BEHAVIORAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCES SURVEY COMMITTEE,
Washington, D.C., August 18, 1969.

Dr. O. MEREDITH WILSON,
Director, Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences
Stanford, Calif.

DEAR DR. WILSON: Because of my services as a consultant to the Behavioral Sciences Division of the Ford Foundation in the days when the Center was under discussion, and because of my residence in Stanford ever since the opening, I have been in an unusually good position to watch its development and to assess how well it has served the purposes for which it was established. I had one year there myself—in 1956–1957—so that I saw it from the inside as well.

As this letter indicates, I have currently been involved in a study of the status of the behavioral and social sciences on a national basis, under the joint auspices of the National Academy of Sciences and the Social Science Research Council. This gives me some added perspective from which to view the work of the Center, for the fields we have chosen to explore (anthropology, economics, geography, history, linquistics, political science, psychiatry, psychology, sociology, and aspects of mathematics-statistics-computation) have all been within the range of fellow-selection by the Center.

I can present one "statistic" to show how influential the Center has become in creating a body of behavioral and social scientists concerned with the broader aspects of their disciplines in their relation to each other. We set out to find the best representatives that we could of each of the specialties named above, by consulting the officers of the national professional associations, representatives in the National Research Council, Division of Behavioral Science, and in the Social Science Research Council. In this way we appointed a group of chairmen and co-chairmen for the separate panels, and had them nominate members for their committees to be as widely representative as possible of the range of their disciplines, chiefly of energetic and productive men at the height of their careers rather than the established senior citizens.

The result was that we came up with 76 members of our committees and panels responsible for the reports soon to appear. The "statistic" to which I refer is that a recent check shows that 33 of these 76, or 43 percent, had been Fellows at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences. There was no deliberate effort to select Fellows; in the effort to achieve diversity it was quite possible that Fellows might have been sidestepped. In any case, I find this a fitting testimony as to what the Center has done in selecting promising men, and in motivating then to accept appointment in serving their professions and society at large through nonremunerated activity such as that of our survey.

If there is one theme central to the report that we are preparing from our survey, it is that the behavioral and social sciences are now at the stage that their data and methods can be made increasingly pertinent to the social crises of our day. This who have participated widely in the interdisciplinary discussions at the Center have been prepared to see the limitations that are imposed by an exclusive preoccupation with disciplinary specialization, and they have been helpful in working out suggestions for new forms of organization that will permit work to go on at a high scientific level while at the same time meeting new standards of potential relevance.

If there is any criticism I would have of the Center it is that with but 50 Fellows per year it cannot possibly meet the needs of the very rapidly growing fields that it serves. It has been so successful, in my mind, that it ought to be duplicated elsewhere. I have been pleased to learn, for example, of a grant of $400,000 from the National Science Foundation to establish a facility for advanced study in social science at the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton. The readiness for such a new facility is a tribute to the influence of your Center in the past.

Postdoctoral training is coming to be expected in the physical and biological sciences as a matter of course, and only more slowly so in psychology and the social sciences. In some parts of Europe and Asia there is a special kind of degree or diploma issued on the basis of advanced scholarship, after formal graduate-school training is completed. We may be coming to that in this country. The many "specialty-boards" in medicine are being duplicated now in psychology; this is a straw in the wind. Apart from formalities, there is no doubt that the Center is a postdoctoral educational institution, contributing to the understanding of advanced scholars, and through them modifying the course of training in our universities.

Sincerely yours,

ERNEST R. HILGARD,
Chairman, Behavioral and Social Sciences Survey Committee.

STATEMENT OF CARL KAYSEN, DIRECTOR OF INSTITUTE FOR ADVANCED STUDY

The Institute for Advanced Study is devoted to the encouragement, support and patronage of learning—of science, in the old, broad, undifferentiated sense of the word. The Institute partakes of the character both of a university and of a research institute; but it also differs in significant ways from both. It is unlike a university, for instance, in its small size—its academic membership at any one time numbers only about one hundred fifty. It is unlike a university in that it has no scheduled courses of instruction and no commitment that all or most branches of learning be represented in its Faculty and members. It is unlike a research institute in that its purposes are broader, that it supports many separate fields of study, that it maintains no laboratories; and above all in that it welcomes temporary members, whose intellectual development and growth are one of its principal purposes. The Institute, in short, is devoted to learning, in the double sense of the continued education of the individual, and of the intellectual enterprise on which he is embarked.

The Institute was founded in 1930 by gift of Louis Bamberger and his sister, Mrs. Felix Fuld. The further financial basis for its development and growth was provided by a substantial legacy from the founders. Mr. Bamberger and Mrs. Fuld were greatly influenced in their conception of what the Institute should be by the ideas of Abraham Flexner, its first Director. Flexner, who had earlier led the reform of medical education in the United States, was then at the Rockefeller Institute (now Rockefeller University) which he had helped to create. He was concerned that American universities at the time did not provide adequately for the pursuit of science and learning at the highest levels. Americans who wanted to be trained in that pursuit had to go to Europe for training, and most of the leading figures in science and scholarship were to be found abroad in Germany, France, and England. It was Flexner's purpose to bring the possibility of leadership in many of these fields to this country; and the gifts of Mr. Bamberger and Mrs. Fuld gave effect to it. I think the record of the Institute will show that their hopes were realized and, having been Director only a short time, I think I can say that in all modesty.

At present the academic work of the Institute is carried on in three schools: a School of Mathematics, a School of Natural Sciences, and a School of Historical Studies. The members of the School of Mathematics are for the most part pure mathematicians, and the members of the School of Natural Sciences theoretical physicists, astrophysicists, and astronomers; but there have been members in both these Schools who have worked in other sciences—chemistry, biology, and psychology, for example. The School of Historical Studies is broader still in scope, and includes in principle all learning for which the use of the historical method is a chief instrument. Here, too, our work tends to reflect the interests of the Faculty: Greek archaeology and epigraphy, Greek philosophy and philology, Roman history, palaeography, medieval history and the history of art, modern history, the history of mathematics and the sciences. Here again there have been members, working alone or in concert, in disciplines not represented on the Faculty.

In these three Schools together, the Institute has twenty-three professors (not counting the Director) who constitute its present Faculty: 9 in mathematics, 5 in physics, and 9 in historical studies.

For the three year period beginning with the academic year 1968–69, the Institute is broadening its range by the addition of a small experimental program in the social sciences. This will involve bringing together for each of the three years six to eight scholars who are using the methods and perspectives of the social sciences in the study of history, especially the study of social change. The visitors under this program will be drawn from a variety of disciplines, including history, sociology, anthropology, economics, political science and psychology. The program aims at providing the stimulation of discussion of common perspectives by scholars working on a variety of problems, not an integrated team or project approach. This program is being financed by a grant from the Carnegie Corporation and the Russell Sage Foundation.

A principal function of the Institute is to provide for members who come here for short periods, for a term or a year or, in the Schools of Mathematics and Natural Sciences, occasionally for two years. There are currently some hundred twenty such members in residence. Admission to membership is by vote of the Faculty concerned. Perhaps a half or two-thirds of our members are invited by us because we know or learn of their work, and believe that a time here would be fruitful for them, for their work, and for that of other members; other members are selected from the many applicants who write to us outlining the state of their researches and their reasons for desiring to come. Inevitably there is a real competition for memberships, since both the physical limitation of the institution, and the desire to preserve a community small enough to be a true community, limit the number of members admissable.

Of the visiting members more than half are young men and women within a few years of their doctorate. The work they do at the Institute contains a high element of postdoctoral training as opposed to research. In Mathematics and Natural Sciences postdoctoral training is widely recognized as a regular part of the process of preparation for those who are entering the academic and research profession. The work of the balance of the members, who are for the most part already well established academically, can correspondingly be viewed as having a larger element of research and a smaller one of training although of course any scholar is engaged in the process of learning throughout his whole life.

The work product of the Institute is therefore of two kinds: the research that is produced by its permanent faculty and the visiting members, and the training that the visiting members receive. In both respects the work of the Institute, though small in volume, is of significant importance because of its quality, and because its visitors come to it from, and return to, the leading institutions of higher education and research in this country and indeed, to a great extent, in the rest of the world as well.

Some flavor of its past activities can be conveyed by mentioning the names of a few of its professors and the subjects in which they have been active. In mathematics. Marston Morse and Hassler Whitney, recognized as among the leading American mathematicians, are both professors in the Institute. Amongst Europeans who have come to this country and become a permanent part of its mathematical community, many have been at the Institute, including notably, Herman Weyl at an earlier period and André Weil and Atle Selberg today. The late John von Neuann was professor of mathematics at the Institute, and he was distinguished not only for his important papers in a great many different branches of mathematics but also for his fundamental contribution to the invention of the electronic computing machine, his work on long range weather forecasting, and his important services to the national defense. The 1968 Report of the National Academy of Sciences on the Mathematical Sciences describes the Institute as "a world center of mathematical research."

In physics, of course, the name of Albert Einstein, who was professor here from the foundation of the Institute, springs first to mind. C. N. Yang and T. D. Lee were working at the Institute when they did the work for which they received the Nobel Prize. In the '50s, the Institute shared with Niels Bohr's Institute of Theoretical Physics in Copenhagen the position of the world's leading center of theoretical nuclear physics. Today the Institute counts among its faculty members in physics Professors Freeman Dyson, the recipient of this year's Max Planck Medal and one of the world's leading mathematical physicists, and Marshall Rosenbluth, America's leading contributor to the understanding of plasmas. Rosenbluth was the recipient of the Einstein Award in 1967.

In the historical fields, amongst many distinguished men, one can mention the late Erwin Panofsky, this generation's most erudite and influential historian of art, and Homer Thompson whose work as the supervisor of excavations in the Athenian Agora for a generation has been a major factor in increasing our knowledge and understanding of classical Greece.

The Institute relies primarily on its own resources for the financing of its operation and in the last academic year more than three-quarters of its receipts came from the return on its own investments (including realized capital gains), somewhat less than 20% from grants and contracts from govenment agencies, and 5% from grants from private foundations and other private organizations. Thus, if we are not an educational institution under the proposed new law, we become a private foundation, and we would not qualify as an operating foundation.

The language which defines an educational institution for the purposes of the Act, Section 201(a) (1) (B) (ii), speaks of an organization "which normally maintains a regular faculty and curriculum and normally has a regularly enrolled body of pupils or students in attendance at a place where its educational activities are regularly carried on." While we can clearly meet the tests of having a regular faculty and a regularly enrolled body of students in attendance at the Institute, I am less ready to assert that we can clearly meet the requirement of maintaining a regular curriculum, since the essence of our enterprise is the guided self-education of the members, even the youngest of whom have already had considerable academic training, along lines based on their past activities and present interests.

The status of "private foundation" under the proposed statute would present the Institute with two serious problems. First, of course, would be the direct impact of the proposed tax. Had the provisions of the House Bill been applied to us in our last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1969, we would have had to pay nearly $250,000 in taxes. This is a large sum, and equals a quarter of what we spent on grants and stipends for visitors in that year. It is clear that taxation at such a rate would force a significant curtailment of our activity. Second, and even more important, would be the effect on our relations with the major grant-making foundations. Since the Bill would create doubt as to whether we were in fact an educational institution, these foundations would be properly hesitant in making grants to us since such grants might not be "qualifying distributions" under the Bill. As a consequence, our ability to initiate new programs or to continue and expand the one we have just initiated would be severely handicapped if not completely ended. The new program in the social sciences about which I spoke above was initiated on an experimental basis with grants from the Carnegie Corporation and the Russell Sage Foundation. The first step toward putting it on a long-run basis has been a grant from the Ford Foundation, conditional on a somewhat greater matching effort from other private sources. This example is not untypical in that grants from the larger private foundations have played a significant role in making possible new ventures in enterprises such as the Institute as well as in the univeristies and colleges. The combined effect of both these restrictions—the diminution in the availability of our own resources to support our programs, and the inhibition of foundation support—would be to curtail our existing program seriously, and impair our capacity for growth even more seriously.

The experience of nearly 40 years has shown that the idea of the Institute has been a useful and beneficial one and that the Institute fills an important place in the whole stream of American higher education. In the fields in which we have been most active in the past—mathematics, theoretical physics, and astrophysics, classical archaeology, classical and medieval history, the history of art are the most important—the Institute has played an important role in the development of the ideas and research interests of a significant proportion of the best men in the faculties of American universities. It has further had an important function as an international meeting place in which Americans and Europeans exchanged ideas and kept abreast of each other's work in these same fields. It is my hope that in the future it can play the same critical role in developing areas in the social sciences. The Institute has been an innovator, one of the first institutions in this country to recognize the importance of postdoctoral training to the career of the young scientist and scholar. It has had many followers in its history, and independent institutions such as the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, or the Centers for Advanced Study that are part of a University such as those at the University of Illinois, the University of Virginia, the Institute of Historical Research at the University of Wisconsin, Dumbarton Oaks here in Washington which is in effect the Institute of Byzantine Studies of Harvard University, as well as others here and abroad have followed its model.

Functionally the Institute is an integral part of the system of higher education in the United States. Its basic mission is a combination of advanced training and research. Its faculty are academic personnel, all of whom have taught and done research in major universities both in the United States and abroad before coming to the Institute. Further, from time to time, many of them serve as visiting professors in these same institutions. Visiting members of the Institute come from the universities and return to them, typically to their faculties. One chief aim of their stay here is to enhance their capacities for continuing research and advanced training at the universities. Both the faculty and the visiting members are all active contributors to the scientific and scholarly literatures of their respective disciplines. There is no logical basis for distinguishing between the same functions in a part or subdivision of a university, and in an independent non-profit institution, and recognizing one but not the other as part of the system of higher education.

In the light of this, I submit that it is squarely within the policy purpose of the Bill before the Committee so to modify its language that the Institute, as well as other specialized institutions of research and advanced training operating in a similar way, is clearly given the same exempt status that other institutions which are also part of the system of higher education enjoy.

Senator ANDERSON. The next witness is the Honorable Brooks Hays, Chairman of the Southern Committee on Political Ethics.

STATEMENT OF HON. BROOKS HAYS, CHAIRMAN OF THE SOUTHERN COMMITTEE ON POLITICAL ETHICS

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, having been a Member of Congress for 16 years, and having served as acting chairman of the Cox committee to study foundations, I am aware of the pressure of time, and I will try to be very brief.

I was inspired to request this time largely because I thought it might be helpful to share with the committee the results of that study, which was in a different context in 1953. I will simply highlight some of the things that came to the members of the committee as a result of the study which was prompted by Congressman Eugene Cox of Georgia. Upon his death I succeeded to the chairmanship.

Incidentally, I wanted to make available to your staff the full findings, because it was a rather comprehensive statement. The interesting thing to me, Mr. Chairman, was that Congressman Cox changed his mind about foundations. He went into the study with a negative attitude, believing that something was wrong with the foundation system, even going as far as to express the suspicion that it was against the interest and the traditions of the United States.

I watched his evolving conclusions, and was quite impressed with the conviction he expressed at the end, that the foundation system is thoroughly American, and is important in our free enterprise system.

Foundations are what I call creatures of freedom and are of great service in buttressing the humanitarian things that Government in modern times has to do.

The statement of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., impressed our committee. He said "it is harder to give away a dollar intelligently than to make it honestly."

The Congress of the United States and all who preside over this Government need all the help that they can get in the great business of relieving distress, and that is what it is all about.

I serve as a member of two college boards. I am on the Board of George Washington University, and for a longer period I have been on the George Peabody Board, the college for teachers at Nashville. This college grew out of one of the early foundation movements.

George Peabody, a great philanthropist, was drawn in great compassion toward the plight of the South following the Civil War, and he asked experts to make a thorough study of where he could best use his money. So while the modern foundation is a flowering of this impulse to help needy people, and to aid in the great causes of education and health and welfare, we found that it even goes back to Rome and to Greece, and the committee is probably familiar with the Charitable Use Statute of 1611 in England, when it was found that even the church, with all of its wealth and it was from a third to a half of all the wealth of the land was not able to do the work that needed to be done to meet human distress.

I am appearing as chairman of the Southern Committee on Political Ethics, and I would like to say that I have no interest from the standpoint of exemptions for us. We are not eligible because we decided that it might unduly limit our activity. My appearance is not in the interest of any tax exemption for us.

But we are students of the problems of politics, and we just happen to be a group of southerners, I hope in time that it will spread out. Pursuing the idea of helping to improve the moral and ethical tone of our political system, we encountered good work being done by tax exempt organizations, the Southern Regional Council, for example.

I would hope that the committee would approach the problem of limiting the activities of foundations with great caution, and that your best craftsmanship would be used in this area because while I agree thoroughly with what is obviously the general feeling of the Congress that foundation money should never be used to help an individual candidate nor to help one party or another, I think that to say that foundations must not do anything that affects legislation would unduly restrict the activities of some very fine and useful organizations.

Our group is composed of newspapermen like Harding Carter and Hugh Patterson, former Members of Congress, Frank Smith, Carl Elliot, and Hugo Sims, and public men like Camille Gravell of Louisiana. It is bipartisan. We have leaders of the black community, Vernon Jordan of Atlanta, Clarence Mitchel of Baltimore and others.

So, Mr. Chairman, I simply hope that the committee might take a look at the summary of my views which I have hastily sketched here, and such portions of the Cox Committee report that the staff calls to your attention.

Americans are a compassionate people and I know that those who preside over the affairs of this Nation are not going to let human suffering go unattended. But if we do not have this help from private resources with the great ingenuity and inventiveness and vision that private organizations can supply, we will have a trend toward stateism in the field that ought not to be entirely preempted by either the church, which is left unfettered of course in its eleemosynary work, or the State, resulting from the pressures on the State to do the things that some are saying the foundations should not do.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for letting me make this statement.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question. First I want to welcome our former colleague. At least three of us have had the privilege of serving with you in the House, and I want to thank you for coming here and speaking up in behalf of what I regard as a group of organizations that are very vital to our way of life.

Would you subscribe to this general approach, that we first provide for complete reporting followed by very thorough auditing by the IRS, and find out what the facts are before we embark on any major legislation, except in those fields where an abuse is clearly defined and there are available answers?

Mr. HAYS. I most certainly would, Senator. I think that this would be a great step, and I think you are going to find what we might call the old, the mature, the legitimate foundations are all in agreement on this. I have not studied the matter of disclosures, but the Cox committee recommended that legislation be enacted to require that all grants be publicized. You have the problem of defining the legislative function, drawing the line so that administrative functions are not impaired, and things that must be done by the IRS are left to them, because much of it I think is already provided for. The IRS should be fully equipped to hold the foundations to an accounting.

Nevertheless, if If understand your question, I am in thorough agreement with it, because this is a public trust. The foundations are engaged in the great business of administering trusts, and what they do, since they enjoy these privileges, should be disclosed.

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you very much.

(Mr. Hays' prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF BROOKS HAYS, CHAIRMAN SOUTHERN COMMITTEE ON POLITICAL ETHICS

SUMMARY

Mr. Hays appears as Chairman of the Southern Committee on Political Ethics, and as former Acting Chairman of the House Select Committee to Investigate Foundations in 1952.

From his personal experiences with foundation programs over two decades, Mr. Hays has very favorable impressions of them. He feels they have been, and are, of particular importance to the uplifting of the Southern States. He notes that the Southern Committee on Political Ethics has no self-interest in this matter, since it is not tax-exempt and receives no foundation support.

He points out that when the House Select Committee to Investigate Foundations was established in 1952, the activities of a few foundations had caused apprehension and concern. In its investigation the Committee found:

In general, foundations were not diverting their resources from their basic purposes and were not working against the interests or traditions of the United States.

The larger and older foundations were rendering great service to the country.

The larger foundations favored public accounting and disclosure, some smaller ones opposed it.

The Select Committee recommended full disclosure of all grants.

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman, and members of this distinguished Committee, my name is Brooks Hays. I appear before the Committee today in my capacity as Chairman of the Southern Committee on Political Ethics, and also as former Member of Congress, where for 16 years I represented the Fifth Congressional District of Arkansas. In that capacity, I served, in 1952, as Acting Chairman of the House Select Committee to Investigate Foundations, assuming that position upon the death of the Chairman, the Honorable E. E. Cox of Georgia.

The Select Committee's investigation of the foundations sparked an interest in their activities which I have maintained through the years. During my career, I have had the honor, in addition to my service as a Member of Congress, to serve as Special Assistant to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, as a member of the board of directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, as an Assistant Secretary of State, and as a member of the faculties of Rutgers University and the University of Massachusetts.

At present, I am a member of the governing boards at George Peabody College and George Washington University. I am also Executive Director of the National Conference on Citizenship, which was chartered by Congress in 1953. I am a director of the Southern Regional Council, and Director of the Ecumenical Council of Wake Forest University.

I have sketched this background, Mr. Chairman, to indicate the variety of experiences which have helped shape my convictions regarding the great value of private foundations to our total American society. In almost every activity in which I have engaged over the past two decades I have come in contact with foundation programs. My cumulative impression of those programs is an extremely favorable one.

The advancement of the South, in all areas of activity, has, of course, been of special interest to me. In 1967, I joined with a small group of Southerners, a list of whom is attached, to found the Southern Committee on Political Ethics (SCOPE). Our purpose is to do whatever we can to help elevate the tone of political activity and to dignify the profession of public service in our region.

My fellow members of SCOPE asked me to appear before this Committee to oppose the imposition of unreasonable restrictions on foundation activities. In doing so, we have no self-interest. SCOPE is not a tax-exempt organization, and cannot receive foundation support.

However, we note that many organizations which are working effectively for the uplifting of the South do receive foundation help. An example is the Southern Regional Council and its Voter Registration Project. There are many others. Many of these, as I understand it, could not have been established under the provisions of the bill passed by the House.

I hope the Committee will consider very carefully the provisions of the Bill which would prohibit the use of foundation funds in any manner which might influence legislation.

While certainly no substantial portion of the funds or activities of foundations and their grantees should be used to influence legislation, a complete prohibition seems to be unreasonable. A great many things, in one way or another, eventually influence legislation, often in very constructive ways. As the language in the bill is now drawn, I fear that the result would be a very inhibiting influence on foundation officials in making grants in areas of public concern.

I mentioned, Mr. Chairman, that I had the honor of serving as the ranking member and later as Acting Chairman of the Select Committee to Investigate Foundations during the 82nd Congress in 1952. At that time, as now, the activities of a few foundations has caused some apprehension and concern.

The Committee was given a mandate by the House to determine "if the foundations were using their resources for purposes other than those for which they were established for purposes not in the interest or tradition of the United States."

In general, the Committee found that these organizations were not diverting their resources and were not working against the interest or tradition of the United States.

The Committee did find that a negligible number of foundations—a few of the smaller ones—had permitted subversive influences to penetrate their organizations. Such cases were duly reported to the appropriate agencies of the government.

The older and larger foundations—such as Rockefeller, Ford and Carnegie—were determined to have rendered a great service in the fields of health and education and in expanding the frontiers of knowledge.

We found that the larger foundations favored public accounting and public accountability. Some of the smaller ones opposed this, largely on the grounds that it would inhibit some contributions. Our Committee recommended that all such information should be filed with the Internal Revenue Service, and that full disclosure should be made of all grants.

On the question of tax evasion by use of the foundation device, the Committee found some abuses and recommended further study. The Internal Revenue Service was at that time giving attention to such abuses.

Mr. Chairman, the highly-competent general counsel for the Select Committee, Mr. Harold M. Keele of Chicago, was entitled to much of the credit for the excellence of the study. His views and experience might perhaps be of value in the present situation.

I have with me a copy of the Select Committee's report. I don't wish to burden the record unless the Chairman feels it would be valuable, but I will be happy to make a copy available to the Committee and the staff.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would like to echo the sentiments of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who once observed that it is more difficult to give a dollar away intelligently than to make it honestly.

I feel, based on my experiences, that the responsible foundations are trying to operate their philanthropies in an intelligent and constructive manner.

I believe the American foundations are creatures of freedom, and are making great contributions toward the strengthening of our society.

Senator ANDERSON. Next is Dr. Elvis Stahr. We are glad to see you here.

STATEMENT OF DR. ELVIS STAHR, PRESIDENT, AUDUBON SOCIETY

Dr. STAHR. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I have submitted a written statement which for the sake of brevity I shall touch upon only in part. However, I would appreciate it if the full statement could be incorporated in the record.

Senator ANDERSON. Without objection that will be done.

Dr. STAHR. I am Elvis Stahr, president of the National Audubon Society. I am speaking today for the Audubon Society, and also for the National Conservancy, the National Wildlife Federation, Trout Unlimited and the Wilderness Society. Also Mr. Chairman I have a letter from the Izaak Walton League of America which I would like to have appended to my statement with your permission.

Senator ANDERSON. Without objection that will be done.

(The letter follows:)

THE IZAAK WALTON LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
Glenview, Ill., October 2, 1969.

Hon. ELVIS J. STAHR,
National Audubon Society,
New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. STAHR: The Izaak Walton League is pleased that you will have the privilege of appearing in person before the Senate Finance Committee in connection with the tax reform bill. As you know, the League was required to submit its statement for the record by September 9, which gave us practically no time at all to study the myriad of complex legal details of the proposed legislation. Consequently, the League statement was confined to the basic thrust of the bill as it pertains to relationships between citizen conservation societies concerned with human environmental issues and charitable foundations and others which provide some of the operating funds of such societies.

We find it unfair, unjust and against the broad public interest that such citizen societies should be prevented from any activity, supported by charitable funds, which directly, indirectly or ultimately might have some influence on legislation to protect and preserve environmental values; whereas any business with a dollar interest in an activity which threatens such environmental values is free to take any and all steps to influence legislation and charge it off to business expense for tax purposes. This would be intolerable and can hardly represent the intent of Congress, which has clearly demonstrated its concern with environmental values.

We urged also that the sections of the bill dealing with foundations and other such charitable organizations be deleted from the bill and be taken up in depth and detail in public hearings at which all view points can be adequately expressed.

Your statement in behalf of the National Audubon Society has been studied. The League is happy to be associated with it.

Sincerely,

J. W. PENFOLD,
Conservation Director.

Dr. STAHR. These conservation groups together with ours comprise over a half million members and our organizations are dependent entirely upon voluntary public support. We receive no Government grants, and I am not here to plead the cause for private foundations. Rather, I am here solely to speak for the field of conservation.

When man landed on the moon he found not a living thing for the moon has no water, no air, indeed none of the elements that life depends upon. Back here on earth today Lake Erie is dead, the largest river on the east coast, the Hudson, is in its death throes. It is little more than an open sewer as it flows past the biggest city in the country.

The very air we breathe contains rising amounts of pollutants, and a declining proportion of oxygen. The parade of examples of serious pollution and degradation of our national environment is far too long to embark upon further here.

Our concern is to try to see to it that this death march is halted, and that this earth of ours does not become another moon, barren and lifeless, or a place unfit for a full and healthful life for man.

The cause of conservation, I submit, cannot and should not be abandoned on the door step of Government. It is the vital concern of all people. We see it as our role to inform mankind about the natural world he inhabits, and about his relations to it and about its importance to him.

As I have said, we are not here to speak for private foundations. Indeed we believe foundations in general have been derelict for they have been slow to recognize the very grave problems of conservation. In the past few years, however, we have been successful in generating increasing financial support from foundations. I say financial support for that is in truth the only really effective support they can give. The foundations are not experts in conservation and they usually don't pretend to be.

Their most effective role in conservation is to give financial support to organizations which are experts in the field.

Yet the struggle to preserve our planet as a place where decent life can exist is to be won as it must be won, our efforts will have to be expanding and steadily increased over the long pull. It is therefore essential that we have an ever increasing amount of support from every source available including foundations. Any thing that will in any way endanger the increasing and continuing perpetual support of conservation we must view as potentially fatal.

We believe that the proposed tax law which you are considering presents just such a danger, probably inadvertently. Our concern is not alone with the details of specific provisions but also with the overall impact, in that the bill seems to add up almost to a general policy to put a damper on future contributions, both from foundations and from private citizens, to organizations such as ours.

As it stands, it may not hurt foundations as such nearly as much as it will hurt conservation.

I have referred in my written statement to sections in H.R. 13270 that appear the most dangerous to us. I would like to talk about two of them very briefly now.

The first is the divestiture provisions of section 4943. As I have said, we see the war for conservation as never ending. It will require perpetual support. To the extent that 4943 will discourage additions to existing foundations and the creation of new ones, we will have lost an important source of increasing perpetual support.

I have recently been made aware of an amendment of Senator Miller's which appears to represent the type of balanced and equitable approach that I am suggesting.

Second, the penalty provisions of section 4943 are extremely, even though indirectly, dangerous to us. Our most effective weapon in conservation is an informed public, and we must attempt to educate and thereby affect the opinion of the general public to support both the Government's and our own efforts, for without that support little can be done by anyone.

We believe that a grant to us by a foundation will not be prohibited by 4945, but we are not the ones to decide if such a grant shall be made. That decision must be made by the foundation managers, and they may very well be advised by their counsel that it is possible that such a grant may be subject to the sanctions of 4945. You see, because of the severe penalties of 4945, foundation managers will have to live in the world of possibilities. If they decide to play it ultra safe, they won't suffer. We will.

If we are to be realistic in expecting future foundation support, it must be made clear that grants to bona fide conservation organizations will not be subject to the penalties of 4945.

There are other provisions of H.R. 13270 which will diminish the ability and/or the incentive of private donors to support us, and my written statement mentions them. They need balanced consideration, taking more fully into account—than in our view does the House bill—the values to our society of the work done by nonprofit groups such as ours.

At a time when the cause of conservation is just beginning to receive the very essential supports of foundations, and of growing numbers of concerned private citizens, it is our earnest hope that whatever changes may come in the tax law will not have the effect of diminishing that support, for if they do, we are the ones that will suffer and when I say we, I speak in fact of all mankind.

In short, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we plead with you to take a most careful look at this bill from the point of view of beneficiaries such as we all are for the kind of tax incentives that encourage support of the conservation effort.

If I may borrow a phrase from Mr. Hays who just testified, we hope you will use our best craftsmanship to achieve a fair and equitable and constructive result.

Thank you.

Senator ANDERSON. Are there questions? I wouldn't want you to be here without somebody saying that you were a fine man, you served with distinction in the administration some years ago and we are glad to have you before us.

Dr. STAHR. Thank you very much, sir.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment upon the case made against the divestiture provision. I agree with you very much.

With a new foundation it is very likely that it will be created by the donor out of something that he has; isn't that correct?

Dr. STAHR. Yes, sir.

Senator CURTIS. It is easier for him to give a portion of his business than to give anything else.

Dr. STAHR. That is often true.

Senator CURTIS. And this divestiture serves no purpose whatever. It will not bring in one dime of revenue, and there is no evidence before the committee that that particular class of foundations are guilty of any more laxity than anybody else. That is the reason that I strongly favor a period of gathering some information before we try to find the answers. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE ELVIS J. STAHR, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL AUDUBON SOCIETY

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I am Elvis J. Stahr, President of the National Audubon Society, one of this country's largest direct-membership conservation organizations. Today I am speaking for the Audubon Society and am associated with several other conservation organizations—Izaak Walton League of America, National Conservancy, National Wildlife Federation, Trout Unlimited and Wilderness Society. Each of these organizations concurs with the fundamental principles enunciated in this statement but not necessarily with the exact wording. Obviously, the other organizations are not responsible for any answers I give to questions you might ask.

These organizations have a combined membership of over 500,000. As our membership has grown through the years, so have our concerns with the environment in which we live.

Someone who starts out watching a bird soon realizes that when that bird can no longer find a tree to nest in, or a swamp in which to search for food, the bird cannot survive. Our birdwatcher soon finds that this applies to every other member of the animal kingdom, including man—each species needs its own special food and shelter, yet all are inter-related. So our members wind up worrying about a lot more things than birds and wildlife. That's what has happened to us and it is reflected for example in the Audubon's official statement of objectives:

> To promote the conservation of wildlife and the natural environment.
> To educate man regarding his relationship with, and his place within, the natural environment as an ecological system.

In pursuing these objectives through the years we have established many private sanctuaries and parks in several different parts of the country, to help preserve habitat as well as wildlife. We have helped inform the public about the battles to save our publicly-owned wild areas—to name just a few, the redwoods, the Grand Canyon, the Everglades, the Great Swamp.

We have pioneered in teaching concepts of conservation to both adults and children—with summer study camps primarily for teachers and youth workers, with long-standing programs of producing teaching material on natural history and conservation at all grade levels, with fine nature centers which we have helped local people plan and establish all over the country.

The purposes of our organizations, then, are two—action and education. This can encompass anything from taking kids out of the city ghetto on a walk through a centuries-old hemlock forest, to working to save one of our precious unique wildernesses. It includes battling a world-wide pollutant that we feel is such a critical threat to all of us. I refer, of course, to our current campaign against "hard" pesticides—those insect-killers that farsighted scientsists warned us long ago would turn on us and destroy the life around that we cherish and, indeed, cannot live without.

The key phrase in this brief discussion of conservation and the environment is that last one—"cannot live without."

People are just beginning to realize fully what we are doing to our environment—how closely all living things are tied together in a web of mutual support—and how wantonly we have been tearing that web apart. We have wrested precious minerals from the land and left behind acres of stripped soil, mountains of slag and tailings. We have felled the trees and left the land behind open to erosion and flooding, then taken the wood, made it into pulp, and dumped the wastes into our rivers—along with our sewage, garbage and chemicals. We have called our wetlands useless and have proceeded to make them just that by filling them up with our bounty of tin cans, old stoves, refrigerators, furniture and junked cars. Our affluent society, with its cars, air conditioning and central heating, has given our urban areas such polluted air that it is a health hazard just to stand on a street corner in places like New York and Los Angeles and breathe.

The message we conservationists try to get across is that man cannot live without trees, clean water, clean air, unpolluted wetlands and shorelines, and productive natural life cycles of both plants and animals; that man must learn to use nature's resources and to return them to her in a way in which she can use them to renew life, not destroy it.

We have no selfish motives, no profit motives—we have only the public interest to serve, including the interests of our posterity in a decent environment on this planet.

We know now why life wasn't found on the moon. It simply lacks the air, water and other basic ingredients of the processes which make life possible here on Earth. It is ironic indeed that these very ingredients are being seriously degraded, polluted and in some cases even destroyed here on earth.

Now we are gettiing down to the reason I am here. This tax reform bill, as passed by the House, would be a serious setback to the conservation movement. It would have no direct effect on any of our organizations, because we are not "private foundations." But indirectly, it would curtail the activities of non-profit conservation organizations that depend upon philanthropy and Foundation grants for part of their budgets.

It would endanger our sources of funds just at a time when groups like ours so urgently need to step up our efforts to make the public aware of the facts and the dangers in connection with what is happening to the environment and to develop alternative solutions for problems in their own communities, states and areas.

As members of this committee, you are aware of how vital it is to have an informed public, and how important a role private organizations can and do play in educating all of us on many important matters. There need to be means of informing interested citizens other than through government sources.

This is not to say that government agencies have not done fine work in some areas. But in other areas they have failed—to get an idea of what they have failed to do, may I suggest you read the recent report of the citizens' panel of the President's new Council on Environmental Quality. So we feel strongly that these private organizations must be strengthened.

You will appreciate my concern, then, that practically out of the blue we are confronted with new—and surely unintentioned—roadblocks to that strengthening. In general, we are in agreement with Assistant Secretary Cohen's statement that, "The Federal Government thus has a vital interest in insuring that their assets [private foundations] are properly applied. The provisions of the House bill dealing with private foundations will tend to insure that their property is devoted solely to charitable purposes. Private foundations will thus become an [sic] even more useful as a flexible source of support for achievement of new levels of thought and action, relieving the burdens of government." In this respect, we approve many of the purposes of the bill. However, we fear that the House in its enthusiasm to insure devotion of the property of foundations to charitable purposes may have created a law which in some instances will produce the opposite result.

The problems related to private foundations not our sole concern, but as objective beneficiaries of grants and gifts from private foundations as well as from the general public we would like to discuss proposed Code sections 84 and 277, 506, 4942, 4943, and 4945:

SECTIONS 84 AND 277

The combined effect of the limitation on tax preferences and allocations of deductions may critically penalize conservation organizations since substantial gifts of real estate and other property for such purposes would no longer be attractive to donors. We concur with the Administration's suggested removal of charitable gifts from the area of limit on tax preferences and allocation of deductions:

". . . it appears that the inclusion [in the Bill] of gifts of appreciated property to charity as a tax reference item will reduce the benefit of the contribution, and thus, unduly restrict public support of worthwhile educational and other public charitable institutions."

SECTION 506

In providing new laws concerning charitable organizations, the House created section 506 (7½% tax on investment income) primarily so that taxpayers, in general, would not have to pay the increased governmental supervisory costs. We also believe private foundations should pay such administrative costs. However, 7½% is too high to be a true license fee. We recommend the adoption of the Administration proposal of a 2% rate, and consider it important that the money be suitably earmarked for administration and supervising.

SECTION 4942

As beneficiaries we believe that a minimum distribution requirement is sound. We are in complete agreement with the House's philosophy that when donors receive immediate and sometimes substantial tax benefits from contributions, charitable organizations should receive current benefits.

While our group approves the principle of a statutory income equivalent, it is not prepared to comment on the appropriate percentage, nor on the many technical problems that undoubtedly exist in this difficult section, except for the definition of "operating foundation" in section 4942(j) (3) (B) (ii). This provision attempts to prohibit private foundations from creating other private foundations in order to circumvent the income equivalent. As drafted, it may discourage the creation of new small charitable organizations.

The limitation of receiving funds from the public or at least five exempt organizations none of which contributes more than 25 percent, in effect declares any such organization captive instead of looking to its actual operation. While such a principle may be valid for large organizations, i.e., the larger the entity the easier to measure worthiness by its contact with the public at large, it may be incorrect regarding the establishment and operation of smaller entities. Many worthy organizations would not have been created if this section were applicable since each was originally created by one man, then primarily sustained by the grants of one foundation, and ultimately adopted by the public. These and other entities like them are the future supporters of conservation. If they are automatically defined as non-operating, they will experience difficulty in obtaining grants.

We recognize the technical difficulties inherent in revising this section to accomplish valid purposes without doing away with the type of organization just mentioned, but believe they can be solved.

As beneficiaries we oppose this section. We have benefited greatly from grants by private foundations in the past and hope to in the future.

As stated earlier, we are "objective beneficiaries." If the Senate adopts the House's concept of an income equivalent and proper self-dealing provisions, we see no reason for a divestiture law. The evils of control that have been referred to relate primarily to these two areas. Perhaps there should be some additional safeguards: a requirement of public holding within a reasonable period, for example, would place corporations much of whose stock is held by a private foundation under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Perhaps percentage of ownership should, within a reasonable period, be cut to less than 50%.

As a group, we do not believe it is our place to make specific recommendations along these lines. What is important is that divestiture provisions, if any, should not be so harsh that present donors will be discouraged from adding to foundations, and potential donors will be discouraged from creating them. Foundations are normally created with mixed motives: a desire to protect control of a corporation rather than see it subject to raids or swallowed in an acquisition can quite properly be coupled with a desire to benefit charity. We believe the House limitation of 20% to be both unnecessary and harmful, and hope the final law will either remove the divestiture provision completely or at least substantially liberalize it.

Reiterating the group's position against section 4943, the ends of charity are met where there can be no self-dealing and private foundations must dispense their income annually, regardless of corporate control. In fact, charity has benefited greatly and will continue to do so when men of philanthropic spirit are encouraged to create private foundations with the assets of a business.

We note that section 4945 imposes a 100% tax on every "taxable expenditure" of a private foundation plus a tax of 50% on any foundation manager who agrees to the making of such expenditure, and that the term "taxable expenditure" not only includes any amount paid or incurred by a private foundation to carry on "propaganda" or otherwise to attempt to influence legislation, but also is additionally defined to include "any attempt to influence legislation through and attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof" as well as any private communication with any member or employee of any legislative body or any other person who may participate in the formulation of the legislation.

The precise scope and meaning of these proscriptions are far from clear. Private foundations might well conclude that under the bill they could no longer safely make grants to any exempt organization active in the conservation area of our National life which directly or indirectly engages—to any degree—in any of the activities described above, because it might be deemed that the grantee's activities "tainted", so to speak, the grants by the private foundations and made them "taxable expenditures." Should this occur, it would have a serious adverse impact on a variety of organizations which traditionally, some for more than half a century, have been engaged in conservation work in this country.

The problem, we think, is simple and ominous: the bill imposes such inordinately heavy penalties for tansgression of its provisions, not only on an offending foundation itself, but also on its managers (which by definition include trustees as well as executive officers) as to mean as a practical matter that it is unlikely that foundations will risk making grants to any conservation group since those groups conceivably might—indeed, they sometimes must under their charters—endeavor to influence public opinion to stop the littering, polluting and general degrading of our natural environment, on which every human depends. Public problems of these kinds sooner or later may engage the interest of legislative bodies, from city councils to the Congress, and thus may in instances be said to involve legislation.

We would therefore stress to the Committee that the provisions of the bill regarding foundation grants to non-profit organizations such as ours should be, in any event, much more precisely and clearly defined in order that both private foundations and their grantees might know with certainty what they can and what they cannot properly do, in order that the work of conservation groups, such as ours, which is almost universally approved and applauded, be not significantly impaired.

We earnestly hope, and respectfully ask that you give these provisions of the tax reform bill separate and thorough study on their own merits and demerits.

I would like to mention an additional matter of importance to our group aside from the matters previously covered. If the Committee should decide to recommend an amendment to bill section 201(a)(1)(B) extending the 30% classification to any additional specific type of organizations, it is respectfully requested that there be included "an organization whose principal purpose is to promote the conservation of either wildlife or natural resources."

In conclusion, the conservation societies for which I am speaking today concur with the objective of removing existing evils from the foundation field, but believe that parts of the bill have a punitive rather than remedial effect. We can perseive that an unintended result of parts of the bill will almost surely be the drying up of a most important and proper source of funds upon which religious, educational, conservation and other proper charitable activities must depend in order to do their vital work.

Senator ANDERSON. The next witness is Howard J. Privett, the James Irvine Foundation.

Senator BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, since we have two witnesses from the James Irvine Foundation, maybe we should hear both of them together. That is your decision.

Senator ANDERSON. Will you proceed.

STATEMENT OF HOWARD J. PRIVETT, THE JAMES IRVINE FOUNDATION; ACCOMPANIED BY JOHN T. SAPIENZA, COVINGTON & BURLING, WASHINGTON, D.C.; AND JOHN S. FLUOR, DIRECTOR, JAMES IRVINE FOUNDATION

Mr. PRIVETT. We very much appreciate the opportunity presented to us to present the views of the James Irvine Foundation of the bill that is before you, the members of this very distinguished committee.

My name is Howard J. Privett a member of the law firm of McCutchen, Black, Virleger & Shea of Los Angeles, Calif.

I have served as counsel for the James Irvine Foundation for more than 10 years. On my left sits Mr. John S. Fluor, one of the 11 members of the board of directors of the James Irvine Foundation. On my right sits Mr. John T. Sapienza of the firm of Covington & Burling, the Washington counsel for the foundation.

In the time allotted to us this morning, we should like to address ourselves and to focus your attention for a moment on the effect of two provisions of this bill on the small community oriented foundations like the James Irvine Foundation. The sections I refer to are the provisions for limiting the stock ownership of private foundations and the provisions that relate to a minimum investment return from their investment assets.

Let me say first, that Mrs. Joan Irvine Smith is not a member or director of the James Irvine Foundation nor has she ever been connected with the foundation. She is a granddaughter of James Irvine, the donor of the James Irvine Foundation, and a stockholder in the Irvine Co.

Mr. Irvine was a very successful California businessman. The asset which he had, which he personally characterized as his life's work, was a large landholding which was operated by him as a ranch in Orange County, Calif. It consists of approximately 18 percent of the land area of that county today. In 1937 Mr. Irvine, who had always expressed his philanthropic concern for his neighbors and assisted them during his lifetime, made an irrevocable decision or rather a decision that became irrevocable on his death. He committed 51 percent of the stock of the Irvine Co., which is the incorporated name of the ranch to which I have referred, to the James Irvine Foundation. He did this by establishing a charitable trust under the laws of the State of California and committing to this trust this 51 percent stock ownership during his lifetime. The balance of the stock, or 49 percent, he gave to the various members of his family. Therefore, the Irvine Company is owned 51 percent or majority by the charitable foundation, and the minority of 49 percent is owned by the members of his family.

We think that a close examination of the records that are available, and these are not complete, will disclose that there are literally thousands of foundations in the country, including some of the great ones about which you have heard, and from whom you have heard in the proceedings before this committee, names like the Kellogg Foundation, that have been started by the gift of a substantial business interest to the foundation. So this is not an atypical situation we have with the James Irvine Foundation. We submit that it is typical.

The gift that Mr. Irvine made, when it became irrevocable in 1947 on his death, 10 years after the establishment of the foundation, had a value for estate and inheritance tax purposes of $5.6 million.

Now if this gift had not been for charitable use and expressedly and explicitly limited to charitable use, it would have been subject to an estate inheritance tax of 77 percent, or approximately $4.3 million.

The estate tax benefit, and the only tax benefit conferred by virtue of this gift, was that $4.3 million. Mr. Irvine gained no tax benefits during his lifetime by reason of this gift. The Irvine Co., during Mr.

Irvine's lifetime and at all times since that date, down to the present, has paid the full measure of tax that any other corporation pays. Mr. Irvine gained no tax deduction during his lifetime. On the $4.3 million tax that was not paid on Mr. Irvine's death, what have been the benefits that have been conferred? On this gift income to date has been earned which has been distributed to the private colleges and universities, hospitals, and youth organizations in the communities served by this foundation of $10.3 million. That is to say almost double the amount of the tax benefit conferred or of the loss of tax revenue to the U.S. Treasury has been returned directly to the small community which Mr. Irvine desired to benefit at the time he made this gift.

We, therefore, with this background and with this framework, and we claim no special status for the James Irvine Foundation, indeed we think it is very clear from the Treasury Department report and the express pronouncements of the Treasury following its study, we think it is clear from the hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee that the results obtained for charity by virtue of Mr. Irvine's gift are commonplace in the foundation field.

It is in this framework that we ask the members of the committee to consider first the effects of 20-percent stock ownership limitation. First, it is probably a bad thing for foundations that this has come to be known as the 20-percent stock ownership limitation. It is not that at all. As applied to the small foundations that I am talking about now, it is a 100-percent divestiture requirement. As long as a donor gives part of his business to the members of his family who are the natural objects of his bounty, and he gives the balance of it to a foundation, the foundation must divest itself of all its interest, for as long as much as 20 percent of the stock owned is owned by members of the donor's family, the foundation is not permitted to own any stock.

Accordingly as applied to the Irvine Foundation, we would be required to divest 100 percent of our stock in the Irvine Co.

Now it has already been observed that a very substantial portion of the capital available in the country today that can be transferred and devoted for public use and for our concern for the betterment of American life is in business enterprises owned by men of vision and concern like Mr. Irvine. We submit that there have been no facts established by either the Treasury Department or in the hearings thus far held which would warrant the adoption of a so drastic and far reaching rule as the compulsory divestiture that has been proposed in the House bill.

We respectfully draw the attention of the members of the committee to the lack of the existence of any evidence whatsoever that there is a correlation between the amount of stock that a charitable organization owns and the opportunity for or the incidence of any of the abuses about which there has been testimony.

Now of course there are abuses in the foundation field as there are abuses in all the other areas of American life as we know it. We respectfully urge the members of the committee to reject the sweeping divestiture proposal, and to proceed with measures designed specifically to deal directly with the areas of abuses where they have occurred.

We think that the self-dealing provisions of the present bill contains provisions which may be helpful in this respect. The directors of the James Irvine Foundation have adopted and publicly stated the policy that they operate this trust in the public interest, and that any rules that the members of the committee might think appropriate to prevent abuses by rules with respect to self-dealing we think would be appropriate.

We think further that the provisions for reporting and publication of all of the facts regarding foundations will be helpful. We further submit that the entire foundation field has been hurt by the very severe lack of enforcement and audit of existing laws and regulations, and we think it very likely that many of the witnesses who are here today would not be here today and we would not be taking up the time of this committee, if the laws that are already on the books and have been on the books for some years had been actively enforced. If a fee by foundations is necessary to bring about this auditing which will take the field of private philanthropy out of the disrepute which has come upon it, then we think that also would be appropriate.

If notwithstanding what we think or the very strong reasons for rejecting this divestiture proposal in its broad sweeping application which we cannot see how it will in any respect operate to cure the abuses about which there has been testimony, is to be adopted, then we respectfully urge the members of the committee to give the most serious consideration to whether that rule should be given a retroactive ex post facto application to irrevocable trust established by the donors who are long since dead.

We respectfully submit that men like Mr. Irvine at the time they committed their property and made irrevocable decisions with respect to it, which were lawful and valid at the time they were made, had a right to expect from the Government that it would not change the law in the future so as to undo the dispositions which they made of their property and the basis for the decisions which they made which were valid and lawful at the them when they were made and have been lawfully carried out since that date.

Finally on this particular rule, if a divestiture rule is to be applied retroactively, no segment of the foundation community will be more seriously effected or harder hit than the small community oriented foundations whose only or principal asset consists of ownership of stock in a closely held corporation.

The provisions of the House bill in this respect are grossly inadequate. They would allow the James Irvine Foundation a total of only 5 years to dispose of an asset that is worth somewhere in excess of $100 million in a corporation where there has never been any established market. In fact there have only been 2 minute sales of this stock within the last 20 years, and one of those from a brother to a sister consisting of one share and a sale of a few shares at an estate sale.

The Ford Foundation, I believe, started in 1953 to divest itself of its interest or a portion of its interest in the Ford Motor Co. Moving as rapidly as it could with safety for the value of its assets and for protection of the interest of the other stockholders, it has taken down to the present, and it still owns somewhere in the neighborhood of 27 percent of the Ford Motor Co. equity, so in a period of 13 or 14 years. moving as rapidly as they could, it has taken them that length of time, and we respectfully submit that the 5 years it is allowed by the present bill to foundations such as ourselves is not nearly adequate for that purpose and that the inevitable result will be that this trust will lose very substantially the value of its capital, which should remain in perpetuity for the benefit of the charities Mr. Irvine intended to benefit.

I call your attention also that the House bill has a 2-year interim provision, which requires disposition of 10 percent of your excess holdings within 2 years, unless you can make a case for hardship. That particular provision, it is interesting to note, applies to existing organizations, but it does not apply to foundations created in the future. They have a full 5 year period without an interim provision. We think this is an unfair application and recommend that both the 5 year interim period and the 2-year period be eliminated from the bill.

The United States Supreme Court in deciding what was a reasonable divestiture period for the DuPont Co. which was found to have violated the antitrust laws in acquiring General Motors stock, for the protection of the interests of the corporation whose stock was held, for the protection of the value of the interest of the stockholders of DuPont, for the protection of the interests of the other stockholders of the General Motors Corp. the court allowed a 10-year period. We don't feel that interests that were lawful when acquired and have been lawfully operated ought to be less liberally treated. We respectfully submit to the members of the committee that the absolute minimum period that is required to protect the interests of the charities that are now irrevocable who hold their assets in closely held corporations is 10 years. We submit further that we see no reason for great liberality not being allowed in this respect.

Mr. Chairman, the other provision I would like to make mention of briefly is the minimum investment return provision. The directors of the James Irvine Foundation have always followed the policy of paying out on a current basis all of the income which they receive.

We have no objection to the provisions in the bill which require that foundations make that kind of a payout.

However, we believe the minimum investment return proposal is unrealistic as it would apply to foundations such as the James Irvine Foundation.

In the first place, taking an asset such as the Irvine Co., which lies just south of the urban growth in Los Angeles County, the value of the real properties in that county since 1960 have accelerated very rapidly, and the growth in the value of these real properties because of the growth in population density has very greatly exceeded the capacity of these properties to earn income, and necessarily of course the increase in the value of such properties will run years ahead of the actual income that will be produced from those properties as they are developed for residential, commercial, industrial purposes as they can be.

Accordingly we suggest for the consideration of the committee that an income equivalent provision tied to a concept as illusory as fair market value when applied to an interest in a closely held corporation will not necessarily protect the interests which are to be protected and may work severe hardships on the organizations which hold those investments.

We call the attention of the committee to the fact that we are not talking about investments that directors or trustees of foundations have gone out and selected in the marketplace. We are talking about the investment that they have by virtue of a gift from their donor, and gifts made with directors by the trustor to the trustees of the trust as to the manner in which those should be administered.

In summary, we respectfully submit that the minimum investment return provision should be tried to the tax benefit that has been conferred, not to the market value of the asset.

Secondly, that it should not apply to those trusts which are irrevocable, and which are prevented by the terms of their governing instruments from making distributions out of their corpus.

The James Irvine Foundation trust does not permit the trustees in the James Irvine Foundation to distribute out of the corpus of the trust. Accordingly we could not comply with the minimum investment return provision unless our income was actually equal to 5 percent. That would be taken care of, of course, by the requirement that we distribute all of our income.

Secondly, we submit that this minimum investment return provision should not apply to assets which trustees are directed by their governing instruments to retain.

If a trustee has no power to change the corpus of his trust or the investment in which the trust is endowed, then it would serve no purpose for the Congress to apply a provision which would over a period of years erode the value of the corpus.

With these points, Mr. Chairman, I conclude my formal statement.

Statement of the James Irvine Foundation Regarding Provisions of Section 101 of H.R. 13270

The James Irvine Foundation, a California corporation, is the owner, as trustee, of 459 shares of stock of The Irvine Company, which is 54.55 percent of its issued and outstanding stock. This interest was acquired by inter vivos gift from James Irvine in 1937 under the terms of an Indenture of Trust in which Mr. Irvine directed the Foundation to hold and administer the stock under the trust "as a unit without division or segregation thereof" and to devote the income therefrom exclusively to charitable uses and purposes in the State of California. The Indenture further provides, inter alia:

"Trustor hereby makes the following directions with respect to the management of the shares of stock of The Irvine Company and the property thereof, which consists for the most part of a land holding situated in Orange County, California: that inasmuch as the development and operation of said property has constituted the life work of the Trustor, it is the purpose of said Trustor, by the creation of this trust and by vesting in the Trustee through its holding of said stock of The Irvine Company, the exercise of a controlling voice in the operation of its properties, to perpetuate the operation thereof and thus insure an adequate foundation for the charitable purposes herein provided."

The Irvine Company is a closely held business corporation. The ownership of its stock, other than that held by the Foundation, is divided between 12 parties, most of whom are related by blood or marriage to the Foundation's donor. The stock is not traded and has no established market. Except for transactions in which the Company purchased and retired shares of its own stock, there have been only two sales in the past 20 years; one in 1964 in which a minority shareholder sold his sister one share at a price of $115,000 and one in 1960 in which the estate of a deceased shareholder sold 15 shares at a public auction for a price of $108,333 per share to raise money for taxes. The Company's purchases were: 50 shares at a price of $100,000 per share in 1962 and 13½ shares at a price of $250,000 per share in 1968.

Under the laws applicable to The Irvine Company, the Foundation's stock ownership entitles it (a) to elect four of the seven members of the Company's Board of Directors, (b) to vote the stock on all matters of Company business requiring shareholder approval and (c) to receive 54.55 percent of all corporate distributions. The cash dividend paid by the Company during its fiscal year ended April 30, 1969 was $2,850 per share, or a total of $1,308,150 on the 459 shares owned by the Foundation. This represents an increase of more than 500 percent in the annual dividend rate of $500 per share paid by the Company in 1948, the year the Foundation's rights in the stock vested.

Through a partial liquidation in 1962, The Irvine Company distributed several parcels of real property to its shareholders in redemption of a portion of their stock. The Foundation's pro rata share interest in the properties had a value of $6,211,263.

There have been no business transactions between the Foundation and The Irvine Company. More specifically, the Foundation has neither loaned or borrowed money nor sold or purchased property from the Company.

The Foundation is managed by an 11-member Board of Directors. One of the Directors is a granddaughter of Mr. Irvine. The remaining 10 Directors are in no way related to Mr. Irvine or his family. In the administration of its trust, the Foundation is regulated and supervised by the California Attorney General under the provisions of the Uniform Supervision of Trustees For Charitable Purposes Act (California Government Code, Secs. 12580–12595).

Mr. Irvine gained no tax advantage and realized no deduction or other tax benefit during his lifetime by reason of his gift of a majority of The Irvine Company stock to the Foundation in trust for charitable purposes. On Mr. Irvine's death in 1947, the trust became irrevocable under California law and a tax benefit was realized in that the stock (which was then valued at $11,000 per share or $5,610,000) was exempt from the estate and inheritance taxes which would have been payable if the inter vivos gift had not been limited to charitable uses.

The Foundation's ownership of a majority stock interest in The Irvine Company has at no time in the past, and does not today, provide a tax benefit or advantage of any kind to the Company. All of its operations were fully taxable before Mr. Irvine's charitable gift in trust, and they remained so after the gift was made. Today, as during Mr. Irvine's lifetime, The Irvine Company pays the full measure of taxes that any other corporation is obligated to pay. The only income tax benefit that has resulted from the fact Mr. Irvine's gift of stock was for charitable uses is that the Foundation is not obligated to pay taxes on the dividends that it receives. The dividends, of course, are the trust income which the Foundation distributes to charity on a current basis.

TAXES ON EXCESS BUSINESS HOLDINGS

(Section 101(b) of H.R. 13270 and New Section 4943 of the Code)

This section places precise limits on the amount of voting stock of a business corporation that may be owned by a foundation. The maximum limit is 20%. The specific limit applicable to each foundation is determined by subtracting from the 20% maximum the percentage of voting stock owned by all disqualified persons, including the foundation's donor and all other substantial contributors and their families and lineal descendants. An exception is provided where an independent third-party has control of the business corporation and the foundation and all disqualified persons combined own less than 35% of the voting stock. In that case, the maximum limit on the amount of voting stock of a business corporation that may be owned by a foundation is 35% reduced by the aggregate percentage of the voting stock owned by all disqualified persons. Under the terms of a de minimis rule included in the section, foundations are permitted to own as much as 2% of a business corporation's voting stock even though the combined ownership of disqualified persons is equal to or exceeds the applicable maximum limit.

All stock held by a foundation in excess of its permitted limit must be disposed of within specified time periods. The sanctions imposed for failure to comply with the divestiture requirements is an initial tax of 5% of the value of the excess stock holdings and an additional tax equal to 200% of the value of such excess stock holdings if they have not been disposed of by the close of a designated correction period.

It may be somewhat difficult to assess the full extent of the near and long term damage to the cause of private philanthropy that would result from a change in the policy of our tax law as drastic and as bludgeon-like in its application as that proposed by this section of the House bill. But there can be doubt that the damage would be great and would have far reaching consequences. It would reverse the incentive that has been provided by our tax laws over the past half century for the dedication of private wealth to the benefit of the public. Moreover, it would compel long established public trusts that have been administered explicitly in the public interest to divorce themselves from the stock interests with which they were endowed and which have provided the resources for their important and growing contributions to the public welfare.

The effects of such a policy change would fall most heavily on the small community-oriented foundations capitalized by a substantial ownership interest in a local business and on donors whose accumulated wealth consists of ownership of a business enterprise. In this area, a compulsory divestiture rule would constitute a deterrent of such proportion that it would virtually eliminate the making of gifts of substantial interests in the donor's business for the perpetual use of charity, whereas such gifts are now commonplace and were the source of beginning for many of the great foundations operating in the country today. Since the personal wealth of the group of persons who own businesses represents a significant portion of the private capital in the United States, there can be little doubt that the adoption of such a rule would be followed by a substantial diminution in the number and financial capacity of foundations to serve the ever-growing local needs that are now being met through private philanthropy. The magnitude of the potential loss can be, perhaps, best demonstrated by a brief look at The James Irvine Foundation.

Its founder, Mr. James Irvine, owned a large ranch in Orange County, California, which he incorporated under the name "The Irvine Company". Mr. Irvine devoted himself fully to this enterprise and personally characterized it as his life's work. Forty-nine percent of the stock of the company was given by Mr. Irvine to members of his family. With the remaining 51 percent or majority of the stock he established a charitable trust for the benefit of the people of California with particular emphasis on the needs of the people of the county in which the ranch was located. The James Irvine Foundation was organized to administer this trust as its trustee.

On Mr. Irvine's death in 1947 his trust became irrevocable under California law. On that date the total value of the majority stock interest with which Mr. Irvine endowed the trust was $5,610,000. To date the income received from this 5.6 million dollar gift has enabled the trust to make direct grants of more than 10 million dollars to the universities, colleges, hospitals, youth organizations and similar charities within the community it was established to benefit. During the same period of time the value of this gift, which will continue to serve the public in perpetuity, has increased dramatically.

The contribution to the public welfare from Mr. Irvine's gift of a majority stock interest in his business is not a unique or isolated occurrence. Indeed, the record of the hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee, establishes that such results are quite commonly obtained from gifts of substantial business interests for charitable uses.

The proposal to enact a law applicable to such gifts as harsh and undiscriminating as across-the-board compulsory divestiture is unwarranted and should be rejected unless there is clear evidence (1) that the gifts produce some substantial evil which cannot be reasonably corrected by more refined regulations and (2) that the evil resulting from the gifts will have demonstrably more serious consequences than those produced by the remedy. Clearly, no such condition can be found in the operations of private foundations. The study made by the Treasury Department at the request of this Committee and of the Committee on Ways and Means disclosed that "the preponderant number of private foundations perform their functions without tax abuse"; that "most private foundations act responsibly and contribute significantly to the improvement of our society"; and that "upon the whole, the record of foundation disbursements is one of solid accomplishment". (Treasury Report on Private Foundations, February 2, 1965, pp. 2, 13 and 14.)

In the area of foundation involvement in business, the Treasury has reported "several kinds of undesirable results" from the operations of a minority of foundations. They are said to be (a) competitive advantages; (b) varied forms of self-dealing; (c) deferral benefits to charity; and (d) distraction of the attention of foundation managers from charitable activities. The Treasury concedes (Report, p. 36) that these results are not a necessary consequence of foundation ownership of business interests and no facts have been presented, either in the Treasury study or the hearings of the House Committee, which would support a conclusion that they do occur in the operations of any meaningful proportion of the foundations that own in excess of 20% of a business corporation. This is true, we submit, because the situations and practices that give rise to such results are not related to and cannot be rationally correlated with the amount of a foundation's stock interest in a business corporation.

The appropriate remedy for the "undesirable results" of foundation involvement in business suggested by the Treasury study may be found in more active enforcement of existing law or in the adoption of new provisions tailored specifically to deal directly with the conduct and practices that cause such results. They cannot be corrected as effectively and should not be corrected by a wholesale compulsory divestiture rule, whose impact would extend well beyond the limits of the problem and would itself give rise to "undesirable results" of an economic and social nature more serious than those it seeeks to eliminate.

It has been suggested by some qualified commentators, and we think correctly so, that the only substantial basis for the Treasury proposal of a broad stock ownership limitation is administrative convenience and that the only benefit that would be realized by adoption of the rule would be some easing of the burden of administering the tax law. (See, e.g., Robert E. Gother, Analysis and Criticism of The Treasury Proposal To Limit Stock Ownership By Private Foundations, 13 UCLA Law Review 1017 (1966), a copy of which is annexed hereto for the convenience of the members of the Committee.) We acknowledge that the burden of enforcing a law is a proper legislative concern and that there would be administrative difficulties and additional costs involved in enforcing regulations directed at specific abuses. However, the assumption of these burdens is more than justified by the greater effectiveness such rules would have in the curbing of abuses in the problem areas and by the preservation of the substantial benefits to the people that now obtain because businessmen are free to contribute interests in their businesses in unlimited amount to perpetual charitable uses.

We, therefore, respectfully urge the members of the Committee to proceed with measures designed to curb specific abuses and to reject a broad, sweeping compulsory divestiture rule which would defeat the intentions of donors of existing public trusts and operate as a powerful deterrent to the making of substantial gifts of corporate stock to charity in the future.

If the Committee nevertheless concludes that the divestiture proposal should be adopted, we request that new section 4943 be modified in the following respects to mitigate the harsh and unjust effects it would have on existing organizations.

1. An exception to the divestiture requirements should be made for foundations and trusts in existence on May 26, 1969, with respect to all business interests acquired by gift or bequest before that date. The House bill has already provided an exception for two such organizations: the W. K. Kellogg Foundation which has as its sole asset 50.34% of the voting stock of the Kellogg Company; and the Benwood Foundation which owns about 70% of the stock of the Coca-Cola Bottling Co. (Thomas) of Chattanooga. The good reasons that commend the making of these exceptions, also apply to The James Irvine Foundation and the overwhelming majority of other foundations. In this connection, Representative James B. Utt (Republican of California), a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, made the following pertinent observation in proceedings recorded in the Congressional Record for August 6, 1969:

"We have given certain foundations complete immunity.

"It was considered that control of a corporation by a foundation was an evil thing. It was even evil if it were to be controlled by a consort consisting of the founder and members of the founder's family to the second and third generations. Later, the committee decided that if the people of the foundation were 'good' people and qualified under a technical amendment, total control of a corporation was to be OK. That took care of the Kelloggs of Battle Creek. I am certain that there are many family foundations just as virtuous as the Kellogg Foundation, but they do not receive preferential treatment. To name but a few, I would refer you to the Hormel Foundation, the Waterman Foundation and the Kaiser Foundation. Why this discrimination?"

Congress has, on numerous occasions, applied the equitable principle that new tax provisions should not apply to transactions irrevocably entered into in good faith at a time when there was no tax or penalty on such transactions. See, e.g., IRC Sec. 2038 (excluding from estate tax revocable transfers made on or before June 22, 1936), IRC Sec. 2041 (excluding from estate tax unexercised general powers of appointment created on or before October 21, 1942), IRC Sec. 2107 (excluding from estate tax estates of expatriates losing U.S. citizenship prior to March 8, 1965), Sec. 601 of H.R. 13270 (excluding existing tax-exempt securities), and Sec. 703 of H.R. 13270 (excluding from the proposed repeal of the investment credit property acquired prior to April 19, 1969 and property constructed, reconstructed, erected or acquired pursuant to a contract which was, on April 18, 1969, and at all times thereafter, binding on the taxpayer). These, and many other like provisions enacted by Congress, recognize the basic unfairness of applying penalties or prohibitions to transactions completed in good faith at a time when no penalty or prohibition existed.

2. If the modification suggested above is not adopted, an exception to the divestiture requirements should be made with respect to business interests which foundations and trusts are directed to retain by the terms of governing instruments which were irrevocable on May 26, 1969. The Treasury recognized the need for this exception in its Report on Private Foundations, saying (p. 37):

"An exception to the general disposition requirement would seem advisable for existing foundations whose governing instruments, as presently drawn, compel them to hold specified business interests, if relevant local law prevents suitable revision of the controlling document."

However, the House bill does no more than provide a moratorium on the application of the divestiture requirements "during the pendency of any judicial proceeding by the private foundation which is necessary to reform its governing instrument to allow disposition of such holdings." No provision is made for the possibility that the petition for such reform may not be granted, as has occurred in the past. (See, e.g., Cocke v. Duke University, 260 N.C.I., 131 S.E. 2d 909 (1963).) Moreover, where donors have conveyed business interests to foundations with direction that they be retained at a time when it was lawful under Federal tax law as well as State law for such interests to be retained in unlimited amount, no reason exists for requiring what is in effect an ex post facto application of the divestiture rule.

3. Provision should be made for an unrestricted ten-year transition period for the disposition of stock holdings in excess of the prohibited amount, with authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the period in cases of hardship. Ten years is the minimum period within which it can be reasonably expected that foundations can dispose of major interests in closely held corporations without serious and unwarranted loss in the value of their capital and possible loss to other owners of the same equity.

The experience of the Ford Foundation in disposing of its Ford Motor Company stock provides a relevant example of the time required to dispose of major business interests. Beginning in 1956, it undertook a massive program to divest itself of this stock as rapidly as practicable "within the limits of prudence" and a trustee's "fiduciary responsibility to preserve the value of the asset." After 13 years, it has only succeeded in reducing its holdings from 88.4 percent of the total stock outstanding to 27.4 percent.

It may also be helpful to consider the time required for disposition of major business interests to comply with judicial orders requiring divestiture under the antitrust laws. In United States v. du Pont & Co., 366 U.S. 316 (1961), the Supreme Court allowed the defendant a period of ten years for disposition of its General Motors stock. Similarly, in United States v. United Fruit Co., 1958 CCH Trade Cases Sec. 68,941, United Fruit was permitted eight years and four months after the date of the decree to dispose of its International Railways of Central America stock. In both of these cases the business interests to be sold were in publicly held corporations whose stock had an established market. Even longer periods would have been necessary to comply with the divestiture orders had the corporations involved been closely held with no existing market for their stock.

The courts in ordering divestiture for violations of the antitrust laws have fixed transition periods of sufficient length not only to protect the value of the stock to be sold and the equity of other investors, but to permit an orderly transfer of control with minimum disruption of the business relationships and management of the enterprise whose stock is to be sold. Those considerations should be of even greater concern in fixing the transition period for divestiture of business interests lawfully acquired and operated for the welfare of the people.

The transition period allowed by the House bill for foundations to dispose of their present holdings in excess of the permitted limits is clearly inadequate. As applied to The James Irvine Foundation, it allows a maximum of five years and possibly only two years* after May 26, 1969, for sale of all the Foundation's 54.55% stock interest in The Irvine Company.

The ten-year period which the House bill is commonly thought to allow is not available to this Foundation and no doubt the same is true of many others. Under the terms of the bill, ten years is allowed for divestiture only if, at the close of the five-year period beginning on May 26, 1969, the foundation and all disqualified persons including the donor's family and descendants, own less than 50% of the stock. Because almost all of The Irvine Company's stock not owned by the Foundation is owned by decendants of its donor, the Foundation cannot meet that condition until it has sold all but 4.55% of its interest.

In practical effect, therefore, the bill allows this Foundation no more than five years to accomplish a divestiture of a controlling stock interest of exceedingly great value which it has held for more than 32 years. The probability is great that this time limit would impose forced sale conditions and the loses that inevitably result from sales under such conditions since there is no established market for Irvine Company stock and only two sales, other than repurchases by the Company, have occurred in the past 20 years; a sale of one share in 1964 by a minority shareholder to his sister and a sale of 15 shares by the estate of a deceased shareholder.

TAXES ON FAILURE TO DISTRIBUTE INCOME

This section of the bill would require foundations to distribute all of their income by the end of the year following the year in which it is earned or, if greater, an amount equal to a "minimum investment return" of 5% on the "aggregate fair market" value of all of their investment assets. The minimum investment return is to be adjusted prospectively from time to time to the extent necessary to retain a comparable relationship between the return rate and money and investment yields. The fair market value of investment assets is to be fixed by the Secretary on a monthly basis for securities having an established market and as frequently as he may deem appropriate for other assets. The sanction imposed for failure to make the required distributions is a tax of 15% on the undistributed amount with an additional tax of 100% on such amounts as remain undistributed at the close of a specified correction period.

We agree that charitable foundations should be required to pay out all of their current income for charitable purposes. The James Irvine Foundation has from the beginning distributed all of its income on a current basis. The only delay in distribution occurred during pendency of the suit brought by Mrs. Joan Irvine Smith to rescind the charitable trust and require transfer of the trust principal and income to her and other heirs of James Irvine. Upon termination of this suit the accumulated income of the trust was distributed to charitable beneficiaries.

The effect of the minimum investment return provision in the House bill would be to reduce the capital of charitable organizations each year in the amount by which their annual net income is less than 5% of the current value of their investment assets. As applied to foundations which have a broad base of diversified investments that can be readily marketed and that the managers have the power to sell, the resulting impairments of capital may not be significant. However, as applied to the numerous foundations and trusts that do not have such a favorable investment asset position, the necessary result would be a serious and continued impairment of their capital with consequent loss of their capacity to carry out the charitable purposes for which they were established.

*The James Irvine Indenture of Trust directs the Foundation to hold The Irvine Company stock "as a unit without division or segregation thereof" which may not permit sale of the stock in units over a period of years. If that should prove to be the case, the two-year period in which the bill requires sale of 10% of excess holdings would have the effect of requiring the sale of all this Foundation's stock in two years which would be most unjust and seriously threaten it with a substantial loss of capital.

Consider, for example, the application of the minimum investment return requirements to:

(1) trusts established by instruments which are irrevocable under State law and which either direct the trustee to retain the existing trust investments or provide that the trustee cannot change the form of the investment assets;

(2) trusts whose only or only substantial asset, at present, is stock in a closely held corporation for which there is no established market and which cannot be readily sold except at distress prices far below its fair market value; and

(3) trusts established by instruments which are irrevocable under State law that do not permit distributions out of the trust capital.

While the stated purpose of the minimum investment return requirement is to prevent avoidance of current benefits to charity "by investments in growth stock or non-productive land" (Report, p. 25), the provision is not limited in its application to investments voluntarily made or retained. By its terms, it applies to all investment assets without regard to the legal or practical power of foundation managers or trustees to change the form of their investments or to otherwise obtain a return on their assets which is equal to 5% of their theoretic current fair market value. Moreover, the tax sanctions for failure to make the required minimum investment return distributions are imposed without regard to the legal power of foundation managers or trustees to distribute trust capital to make up the deficiencies in their income.

To avoid the unwarranted and unjust applications of the minimum investment return rule mentioned above, we respectfully urge the Committee to amend the provisions of new section 4942 to accomplish changes in its terms in each of the following respects:

1. Existing irrevocable trusts established by instruments which do not permit distributions out of capital should be exempt from the operation of the minimum investment return provision since it would not be possible for them to meet its requirements. The Treasury Department has priviously suggested that an exemption for such organizations should be made. (See, Treasury Department Tax Reform Studies and Proposals, February 5, 1969, p. 301.)

2. The value of investment assets held under existing irrevocable trust instruments which do not permit the trustee to change the form of the investment asset should be excluded from the operation of the minimum investment return provision. No objective of the tax laws or any other useful purpose would be served by compelling a foundation administering such a trust to deplete its other, perhaps very limited, capital to satisfy the minimum investment return requirement with respect to investments which it has no power to change.

3. The value of securities in closely held corporations and other investment assets held on May 26, 1969, which do not produce income equal to the minimum investment return rate should be excluded from the operation of the rule for a period of not less than ten (10) years. This would provide foundation managers and trustees with a reasonable period of time in which to make an orderly disposition of such assets and to realize their fair market value. The two-year moratorium on the application of the minimum investment return to existing organizations included in the House bill is grossly inadequate for this purpose.

4. The value of property acquired after May 26, 1969, by means other than purchase (i.e., by gift, bequest, corporate liquidations, dividends in kind, etc.) which is unproductive when received, should be excluded from the operation of the minimum investment return rule for some reasonable period of time within which it can be sold. The need for this exclusion would be acute if unproductive property of high value in relation to other foundation assets was received and could not be sold for a period of years.

5. If a minimum investment return distribution is to be required, the 5% rate should in all fairness be based on the tax benefits conferred (estate or income tax saving on the bequest or gift to charity plus income tax saving on realized capital gains). It should not be applied to the unrealized appreciation in value of the assets of foundations since no tax benefit has been realized by any one or will be realized until the assets are sold.

CONCLUSION

On behalf of the Directors of the James Irvine Foundation, I should like to express our appreciation for the opportunity to present our views on the provisions of H.R. 13270. They and I hope that these views will be helpful to your Committee in its deliberations. We strongly urge that this Committee avoid provisions which will unfairly and oppressively affect this and other private foundations and diminish their ability to carry on the philanthropic work which has substantially benefited the communities in which they operate.

Respectfully submitted,

By HOWARD J. PRIVETT, Counsel.

ANALYSIS AND CRITICISM OF THE TREASURY PROPOSAL TO LIMIT STOCK OWNERSHIP BY PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

(By Ronald E. Gother*)

The issue squarely presented by the Treasury Department's proposed[1] amendment prohibiting all tax exempt private foundations from owning more than twenty percent of the stock of any corporation, is the extent to which convenience of administration should be taken into account in the formation of tax legislation. Although the Treasury Department merely mentions administrative convenience as one of the reasons for its proposal, when the other reasons advanced by the Department are analyzed closely, it is apparent that administrative convenience is the sole justification. In the course of studying the Treasury proposal, I will analyze each of the reasons given for its support by the Treasury Department, the history of similar proposals made in the past, the enforcement problems which it raises, and the various alternatives which have been suggested. Although additional safeguards may be necessary to prevent an abuse of the tax exemption privilege, the proposal to limit the amount of stock of any one corporation which may be owned by a private foundation is unwarranted, unnecessary, and goes beyond the scope of merely preventing abuses. If adopted it may seriously curtail charitable gifts.

The proposal of the Treasury Department as set forth in its most recent Report on Private Foundations is deceptively simple. The recommendation is that a private foundation should be prohibited from owning more than twenty percent of the voting power or equity of a corporation, or of the capital of a partnership and other incorporated business.[2] Present foundations with holdings which exceed this maximum limitation would be granted a prescribed period (unspecified) within which to reduce their holdings below the maximum limit. Foundations which do not comply with this requirement would lose their tax-exempt status.

I. HISTORY OF PROPOSAL

The proposal to limit the amount of stock or other business interests which a foundation can hold and still be deemed to be operating solely for charitable purposes is not new, but has been proposed several times in the past. In 1950, Congress conducted an extensive investigation of the tax-exempt privilege. The House version of the proposed legislation would have disallowed a charitable deduction for income, gift and estate taxes for corporate stock donated to a foundation if the donor and his family controlled the foundation and owned more than fifty percent of the voting stock of the corporation or more than fifty per cent of the entire outstanding stock of all classes.[3] It was at this legislative session that extensive provisions were adopted with regard to the taxation of unrelated business income,[4] certain types of prohibited transactions,[5] and the unreasonable accumulation of income.[6] The proposal to set a maximum limitation on the amount of stock which a foundation could hold was, however, rejected by the Senate and it was the Senate version which finally passed. The Senate Report summed up the reasons for rejecting the House proposal in the following manner:

> The House Report expressed the view that denial of deduction in such cases would simply be a recognition of the fact that where such control exists no complete gift for which a deduction should be granted has been made. In the opinion of your Committee this overlooks the fact that the donor or his family must use the property set aside in the foundation or trust for charitable, etc., purposes rather than for personal purposes.
> The view was also expressed that as the result of allowing these deductions there was an avoidance of income, estate and gift tax deductions. Outweighing this in the view of your Committee is the fact that if these deductions are not allowed still larger funds would be lost to private charities.[7]

In 1955 a committee headed by Representative B. Carroll Reece conducted hearings to determine whether provisions were necessary to implement the 1950 legislation. In its report[8] the committee did not come to any conclusion with respect to the ownership of stock by a foundation. It did, however, "suggest" to the House Ways and Means Committee that it consider denying a tax exemption if a foundation invested more than five or ten percent of its capital in the securities of any one corporation provided it also held substantial other assets so that it would not violate the five or ten per cent limitation. The Reece Committee, however, did not recommend that the donor be denied his income, gift or estate tax deduction for the gift. The Committee suggested a two- to five-year period within which existing foundation with holdings exceeding the limitation could conform without losing the tax exemption. The Committee proposals did not result in any legislation.

Earlier in 1965 Congressman Wright Patman issued the third installment of his report as Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Small Business. In this now famous "Patman Report"[9] he proposed that a three per cent maximum limit on such business interests be imposed.

From this it can be seen that the proposal of the Treasury Department is not a new or original thought although its seems to have steered a middle ground between prior proposals.

II. TREASURY DEPARTMENT REASONS PURPORTEDLY JUSTIFYING ITS PROPOSAL

Basically, the Treasury Department sets forth three reasons, other than administrative convenience, to which it only briefly alludes, which purportedly justify the proposals to limit the amount of stock a foundation can own. The three reasons are that (1) the ownership of a significant amount of a corporation's stock by private foundations puts regular business enterprises at a competitive disadvantage, (2) the opportunities and temptations for self-dealing proliferate, and (3) private foundation management spends more time concentrating on the commercial activities of the company whose stock it owns than it does on the charitable activities. Each reason will be analyzed separately.

A. Competitive advantages

The Treasury Department sets forth three ways in which a corporation acquires some sort of competitive advantage when its stock is owned in part by a tax exempt foundation. In analyzing these competitive advantages it is essential to keep in mind the fact that even though twenty per cent or more of the stock of a corporation is owned by a private foundation, such corporation pays the same corporate income tax as any other profit-making corporation engaged in business. The fact that the stock of such a corporation is owned by a charitable organization does not mean that the corporation secures any particular tax advantage.

1. Capitalization of Business with Before-Tax Income

As an example of this competitive advantage the Treasury Department cites the situation of a corporation which desires to allocate $1,000,000 of its gross earnings to the establishment of a new business to be carried on by a subsidiary. If the subsidiary were to be a fully taxable corporation, the parent would only be able to contribute to it approximately $500,000 out of the $1,000,000 of its gross earnings because it would first incur federal income taxes. However, if in lieu of creating a taxable subsidiary, the corporation created a charitable foundation to operate the same business, it could deduct its capital contribution and thereby donate the full $1,000,000 to the establishment of this new business operation. Whatever advantage a profit-making corporation would gain by forming a foundation to carry on a portion of its business would only be temporary. Thus, when a charitable foundation is organized, the amount of property donated to the foundation, $1,000,000 in the example, is permanently set aside for charity. Neither the income nor the capital contributed to the foundation can be returned to the corporation. Whatever possibilities there are for self-dealing in this type of situation, including favorable loans to the donor corporation, which seem to be a major concern of the Treasury Department, would be eliminated by the proposal to prohibit all transactions between the donor and the foundation.[10] Because the profit-making corporation can only take a charitable deduction for five per cent of its taxable income, it is apparent that any competitive advantage in a situation of this sort is of limited use. It would be necessary for the profit-making corporation to have taxable income of $20,000,000 in order to capitalize a foundation with $1,000,000 of before-tax income.

2. Lack of Demand for Dividend Income

A second competitive advantage envisioned by the Treasury Department is that a private foundation is less likely to demand that the corporation whose stock it owns declare dividends. For this reason, the corporation could retain more income to expand its business or modernize its facilities, giving such corporation a competitive advantage over other corporations whose shareholders may demand dividend income. However, a great number of profit making corporations in business today do not pay dividends even though they have shareholders who are not tax exempt entities. Such shareholders believe it is in their best interest to allow the company to reinvest the profits. Thus, there is no connection between the dividend payment policies of a corporation and the tax status of its shareholders. Moreover, in many situations the foundation, in the long run, may receive a greater benefit by allowing the corporation to reinvest its income, thereby increasing the value of the stock rather than siphoning out its income as dividends.

3. Acquisition of Business

The Treasury Report cites Commissioner v. Clay B. Brown[11] as an example of how a foundation can compete unfairly in the acquisition of a business. In Clay Brown the tax exempt foundation acquired an operating business, liquidated it, and then leased its assets to a newly formed operating company for a term of years. The rent, which the foundation received tax free, was used to discharge the purchase obligation. At the same time the rent was tax deductible to the operating corporation.[12] The Treasury Department argues that in this type of situation the foundation is able to pay more for the business than a non-tax exempt purchaser, thereby acquiring a competitive advantage.[13]

The Treasury Department also sees a competitive advantage in the potential ability of a foundation to lease business assets[14] to an operating subsidiary,

[10] Section A of the Treasury Report deals explicitly and comprehensively with the self-dealing situation. In effect, it recommends rules patterned after the total prohibitions against transactions with related parties proposed by the 1950 House Bill. Such proposals would prevent private foundations from dealing with any substantial contributor, any officer, director, or trustee of the foundation, or any party related to them, except to pay a reasonable compensation for necessary services and to make incidental purchases of supplies.

[11] 380 U.S. 563 (1965). In this case the U.S. Supreme Court held that the seller of the business was able to report the installment payments he received as part of the purchase price as capital gains notwithstanding the fact that the payments were made out of the future income from the business.

[12] Shortly after the Brown decision the Internal Revenue Service issued T.I.R. 768 (1965), in which it indicated that in the future it will continue to challenge the deductibility of the rental payments made by the operating corporation. The Service in some prior cases has successfully established that the rental deduction is limited to a reasonable rental. Royal Farms Dairy Co., 40 T.C. 172 (1963); Estate of Goldenberg, 23 CCH TAX CT. REP. 810 (1963). See also Warren Brekke, 40 T.C. 789 (1963). However, the Service has also lost cases involving the same issue. Anderson Dary, 39 T.C. 1027 (1963); Isis Windows, 22 CCH TAX CT. REP. 837 (1963); Oscar C. Stahl, 22 CCH TAX CT. REP. 996 (1963).

[13] One student writer has suggested that, in fact, the charity can bargain for a lower price because its tax exemption allows it to return the purchase price to the seller faster. See Note, 18 U.C.L.A. L. REV. 167 (1965).

[14] If debt were incurred in acquiring the asset, the income from its subsequent lease would be unrelated business income and taxable to the foundation under INT. REV. CODE OF 1954, § 512.

siphoning off most or all of the subsidiaries' earnings by rental payments which are deductible by the subsidiary but are not taxable to the parent foundation. Apparently the competitive advantage is that the foundation can accumulate such tax-free rental income for future business operations.

Initially, it should be realized that only a relatively few foundations misuse their tax exemption privilege this way, in such situations. In only one case has the Commissioner been able to prove that an excessive price was paid for the business, and that case obviously involved a sham transaction.[15] Moreover, the Treasury Department has taken the position that Clay Brown will not apply if an excessive price is paid.[16] Although it is not clear that the courts will concur with this position, at least a potential remedy of more limited scope currently exists.

In addition, both of these alleged competitive advantages could be cured by means less drastic than prohibiting a foundation from owning more than twenty per cent of a corporation's stock. For example, competitive advantages could be eliminated by expanding the unrelated business income provisions of the code.[17]

B. Self-dealing

The Treasury Department states that the prohibited transactions section of the new proposals [18] should eliminate all types of self-dealing. However, it asserts that self-dealing occurs more frequently when a foundation owns a large block of a corporation's stock. Consequently if a foundation could not own a large block of stock the enforcement of the prohibited transactions section would be easier. This is the only time that the Treasury Department admits that the ease of administering this law is a reason for its proposal. However, if the prohibited transactions section is strengthened, any remaining self-dealing problems should be reduced to a level where they could be adequately handled on a case-by-case basic. At this point it would seem that the matter could be left to the states. Most states have developed sufficient limitations and safeguards to prevent a diversion of funds by transactions between the trustee and the foundation.[19] Even though in the past the states may not have been too active in policing private foundations, the move is in that direction,[20] and several states, including California,[21] have extensive regulatory provisions.

C. Lack of attention to charitable activities

The Treasury Report points out that when a foundation becomes involved in business activities the charitable pursuits, which constitute the real reason for its existence, may be subordinated to the demands of the commercial enterprise. More time may be spent on the operation of a business than on the charitable activities. However, there does not seem to be any correlation between the proposal to limit the amount of stock which a foundation may own, and this particular problem. Directors of the foundation need not be active in the management of the corporation. In a great many situations the foundation operates as an independent organization.

It does not follow that directors will spend less time than necessary to carry out the foundation's charitable activities if they are also engaged in the corporate business. As a practical matter either the corporation or the foundation, or both, will have other salaried personnel to manage the day-to-day operations. Quite often the private foundation is a passive entity merely distributing its income periodically to the support of other active charitable institutions. In this event, little time is required of directors in order to carry out the foundation's charitable purposes.

Even if the foundation were to own only a varied portfolio of common stocks, it does not necessarily follow that the directors will have more time to spend on the active pursuit of charitable activities. Such directors will, of course, be otherwise engaged in their own individual occupations. They may be officers and key employees of other active business corporations completely independent from the private foundation. The amount of time which they will have to devote to the foundation will depend on their other active business interests.

D. Administrative convenience

To summarize the foregoing, at least the first two reasons given by the Service to justify its proposal, that is, to eliminate purported competitive advantages and all types of self-dealing, would be adequately dealt with either by the prohibited transactions provision proposed by the Treasury or by expanding the unrelated business income provisions of the Code. The Service has found in the past that the prohibited transactions and unrelated business income sections of the Code are the most difficult to administer for the reason that the issues are complex and violations are sometimes hard to detect. Limiting the amount of stock which a foundation could own may reduce the administrative burden somewhat by eliminating, in some instances, the circumstances under which these sections come into play. It should, however, be acknowledged by the Service and clearly understood that this ease of administration is the primary reason for its proposal. The third reason for the proposal, that is, lack of attention to charitable activities, seems to be more of an afterthought on the part of the Service and a make-weight argument. It can be seriously questioned whether tax legislation of any sort should, or can, affect the amount of time which the directors of a foundation are to spend on its charitable activities.

III. ENFORCEMENT PROBLEMS

As a sanction for violating its proposal the Treasury Department would withdraw the foundation's tax exempt status. A second sanction might also be imposed by the state which supervises the foundation's activities. Such a remedy would compel the foundation to divest itself of stock so that it would not lose its tax exemption privilege.

A. Withdrawal of exemption

If the tax exempt status of a foundation were to be withdrawn, its income would be subject to tax, presumably at the regular corporate rates. This would affect the charitable activities of the foundation in two ways. First, it would have less income available for charity because a portion would be paid to the federal government. Second, the charity could not solicit additional contributions from others for it would no longer qualify as an organization to which deductible contributions may be made for federal income tax purposes. Even if this were only a temporary matter, the charities could suffer irreparable damage.

B. Divestiture

Divestiture could also work to the disadvantage of a charity. It would be apparent to any purchaser that this would be a forced sale which would in all probability bring a reduced price. This would be particularly true if the divestiture were required within a specific time rather than within a "reasonable time" or some other flexible alternative.

Unless the corporation whose stock is owned by the foundation has a public market (in which event the alleged abuses and advantages previously discussed are not likely), there may not be any market at all for the stock. It is possible that a foundation could wind up in a situation in which it could not sell the stock.[22] One large foundation has not been able to sell its minority interest in a large brewing company because the potential purchasers would not buy unless the majority joined in the sale and the majority was unwilling to do so.[23]

Forced divestiture completely ignores the possibility that such stock interest may be an excellent investment which returns to the foundation substantially more in income and other benefits than could be acquired by other investments. The responses to the Treasury proposals contained numerous examples of this fact. Yale Professor John G. Simon summarized this quite well in a letter he submitted in response to Treasury proposals wherein he pointed out that of the 534 foundations surveyed in the Patman Report, the 112 which held ten percent or more of the stock of a corporation received dividends over a 10-year period equal to forty-two percent of the market value of their corporate holdings. This was substantially in excess of a twenty-nine percent average return experienced by the entire 534 foundations.[24]

[23] HOUSE COMM. ON WAYS AND MEANS, 89TH CONG., 1ST SESS., WRITTEN STATEMENTS BY INTERESTED INDIVIDUALS AND ORGANIZATIONS ON TREASURY DEPARTMENT REPORT ON PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS, VOL. I 158-59 (Comm. Print 1965) [hereinafter cited as STATEMENTS].

A forced divestiture could, in some instances, work significant hardships on the donor. For example, the donor who in the past made a gift of a thirty per cent interest in the stock of his closely held corporation would be forced to accept outside third parties as stockholders in his business unless he or his family bought the stock back from the foundation.

Divestiture could also follow an irregular pattern because the matter would have to be left to the states. Some states would in all probability take no action whatsoever to compel a divestiture. In fact, without legislation many states may not even authorize such action at this time. As a result, if the Treasury proposal were adopted it can be expected that new foundations, and perhaps some of the existing foundations, would attempt to find friendly jurisdictions within which to do business so as to avoid this harsh penalty.

IV. ALTERNATIVES WHICH HAVE BEEN SUGGESTED

Numerous comments and suggestions were made in response to the Treasury proposals. Most of the comments were from those who had a personal interest and who would be adversely affected. As a result, each entity proposed either an exception to the proposal, so that they could continue to operate, or an alternative. The following are some of the alternatives which have been suggested:

A. Limit the charitable deduction for stock donated to a private foundation to cost and not market value of the stock represents an interest in a corporation controlled by the donor.

B. Do not legislate at all in this area but rather leave it to state law to limit the investments of a private foundation as New York (which prohibits a corporation from making a contribution to any foundation which owns ten per cent or more of the corporation's voting stock)[25] and Ontario (which prohibits a charitable institution from owning more than a fifteen per cent interest in a business)[26] have done.

C. If a foundation owns stock in excess of the maximum limitation, tax the dividends from such stock as unrelated business income.

D. Allow a foundation to prove that whatever stock interest it has in a corporation, even if it exceeds a twenty per cent interest, does not give it control of the corporation.

E. Insert a grandfather clause specifically exempting all existing foundations.

F. Provide an exemption for stock which is listed on the national stock exchanges.

G. Impose the twenty per cent maximum limitation only for stock acquired by purchase and not by gift or bequest.

H. Do not apply the twenty per cent rule if the grantor or related parties are no longer in control of the corporation.

I. Allow a foundation to hold the stock even though it is in excess of the maximum limitation as long as it produces a reasonable rate of return.

V. GENERAL COMMENTS AND CONCLUSIONS

The one glaring deficiency of the Treasury proposal is the fact that no evidence has been brought out to indicate the extent to which charitable giving will be restricted if the proposal were adopted. Certainly a significant portion of the charitable giving which occurs in the United States is prompted by the tax benefits accruing to a donor. The persons who would be most directly affected by the restrictions are those who have accumulated wealth mainly in the form of stock in closely held corporations. They have little else except such stock which they can use to make gifts to charity. The personal wealth of this group of persons represents a significant portion of the private capital in the United States. Any proposal which affects the ability of such persons to make tax deductible charitable gifts must of necessity reduce the total amount of all private charitable activities.

If the Treasury proposal to limit the amount of stock which a foundation can own has any merit whatever, it must be the ease of administration of the tax law with respect to private foundations, achieved by establishing a maximum limitation. Although no one would dispute the fact that the facility of administering any law, and particularly the tax law, is a proper and desirable goal, it must in each instance be balanced and weighed against the effect it will have on the over-all objective of the law. The objective of the tax law with respect to tax exempt organizations is to promote the dedication of private capital to the public good. From the small sampling of statistical evidence which is presently available it can be demonstrated that even if this particular Treasury proposal reduced charitable giving only by a small percentage, the public loss would be significant. Of the many foundations which own more than twenty percent of a corporation's stock, there are three in particular whose charitable activities have promoted the public good in significant ways over the years. These artivities would be severely affected by the proposal. One is Duke Endowment which owns fifty-seven percent of the outstanding stock of Duke Power Co. In the course of its operations it has already allocated $220,000,000 (more than double its initial grant) for its charitable purposes.[27] Lilly Endowment, Inc., the owner of forty-five percent of the Class A voting stock of Eli Lilly & Company, has made grants for various charitable purposes totalling $53,000,000,[28] while the W. K. Kellogg Foundation, owner of fifty-one percent of the Kellogg Company voting stock, has made grants of $67,000,000.[29] Other large foundations which hold more than twenty per cent of a corporation's stock include the Kresge Foundation (owner of thirty-four percent of the S. S. Kresge Company voting stock), John A. Hartford Foundation (owner of thirty-four percent of the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, Inc. voting stock), Samuel H. Kress Foundation (owner of forty-two percent of the S. H. Kress & Company voting stock), Werner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research (owner of twenty-four percent of Electrolux Corporation voting stock), the Pew Memorial Trust (owner of twenty-one percent of Sun Oil Company voting stock), and The Danforth Foundation (owner of twenty-three percent of the Ralston-Purina Company voting stock). No doubt there are many others, These large and prominent charitable foundations have and will continue to make important contributions to the public welfare. Unless curtailed by a revision of the tax law it can be expected that significant additional private wealth will be dedicated to the benefit of the public. It is submitted that, on balance, the administrative convenience factor is of secondary importance.

OCTOBER 3, 1969.

SUPPLEMENT TO STATEMENT OF THE JAMES IRVINE FOUNDATION

The Directors of The James Irvine Foundation do not believe that the time of the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate should be used to review the legal squabbles of a dissident minority shareholder with the management of a private corporation; nor do they believe that the merits or demerits of such controversies are in any way relevant or material to the determination of a national tax policy applicable to private foundations. However, for purposes of the record it is necessary for us to advise the Committee of the falsity of the charges made in the statement submitted by Joan Irvine Smith.

We regret that Mrs. Smith as a minority shareholder of the Irvine Company has taken the position that she has with respect to her grandfather's gift of a majority of the Irvine Company stock to the Foundation in trust for charitable uses. The other three grandchildren of Mr. Irvine and the other members of the Irvine family who also have a stock interest in the Company have not joined Mrs. Smith in either her attacks on the Company or her attempts to invalidate Mr. Irvine's trust. To the contrary they have contributed in a constructive way to the growth and development of the Company and to the fulfillment of Mr. Irvine's charitable objectives.

The allegations in Mrs. Smith's statement to your Committee that the Foundation has engaged in unlawful conduct and self-dealing are wholly untrue. Mrs. Smith's assertion of these spurious charges can be understood only in the perspective of the events of the past ten years.

During that period Mrs. Smith has been engaged in an all-out effort to discredit and disrupt the management of the Irvine Company in order to gain the control over its affairs that was denied to her by Mr. Irvine's gift of stock to the Foundation. In this endeavor Mrs. Smith has resorted to a variety of techniques and devices. She has maintained a steady stream of baseless litigation in which she has never succeeded in substantiating the allegations made in her complaints or in obtaining a judgment in her favor. Mrs. Smith has also retained a press agent to publicize unfounded charges and false accusations against every chief executive officer of the Irvine Company and all but one of the men who have been elected to its Board of Directors since 1959. In addition, Mrs. Smith has made extensive use of private investigators and has surreptitiously recorded conversations of officers and directors of the Company and meetings of directors by concealing recording devices on her person and in the living room of her home.

The California Attorney General in his capacity as the supervisor of the administration of private foundations has made investigations of various of Mrs. Smith's charges and has found them to be without merit. Moreover, the Attorney General under the Uniform Supervision of Charitable Trusts Act has periodically reviewed the operations of the Foundation and has found no instance of unlawful conduct or self-dealing.

In the most-recently concluded of Mrs. Smith's law suits, she attempted to invalidate the charitable trust established by Mr. Irvine and to recover for herself and other heirs the Irvine Company stock held by the Foundation under the terms of the trust. The claim and accusations made by Mrs. Smith in her pleadings and testimony in that case included a large number of the charges contained in her statement to your Committee. The United States District Court in entering its judgment in favor of the Foundation and against Mrs. Smtih found expressly that "none of the contentions of the plaintiff [Mrs. Smith] are well founded." 277 Fed. Supp. 774, at 802 (1967). The judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit (402 F.2d 772 (1968)) and Mrs. Smith's petition for writ of certiorari was denied by the United States Supreme Court on April 28, 1969 (394 U.S. 1000, No. 1167).

With respect to the decision in that case Mrs. Smith's attorney, Lyndol L. Young, in a memorandum to the minority stockholders of the Irvine Company dated June 11, 1969, stated inter alia:

"Three years ago Mrs. Smith instituted a determined fight to free The Irvine Company from the control of the Foundation by taking action in the United States District Court and before the United States Treasury Department, the Internal Revenue Service and the Congress. The battle was waged simultaneously on all of these fronts. Her objective was and is to compel the Foundation to get out of The Irvine Company. The Federal court action, if successful, would have recovered the 459 shares of Irvine stock now held by the Foundation for the Irvine heirs or the Irvine estate. This case should have been won, but it was lost because, as everybody now knows, the courts have been polluted with the money influence of the private tax-exempt foundations.

"There never was a greater miscarriage of justice than the decisions of the courts in this litigation.

"However, the record that was made in the federal courts in Mrs. Smith's case against the Foundation laid the framework and is largely responsible for the action that is about to be taken by the Congress, which will accomplish the forced demise of The James Irvine Foundation as the majority and controlling stockholder of The Irvine Company."

We believe it is clear from the foregoing that Mrs. Smith's charges against the Foundation are without substance in fact or in law and that her submittals to your Committee and to the Committee on Ways and Means are calculated not to serve the public interest but to benefit her private interests at the expense of the charitable beneficiaries of Mr. Irvine's trust.

Respectfully submitted,

HOWARD J. PRIVETT,
Counsel.

Senator BYRD. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a couple of clarifying questions?

Mr. Privett, do I understand you correctly that the value of the trust when it was established was roughly $5 million?

Mr. PRIVETT. $5.6 million.

Senator BYRD. $5.6 million, and you have distributed $10.3 million?

Mr. PRIVETT. Yes, sir.

Senator BYRD. Over what period of time?

Mr. PRIVETT. Since 1947. That is when the trust became irrevocable.

Senator BYRD. The assets of the trust are $100 million, you say?

Mr. PRIVETT. Senator, we have no specific basis for determining what the value of this stock interest is. The last sale of the stock was a redemption by the company in November of last year of a small number of shares held by another shareholder, and the redemption price was $250,000 per share. If that is the value our asset would be approximately $124 million.

Senator BYRD. What is the trust income?

Mr. PRIVETT. It was $1.3 million in dividends last year.

Senator BYRD. That is total income, $1.3 million?

Mr. PRIVETT. Yes, sir. You are talking about now the dividend income that was received by the foundation in respect of its stockholders.

Senator BYRD. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ANDERSON. $125 million earnings; you can buy Government bonds and get 5 percent, which would give you an income of over $6 million; can you not?

Mr. PRIVETT. That is correct, Senator. This is the point that I think that we have not been able to make clear. It is very easy to take the value which I said this stock sold for in a redemption last November and to immediately apply a factor to that, but the reason for this increase in value and the reason for that value, Senator, is because of the massive appreciation that has occurred in the value of this large landholding.

Now there are only about 5,000 acres of this 84,000-odd acre landholding that have been developed. A master plan was developed in 1964 as this urbanization took place. It was approved by the Orange County Planning Commission and the company is moving ahead as rapidly as the market will absorb the development that it is making in the residential, commercial and industrial field, but until we get these developments on the ground, and the real estate is returning income, then the income from this asset is not going to approximate the growth that there has been in the value of the underlying assets.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, with my limited knowledge of this foundation, it is an example particularly adverse to the genuine public interest. It is an example of the dead ruling the living, of the investment of 84,000 acres, a large percentage of a whole county, in perpetuity, contrary to the feelings of ancient civilizations as well as our own.

Senator Byrd has called attention to the small dividends received by the trust. True, the dividends remain in the company, and the control of the company by the trust, by the foundation, is used for that purpose. This is likewise typical, as the distinguished gentleman says, of many foundations.

The committee has a great challenge here to look after the public interest interpreted by a democratic society and not by a particular board of directors or by the bequest of some man who has long since gone to his reward.

Thank you.

Senator FANNIN. Mr. Chairman, I think timing is vital in the disposal of property or in the development of property. I know in my State of Arizona and certainly in New Mexico that if all of the land were placed on the market at one time, the value of it would drop appreciably. So I think that we must look at this broadly. I would just like to ask the question that I think is important.

Does the ownership of the stock as now held provide a tax benefit or privilege to the Irvine Co.?

Mr. PRIVETT. Senator, the Irvine Co. enjoys no tax benefit of any kind whatsoever by reason of the fact that the foundation owns this particular stock interest in the company. I should also like to say, Senator, that the foundation exercises its franchise in voting this 51 percent stock interest to elect men to the board of directors of the company.

This board of directors has followed the policy of paying out a very high proportion of the operating income of the company in dividends, much higher than competing companies or other companies that are not owned in any proportion by private foundations.

I have set forth in the written statement which we filed some of the details of the dividend distribution that there has been, but roughly in excess of 80 percent of the operating income of the company is paid out in dividends, and we respectfully suggest that the operation of this substantially agricultural enterprise as a ranch, which has had this phenomenal growth in value, and which is going to inure this value in perpetuity to the benefit of charity has occurred without any abuse on the part of the foundation. Rather it seems that because the rapid acceleration has occurred, and because it does take time to get to developments on the ground that are going to produce the income, that there is a feeling that the foundation has not functioned, moved ahead as aggressively with its projects as it should.

I submit that a careful examination as the California attorney general has given to the affairs of the Foundation would disclose the facts to be that the land area of Orange County that is controlled by the Irvine Co. is being developed as rapidly as the market will absorb the land, and short of going out and wholesaling the land off for speculative purposes, the development could not progress faster than it is progressing under the excellent land management team that manages the Irvine Co.

Senator GORE. What is wrong with speculation and enterprise on the part of American citizens? Why should they be denied the opportunity to develop as individuals view the opportunity?

Mr. PRIVETT. I am not complaining about what other individuals——

Senator GORE. You seem to be condemning this.

Mr. PRIVETT. I am not condemning that, Senator.

Senator GORE. Pardon me?

Mr. PRIVETT. I am saying that from the standpoint of the trustees of the foundation——

Senator GORE. That is a different proposition from our standpoint.

Mr. PRIVETT. Their objective is to take the asset which Mr. Irvine gave them, and to develop this asset so that it has the greatest benefit for the people of California that he wanted to benefit, and the manner——

Senator GORE. The people of California may not agree with the view of the board of directors.

Mr. PRIVETT. Well, the uniform supervision of charitable trust acts has been law in California since 1955. We have now and have always had a very active attorney general in carrying out that obligation, and the deputy attorney general attends meetings of the board of our foundation, and if they have any feeling that the manner in which the Irvine Ranch is being developed and whether the judgment of our trustees that the orderly development of this property under a master land use plan, within the center of it a 1,000-acre campus of the University of California which arose from a gift of 1,000 acres of land to that university for the development, and around that university will be a city of more than 100,000, and it will be developed with sufficient green belts, with schools, parks churches, and provisions for the kind of an environment——

Senator GORE. Who is going to determine the manner of development?

Mr. PRIVETT. That is being determined by the board of directors of the Irvine Co., which consists of three members that are on the foundation board, who are elected by the foundation, and the president of the company, and three members of the minority stockholder group.

Senator GORE. Then you propose in perpetuity to manhandle the people of an entire city?

Mr. PRIVETT. We do not propose to manhandle anyone, Senator. All I can say in that respect is that our purpose is to carry out the public trust which we have, and to do so in a way that is a fitting and proper way.

Senator GORE. Thank you.

Mr. PRIVETT. We think we have done that and we think the California attorney general agrees with us.

Senator ANDERSON. Do you think that the founder of this trust would be happy seeing his family squabbling?

Mr. PRIVETT. I am sorry, Senator, I did not get the question.

Senator ANDERSON. I will skip it.

Further questions?

Will Mrs. Smith come forward.

Mr. PRIVETT. Is it your desire that we remain at the table, Senator, to answer such questions as you might have?

Senator ANDERSON. Go ahead, Mrs. Smith.

Senator BENNETT. I made the proposition. I will set the captives free.

Mr. PRIVETT. No; we are very pleased, thank you, sir.

Senator BYRD. Mr. Chairman, could I make a comment at this point?

Senator ANDERSON. Yes, sir; you may.

Senator BYRD. I think the committee will agree that it is not very often that the committee has such an attractive witness as the one we will have in a few minutes. And I might say that not only is she a woman of charm but she is a splendid businesswoman, energetic, and determined. She I understand is a minority among a majority on a board of directors, and whether she is right and the majority is wrong I don't pretend to say. But she is a fine Virginian and I am very pleased to have Mrs. Smith, to welcome her here to this committee and to have my colleagues come to know her as Joan Irvine Smith of Middleburg, Va.

STATEMENT OF MRS. JOAN IRVINE SMITH, THE JAMES ERVINE FOUNDATION, ACCOMPANIED BY LYNDOL L. YOUNG, ATTORNEY FOR MRS. SMITH

Mrs. Smith. I should like to begin my statement by saying that my great-grandfather James Irvine acquired the Irvine Ranch in 1864, more than 100 years ago. My grandfather, James Irvine, Jr., inherited the property from his father and incorporated his holdings as the Irvine Co., under the laws of the State of West Virginia in 1894.

Today the principal assets of the Irvine Co., are 88,000 acres of urban land in Orange County, Calif., which is adjacent to the metropolitan area of Los Angeles. This holding constitutes 20 percent of the entire area of Orange County, and is worth in excess of $1 billion.

As the largest individual stockholder in the Irvine Co., I hold 180 shares of that stock which constitutes 22 percent of the total stock outstanding. The James Irvine Foundation holds as trustee 459 shares or approximately 55 percent of the total stock outstanding.

The foundation stock interest of course represents absolute control of the corporation. It should be extremely obvious that as a substantial stockholder in the Irvine Co., I am seriously affected by the mismanagement policies of that corporation under the absolute domination and control of the James Irvine Foundation.

Mr. Surrey's statement before this committee cited the following abuses committed by foundations which bill H.R. 13270 will correct. They are self-dealing, failure to make adequate current distribution, ownership of business, utilization of the foundation by the donor as an instrument to facilitate the control of business, and speculative investment of assets.

The James Irvine Foundation is guilty of all these abuses and more. This foundation is by far the rottenest apple in the foundation barrel. In view of the time allotted to me to make my oral statement, I will have time to cover only a few of the most recent abuses practiced by the James Irvine Foundation.

However, I have filed a much more detailed written statement with the committee, which covers those incidents that I will not have an opportunity to go into at this time.

Now it should be pointed out that there has been and always will be as long as the James Irvine Foundation controls the Irvine Co., an interlocking directorship relationship between the foundation and the corporation.

There are seven directors of the Irvine Co., and five of them are elected by the foundation and serve as its agents, representatives and puppets of that foundation.

I am the only stockholder in the Irvine Co., who is also a director of the corporation. Mr. McLaren, the president of the foundation, is also the chairman of the board of directors of the Irvine Co. He is the dictator of the corporation. He has repeatedly told me that I am an outside director because I am not a part of the Irvine Co. management, and therefore, that the only functions which I am entitled to perform as a director is to approve all of the acts of the foundation-controlled management of the corporation.

Whatever may be the qualifications of Mr. Privett as the attorney for the foundation, he is certainly no authority on what constitutes good management for a private enterprise corporation such as the Irvine Co. Neither does Mr. McLaren posses the qualifications that are so necessary to the successful management of a private enterprise corporation.

Now the background of Mr. McLaren is solely that of a certified public accountant. Incidentally, Mr. McLaren's firm up until a short time ago did the auditing for the Irvine Co., in addition to the other hats that he also wore.

It was this gentleman who represented my grandfather as his tax accountant and tax adviser, and in this capacity he inveigled himself into my grandfather's confidence and convinced him that the Irvine Ranch would have to be sold in its entirety in order to pay the estate and California inheritance taxes which would be levied against his estate.

It was solely upon this representation of Mr. McLaren that my grandfather entered into the trust agreement under which the foundation became the tax-exempt owner in trust of the controlling stock interest in the Irvine Co.

Now this representation by Mr. McLaren was untrue, as the assets that were in my grandfather's testamentary estate in addition, his Irvine stock holdings were liquid and adequate to have paid these taxes, if my grandfather had not transferred this Irvine stock to the foundation as trustee, but had left this stock to his estate for the benefit of his heirs.

It is not necessary that the members of this committee consider only my statements with reference to the mismanagement policy of the Irvine Co. under the control of the James Irvine Foundation. Let us look at the record and the statements of impartial witnesses concerning the incredibly low dividend policy of the Irvine Co., since the absolute control of this company passed to the foundation upon the death of my uncle, Myford Irvine in 1959.

In that year the estate of Myford Irvine sold 15 shares of Irvine stock for $100,000 per share, and in November 1968 the Irvine Co., purchased 13½ shares of its own stock from a dissatisfied stockholder for $250,000 per share. At no time during the last 10 years were the dividends of the Irvine Co. more than 1 percent of the value of the stock of that company when it was either $100,000 per share or $250,000 per share.

When Mr. McLaren and Mr. Privett appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives on Februrary 21, 1969, Mr. Mills, the chairman of the committee, examined both Mr. McLaren and Mr. Privett concerning this penurious dividend policy of the Irvine Co., under the control of the foundation.

Mr. Mills asked Mr. McLaren what he considered the corpus of the foundation to be worth, and Mr. Privett answered for Mr. McLaren by stating that based upon the sale of 13½ shares of Irvine stock in November 1968, the corpus of the foundation consisting of 459 shares of Irvine Co., stock would be approximately $123 million.

Mr. Mills then wanted to know what the annual income of the foundation was based upon its stock holdings in the Irvine Co., and Mr. Privett replied, "Approximately $1¼ million."

Now Mr. Mills asked Mr. McLaren whether or not he as chairman of the board of directors of the Irvine Co. was satisfied that the company is properly managed, and Mr. McLaren stated that he was completely satisfied.

Mr. Mills then asked Mr. McLaren, Why is it that the Irvine Co. is only producing a return per year on those shares of Irvine stock that are held by the foundation of 1 percent or less when that return is related to the value of the corpus of the foundation;"—to wit, its Irvine stock based on $250,000 per share?

Mr. McLaren had no answer to this question. Mr. Mills also told Mr. McLaren and Mr. Privett that he would not accept as a true value for the purposes of determining the relationship of income to value the transaction involving the sale of only 13½ shares of stock of the Irvine Co. at $250,000 per share, and commented that the value of the foundation's Irvine stock would be far greater if put on the market than that of 13½ shares sold by minority interests.

Mr. Mills then stated to Mr. McLaren that if the Irvine Co. under the management of the foundation cannot make more money than that on its Irvine Co. stock, to wit, less than 1 percent on the value of $123 million as stated by Mr. Privett, whether this is a good thing for the foundation to continue to have this much of its total corpus tied up in the stock of Irvine Co., and Mr. Mills further stated that he thought Mr. McLaren would welcome the Treasury's suggestion that the Congress force the foundation to diversify its investment to some greater extent, to where it would get a better rate of return on its investment than it was getting out of its stock in the Irvine Co.

Now, during Mr. Dillon's appearance before this committee on September 25, I believe Senator Curtis asked him how the Government would receive any tax benefits from the divestiture provision of the House bill as recommended by the Treasury. Here is the answer to this application to the James Irvine Foundation.

I have just called your attention to the 1-percent dividend record of the Irvine Co. as managed by the James Irvine Foundation, which has only produced for the taxpaying stockholders of that company approximately $1,250,000 per year.

When this foundation is forced to divest itself of its controlling stock interest in the Irvine Co., it will sell its Irvine stock to new stockholders who will be taxpayers. New private enterprise corporate management will replace the inefficient, incompetent, self-dealing and fraudulent foundation controlled management.

Under new competent management, dividends of at least 5 percent could be paid to the stockholders, which will amount to in excess of $12 million per year. The Government will of course receive taxes on this amount rather than on approximately $1 million per year, which is at present being received by the individual taxpaying stockholders.

In addition, the Irvine Co. will pay far more substantial corporate taxes with new private enterprise management who will accelerate rather than retard the proper development of the Irvine Ranch properties.

Through this divestiture, the foundation will receive on its own evaluation $123 million for its stock. Invested at the rate of 5 percent the return per year on this amount will be in excess of $6 million instead of the present $1.3 million per year, which will certainly redound to the substantial advantage of the charitable beneficiaries.

Now Orange County, Calif., where the Irvine Ranch is located is growing at the rate of 210 persons per day, and at present its population is 1,400,000 people. Over the last 12 months 26,000 homes have been constructed in the county. Now although the Irvine Co. owns 20 percent of the most readily residential developable land in that county, they have, because of inefficient, incompetent management, constructed only approximately 1,000 homes in the last 12 months. This of course is less than 4 percent of the total home construction in that area.

According to Mr. John McIntire, of the nationally known land planning and civil engineering firm of McIntire & Quiros, the Irvine Co. should under proper management construct at least 10,000 dwelling units per year, and should do that for the next 10 years which would be 100,000 homes constructed by 1980.

To further illustrate the mismanagement practiced by the Irvine Co. under the control of the James Irvine Foundation, they have this very year frozen 50,000 acres of prime residential real estate now ready for development, in a so-called but fictitious agricultural preserve. This will mean that 50,000 acres of prime Irvine Co. land will be frozen out of development for the next 10 years or more.

I call your attention to the statement that Mr. Mills made to Mr. McLaren regarding this agricultural preserve, to wit, "I do not know what hat you wear at this meeting,"—meaning the hat of the president of the foundation or the hat of the chairman of the board of directors of the Irvine Co.—"but in either case how do you justify entering into this agreement"—meaning the agricultural preserve—"to forestall the increased value of property that you as a director or a trustee are obliged to preserve and maintain as a part of the corpus of the foundation? Was this a good thing on your part as the chairman of the board of the Irvine Co. to allow this restriction to occur on 49,253 acres of land in a part of the Irvine Co. which is 53 to 54 percent owned by the foundation? Is that good foundation practice?"

Mr. McLaren stated that he believed it was because through the establishment of the agricultural preserve the Irvine Co. expected to save, which it has not done so far, $1,500,000 per year on real estate taxes in Orange County.

Now, concerning this explanation by Mr. McLaren, Mr. Mills stated, "But as the taxes go up, the fact that you have saved that much in taxes also means that you also have avoided through this device the normal increase in value of that property."

Mr. Mills then wanted to know whether or not Mr. McLaren and Mr. Privett had explored with the courts in California to see whether this agricultural agreement could be set aside, or whether it is in the best interests of anyone, and Privett answered that they had not, and that I have filed a suit in the Federal court in Los Angeles asking the court to set aside the agreement and that he as the attorney for the foundation was going to file an answer to this lawsuit on March 3, 1969.

Mr. Mills then stated, "You are just filing an answer? I thought you were going before somebody to ask that the restriction"—meaning the agricultural preserve—"be removed. You are not going to do that?"

Mr. Privett replied, "Definitely not, Chairman Mills."

Mr. Mills then asked, "Why don't you want it removed if you are going to diversify your assets or your investments? This is a situation where a foundation is operating, dominating, and controlling a business enterprise, one of the things which I do not think a foundation ought to engage in. The issue is whether a foundation should be permitted to own and dominate a business operation such as the Irvine Co., to place encumbrances upon its properties perhaps to such an extent as to minimize values, and whether it is in the public interest for a foundation to remain in this condition, that is the issue before the committee.

"We do have this recommendation that the situation ought not to be permitted to go on in perpetuity."

Mr. Mills then stated, "When you put on your hat as chairman of the board of directors of the Irvine Co. and put this amount of land into the agricultural activities for 10 years, there is not anybody who would question that you have materially reduced your possibility of income. I am not a real estate man, but when you tell me you cannot sell land in that community and get more for it than you can raising agricultural products, you have lost me. Now you have tied yourselves out of it."

Mr. Schneebeli, a Republican member of the Committee on Ways and Means wanted to know why the board of supervisors of Orange County entered into the agricultural agreement which reduced the county's tax income by $1,500,000 per year, and when Mr. McLaren stated that he could not speak for the county officials, Mr. Schneebeli stated, "Well, does it make much sense?"

Mr. Utt, the second ranking Republican member of the committee and in whose congressional district the Irvine Ranch is located and who is intimately acquainted with the mismanagement policies of the Irvine Co. under the control of the foundation expressed his opinion concerning the establishment of the agricultural preserves as follows:

"I agree so completely with your statement"—referring to my statement—"on that preserve or whatever you call it to relieve the Irvine Co. of $1.5 million taxes to the county. I cannot understand the board of supervisors doing it because I have a great many close associates owning land within that conclave of the Irvine Co., some 1,000 or 2,000 or 3,000 and they have been dealing with them on a water system and they are not going to be interested in that because they cannot develop it, because you can stop development of the Irvine Co. because of the establishment of this agricultural preserve."

I replied to Mr. Utt's statement as follows:

"To me it is absolutely appalling because this land"—meaning the agricultural preserve—"lies directly beside Tustin, and know what the growth in Tustin is. You know all of the growth comes up to the Irvine Co. land in that area and it stopped and it does not go any farther and there are these people that you speak of that have 3,000, 4,000 acres that lie there in one piece. San Joaquin Fruit Co. I believe owns some property there in that area and they have attempted to develop this land. They cannot get sewers, they cannot get anything."

Now, Mr. McLaren paid no attention whatsoever to the criticism by Mr. Mills and other members of the Committee on Ways and Means concerning the mismanagement policies of the foundation through its control of the Irvine Co. Upon his return to California, Mr. McLaren continued to engage the Irvine Co. in the same practices and policies for which he had been challenged by Mr. Mills.

On June 16, a regular meeting of the Irvine Co. board of directors was held, and at this meeting the Irvine Co. 1969 restricted stock property plan was approved. Under this plan certain foundation-elected key executives of the Irvine Co. which include Mr. McLaren are to receive a bonus in kind for their services, but the exact nature of this bonus is not described. It could be a distribution of the stock of the Irvine Co. or one of its subsidiaries, or a piece of the assets of the Irvine Co. such as a shopping center or an apartment complex.

Now, these so-called key executives would be selected at the sole and unfettered discertion of the compensation committee which is appointed of course by the foundation-controlled board of directors.

This is just one more of many such schemes the foundation, trustees and their controlled Irvine Co. management have attempt to put over on the minority stockholders.

Again as in the past I have been compelled to file legal action to prevent the dissipation of Irvine Co. assets.

As you will be able to see from my written statement, I have for the past 12 years been in a continuous battle with the James Irvine Foundation trustees and their Irvine Co. management to keep them from getting their fingers literally in the company till.

This foundation reform legislation is long, long overdue gentlemen.

Thank you.

Senator ANDERSON. Do you want your full statement to be put in the record?

Mrs. SMITH. Certainly.

Senator ANDERSON. That will be done.

(Mrs. Smith's prepared and supplemental statements follow:)

STATEMENT OF JOAN IRVINE SMITH WITH REFERENCE TO THE JAMES IRVINE FOUNDATION

SUMMARY

The James Irvine Foundation, as trustee, holds 459 shares of the stock of the Irvine Company, a West Virginia corporation, which represents approximately 53% and the control of the Board of Directors and the management of this One Billion Dollar corporation. The principal asset of The Irving Company consists of land holdings in Orange County, California, amounting to 84,000 acres which are located in the metropolitan Los Angeles area. This holding constitutes 20% of the total area of Orange County, California. In 1960, the population of Orange County was approximately 700,000 persons. Today, it is approximately 1,500,000 persons. In 1960, the population of Orange County represented 4.4% of the total population in California. Today, it is 7%. During the year 1968, the County's growth averaged 6,388 persons per month, or 210 per day. The Irvine Company has an outstanding capital stock issue of 841½ shares and The James Irvine Foundation holds, as trustees, 459 shares or 53.7% of the total stock of this Company. I am the largest individual stockholder of the Irvine Company with my stockholding of 180 shares which constitutes approximately 21% of the total issued stock. The remaining shares are principally owned by members of the Irvine family.

N. Loyall McLaren is President of The James Irvine Foundation and Chairman of the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company and 5 of the 7 Directors of this corporation are designated and elected by Mr. McLaren, as the President of The James Irvine Foundation. As Chairman, Mr. McLaren rules the Board of Directors and the management of The Irvine Company, which is personally selected by him, with the ruthless tactics and strong-arm methods of a dictator. During the reign of Mr. McLaren over The Irvine Company since 1959, no consideration whatever has been given to the 45% stock rights and interests of the Irvine family stockholders. During this same period, the policies and practices of Mr. McLaren with reference to the management of The Irvine Company have only produced dividends to the stockholders of less than 1% based on the market value of their stock. As recently as November, 1968, The Irvine Company itself purchased from a stockholder, 13½ shares of its own stock for $250,000.00 per share and based on this transaction, the total dividends of approximately $2,300.00 per share paid by The Irvine Company for the year 1968 constitute a dividend return of less than 1%. During the last 5 years the net income of The Irvine Company, including land condemnations and sales was approximately between $8,000,000.00 and $10,000,000.00, and under proper management, dividends based upon this sum of at least $6,000.00 per share should have been declared and paid to the stockholders.

Under the following titles in my attached statement, there are set forth many of the self-dealing practices and abuses of The James Irvine Foundation in connection with its absolute and arbitrary control of the Board of Directors and the management of The Irvine Company, a private enterprise corporation, whose business is wholly unrelated to the charitable activities of the Foundation.

The illegal hellis transactions with the Irvine Company.

The death of Myford Irvine.

The Stevens Development Company deal.

The Upper Bay Development Company deal.

The University of California at Irvine.

The Long deal.

Attempt to bring my attorney to directors meeting.

The hostile attitude of N. Loyall McLaren.

The Irvine Ranch Agricultural Preserve Foundation deal.

The so-called "1969 RESTRICTED STOCK AND PROPERTY PLAN" proposed by the foundation for certain foundation controlled key executives of the Irvine Company.

The Irvine Company policy established by the foundation does not justify its tax exemption as a charitable organization.

I strongly recommend to the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, that the provisions which are contained in H.R. 13270 that is now under consideration by your committee with reference to the divestment by private foundations of stock held in corporations whose business is unrelated to the charitable activities of foundations; the income tax of 7½% based on value of the investment assets of foundations and the 5% annual income distribution applicable to all foundations, be approved by your committee, but with the following revisions, to wit: that the divestment period commence with the year 1970 on a basis of at least 20% instead of the 10% provided in H.R. 13270 at the end of 1971 and that there be an annual 20% divestment provision during each of the remaining 4 years so that at the end of the 5-year period, as now provided in H.R. 13270, The James Irvine Foundation will have been required to divest itself of all stock that it holds in the Irvine Company. Also, that the 7½% income tax be made applicable to the year 1969 in order that this new tax will be paid on April 15, 1970 and that the 5% income distribution provision be made applicable to the year 1969 instead of 1970.

STATEMENT

My name is Joan Irvine Smith. I live with my husband, Morton W. Smith and our children on our farm in Middleburg, Virginia.

My great grandfather, James Irvine, immigrated from Ireland to the United States in 1846. He was then 19 years of age. Upon his arrival in New York City, he went to work in a paper mill but soon thereafter left New York for the California goldfields, where he worked as both a miner and a merchant. He later moved to San Francisco where he engaged in the mercantile business. In 1865 James Irvine, with two partners acquired 3 ranches in what was then Los Angeles County and which originally were Spanish land grants. These ranches were known as the Rancho San Joaquin, Rancho Lomas de Santiago and a portion of Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana and covered approximately 115,000 acres.

In 1876, James Irvine acquired his partners' interest and thereafter the above-named 3 ranches were known as The Irvine Ranch. James Irvine died in 1886 and The Irvine Ranch was left to his son, my grandfather, James Irvine, Jr., in trust until he was 25 years of age whereupon the ownership of The Irvine Ranch vested absolutely in him.

In 1894, James Irvine, Jr. incorporated The Irvine Company under the laws of West Virginia with a capital of $100,000.00 divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $100.00 per share.

In 1921, my father, James Irvine II, received from his father 200 shares of the stock of The Irvine Company. This stock holding was placed in trust under an agreement between James Irvine II and his father who was also the trustee. This trust agreement provided that if James Irvine II predeceased his father without issue, the 200 shares of Irvine stock reverted to his father, but if James Irvine II predeceased his father with surviving issue, the trust agreement provided that if such issue survived James Irvine, Jr., the 200 shares of Irvine stock would be distributed to such issue and the trust thereupon would be terminated.

My father died in 1935 and was survived by myself and my mother. I was two years old. On August 24, 1947, my grandfather died and thereupon I became the owner of 200 shares of the stock of The Irvine Company.

After my father died in 1935, certain problems arose with reference to Federal Estate Taxes and California Inheritance Taxes which involved the 200 shares of the stock of The Irvine Company which my father had received in trust from his father in 1921. At this time, N. Loyall McLaren, who was a certified public accountant and tax adviser for my grandfather was employed to handle the Federal Estate Taxes and the California Inheritance Taxes that were involved in the estate of my father. In connection with the settlement of these tax problems, Mr. McLaren became closely associated with my grandfather and during the period between 1935 and 1937, Mr. McLaren had inveigled himself into the confidence of my grandfather to the extent that he succeeded in having my grandfather sign an Indenture of Trust and to allegedly assign to a California corporation, as trustee, to wit, The James Irvine Foundation, 510 shares of the stock of The Irvine Company which amounted to 51% of the total issued and outstanding stock of this company. Under this Indenture of Trust, the title to the 510 shares of Irvine stock was not to vest in The James Irvine Foundation, as trustee, until after the death of my grandfather. During the period from 1937 to 1947 when my grandfather died, he received all of the dividends and there was no change whatever in the ownership and the control and the management of The Irvine Company by my grandfather. The James Irvine Foundation, as trustee, during this period of 10 years had no connection whatever with the business or corporate affairs of The Irvine Company or with the 510 shares of Irvine stock.

After the death of my grandfather, on August 24, 1947, the James Irvine Foundation, as trustee, illegally received the delivery of the 510 shares of Irvine stock from the executors of the estate of my grandfather who were also directors and trustees of the James Irvine Foundation. At the time of the death of my grandfather, the certificates of stock representing the 510 shares all stood in the name of my grandfather. After the delivery of these certificates in November, 1947 for 510 shares of Irvine stock to the Foundation, as trustee, following the death of my grandfather, a stock certificate was for the first time issued in the name of the James Irvine Foundation.

When my grandfather died, I became the owner of the 200 shares of Irvine stock but I was only 14 years of age and a minor. A certificate for the shares was therefore issued in the name of my mother, Athalie R. Clarke, as guardian of my estate. In 1952, when I was 19 years of age, I was married and under the laws of California, I thereupon had reached by majority and was entitled to have the 200 shares of Irvine stock transferred from the name of my mother as said guardian to my own name. I then placed 100 shares of Irvine stock in a trust for my mother. Upon her death, this 100 shares reverts to me.

In 1957, I became a Member of the Board of Directors of the Irvine Company and thereupon I was in an official position to become acquanited with the affairs of The Irvine Company and what I discovered disclosed to me that there were many irregularities and illegal, self-dealing and unjust enrichment transactions that were connected with the management of the company under the control and domination of The James Irvine Foundation.

The 180 shares (formerly 200) of the stock now owned by me in The Irvine Company represents 21.1% of its total capital stock. The 459 shares (formerly 510) of Irvine stock now owned by The James Irvine Foundation amounts to 53.7% of the total capital stock of the corporation. The total issued capital stock of The Irvine Company at this time amounts to 841½ shares. Approximately 202½ shares of Irvine stock are owned by other members of the Irvine family. On November 6, 1968, The Irvine Company purchased 13½ shares of its own stock which were then owned by the Macco Realty Company. The price paid by The Irvine Company for this stock was $250,000.00 per share and based upon this valuation, my 180 shares of Irvine stock has an established market value of $45,000,000.00.

The illegal Hellis transactions with the Irvine Co.

The first discovery that I made concerning the self-dealing and mismanagement practices of The James Irvine Foundation was shortly after I became a Director in 1957, and involved the illegal dealings of one W. B. Hellis that were connected with The Irvine Company. Mr. Hellis was a Director and Vice President of the Irvine Company and since 1950 he also had held the dual and conflict of interest position of Director, Member and Trustee of The James Irvine Foundation.

In August of 1947, Mr. Hellis and a friend of his, whose name is W. S. Tubach, had gone with my grandfather to a cattle ranch owned by The Irvine Company in Montana, and I learned that while on this trip my grandfather had met his death by alleged accidental means while fishing in a stream that was located on the cattle ranch. As I heard the story, there had been a very violent argument between my grandfather and Mr. Hellis during lunch on August 24, 1947, and right after the argument my grandfather and Hellis and Tubach supposedly went fishing and each man took a location on the stream and they were to meet afterwards. Well, my grandfather never came back. I don't recall if it was Hellis or Tubach who found my grandfather supposedly, but he was in the water and he was dead.

I then discovered that at a meeting of the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company which was held on October 16, 1947, as disclosed by the minutes of this meeting, which meeting was attended by Directors Hellis, Dinsmore, Scarborough and Plum, absent, Myford Irvine. Hellis stated to the Board of Directors that on this trip to Montana, my grandfather had orally agreed to loan him and his wife and Tubach, from funds of The Irvine Company, the sum of $190,000.00. There was no writing signed by my grandfather or any other corroboration to support the statement of Hellis concerning this alleged agreement. To my astonishment, I further discovered from reading the minutes of this meeting that the Board of Directors for the first time in the entire existence of The Irvine Company authorized the making of a loan of company funds to anybody, let alone a Director and Vice President of the Company and a total stranger to the company such as Tubach.

The minutes of this meeting further disclose that N. Loyall McLaren and A. J. McFadden who were present at the meeting as Directors, Members and Trustees of the James Irvin Foundation and as nominee Directors to the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company upon an amendment to the By-Laws of said company increasing the number of Directors from five to seven, sat in and participated in this meeting as directors for the Foundation and gave their approval to the making of this loan in the sum of $190,000.00. As above pointed out, Hellis was made a Director and Trustee of the Foundation in 1950.

I further discovered that through an investigation made by my attorneys that Hellis and his friend Tubach had been buying properties together with the Irvine Company under the control of the Foundation that were located in Imperial Valley as tenants in common with the company. It also further developed that there were other unjust enrichment transactions involving the purchase of lands and where Hellis and Tubach each owned a ½ undivided interest with the Irvine Company owning the other ½ interest and financing the deal. The various transactions in Imperial Valley amounted to approximately $11,000,000.00. Subsequently,

I requested the Foundation controlled Board of Directors of the Irvine Company to take action against Hellis and Tubach with reference to these illegal transactions where founds of the Irvine Company had been used to unjustly enrich both Hellis and Tubach, but they refused to take action. My mother and I thereupon instituted legal action against Mr. and Mrs. Hellis and Mr. and Mrs. Tubach consisting of a proceeding to perpetuate testimony and as a result thereof Mr. Hellis resigned as a Director and Vice President of the Irvine Company and also a Director, Member and Trustee of The James Irvine Foundation and there was a voluntary partition made of the properties which stood in the names of Hellis and Tubach as to an undivided ½ interest and in the name of the Irvine Company as to the remaining ½ interest.

The death of Myford Irvine

My uncle, Myford Irvine, who succeeded my grandfather as President of the Irvine Company was found dead in the basement of his home on January 11, 1959, from gun shot wounds. An autopsy disclosed that he was shot in the stomach twice from a 16 gauge shotgun and once in the head by a .22 revolver. It appeared that my uncle was confronted with financial obligations which had caused him considerable worry. He had endeavored to either sell or borrow money on his stock in the Irvine Company which consisted of 150 shares, but was unable to do so. His death was officially attributed to suicide.

The Stevens Development Co. deal

Immediately following the death of my uncle, A. J. McFadden, who had never been a Director or Officer of the Irvine Company during the lifetime of my grandfather and who was made a Director of the company in 1947 by The James Irvine Foundation was elected President of the Company and N. Loyall McLaren was elected Vice President and acting President. Mr. McFadden was elected as only an interim President until a permanent President had been elected. Mr. McLaren took over the task of interviewing candidates for the office of President and one of the men that he interviewed was Roger Stevens, a real estate man with offices in New York City. Mr. Stevens came to the Irvine Ranch but instead of talking about becoming the President of the Irvine Company, Mr. McLaren stated that Mr. Stevens had made a proposal to develop the properties owned by the Irvine Company, and under the Stevens proposal, the Company was to put $12,000,000.00 worth of land into a new corporation to be called the Stevens Development Company. It was apparent this was a pre-arranged self-dealing transaction between McLaren and Stevens. Mr. Stevens was to contribute $5,000,000.00 to the capital of this new corporation which would make a total capitalization of $17,000,000.00.

The stockholders of the Irvine Company were to have an opportunity to purchase a part of Mr. Stevens' commitment for stock in the sum of $5,000,000.00 and also employees of the Company which would have included the Foundation Directors, Mr. McFadden and Mr. McLaren, would also have enjoyed the right to purchase some of Mr. Stevens' stock. Furthermore, under the Stevens proposal, he or the new Stevens Development Company would have the right of first refusal on all of the company acreage, which would have been the same as giving the Stevens Development Company an option on the entire property that was owned by The Irvine Company in Orange County. The Stevens proposal was made to the Board of Directors immediately after Mr. McLaren had become a Member of the Board and Vice President of The Irvine Company. I believe it was at the April meeting in 1959 that Mr. McLaren made the Stevens proposal to the Directors, and he further stated that he had hired the New York law firm of Cravath, Swain & Moore to represent The Irvine Company and to evaluate the Stevens proposal.

The Stevens proposal covered approximately sixteen pages and Mr. McLaren handed copies to each member of the Board of Directors and stated that he was very much in favor of it. I looked over a copy of the proposal and it was very long and very detailed, but one of the things I could certainly see from it was that the Irvine family minority stockholders would be totally out as far as making any capital gains on the sale of any of the Orange County properties because of the way that the Stevens proposal had tied up the entire Irvine Ranch property.

I asked Mr. McLaren about that, and he said, "Well, you can spin off the stuff in Montana and in Imperial Valley," and so I said, "Well, that is not where the appreciation has been, it has been in Orange County." Mr. McLaren replied, "Well, that's where we've got the stockholders where the hair is short, you are not going to get any capital gains here".

Later there was a luncheon held at the Irvine Coast Country Club for the Board of Regents of the University of California, who were considering the location of the Univeristy of California at Irvine on part of the property of the Irvine Ranch. Mr. McLaren was present and, after the luncheon I told Mr. McLaren that I was not going to go along with his deal, and he told me that I was, that I was going to do exactly as I was told to do and we got into quite an argument outside of the Club. Later that afternoon, Mr. McLaren called me at my home and asked me if he could come down and he came down with Roger Stevens and an attorney from Cravath, Swain & Moore and I believe another gentleman who was an attorney from the same law firm or an associate of Mr. Stevens. The meeting lasted about a half an hour and Mr. McLaren tried to convince me to go along with the Stevens proposal. I had previously obtained legal opinions from three law firms in Los Angeles, which were in writing and I had them with me at the meeting and all three opinions stated that the Stevens proposal for the Irvine family minority stockholders was a very bad thing and should not be gone into and just was certainly not a good business deal as far as the Irvine family stockholders were concerned. I told Mr. McLaren that if he pushed the Stevens deal that I would sue for liquidation and Mr. McLaren turned to Mr. Halloran from the Cravath law firm and said, "Tell her the laws in the State of California when the Foundation owns 51% of the Company, that she can't sue for liquidation," and I said, "You had better tell Halloran that this is not a California corporation, it is West Virginia, and in West Virginia you only need 20% and I have got the 20%".

Thereupon the whole tenor of the conversation changed and Mr. McLaren got very sugary and sweet and said how he had always taken care of my affairs, represented me on the Board of Directors, looked after my mother's and my interest and that I shouldn't spend all of my money going to these attorneys, that I didn't need to, that all they were going to do was cost me money for legal fees, and so on, and so forth, and Mr. Halloran said, "Well, I couldn't give her better advice than to seek legal counsel whenever she feels it's necessary". They then started talking about setting up separate corporations with the Company properties in Orange County and spinning them off, and so forth and there was a discussion about that, and then the meeting was over, and they all left. The next day at the Board of Directors meeting, Mr. McLaren again tried to push his self-dealing Stevens deal through and I had the three legal opinions which I read into the record, that it was a bad deal, and I informed them that I would start to sue for liquidation if they tried to push it, and Mr. McLaren then told Mr. McFadden to contact Stevens and tell him that the deal was off, and that was the end of the Stevens proposal at that time. I was very excited about the Stevens proposal because Mr. McLaren was supposed to be contacting Mr. Stevens to come in as President of The Irvine Company, and here he came in with an entirely different situation where he was going to strip the Irvine Company of its Orange County property and put it in this other corporation where Mr. McLaren would have an interest. This was the end of the Stevens deal and Mr. Stevens returned to New York.

The Upper Bay Development Co. deal

Following the Stevens proposal, Mr. McLaren brought another self-dealing proposal to the attention of the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company which was known as the Upper Bay Development Company, and under this proposal by Mr. McLaren this Company was to be organized as a subsidiary corporation of The Irvine Company. The Irvine Company was going to take one-third of the stock, and the Irvine family minority stockholders were going to be able to get a third of it so Mr. McLaren at the Directors meeting stated that this was a very highly speculative business venture and he felt that the Foundation would give up its one-third stock interest. They would not take their third, and instead The Irvine Company employees would get that third and that instead of said employees having to buy the third of that stock in this subsidiary, which would hold about 170 odd acres of the land of The Irvine Company, that was worth approximately $50,000.00 an acre, that The Irvine Company would advance 90% of the money for the employees to go into the deal and that the employees would only have to put up 10%. Mr. McLaren and Mr. McFadden were both directors of The Irvine Company and the Foundation, Mr. McFadden was President of The Irvine Company and Mr. McLaren was Vice-President and Mr. McLaren was also President of the Foundation so both of them would have participated in the ownership of one-third of the stock of this subsidiary corporation as employees of

The Irvine Company and 90% of the purchase price of this stock would be advanced by The Irvine Company and they would only personally contribute 10% thereof.

I asked Mr. McLaren whether the Company was going to loan the Irvine family minority stockholders the money to purchase their stock and he said, No, that we would have to buy all or any part that we wanted with our own money. Later this proposal came before the Board of Directors and the Company Tax Counsel wrote a memorandum on how this subsidiary corporation was to be set up and how it was to be divided with the employees of The Irvine Company which included Mr. McLaren and Mr. McFadden as officers of the Company and Directors and Trustees of the Foundation who would get a piece of the stock which would be financed up to 90% with Company money. Through my efforts, this self-dealing transaction which would have unlawfully enriched McLaren and McFadden, was abandoned.

After Mr. McLaren became Chairman of the Board of Directors in 1960, he opposed many of my motions as a Director and as the only stockholder of The Irvine Company who was a Director with reference to many matters which were for the best interest of the Company and the Irvine family stockholders. One of these matters was the master plan for the development of the extensive land holdings of The Irvine Company. This plan was finally adopted but both Mr. McLaren and Mr. McFadden fought it and the other Foundation Directors also opposed it, but finally agreed to it.

The University of California at Irvine

When the Board of Regents of the University of California indicated that they were interested in locating a University on The Irvine Ranch providing The Irvine Company would make a gift of the property to the Board of Regents, Mr. McLaren wanted to sell the property to the Board of Regents. I was in favor of the Company making a gift of the property and I cited the University of California at Los Angeles as an example as to how The Irvine Company would be benefited by having the University located on its property like the City of Westwood which was developed adjacent to the University of California at Los Angeles was an example of what would happen if the Board of Regents established a similar University on the property of The Irvine Company. There was another group who owned considerable property that was going to give their property to the Board of Regents and the University would have been located on this other property if we had not made a gift of our property to the Board of Regents and if this had happened, we would not have the University of California at Irvine where it now exists, on the property of The Irvine Company at Irvine, Orange County, California.

The Long Deal

Another self-dealing transaction involving an officer of The Irvine Company and the Foundation controlled Board of Directors of the Company was the Long transaction. Mr. Long was a Vice President of The Irvine Company in charge of the Land Development Department. This transaction came before the Board of Directors with reference to a tract of company land of approximately 125 acres that was situated along what was known as the Upper Back Bay in Newport Beach, and on this particular property the Company began to put in the improvements, that is the public utililities and the streets so that it could be developed. I was then advised that the Company was going to have a man who had done other development work for the Company to the development on this particular property. Mr. Long, who was a Vice President of the Company, came before the Board of Directors and stated that he had a small minority interest in the Bay Crest Corporation which was one of the corporations that another individual by the name of Austin Sturdyvand was acting in the development of this property. The way it turned out was that there were two other people who also had an interest in this property, and they both came in with bids for the property. I think one bid was for $13,000 an acre and the other bid was for $12,500 an acre which was later raised to $13,000 an acre and the bid of Mr. Sturdyvand was $11,000 an acre. Mr. Long was involved in this trasaction with Mr. Sturdyvand. Mr. McFadden, who was the President of the Company and also a Director of both the Company and The James Irvine Foundation stated that he was going to handle the deal and that as President he would take care of the matter and that the best group would purchase the property. As it turned out, the other two bids for $13,000 an acre were discouraged by Mr. McFadden or his agent from being interested in the purchase.

One of said purchasers was told by a representative of The Irvine Company that this Company was an eleemosynary organization and wasn't interested in making money. When these two other bids dropped out, Mr. McFadden and Sturdyvand agreed to a purchase price of $13,000 an acre and then he kicked in for The Irvine Company additional acreage which had not been approved by the Board of Directors or brought to my attention as a Director and stockholder of the Company and also Mr. McFadden added another 12.73 acres which likewise had never been authorized by the Board of Directors or brought to my attention as a Director and stockholder and sold the same to Sturdyvand at $10,000 an acre. This property was appraised shortly thereafter in the neighborhood of $30,000 an acre.

Both Mr. McLaren and Robert H. Gerdes, who was also a Director of The Irvine Company, as well as a Director of the Foundation approved the transaction with Sturdyvand. At the Directors meeting which occurred after the deal was closed by Mr. McFadden, he stated that all of the extra acreage that was added to the original 125 acres which was approved by the Board of Directors with the exception of my "No" vote had been added to and sold to Sturdyvand. This transaction was a typical example of how The Irvine Company has been mismanaged under the control and domination of The James Irvine Foundation. Later, my mother, Mrs. Athalie R. Clarke, and myself, filed a derivative stockholders suit against the Foundation and its Directors and Mr. Long for damages that the company lost in the sale of the property to Sturdyvand at $13,000 an acre. The lower Court sustained a Demurrer to our Complaint without leave to amend. An appeal was taken to a higher Court and the judgment of the lower Court was reversed as to Long, McFadden and McLaren and my mother and I were given permission to file an Amended Complaint which we were unable to do because the appraiser who had appraised this property had died during the appeal and we therefore were unable to use his testimony and so the action was dismissed.

Before this suit was filed, I attended a meeting of the Board of Directors and there was a discussion with reference to the Long situation. I requested that Mr. Long be brought to the Directors meeting for the purpose of telling the Directors exactly what kind of an interest he held in the Bay Crest Corporation and Mr. McLaren spoke up and said that Mr. Long didn't have to tell anybody about anything and that he, Mr. McLaren, was satisfied with the deal and that it had gone through and been completed and that that was simply the end of it. I later discovered that Mr. Long had considerably more than a small minority interest in the Bay Crest Corporation and there was another corporation involved in this Sturdyvand transaction in which he was the total stockholder and there were two other corporations also involved which I understood that Mr. Long held at least a 50% interest therein.

Attempt to bring my attorney to directors meetings

Because of all of the improper and illegal transactions that were involved under the control and domination of The James Irvine Foundation, I requested the right to bring my attorney to the meetings of the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company. As I have already pointed out, I was the only stockholder in the Company that was also a Director and furthermore as the owner of the 200 (now 180) shares of stock of The Irvine Company, I was the owner of ap- approximately 21% of all of the assets of this corporation and was therefore vitally and substantially interested in how the affairs and business of The Irvine Company were managed. It was the general practice of Mr. McLaren, as Chairman of the Board of Directors to overrule all of the motions or resolutions that I proposed by telling me that I was out of order and when I would appeal his ruling, I of course was overruled because the Foundation Directors who were in the majority all voted to uphold the ruling of Mr. McLaren. The Foundation could not keep me off the Board of Directors because my 200 shares of stock under the cumulative voting law in California permitted me to elect myself as a Director and therefore the Foundation could not keep me from serving as a Director of The Irvine Company. My request to have my attorney present at the meetings of the Board of Directors was turned down. My attorneys thereupon filed a Petition with the Court for a Writ of Mandamus for the purpose of directing and ordering the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company to permit me to bring my attorney to the meetings of the Board. I was the only woman on the Board of Directors and the Foundation Directors were attorneys and businessmen and Mr. McLaren was a certified public accountant and also the Foundation selected an attorney for The Irvine Company and he was also present at the meetings and of course his opinions supported the wishes of the Foundation Directors who controlled the meeting. The Court held that under the laws of West Virginia where The Irvine Company was incorporated that the Board of Directors was the exclusive authority as to who could attend the meetings of the Board and therefore this proceeding was dismissed.

The attitude of Mr. McLaren as Chairman of the Board of Directors toward me as a Director and a substantial stockholder in The Irvine Company is perhaps best illustrated by a conversation that my mother and myself had with Mr. McLaren in San Francisco. On this occasion, Mr. McLaren referred to me as an outside Director and he referred to a book which he had written and in which he stated that unless you were a Director who was also a part of management which of course I was not, that you therefore were an outside Director and didn't have any say in what was going on in the company. You simply attended the Directors meetings to approve what management did, and not to direct management unless you were part of management and therefore he considered me to be an outside Director, even though I own 21% of The Irvine Company and neither Mr. McLaren or any other Director on the entire Board of Directors owned a single solitary share of stock therein. The control by The James Irvine Foundation directors that controlled The Irvine Company, from time to time created wholly owned subsidiary corporations and in connection with the organization of these companies, the Irvine family stockholders indicated that they would like to have a voice in the management thereof. One of these corporations was The Irvine Industrial Complex, a California corporation. However, the Irvine family stockholders were told by Mr. McLaren that the control of the Board of Directors of these subsidiary corporations would also be under the control of The James Irvine Foundation and that the Foundation did not intend that any other stockholder would have anything to say about the control of The Irvine Company or any of its subsidiary corporations.

On one occasion, when there was a discussion about the subsidiary corporation, Mr. Privett, who is the attorney for The James Irvine Foundation, was present. During the discussion, I brought up the fact that the Treasury Department had recommended to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives that all private foundations, such as The James Irvine Foundation, should be prohibited from holding more than 20% of the stock of another corporation such as The Irvine Company and Mr. Privett stated that The James Irvine Foundation would give up the tax exemption rather than divest its stock in the Irvine Company because the prime interest of the Foundation was running The Irvine Company in perpetuity and forever.

The Irvine Ranch Agricultural Preserve Foundation deal

On January 29, 1969, the Board of Supervisors of Orange County, pursuant to an application filed by The Irvine Company, adopted a resolution by a vote of 3 supervisors and with 2 supervisors voting "No", which substantially provided that the application of The Irvine Company for the establishment of an agricultural preserve on the lands of The Irvine Company in Orange County and covering an area of approximately 49,253 acres was approved. Although I am a Director and the largest individual stockholder in The Irvine Company, I had not been notified of the filing of this application with the Board of Supervisors, otherwise I would have been present at the hearing and would have objected thereto. This resolution further provided in substance that on February 18, 1969, the Board of Supervisors would consider the execution of an agreement with The Irvine Company to establish the agricultural preserve pursuant to the California Conservation Act of 1965.

On February 11, 1969, the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company, by the vote of the Foundation controlled Directors, McLaren, Sullivan, Mason and Wheeler and with the fifth Foundation controlled Director, Newman being absent, adopted a resolution authorizing the President of The Irvine Company to enter into the Agricultural Preserve Agreement with the Board of Supervisors of Orange County. I voted against this resolution and so did Director N. Keith Gaede, husband of Linda Irvine Gaede who owns 45 shares of the stock of The Irvine Company. As above mentioned, I am the only Director who is also a stockholder.

On February 18, 1969, the date which had been set by the Board of Supervisors for the purpose of considering the execution of the Agricultural Preserve Agreement with The Irvine Company, my attorney, Lyndol L. Young, personally appeared and requested the Board of Supervisors to postpone the consideration of this agreement for a period of one week in order that I and my mother, who is also a stockholder in The Irvine Company, could appear before the Board of Supervisors and protest the execution of this agreement. Mr. Young advised the Board of Supervisiors that I and my mother were attending a hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives—United States Congress in Washington, D.C. and that I was scheduled to appear as a witness before this committee on February 19, 1969 and was therefore unable to be present at the meeting. The attorney for The Irvine Company was present at this meeting and he objected to the postponement requested by Mr. Young and thereupon the Board of Supervisors adopted a resolution approving the execution by the Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of this agreement.

The establishment of the fictitious agricultural preserve on 40,253 acres of land of The Irvine Company in Orange County out of a total holding of 84,000 acres during the 10-year period of the agreement prohibits The Irvine Company from selling or leasing any part of the lands contained therein free and clear from the incompliances, restrictions, limitations and liens imposed thereon under the terms of the agreement which are that no part of the agricultural preserve lands may be devoted to any uses other than agricultural. Only 10,000 acres involved in the agricultural preserve are actually devoted to agricultural purposes and the remaining 30,000 acres do not contain topography that is agriculturally oriented. This means that The Irvine Company, during this 10-year period, is prohibited from developing any part of this 40,253 acres of the company's valuable lands in Orange County for residential, industrial, commercial or business uses. Consequently, The Irvine Company and the minority stockholders, including myself, will be substantially damaged both as to dividends and the intrinsic value of our Irvine stock. The Agricultural Department of the Company now operates at a substantial loss.

Because of the mismanagement policies by the Foundation through its control of The Irvine Company in refusing to adequately develop the Company property in Orange County, a great number of home buyers who desire to locate in Orange County have had to go elsewhere in order to find a home and by reason thereof, many thousands of home sales have been lost to The Irvine Company. The major portion of the lands covered by the agricultral preserve are presently ready and marketable for residential, business, commercial and industrial development and under proper management, this land would be developed by the construction of 10,000 homes per year during the period of the next 10 years or a total of 100,000 new homes. Because of the establishment of the agricultural preserve on 40,253 acres of these lands, the buyers who would prefer to purchase homes on the Irvine Ranch will go elsewhere and in this event, The Irvine property that constitutes the agricultural preserve will remain vacant and economically unproductive and unsalable indefinitely and for many years in the future, and this will have a detrimental, restrictive influence on the orderly urban growth of the property of The Irvine Company in Orange County.

I have instituted a stockholders derivative action in the United States District Court in Los Angeles against The James Irvine Foundation and the Foundation controlled Directors of The Irvine Company and the members of the Board of Supervisors of Orange County for the purpose of having this Agricultural Preserve Agreement set aside and adjudicated as invalid.

The so-called "1969 restricted stock and property plan" proposed by the Foundation for certain foundation controlled key executives of The Irvine Co.

At the meeting of the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company on June 16, 1969, attended by myself and the other 6 members of the Board, John V. Newman, Director of both The Irvine Company and the Foundation and Chairman of the Compensation Committee of the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company, handed a 3-page document to each of the Directors, including myself, which document was entitled "The Irvine Company—1969 Restricted Stock and Property Plan." Director Newman read a prepared resolution to the effect that this plan be approved by the Board of Directors. During the discussion of the resolution, Foundation Director Sullivan, who is a member of the Compensation Committee, stated that under this plan, a piece of the assets of The Irvine Company and of its subsidiary corporations will be given to the key executive employees of

The Irvine Company who will be selected by the Compensation Committee in its sole discretion. Directors Mason and Wheeler who are respectively the President and Secretary of The Irvine Company, disqualified themselves from voting on the resolution as they were interested parties who will participate in the plan. I spoke against the plan as a give away to the Foundation agents and representatives who had served the interests of the Foundation and not the interests of the minority stockholders of The Irvine Company. Three Directors who were all members of the Compensation Committee voted "Yes" and I voted "No". Director and Chairman of the Board and also a Director of the Foundation, McLaren, said to me, "You are making a terrible record". I replied that "I was not", and thereupon Director McLaren stated that he voted "yes". His vote was necessary to adopt a resolution by a majority of the whole Board. McLaren was and is the salaried Chairman of the Board of Directors of The Irvine Company and he is by definition in the "Plan" a key executive employee. Like Directors Mason and Wheeler, he is an interested party who will participate in the plan.

For many years, McLaren and the Foundation's attorney, Mr. Privett, have voted the stock of The Irvine Company owned by the Foundation and McLaren exercises such control over the Foundation, that he votes the stock in his uncontrolled discretion and in effect, personally selects 5 of the 7 members of the Board of Directors of the Company.

The liklihood of mishandling and self-dealing under the "1969 Restricted Stock and Property Plan" is evidenced by the history of The Irvine Company under the control of the Foundation since 1959, which has required my constant guarding against the misappropriation of corporate assets, such as the illegal Hellis transaction mentioned by me where a Director of The Irvine Company was purchasing real estate in joint ownership with the Company and borrowing money from the Company while serving as a Director; also, the Stevens Development Plan Deal mentioned by me where an option to buy the entire Orange County property of The Irvine Company was to be conveyed to a corporation controlled by a Mr. Stevens, under a plan giving employees of The Irvine Company the right to purchase part of Mr. Stevens' stock. (Such employees included the Chairman of the Board, Mr. McLaren); and the Upper Bay Development Company Deal, also mentioned by me which involved an attempted transfer of 170 acres of land valued at approximately $50,000 per acre, to a subsidiary corporation in which the employees of the corporation were to be permitted to purchase ⅓ of the stock therein and The Irvine Company would loan the employees 90% of the money they would need to buy this ⅓ interest. Mr. McLaren would have participated in this self-dealing transaction if I had not interfered and frustrated its execution.

Then we have the recent Agricultural Preserve Deal, also mentioned by me, that is presently being litigated, and which involves the placement of approximately 50,000 acres of The Irvine Company land in Orange County in a fictitious "agricultural preserve", freezing this acreage from commercial development for 10 years, thereby depressing the present value of The Irvine Company's assets for purposes other than and contrary to those of the minority stockholders. I am convinced by these and other similar self-dealing proposals and practices of the Foundation and its President, McLaren and the other Foundation Directors who are also Directors of The Irvine Company, that this "1969 Restricted Stock and Property Plan" is designed as it is (without any guidelines or standards) for the specific purpose of distributing the assets of The Irvine Company in a manner which would work a fraud on myself and the other minority stockholders and would constitute a wasting of the assets of the Company.

Like the other self-dealing transactions proposed and attempted by McLaren during the past 10 years by virtue of his position as Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Company, I have been compelled to file another lawsuit in West Virginia where The Irvine Company was incorporated, in order to prevent this giveaway plan from being carried into effect. My attorneys filed a motion in this action for a preliminary injunction, and the West Virginia Court has ordered, with the agreement of the attorneys for The Irvine Company, that no further steps will be taken by the Board of Directors in connection with this plan pending the hearing of my motion for a preliminary injunction.

The Irvine Co. policy established by the foundation does not justify its tax exemption as a charitable organization

The dividend record of The Irvine Company under the domination and control of The James Irvine Foundation has been extremely low. In November, 1968, The Irvine Company purchased 13½ shares of its own stock from the Macco

Realty Company for the sum of $250,000.00 per share or a total sum of $3,375,000.00. Dividends paid by The Irving Company during the past 10 years are less than 1% of the asset value of the 459 shares of the stock of The Irvine Company that is held by the Foundation. This low rate of dividends is not attributable to the net earnings and profits of the Company which constitute the source of money that is available for the payment of dividends, which averages approximately $8,000,000.00 to $10,000,000.00 per annum including land condemnations and land sales. The James Irvine Foundation contends that it is a charitable organization and it has therefore obtained from the Internal Revenue Service a tax exemption on all income and capital gains received by it on its stock in The Irvine Company. It is the duty of The James Irvine Foundation, through its control of The Irvine Company, to produce maximum dividends on its Irvine stock and also to declare adequate dividends for the minority stockholders and not to accumulate dividend income for capital improvements or development which the Foundation controlled Board of Directors has done since 1959 when Myford Irvine died and the absolute control of the management of The Irvine Company was taken over by the Foundation.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969—H.R. 13270 provides that all tax exempt private foundations, including The James Irvine Foundation, commencing with the year 1970, will be required to pay an income tax of 7½% based on the value of the investment assets held by the Foundation. In my opinion, this income tax of 7½% should be made applicable to the year 1969 in order that the payment thereof will commence on April 15, 1969 instead of April 15, 1971. I also believe that the provision in H.R. 13270 that requires tax exempt foundations to distribute each year 5% of the value of the investment assets of the Foundation should be applicable to the year 1969 instead of the year 1970.

Supplemental Written Statement of Joan Irvine Smith Amplifying Her Testimony Before the Finance Committee, U.S. Senate, on October 7, 1969

(Re the incompetent and self-dealing management policies of the James Irvine Foundation through its 53 percent stock control of the Irvine Co.)

On February 21, 1969, N. Loyall McLaren, President of the James Irvine Foundation, and Howard J. Privett, attorney for Mr. McLaren, appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and were examined by the Chairman, Mr. Mills, and other members of this Committee.

During the examination of Mr. McLaren, he referred practically all of his answers to the questions propounded to Mr. Privett. Mr. Mills asked Mr. McLaren the following question: "What do you consider the corpus of the Foundation to be worth?" Mr. Privett answered for Mr. McLaren as follows: "The last sale of Irvine Company stock, which was rather recently (November, 1968), was at $250,000 per share. If that value could be obtained, and that was a sale of only 13½ shares, then the corpus of this Foundation would be approximately $123,000,000."

Mr. Mills then asked the following question: "What is your annual income?" Mr. Privett replied: "Approximately 1¼ Million Dollars."

Mr. Mills inquired of Mr. McLaren as follows: "You are, Mr. McLaren, a member of the Board of Directors of the Company?"

"Mr. McLaren. I am.

"Mr. Mills. And you are acquainted with the operations of the Company?

"Mr. McLaren. Yes.

"Mr. Mills. Are you satisfied that the Company, itself, is properly managed?

"Mr. McLaren. Completely satisfied.

"Mr. Mills. And yet Mr. Privett has testified here that the income of the Foundation is about, on an annual basis, 1% of the value of the corpus, or less?

"Mr. McLaren. The income of the Irvine Company is now three times as much as it was a few years ago.

"Mr. Mills. That is not my question. Why is it that the Irvine Company is only producing a return per year on those shares of stock that the Foundation owns (459 shares, which is 53%) of 1% or less, when that return is related to the value of the corpus?"

[Mr. McLaren did not answer this question.]

"Mr. Mills. Now, Mr. Privett, you have given us a value of the corpus of the Foundation which is based upon the sale of a very few shares by a minority interest (18½ shares). I am not willing to accept that as a true value for purposes of determining the relationship of income to value. I think you would admit that maybe the value of the Foundation's less restricted portion would be far greater if put on the market than that of a few shares sold by a minority interest. Is that right? I think it would work that way in California. It would in Arkansas.

"Mr. Privett. I think there is certainly an increment of value added from the fact of majority control. And I would have to agree that if the minority interest was worth that much, and it was put on the market place between a willing buyer and seller, that if control was added with it, there would be an increment that was added to it.

"Mr. Mills. All right, let me ask you, Mr. McLaren, you are President of the Foundation and you are on the Board of Directors of the Company as Chairman of the Board. Is that right?

"Mr. McLaren. That is correct.

"Mr. Mills. I don't know which hat you wear at this meeting, but in either case how do you justify entering into this agreement to forestall the increased value of property that you as the Director or Trustee are obliged to preserve and maintain as a part of the corpus of the Foundation? Was this a good thing on your part as the Chairman of the Board of the Irvine Company to allow this restriction to occur on 46,000 acres, I believe somebody said, of land in a part of the Irvine Company which is 53 or 54% owned by the Foundation. Is that good Foundation practice?

"Mr. McLaren. I believe it is.

"Mr. Mills. Tell me why.

"Mr. McLaren. This matter has been under consideration for about two years. It has been studied intensely by officials of the Company and some members of the Board of Directors over that period. The final conclusion was that the effect of going into this agricultural preserve would be an immediate saving in taxes of somewhere around $1,500,000 a year."

[The Directors referred to by Mr. McLaren all hold the conflict of interest position as Directors and Trustees of The James Irvine Foundation. The two independent Directors on the Board are myself and Keith Gaede, husband of Linda Irvine Gaede, who, like myself, is a stockholder in the Irvine Company.]

"Mr. Mills. But as the taxes go up, the fact that you have saved that much in taxes also means that you have also avoided through this device the normal increase in value of that property."

Mr. Mills then asked Mr. McLaren the following question:

"Mr. McLaren, did you get the permission of the Attorney General's Office in California to enter into this agreement with the authorities of Orange County?

"Mr. McLaren. Certainly not.

"Mr. Mills. You did not?

"Mr. McLaren. Certainly not.

"Mr. Mills. If the Attorney General of California checks on your operations and decides that you have not acted in your capacity as President of the Foundation in permitting this encumbrance to be placed upon an asset of the Foundation, but that you have acted actually as Chairman of the Board of the Irvine Company, would you be in a difficult position to explain it?

"Mr. McLaren. I certainly wouldn't. As I mentioned before, after careful consideration extending over a long period, five of the Directors of the Company out of a total of seven decided that the entering into of such agreement was in the best interests of the Company."

[All five of the Directors referred to by Mr. McLaren held their office as agents and representatives of the Foundation and were elected as such Directors at the annual meeting of the stockholders through the stock held and voted by the Foundation.]

"Mr. Mills. I have been told that the States are developing control over foundations through the Attorneys General of the States. This is not true in California?

"Mr. McLaren. No.

"Mr. Mills. I don't know, if this Company [Irvine Company] can't make any money than that, whether it is a good thing to continue to have this much of your total corpus tied up in one operation, unless you are looking to some future time when the situation might change. I think you would welcome the Treasury suggestion that we force you to diversify to some greater extent where you might get a greater return on your investment than you are getting out of this operation [the Irvine Company].

"But the very restriction that has been entered into with the Orange County authorities on the use of the property seems to me to be at least a borderline violation of the initial trust provision to which you have just referred, Mr. Privett.

"Mr. PRIVETT. I would just have to say, Mr. Chairman, I disagree——

"Mr. MILLS. Is it a chancery court that handles equity matters in California?

"Mr. PRIVETT. We call it just our Superior Court, but it is on the equity side.

"Mr. MILLS. Have you explored with the Court to see whether this agreement could be set aside, or whether it is in the best interests of anyone?

"Mr. PRIVETT. We have not. The previous witness, Mrs. Smith, filed a suit in the U.S. District Court last week asking that Court to review the question, and I think our answer to that complaint is due on the 3d of March.

"Mr. MILLS. I am not looking for a client or anything of that sort, but the previous witness, Mrs. Smith, may have been raising issues that really did not get to the crux of the thing. Aside from that, I just want to get this clear now. Mr. McLaren, you are the President of the Foundation. Suppose we pass legislation saying that a Foundation may not have in its portfolio of investment more than 20% of any single business operation. Would it then be your judgment that you would have to begin immediately the process of divesting enough Irvine Company stock to get you below the 20% level within the time limit prescribed by law—or what would you do? What would you recommend to the Foundation that you do? You are the principal officer of the Foundation.

"Mr. MCLAREN. I believe that under the trust indenture we would have to get court approval of any such action. I do not know how the California courts would feel.

"Mr. MILLS. I do not think that the courts in California would say that you didn't have to divest yourself when you are required by Federal law to do so. At any rate, if you didn't divest, you wlułd immediately lose your tax exemption under Federal Law. Would you welcome that; would you allow that to happen, or what would you do? Would you forego the Foundation's tax exemption rather than divest the stock?

"Mr MCLAREN. That would be a question that would have to be considered by our Board of Directors at the appropriate time. I can't speak for the Board.

"Mr. MILLS. I understand. I am trying to find out whether we should do this or not. The Treasury recommends that we require you to do that without imposing any hardship on you. Do you feel that in your dual capacity as President of the Foundation and as Chairman of the Board of the Irvine Company that you operate both organizations?

"Mr. MCLAREN. No. Personally, no. They are separate Boards of Directors.

"Mr. MILLS. I will tell you one thing. If I am the Chairman of the Board of a company, I am going to accept the responsibility of being the principal officer of that company unless I am just paid to front for somebody. I think that fact is pretty clearly demonstrated here. Mr. McLaren. What I am concerned about, though, is why the Attorney General hasn't looked into this interboard relationship between the Corporation and the Foundation.

"Mr. PRIVETT. I assure you, Mr. Mills, that the Attorney General has looked into that relationship.

"Mr. MILLS. That isn't a question of looking over somebody's shoulder. The question is one of judgment. This is a situation of whether a Foundation is operating, dominating, and controlling a business enterprise—one of the things which I don't think a Foundation ought to engage in. The issue is whether a Foundation should be permitted to own and dominate a business operation, such as the Irvine Company, to place encumbrances upon its properties perhaps to such an extent as to minimize values, and whether it is in the public interest for a Foundation to remain in this condition. That is the issue before the Committee. We do have this recommendation that this situation ought not to be permitted to go on in perpetuity. I think we have had many extraneous points go into this record. As a result of my questions, and I wouldn't say as a result of what either Mrs. Smith or you have said, but someone said that it is the purpose of the Irvine Company to try to get this restriction removed on this property. Is that right? What are you going to do on March 8?

"Mr. PRIVETT. On March 3, I will file an Answer to a lawsuit filed by Mrs. Smith against the Foundation and the Company, trying to prevent them from entering into the agricultural preserve.

"Mr. MILLS. You are just filing an Answer? I thought you were going before somebody to ask that the restriction be removed. You are not going to do that?

"Mr. PRIVETT. Definitely not, Chairman Mills.

"Mr. MILLS. Why wouldn't you want it removed if you are going to diversify your assets or your investments?"

Following the foregoing examination of Mr. McLaren and Mr. Privett by Mr. Mills, Mr. Schneebell, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, interrogated Mr. McLaren as follows:

"Mr. SCHNEEBELI. Mr. McLaren, you made the statement that you are able to save a million and a half dollars a year in taxation by this Agreement [Agriculture Preserve Agreement].

"Mr. MCLAREN. Maximum.

"Mr. SCHNEEBELI. Why would the county officials be willing to sign an agreement to reduce their own county income by one and a half million dollars a year? I find public officials generally like to look good in a short term; and in a short term, the more income they have, the less they are concerned about raising more taxes, so why should they make an agreement to reduce their own income by this amount of money?

"Mr. MCLAREN. Obviously, I can't speak for the county officials.

"Mr. SCHNEEBELI. Well, does it make much sense?

"Mr. MCLAREN. Presumably one of the big factors they took under consideration was the desirability of preserving a large amount of agricultural land to balance the growth and development of the county. I think that was one of the principal factors.

"Mr. SCHNEEBELI. The message that we are getting from the people says that, 'You are making too many deals with the high-income people,' and it seems to me that this would be a glaring example of this whereby they are reducing their own income by this amount of money by an agreement. I don't understand why they are doing it. Well, with the large amount of income which your Company seems to have annually, I don't see where you are going to be forced into a position of a forced sale. I wouldn't think that that would occur to them insofar as it applies to your property. You say that the concern here is a matter of forced sale? Wherein would the Irvine Company be forced to sell land with its holdings? Is this a threat to your Company?

"Mr. MCLAREN. All of these negotiations were conducted by our professional staff under the direction of Mr. Mason, the President of the Company. [Mr. Mason was personally selected to represent the Foundation by Mr. McLaren.] So I am not in a position to give you details. I didn't participate except in the final reports that were received."

Mr. Corman, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, inquired of Messrs. McLaren and Privett as follows:

"Mr. McLaren, I could see that the obligation of the Directors of the Foundation is to maximize the dollars available for charitable purposes.

"Mr. PRIVETT. That is correct.

"Mr. CORMAN. The obligation of the Directors of the Company is to maximize the income for the stockholders.

"Mr. PRIVETT. That is correct.

"Mr. MILLS. There is bound to be a conflict.

"Mr. CORMAN. That is why one of the very substantial minority stockholders has a complaint—Mrs. Smith.

"Mr. MILLS. Mr. Corman, I thought you were through. I was going to ask you to yield when you completed your statement. I want to point out that I don't see how in the world there could possibly be any time in the operation of these two entities—Irvine Company and the Foundation—when there wouldn't be a perpetual conflict. It looks to me that the Irvine Company is interested more in conservation than in making a profit and that the Irvine Foundation should be interested in its stock bringing in a maximum amount of income to the Foundation.

"Mr. MCCLAREN. May I just reply to that for a second?

"Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. MCCLAREN. The primary obligation of the Foundation, as I see it, is to distribute the largest possible amount annually to deserving charities in California.

"Mr. Mills. It is also obliged to see to it that the stock of any company that it owns, that it manages, produces a maximum amount of return to the Foundation.

"Mr. McLaren. That is right. That is what we are trying to do.

"Mr. Mills. I don't know. When you put on your hat as Chairman of the Board of the Irvine Company and put this amount of land into agricultural activities for ten years there is not anybody who would question that you had materially reduced your possibility of income.

"Mr. Privett. I think, Mr. Chairman, about that, that there is a mistake of fact here that, if I could, I would like to attempt to clear up. This 50,000 acres that were put into agricultural preserve is only agricultural land now or unproductive land, and we have got, in addition to that, 24,000 acres of land that is in the same situation—not developed. Now the question is, if we can develop all of this land today, if it could be developed and absorbed in the market in one year, that would be our desire to do, because the Company is a profit-making company to make the highest return to the shareholders that it can. That is its obligation.

"Mr. Mills. You could sell it, couldn't you?

"Mr. Privett. Not without, according to the studies that I have made, a terrible loss to the Company.

"Mr. Mills. In this burgeoning community, with its rapid rate of growth? I am not a real estate man, but when you tell me you cannot sell land in that community and get more for it than you can raising agricultural products, you have lost me.

"Mr. Privett. I think if you are talking about whether we make more income next year if we put the 84,000 acres on the market——

"Mr. Mills. No, hold it because you can't tell what is going to happen six months from now. Maybe the population will be rising then at the rate of 420 a day instead of 210. Now you have yourselves tied out of it."

In connection with the establishment of the agricultural preserve, which covers 49,253 acres out of a total of 84,000 acres that constitutes the Irvine Ranch in Orange County, I employed the nationally-known Land Planning and Civil Engineering firm of McIntire & Quiros to make a survey for me of the following questions that are connected with the incompetent and fraudulent foundation-controlled business management policy of the Irvine Company in converting this large portion of the urban acreage in Orange County into an agricultural preserve for a period of ten years or longer, to wit:

(1) Is there a higher and better use for this urban acreage than to freeze the same for a period of ten years in an agricultural preserve?

(2) Will the preserve area as established act as a restriction on the normal urban growth patterns of Orange County?

(3) Is it in the best interests of the stockholders of the Irvine Company to continue this preserve for a period of years?

(4) Approximately how many home sales could have been obtained on the Irvine Ranch north and south of the Santa Ana Freeway during the past five years had this agricultural preserve property been opened to developers?

(5) If the Irvine Company adopted a policy to implement an unrestrained sales and promotional effort, how many homes could be marketed in the next ten years?

(6) In order to capture diverse elements of the urban market, would it be better to consider sales efforts on a broader front than that limited because of the preserve area?

The civil engineering firm of McIntire & Quiros is rated as one of the top firms in the United States that is connected with land development and planning and is perhaps the largest firm in the State of California that is identified with this field.

In their report, McIntire & Quiros have answered the foregoing questions as follows:

"To an engineer, it is obvious that only 9,000 to 10,000 acres of the entire preserve contains topography that could be truly agriculturally oriented within the exact meaning of the word. Our rough analysis indicates that of this 9,000 to 10,000 acres of agriculturally suitable land, approximately 2,000 acres are southerly of the Santa Ana Freeway, and approximately 7,000 acres lie northerly of the Santa Ana Freeway. Topographically, only this latter acreage might truly serve all the needs of an intense agricultural use."

[The 10,000 acres referred to constitute the only acreage that is contained in the 49,253 acre agricultural preserve that is actually devoted to agricultural purposes, such as the growing of oranges and the production of certain field crops. The remaining 39,000 acres have never been and never will be, during the ten-year period of the agricultural preserve agreement, devoted to any agricultural uses whatever, and it is, therefore, obvious that the major portion of the agricultural preserve is fictitious, not only in name but also for the production of anything that is connected with agriculture.]

The report continues:

"In any case, with the diverse land development program available, this highly restricted preserve land use could be subject to critical examination when one considers its location in the heart of Orange County. In short, the most agriculturally suitable land was not set aside in the preserve. This would have been an impossibility, as 49,253 acres of this type land do not exist on the total Ranch.

"It is our considered opinion that there is a higher and better use for the majority of the land in the preserve area. The topographical restrictions on much of this land are so penal as to virtually prohibit any type of agriculture whatsoever. Notwithstanding the tax savings, if any, let us explore the results of this so-called tax shelter for ten years on land that not only cannot be farmed but will yield little or no revenue. This would obviate a property tax drain on more than approximately 50% of the entire ranch for a prolonged period of time.

"We do believe that the preserve area as planned does block normal growth patterns in many areas. To satisfy the potential demands of Orange County growth (if the Irvine Company is interested in enjoying its fair share of this tremendous market), sales efforts must be diversified and more builders brought into the picture on a broader front. The three most obvious areas not provided for in the Irvine Company planning are the Easterly encroachment of Tustin, the Northwest encroachment of Laguna, and the Southerly extension of the Irvine Campus environs.

"We are presently making inquiries into the number of residential homes constructed North and South of the Santa Ana Freeway between the Easterly boundary of the Ranch and the Westerly limits of San Juan Capistrano over the past several years. The single apparent reason for this phenomenon is and was the policy of the Irvine Company not to make land available to buyers in the Irvine Ranch. For this reason, many thousands of home sales were lost to the Irvine Company. All indicators predict that this growth will not only continue but will probably intensify during the 1970's. If the Irvine Company is ready to meet this challenge, it should capture the lion's share of the market. The geographical location is such as to preclude the majority of the buyers going elsewhere if a reasonable competitive merchandise is offered.

"This activity would in no way interfere with other development on the Northerly portion of the Ranch. In our opinion, the Irvine Ranch could absorb 100,000 single family dwellings by 1980. Assuming the 100,000 units would require more than 25,000 acres of land in addition to the provision for Industrial, Commercial, etc., and further assuming other companion-type development programs will have substantial acreage demands, it would appear that the agricultural preserve will act as a restrictive influence on the orderly urban growth of the Irvine Company lands in Orange County."

On October 22, 1968, at a regular meeting of the Board of Directors of the Irvine Company, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved further, That it shall be the policy of this corporation to declare as regular dividends substantially all of net income from operations that is not needed as investment capital, working capital, or adequate reserves to meet contingencies."

Following the adoption of this resolution, the management of the Irvine Company was directed to file a report concerning the allocation of funds received from the conversion of the residential properties of the Company which were held under leases into fee title ownership covering approximately 2,700 pieces of residential property. It was considered that should this program be developed, there would be more money available for investment and dividend purposes, and the report of management that was subsequently filed with the Board of Directors pointed out that the fee program would provide a larger cash flow in the earlier years from which larger dividends would be possible than under the leasehold program, and the report further stated as follows:

"Since it is also a recognized Purpose of the Irvine Company to increase the total earning asset, it will be necessary to invest a portion of the proceeds from the fee sales in projects such as office buildings, apartments, shopping centers and other conventional investment opportunities. At the same time, however, a portion of the proceeds should be used to increase dividends to the stockholders."

Notwithstanding the dividend policy as established by the resolution of the Board of Directors of the Irvine Company adopted on October 22, 1968, as well as the report of the management of the corporation hereinabove mentioned concerning the allocation of funds received from the sale of the residential properties of the Company through their conversion from leasehold to fee title, the Board of Directors on September 9, 1969 adopted a resolution that repudiated the October 22, 1968 resolution, as follows:

"Whereas, The Irvine Company has converted its new single family residential developments to a fee or lease with option to buy; and

"Whereas, there are in existence approximately 2,284 residential leases on completed projects which have not been granted the lease with an option to buy; and

"Whereas, the income from these residential leases forms a re-occurring income to the corporation of approximately $1,900,000; and

"Whereas, it is the policy of this Corporation to invest on its own lands and increase the earning assets of the corporation through a development program in the fields of commercial, industrial and multi-family residential developments; and

"Whereas, this Corporation, after careful consideration, recognizing the problems involved with single family residential leasehold, wishes to offer to the lessees within existing completed developments the opportunity to purchase the leased lot or obtain a new lease with option to purchase; and

"Whereas, the funds so derived from the exercise of this option are desired to be reinvested as earning assets of this corporation's diversified development program;

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, that this corporation offer each of its single family residential lot lessees the opportunity to either buy the leased lot or obtain a new lease with an option to purchase in the manner set forth in the report presented to the March 5, 1968 meeting of its Board entitled 'Corporate Policy—Single Family Residential Development—Program for Implementation From Leasehold to Fee'; and

"Resolved, further, That, notwithstanding the policy adopted by this Board at its meeting of October 22, 1968, with respect to the allocation of net income dividends, it shall be the policy of this Corporation to retain after-tax funds derived from sales and the exercise of the options to buy in existing residential developments not heretofore authorized for conversion to the sale or lease-option program for equity funding of this Corporation's commercial, industrial and multi-family developments, and that in determining net income for purposes of allocation to dividends under the general Corporate Policy referred to above, such after-tax funds shall be first deducted from net income."

It is obvious that under this resolution, the resolution adopted on October 22, 1968 is repudiated and nullified insofar as the allocation to dividends of any part of the funds received from the sale of the residential properties of the Company which are now under leases. I understand that the foundation-controlled management of the Irvine Company expects to receive approximately the sum of $40,000,000 from the conversion of leaseholds to fee title and that no part of this fund will be used for the payment of dividends, although the entire net fund after taxes which constitutes profits received by the Corporation, and which are entirely available for dividend purposes, will be transferred to the capital assets of the Irvine Company and used for development purposes. I was unable to be present at the meeting of the Board of Directors on September 9, 1969, but I am advised that Director Keith Gaede voted "No" on this resolution.

At the hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means on February 21, 1969, as well as at the hearing this morning, On October 7, 1969, Mr. Privett referred to the development program of The Irvine Company for the year 1969 with the statement that under the Foundation management, The Irvine Company expected to complete approximately 1,200 homes on the Irvine lands in Orange County. I have been advised that the official records of Orange County show that during the year 1968 building permits for construction of homes in Orange County were issued for 13,988 single family residence and 10,333 multiple dwellings, or a total of 24,321 units. These figures, when compared to the 900 single family residences which Mr. Privett indicated covered the development of the Irvine Company in 1968, and the estimate of Mr. Privett for 1,200 single family residences in 1969, furnishes another answer to the reason why only 1% of the value of the stock of the Irvine Company, based upon $250,000 per share, is being disbursed as current annual dividends to the stockholders of the Irvine Company. The number of total permits issued by Orange County in 1968 numbering 24,321, when compared to the 900 homes constructed by the Irvine Company in 1968, conclusively demonstrates the mismanagement policies of the Irvine Company under the control of the Foundation. In my written statement filed with the Finance Committee, I have indicated that the land holdings of the Irvine Company in Orange County constitute 20%, or one-fifth, of the total area of Orange County, and on this ratio the Irvine Company, based upon the 24,321 permits for the construction of single family residences and multiple dwellings issued in Orange County in 1968, is developing less than 5% of the total annual residential building requirements for all of Orange County.

Notwithstanding the criticism by Mr. Mills and other members of the Committee on Ways and Means concerning the mismanagement policies of the Foundation through its control of the Irvine Company, Mr. McLaren paid no attention thereto, and upon his return to California he continued to engage the Irvine Company in the same practices and policies for which he had been challenged by Mr. Mills. On June 16, 1969, a regular meeting of the Board of Directors of the Irvine Company was held and at this meeting a resolution was introduced by John V. Newman, who is both a Director of the Irvine Company and The James Irvine Foundation, and Chairman of the Compensation Committee of the Board of Directors of the Irvine Company. Prior to introducing this resolution, Mr. Newman presented a three-page document which was entitled "The Irvine Company—1969 Restricted Stock and Property Plan."

Under this Plan, certain key executives of the Irvine Company, which include Mr. McLaren, were to receive a bonus for their services, but the exact nature of the bonus was not described. It could have been a distribution of the stock of the Irvine Company or one of its subsidiaries, or a piece of the assets of the Irvine Company. The so-called key executives would be selected by the Compensation Committee in its sole discretion. I voted against the resolution and the Plan described therein. All of the Foundation Directors, including Mr. McLaren, voted for the resolution. In order to prevent the Irvine Company from acting under this resolution I was compelled to file legal action in the State of West Virginia where the Irvine Company was incorporated in 1894. A motion was made by my attorneys for a preliminary injunction, but the attorneys for the Irvine Company stipulated that the Company would not take any corporate action whatsoever with respect to the "1969 Restricted Stock and Property Plan", which was the subject of the lawsuit; and, upon the basis of this stipulation, the Court made an order to the effect that until plaintiff's motion for preliminary injunction is heard by the Court, the defendant, the Irvine Company, shall not take any further action in connection with the said 1969 Restricted Stock and Property Plan. I request permission, Mr. Chairman, to file a copy of this Complaint for the record.

On August 7, 1969, the House of Representatives, by a vote of 390 to 34, passed H.R. Bill No. 13270. Under the provisions of this Bill, which relate to tax-exempt foundations, The James Irvine Foundation will be required, when the Bill becomes law, to divest itself of its controlling stock interest in the Irvine Company. Both Mr. McLaren and Mr. Privett and the members of the Board of Directors of the Irvine Company and The James Irvine Foundation are familiar with the tax-exempt foundation provisions of this Bill. But again, like the 1969 Restricted Stock and Property Plan that was adopted at the Directors Meeting of June 16, 1969, the Foundation Directors and the Irvine Company paid no attention whatever to the effect that this Bill will have on the controlling interest of the Foundation in the Irvine Company. And at the meeting of the Board of Directors held on September 9, 1969, the Foundation Directors continued to pursue their same mismanagement policies with reference to the Irvine Company as though the Foundation would continue in control of the corporation in perpetuity. At this meeting, Mr. Mason, the Foundation's President, stated that a very serious financial condition confronted the Company. He stated that the consolidated statement of income for the three months period ending July 31, 1969, shows that the net income for the first quarter of 1969–1970 is approximately 22% below that budgeted. The consolidated statement of income budgeted and forecast for the year ending April 30, 1969, as of August 21, 1969, forecasts a net income for the year to be $5,741,500, which is $281,500 less than budgeted. Mr. Mason further stated:

"The current national economic picture, with money becoming increasingly tighter, and high interest, make forecasting for the balance of the year extremely difficult. It is too early in the fiscal year to be able to accurately establish the net income for the entire year because of the major effect that both residential and industrial sales have on the total income of this corporation. While the forecast for the current fiscal year appears achievable at this time, management is deeply concerned about the prospects for the fiscal year 1970-1971. The current housing and industrial sales are based upon financed commitments made prior to the severity of the current situation, and management is concerned that, if the situation worsens, it will not be possible to begin new developments or housing developers to obtain financing for new houses which will be a part of the next fiscal year's income. Further, the Federal Government's policy of curtailing will probably have a serious effect on buying psychology, especially as it relates to single family housing, increasing construction costs and high-interest rates which are already discouraging and making it impossible for many home buyers to qualify for new homes."

Notwithstanding the unfavorable financial outlook for the Irvine Company in the immediate future, the management recommended, and the Foundation's Board of Directors approved, the expenditure by the Company of large sums of money that are connected with the construction of residential apartment houses and other units on the land of the Irvine Company in Orange County, California, and

(1) The creation within the Company of a Merchant Builder Department. Under this program, which was approved by the Foundation Board of Directors, the Company will enter a new field of home construction through personnel employed by the Company. Heretofore all construction of homes, apartment houses, office buildings and other structures on the land of the Irvine Company have been through independent or outside builders. This program involves the employment of additional personnel by the Company with salaries of $40,000 to $60,000 for key employees, and also contemplates the raising of additional and large sums of money for the purpose of entering into this new field of activity where neither the present personnel or management of the Company have had any previous experience.

Another inexcusable policy of the Irvine Company under the control of the Foundation is the arbitrary refusal of the Foundation Management to file an application for the Irvine Company with the Securities and Exchange Commission for the registration of the minority stockholders' shares of stock in the Irvine Company. In order for a minority stockholder to sell a single share of his or her stock, it is mandatory that the Irvine Company shall file its application and that the stock of the minority stockholder shall be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Although my 180 shares of stock in the Irvine Company have the intrinsic value of approximately 100 Million Dollars, I am not able to sell one share thereof until this application has been filed and approved. Under these circumstances, the only person who is qualified to purchase a share of the Irvine Company from me or any other minority stockholder must qualify as a sophisticated buyer, which means that this buyer must sign a letter to the effect that any Irvine stock purchased from me will be for investment purposes only and will not be re-sold by him for a period of at least three years. Sophisticated buyers are very rare. Both myself and other minority stockholders have requested the Foundation Management of the Irvine Company to cooperate with us by filing such an application with the Securities and Exchange Commission, but this Management has repeatedly refused to do so.

H.R. Bill 13270, which was passed by the House of Representatives on August 7, 1969, was introduced by Honorable Wilbur D. Mills for himself, as Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means (a Democrat), and by Honorable John W. Byrnes, Member of the Committee (Republican). Insofar as the provisions of this Bill relate to tax-exempt foundations, the members of the Committee, both Democratic and Republican, were practically unanimous in their support thereof. When the Bill reached the voting stage in the House, a few members of the Committee voted "No", but I understand this vote was not based upon their opposition to the tax-exempt foundation provisions of the Bill, but was related in the most part to the provisions thereof with reference to the changes in the rate of capital gains taxes and the lowering of the oil depletion benefit from 27½% to 20%. Honorable James B. Utt, Republican Congressman from the 35th District of California, which is the District in which the 84,000 acre Irvine Ranch is located, and who was born in Tustin, Orange County, California—that is a city which is located on a portion of the Irvine Ranch—and who is intimately familiar with the mismanagement policies and abuses of The James Irvine Foundation in connection with its control and management of the Irvine Company since 1947, when James Irvine died and the control of the Company passed to the Foundation, is the second ranking Republican member of the Committee on Ways and Means; and during the hearings of the 1969 Tax Reform Bill before the Committee, Mr. Utt strongly advocated and favored the provisions of the Bill which are applicable to tax-exempt foundations and particularly the provisions thereof which relate to the mandatory divestment by all foundations of their controlling stock interests in separate businesses or corporations, whose business is unrelated to the charitable activities of a private, tax-exempt foundation, such as The James Irvine Foundation. Under the divestment provisions of H.R. 13270, The James Irvine Foundation is required to divest itself of all of its stock in the Irvine Company within a period of five years commencing with a 10% divestment in the year 1971.

The James Irvine Foundation will also be required to commence the divestment of its stock in the Irving Company through a sale or the transfer thereof to a charitable organization commencing in the year 1970 and each year thereafter in order to satisfy the annual 5% income distribution provisions of this Bill. The James Irvine Foundation, as Trustee of 459 shares of the stock of the Irvine Company, has an income on this stock through dividends amounting to approximately $1,000,000 per year. The value of these 459 shares of the Irvine stock will be determined annually by the appraisal of the United States Treasury Department; and, assuming that the first valuaton thereof will be approximately $200,000,000 the Foundation will be required to distribute 5% of this sum of money, or the sum of $10,000,000 during the year 1970, and at least the same amount, or more, during each succeeding year. The only source where this amount of money can be raised by the Foundation is through the sale of its Irvine stock or by a gift thereof to qualified charitable organizations. It is, therefore, obvious that The James Irvine Foundation will be required to surrender its stock control of the Irvine Company within the very near future.

The provisions applicable to tax-exempt foundations which are set forth in H.R. 13270 are the result of many years of intensive study by the Treasury Department, the staffs of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and the Finance Committee of the United States Senate.

On February 2, 1965, Honorable Douglas Dillon, Secretary of the Treasury, wrote the following letter:

"Hon. HARRY F. BYRD,
"Chairman, Committee on Finance,
"U.S. Senate,
"Washington, D.C.

"Hon. WILBUR D. MILLS,
"Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means,
"House of Representatives,
"Washington, D.C.

"DEAR MR. CHAIRMEN: I am presenting herewith the Report of the Treasury Department on private foundations. This report responds to the requests by the Committee on Finance of the Senate and Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, that the Treasury Department examine the activities of private foundations for possible tax abuses and report its conclusions and recommendations to the Committees. The report contains the results of an intensive study made by the Department pursuant to such requests and contains proposals for correction by legislation of inadequacies of the law disclosed by the studies.

"Sincerely yours,

"DOUGLAS DILLON."

Among many abuses practiced by private foundations which are set forth in the 118-page report that was attached to the letter of Secretary Dillon, the most flagrant abuse involved the foundations' control of business and corporation enterprises that were not related to the charitable activities of the foundations. This report contains the following statement:

"Many private foundations have become deeply involved in the active conduct of business enterprises. Ordinarily, the involvement takes the form of ownership of a controlling interest in one or more corporations which operate businesses; occassionally, a foundation owns and operates a business directly. Interests which do not constitute control may nonetheless be of sufficient magnitude to produce involvement in the affairs of the business.

"Serious difficulties result from foundation commitment to business endeavors. Regular business enterprises may suffer serious competitive disadvantage. Moreover, opportunities and temptations for subtle and varied forms of self-dealing—difficult to detect and impossible completely to proscribe—proliferate. Foundation management may be drawn from concern with charitable activities to time-consuming concentration on the affairs and problems of the commercial enterprise.

"For these reasons, the Report proposes the imposition of an absolute limit upon the participation of private foundations in active business, whether presently owned or subsequently acquired. This recommendation would prohibit a foundation from owning, either directly or through stockholdings, 20 percent or more of a business unrelated to the charitable activities of the foundation. Foundations would be granted a prescribed reasonable period, subject to extension, in which to reduce their present or subsequently acquired business interests below the specified maximum limit."

On August 26, 1965, appoximately six months after the Treasury Department Report was filed, to wit, on February 2, 1965, Chairman Wilbur D. Mills, Democrat of Arkansas, Committee on Ways and Means, and ranking minority member, John W. Byrnes, Republican of Wisconsin, issued a press release which requested that organizations or individuals who are interested in the "Treasury Department Report on Private Foundations" issued on February 2, 1965, submit written statements indicating their views on the Treasury Department proposals. Interested parties were requested to submit written statements by October 15, 1965. Over 100 written statements were filed by interested private foundations pursuant to this request and were printed in two volumes by the United States Government Printing Office and made available to the public and all interested parties. This Government pubication discloses that practically every large tax-exempt foundation in the United States, or its attorneys, filed their written statements which contain their views and objections with reference to the adoption of legislation based upon the Treasury Department Report dated February 2, 1965.

At the request of Chairman Mills and Member John W. Byrnes of the Committee on Ways and Means, the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, immediately commenced a study and analysis of the statements that were submitted by all of the interested parties.

During the years 1965, 1966, 1967 and 1968, a great deal of time and study was devoted by Mr. Stanley S. Surrey, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, to the preparation of legislation to be proposed to the Committee on Ways and Means and the Finance Committee with reference to the adoption of the recommendations contained in the Treasury Department Report of February 2, 1965.

H.R. 13270, which has been passed by the House of Representatives and is now before the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, with reference to the provisions contained in this Bill that relate to private tax-exempt foundations, has received the approval of Secretaries of the Treasury, Dillon, Fowler and Kennedy insofar as the divestment provisions of the Bill are concerned. Furthermore, the exempt foundation provisions of this Bill as passed by the House of Representatives have received the express approval of the Nixon Administration through the statements of Secretary Kennedy and Assistant Secretary Cohen, who appeared before the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, on December 4, 1969, with the exception of the 7½% income tax provision contained in the Bill, and which provision the Nixon Administration recommended be reduced from 7½ to 2%. All of the other provisions with reference to private tax-exempt foundations that are contained in H.R. 13270 have been approved by the Nixon Administration in their entirety.

I believe that the Members of the Finance Committee will be interested in the statements made by Congressman Utt during the appearance of myself and Messrs. McLaren and Privett before the Committee on Ways and Means on February 21, 1969. As I have already mentioned, Congressman Utt is undoubtedly the best-posted and most intimately acquainted person in the Congress concerning the activities of The James Irvine Foundation since the death of Myford Irvine in 1959, which have resulted in the mismanagement policies of the Irvine Company as heretofore detailed by me. Congressman Utt has continously since 1952 represented the Congressional District in California in which the Irvine Ranch is located and where the James Irvin Foundation exercises its control over the Irvine Company. I am, therefore, calling these statements of Mr. Utt to the attention of the Members of the Finance Committee, as follows:

"Mr. UTT. Mr. Chairman, I had a few questions that I wanted to ask Mrs. Smith to clarify some of the statements that have been made. You made some very serious charges against the self-dealing within the Irvine Co. and your supplemental statement adds a great deal more and I think it is certainly pertinent to this committee, on not dealing at arm's length, self-perpetuating, and I want to ask, was the statement made by the attorney for the Irvine Co. or the Irvine Foundation, either one, to the effect that they would give up their tax-free exemption rather than surrender control of the Irvine Co.?

"Mrs. SMITH. Yes, it was made at a stockholders meeting approximately, oh, it was about 2 years ago and there were a good many witnesses there. I mean there were many people there that heard it.

"Mr. UTT. Which indicates very definitely that its real purpose is not to be a charitable foundation.

"Mrs. SMITH. That is correct.

"Mr. UTT. It is really a foundation for perpetuation and control of a separate corporation nonrelated to the charitable purpose of the foundation.

"Mrs. SMITH. That's absolutely correct. Its whole purpose is to run this corporation.

"Mr. UTT. Now, have you examined, legally or otherwise, what would happen to that foundation in case they relinquished their tax free exemption which apparently doesn't mean very much to them? It could be done. Would it destroy the foundation? Would it revert to the original donor, or his heirs or would it continue on as a non-tax-free foundation?

"Mrs. SMITH. As I understand it, according to the way the indenture of trust is worded, I believe that they would be out of business completely because I think it would invalidate the indenture of trust.

"Mr. UTT. You made in your original statement a statement with reference to subsidiary companies.

"Mrs. SMITH. Yes.

"Mr. UTT. And then in your supplemental statement you explained what they were. One was the Irvine industrial complex.

"Mrs. SMITH. That's right.

"Mr. UTT. And how many acres did that involve?

"Mrs. SMITH. Three thousand.

"Mr. UTT. Three thousand?

"Mrs. SMITH. Yes. It originally was 2,700.

"Mr. UTT. Is that a corporation under the laws of California?

"Mrs. SMITH. That's right.

"Mr. UTT. So you have lost your West Virginia corporate law so far as that subsidiary is concerned?

"Mrs. SMITH. That's correct.

"Mr. UTT. This was formed by the Irvine Co.

"Mrs. SMITH. That's right.

"Mr. UTT. On the order and instructions of the Irvine Foundation?

"Mrs. SMITH. That's right.

"Mr. UTT. And how were the directors selected on that subsidiary corporation?

"Mrs. SMITH. They were appointed by the foundation. They were not voted on.

"Mr. UTT. And you personally have no stock in the subsidiary corporation?

"Mrs. SMITH. No, the Irvine Co. owns all the stock.

"Mr. UTT. So you could not under any circumstances by cumulative voting buy yourself onto the directorship of that subsidiary?

"Mrs. SMITH. Not only can I not buy into the directorship, I can't even look at the books. The foundation won't let me.

"Mr. UTT. That is gratuitous but it is all right. What I am leading to is, is there a second subsidiary corporation doing approximately the same thing?

"Mrs. SMITH. That's right.

"Mr. UTT. Let's follow that to the ultimate conclusion. Wouldn't it be possible to sequester every asset of the Irvine Co. into a series of subsidiary corporations in which you would be ruled out completely as a director of any of those companies?

"Mrs. SMITH. Absolutely.

"Mr. UTT. You would remain as a director of the shell.

"Mrs. SMITH. That is correct. This was the idea of the Stevens Development Co. that I spoke to and it would have also been true in the Upper Bay Development Co.

"Mr. UTT. O.K. Generally when you take a position do the Irvine heirs decide to go along with your position? The Irvine Co. bought in about 13 shares of stock just recently.

"Mrs. SMITH. That's correct.

"Mr. UTT. For $3.2 million.

"Mrs. SMITH. That's correct. It was $250,000 a share.

"Mr. UTT. They did not retire it.

"Mrs. SMITH. No, they did not.

"Mr. UTT. Did it find its way into the foundation, or where does it reside? How can it be treasury stock and still be voted?

"Mrs. SMITH. I would like to explain that to you. All of the individual stockholders want that stock retired. I called a special stockholders meeting a week ago last Monday for the purpose of retiring the stock. The foundation sent out a letter prior to this meeting advising the other stockholders not to vote to retire the stock because the following day they had a board of directors meeting coming up and at that board of directors meeting there was going to be a certain resolution passed which would involve the retirement of this stock so they considered the retirement on the Monday premature, so we all arrived at the stockholders meeting and all of the stock was represented.

"Now, the motion was made to retire the 13½ shares and when it was asked for discussion I asked the foundation attorney or Mr. McLaren, whoever was going to speak, to explain the reasons in this letter that they had spoken of exactly why they didn't want to retire the stock at that time.

"Being a director, I knew that the reason they didn't want to retire the stock was because they were planning a stock split and the stock split would have gone one of two ways. One was to have a California corporation merger of the West Virginia corporation. I think the split was to be 10,000 to 1.

"The other way was to go directly through the West Virginia corporation, again on a split of 10,000 to 1.

"However, the individual stockholders would have to sign an agreement that the new stock which they were acquiring was not for public sale. It was to be held by them as an investment. In other words, this was not a forerunner of public issue. It was strictly just to hold this stock in smaller amounts.

"So I asked Mr. Privett or Mr. McLaren to explain this to the stockholders. They refused. My attorney asked them to explain it to the stockholders. They stated this was the board of directors business. They would not have the stockholders knowing anything about it.

"Well, the meeting must have gone on for maybe an hour. These other stockholders became very agitated because this obviously affected them considerably, what was done with this stock, the Irvine family stockholders, so when it came to vote the family stockholders voted to retire that stock.

"The foundation voted against the retirement of the stock.

"Mr. UTT. All the family heirs voted to retire the stock.

"Mrs. SMITH. To retire.

"Mr. UTT. I am a little puzzled how a corporation can buy stock and not retire.

"Mrs. SMITH. Well, it can remain in the treasury and if they had passed the stock split that they were anticipating and these shares which would be expanded in number were in the treasury they would be sitting there available to take stock options on for the employees.

"Mr. UTT. One more question and I will wrap it up. Has Hugh Metzgar been a director of the corporation?

"Mrs. SMITH. He is a director of the foundation presently.

"Mr. UTT. And who writes all the compensation insurance for the Irvine Co.?

"Mrs. SMITH. At one time Mr. Metzgar did, but he no longer does.

"Mr. UTT. He divested himself from that?

"Mrs. SMITH. He has some other insurance. I can't tell you exactly what he does have but he has some insurance. But there is a great deal of it that he divested himself from.

"Mr. UTT. The Tom Cleverdon Co. still writes that insurance, does it not?

"Mrs. SMITH. What?

"Mr. UTT. Tom Cleverdon.

"Mrs. SMITH. Yes, Cleverdon & Co. was his company.
"Mr. UTT. And it still writes some insurance.
"Mrs. SMITH. It writes some insurance. I couldn't tell you exactly what. I haven't read the records.
"Mr. UTT. A trustee director writing insurance for the company.
"Mrs. SMITH. That's right. Oh, on that same point Mr. McLaren's firm of Haskins & Sells used to audit the books, too. He doesn't do that any more though. Well, he does on special auditing; yes.
"Mr. UTT. I agree so completely with your statement on that preserve or whatever you call it to relieve the Irvine Co. of a million and a half taxes to the county. I can't understand the board of supervisors doing it because I have a great many close associates owning land within that conclave of the Irvine Co., some 1,000 or 2,000 or 3,000 acres, and they have been dealing with them on the water system and they are not going to be interested in that because they can't develop it because you can stop development of the Irvine Co. for sale.
"Mrs. SMITH. To me it is absolutely appalling because this land lies directly beside Tustin, and you know what the growth in Tustin is. You know how all of the growth comes up to the Irvine Co. lands in that area and it stops and it doesn't go any farther and there are these people that you speak of that have 3,000, 4,000 acres that lie there in one piece.
"San Joaquin Fruit Co., I believe, had some property there in that area and they have attempted to develop this land. They can't get sewers. They can't get anything.
"Mr. UTT. I think that's all, Mr. Chairman."

Mr. PRIVETT. Mr. Chairman, could I request a very brief moment?

Senator ANDERSON. We do not want to have a debating society but go ahead for just a second.

Mr. PRIVETT. None of the charges of self-dealing to which Mrs. Smith has addressed herself, all of which have been the subject of one or more of the seven or eight lawsuits that she has filed during this period, have ever been substantiated by evidence. Mr. McLaren's firm does not serve as the auditor of the Irvine Co. They have not since 1952.

Mr. McLaren is not eligible under the 1969 restricted stock and property plan to which the witness has just testified. The agricultural preserve agreement a Federal district judge in Los Angeles just a few weeks ago dismissed Mrs. Smith's complaint with respect to this agricultural preserve. She has now filed a second amendment complaint which will be heard in due course.

I would like to simply say we do not feel—we obviously have a dissident stockholder—we do not feel that the battles that Mrs. Smith is waging as a dissident stockholder ought to affect the decision that is made on a national tax policy.

We also want to point out that none of the other members of the Irvine family have ever filed any lawsuits, and none of the members of the other Irvine family have joined Mrs. Smith in the attacks which she has made on the foundation. We draw your attention also to the fact that we are closely supervised by the California attorney general, and if the California attorney general agreed with Mrs. Smith's charges, and he has investigated them on several occasions and found them to be without merit then severe corrective action would be warranted.

We welcome the attention of the members of the committee to any legislation designed to prevent any of the specific abuses that Mrs. Smith has discussed, even though we resolutely say we are not guilty of these, and we have been exonerated from the charges that have been made in courts of law when we have been able to offer the evidence.

Senator ANDERSON. I cannot testify about Mrs. Smith's capability but I can say that I could do better than earning only 1 per cent on assets.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, the principal point here is whether or not a so-called charitable foundation should be engaged in the operation and in the domination of a business undertaking. That is the question at issue, and I think the gentleman has made an excellent case against himself.

Senator ANDERSON. Are there questions?

Thank you very much.

Senator BYRD. Mr. Chairman, just two brief questions. Am I correct now? The 88,000 acres of land is owned by the company?

Mrs. SMITH. That is right.

Senator BYRD. And then the foundation owns 55 percent of the company?

Mrs. SMITH. Owns it as a trustee.

Senator BYRD. As a trustee?

Mrs. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. PRIVETT. Under an irrevocable charitable trust.

Senator BYRD. The land is owned by the company?

Mr. PRIVETT. That is correct, Senator.

Senator BYRD. Now other than the 55 per cent that it holds of the company under a trust agreement, what other assets does the foundation have?

Mr. PRIVETT. Those are the only assets that the foundation has except that in 1963 there was a partial liquidation of the company under which approximately $11 million worth of property was distributed in kind to the shareholders in redemption of 10 percent of the outstanding stock. The foundation therefore in addition to its Irvine Co. stock has a portfolio now of approximately $7 million of diversified stocks and bonds which arose from the partial liquidation of the company in 1963, but Mr. Irvine endowed this foundation with this 51 percent stock interest, and that was the only asset with which he endowed it in the trust.

Senator BYRD. One final question. Mrs. Smith is a director of the company but not of the foundation?

Mrs. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. PRIVETT. That is correct. The foundation is managed by an 11-member board of directors which are independent businessmen with the exception of one of Mr. Irvine's granddaughters, Catherine Wheeler, who is a granddaughter like Mrs. Smith, and she serves on the Irvine Foundation Board.

Senator BYRD. But Mrs. Smith is a director of the company?

Mr. PRIVETT. That is correct.

Senator BYRD. Thank you.

Senator ANDERSON. Do you have a statement to make, Mr. Young?

Mr. YOUNG. Yes, Mr. Chairman. In connection with the statement, the oral testimony and also the written statement of Mrs. Smith, I would appreciate at this time the permission, Mr. Chairman, of yourself and the committee to file a copy of the complaint that Mrs. Smith referred to in connection with the vacating of the agricultural preserve, which she said is now pending in the Federal court.

Senator ANDERSON. Without objection that will be done at this point in the record.

(The document referred to was made a part of the official files of the committee.)

Mr. YOUNG. And also with reference to the key employees giveaway plan which was referred to, that action has been filed in West Virginia by a West Virginia law firm. The complaint is verified. There is an affidavit connected with it. It is verified, and with the permission, Mr. Chairman, of yourself and the committee, I would like very much to file a copy of that complaint and a copy of the affidavit that is attached thereto.

Senator ANDERSON. Is there any objection?

(No response.)

Senator ANDERSON. The Chair hears none.

Go ahead.

(The documents referred to were made a part of the official files of the committee.)

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, that action has been set for trial, the one in West Virginia, on November 10 of this year.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter that I would like to bring to your attention, and that is the attempt which is set forth on page 12 and 13 of Mr. Privett's written statement where he implied that Mr. Utt of the Ways and Means Committee and in whose district the Irvine Co. and the Irvine Ranch is located is not in favor of the divestiture provisions of the bill that came over, the House bill and which is now under consideration by your committee.

This is flagrantly untrue, and I am authorized expressly by Mr. Utt to repudiate the statement which implies very definitely that Mr. Utt favored the exception in the bill of the Kellogg Foundation from the divestiture provisions of the bill, and that he made a speech on the floor of the House in which he referred to the discriminatory practices that the Committee on Ways and Means indulged in, in giving an exceptional consideration to the Kellogg Foundation and the Bendow Foundation.

He stated if you are going to give any exceptions how about some other foundations like the Hormel Foundation, the Waterman Foundation, and the Kaiser Foundation.

The basis, however, of the statement of Mr Utt was not to give any exceptions to any foundation, but to show that by giving the exceptions to the Kellogg Foundation and to the Bendow Foundation was opposed by him, and I am expressly authorized to state to this committee, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Utt in committee, I mean in the executive session of the committee voted against making the Kellogg Co. and the Bendow Co. an exception to the divestiture provisions of this House bill that is now under consideration by this committee.

Mr. Utt is the Congressman from the district in which President Lincoln—I mean President Nixon has his home. I beg your pardon, Senator Gore, I did not mean that.

Senator GORE. I think there is one comparison, the only one I can think of: we have the highest interest rates now since Lincoln's time.

Mr. YOUNG. Well, that is true. That was a slip of the tongue. I do not know why I said President Lincoln.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I seriously—and I do not mean to enter into this family quarrel—I seriously question whether or not we should receive in our record here what took place in the executive session of the Ways and Means Committee, unless that committee releases it. It is executive, and should not be recorded here.

Furthermore, it is totally immaterial to the merits of the case.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Utt authorized me to make the statement which I did, Senator.

Senator ANDERSON. I request that we check carefully whether that can be done.

Mr. YOUNG. It was in the session that he made it a matter of record. I think it is in the record published by the committee.

Senator ANDERSON. It will be checked.

Are there additional questions?

Thank you very much.

Mr. YOUNG. Thank you.

Senator ANDERSON. Our next witness is Mr. Charles Stewart Mott.

Mr. Mott, they tell me you will be our oldest witness. As the oldest member of this committee I welcome you and am very much interested in what you have to say.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES STEWART MOTT, CHARLES STEWART MOTT FOUNDATION, ACCOMPANIED BY FRANK K. MANLEY, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

Mr. MOTT. My name is Charles Stewart Mott, of Flint, Mich., and I want to mention a few of the extraordinary accomplishments of the foundation bearing that name over the past 43 years and why I believe it should not be weakened by undue restrictions.

Our foundation is based on some simple ideas of helping people; through opportunities in education, health, and recreation. We do this by keeping Flint schools open 3,800 hours a year compared with the national average of 1,800 hours. We have more adults using the schools at night than children in the daytime.

This partnership between the Mott Foundation and the Board of Education has promoted taxpayers' use of their schools around the clock, around the year. It is known as the Community's Gold concept.

For the past 34 years we have examined the health status of all Flint school children and have established an out-patient clinic Children's Health Center to treat all indigent children. This has raised the percentage without medical defects from 13 percent to about 90 percent, and those without dental defects from 13 percent to about 50 percent.

We provide our program primarily for the people of Flint, but consider Flint also as a laboratory to demonstrate our program to others. Seventy thousand people have visited our community school workshops in Flint, and now 378 localities have 1,337 community schools in operation.

We make grants to nine university regional training centers in addition to training programs conducted by the seven universities of the State of Michigan to train community school leadership personnel.

These accomplishments suggest why we are concerned about anything that threatens our ability to carry out these programs.

Foundation services outnumbered governmental objectives in education, health and social services, which reinforce the concept of tax exemption for funds to be used.

If some foundations do a poor job, regulate them; but do not penalize foundations clearly operated for the public advantage. These foundations function as government's equivalent of industry's research and development departments. If using foundation income for acceptable purposes is good, then a 7½ percent tax on that income is not logical.

Proposed prohibition of all dealings between foundations and donors could create unreasonable problems. Proposed distribution of annual income of 5 percent of the fair market value of investment assets within 12 months could be unduly restrictive and detrimental.

It would preclude investment in growth businesses which require reinvestment of current earnings for greater future value and earnings.

The proposed ownership limitation seems to us to be the most unfair, unworkable and destructive of proposed changes. This would prevent reasonable latitude of investment management to produce maximum current and future income to carry forward our programs.

We agree that abuses should be corrected, but feel that proper ethical operations for the public good should not be penalized. Required divestiture could result in serious loss of income and consequently cutback of services.

We agree with the proposed limitation on use of assets and with requirements for disclosure and publicity on operations, and some other proposals, but consider that foundations should be encouraged rather than discouraged.

Possibly a voluntary association of foundations could establish what would be in effect accreditation standards of objectives, methods and practices.

We are private only in the source of funds. Our devotion and service are entirely to the public interest.

When Flint lacked college opportunities, we gave a campus and helped construct buildings, and as a result 9,500 young people who could not have afforded to live away from home are now getting a college education at a saving of about $16 million a year to their families.

Community schools open around the clock around the year and create informed participation in citizenship, democracy in action. President Eisenhower sent Gen. Edwin Clark and President Kennedy sent Bud Wilkinson to get us to start a physical fitness program. Both reported we already had the finest program in the United States, one that should be promoted everywhere.

I would like to invite you to visit Flint and see for yourselves what the Mott Foundation is doing, which would be the best way for you to understand why I ask you not to destroy or weaken these good works by restrictive or punitive legislation.

I think it was Jack Knight who said do not burn down the barn to kill a few rats. The cost of opening 1,337 community schools cost us $361,000, and a contribution by the community and others of $7,395,000. That is a ratio of our contributing one-twentieth of what others put in in order to carry on this program. It shows what they think of it.

If the market value of stocks given to foundations is disallowed, and cost of stock to the donor is substituted you would find the source of the gifts of this sort to dry up very fast. If you would not allow the dedicated giver to have anything to do with the income produced, you would find that the reason for making large gifts would be affected. In many cases the large gifts are given by a donor because he wants to accomplish a good result, and wants to be sure that it will be used to the best advantage.

Our 3-day workshops have been attended by over 12,000 people per year, over 70,000 during the past 6 years. Almost without exception everyone has said, "If we had not seen it we would not have believed it."

Our capital expenditures have been over $33 million in order to provide facilities for carrying on our programs and I give as reference the following names and groups who have seen it in operation:

Secretary of Transportation John Volpe; Secretary of Housing and Urban Development George Romney; General Edwin Clark; Congressman Donald Riegle; Bud Wilkinson, 70,000 people who have attended 3-day workshops in Flint; all seven Michigan universities; Chicago University; Arizona State University; Brigham Young University; Board of Education for Flint; 80,000 people of the city of Flint who have participated in after-hour classes and games in the afternoon and evening programs, and President Richard M. Nixon, who is quite familiar with the operation, and who on August 8 made a speech recommending all of the projects that we had in operation long before he was elected President.

I am proud of the good work done by the Foundation bearing my name for these past 40 years. I appreciate the opportunity to testify and can assure you that at 94 years of age my motivation is not selfish. It comes from my heart, and this is no time to diminish the resources of our country.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Mott.

Are there any questions?

Senator BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, just for the record, Mr. Mott, can you give us an idea of the proportion or the percent of the income of the foundation that you disburse every year?

Mr. MOTT. We disburse or contract, commit ourselves to the entire income, which is about $16 million.

Senator BENNETT. Do you know offhand what percentage that is of the present value of the assets of the foundation? I ask that because this bill would require that a foundation distribute 5 percent of its assets. Do you have any idea what that would be in relation to the total value of the assets?

Mr. MOTT. No. I can only guess roughly. Income $16 million, and the assets something like $250 of $300 million. Whatever the percentage is.

Senator BENNETT. That would be about 5 percent. Thank you.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Mott, where are your glasses?

Mr. MOTT. In my pocket.

Senator CURTIS. There was a conversation up here calling attention to the fact that you read that statement without your glasses.

Mr. MOTT. Yes, sir.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to take note of the fact that Mr. Mott is accompanied in the room by a distinguished former member of the Cabinet. I refer to Post Master General Arthur Summerfield of Michigan.

Mr. Mott, what has you foundation done regarding housing?

Mr. MOTT. On the housing thing I would like to turn that over to Mr. Manley here, who is right in touch with the whole thing.

Mr. MANLEY. Mr. Chairman, what we have tried to do in Flint through our community school concept program is to try to work on all the problems that we have in our community. As a consequence we have worked very closely with the urban renewal people as well as the highway department, and we have relocated through the highway department, and so on, about 9,000 families, and we have tried to have it through scattered housing.

We were the first city in the country to have an open housing law passed by an ordinance. We feel that we have done quite a bit in the private as well as the Federal development program in housing. Also, along with housing field, Mr. Mott has contributed $4.5 million for the Genesee County recreational area as well as another park given to the county for recreational purposes in the very dense part of our community.

There are many other things that we could go into; we are very alert to all the problems of any community.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Manley, do you feel that a tax of 7½ percent, if placed upon this foundation's income, in reality will actually fall on the beneficiaries?

Mr. MANLEY. Yes, sir.

Senator CURTIS. Will this foundation be adversely affected by the divestiture provisions of the House bill?

Mr. MANLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOTT. Is it felt that foundations should make gifts for housing?

Senator CURTIS. No, no. We knew of your work in that regard, and I merely wanted the record to so reflect.

Mr. MOTT. We simply spent certain amounts of money in promotion of ideas to get housing done.

Senator CURTIS. That leads to another question. Could you give an example, either Mr. Mott or Mr. Manley, of how the foundation has served as a laboratory for Federal legislation?

Mr. MOTT. We think that the establishment of community schools, opening the schools for 3,800 hours a year as against 1,800 is an example. We are pushing that, and it is increasing all over the country. We think that the Government should take cognizance of that and what we have recommended and put it into operation; they should do the same thing in the encouragement of that.

Also, the establishment of colleges in Flint so that the kids in Flint do not have to leave home to attend college; we have 9,500 kids attending college in Flint that could not go if they had to board away from home.

Senator CURTIS. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FANNIN. Mr. Mott, perhaps you could tell us about your youth retention laboratory.

Mr. MOTT. The what?

Senator FANNIN. The youth retention laboratory. I am just referring to how you retain your youth.

Mr. MOTT. I am so absolutely dedicated to what we are trying to do that somebody says—well, an old confrere of mine, when I complimented him on his 88th birthday, he said the only thing we can do now, Stewart—we cannot do much—is to talk about old times and things that happened.

I said you have got me entirely wrong. I was born today. I am looking only to the future, and I am going ahead 100 percent full steam.

Senator FANNIN. Mr. Mott, we have heard a great deal about foundation-controlled corporations. I would just like to ask you, speaking of your foundation, as to how you justify the foundation having a controlling interest in several corporations?

Mr. MOTT. Those corporations were investments that I have personally made because I felt there was growth and were profitable and a hedge against inflation, which very few people pay much attention to now, and from my point of view represented wonderful investment personally. The results from those over the years have proved that they were wonderful investments.

When people came along and said we want more money to spend in the foundation to do these various things, I did not have the cash. I did not want to sell the stock in these corporations, so I gave the stock to the foundation. There is no reason why we ought to penalize those foundations simply because of the whim of somebody.

Senator FANNIN. Well, wasn't your foundation largely built up by gifts which resulted in big tax savings to you? In other words, did you not receive tax savings?

Mr. MOTT. I complied with the law as it existed, so there certainly should be no criticism of my complying with the law. When I gave about a quarter of a billion dollars to the foundation, I did not receive any tax-exemption on that.

Senator FANNIN. In other words, you say that——

Mr. MOTT. I had already paid taxes in many cases of 90 percent of the income from those corporations.

Senator FANNIN. Thank you.

Senator HANSEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Mott, let me compliment you on your very stimulating testimony. I would like to ask you, sir, how can Congress control the abuses by some foundations without handicapping constructive ones?

Mr. MOTT. I think that you are hopping on a man who is trying to do the best he can under the rules and regulations, and then you ask me how to write a taxation bill.

Senator HANSEN. You are the only one who has not told us how.

Mr. MOTT. There are so many complications on these things. As Jack Knight says, do not burn down the barn in order to kill a few rats. It certainly seems to me that the Senate ought to be able to devise conditions in the tax bill that would protect good foundations and serve punishment on those that are not good.

Senator HANSEN. I have one further question if I could, Mr. Chairman.

How would it seriously handicap your foundation to require it to spend 5 percent of the total market value each year of the corpus of that foundation?

Mr. MOTT. That means that the Government would take away from the foundation 5 percent of a certain amount of money from the beneficial operations of the foundation. Whatever they take away as tax the foundation could not spend for the beneficial things that we stand for.

Senator HANSEN. Thank you, Mr. Mott.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, gentlemen.

Thank you very much, Mr. Mott. We are very proud to have you with us today.

(Mr. Mott's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF CHARLES STEWART MOTT ON TAXATIONS OF FOUNDATIONS

SUMMARY

1. My name is Charles Stewart Mott, and I want to mention a few of the extraordinary accomplishments of the foundation bearing that name for the past 43 years, and why I believe it should not be weakened by undue restrictions.

2. Our Foundation is based on some simple ideas of helping people through opportunities in education, health, and recreation. We do this by keeping Flint schools open 3,800 hours a year, compared with the national average of 1,400 We have more adults using the schools at night than children in the daytime. Ths partnership between the Mott Foundation and Flint Board of Education has promoted taxpayers' use of their schools around the clock around the year, and is known as the Community School concept.

3. For the past 34 years, we have examined the health status of all Flint school children, and have established an outpatient-clinic children's health center to treat all indigent children—raising the percentage without medical defects from 13% to about 90%, and of those without dental defects from 13% to about 50%.

4. We provide our program primarily for the people of Flint, but consider Flint also a laboratory to demonstrate our program to others. 70,000 people have visited our community school workshops in Flint, and now 379 localities have 1337 community schools in operation.

5. We make grants to 9 university regional training centers— in addition to the training program conducted by the seven universities of the State of Michigan—to train community school leadership personnel.

6. These accomplishments suggest why we are concerned about anything that threatens our ability to carry on these programs.

7. Foundation services carry out avowed governmental objectives in education, health, and social services—which reinforces the concept of tax exemption for funds so used.

8. If some Foundations do a poor job, regulate them, but do not penalize Foundations clearly operated for the public advantage. The Foundation functions as government's equivalent of industry's research and development department.

9. If spending Foundation income for acceptable purposes is good, then a 7½% tax on that income is not logical.

10. Proposed prohibition of all dealings between Foundations and donors could create unreasonable problems.

11. Proposed distribution of annual income or five percent of the fair market value of investment assets within 12 months could be unduly restrictive and detrimental. It would preclude investment in growth business which require reinvestment of current earnings for greater future value and earnings.

12. The proposed stock ownership limitation seems to us the most unfair, unworkable, and destructive of proposed changes. This would prevent reasonable latitude of investment management to produce maximum current and future income to carry forward our programs. We agree that abuses should be corrected, but feel that proper, ethical operations for the public good should not be penalized. Required divestiture could result in serious loss of income and consequent cut-back of services.

13. We agree with proposed limitations on use of assets, and with requirements for disclosure and publicity on operations, and some other proposals, but consider that Foundations should be encouraged rather than discouraged. Possibly a voluntary asso ıon of Foundations could establish what would be, in effect, accreditation standards of objectives, methods, and practices.

14. We are "private" only in source of funds, our devotion and service are to the public interest.

15. When Flint lacked college opportunities, we gave a campus and helped construct buildings—as a result, 8,000 young people who could not afford to live away from home are getting a college education at a saving of about $16,000,000 a year to their families.

16. Community schools—open around the clock around the year—are creating informed participating citizenship, democracy in action.

17. President Eisenhower sent General Edwin Clark—and President Kennedy sent Bud Wilkinson—to get us to start a physical fitness program. Both reported we already had the finest program in the United States, one that should be promoted everywhere.

18. I would like to invite you to visit Flint and see for yourselves what the Mott Foundation is doing—which would be the best way for you to understand why I ask you not to destroy or weaken these good works by restrictive or punitive legislation.

STATEMENT

I want you to know that I appreciate the opportunity to offer some testimony on proposed changes in taxation of foundations. Particularly, I want to present some very specific facts about one foundation, its origin, purposes, accomplishments, and future potential if it is not weakned by undue restrictions and limitations.

My name is Charles Stewart Mott, and I want to tell you something about the foundation which bears my name, and which was established 43 years ago. First, I would like to note that I served in the New York State Naval Militia from 1894 to 1900—and that in 1898 I enlisted as a Gunner's Mate First Class in the United States Navy, and served on the U.S.S. Yankee during the Spanish-American War. I have also been of service to the military in the first and second World Wars. I moved from the New York area to Flint, Michigan, in 1907. I served as Mayor of Flint in 1912, 1913, and 1918, giving my salary as Mayor to the City Health Department and Red Cross. More than fifty years ago, I organized the Y.M.C.A. in Flint. I mention these things to establish the point that my patriotism and concern for service to the Nation and the community are not of recent origin, but have been a matter of public record since the last century. Exactly these motives brought me to establish the Charles Stewart Mott Foundation in 1926, under the laws of the State of Michigan, to carry on philanthropic, charitable, and educational work.

Establishment of the Foundation involved some basic assumptions:

First, that those of us who have benefited from society have an obligation to benefit society in return;

Second, that it is possible to benefit society by helping people improve the quality of their lives;

Third, that creation of opportunity for self-improvement helps best by developing self-reliant strength;

Fourth, that extensions of opportunities in education, recreation, and health are fundamental means of improving the quality of living; and

Fifth, that existing facilities, agencies and democratic methods can serve best in the development of such extended opportunities.

Those ideas may sound very simple indeed, and so they are. Upon them the Mott Foundation is built. We have been working with those ideas from the beginning, and our Foundation has been guided always by dedicated, unpaid trustees who have shared our concern for carrying out our responsibilities to society by creating opportunities for people to improve the quality of their lives. In the depression years, when everyone agreed that somebody else should do something about juvenile delinquency, we began implementation of these ideas in Flint, Michigan. Finding that Flint schools were open only about 1400 hours a year—the national average—and that young people had no constructive recreational opportunities in the evenings, we offered to help the Flint Board of Education make those school buildings the public had built available for use by that public in the afternoons and evenings when they had previously been locked. We did this by providing funds to the Board of Education to conduct supervised recreational and educational activities for young people and adults.

The response was enthusiastic—both from the Board and from the public. We also began grants for examination of the health status of school children, and means of correcting the physical and dental defects revealed by those examinations. From this experimental beginning in 1935, what is now known as the Community School Concept developed. The partnership between the Mott Foundation and the Flint Board of Education has grown over the years so that we now contribute some $4,000,000 annually to permit the Flint schools to operate a wide scope of programs—adult education, recreation, physical fitness, health, special education, and many others—for both adults and children. Flint schools are open 3,800 hours a year, now, and a similar multiplication of effectiveness of existing facilities has been applied in many areas. In the field of health, for example, we have built a $4,000,000 Children's Health Center—with operating expenses of $1,500,000 annually—to make certain that the physical and dental defects which will yield to correction are corrected for the children whose parents cannot afford such medical and dental attention. These are only a few of the several implementations of those basic ideas on which the Mott Foundation is built.

From the beginning of our Foundation activities, we have also had another simple idea. It is this: we felt a special obligation to, and interest in, the Flint community—made up of some 200,000 people in the city and another 200,000 in the surrounding county. We basically planned, therefore, to carry on our program of community improvement for the people of the Flint area first—while holding as equally important the concept that this demonstration, with Flint as a laboratory, should be made available to as much of the rest of the world as might wish to observe, learn, and apply the demonstrated ideas to their own communities.

In order to make this demonstration highly available to others, everywhere, we have, for the past 12 years, held a series of three-day Community School Workshops in Flint at which visitors from everywhere have been able to see the programs in action. More than 70,000 people have thus taken advantage of the opportunity to share in this Community School Workshop experience—and their almost universal comment has been that they could not have believed such a program could be carried out with such wide and intense community participation if they had not seen it for themselves. I can't begin to tell you all of the results and effects of this spreading of the community school idea—which is the essence of democracy in action—except to mention that at the latest count we have record of community education programs developed in 379 different localities involving 1337 different schools. Of these 1337 schools, we can document the fact that Mott Foundation funds served to help initiate the community program in 625 of the schools. The other 712 community schools, deriving their inspirations from the Flint demonstration, have applied the principles and techniques without financial assistance from the Mott Foundation. To meet the need for personnel trained in such community school techniques, we have worked with many educational institutions to develop training courses for Community School Directors—both in Flint and elsewhere.

The Mott Foundation has employed about $2,000,000 in grants to provide for leadership training to make possible the establishment of community schools throughout the 379 localities mentioned. We are working with nine University Regional Training Centers across the Nation, in addition to the training program conducted by the seven universities of the State of Michigan. So successful has been this approach to provision of demonstration community school programs, and leadership training, that the State of Michigan has just appropriated a million dollars to help stimulate and implement such programs throughout the State. I might mention, that of the 625 schools where some Mott Foundation funds have been utilized in initiating community school programs, our grants of only $361,796 have resulted in local community contributions exceeding $7,000,000 in this implementation of school-centered community development.

I have not mentioned Mott Foundation application of basic ideas at the college level, or our work with and through existing social agencies, or the contribution of a $6,500,000 Children's Hospital to the University of Michigan, or many other aspects of Mott Foundation activities. I have not mentioned our accomplishments in the field of physical fitness—which have received such generous comments from Presidential advisors in this sector. But perhaps I have told you enough to demonstrate that we believe very deeply in what we are doing—and that carrying out these programs is our purpose in living.

Since this is true, you can understand our concern about any governmental action which threatens the resources of the Mott Foundation in such a way that they might be unable to carry forward this great work we have begun, and which is producing such rich returns in human values in the lives of many thousands of people.

I would like to explore with you one more simple idea—the idea of exemption from tax of money used for such purposes as those which our Foundation carries out. It seems to me that the concept of exemption is a simple one based upon the fact that money so exempted is being used to fulfill avowed governmental objectives in this democracy of ours. A government for the people, such as ours, accepts responsibilities to serve its people as far and as well as it can in education, health, and social services. If a potential taxpayer uses his funds to carry out such avowed governmental objectives—providing educational services, health services, and social services—he may achieve more effectiveness, more economy, and more flexibility than the nature of governmental operation could logically permit. The dollars he, through a foundation may spend to accomplish such admitted governmental objectives will obviously make it unnecessary for government to spend a larger number of dollars to accomplish what he has already done. Thus, the logic of tax exemption of funds used to fulfill obligations of a democratic government to its people would seem to be unassailable. We consider that the Mott Foundation devotes its funds exactly to the efficient fulfillment of such objectives.

If it is asserted that some foundations do a poor job, or are so manipulated as to serve private ends of their donors, or in some other fashion serve rather as a tax haven than an instrument of public—good then I reply that it should not be difficult to frame, enact, and enforce laws preventing such abuse while not penalizing those foundations which do operate clearly for the public advantage. If it is protested that foundations provide grants, even in such approved fields as education, recreation, health, and social services, to carry out programs which government would not undertake—then I would note that, within the bounds of common sense, this is a virtue rather than a sin. A foundation may venture risk money on an experimental program inappropriate for government—but it is by such experimental pilot programs that new and better ways of serving education, health, and social service are developed. The foundation can be government's equivalent of industry's research and development department. Indeed, as government recognizes to an increasingly great extent its obligation to serve the people of the nation in education, health, housing, employment training, and social service fields, the function of the so-called private foundation becomes more and more valuable as the trail-blazer, the pathfinder, the troubleshooter, to do those necessary things for the public good which government cannot or will not do. I could cite as a typical instance the development of fine techniques of humane relocation of families displaced by highway and Urban Renewal programs—as pioneered by an agency funded in part by the Mott Foundation. The methods developed by this agency were later incorporated into Federal laws and regulations to the advantage of the entire nation.

To bring the question of these proposed tax changes down to simplest terms, we—believing in all sincerity that the Mott Foundation is conducted for the public good, in the public interest—would protest any change which reduced the resources available to carry on our programs. At the same time, we are equally in favor of any change in law which would serve to prevent abuses of foundations by those who would attempt to use them for their own private advantage.

If devotion of the income of foundations to acceptable programs is good, it must be 100% good, not 92½% good. For this reason, I do not understand the logic of the proposed 7½% tax on the income of foundations.

With respect to the proposed limitations of dealings between a foundation and persons with certain specified relationships to that foundation, it would appear that the test should be one of fairness and honesty—not a complete prohibition. It is not difficult to imagine circumstances under which a foundation might need to borrow money or lease property; a total ban on dealings between foundations and donors might create undue cost or hardship to the foundation. The Mott Foundation has not relied on, and does not expect to rely on, such practices, but circumstances could exist where a foundation might have justifiable need of legitimate dealings with one or more of the donors contributing to it.

The proposed requirement of distribution of annual income or five per cent of the fair market value of investment assets within a year could lead to unreasonable applications under some circumstances.

At best it restricts the flexibility of the trustees of a foundation to apply their best discretion in the making of grants on the basis of the worthiness of the objectives—since in a given calendar year, insufficient projects of demonstrable merit might be proposed, while another year's approved requests might require more than that year's income. Again, it would seem that a test of general practice in expending earnings within a reasonable period for objectives of obvious merit would be a better yardstick than a calendar requirement would be.

There are two points of concern with this provision—first, the one just mentioned, an absolute requirement to spend income within the one-year period—and, second, the requirement that if an investment does not yield 5% for such expenditure as income, then a portion of the capital asset must be sold to provide the equivalent of such income for expenditure within the specified period. A balanced investment program will include growth stocks, also the development of a particular business may, in the very process of healthy growth, require retention of its earnings to expand facilities for a period of years resulting in greater income-producing resources in the long run. We have planned the Mott Foundation for a very long run indeed—to continue its good works throughout the foreseeable future—and have established our investment program accordingly. It seems to us that a reasonable and prudent latitude in investment management is both fair and necesary to permit establishing and conserving capital resources for future as well as present income for foundations.

Of all the proposed changes in the law regulating foundations, the stock ownership limitation seems to us the most unfair, unworkable, and destructive. Certainly, if a foundation has acquired a portion of the ownership of a business which is being operated in whole or in part for the benefit of a donor or his family, such practice should be stopped or punished. But if a donor in good faith contributes all or part of a business to a foundation to provide income to carry on its good works, it is not reasonable that this business should have to be sold at a sacrifice. The Mott Foundation has substantial holdings exceeding twenty per cent of the outstanding stock of several corporations, including complete ownership in some cases. Where a foundation owns 100 per cent of a business or corporation, there can scarcely be any question of manipulation of that business for the advantage of stockholders other than the foundation—so why should a foundation be required to divest itself of such complete ownership? If there are reputed to be temptations in ownership of a fraction of the stock of a company by a foundation, certainly 100 per cent ownership is the best assurance of removal of those temptations. In no instance are the officers of these corporations, who carry on the day-to-day activities of the business, substantial donors or management personnel of the foundation. Rather, the operation of these corporations is carried out by professional management personnel. We would note that such corporations are already paying over 50 per cent of earnings as corporate profits taxes. To force the foundation to dispose of securities or other business interests could seriously weaken the income situation, and thus reduce our ability to carry forward the long-term programs on which we are already embarked.

Believing, as we do, that the objectives and programs of the Mott Foundation are good, and in the public interest, we feel an obligation to enhance and conserve our investment position to produce the maximum income for carrying these programs on. In practice, we disburse our dividends within a year after they are received in accordance with the law, and we feel we should be able to make and preserve the best investments and business operations to keep the maximum resources available for our programs. Required divestiture could result in serious loss of income for the charitable purposes of the Foundation. We have been guilty of no abuses that would justify so stringent a requirement. Again, we come back to the principle: correct abuses, but do not penalize proper, ethical operations demonstrably conducted for the public good. It would seem that strict enforcement of present laws would be sufficient to prevent abuses, without imposing this drastic provision requiring divestiture.

Lest you believe I have come here to disagree with everything proposed in the legislation under consideration, I would note that we agree with proposed limitations on the use of assets, and with the requirements for disclosure and publicity on operations, and some other proposed regulations. Basically, we feel that the private foundation deserves to be encouraged rather than discouraged, promoted rather than hampered, considered a national asset rather than a reprehensible haven of sharp practice—in short, a very good citizen rather than the villain of the peace.

Perhaps foundations themselves, as a group, should set up a formal association of foundations to adopt voluntary standards of approved purposes, methods, and practices, to provide a mechanism for self-policing. To be an accredited member of such an association would be conditional upon conformity to universally accepted standards of approved objectives, methods, and practices. It seems to me that encouragement of development of such a framework for establishment and maintenance of standards would be a better approach than governmental restrictions which could prove detrimental to the public good.

Maybe what Iam trying to say to you as elected representatives of the people of the United States is this: please don't hamstring us, because it's your race we're running. We are a "private" foundation only in the source of our funds—in our programs we are as devoted to the public as government itself, and all our activities are completely in the public interest.

I would like to tell you about a lot more of our programs—how, by financing creation of two colleges we make it possible for the families of 8,000 young people to save $16,000,000 a year and give their sons and daughters college educations while living at home.

I would like to tell you more about community schools—buildings that belong to the taxpayers, and that the taxpayers actually use around the clock, around the year for every kind of wholesome and constructive activity—with 20,000 adults per semester turning out for adult education and recreation classes in Flint alone—and hundreds graduating from high school each year in middle age—more adults using the schools at night than children in the daytime—giving working democracy a true medium in which to function, the community school, now carrying its torch of Interest, Involvement, and Information throughout the Nation to create that informed participating citizenship we all want . . .

I would like to tell you what President Eisenhower's General Edwin Clark—and President Kennedy's Bud Wilkinson have to say about our physical fitness program, and its importance to this Nation . . .

Most of all, since I can't expect time to tell you about all these and a dozen other programs—and you wouldn't be able to believe their excellence without seeing them for yourselves—I would like to invite you to visit Flint, Michigan, and see our programs in action. Then you would not wonder that I appear before you to ask you not to destroy or weaken these good works by restrictive or punitive legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness will be Mr. Byron P. Hollet of the Lilly Endowment, Inc.

Senator BYRD. Mr. Chairman, would you recognize me for a brief moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Byrd.

Senator BYRD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit for the record a statement in behalf of Colonial Williamsburg. It is a statement of Carlisle Humelsine, president of Colonial Williamsburg.

I would like to point out that in the past 40 years Colonial Williamsburg has spent nearly $100 million in Virginia in that great colonial area of our State.

I would want to point out to the committee, too, that this Colonial Williamsburg is managed by an 18-member independent board and is not subject to any individual or to any other foundation.

I submit now with your permission, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a statement in behalf of Colonial Williamsburg by Carlisle L. Humelsine, president of Colonial Williamsburg.

(The statement referred to by Senator Byrd follows:)

STATEMENT IN BEHALF OF COLONIAL WILLIAMSBURG

(By Carlisle Humelsine, President, Colonial Williamsburg)

The Tax Reform Bill of 1969 (H.R. 13270), as passed by the House of Representatives on August 7, 1969, poses, in its present form, a genuine threat to a number of historical preservation and educational institutions whose work in their various field of endeavor has earned national and even world-wide respect and renown. One of these institutions, one that has become a national symbol of the American heritage and a source of deep satisfaction and inspiration to literally millions of Americans, is Colonial Williamsburg, Incorporated, the widely known preservation and educational undertaking at Williamsburg, Virginia.

For those who are not familiar with the restoration, its program, and the arrangements that have been made for its financial support and permanence, perhaps it should be said that the work was begun more than forty years ago by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who saw, in the survival of the early eighteenth-century town plan and of nearly one hundred original eighteenth-century structures, a unique opportunity to preserve and restore for the edification of future generations of Americans the environment out of which developed the concepts that are so fundamental to our nation today.

The work has been an exceedingly careful one, marked by the highest degree of scholarly integrity and a notable absence of the kind of commercialism that too frequently has blighted our historic sites. The work has been a costly one, approaching one hundred millions of dollars. Today, the preserved area of Williamsburg, extending along the one-mile strip of Duke of Gloucester Street from the Christopher Wren Building of the College of William and Mary to the restored Capitol where Washington and Jefferson sat as burgesses, constitutes America's—and probably the world's—most extensive single undertaking in historical preservation. More than 300 rooms in the assemblage of public buildings, taverns, and historic residences, that are open daily to the public, are furnished with one of the world's finest and most representative study collections of seventeenth and eigtheenth-century furniture and furnishings. Colonial Williamsburg has become one of our leading educational institutions in the fields of historical preservation, eighteenth-century decorative arts, archaeology, and, perhaps most important of all, of the social, economic and political circumstances out of which this nation arose.

More than one million Americans and visitors from all over the world visit Williamsburg every year. Of this count, nearly 100,000 are students and school children, many of whose American history curriculum in their home schools has been specifically programmed for preparation for the Williamsburg visit and for better appreciation of its broad educational content. Many of these visitors, too, are distinguished persons, heads of state, whose first glimpse of the United States is Williamsburg, where, normally in a brief, overnight visit before calling on the President in Washington, they are given the opportunity to see first-hand an impressive manfiestation of our national heritage and fabric as a people.

Colonial Williamsburg, Incorporated, the organization responsible for the carrying on of the project, is managed by an entirely independent board of 18 distinguished Americans, representing all parts of the country and the various fields of interest to the restoration. The organization is subject neither to the control nor the influence of any single person or any other foundation. Its financial resources are its own, and are used exclusively for the purpose of continuing to serve the interests of the American public through its educational programs and historic preservation projects.

In the early years of the restoration, it became clear that the small town of Williamsburg was wholly incapable of providing accommodations that the growing number of visitors more and more urgently needed. In the depression years of the 1930's and the war years of the 1940's, Colonial Williamsburg was left to provide these facilities itself, if its great work was not to founder. Consequently, in the late 1930's the Inn and Lodge were built to provide essential hotel and dining accommodations to the public. Today, these facilities represent only a fraction of the many others privately owned and operated in the Williamsburg area. Indeed, the stimulus of Williamsburg has become a factor of cardinal importance not only in respect to the prosperous growth of the Williamsburg community, but in the economy of the Commonwealth of Virginia as a whole.

At Williamsburg, the availability to the public of convenient hotel and related accommodations has been essential from the very beginning. These facilities operated by Williamsburg Restoration, Incorporated, a wholly owned subsidiary of Colonial Williamsburg, have been designed, specifically, to meet the expanding educational goals of the project by providing a functional environment for seminars and conferences in the atmosphere of Williamsburg. Without these facilities, Colonial Williamsburg's effort to convey the relevancy of our eighteenth-century heritage in today's world would be enormously diminished in importance and impact. Materially related to its exempt purposes as these facilities may be, however, Colonial Williamsburg has, since its beginning, operated these activities through a separately incorporated wholly taxable entity. No attempt has been made to shield income from these operations from normal corporate taxation—Federal, State, or local—and separate corporate structures have been maintained to provide a clear distinction between operations not subject to tax and taxable operations. The operations of both the tax-exempt parent and the taxable subsidiary are regularly examined and audited by the Internal Revenue Service.

The gross income of Colonial Williamsburg, after a reorganization of some of the business operations scheduled to take place on January 1, 1970, will be derived annually from the following sources in the following approximate amounts:

Admissions, sales of handcraft products, publications and films	$3, 750, 000
Rentals and other income from residences and other functionally related properties	2, 850, 000
Endowment funds (invested securities)	3, 400, 000
Total	10, 000, 000

The annual cost of normal operating programs at Williamsburg exceeds $8,725,000. A major portion of the income derived from endowed funds, therefore, is required to meet the difference between operating costs and operating income. Inflationary and other economic factors operating everywhere in the country in recent years have had the effect of continually widening this difference, and thereby making the endowment fund income more and more vital to the survival of Colonial Williamsburg. The balance of income from endowed funds has been programmed into many years in the future to permit the continuation of preservation and restoration necessary to the ultimate completion of the undertaking, and to the research and archaeological projects, production of educational films and publication of books and research materials, which are all so essentially related. Obviously, therefore, all income from every source is devoted directly to the exempt purposes of the organization.

The Tax Reform Bill of 1969, as presently worded, would impose upon Colonial Williamsburg a federal tax liability in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 per year. This would have the disastrous effect of forcing the organization into annually escalated deficits and could only lead to wholly unintended results. It would bring at once a halt to plans for completing the restoration and expanding current educational programs in response to public interest and attendance. Moreover, the organization would be forced to re-appraise its fundamental mission, with the view of cutting back existing operations to accommodate to a much-reduced financial capacity.

There is not the slightest question that the effect of such actions would be to diminish materially the significance of Colonial Williamsburg and to deprive future generations of much of its inspirational impact.

An understanding of the general purposes of the tax reform bill make it abundantly clear that no such effect was intended. In a number of instances, Colonial Williamsburg is particularly noted in the House Committee on Ways and Means explanatory report, with references to specific provisions provided in the bill to avoid irreparable harm to it and similar organizations. In at least two sections, however, the present language of the bill would expose such organizations, and Colonial Williamsburg in particular, to an inevitable erosion of their fundamental financial security. These proposals contradict the general intent of the greater portion of the bill and should not be left standing in their present form.

These inconsistencies lie in the present wording of those portions of the bill that would (a) define "gross investment income," as used in Section 506(b) (2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, (b) add a new Section 509 to the Code, and (c) modify existing Section 512(b).

Fortunately, these provisions are capable of simple remedy, by adding legislative language consistent with the balance of the bill. At the appropriate time, I would like to ask the Committee's permission to submit suggested amendments.

These changes would have the effect of recognizing the fundamentally public nature of the financial support behind such organizations as Colonial Williamsburg. In the case of Colonial Williamsburg, income derived from admissions and from other services and facilities furnished to the public, either directly or through functionally related activities, far exceeds income derived from endowed funds. In other words, the activities of Colonial Williamsburg have historically met the purposes of the bill to insure responsiveness on the part of such organizations to the needs and interests of the public.

STATEMENT OF COLONIAL WILLIAMSBURG

The tax on investment income and the tax (at ordinary corporate rates) on income from functionally related business activities, as currently provided in the Tax Reform Bill of 1969 (H.R. 13270), will gravely jeopardize the educational and preservation programs of Colonial Williamsburg.

For the reasons set forth in the attached explanatory statement, consideration by the Senate Committee on Finance of the following three amendments to the House Bill is respectfully requested:

1. Amend proposed Section 506(b)(2) defining "gross investment income" to read as follows:

"(2) Gross Investment Income—For purposes of paragraph (1), the term 'gross investment income' means the gross amount of income from interest, dividends, rents, and royalties, but not including any such income to the extent included in computing the tax imposed by Section 511 or any such income derived from a functionally related business as defined in Section 4943(d)(4)." (New matter italic.)

2. Amend proposed Section 512(b)(15), imposing the unrelated business income tax on interests, annuities, rents and royalties received from controlled corporations, to read as follows:

"(15) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), (2), or (3), amounts of interests, annuities, royalties and rents derived from an organization of which the organization deriving such amounts has control (as defined in Section 368(c)), other than such amounts derived from a functionally related business as defined in Section 4943(d)(4), shall be included as an item of gross income (whether or not the activity from which such amounts are derived represents a trade or business or is regularly carried on), and there shall be alowed all deductions directly connected with such amounts." (New matter in italic.)

3. Amend proposed Section 509(a)(2)(B) to read as follows:

"(B) normally receives not more than [one-third] one-half of its support in each taxable year from gross investment income (as defined in Section 506(b)(2);" (Eliminate matter in brackets; new matter italic.)

The following describes means of amending the several sections referred to above.

Page 5, amend line 19 as follows: Delete period and add, "or any such income derived from a functionally related business as defined in Section 4943(d)(4)."

Page 91, amend line 3 as follows: After second bracket, add words, "other than such amounts derived from a functionally related business as defined in Section 4943(d)(4),"

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hollet.

STATEMENT OF BYRON P. HOLLET, DIRECTOR, THE LILLY ENDOWMENT, INC.

Mr. HOLLET. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Byron P. Hollet. I am a director of Lilly Endowment of Indianapolis, Inc., and I am appearing on behalf of that private foundation.

Lilly Endowment was established 32 years ago by three members of the Lilly family, two of whom are now deceased. Those founders made gifts to the endowment of substantial amounts of Eli Lilly & Co. which have been retained by the endowment.

Preceding witnesses have covered many aspects of the proposed legislation affecting private foundations. Lilly Endowment supports much of this legislation designed to correct abuses. We believe that funds which have been committed to charity through gifts to a foundation must be devoted exclusively to charitable needs.

We also endorse the concept that there must be a public benefit at least commensurate with the tax privileges accorded.

Since Lilly Endowment was founded, It has distributed to charity substantially its entire income, over $77 million, an amount which is more than 2½ times the initial value of all of the gifts which have been made to the endowment.

We have been concerned over the provision of the House bill which would levy a tax of 7½ percent on the income of the private foundation. We are glad to see that the Treasury Department has recommended the substitution of a supervisory fee or a tax of 2 percent for that purpose, and we endorse that recommendation.

In the time remaining I should like to express, however, our deep concern over two specific provisions of the House bill, the minimum 5-percent pay-out rule and the 20-percent limitation on business holdings.

The bill would require, as you know, a foundation to distribute annually its entire net income and in any event not less than 5 percent of the current market value of its assets. We have always distributed substantially our entire net income and have no objection to such a requirement. But as to the 5-percent minimum pay-out provision, we have two objections.

First, we think the 5-percent requirement is too high, and second, we believe it would be unfair to apply that percentage to the current market value of the assets of a foundation each year.

With reference to our first objection, we believe that Congress should not expect nor require a foundation to earn a greater return from its investments that can be realized from a well-managed portfolio of equity securities, Attachments B and C to our written statement, which is already submitted, demonstrate that a 5-percent return can seldom if ever be realized.

Therefore, to meet the 5-percent requirement, a foundation must follow one of two courses of action.

(a) The foundation must invest its funds in fixed income securities, such as bonds and preferred stocks with a high yield but little or no growth potential or

(b) The Foundation must pay out a portion of its principal each year to meet the deficit between the income it receives and the 5 percent of the fair market value of its assets.

Neither of these alternatives advances the interests of charity. Indeed either in our judgment curtails such interests.

Let me illustrate my point by taking Lilly Endowment itself as an example. Had our endowment chosen to dispose of its gift of stock at the end of each year in which they were received and to invest the proceeds in government bonds, for example, the following would have been the results:

For the period from 1937 through 1968 our endowment would have received income of only $15 million instead of $81 million it actually received. For the year 1968 our endowment would have received only $1.2 million instead of $6.8 million it actually received and contributed.

Funds given to charity in the 32-year history of our endowment would have been reduced from $77 million to $15 million, or a reduction of about 80 percent. Yet curiously enough the program of investing in government bonds would likely have qualified under the 5-percent requirement, whereas the alternative which we followed would not, because of the increase in market values of foundation assets to which the 5 percent must be applied.

The second alternative to meet the 5 percent pay-out would be to distribute annually enough of the principal of the foundation's assets to make up the difference between the full income it receives and the 5 percent. This we submit can only result in a steady depletion of the assets of the foundation, and eventually lead to its extinction.

While we are aware that there may be some who believe that a life of a private foundation should be limited, we do not share this belief, and we do not think that this belief is shared by those connected with the hundreds of thousands of churches, schools, hospitals, and other benevolent institutions which could not continue to exist in this country without the existence of the private foundation, particularly whereas here under the proposed bill, the formation of new foundations is discouraged.

Our second objection to the 5 percent minimum pay-out provision arises because the percentage figure would be applied annually to the market value of the foundation's assets. We have observed that the market value of any particular security can and does fluctuate widely from year to year. Such fluctuations could substantially distort the minimum pay-out required of a foundation each year, and thereby seriously hamper the planning and orderly administration of its grants to charity.

To avoid this situation, we suggest that the minimum distribution requirement, whatever it may be, should be more broadly based and applied to an average of market values of a foundation's assets taken over a period of years, 10 years, for example, or for such period of time as the asset has been held if less than 10 years.

This change would go far to insure a more effective and orderly way for the foundation to carry out its programs.

Now, let me discuss in the brief time I have left our objections to that provision of the bill which would limit to 20 percent the holdings of the foundation in an incorporated business enterprise when combined with the holdings of disqualified persons under the bill.

First we think that the current provision in the House bill would certainly produce some results not in the best interests of the public welfare. It would force many existing foundations including Lilly Endowment to divest themselves of investments which have proved to be highly beneficial in the past, under circumstances which might seriously impair the Foundation's ability to realize the true value of such investments.

Further, such a limitation most certainly would discourage and impede further gifts to existing foundations, and the formation of new foundations.

We do not believe that control of a business enterprise by a foundation in and of itself is bad, and we suggest that there is no significant evidence to establish this as a fact. If property having substantial value and significant growth potential is contributed to a foundation and managed for the exclusive benefit of charity, it is difficult to understand why Congress would consider control of the property by the foundation its donor and members of his family as objectionable; particularly is this true where the term "disqualified persons" under the House bill apparently would include not only donors living or dead, their spouses living or dead, and all descendants no matter how remote of those living and dead persons, but also through the application of most severe attribution rules found in the Internal Revenue Code the brothers and sisters of those living or dead donors and their descendants.

The application of the House bill's definition of disqualified persons would in the case of Lilly Endowment include the stockholdings of persons extending through five generations, many of whom have neither an active interest nor the slightest participation in the affairs of the Foundation or the Lilly Co.

The House proposal leaves little or no opportunity to establish or to enlarge a philanthropic foundation through gifts of stock to a family-controlled corporation.

Society has received great benefits from charity made possible through the medium of the family foundation. Our national policy we believe should seek to take every advantage of this opportunity, and to turn private wealth to the public good and to stimulate not discourage, the institution of the family charitable institution, thereby relieving the Federal Government and its taxpayers from the support now given by private foundations.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I thank you on behalf of the Lilly Endowment for this opportunity to appear before you and to express our views.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Senator BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, as you know, this is a day when we have a regular luncheon at 12:30.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Anderson wants to hear Mr. Ross Malone before we quit for lunch. I suggest if you have to leave to attend your meeting, Senator, I will stay as long as we can and then we will come back.

Senator BENNETT. If you are only going to hear Mr. Malone before lunch I will be happy to stay here and then we can come back.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. HOLLET. Thank you.

(Mr. Hollet's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF BYRON P. HOLLET

My name is Byron P. Hollet.[1] I am a member of the board of directors of Lilly Endowment, Inc., of Indianapolis, Indiana. This private philanthropic foundation was incorporated June 25, 1937, as a nonprofit corporation under Indiana law.[2] I am appearing before this committee on behalf of Lilly Endowment to present the views of its board of directors on H.R. 13270, the "Tax Reform Act of 1969."

Lilly Endowment is in agreement with those provisions of the bill which are intended to correct abuses by some private foundations of their tax-exempt privileges. We endorse the fundamental position that funds which have been committed to charity and for which tax benefits have been granted, should, in fact, be devoted to charitable ends.

We feel, however, that certain provisions of H.R. 13270 go further than necessary and, in fact, would create what we believe to be unintentional hardships on Lilly Endowment and other similarly situated foundations whose assets are not in fixed-income-producing securities. I shall confine my discussion to these provisions and to what we believe are constructive suggestions for modifying or altering them.

DISTRIBUTION OF INCOME

Section 101(b) of the House bill (new section 4942 of the code) would require a foundation to distribute annually an amount equal to at least 5 percent of the market value of its assets.

Lilly Endowment distributes to tax-exempt organizations essentially its entire net income each year for the purposes of its stated objectives—the promotion and support of charitable, educational, or religious programs. Its income is derived for the most part from common stock of Eli Lilly and Company received as gifts, principally from three members of the Lilly family. These gifts were valued in the aggregate at approximately $29 million at the times they were received. Through 1968 the Endowment had distribtued in grants $77 million of a net income of $79 million. Commitments for future grants amounted to $6.3 million at December 31, 1968.

In analyzing the performance of Lilly Endowment over its thirty-two-year history, it should be noted that its annual distribution of income to charity now amounts to almost one-fourth of the aggregate value of its assets at the time they were acquired; further, that Lilly Endowment has, since its founding, disbursed almost 2.7 times as much money as it has received through donations.

During the twenty-year period 1946 to 1965, the Endowment received income from its assets equal to an average annual yield of about 3.5 percent on the year-end market value. Since 1966 market values have risen; and, although dividend rates have increased, the yield has averaged only approximately 1.5 percent of market value.

A fixed formula for distributing income based on the market value of the assets of a particular year would obviously have a decided impact on the investment alternatives available to Lilly Endowment and other foundations. If the 5-percent-minimum-investment-return requirement (and the proposed 7.5-percent tax on income) had been in effect from the date of Lilly Endowment's founding, the Endowment would have been forced to dispose of more than one-third of its principal assets. In turn, income available for distribution in 1968 would also have been reduced by more than one-third, from $6.8 million to $4.4 million—a reduction of $2.4 million. And further reduction of principal—with concurrent loss in income available for distribution—would probably continue year after year.

Under provisions of the House bill, the only way a foundation could hope to avoid depleting its principal would be through investment in fixed-income securities, such as bonds and preferred stocks, with a high yield but little or no growth potential. If, from the beginning, such an investment policy had been followed by Lilly Endowment and its assets had been converted to government bonds, the Endowment's initial investment value of $29 million would have held fairly steady, but the income available to charity would have been decreased from $79 million to $15 million, a reduction of more than 80 percent.

Had the Endowment chosen to dispose of its gifts of stock at the end of each year in which they were received and to invest the proceeds in one of five representative alternative investment programs, the differing results in income earned would have been as presented in the following table:

COMPARATIVE INCOME—FROM RETENTION OF DONATED STOCK HAVING A MARKET VALUE OF $29,000,000, AT DATES RECEIVED, COMPARED WITH INVESTMENT THEREOF IN 5 ALTERNATIVE, PROGRAMS

	1937–68	In 1968
Denoted stock	$81	$6.8
Moody's industrial stocks	72	5.4
Dow-Jones industrial stocks	68	4.8
Massachusetts Investors Trust [1]	61	4.3
State Street Invest~ent Corp [1]	45	3.4
Government bonds held to maturity	15	1.2

Note: Computations made by Ernst & Ernst, certified public accountants.

A requirement that private foundations distribute their net income on a current basis seems entirely justified and reasonable. Lilly Endowment has followed such a practice since it was founded. A 5-percent-minimum-distribution requirement, however, would effectively prevent the investment by private foundations in common stocks, since income from such investments seldom reaches 5 percent when applied against current market values (see attachments B and C).

If society is to receive the long-term benefits to be derived from investments in stocks which participate in the growth of the general economy, it is apparent that a 5-percent-minimum-investment-return requirement would be too severe, particularly when administrative costs of operating the foundation must first be paid. On the other hand, a minimum-investment-return formula more in line with the return which can be reasonably expected over a period of time from a well-managed investment portfolio would provide concurrent benefits to society as well as providing the foundation with some desirable freedom of choice in selecting investment alternatives.

Because of widely fluctuating market values in any single year or over relatively short periods of time, provision also should be made for basing the minimum-investment-return requirement on an average of asset values over a period of years (ten years, for example), rather than on current market values.

In addition to the threat which the bill's requirement poses to a foundation's freedom to invest in common stocks, with their potential for a greater return to charity than can be achieved through government bonds or other fixed-income investments, attention should be directed to the effect which such a requirement would have on the establishment of new foundations. We believe prospective donors would be discouraged from contributing to foundations low-yielding stocks or stocks in family-owned companies.

Society has received great benefits from charity made possible through the medium of the family foundation. Our national policy should seek to take every advantage of this opportunity to turn private wealth to public good and to stimulate, not discourage, the institution of the family charitable foundation.

Alternative

We suggest for consideration the following alternative to the 5-percent-minimum-investment-return requirement:

a. The minimum-investment-return requirement should be based on an average of asset values over a period of years (ten years, for example) rather than on current market values, subject as they are to fluctuation, and

b. The required annual distribution as a percent of that average market value should not exceed the return that could be reasonably expected from a well-managed portfolio containing common stocks.

This alternative will ensure that society receives concurrent benefits from tax-exempt privileges and, at the same time, will permit a foundation to exercise investment discretion that will provide greater long-range benefits to society.

STOCK-OWNERSHIP LIMITATION

Section 101(b) of the House bill (new section 4943 of the code) would limit to 20 percent the holdings of a foundation in an incorporated business enterprise when combined with the holdings of "disqualified persons".

In April, 1969, the Treasury Department recommended that a foundation be permitted to own 20 percent of the voting stock of a corporation. Included in the recommendation was a provision that no divestiture of such stock would be required as long as the aggregate ownership by donors did not exceed an additional 15 percent. The Treasury proposal would have permitted reasonable ownership by foundations of a corporation's voting stock.

The House bill drastically changes this concept by providing that the maximum amount of stock in any corporation that can be held by a foundation is 20 percent reduced by the aggregate holdings of disqualified persons. This major change might force (depending upon final resolution of the definition of "disqualified persons") almost complete divestiture by Lilly Endowment of its holdings of stock in Eli Lilly and Company, a company which has paid continuous dividends since 1885 and which has attracted an increasing number of outside investors now totaling more than 15,000.

A major objective of the stock-ownership-limitation provision, as stated in the House report, is to prevent diversion of foundation management from concern with charitable activities.

Such an abuse of a foundation's tax-exempt privilege has not materialized in the thirty-two years that Lilly Endowment has been a large stockholder of the company. There has been no diversion of the full-time staff of the Endowment from concern with charitable activities, because the staff has no responsibility for the operation of the company. And, as the record shows, charity has been generously advanced.

This provision of the House bill could affect adversely many foundations, such as Lilly Endowment, which have not been guilty of any abuse of tax privileges. It certainly will discourage many contributions to existing foundations and the establishment of new foundations. A potential donor owning more than 20 percent of a corporation's stock could not make any significant gift of such stock to a private foundation with the expectation that the foundation would retain the investment. Thus, a potential donor, or his family, who wishes to contribute to or establish a foundation with shares of a closely held company, for which there is no immediate market, will be deterred by the realization that his charitable intention could be frustrated through forced divestment of the contributed property in a comparatively short period of time.

The House proposal, as currently written, leaves little or no opportunity for a family to establish a philanthropic foundation through gifts of stock in a family-controlled corporation. While recognizing that some limitation on stock ownership may be in the public interest, it would seem wise, as a matter of public policy, to encourage within less-stringent limitations the motivation for charitable giving.

Alternative

We suggest for consideration the following alternative:

> The voting stock of any one corporation held by a foundation should be limited to 20 percent and when combined with the holdings of disqualified persons should be limited to 35 percent. This, basically, is the recommendation made by the Treasury Department in its report to Congress in April, 1969.

with the expectation that the foundation would retain the investment. Thus, a potential donor, or his family, who wishes to contribute to or establish a foundation with shares of a closely held company, for which there is no imediate market, will be deterred by the realization that this charitable intention could be frustrated through forced divestment of the contributed property in a comparatively short period of time.

While recognizing that some limitation on stock ownership may be in the public interest, it would seem wise, as a matter of public policy, to encourage within less-stringent limitations the motivation for charitable giving.

Alternative

We suggest for consideration the following alternative:

> The voting stock of any one corporation held by a foundation should be limited to 20 percent and when combined with the holdings of disqualified persons should be limited to 35 percent. This, basically, is the recomendation made by the Treasury Department in its report to Congress in April, 1969. "Disqualified persons," for this purpose, should include only substantial donors who are living, their spouses and lineal descendants, and managers of the foundation (as defined in the bill).

The limitation suggested by the Treasury would be adequate to prevent abuses resulting from foundation control of business enterprises and would materially alleviate some of the hardships which would be incurred under the House limitation. At the same time, it would permit some investment alternatives that, as demonstrated in the past, would provide greater returns to society (see page 5).

Also, the above recommendation would define "disqualified persons" in such a way as to preclude the possibility, which we believe exists, of interpreting the definition to include the stockholdings of deceased donors and, thereby, those of many persons who have neither an active interest nor any active participation in the affairs of either the foundation or the corporation.

Special exemption.—The House bill would make an exception of an organization created by an inter vivos trust which was irrevocable on December 31, 1939, and which met certain other requirements. If this special exemption is retained in the bill, we suggest that it be enlarged to include incorporated foundations existing on that date which hold interests in corporations whose common stock is traded on public exchanges or in the over-the-counter market.

TAX ON INVESTMENT INCOME

Section 101(a) of the House bill (new section 506 of the code) would impose a tax equal to 7.5 percent of a foundation's net investment income.

The proposal to tax a private foundation's investment income at the rate of 7.5 percent per year will divert this income from charity.

Alternative

Lilly Endowment proposes the following alternative to the imposition of such a tax:

> A fee could be paid by foundations, on some equitable basis, as a means of providing the funds necessary to support governmental supervision of private foundations.

Charity, thus, would be deprived only of those funds necessary to provide such supervision.

CONCLUSION

A few foundations have, apparently, been guilty of abusing their tax-exempt privileges. Most foundations, however, have conducted their affairs with scrupulous concern for the public interest. Lilly Endowment supports legislation aimed at correcting specific abuses and does not oppose—within the ranges suggested here—a minimum-investment-return requirement, a stock-ownership limitation, or a fee to support governmental supervision.

BYRON P. HOLLET

Byron P. Hollett was born September 28, 1914, in Indianapolis, Indiana. He attended public schools and was graduated from Shortridge High School in 1932. In 1936 he received a Bachelor of Arts degree from Wabash College, where he majored in history and economics; and in 1939, a Bachelor of Laws degree from the Harvard University School of Law.

In World War II he spent four years in the United States Navy, serving in the South Pacific, and attained the rank of lieutenant.

Before and after his naval service, Mr. Hollet was associated in the practice of law with his father's firm, Hollet & Lafuze. Since 1951 he has been a partner in the Indianapolis law firm of Baker & Daniels.

In addition to being a member of the board of directors of Lilly Endowment, Inc., Mr. Hollett is a director of the American Fletcher National Bank and Trust Company and the United Fund of Greater Indianapolis. He is also a member of the board of governors of the James Whitcomb Riley Hospital for Children, a trustee of Wabash College, and Chancellor of the Episcopal Diocese of Indianapolis.

Senator ANDERSON. I do want to welcome Mr. Ross Malone. He has been a very prominent attorney in New Mexico. He has been with the General Motors Corp. and has been involved in many other organizations, and we are glad you are here.

The CHAIRMAN. I do have to go to another meeting soon.

Go ahead, Mr. Malone.

STATEMENT OF ROSS L. MALONE, PRESIDENT; ACCOMPANIED BY GEOFFREY C. HAZARD, JR., EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR; AND H. CECIL KILPATRICK, TAX COUNSEL OF THE AMERICAN BAR FOUNDATION, CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. MALONE. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for giving me the opportunity to appear before lunch. I think I can conclude by 12:30.

I am president of the American Bar Foundation of Chicago, Ill., and I am accompanied today by Mr. Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., the executive director of that foundation, and Mr. H. Cecil Kilpatrick, of Washington, who is the tax counsel of the foundation.

The American Bar Foundation is a nonprofit research and educational organization sponsored by the American Bar Association which as you know is the national organization of lawyers of the United States.

The foundation devotes itself to the study of the operation of law in society, and studies seeking to improve the administration of justice.

The foundation is currently conducting some 40 research projects in these areas of improvement of administration of justice and the public administration of the law. They range from "Criminal Law Administration in the Large City" to "The Mentally Ill and the Law," and the "Canons of Professional Ethics" of the profession.

The foundation finds itself in a position which is a bit uncertain insofar as the provisions of H.R. 13270 are concerned. The principal support of the American Bar Foundation comes from some 40,000 lawyers of the United States, who are members of the American Bar Association, hence of the American Bar Endowment.

The American Bar Endowment is the third member of the American Bar Association family, which is composed of the association, the endowment and the foundation.

The association is the membership-in-action organization of the bar.

The endowment is a 501(c)(3) organization which solicits and receives bequests, memorial gifts and contributions from members of the bar and others for public purposes, and the principal beneficiary of the endowment is the American Bar Foundation of which I have the honor to be president.

The principal source of funds of the endowment is contributions from some 40,000 members of the American Bar Association which are carried out through the group insurance, group life insurance program, which is handled through the endowment.

The problem that we have insofar as the present bill is concerned is uncertainty first as to whether or not the 40,000 members who contribute through the endowment plus 1,500 fellows of the American Bar Foundation who contribute annually to our support, constitute the general public within the purview of the bill or whether because they are members of a single group they would not so qualify.

The second concern that we have results from the fact that our principal source of revenue is grants from the American Bar Endowment, grants which are made out of the money that these 40,000 lawyers contribute to the endowment. We are the primary beneficiary of the endowment, but are not certain whether or not grants so made would qualify as an "indirect" contribution from the 40,000 lawyers to the American Bar Foundation.

Those are the two problems that create uncertainty insofar as our status under the act is concerned.

We are entirely sympathetic to the objectives of eliminating abuses in the private foundation area, but we feel that the organization, the American Bar Foundation, is clearly intended to be in the class of public rather than private foundations within the general contemplation of the act, but that its status by virtue of this unique situation might be in doubt.

The funds that are expended by the foundation are spent in scholarly research. We do not support the enactment of legislation. We make empiric studies of the operation of law in society, and undertake to draw conclusions from what we find, but we then make the product of our efforts available to the entire public for such use, implementation or assistance as it may be to them.

We have carefully examined ourselves insofar as the criticism of private foundations included in the House bill are concerned: the self-dealing, failing to distribute, holding interests in private business, financial speculation, debt finance property acquisitions, unrelated business, organizations for the benefit of their members; and we conclude that we clearly do not have any of those problems. But the work of the foundation would be handicapped if by virtue of the technicalities I have mentioned we should end up in the category of a private foundation.

We have submitted with my statement a proposal by our conusel as to changes which might be made which would eliminate the problem which I have mentioned.

I want to thank you very much for the opportunity to appear and to make this statement.

Senator ANDERSON. We are happy to have you here.

Senator BENNETT. Just one question.

Your testimony boils down to the fact that it is the relation of the foundation to the limited membership which creates your chief problem?

Mr. MALONE. Yes, sir; whether or not that membership constitutes the general public, and then whether the passage of that money through the endowment to us would qualify it as an indirect contribution. We hope it would be. We think it would be.

Senator BENNETT. You have those two problems?

Mr. MALONE. Yes, sir; and they are both covered in our technical memorandum.

Senator BENNETT. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. MALONE. Thank you very much. Mr. Chairman, and thank you, Senator Anderson.

(Mr. Malone's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF ROSS L. MALONE, PRESIDENT AMERICAN BAR FOUNDATION

SUMMARY

1. The American Bar Foundation is a non-profit research and educational organization sponsored by the American Bar Association and devoted to study of the operation of law in society and to improvement of the administration of justice. It currently is conducting some 40 projects in various fields of the law.
2. As passed by the House of Representatives, H.R. 13270 can be interpreted as subjecting the American Bar Foundation to the restrictions, liabilities and tax consequences of a private foundation. We believe this result is at variance with the policy expressed in the Act and an unintended consequence of technical complexities in drafting.
3. These adverse consequences can be avoided by minor amendments, drafts of which are presented in the Technical Explanations appended to this statement and which we believe are consonant with the purposes of the Act.

STATEMENT

My name is Ross L. Malone. I am President of the American Bar Foundation, a non-profit legal research institute, incorporated under Illinois law in 1952. The Foundation's purpose is to improve the practical operation of the law and the administration of justice through research and education. It has been ruled exempt under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.

The American Bar Foundation was created to provide a means by which the organized legal profession of the United States could contribute to improvement of the law and administration of justice through research. It was created by the American Bar Association and maintains close colloboration with the bench, bar, agencies of government, and law schools throughout the country. Its financial support is provided chiefly by the American Bar Endowment, a charitable foundation comprised by the members of the American Bar Association and deriving most of its income from their contributions. The Foundation also receives support from the American Bar Association itself and from gifts, grants and contracts from business, agencies of government and foundations, including the Ford Foundation. In addition, the Foundation receives annual gifts from some 1,300 lawyers comprising the Fellows of the American Bar Foundation, a group of distinguished members of the bar from all parts of the country.

The Foundation's reports on its research are published and made available to the general public, concerned agencies of government—federal, state and local—and the legal profession. The guiding aim of its research program is to broaden understanding of how the law and the courts operate and to suggest improvements in the administration of justice. It does not lobby or attempt to influence legislative bodies.

The Foundation commenced active operation in 1954 and began major research in 1957 with a project on the administration of criminal justice that had been conceived by Justice Robert H. Jackson. Since that time, the size and scope of the Foundation's research program has steadily expanded. The Foundation studies include the following topics:

Administration of Criminal Justice:
- Criminal Law Administration in the Large City
- The Public Prosecutor's Office
- Representation of Indigent Accused Persons
- The Mentally Ill and the Criminal Law
- Criminal Justice in the Rural Community

Judicial Administration:
- The Workload of the United States Courts of Appeals
- Removal and Retirement of Disabled Judges
- Efficient Utilization of Jurors
- State Administrative Law
- Procedures in Federal Income Tax Controversies

Private Legal Transactions:
- Model Business Corporation Act Annotated
- Model Landlord-Tenant Code
- Model Debenture Indenture Provisions
- Title Examination in Real Estate Transfers

Public Law:
- Consumer Credit Legislation
- Mentally Ill and the Law
- Law of Man's Activities in Outer Space
- Marriage Conciliation Services in Domestic Relations Courts
- Children's Attitudes Toward Law and Authority

Jurisprudence:
- Fellowships in Legal History
- Sources of Our Liberties—Legal Documents in American History
- Weaver Constitutional Law Essay Prize

Legal Services and the Legal Profession:
- Legal Problems of the Poor
- Canons of Professional Ethics
- Legal Services for Middle Income Individuals
- Legal Education and Training

The American Bar Foundation is under the administration of a Board of Directors composed of lawyers and jurists from across the United States. The present Board of Directors consists of the following members: Ross L. Malone, New York, President; Lewis F. Powell, Jr., Richmond, Vice-President; Robert K. Bell, Ocean City, New Jersey, Secretary; Joseph H. Gordon, Tacoma, Treasurer; Honorable Dudley B. Bonsal, New York; Harold J. Gallagher, New York; Honorable Erwin N. Griswold, Washington, D.C.; W. Page Keeton, Dean, School of Law, University of Texas; Phil C. Neal, Dean, School of Law, University of Chicago; Barnabas F. Sears, Chicago; Bernard G. Segal, Philadelphia; Whitney North Seymour, New York; William A. Sutherland, Washington, D.C.; Maynard J. Toll, Los Angeles; Karl C. Williams, Rockford, Illinois; Edward L. Wright, Little Rock.

In addition the Foundation has a Research Committee to guide policy in the development of its research program. The members of this committee at present include the following: Derek C. Bok, Dean, Law School, Harvard University, Roderick M. Hills, Los Angeles; Spencer L. Kimball, Dean, Law School, University of Wisconsin; Phil C. Neal, Dean, Law School, University of Chicago; William Reece Smith, Jr., Tampa; Oscar M. Ruebhausen, New York; Stanley L. Temko, Chairman, Washington, D.C.

The staff of the American Bar Foundation consists of approximately 30 professional and semi-professional members, mostly lawyers but also including social scientists in the disciplines of economics, political science, psychology and sociology. The Executive Director, Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., holds a joint appointment on the faculty of law at the University of Chicago. Several of the staff members have teaching appointments in departments of the University of Chicago and in other institutions of higher education in Chicago. In addition to its professional research staff, the Foundation maintains and operates a library consisting of a working collection of legal materials, selected periodicals in law and related social sciences, and an extensive collection of materials relating to the history, organization and activities of the legal profession.

The Foundation publishes an Annual Report each year; a copy of the most recent (1967–68) is attached. At intervals it issues a catalog of its publications; a copy of its most recent catalog is attached. The Foundation's accounts are audited annually by the Certified Public Accounting firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co. It files annual reports with the Treasury Department of the United States, the State of Illinois and the State of New York. Its books and accounts are audited from time to time by agencies of the United States Government to verify project charges and cost allocations in connection with projects funded in whole or in part by the government.

I attach a summary tabulation of the revenues and expenditures of the Foundation for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1965 to 1969, inclusive. As will be seen from Schedule 1 accompanying the summary, its primary source of funds has been contributions by the American Bar Endowment, an organization also ruled exempt under section 501(c)(3). The members of the Endowment are the members of the American Bar Association, now numbering over 135,000 lawyers, of whom over 40,000 make annual contributions to the Endowment. The members meet annually and elect the Board of Governors of the Endowment.

It seems clear that none of the criticisms levelled at private foundations by the Ways and Means Committee report on H.R. 13270 apply to the organization or operation of the Foundation. These criticisms relate to:

(a) Self-dealing between a foundation and substantial contributors;
(b) Failure to distribute income for charitable purposes;
(c) Holding interests in private business;
(d) Financial speculation;
(e) Debt-financed property acquisitions;
(f) Engaging in unrelated business;
(g) Organizations set up primarily for the benefit of their members.

The American Bar Foundation shares its building, the American Bar Center, at 1155 East 60th Street in Chicago, with the American Bar Association and the American Bar Endowment. It uses its entire income for research, except reserves for development and contingencies which total about six months' income. (See financial summary, attached.) It owns no interest in private businesses except publicly traded securities held as investments producing on the average less than 5% of its annual gross income, and has no other assets except its headquarters building.

The Foundation is therefore greatly concerned by advice that the complex provisions of H.R. 13270 could result in the Foundation's being treated as a "private foundation." I attach as an appendix to this statement a technical explanation of the provisions of the bill which lead our advisers to this conclusion. This explanation concludes with recommendations of possible amendments which would accomplish the objectives of the legislation, as we understand them, without impinging on the Foundation's research and educational activities in a manner which we believe the Congress does not intend.

May I thank you for this opportunity to appear on behalf of the American Bar Foundation. We earnestly hope that the Committee will adopt modifications in H.R. 13270 which will assure continuation of the Foundation's program of research in the operation of the law and the administration of justice.

Appendix to Statement by Ross L. Malone, President, American Bar Foundation, Concerning H.R. 13270

TECHNICAL EXPLANATION OF EFFECT OF H.R. 13270 ON THE AMERICAN BAR FOUNDATION

Under H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969, as passed by the House, it will be possible to argue that the American Bar Foundation is a "private foundation." Should it be so classified the Bar Foundation would become subject to the policing restrictions which are enacted in various sections of H.R. 13270. The burdens include the restriction on making grants to individuals for conducting research projects, the cost of maintaining legal compliance with the Act's complex requirements, taxation of investment income, and the added difficulty in persuading other foundations to make research grants to the Bar Foundation.

This interpretation, with the consequent restrictions, could be avoided by amendment of the Act as passed by the House that is fully compatible with the Act's purposes. Such amendment could take either of two forms, which are specifically suggested on pages 5 and 7 herein.

Under the Act, all present 501(c)(3) organizations are classified as "private foundations" unless they fall into the Act's stated exceptions. These exceptions are:

1. That class of organizations which will qualify for the 30% charitable contribution limitation under the Act,
2. Organizations which meet the statutory test established to implement the concept of broadly supported organizations,
3. Organizations which exist to perform the functions, etc., of the above two classes of organizations or which are operated, supervised, or controlled by one of these types of organizations and which are not controlled by "disqualified persons" as defined in the Act, and
4. Organizations operating exclusively for testing for public safety purposes.

The American Bar Foundation might be deemed to fall outside these exceptions.

First, to qualify as an organization to which the 30% charitable contribution limitation would apply and thus to be excluded from the definition of private foundation, an organization such as the American Bar Foundation would have to receive a substantial part of its support from a governmental unit or from direct or indirect contributions from the general public. The Foundation is supported principally by contributions from the American Bar Endowment, a charitable corporation which in turn receives its chief support through contributions of 40,000 members of the legal profession. While the American Bar Foundation indirectly receives a substantial part of its support from a great number of people, namely, the members of the American Bar Endowment, the specialized interest of these people in the law and in its advancement might be such that they could be said not to constitute a sector of the "general" public. Since the term "general public" is found in section 170 of the Internal Revenue Code as it now exists, it is possible to look to the Treasury Regulations to assist in the definition of the term. The Regulations at section 1.170-2(b)(5)(iii)(c)(3) indicate that in determining whether an organization receives its support from a "representative number of persons" and thus is publicly supported "consideration must be given to the type of organization and whether or not the organization limits its activities to a special field which can be expected to appeal to a limited number of persons." The implication is that a group which has a specialized interest area (such as a group which includes only lawyers) might not be "a representative number of persons."

Thus, if it were held that the American Bar Endowment did not receive a substantial part of its support from the general public, the American Bar Foundation could not be excluded from "private foundation" status under the first provision.

Second, to determine if an organization falls within the concept of a broadly publicly supported organization, a review of the sources or the organization's support is required. The review of the organization's income must follow a series of mechanical tests set forth in the proposed statute. The organization will fall outside the definition of a "private foundation" if it (1) normally receives more than one-third of its support by way of gifts, grants, contributions, or membership fees from persons other than "disqualified persons," or (2) normally receives more than one-third of its support by way of gifts, grants or contributions from an organization to which the 30% charitable contributions limitation applies. (Further, the organization must not receive more than one-third of its support from gross investment income.) The proposed law defines a "disqualified person," among other things, as anyone who is a "substantial contributor," inter alia, one giving $5,000 or more in any one year. The American Bar Endowment provides the American Bar Foundation with sums in excess of $5,000 per year, and these sums have constituted between 40% and 70% of the Foundation's annual report. Therefore, even though the support of the American Bar Foundation is provided indirectly by a great many individuals in the form of their gifts to the American Bar Endowment, which in turn passes these amounts on to the American Bar Foundation, the contributions come to the American Bar Foundation directly from the American Bar Endowment, and they exceed $5,000 in each year. This would seem to result in the conclusion that this portion of the support of the Foundation comes from a disqualified person which may not be an organization to which contributions can be deducted based on the 30% limitation. If this were true the Foundation would not qualify for the second exception.

The American Bar Foundation might not meet the third exception to the definition either. This is because arguably the organization is not operated by or in connection with the American Bar Endowment.

The fourth exception is not applicable by definition.

RECOMMENDED AMENDMENTS TO H.R. 13270

Two possible alternative amendments to H.R. 13270 would eliminate the possibility of the above-described result:

1. The definition of an organization to which charitable contributions are deductible under the 30% limitation might be changed to include this type of organization; or

2. The defined term "substantial contributor" might be altered to exclude an organization which has a substantial number of members.

Organizations to which contributions are deductible based on the 30% limitations are described in proposed section 170(b) (1) (B) of the Internal Revenue Code (section 201(a) of H.R. 13270).

Subparagraph (vi) of that section, found at pages 111 and 112 of the Act as passed by the House, reads:

"(vi) an organization referred to in subsection (c)(2) which normally receives a substantial part of its support (exclusive of income received in the exercise or performance by such organization of its charitable, educational, or other purpose or function constituting the basis for its exemption under section 501(a)) from a govermental unit referred to in subsection (c)(1) or from direct or indirect contributions from the general public, shall be allowed to the extent that the aggregate of such contributions does not exceed 30 percent of the taxpayer's contribution base."

It is respectfully requested that this language be amended to read:

"(vi) an organization referred to in subsection (c)(2) which normally receives a substantial part of its support (exclusive of income received in the exercise or performance by such organization of its charitable, educational, or other purpose or function constituting the basis for its exemption under section 501(a)) from a governmental unit referred to in subsection (c)(1) or from direct or indirect contributions from the general public or from an organization having a substantial number of members, shall be allowed to the extent that the aggregate of such contributions does not exceed 30 percent of the taxpayer's contribution base." (Emphasis indicates new material.)

This amendment would put the American Bar Foundation in the class of organizations to which contributions are deductible based on the 30% limitation.

The organization would then be excluded from "private foundation" status. It is submitted that the amendment would not have any other significant effect on this provision of the statute.

The alternative amendment would exclude the American Bar Endowment from the definition of a "substantial contributor," and thereby from the definition of a "disqualified person." The definition of a "substantial contributor" is found in proposed section 507(b)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code (section 101(a) of the Act at page 8 of the bill as passed by the House), and it reads as follows:

"(2) SUBSTANTIAL CONTRIBUTOR.—For purposes of paragraph (1), the term 'substantial contributor' means—

"(A) any person who (by himself or with his spouse) contributed more than $5,000 to the private foundation in any one calendar year (or bequeathed more than $5,000 to the private foundation), and

"(B) any person who (by himself or with his spouse) contributed or bequeathed the greatest amount to the foundation in any one calendar year.

In the case of a trust, such term also includes the creator of such a trust."

It is respectfully requested that this language be amended to read:

"(2) SUBSTANTIAL CONTRIBUTOR.—For purposes of paragraph (1), the term 'substantial contributor' means—

"(A) any person who (by himself or with his spouse) contributed more than $5,000 to the private foundation in any one calendar year (or bequeathed more than $5,000 to the private foundation), and

"(B) any person who (by himself or with his spouse) contributed or bequeathed the greatest amount to the foundation in any one calendar year.

In the case of a trust, such term also includes the creator of such trust, but in the case of a foundation, such term shall not include a foundation which is not itself a private foundation." (Emphasis indicates new material.)

Given the present support of the American Bar Foundation which is received from the American Bar Endowment (which is a membership organization and not a private foundation) this amendment would exclude the American Bar Foundation from "private foundation" status. It is submitted that the amendment would not have any other significant effect on the statute.

STATEMENT OF LINCOLN GORDON, PRESIDENT, JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY, IN BEHALF OF THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, my name is Lincoln Gordon, president of the Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, and I am appearing this afternoon on behalf of the Association of American Universities.

I have prepared a written statement on those aspects of the proposed Tax Reform Act of 1969 which are of special importance to our group of universities and would appreciate the inclusion of the full text in the record of these hearings.

Senator ANDERSON. Without objection that will be done.

Mr. GORDON. The Association of American Universities brings together the 20 State and 22 private universities in this country, which are leaders in post-graduate and professional education, basic and applied research, and undergraduate instruction of high quality.

We account for more than 60 percent of the Ph. D. degrees granted each year, the great majority of medical students, and the best known schools of law, business, engineering, education, and other professional training programs.

There are many complaints in the air nowadays about the structure and performance of American universities. Some of those complaints are well justified. But taken as a whole, the American university system has enormous strength and vitality which is the envy of educators throughout the world. Neither student disturbances nor legitimate complaints about details of internal organization or curriculum ought to distract us from the basic fact that an increasingly technological society will need a constantly greater flow of highly-trained manpower in all fields and the organized application of trained intelligence to the solution of complex national problems.

At the same time, the public rightly expects us to push steadily forward to the goal of full equality in the educational opportunity.

So for the foreseeable future the load upon the Nation's universities will increase. We must look to larger numbers of students and steadily improved training programs for scientists, physicians, engineers, teachers, and administrators. We can expect a growing engagement by the universities in problems of urban reconstruction, environmental pollution, delivery of health care, international relations, and economic development at home and abroad. There is no prospect of a lull in this set of massive challenges to the system of higher education.

To meet these challenges requires massive financial resources. We face the dual pressures of increasing student enrollments which are about 7 million today for all higher education and expected to reach 10 million within a decade, coupled with rising costs per student, especially for graduate and professional training.

The Carnegie Commission for Higher Education forecasts an increase in total institutional expenditures for higher education from $17 billion 2 years ago to $41 billion per year by the academic year 1976–77.

To meet those needs, additional funds will be required from all three major sources, State and local governments, Federal, and private.

With State and local budgets under severe strain, and in face of the Federal financial problems which this committee knows so well, the need for expanded private support for higher education is greater than ever.

Last year private giving to higher education amounted to about $1½ billion. Of this total, the 42 universities in the Association of American Universities received over $500 million, almost 30 percent of that figure going to the State universities in the group.

There could not be a worse time to reverse our long-standing national policy of providing strong incentives for private philanthropy through the operation of a tax system.

The bill before you as passed by the House would sharply curtail private support for higher education, directly through reduced incentives for individual charitable gifts, and indirectly through the proposed tax on foundation income.

The Association of American Universities supports the basic purposes of tax reform, that is the achievement of greater equity and the removal of unwarranted special tax favors and loopholes. Certain of the proposed reforms, and some of these are specified in my written statement, ought to be adopted even though there may be as a byproduct some reduction of incentives to charitable giving.

We strongly oppose, however, those provisions of the House bill which would reduce incentives to make gifts in the form of appreciated property, especially their inclusion in the calculations of limits on tax preferences and allocation of deductions. Gifts of appreciated securities in recent years have constituted more than half of the total of individual gifts to universities, and comprise a vital element in the flow of private support for our institutions.

We are fully in accord with the reasoned position presented to this committee by the American Council on Education on these points, as well as on the need to avoid retroactivity in provisions on charitable remainders.

I want to put a special stress this afternoon on the consequences to higher education of the proposed foundation tax. In 1967–68 foundation grants for higher education totaled $321 million of which $234 million went to the member institutions of our association.

Foundation support has been a cardinal element in the strengthening of the American university system, stimulating innovation and opening up new areas of inquiry in teaching.

The proposed 7½ percent tax on foundation investment income would seriously and adversely affect foundation support for higher education. Since foundations would under the terms of the bill be required to spend all of their current income, the incidence of that tax would in fact fall not on the foundations as such but on the institutions dependent upon foundation support, institutions such as universities, whose own tax exemption is rightly continued by the bill because of their service to the public interest.

We recognize that the existing law contains loopholes which have permitted certain dubious financial practices especially by smaller foundations, but such abuses should be directly attacked by legislative restrictions and a proper system of auditing to which a general tax on foundation income in no way contributes.

We strongly urge, therefore, that the committee replace the foundation income tax by a supervisory fee sufficient to cover the costs of proper foundation audit and control, an amount which would surely be very much less than the estimated $100 million per year involved in the 7½-percent tax.

We suggest that the Secretary of the Treasury be empowered to levy a fee approximating the cost of a foundation supervision unit within the Internal Revenue Service, and to determine an equitable formula for distributing this cost among individual foundations.

We are also deeply concerned by the provision in the House bill defining as a taxable foundation expenditure, and I quote the language, "Any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof," then there is a saving clause, "other than through making available the results of nonpartisan analysis or research."

The saving clause is obviously intended to permit institutions like ours to carry on objective academic research and analysis, even if our work influences public opinion, but the wording is so ambiguous and the penalties on foundation managers are so harsh that we fear a serious inhibition on foundation grants in many fields where university participation in public affairs is highly desirable.

We therefore suggest that the committee substitute wording which will prevent foundation grants from being used to finance partisan activities and lobbying, but which will permit support of nonpartisan activities carried on by educational, scientific, and charitable institutions.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize that higher education faces a grave financial crisis for which no ready or easy solutions are in sight. Recent Federal appropriations for higher education have not increased in proportion to costs, and some have been reduced. State and municipal budgets are under extreme strain.

In the face of rising enrollments, rising costs, and rising public demands on the resources of universities, amendment of the Federal tax law to curtain private giving would convert this already grave situation into an acutely critical one.

We ask that the committee recognize the seriousness of these issues, and adopt the proposals outlined above, so as to maintain incentives to direct private giving and permit the private foundations to continue the volume and character of their indispensable support to higher education.

I will be happy to respond to questions or to assist the committee further in any way that may be desired.

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you.

(Mr. Gordon's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF LINCOLN GORDON, PRESIDENT, THE JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY ON BEHALF OF THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES

SUMMARY

A. Recommendations

1. Propose that a fee be levied on private foundations adequate to cover the cost of unit in the Bureau of Internal Revenue whose function is to insure that the foundations operate within the law.

This fee to substitute for the 7.5 percent tax on investment income, but set annually by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to an equitable formula producing funds adequate to cover the costs of administering the supervisory unit.

The fee not to be any fixed percent of investment income, but set annually by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to an equitable formula producing funds adequate to cover the costs of administering the supervisory unit.

2. Propose that private foundations be prohibited from financing partisan political activity or lobbying, but be permitted to finance activities, carried on under the auspices of non-partisan educational charitable or scientific organizations, in the area of public service and public affairs.

3. With respect to tax treatment of charitable deductions, the primary recommendations of the Association of American Universities is deletion of the provision which would include appreciation on gifts to colleges and universities in the Limit on Tax Preferences and the Allocation of Deductions. More than half of all private giving of individuals to universities is accounted for by gifts of appreciated property. Public as well as private institutions rely on these gifts.

Other changes are also important such as the elimination of retroactivity on any changed treatment of charitable remainders.

The AAU strongly supports all of the amendments to the House bill proposed on behalf of all higher education by the American Council on Education.

B. Background

1. Private giving is an integral unique and indispensable characteristic of American higher education.

Integral because both public and private institutions depend on private giving.

Unique because no other nation in the world benefits from the advantages of multiple independent sources of income for higher education.

Indispensable because without private gifts the diversity, innovative capacity and ability to adapt that characterize American higher education would be lost. Without private giving, an unhealthy degree of dependence on government support would be inevitable.

2. Both private and public institutions depend heavily on private giving. Of the total of $1.5 billion given to all of higher education in 1967–68, $592 million was given to private and $220 million to State universities.

The 42 members (22 private and 20 public) of the Association of American Universities rely on private giving to an exceptional degree. They receive almost half of all private gifts to higher education.

3. Enactment of the tax bill as passed by the House would result in a sharp decrease in private giving to universities in the immediate future.

4. Over the next decade, the number of students in higher education will increase from about 7 to about 10 million—almost 50 percent. Costs per student will continue to rise despite maximum efforts to increase efficiency.

To avoid an unacceptable decline in quality, total national expenditures on higher education will have to increase over the coming decade from about $18 to about $40 billion each year.

If private giving is to continue to play its proper role, the current $1.5 level will have to rise to well over $3 billion per year.

5. There has been no time in our history when reduced incentives to private giving would seriously impair the capacity of universities to serve the Nation.

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I appreciate the opportunity to express the point of view of the members of the Association of American Universities on some aspects of the proposed Tax Reform Act of 1969 that are of special importance to them. While the views and proposals that appear below are those of the Association, the words in which they are expressed are mine.

This Association, whose members are listed on an attached page, is composed of 22 private and 20 public universities characterized by strong and diverse programs of graduate and professional education, and by undergraduate instruction of high quality. They granted 14,000 doctoral degrees in 1967–68, 62 percent of the national total. Graduate study is the most expensive form of higher education and is because of the more extensive personal contact between students and professors likely to increase in cost most rapidly in the future. They enroll in total almost 200,000 students. They receive more than $1.0 billion per year from the Federal government for the support of academic science—about half of the national total. Their endowments have a current market value of about $5.8 billion—more than half of the national total. (But even this very large sum produces less than 10 percent of the annual operating income of the AAU members. For all private universities total endowment income in only 7 percent of the annual operating revenues, and for all public universities .6%.)[1] They are engaged in expensive large scale innovation and experimentation, as is the case with use of computers. They maintain large and expensive libraries and archives which are simultaneously the working tools of scholars in all fields, the places where the history of our nation and of mankind is recorded, and the indispensable source of information for students. They are deeply involved in the objective study of every major problem faced by our society.

The high cost of performing these critically important functions generates special financial problems for this group of universities. Every one of them is engaged in a desparate effort to secure resources to meet expenses as all costs rise and as new tasks are thrust upon them.

1. TASKS OF UNIVERSITIES

Looking ahead to the tasks that the nation will expect all universities to perform, it is clear that the load upon them will steadily increase. American universities will continue to educate a large proportion of the college undergraduates, and prepare a high proportion of them for advanced professional work. Their professional schools will supply most of the nation's need for engineers in an increasingly technological economy. They will supply the Nation's scientists, physicians, and college and university teachers. They will continue to pioneer on the frontiers of knowledge in all fields. They will be urgently pressed by the Federal, State and local governments to turn their resources increasingly to the diagnosis and solution of social and economic problems. They will properly and inevitably become more and more deeply engaged in seeking solutions to the problems of the cities, of minority groups, of transportation, housing, delivery of health care, environmental pollution, international peace and economic development. Indeed, none of our deepest national problems can be solved without the human resources and knowledge made available by higher education. No matter what changes may occur in the governance of universities, their internal structure, their curricula or other characteristics, they will be called upon to perform all of these tasks for society.

Performance of all these functions will become increasingly costly for the indefinite future. The increase in the numbers of students is paralleled by an inexorably rising cost per student. Added to these will be the rising costs of participation in community affairs which the universities should not and can not shirk. The Carnegie Commission on Higher Education has reduced these factors to dollar estimates. Its forecasts indicate that total institutional expenditures for higher education will increase from $17.2 billion in 1967–68 to $41 billion in 1976–77.[2] The expenditures of major universities will rise even more rapidly, and may well triple over the coming decade. These are staggering cost increases, but failure to meet them would mean an unacceptable deterioration in the quality of higher education in this country.

2. IMPORTANCE OF DIVERSITY

Many of the educational needs of the Nation can not be best met, or met at all, by large universities. Community colleges perform a unique and important function. The smaller liberal arts colleges stress important values and best serve the needs of thousands of young people. State institutions and private institutions each have their unique qualities to contribute to the National needs. This diversity of emphasis, the different mix of purposes, experimentation in different ways of adjusting to the needs of many kinds of student and to widely varying community needs constitute a central strength of our system of higher education. If we are to retain this rich diversity, the high and rising financial needs of all of these types of institutions must be met.

3. NEED FOR FUNDS FROM ALL SOURCES

The financial burden of this entire system is so heavy that steadily rising support will be needed from the federal government, from state governments, from local governments and from all private sources—individual, foundation and corporate. There is no need to explain to this Committee why both the federal government and the states are finding difficulty in providing adequately for higher education. The prospects for the short term are not encouraging. Over the long run, funds from both sources must grow as the economy expands and as needs grow. However, the most likely prospect is for a lag between the emergence of urgent needs and the elevation of levels of governmental support. The need for private giving will become progressively more acute.

4. SIGNIFICANCE OF PRIVATE SUPPORT

Sound public policy calls for a strong effort to expand private support for higher education both now and for the indefinite future. There are two major reasons why private giving is essential.

First, the institutions need the money. The $1.5 billion now supplied by private giving is an indispensable part of the total budget for higher education. It means survival for many institutions, and elevation of standards above mediocrity for others. It provides resources for innovation, experimentation and high levels of excellence for most universities.

The special dependence of the 42 members of the Association of American Universities on private giving is indicated by the fact that they received $560 million in gifts in 1968—43 percent of the total given to 881 institutions.[3] Of the $560 million, $172 million was received from private foundations—55 percent of all foundation funds given to all institutions of higher education in that year.

The private universities, which receive relatively smaller portions of their income (and particularly small parts of their continuing operating revenue for general purposes) from government, are most heavily dependent upon private giving. Most of them would be in desperate circumstances if private giving were seriously impaired. Nevertheless, it should be specifically noted that public as well as private institutions depend upon private giving. Among the members of the AAU, almost 30 percent of all voluntary giving, and of foundation support, is to the public members. In absolute terms the public members of the AAU received $156 million in voluntary gifts, of which $66 million was from private foundations.

The second reason why private giving is essential to the health of higher education relates to the terms and conditions under which the money is made available. Most government support—Federal and State—is given for specific purposes defined in advance for the colleges and universities. These funds are indispensable, but a high degree of earmarking of most government funds for specific uses is inevitable.

Private gifts provide universities with resources that help them to determine their own character and their own priorities. Private gifts are the major source of funds needed to adapt the curriculum to new needs, to explore new forms of university governance, to help with community problems, and to meet unexpected financial emergencies. This source of revenue is particularly important as the volume of government support grows, as it will and should.

As our national expenditures on higher education rise, private giving will have to rise if this source of funds is not to decline in relative significance. The current level of $1.5 billion in private giving will have to exceed $3 billion by the end of the coming decade if its relative role is to be sustained.

In the face of needs for increased private giving to meet part of the rising costs of higher education and in face of the obvious desirability of sustaining diversity in sources of support, the outlook for increases in private giving is clouded by several basic trends.[4] First, the proportion of adjusted gross income of all taxpayers devoted to all forms of charitable giving has actually been declining in recent years and may decline still further. Second, private foundations, after a burst of giving to universities, are not sustaining the earlier rates of growth in giving. Third, competition from other worthy objects of charitable giving—such as urban projects and the performing arts—will probably increase. Fourth, universities have passed through a period of intensified effort to secure increased charitable giving, and further increases will be more difficult.

5. REDUCED INCENTIVES TO PRIVATE GIVING IN THE HOUSE BILL

This is the worst of all possible times to reverse our long standing national policy of providing strong incentives for private philanthropy through the operation of the tax system. The bill as passed by the House will tend to curtail sharply the volume of gifts and grants from private sources to higher education—directly through reducing incentives to individuals to make charitable gifts and indirectly through the proposed tax on foundation income. Accordingly, we urge that the Senate redress the balance by a thorough review of the provisions of the legislation in this light. We urge that it modify or remove provisions of the House bill which most seriously threaten to restrict private giving, and which can be changed without generating inequities, substantially impairing tax revenue, or defeating the main objectives of tax reform.

6. SUPPORT FOR NEEDED TAX REFORMS

We recognize that the desirability of encouraging charitable gifts must be considered in the context of the entire tax system. We are fully in accord with the need for and desirability of tax reform. We agree with the imperative need for greater equity in the distribution of the tax burden, for removing a large list of special tax favors, and for closing loopholes which have permitted many taxpayers to avoid their just share of the tax burden. The case for major reforms is compelling, and I wish to make clear that this testimony is in no way directed against the major thrust of tax reform legislation.

Recognition of the need for tax reform leads us to support a number of proposed changes because they are equitable and sound, even though one consequence of adopting them will be, as a by-product, some reduction of incentives to charitable giving. We agree that taxpayers should not be allowed, in the words of the House report (p. 58), to make "a charitable contribution deduction for a gift of a remainder interest in trust to a charity which is substantially in excess of the amount the charity may ultimately receive." However, in our opinion any abuses that have developed can easily be remedied without destroying the well understood and effective systems that are now operating, and we associate ourselves with the proposals made by the American Council on Education to accomplish this end. We also believe that removal of the unlimited charitable deduction is sound, even though this will adversely affect giving to some institutions of higher education. As another example, we believe that the proposed changed in tax treatment of "bargain sales" is sound in principle. Many of the proposals need perfecting, as, for example, in the important matter of avoiding retroactivity which would create confusion and inequity. We assume that such technical matters can and will be worked out.

7. REDUCED INCENTIVES TO MAKE GIFTS IN THE FORM OF APPRECIATED PROPERTY

We stress, in concert with the position of the American Council on Education, that the central deficiency of the House bill is a set of changes that will reduce incentives to make gifts in the form of appreciated property. In this connection, the importance of gifts of appreciated securities in relation to total private giving to large and small colleges and universities throughout the nation is not generally recognized. In recent years, appreciated securities have constituted over half of the total of gifts. Appended is a table showing the percentages for a number of representative institutions.

Simply stated our two major recommendations on the treatment of gifts of appreciated property are:

(a) For purposes of the limit on tax preferences (Sec. 301), which we consider in principle a sound change in the tax law, the value of appreciation of property should not be counted as a preference item when appreciated property is given as a charitable gift. The reason for this proposal is that charitable gifts, in contrast with every other tax preference item, do not generate income for the taxpayer (as in the case of tax free interest and capital gains) or tax benefits arising out of profit-seeking activities (as in the case of accelerated depreciation and farm losses).

(b) In connection with the new provision for allocation of deductions between taxable and tax free income (Sec. 302), which we also consider sound in principle, charitable gifts should not be considered a personal itemized deduction subject to allocation. All of the other items subject to allocation are involuntary expenses to the taxpayer—interest payments, tax payments, theft and casualty losses, medical expenses, etc. Charitable gifts do not logically fall in this category, because they are discretionary. The taxpayer freely chooses to make a gift or not to make it. They are hence not "expenses" in the sense that the other items are expenses, and a change in tax treatment may therefore adversely affect the decision to make the gift.

The Executive Branch has recommended these two exclusions, which we strongly endorse. These exclusions are the major way through which private giving to universities can be sustained without weakening the general reforms, without producing large losses of revenue, and without introducing inequities among taxpayers. Failure to amend the House bill in this respect will have extremely serious consequences for the entire volume of private giving for higher education, and the repercussions on some private institutions would be crippling.

Other witnesses have emphasized the significance of the two proposals above, and have dealt with other important proposals for changes in the House bill, particularly those provisions which would seriously affect deferred giving. We wish to associate ourselves with the testimony on behalf of all higher education by the American Council on Education.

8. THE ROLE OF PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS AND THE PROPOSED TAX ON FOUNDATION INCOME

Simply in terms of revenue dollars, the foundations are an important source of income for higher education. Their grants to all institutions of higher education totalled $311 million in 1967–68. Of this, $173 million went to the private and $61 million to the public members of the AAU. These funds are a substantial contribution to the revenue of the institutions.

The qualitative contribution of private foundations to universities has been to stimulate innovation, to permit exploration of new areas of inquiry and teaching, to point the way for governmental and other support, to finance new forms of academic organization, and to provide physical resources for new undertakings. This tremendous positive contribution has continued throughout this century, and the nation, as well as universities, is better as a consequence of the role played by foundations.

Our system of medical education was completely revamped in the first two decades of this century through foundation support, and another wave of reform in medical education is now being propelled in substantial part by foundation assistance. Foundations have been one of the catalysts in bringing about innovation in universities. New fields of knowledge have been initially explored with their help. For example, they have taken the lead in stimulating research on the linked questions of population growth and food production. Worldwide beneficial effects, most particularly in stimulating the "green revolution" and widespread programs of family planning, have resulted. Foundation grants in the arts and humanities have helped to redress a serious imbalance generated by concentration of governmental support in the physical and biological sciences. The pioneering efforts which they financed have stimulated governmental and international activities. Finally, foundation gifts have had a strong multiplier effect by stimulating other private gifts, particularly for capital construction.

Turning now to the proposed 7.5 percent tax on the investment income of private foundations, we believe that it should be replaced by the concept of a supervisory fee based on actual costs of supervision.

The report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives did not spell out the reasons for the imposition of this new tax, which represents a startling departure from the well-established policy of exempting the income of private foundations from taxation. The report said merely that: "Your Committee believes that since the benefits of government are available to all, the costs should be borne, at least to some extent, by all of those able to pay. Your committee believes that this is as true for private foundations as it is for taxpayers generally." (p. 19) This sentence is the only reference to the basic justification for imposing the tax, and it does not establish a convincing case on several counts.

First, the tax would in fact fall not on the foundations but on institutions whose vitality depends in large measure on philanthropic gifts. The House bill recognizes the position of these institutions by properly continuing their traditional tax exemption. Yet the full incidence of the proposed foundation tax would fall upon the universities, colleges, schools, churches and other tax exempt beneficiaries of foundations. A reduction of $100 million per year, the estimated yield of the tax, would be a very serious matter for many of these tax exempt organizations.

In this connection, the needs of these organizations are so pressing and the functions which they perform are so vital to society that government would be under strong pressure to replace a large part of the income that would be lost to them by reason of the proposed foundation tax.

Second, the tax is misdirected. The existing law does indeed contain loopholes which have made dubious financial practices possible, and some smaller foundations have apparently taken advantage of these. However, imposition of a general tax on the investment income of foundations would not be an appropriate or effective response. A reduction in the income of all foundations through a general tax would in no way contribute to the removal of any abuses which may exist. The direct and effective way to deal with abuses is to specify what is legal and illegal and to enforce the law.

Third, the bill does not in fact require that all private non-profit organizations pay taxes. The investment income of foundations whose disbursements are solely for educational, charitable, research, and religious purposes would be taxed, but the income of other organizations such as groups of trade and business associations and labor groups would not be taxed. The proposed tax is therefore discriminatory, and paradoxical in that organizations whose avowed and proper reason for existence is to advance the interests of their members are not taxed while those whose function is solely to help others are taxed.

However, we recognize that abuses have existed, and we believe that foundations can properly be required to carry the cost of governmental activities specifically devoted to enforcing whatever limitations on foundation activities may be enacted. We suggest that an annual supervisory fee be collected from foundations to cover these costs. Both the House report and the Executive Branch testimony before this Committee suggest such a solution. Thus the House Ways and Means Committee report stated that: "It is clear that vigorous and extensive administration is needed in order to provide appropriate assurances that private foundations will promptly and properly use their funds for charitable purposes. This tax, then, may be viewed as being in part a user fee." (p. 19) Secretary Kennedy suggested a "supervisory tax" of 2 percent on the investment income of foundations to finance such an operation in the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

We urge modifications in the proposals for change made by the Executive Branch. The first is to define the charge as a fee rather than a tax. We consider the distinction between a fee and a tax to be not only important in principle but as having important practical consequences. A fee is to finance a specific service, and is not a contribution to the general revenues. Second, the amount of the fee should be commensurate with the cost of the service financed by the fee. In contrast, a tax is essentially open ended with no objective criterion for setting its amount.

The fee would have these advantages:

(a) The purpose of the fee would be unambiguous. The illogical and harmful effects of the concept of a tax would be eliminated.

(b) The amount of the fee to be paid by each foundation could be set in an equitable manner and the total amount collected could be related directly to the cost of administering a Bureau of Internal Revenue unit charged specifically with responsibility for ensuring foundations do not abuse the privileges given to them by law.

(c) The amount collected from foundations in fees would surely be very less than the estimated 100 million dollars per year that would be produced by the proposed tax. The adverse effect upon beneficiaries of foundation grants would be markedly reduced.

(d) Foundations would by paying a fee completely finance those activities of government generated specifically by their operations. We suggest that the amount of the fee not be written into law, because the cost of the supervisory unit is not known, and it will change. Adjustment of the fee to cover the cost of the unit would require amendment of the tax law. We suggest that the Secretary of the Treasury be empowered to levy a fee approximating the cost of the supervisory unit, and to determine an equitable means of setting the fee to be paid by each foundation.

9. RESTRICTIONS ON THE SCOPE OF FOUNDATION ACTIVITIES

We wish to call to the attention of the Committee our concern over the provision which would define as a taxable foundation expenditure "any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof . . . other than through making available the results of non-partisan analysis or research." Our concern is sharpened by the further provision which imposes a personal tax on foundation managers equal to 50 percent of the amount of the taxable expenditure.

The savings clause relating to non-partisan analysis or research is obviously intended to permit grantees of foundations to carry on objective academic research and analysis even if their work influences public opinion. However, the meaning of the prohibition itself is so vague and ambiguous, and the penalties on individual foundation managers are so harsh that foundations would be inhibited from making grants in many fields where the participation of academic people in public affairs is urged and expected, but where effects on public opinion are inevitable. Moreover, the saving clause is inadequate because many productive and non-partisan activities of faculty members do not consist literally of "making available the results of non-partisan analysis or research." They lead seminars composed of non-partisan groups of citizens and advise technical groups—for example, non-partisan advisory and study commissions to local, state and national bodies on such matters as environmental pollution, transportation, model legislation on various topics, science policy, agricultural policy, trade policy, community organization, interstate compacts relating to water use and joint administration of facilities. A legitimate and desirable function of these activities is to illuminate public issues and thereby influence public opinion and legislation. Other witnesses will no doubt elaborate upon the difficulties which this proposed provision of law would generate. This testimony concentrates upon the manner in which the clause would deprive the public of the help of competent and sometimes uniquely qualified scholars and experts from the university world on matters of the highest importance.

We recognize the problem generated by foundation financed activities which may have partisan political repercussions. However, we believe that the wording of the proposed amendment of the law goes so far beyond what is required as to threaten legitimate and desirable activities in the public interest. Our suggestion is that the Committee adopt wording which will prevent foundation grants from being used to finance partisan activities and lobbying, but which will permit foundation grants to support non-partisan activities carried on by educational, scientific, and charitable institutions. This approach would appear to forbid the kind of activity which is clearly objectionable. It would allow the kind of productive work cited above.

10. CONCLUSION

Higher education faces grave current financial problems, and the outlook for the future is not bright. Recent federal appropriations for higher education have not been increased in proportion to costs and some have even been reduced. State and municipal budgets are under acute strain. In the face of rising enrollments, costs, and public demands on the resources of universities, amendment of the federal tax law to curtail private giving would convert an already serious situation into an acutely critical one.

We ask that the Senate Committee on Finance recognize the seriousness of these issues and adopt the proposals outlined above in order to maintain incentives to private giving to higher education and to permit private foundations to continue the volume and nature of their indispensable support to higher education.

On behalf of the Association of American Universities, I wish to express appreciation for this opportunity to testify on matters of first importance to higher education. We stand ready to assist the Committee further in any way you desire.

Senator ANDERSON. Mr. Simon.

STATEMENT OF JOHN G. SIMON, PROFESSOR OF LAW, YALE LAW SCHOOL

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, my name is John G. Simon. I am a professor of law at Yale Law School. Although my testimony today grows out of my academic studies of tax policy relating to foundations, for the record I should like to state that I also serve as the president of a foundation, the Taconic Foundation, which is not likely to be affected by the provisions I wish to discuss here today.

Many Members of Congress are concerned by the power of private foundations in the United States. Yet I take the liberty of stating that the tax reform bill as passed by the House would aggravate rather than solve the only potentially troublesome aspect of foundation power.

Let me say first that the power questions one usually hears about are not in my view the really troublesome ones. For example, the foundation's power to control resources should not trouble us. The trust department of one New York bank manages almost as many assets as are held by almost all American foundations, and the 1965 Treasury Report found that the foundations' share of total corporate invested wealth in this country had not increased over the prior 15 years, as compared for example to a great increase in the shares held by pension funds.

Moreover, the data submitted yesterday by Mr. Pifer shows that over the last decade the foundation's share of total national wealth has slightly declined.

With respect to another kind of power, power over decisionmaking processes in the larger society, foundation grants are so tiny in relation to Government expenditures, far less than 1 percent, that the foundations cannot impose their ideas on the Nation.

Foundations can only point out alternative approaches, new options which other institutions are free to accept or reject. Some innovations offered by the foundations such as preschool education for poverty children have been embraced by public institutions. Other ideas have been rejected and have ultimately dropped from sight.

In the last analysis, the people have decided in this world of private charitable enterprise just as the people decide in the world of private commercial enterprise.

I should add that on the whole foundations contribute to a diffusion of power in society by placing in nongovernmental hands the allocation of a fraction of resources that would otherwise be taxed and allocated by the Central Government. But in the world of philanthropy as in the world of commerce, placing decentralized power in nongovernmental hands can become dangerous when there are two few hands. This is the problem which the tax reform bill aggravates. Let me explain.

Altough there are roughly 20,000 private foundations in the country, less than 300 of them have assets exceeding $10 million. In other words, less than 300 have an annual giving capacity of more than approximately $500,000. So it is largely to these 300 foundations that charitable organizations must turn to gain substantial foundation financing for new programs and new ideas.

Moreover, to obtain support in any one area of the country or in any one field of work, for example air pollution, crime control, mental health, one can turn only to a handful of these foundations, for most foundations must specialize to some extent, and in the course of time even the small group of foundations dealing with a particular problem or operating in a particular part of the country will be reduced in size by dissolution or reducing in effectiveness by the onslaught of tired blood.

Accordingly if charities seeking financing are to keep their options open, if they are to have alternative sources of support for experimentation and expansion, new foundations must enter the field from time to time to replace the foundations which have died out or which have become tired out.

In other words, a reasonable birth rate among the larger foundations must be sustained. Here as in the commercial market place it is wise public policy to promote or at least not discourage new entry into the field.

Now, what does the foundation birth rate depend on? Among foundations in the over $10 million class, as my full written statement shows, birth rate depends on the receipt by foundations of property which has appreciated in the donor's hands, and/or property which represents some share of the donor's coorporate control holding. The overwhelming majority of the larger foundations are launched with contributions of property falling into these two categories.

The tax reform bill would heavily discourage the founding of new foundations by discouraging both types of gift, the gift of appreciated property to a foundation, and the gift of corporate controlled stock to a foundation.

First section 201(c) of the bill permits almost all charitable organizations to receive deductions contributions of appreciated property other than tangible personal property without the donor being subject to tax on the long-term capital gain.

The big exception is the private nonoperating foundation. When it receives such property, the donor is taxed, unless the foundation is a conduit organization which redistributes the entire gift within 1 year.

This discrimination against nonoperating foundations will heavily discourage gifts of appreciated property to the larger foundations, in addition to having some overall negative impact on charitable giving.

The House report does not seek to explain this discriminatory provision. It justifies other changes in the appreciated property rules but not this one. The only justification for such a rule must be the belief that it is good to divert gifts away from foundations, even at the cost of some decrease in overall charitable giving.

If this is a good result, it must be because of the power questions I have discussed today, or because of the certain quantitative or qualitative arguments covered in my full statement. I respectfully refer the committee to that statement at page 301 of the committee print.

That statement rebuts any notion that gifts to foundations produce a direct charitable benefit which is either too little or too late, and it suggests also that before the Congress condemns the foundations, either on the ground of quality or on the ground of quantity, it should have the benefit of the forthcoming report of the Peterson commission on foundations and private philanthropy, or some other dispassionate and considered appraisal of the overall record of the foundations.

Now the second provision of the House bill which affects foundation birth rate is proposed code section 4943 which would in effect prevent a foundation from receiving a gift of corporate controlled stock unless the combined voting interests of the foundation and the donor is brought below 20 percent within 5 years. I am not referring to the bill's limitations on a foundation's purchase of business control but only to the restrictions on gifts of business interests.

This restriction on such gifts will make it very difficult or unattractive for a man whose nest egg consists of corporate controlled stock to endow a foundation with that nest egg. It may be difficult because the stock is not readily marketable or it may be unattractive because it will force a sale to strangers or merger with larger competitors or conglomerate owners.

Accordingly this provision like the appreciated property provision will discourage the creation of new foundations, and may also have a negative effect on overall charitable giving.

Now what justification can there be for this provision? The Ways and Means Committee report attributes three evils to foundation ownership of controlled stock. Again time limits require me respectfully to refer the committee to my full statement, where I believe I have demonstrated that one of these three grievances, the alleged diversion of the energies of foundation managers, does not stand up under analysis or in the light of actual foundation experience, and my written statements also explains how two other asserted problems, the inadequacy of income yield and the unfair competitive advantage are satisfactorily cured by the income distribution and self-dealing provisions of this same bill, the tax reform bill, supplemented if necessary by certain fairly simple amendments outlined on pages 8 and 9 of my full statement reprinted at pages 312 and 313 of the committee print.

In other words, the abuses, and they do exist, are correctable without prohibiting a foundation from holding the control stock donated to it. If the committee nevertheless wishes to limit this practice, I suggest that it should at least allow a much longer period for divestiture than the 5 years allowed in this bill.

A long period will mitigate the discouraging impact of this provision on potential foundation donors.

I also commend to the committee the technical amendments that Mr. Mitchell Rogovin advocates in his testimony, which will facilitate the redemption of excess business holdings.

To sum up, because the appreciated property and stock ownership rules I have discussed would substantially reduce the birth rate among larger foundations, which is precisely where in the interests of limiting foundation power a reasonable birth rate is most needed, I respectfully make two suggestions:

First, that this committee refrain from approving an appreciated property rule which discriminates against private operating foundations, and second, that this committee refrain from adopting the stock ownership prohibition, or at least I minimize the deterrent impact of such a prohibition by substantially extending the deadline for divestiture beyond the 5-year period set forth in the House bill.

As these two provisions now stand in the House bill, they are likely to inflict serious damage on our system of private charitable enterprise, for that system as the president of Yale University has recently stated rests on the great importance of giving each new idea a chance to find a sympathetic sponsor by offering it more than one doorbell to ring. Innovation is the essence of progress, independence and variety are the essence of a free society.

Both seem to make it absolutely essential that an idea, a person, an institution not be dependent upon the ability to persuade or to please any single source of support.

I thank you very much.

Senator BENNETT. No questions. This is a very interesting new note in our testimony, and I am very glad to have it.

Mr. SIMON. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for a good statement.

(Mr. Simon's prepared statement and a letter to the chairman from Mr. Simon, regarding the cooperative assistance fund, follows:)

STATEMENT OF JOHN G. SIMON, PROFESSOR OF LAW, YALE UNIVERSITY

SUMMARY

Introduction

Certain provisions of H.R. 13270 are likely to have the unanticipated effect of aggravating rather than solving the questions of "foundation power" which are of concern to many members of Congress.

1. The Birth Rate Problem

a. By permitting decentralization of decision-making, foundations make a major contribution to the democratic process. Yet decentralization into non-governmental hands becomes dangerous if there are too few hands.

b. Over time, many of the 300 existing foundations in the over-$10-million class will be dissolved, leaving only a few of these foundations operating in any one field of activity (e.g., mental health, pollution) or in any one geographical region. This shrinkage will narrow the options available to organizations seeking substantial foundation funds for new ideas and new approaches, unless a reasonable foundation birth-rate is maintained in the over-$10-million category. New entry is desirable here in "private charitable enterprise," as it is in private commercial enterprise, in order to diffuse power.

c. The birth rate of the larger foundations largely depends on contributions to foundations of property which is (a) appreciated and/or (b) represents some part of a donor's corporate control stock.

d. Contributions of both types of property to foundations would be heavily discouraged by H.R. 13270, as outlined in parts 2 and 3, below.

2. The Impact of the Appreciated Property Provision

a. Section 201(c) of H.R. 13270 permits all charitable organizations except private non-operating foundations to receive deductible contributions of appreciated property (other than tangible personal property) without the donor being subject to tax on the long-term capital gain.

b. This discrimination against foundations will heavily discourage gifts of appreciated property to foundations, in addition to having some overall negative impact on charitable giving.

3. The Impact of the Stock Ownership Provision

a. Section 101(b) (new code section 4943) of H.R. 13270 would prevent a foundation from receiving a gift of corporate control stock unless the combined voting interest of the foundation and the donor is brought below 20% within five years.

b. This provision will make it very difficult or unattractive for a man whose nest egg consists of corporate control stock to endow a foundation with that nest egg.

c. Accordingly, this provision, like the appreciated property provision, will discourage the creation of new foundations and may also have a negative effect on overall charitable giving.

d. Of the three specific evils attributed to foundation control of business enterprises in the House Ways and Means Committee report, one does not appear to present a significant problem, and the other two can be cured by application of other provisions of H.R. 13270 and existing law, supplemented if necessary by certain fairly simple amendments.

e. Accordingly, if the stock ownership prohibition—and the appreciated property provision as well—are to be justified, it must be on the ground that there is some positive advantage in diverting charitable giving away from foundations to non-foundation charities.

4. The Arguments in Favor of Diversion

In this section various possible arguments in favor of diverting charitable gifts away from foundations—(a) quantitative arguments, (b) qualitative arguments, and (c) arguments relating to "power" and "non-accountability"—are briefly analyzed and are found to lack logical or empirical support. The suggestion is also made that some of these issues can best be analyzed in the light of the forthcoming findings of the Peterson Commission.

STATEMENT

There is an important relationship between the question of "foundation power," which concerns many members of Congress, and two provisions of H.R. 13270 which prevent private foundations from (a) receiving gifts of appreciated property without the imposition of a tax on the donor and (b) owning corporate control stock. The relationship, however, is not what some of the proponents of these provisions may suppose. For, as I hope to make clear in this statement, these restrictions are calculated to aggravate, rather than solve, any problems which "foundation power" may present.

The Birth Rate Problem

The private charitable foundation represents a uniquely American contribution to the democratic process. Foundations permit us to decentralize and place in private hands the decisions over the allocation of a fraction of the resources that would otherwise be taxed and allocated by the central government. In this way the foundations serve as a counterpart to our free enterprise system, implementing what Judge Learned Hand called the national presupposition that "right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many, this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all."

5. Conclusion

Because the case for diverting charitable giving away from foundations has not been made, and in view of the strong public policy reasons for maintaining a reasonable birth-rate among the larger foundations, it is respectfully suggested that the Committee

(a) refrain from approving an appreciated property rule which discriminates against foundations, and

(b) refrain from adopting the stock ownership prohibition, or at least minimize the deterrent impact of such a prohibition by substantially extending the deadline for divestiture beyond the five-year period set forth in H.R. 13270.

But in the world of philanthropy, as in the world of commerce, placing decentralized power into private hands becomes dangerous when there are too few hands. Although there are roughly 20,000 private foundations in this country, less than 300 of them have assets in excess of $10 million; in other words, less than 300 have an annual giving capacity of more than approximately $500,000. It is largely to these 300 foundations that individuals and organizations must turn to gain substantial foundation financing for new programs and approaches. Moreover, to obtain support in any one field of work (for example air pollution, crime control, mental health), or in any one area of this country, an organization can turn to only a handful of these foundations, for in order to husband their resources, most foundations must specialize to some extent. In the course of time, even the small group of foundations dealing with a particular problem—or operating in a particular geographical region—will be reduced in size by dissolution, or reduced in effectiveness by the onslaught of tired blood. Accordingly, if persons or charities seeking financing are to keep their options open, if they are to have alternative sources of support for experimentation and expansion, the birth rate in the foundation world must be sustained. Here, as in the commercial market place, a decreasing rate of new entry into the field would, over time, leave the remaining foundations with an undesirable degree of power to determine the rate and form of change in the philanthropic part of the private sector.

What determines the birth-rate of foundations in this over-$10-million class? We must look at the kinds of assets with which such foundations are brought into being. We find two types of assets, often overlapping: (a) In his study of "The Investment Policies of Foundations," Professor Ralph L. Nelson reports that "[t]he large endowed foundation receives its initial endowment commonly in the form of assets that the donor has held for a long time"—presumably appreciated assets.[1] (b) Professor Nelson also finds that most of the post-1940 growth in foundation assets has stemmed from contributions of what he calls "donor-related" assets, i.e., common stock in a "company . . . in which the donor was active and through which he had built his fortune." Thus, the 1965 Treasury Report on private foundations tells us that out of 175 foundations which had more than $10 million in assets in 1962, 78—or 45 percent—owned 10 percent or more of a stock of a business corporation. And 45 of the 175 foundations—26 percent of them—owned 20 percent or more of the stock of a business corporation. In a large number of the cases falling between 10 percent and 20 percent, the figure would be over 20 percent if one included the shares owned by the donor and his family. And many of the foundations which do not now wield corporate control or share control with the donor found themselves in such a posture in the years of their infancy.

It follows that a sustained birth rate among foundations in the over-$10-million category depends on the ability of foundations to receive property which (a) has appreciated and/or (b) represents some portion of a donor's corporate control holdings.

Unfortunately, the provisions of H.R. 13270 would heavily discourage donors from contributing either type of property to foundations and would therefore seriously impair the birth-rate of the larger foundations.

The Impact of the Appreciated Property Provision

Section 201(c) of H.R. 13270 (amending code section 170(e) and adding new code section 83) carefully discriminates against foundations with respect to the receipt of appreciated property. Section 201(c) permits most charitable donors to continue to give appreciated property (except for tangible personal property) to charity without paying a tax on the long-term capital gain.[2] But donations to private non-operating foundations, alone among all charitable organizations, are denied this treatment: unless the foundation redistributes the entire contribution within a year (which would prevent the foundation from becoming endowed

[1] Professor Michael Taussig reports that contributions of appreciated property accounted for 39.5% of the value of all charitable gifts made in 1962 by taxpayers with more than $1 million in income—the category in which one would find the creators of foundations in the over-$10-million class. Taussig, "Economic Aspects of the Personal Income Tax Treatment of Charitable Contributons," National Tax Journal, vol. 20, March 1967.

[2] The non-taxability of this gain is, however, circumscribed by section 301 of the bill, imposing a limit on tax preferences, coupled with the allocation of deductions provisions of section 302. But these limitations apply to all charitable gifts of property, whether received by foundations or non-foundations.

or engaging in long-term programs), the gift to the foundation constitutes a taxable event, requiring payment of the capital gains tax on the appreciation.

Obviously, a potential donor will be heavily discouraged from contributing appreciated property to a foundation if the tax treatment of such a gift is dramatically less favorable than the treatment of a gift of the same asset to other charities. In the face of this discriminatory rule, some potential donors, whose main charitable objective is to create a foundation, may simply decline to give the property away at all—in which case neither the Treasury nor philanthropy will receive the appreciated property or any tax on it, except at some remote date and in uncertain amounts. In the case of other donors, the result may be to shift the benefaction to a non-foundation charity, although possibly in a reduced amount reflecting the frustration of the donor's original intentions. Charity as a whole will probably suffer reduced receipts as a result of section 201(c). But for present purposes the more important point is that section 201(c) will very substantially reduce the birth-rate in the world of the larger foundations—which is precisely where, in the interests of diffusing "foundation power," a reasonable birth rate in most needed.

The Impact of the Stock Ownership Provision

Section 101(b) of H.R. 13270, setting forth new code section 4943, would in effect prevent a foundation in the future from receiving a gift of all or any part of a donor's corporate control stock unless the combined voting interest of the foundation and the donor is brought below 20% within five years of the gift. In its impact on the creation of new foundations, this provision is less damaging than the proposals set forth in the 1965 Treasury Report, which would have deferred the donor's deduction until the control situation was terminated. Yet new section 4943 will still make it very difficult or very unattractive for many or most men whose nest egg is a controlling interest in a business enterprise to endow a foundation with that nest egg. A sale by the foundation and/or the donor within five years may not be feasible—or may not be perceived as feasible by the potential donor—either because the stock is not marketable or because the donor may not be able to accept the prospect of a forced sale to strangers or a compulsory merger.[3]

Here, as in the appreciated property situation, the result may be no gift to charity at all, or the donor may simply give the stock to a non-foundation charity which informally promises not to sell it. The resulting impact on the birth rate of foundations in the over-$10-million class will be understood by recalling that almost one-half of all foundations in this category hold what appears to be corporate control stock.

The House Ways and Means Committee explains that section 4943 combats three evils inherent in foundation control of business enterprises. One evil is the "diversion" of the foundations managers' attention to business affairs, "away from their charitable duties." Logically, this point is difficult to understand. A small foundation, without a staff, will be run by members of the family who would, in any event, be spending some of their time on business, some of their time on philanthropy. It is difficult to see why the amount of time devoted to philanthropy would be any less, merely because the family's philanthropic interest (the foundation) happens to be linked to the family's business activity (the controlled corporation). On the other hand, the foundation large enough to have a substantial professional staff will have employees who are spending full time on philanthropy and lay trustees who would not be devoting full time to foundation affairs in any event. Moreover, the diversified portfolio of a non-corporate-controlling foundation may require just as much financial attention as the single predominant investment of a corporate-controlling foundation.

[3] Assuming that the donor does wish to maintain family control over the business without bringing in outsiders, the question of whether the Treasury proposals will deter him from contributing control stock to the foundation will in large part depend on the foundation's chances of achieving the required divestiture without selling to strangers. This possibility, in turn, will be a function of several factors: the extent to which the Treasury will or can interpret the accumulated earnings tax provisions to permit the family corporation to redeem the tainted stock in the foundation's hands (a rather doubtful prospect under current law); the proportionate size of the interest to be redeemed; and the cash position and cash needs of the enterprise that is supposed to be doing the redeeming. In the case of many substantial family corporations—the kind which would form the basis for endowing a foundation in the more than $10-million-dollar asset class—these factors will not indicate favorable odds for redemption, and thus the donor will seek some way of maintaining family hegemony over the enterprise, other than through a foundation.

Finally, logic aside, the roster of corporate-controlling larger foundations contains many names of distinguished foundations (e.g., Danforth, Lilly, Hartford, Irwin-Sweeney-Miller) which go about their charitable work without being "diverted" by the nature of their business holdings.

A second evil is said to lie in the fact that the donors of control stock "in some cases are relatively unconcerned about producing income to be used by the foundation for charitable purposes." This phenomenon, where it is found, can be corrected by a combination of the minimum payout requirements of section 101(b) of the bill (new code section 4942), coupled with vigorous enforcement of the existing tax on accumulated corporate earnings. To give further assurance of productivity, the new law could prohibit or penalize a foundation's retention of corporate-controlled stock unless the annual return on that stock, measured alone, equalled the minimum percentage which, under the payout provision of H.R. 13270, the foundation was required to distribute each year.

The third asserted evil is that, although the controlled company is fully taxed, foundation control gives the company an unfair business advantage in relation to competitors which are not owned by tax-exempt entities. Any such advantage would be substantially reduced if, through the techniques suggested above, foundations were placed under pressure to exact an adequate dividend pay-out from their controlled companies. Moreover, section 101(b) of the bill (new code section 4941) would prevent a foundation from making any loan, on preferential terms or otherwise, to any corporation 35% owned by the donor's family. In the interest of preventing unfair competitive advantage, this provision could be expanded to prohibit a foundation from providing debt or equity financing to a controlled business except (a) through the purchase of its securities from unrelated third parties on a national exchange, or (b) with the approval of the I.R.S. or the state equity court having equity jurisdiction.[4]

Accordingly, a stock-ownership prohibition is not needed to deal with the evils which the House Ways and Means Committee attribute to foundation corporate control. Yet some will find such a prohibition appealing precisely because—to the extent that it does not reduce charitable giving altogether—it will divert gifts from foundations to other charities.[5] This diversion is the same feature that presumably makes the appreciated property provision, discriminating against foundations, attractive to the House Ways and Means Committee. We must look, therefore, at the arguments in favor of a major diversion of charitable contributions away from foundations.

The Argument in Favor of Diversion

1. One argument is quantative. It contends that a dollar donated to a private foundation produces a direct charitable benefit "too little and too late" in comparison to a dollar donated to an operating charitable organization.

a. The "too little" argument presupposes that foundation endowments generate an inadequate yield compared to other charitable endowments. Yet the only comparative data I have seen do not support this premise: the average ordinary income (excluding capital gains) received by 59 large colleges and universities in 1962, as a percentage of assets at market value, was extremely close to the comparable percentage yield for the same year for foundations surveyed in the 1965 Treasury Report (3.87% for the colleges, 3.7% for the foundations). Moreover in the same year (1962), foundations paid out 6.5% of the market value of their assets in charitable grants, or almost twice the ordinary income received. The annual distribution requirement found in H.R. 13270—applicable to private foundations but not to other charities—should

[4] Indeed, most of the problems presented by foundation corporate control are the very types of problems which state equity courts are experienced in handling and for which they have precise enforcement tools, as I have discussed in detail in vol. 1, House Committee on Ways & Means, "Written Statements . . . on Treasury Department Report," 89th Cong. 1st Sess. (1965), pp. 458–462. To do the job well, state courts and state Attorney General need some help from the Federal Government, which I have outlined in the 1965 paper cited above. In the interests of efficient policing and of honoring the principles of federalism in government regulations there is much to be said for the possibility of a state approach to this question.

[5] Note that if corporate control stock is donated to a school or church which informally agrees to hold it and vote it the donor's way, this arrangement is not prohibited by H.R. 13270, and yet the same evils can be found as in the foundation situation—except that there will be no self-dealing or payout rules to assist the I.R.S., for churches and schools are not covered by these rules under existing law or H.R. 13270, and they do not even have to file an annual information return!

b. The "too late" argument presupposes that gifts to foundations typically become part of endowments, emerging only slowly as income grants to operating charities, whereas a gift to a non-foundation charity is immediately deployed for active charitable operations. Yet many gifts to non-foundation charities—especially major gifts of appreciated property—become part of the endowment funds of the college, church, hospital or other recipient organization, either because the donor so prescribes or because of the policies of the recipient charity. A dollar of endowment income given away by a foundation produces a direct public benefit just about as quickly as a dollar of endowment income spent by an operating charity. It is true that a good part of the appreciated assets donated to non-foundation charities are used for current operations rather than endowment, but that is also true for some portion of foundation assets; unfortunately I know of no comparative data on this point. In any event, even if there were data to support the "too late" argument, the dimensions of the problem must be considered in true perspective: in 1962 (the latest year for which I have figures), $450 million were deducted on individual income tax returns for gifts to foundations, as compared to $7.5 billion deducted on individual income tax returns for all charitable contributions—a figure which probably understates the total charitable gifts made by all itemizing and non-itemizing taxpayers.

2. Another argument for diversion is qualitative. Many critics are opposed to some of the ideas and approaches foundations have supported; others simply do not believe the foundations have accomplished very much. On these issues, I respectfully suggest that this Committee could benefit from the forthcoming findings of the Peterson Commission or some other dispassionate appraisal of the overall record of the foundation. A cursory examination of the testimony the House Ways and Means Committee received last February about foundation achievements in the health field alone—resulting in the saving of many millions of lives from such diseases as polio, yellow fever, hookworm and nutritional disorders—should, in my view, cause this Committee to pause before it concludes that foundations are charity's least effective branch and therefore deserve to be the object of tax discrimination.

3. Finally, there are arguments as to the "power" and "non-accountability" of foundations. Once more I take the liberty of suggesting that the Committee await the conclusions of the Peterson Commission on these points, offering at this time only the following brief comments:

a. With respect to overall power to control resources, the S.E.C. reports that as of June 1968 foundations held less than a third as much common and preferred stock as the private non-insured pension funds, and the trust department of one New York bank manages almost as many assets as are held by all American foundations. Moreover, the 1965 Treasury Report on Private Foundations noted that during the period 1950–1963, when the percentage of total corporate invested capital held by the pension funds increased more than seven times, the foundations' percentages did not increase at all.

b. With respect to foundation power over grant recipients, I have already suggested that this is a danger only if the foundation "birth rate" is suppressed so as to foreclose the range of options open to those recipients.

c. With respect to power over the decision-making processes in the larger society, I would submit that because their grant-making powers are quite limited—annual foundation grants account for approximately 10% of total charitable giving and amount to less than one percent of Federal government spending—the foundations cannot impose new ideas or approaches on the nation: they can only point out alternative possibilities in the arts and sciences, or in health, education and welfare, which other institutions are free to accept or reject. Some innovations demonstrated by the foundations—such as multi-stage rockets or pre-school education for poverty children—have been embraced by public institutions. Other innovations have been rejected and have dropped from sight. In the last analysis, the public-at-large decides.

d. The point I have just made also relates to the question of "non-accountability." There is, of course, no lack of accountability with respect to compliance with statutory and fiduciary standards; on these law enforcement issues, foundation managers must account to the appropriate federal and state government agencies, whose power would be increased in important ways by H.R. 13270. Accountability for the wisdom of grant-making decisions is another matter.

If foundation trustees had to seek approval from a large stockholder-like constituency, the foundations would lose some of their special capacity for flexibility and risk-taking. In a larger sense, however, there is a form of accountability: in the long run, as noted above, any foundation must win the approval of the general public for its ideas and experiments if it wishes to see them prevail.

Conclusion

Because the arguments in favor of diverting charitable gifts away from foundations appear to lack logical or empirical support, and because there are strong public policy reasons for maintaining a reasonable birth-rate among the larger foundations, I respectfully suggest that this Committee

a. refrain from approving an appreciated property rule which discriminates against foundations (section 201(c)), and

b. refrain from adopting the stock ownership prohibition (new code section 4943), or at least minimize the deterrent impact of such a prohibition by substantially extending the deadline for divestiture beyond the five-year period set forth in H.R. 13270.

As these two provisions now stand in H.R. 13270, they are likely to inflict serious damage on our system of "private charitable enterprise," for that system, as the President of Yale University has stated,

"Rests . . . on the great importance of giving each new idea a chance to find a sympathetic sponsor by offering it more than one doorbell to ring. Innovation is the essence of progress. Independence and variety are the essence of a free society. Both seem to make it absolutely essential that an idea, a person, an institution not be dependent on the ability to persuade or to please any single source of support."

NOTE.—Although this statement grows out of my academic studies of tax policy relating to philanthropy, for the purposes of full disclosure I should mention that I also serve as the President of the Taconic Foundation, an organization which owns no corporate control stock (alone or in combination with any donor) and which is not likely to receive any such stock or any substantial gifts of appreciated assets in the years to come, and therefore is not likely to be affected by the proposed legislation under discussion in this statement.—J. G. S.

COOPERATIVE ASSISTANCE FUND,
New York, N.Y., September 30, 1969.

Hon. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Committee on Finance,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am writing this letter respectfully to request that the Committee on Finance, in its forthcoming report on H.R. 13270 (the Tax Reform Bill of 1969), explicitly resolve certain questions about the status under the bill of a new charitable organization, the Cooperative Assistance Fund.

The Fund was created in May, 1968 by a number of foundations to combat poverty, prejudice and community deterioration by assisting members of poverty and minority groups to improve their economic condition and also to have access to improved and integrated housing. The Fund will, among its other activities, make investments which have a substantial potential for upgrading the economic and housing opportunities available to such poverty and minority groups. Investment funds will be made available to groups or persons who are not able to obtain the required financing from conventional sources, in cases where the Fund has determined that such an investment will further the charitable objectives of the Fund.

The Fund will receive two types of contributions from the foundations and other charitable organizations which support its work: (a) "grant contributions," i.e., outright gifts which may be used by the Fund either for its investment program or for its other charitable activities, and (b) "investment contributions," i.e., funds which are made available to the Fund for its investment program and which the "investment contributor" may subsequently withdraw in an amount increased or decreased to reflect investment gains or losses. Seven foundations and one national church have decided to participate in the Fund as "grant contributors" or "investment contributors"; other foundations and churches are contemplating participation. One officer from each of these contributing organizations will serve as a Trustee of the Fund along with other Trustees.

The Internal Revenue Service has determined that the Fund is exempt under Section 501(c)(3), in a letter dated January 2, 1969. The letter recites the fact that the Fund, as one of its charitable activities, will make investments of the type described above. (A copy of the determination letter, together with copies of the Fund's charter and by-laws, are enclosed.)*

The Fund will be able to receive support from the various private foundations which wish to finance it only if it is clear to all concerned that "grant contributions" and "investment contributions" made to the Fund by such foundations constitute "qualifying distributions' under the distribution-of-income requirements of new Code Section 4942. It is our understanding that this conclusion is correct for the following reasons, based on the language of subsection (g)(1) of Section 4942:

(a) Such a "grant contribution" or "investment contribution" to the Fund would constitute an "amount paid out to accomplish one or more purposes described in section 170(c)(2)(B)", and an "investment contribution" to the Fund could also be characterized as an "amount paid out to acquire an asset used (or held for use) directly in carrying out one or more of the purposes described in section 170(c)(2)(B)."

(b) Such a contribtuion would not be made to "an organization controlled (directly or indirectly) by one or more disqualified persons (as defined in section 4946) with respect to the foundation" (the foundation making the contribution). As noted above, an officer of each contributing foundation—a "disqualified person" as to that foundation—serves on the Fund's Board of Trustees, but does not "control" the Fund by so serving.

(c) Such a contribution would not be made to a "private foundation which is not an operating foundation (as defined in subsection (j)(3))." The Fund, if it is a private foundation, will be an operating foundation as defined in new Code subsection 4942(j)(3), since "substantially all" of its income will be spent to carry out the investment program or other charitable activities of the Fund, and "substantially more than half" of its assets will be represented by investments made by the Fund to expand economic and housing opportunities for poverty and minority groups in furtherance of the Fund's charitable purposes. Such investments are assets "devoted directly" to the "activities constituting the purpose or function" of the Fund, within the meaning of subsection 4942(j)(3).

If our understanding, as expressed above, agrees with the Committee's understanding, we should be grateful for a clarifying statement to that effect in the portion of the Committee's report dealing with Section 4942. I take the liberty of suggesting that it might read as follows:

"The Committee understands that foundations interested in investing funds in a manner which will promote charitable objectives, such as increasing economic and housing opportunities for members of poverty and minority groups, have adopted the device of forming a separately incorporated fund, qualifying under section 501(c)(3), for the purpose of engaging in such investing, along with other charitable activities, on a coordinated and efficient basis. In the case of one such organization which has been brought to the Committee's attention, the Cooperative Assistance Fund, all or many of the sponsoring foundations have a representative on the board of trustees of the fund, and contributions by the sponsoring foundations to the fund are made either as outright grants, or as 'investment contributions', the income or principal of which may be returnable to the sponsoring foundation under certain conditions. Since the investments of such a fund made in furtherance of its charitable objectives are assets 'devoted directly' to 'activities constituting the purpose of function for which it is organized and operated', such a fund will ordinarily constitute an operating foundation, and grants or 'investment contributions' to such a fund will ordinarily constitute qualifying distributions for purposes of section 4942."

The Committee's consideration of this request is greatly appreciated.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN G. SIMON,
Trustee of Cooperative Assistance Fund.

INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., Jan. 2, 1969.

COOPERATIVE ASSISTANCE FUND,
New York, N.Y.

GENTLEMEN: We have considered your application for exemption from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.

The information submitted shows that you were created by several foundations exempt under section 501(c)(3) to pursue some of their common purposes and programs. Organizations exempt under section 501(c)(3) may become members by making an investment contribution of at least $1,000,000 or an amount equal to 2% of your investment assets, but not less than $100,000, or by making a grant or grants in aggregate amount of not less than $100,000. Organizations making investment contributions may, after 3 years, withdraw their investment plus any proportionate increase in the assets or less any proportionate decrease in the assets.

You were formed for the purpose of combating poverty, prejudice and community deterioration, by assisting members of poverty and minority groups to improve themselves economically, and to have access to improved and integrated housing. You will make investments which present substantial potential for an economic upgrading of the poverty and minority groups involved, through the providing of employment opportunities or otherwise, extending beyond the mere rendering of assistance to the individuals in the enterprise.

You will conduct or support (1) job-training projects in urban and rural poverty areas; (2) educational programs designed to enable members of minority groups to enter fields of entrepreneurship, management, and advantageous employment not generally entered by such persons; (3) promotion of open-occupancy, nondiscriminatory housing; and (4) assistance to low and lower-middle income families in obtaining improved housing.

If conventional sources are unable or unwilling to supply required capital, you will make investments in (1) business enterprises located in urban ghetto areas, or located outside of such areas but owned or operated by or employing significant numbers of minority or poverty groups from urban areas; (2) housing ventures for low-income or lower-middle income groups; (3) housing ventures not limited to low-income or lower-middle income groups but having integration as a major goal; (4) poverty area cooperative farming organizations and other poverty area cooperative organizations in need of credit; (5) other enterprises of an employment-creating nature located in rural poverty areas.

You also expect to make loans or equity-type financial assistance available to individual members of poverty and minority groups who are in need of such assistance in order to start or improve their own businesses or acquire existing ones, and who are unable to obtain required financing from conventional sources. Furthermore you have indicated that in no event will you invest in a large, financially strong, corporate enterprise.

Where it is in furtherance of your objectives, you will invest in or otherwise support other exempt organizations conducting rehabilitation and training programs, churches running community development programs, small business investment companies, local development corporations or development banks formed specifically for the purpose of assisting poverty and minority group individuals, and organizations established to provide credit for poverty area rural cooperative organizations.

In selecting recipients for financial assistance, you will, where possible, work with and rely on recommendations and referrals from, other organizations engaged in rehabilitation and other training programs in which the individuals to be aided have participated. In determining the potential of a particular assistance program for economic upgrading of a poverty area or the minority group, you will consult with organizations conducting research on economic opportunities for poverty and minority groups, and with churches and other section 501(c)(3) or governmental organizations operating antipoverty and anti-discrimination programs.

You do not expect to have material control over the operation of the businesses you aid, but will endeavor to prevent by contract a disposal of any businesses aided by you in a manner which would frustrate your purposes.

On the basis of your purposes and proposed method of operation, as briefly described above, it is our conclusion that you are exempt from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(3).

In this ruling we are not determining whether any of your present or proposed activities is an unrelated trade or business as defined in section 513 of the Code.

Though you have also considered the possibility of making investments in certain businesses to induce them to relocate in ghetto areas to provide necessary goods and services for residents you have advised us that you do not have any immediate plans to engage in this activity. Therefore, until such time as you can submit more information concerning this activity we will not rule on whether it falls within the intendment of section 501(c)(3) of the Code and the Regulations thereunder.

This ruling is based on evidence that your funds are dedicated to the purposes set out in section 501(c)(3). To assure your continued exemption, you should maintain records to show that funds are expended only for those purposes. In cases where the recipient organization is not exempt under section 501(c)(3), detailed records should be kept to show the name and address of each recipient; the amount distributed to each; the purpose for which the distribution was made; the manner in which the recipient was selected and the relationship, if any, between the recipient and members, officers or trustees of your organization. You should also keep adequate records regarding the shareholders, officers and employees of the recipient organization to establish that the purposes for which you were granted exemption are being accomplished. With respect to distributions to intermediary organizations i.e., small business investment corporations and community development banks, adequate records should be maintained to establish that the disbursements by such organization are fulfilling your exempt purposes.

You are not required to file a Form 1120 income tax return, but if you are subject to tax on unrelated business income under section 511 of the Code, you must file Form 990-T. You are not liable for Federal unemployment taxes. You are liable for social security taxes only if you have filed waiver of exemption certificates as provided in the Federal Insurance Contributions Act. (Your District Director, will be glad to tell you more about the latter point.)

You are required to file the annual information return, Form 990-A, on or before the 15th day of the fifth month after the close of your annual accounting period which ends on December 31.

Donors may deduct contributions to you, as provided by section 170 of the Code. Bequests, legacies, devises, transfers, or gifts to you or for your use are deductible for Federal estate and gift tax purposes under sections 2055, 2106, and 2522 of the Code.

If you change your purposes, character, or method of operation, please let your District Director know, so that he may consider the effect on your exempt status. Also, please keep him informed of any changes in your name or address.

We are informing your District Director of this ruling.

Thank you for your cooperation.

Sincerely,

LAWRENCE B. JEROME,
Chief, Exempt Organizations Branch.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Raymond B. Ondov, member of the Hormel Foundation.

I see you have a very interesting volume published here.

STATEMENT OF RAYMOND B. ONDOV, MEMBER, THE HORMEL FOUNDATION

Mr. ONDOV. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I should like to have my full statement printed for the record. May I suggest with regard to the volume which you have in front of you that it be incorporated by reference to the Library of Congress catalog card No. 6628962.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope I can find time to read it. This is a very interesting book. This is about the work of your foundation I am sure.

Mr. ONDOV. It is, and about the work of the company that the foundation controls, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ONDOV. It is a complete history of the first 75 years of the Hormel Co.

I am Raymond B. Ondov, Mr. Chairman, a member of the controlling body of the Hormel Foundation. I am also a resident of the city of Austin, Minn.

This statement is made by the Hormel Foundation in its own behalf.

The foundation is a philanthropic organization incorporated under the laws of the State of Minnesota in 1941 for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, and educational purposes. The foundation is concerned only with section 4943 of the Tax Reform Act.

This diverstiture provision would require the foundation to surrender control of the George A. Hormel & Co.

The foundation presently owns approximately 10 percent of the voting stock of the Hormel Co., but in addition it is the trustee of various Hormel family trusts, which own approximately 47 percent of the voting stock.

The income is paid to various Hormel family members for their lifetime and upon their death the foundation becomes the absolute beneficiary.

Some trusts require that approximately 10 percent of the stock is to be distributed to certain members of the Hormel family upon the death of Mrs. J. C. Hormel, who is now 73 years of age.

Upon the death of the family members, the foundation will then own absolutely 47.817 percent of the stock. The income which is paid to the family members at the present time is fully taxable, and there is no tax avoidance involved.

George A. Hormel & Co. is a member of the meat packing industry and its history is set out in the volume previously referred to entitled "In Quest of Quality."

The company's stock has been listed or traded on 2 major public stock exchanges since sometime prior to 1930. There are 2,380,248 shares of stock outstanding which are owned by over 2,800 stockholders throughout the Nation.

The Foundation has not engaged in any self-dealing. It makes no loans to the company, and there are no competitive advantages which accrue to the benefit of the Hormel Co. because of the ownership by the Foundation.

The Foundation distributes its income on a current basis, and substantially all of its income is distributed for sustaining the programs of the Hormel Institute which is a unit of the graduate school of the University of Minnesota.

The Hormel Foundation was created in the year 1941. The Hormel Institute as a graduate school of the university was created in 1942. The full controlling interests of the Hormel Co.'s stock was given irrevocably to the Hormel Foundation in 1954 upon the death of Mr. Jay C. Hormel.

The Institute, the Hormel Institute receives its financial support not only from the Hormel Foundation but from many other Federal and State agencies. The Foundation has disbursed over $600,000 in excess of the income that it has received to support its charitable endeavors.

During its lifetime it has disbursed over $4.5 million to various educational purposes and to charities. This Foundation makes no gifts or contributions to individuals. It always makes its contributions to other tax-exempt organizations and of course specifically the University of Minnesota.

The founders of the Foundation and of the Hormel Company never served on the Foundation board. The Foundation has never engaged in any speculative trading activities. It has not and does not lend money to anyone. It has no unproductive assets except a very small tract of ground upon which the Hormel Institute is located. It has never attempted to influence legislation nor the results of a public election.

It never engages in financial transactions unrelated to its charitable purposes. It submits all its required reports to the Federal and state authorities including the State of Minnesota and its financial statements are audited.

The Foundation obviously was created primarily for charitable and educational purposes, and I have already alluded to those. The secondary purpose of the Hormel Foundation was to preserve the status, welfare and independence of the people of the city of Austin, Minnesota.

The city of Austin, Minnesota is populated by 28,000 people. It is in a county of 48,000. The area is agricultural. It is a one-industry city, which is completely dependent upon the existence of the Hormel Company in its present location.

The general executive offices of the company and its largest and oldest meat packing plant are located in Austin. The company employs over 5,000 people out of its Austin facilities. The standard of living is high and the home ownership is extremely high because of the economic stability provided by the company's location.

In order to protect this community in which the company was conceived and nurtured and developed, the Hormels vested controlling interest of the company in the Foundation. The Foundation board is composed of 7 members. The articles require that all of these 7 members must have their chief financial interests in the vicinity of Austin, Minn.

It is also required that a majority of them be residents and freeholders of Mower County, Minn., and Mower County is the county seat in which Austin is located.

The bylaws of the Foundation require it to maintain the management in the company and the control which is interested in the purposes of the Foundation and the welfare of the community.

In order to accomplish this, the Foundation is instructed to invest in Hormel Co. stock when money and shares are available.

The present act will completely destroy these purposes.

The founders have been dead for many years. The establishment of control became irrevocable in 1946 when George A. Hormel and his wife died, and in 1954 conclusively when Jay C. Hormel, their son, died.

There is no method available presently to preserve the honorable intentions of Mr. Hormel, his wife and his son. The founders of the company greatly feared a takeover by industry giants, and the resultant calamity to the Foundation and to this community. They established by honorable means a solution for the preservation of their fine ideals.

The present Act provides the avenue of destruction and opens the doors to leave the community destitute. In recent years many members of the meat industry have been taken over and acquired by alien interests. The Hormel Company possesses all of the desired factors making it vulnerable to a take-over.

When such an event occurs we believe that the company's general offices which are located in Austin would be removed from Austin, Minn., and that the plant facilities would be substantially reduced or completely eliminated.

Such a risk is too enormous to take. The impact of such probable actions simply should not have to be faced. There would be public and private chaos caused by the tragic uprooting of families from this location.

This calamity can be avoided without disturbing the purposes and effectiveness of the act. We believe the stockholding limitation could be removed in its entirety. Then enact the remaining restrictive measures which would fully accomplish the objectives of the Congress.

It must be remembered that divestiture provisions will produce no revenue. We agree the abuses should be stopped and we agree with Chairman Long that if flagrant abuses occur you should tax the eyeballs off them, but it is equally obvious that you intend then to tax the eyeballs off the guilty only and not off the innocent. Why then should you order divestiture by the innocent? Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, do not tar us with someone else's sticky brush.

No case has been made to prove that control by a foundation is evil per se. Some argument is advanced that it will be easier to administer foundation law if control is eliminated. The House bill provides revenue for administration, the enlargement of reporting and disclosure rules, the elimination of self-dealing and current income distribution. We fail to see what is gained by divestiture.

The bill in its present form convicts and sentences us along with other meritorious foundations without any trial whatsoever much less even a fair trial, and without any evidence that we are guilty of any violation of any law either moral or legal.

We are even denied any presumption of innocence by its provisions.

Senator Dirksen told me that tax reform should be designed to establish greater equity in the tax laws. I submit to you that equitable principles have never condoned punitive measures against the innocent.

I note in the record an amendment to this tax bill which has been proposed by Senator Miller. This is amendment No. 222, which was presented on October 3, 1969. This amendment will relieve our problem created by the House-passed bill. We believe the amendment, coupled with the other provisions of the House bill, which I have referred to previously, will accomplish the intent and purpose of Congress to eliminate abuses in the tax-exempt foundation area. We support that amendment.

On the other hand, if Senator Miller's amendment fails to meet with your approval, we respectfully request a grandfather clause or exception which would permit our foundation and other meritorious foundations to retain its holdings. The Act presently contains two such exceptions on page 83 of the bill in paragraphs (A) and (B), and it thus recognizes our suggested philosophy.

We respectfully request a similar exception which can be easily drafted for the Hormel Foundation.

We support these exceptions in the House bill, because it is one of the ways by which the House does recognize the benefit of foundations to our society, and that there are foundations worthy of fair and equitable treatment.

I believe it is also an admission by the House that control is not evil per se.

We would respectfully request one further modification in paragraph 5(B) on page 84 of the bill, which would permit a family member to serve not on the foundation board but on the controlled company's board of directors.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ANDERSON. I have been interested in the Hormel Foundation for a long time. At one time some 40 years ago, Mr. Hormel, Sr., went on a trip around the world, and the younger Hormel was placed in charge of it. He came to us and told us that from the profits he went around the world again.

(Mr. Ondov's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF RAYMOND B. ONDOV ON BEHALF OF THE HORMEL FOUNDATION

SUMMARY

1. This statement is made by The Hormal Foundation in its own behalf. The Foundation is a philanthropic organization incorporated under the Laws of the State of Minnesota in December, 1941, for religious, charitable, scientific, literary or educational purposes.

2. The Foundation is concerned only with Section 4943 of H.R. 13270, pages 34 and following. This divestiture provision will require the Foundation to surrender control of the Geo. A. Hormel & Company.

3. The Foundation owns approximately 10 per cent of the voting stock of the Hormel Company, but in addition it is the trustee of various Hormel family trusts which own approximately 47 per cent of the voting stock. Some trusts require that approximately 10 per cent of the stock is to be distributed to certain members of the Hormal family. Upon the death of the family members, the Foundation will own absolutely 47.817 per cent of the stock.

4. Geo. A. Hormel & Company is a member of the meat packing industry. The company's stock has been listed or traded on two major stock exchanges since prior to 1930. There are 2,380,248 shares outstanding which are owned by over 2800 stockholders.

5. The Foundation has not engaged in self-dealing.

6. The Foundation distributes its income on a current basis. Substantially all of its income is distributed for sustaining The Hormel Institute which is a unit of the graduate school of the University of Minnesota. This Institute receives financial support from other federal and state agencies as well as private entities.

The Foundation has disbursed over $600,000.00 more than the income it has received in support of its charitable endeavors.

The Foundation makes no gifts or contributions to individuals.

7. The founders of the Foundation and of the Hormel Company never served on the Foundation board. James C. Hormel, grandson of Geo. A. Hormel and son of Jay C. Hormel, is the only family member to serve on the Hormel Company board of directors and the Foundation board. He resigned August 11, 1969, in order to preserve and protect the Foundation and the City of Austin, Minnesota.

8. The Foundation has never engaged in speculative trading activities.

9. In the first few years of existence the Foundation borrowed small sums on a short term basis to meet its commitments. However, it has been approximately twenty years since the last borrowing was paid. The Foundation has not and does not lend money to anyone.

10. The Foundation has no unproductive assets except a small tract upon which The Hormel Institute is located and another two acres of negligible value.

11. The Foundation has never attempted to influence legislation or a public election.

12. The Foundation never engages in financial transactions unrelated to its charitable purposes.

13. The Foundation submits all required reports to federal and state authorities and its financial statements are audited.

14. The Foundation was created primarily for charitable and educational purposes. It has performed in outstanding fashion with integrity and honor.

15. The City of Austin, Minnesota, is populated by 28,000 people, in a county of 48,000. The area is agricultural. It is a one-industry city completely dependent for its existence upon the Hormal Company. The general executive offices of the company and its largest and oldest meat packing plant are located here. The company employs over 5000 people in its Austin facilities. The standard of living is high and home ownership is extremely high because of the economic stability provided by the company.

In order to protect the community in which the company was conceived, nurtured and developed by the Hormels, the founders vested controlling stock interest in the Foundation.

The Foundation board is composed of seven members, all of whom must have their chief financial interests in the vicinity of Austin, Minnesota, and a majority of whom must be residents and freeholders of Mower County, Minnesota. (Austin is the county seat of Mower County.) The by-laws of the Foundation require it to maintain management in the company and a control which is interested in the purposes of the Foundation and the welfare of the community. In order to accomplish this, the Foundation is instructed to invest in Hormel Company stock when money and shares are available.

The present Act will completely destroy these purposes.

The founders of the company greatly feared a take over by industry giants and the resultant calamity to Foundation and the community. They established by honorable means a solution for the preservation of their fine ideals. The present act provides the avenue of destruction and opens the doors to leave a community destitute.

In recent years many members of the meat industry have been taken over and acquired by alien interests. The Hormel Company possesses all of the desired factors making it vulnerable to a take over. When such event occurs we believe the company's general offices would be removed and the plant facilities substantially reduced or completely eliminated. Who can afford to take such enormous risk? The impact of such probable actions are enormous. There would be public and private chaos caused by the tragic uprooting of families from this location.

The calamity can be avoided without disturbing the purpose and effectiveness of the Act. We believe the stockholding limitation could be removed in its entirety, enact the remaining measures and accomplish the objective.

An alternative would be to provide a "Grandfather Clause" or exception which would permit the Foundation to retain its holdings. The Act presently contains two exceptions on page 83, in paragraphs (A) and (B), and it thus recognizes the suggested philosophy. We respectfully request a similar exception for the Hormel Foundation.

We also respectfully request a modification in paragraph 5 (B), page 84, which would permit a family member to serve on the controlled company's board of directors.

It is our understanding that this Tax Reform Act is designed to establish greater equity in the tax laws; however, the divestiture provisions create a new gross inequity in our case. Equitable principles have never condoned punitive measures against the innocent.

We like not the role of prophets of doom. We prefer to be citizens of a small community with visions of hope and faith in its future.

STATEMENT

1. This statement is made by The Hormel Foundation in its own behalf. The Foundation is a philanthropic organization incorporated under the laws of the State of Minnesota in December, 1941, for religious, charitable, scientific, literary or educational purposes.

2. Principal area of concern.—The principal concern of the Foundation relates to Section 4943 of H.R. 13270 found at pages 34 and following thereof. This section permits a private foundation together with disqualified persons (as defined in Section 4946 on page 47 thereof) to hold a maximum of twenty per cent of the voting stock in an incorporated business. These provisions will force the Foundation to divest itself of a substantial amount of the common stock of Geo. A. Hormel & Company the effect of which will destroy the objects and purposes of the Foundation. Paragraph 6 herein sets forth the detail with regard to this area of concern.

3. Principal source of income.—The Foundation's principal source of income is received in the form of dividends from its principal asset, namely, 239,258 shares of the common stock of Geo. A. Hormel & Company. This stockholding represents 10.052 per cent of the total outstanding common stock of Geo. A. Hormel & Company. (Geo. A. Hormel & Company shall herein be referred to as Hormel Company.)

4. Details of ownership, vested remainder interests and voting rights.—In addition to said shares which are owned outright by the Foundation, it is the trustee of various trusts containing 1,119,016 shares of common stock of the Hormel Company which represents an additional 47.012 per cent of the total outstanding common stock of the Hormel Company. Details relative to these trust holdings is found in Appendix A attached. The Foundation as trustee votes these shares at Hormel Company stockholders' meetings. The life beneficiaries of these various trusts are family members of Jay C. Hormel as explained in Exhibit A. The life income paid these beneficiaries is fully taxable as in any private trust and no income tax avoidance occurs. Upon the death of the family members the Foundation will own absolutely and clear of any restriction 47.817 per cent of the outstanding common stock of the Hormel Company.

Geo. A. Hormel & Company has a total outstanding common stock of 2,380,248 shares. There is no other stock or debentures issued by the Hormel Company. Of this total stock 1,021,974 shares are publicly held and less than 2 per cent is held by directors, officers, and their families. Geo. A. Hormel & Company stock has been listed or traded on the Mid-West and American Stock Exchanges (or their predecessors) continuously since prior to 1930. This company was incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware in 1928. As of a current date the company had 2880 stockholders.

5. Relative to other provisions of H.R. 13270.—The Foundation expresses no concern relative to other provisions of H.R. 13270 mentioned hereafter because:

5. (A) The Foundation has never engaged in any self-dealing practices. (Section 4941, page 17.) The only possible exception might be with regard to the personal home of Jay C. Hormel. The Will of Jay C. Hormel, a substantial contributor to the Hormel Foundation, deceased on August 30, 1954, gave all of his real estate in Mower County, Minnesota, to the Hormel Foundation, including his homestead, subject to the right of his wife and each of his three sons to buy or lease the premises. One of the sons exercised the right to buy a part of the land, including the homestead, paying part cash and the balance on a note secured by a first mortgage. The note and mortgage were paid in full on August 20, 1958. Under the right in the Will, the son leased another part of the land, and then re-leased it to the Hormel Foundation for its continued use by and under agreement with the University of Minnesota.

5. (B)(1) The Foundation has not failed to distribute its income and it consistently distributes its income on a very current basis. (Section 4942, page 25.) The donee or recipient of the most substantial moneys of the Foundation is the University of Minnesota. In less than one year after the incorporation of the Foundation, a formal Agreement was executed between the University of Minnesota and the Foundation for the establishment of The Hormel Institute as a unit of The Graduate School of the University of Minnesota. A copy of this Agreement is attached hereto as Appendix B. The purpose of The Hormel Institute is to promote education and research and this purpose has always been productively followed. The Institute has achieved such an outstanding reputation that today many federal, state and private entities contribute to its programs of education and research. Its current budget exceeds one million dollars a year. In 1967 the Foundation committed itself to provide a minimum of one million dollars to the University of Minnesota for the programs of The Hormel Institute. At the present time the unpaid portion of this committment is $800,000.00.

5. (B) (2) From the date of its incorporation until November 30, 1968, the total income of the Foundation is equal to $4,055,803.32. For this same period administrative expenses have totalled $43,465.66. During this same period the Foundation has disbursed the total of $4,633,510.77 to promote the educational and scientific projects of The Hormel Institute and in contributions to other tax exempt charitable, educational, religious and scientific organizations. Consequently, it can be seen that these Foundation disbursements have far exceeded its total income and that its administrative expenses are negligible. It should be noted here that the total remuneration to each of the controlling members of the Foundation has never exceeded the amount of $25.00 per meeting and generally has not exceeded the sum of $300.00 per year. The Foundation never makes a gift or contribution to any individual nor to any entity which is not tax exempt. For instance, the Foundation has made and is making contributions to the National Merit Scholarship Program and is committed to make contributions to this program over the next four years estimated at $70,725.00. Examples of other recipients of contributions are shown on Appendix C attached hereto. Additional information relative to The Hormel Institute is contained in Appendix D attached hereto.

5. (C) (1) At no time did Geo. A. Hormel who founded Geo. A. Hormel & Company nor any member of his family ever serve on the board of The Hormel Foundation. At no time did his son Jay C. Hormel nor any member of his family ever serve on the board of The Hormel Foundation, except his son James C. Hormel who became a member of the board on August 15, 1966 and resigned on August 11, 1969, for the reasons hereinafter set forth.

5. (C) (2) Since the death of Jay C. Hormel on August 30, 1954, no member of the families of either Geo. A. Hormel or Jay C. Hormel have served as an officer or director of Geo. A. Hormel & Company except James C. Hormel who became a member of the board of directors on February 15, 1960, and resigned on August 11, 1969, for the reasons hereinafter set forth.

5. (D) (1) The Foundation has never made investments which would jeopardize its charitable purposes nor in any way engage in speculative trading activities. (Section 4944, page 42) All cash received by the Foundation has been invested in government securities or in nominal purchases of common stock of Geo. A. Hormel & Company. The Foundation has never sold any of the Hormel Company stock. The Foundation has received shares of stock of other companies which it has retained in its portfolio.

5. (D) (2) The Foundation has never borrowed money from anyone nor has it ever loaned any money to anyone, except in the minor instances shown in Appendix H.

5. (D) (3) The Foundation has no unproductive assets except the small tract of real estate upon which The Hormel Institute is located and another tract of real estate of approximately two acres which has a negligible value.

5. (E) The Foundation has never expended any money for those items classified as "taxable expenditures" in Section 4945, page 43. It has never attempted to influence legislation or to influence the outcome of any public election. It has never made a grant to an individual for any purpose.

5. (F) The Foundation has never engaged in any financial transactions unrelated to its charitable purposes nor has it ever had any unrelated business income.

5. (G) The Foundation has always made all required reports to federal and state agencies. It maintains meticulous records of all of its activities and its financial statements have been audited by Ernst & Ernst.

6. Details of Principal Area of Concern.—

6. (A) The Hormel Foundation is managed by seven members whose names and titles are found in Appendix E. As previously stated, no Hormel has ever been involved in the management of the Foundation except James C. Hormel. Appendix E also contains the names of the board of directors of Geo. A. Hormel & Company.

6. (B) The assets of the Foundation are shown in Appendix F. The Foundation is a relatively small one. Substantially all of the Foundation's assets were given to it by three people, namely, Geo. A. Hormel, founder of Geo. A. Hormel & Company; his wife, Lillian B. Hormel; and their son, Jay C. Hormel. The details of the Foundation's ownership of stock and its ultimate ownership of Hormel Company stock have previously been recited.

6.(C) It is apparent that the primary purpose for establishing The Hormel Foundation was philanthropic. Geo. A. Hormel and Jay C. Hormel were very remarkable men. Both were imbued with a spirit of loyalty and dedication to reinvest in the betterment and welfare of their employees, the community of Austin, Minnesota, and our society in general.

Because of the philosophies of Geo. A. Hormel and Jay C. Hormel, the company has been a leader in establishing generous programs for the welfare of its employees including the guaranteed annual wage, production pay, profit sharing and the like.

The establishment of the Foundation and The Hormel Institute were additional evidences of the Hormels' generosity and desire to help and improve the less fortunate and our society.

6.(D). The Foundation's record proves that it has truly fulfilled the role which Congress intended when tax exemption was granted. The Foundation's management does not neglect their charitable duties. On the contrary, the Foundation's record establishes the imaginative and productive talent and energy contributed to its programs. Furthermore, there is not and cannot be any suggestion made that the corporate business is run in such a way that it unfairly competes with other businesses whose owners must pay taxes on the income they realize. It is not guilty of any of the abuses which have recently received notoriety. In spite of this good record, the divestiture provisions of the tax reform bill will cause great and severe hardship to the Foundation's objectives.

6.(E) Submitted with this statement is a recently published book entitled "In Quest of Quality" authored by Richard Dougherty. This book is an excellent history of Hormel's first 75 years. A brief scanning of the index and the book's pages will reveal more about the people of the Hormel Company, the City of Austin and the phenomenal growth of the Hormel Company than anything this statement could establish. This is the company upon which the stability of the Foundation has been and is based. This is the outstanding company upon which the Foundation relies to meet its commitments and to accomplish its charitable and educational objectives. If the Foundation is forced to divest itself of the substantial stockholdings in this company, it must then reinvest the assets which it owns and those which it holds as trustee. This involves unnecessary risk, speculation and expense. Neither the Foundation nor the trust beneficiaries should be forced to face these unknown elements.

6.(F)(1) A secondary, yet extremely important purpose of the Foundation is to hold and return the controlling stock interest in the Hormel Company for the benefit of those communities in which the company has established plants or processing facilities. This is particularly true of Austin, Minnesota. Geo. A. Hormel and Jay C. Hormel and members of their respective families had and have an intense loyalty to this community.

It is here they lived, their families were born and raised and its is here they are buried. It is here that Geo. A. Hormel & Company was conceived, born, nurtured and developed.

6.(F)(2) Austin, Minnesota, is a county seat community of 28,000 people, situated in a county of 48,000 people in the Southeastern part of the State. It is ten miles from the Iowa border and one hundred miles from Minneapolis-St. Paul. The surrounding area is agricultural. Rochester is fifty miles to the Northeast. Austin and Rochester are the two largest cities lying South of the Twin Cities. Austin is classified as a one-industry city because its entire economy is dependent on the Hormel Company. The general executive offices and the company's largest and oldest meat packing plant are located here. The company employs over 5,000 people in Austin. The standard of living is high and home ownership extremely high because of the economic stability of the company.

6.(F)(3) The Hormels felt a tremendous obligation to protect and preserve this community which they had fostered and which was solely dependent for its continued existence on the company they had created. The Hormel Foundation was an available and convenient entity for this purpose and they thus placed this honorable and awesome responsibility upon the Foundation's management. To accomplish this great purpose, the Hormels developed a plan whereby the Foundation would presently hold and ultimately own a controlling stock in the company. The method used has been previously set forth. Evidence of this objective is found in the Articles of Incorporation and By-Laws of the Foundation. Article III states:

"The membership of this corporation shall be composed of not less than five nor more than fifteen members, one-third of whom shall be competent business men, one of whom must be an experienced attorney-at-law, all of whom shall be persons whose chief financial interests shall be within the City of Austin and vicinity, of Mower County, Minnesota, and a majority must be residents and freeholders of said county . . ."

Section VII of the By-Laws states:

"As the income of the Hormel Foundation consists almost wholly of dividends on shares of stock of Hormel Inc., a Minnesota corporation, and Geo. A. Hormel & Co., a Deleware corporation, the ability of the Hormel Foundation to carry on the purposes for which it was organized depends upon maintaining for those corporations a management and control which is sound and which is interested in the purposes of this Foundation and the welfare of this community. In order to maintain such control, investments of The Hormel Foundation on its own behalf, or as trustee, should be in shares of stock of the above Companies whenever additional shares are available, and otherwise should be in liquid investments so that the Foundation may be in a position to purchase such additional shares whenever they may become available."

Certainly there should be nothing but praise and commendation for the high principles of such a plan and purpose. There was not, nor is any evil in using the Foundation as the means to fulfill this objective. If the Hormels had any suspicion that Congress would one day attempt to nullify and destroy this means, they would have prescribed another method. Jay C. Hormel died on August 30, 1954, and this plan became irrevocable. Geo. A. Hormel and his wife died in 1946. If Congress forces divestiture upon the Foundation, there is no way to preserve the intentions of the Hormels to protect this community.

6.(F)(4) The Hormels had a great fear that a giant in industry would swallow their well-run, profitable company which would result in disaster to this community. In this day of conglomerate takeover, this is no idle fear. In recent years the meat packing industry has been the target of numerous takeovers. Wilson & Company was acquired by Ling-Temco-Vought. John Morrell & Co. was acquired by A M K. Cudahy is controlled by U. S. Smelting. Hygrade has been acquired. International Packers was acquired by Deltec International, Bryan Bros. by Consolidated Foods and Nat. Buring by Holiday Inns. Armour & Co. had substantial interests acquired by General Host and Greyhound. Swift & Co. and others have been approached for similar purposes. The Hormel Company has not been overlooked. For some years last past and periodically to date the company has been investigated by acquisition minded corporations or groups. However, because the Foundation holds voting control of the company no further action is taken. The Hormel Company would be particularly vulnerable to takeover. In the May–June 1969 issue of Harvard Business Review, page 93, appears an article entitled "Is Your Company a Takeover Target". The article contains formula indicator for self evaluation. The factors included are liquidity, debt position, price/earnings ratio and earnings stability. It says, "Emperical evidence suggests that there is cause for management concern when a company's total score approaches 50, or when any two factors score above the danger line." When we use the formula and table provided, the Hormel Company's score is 78, or well above the 50 mark, and in addition, three factors score above the danger line. (See computation in Appendix G.)

Furthermore, the Hormel Company is more profitable than other companies in the industry. For example, the ratio between its pre-tax earnings and its assets for 1968 is 17.55 per cent as compared with the following:

	Percent
Iowa Beef Packers	16.42
Wilson & Co	12.21
Armour	8.37
Swift	3.64
Cudahy	11.82

The Hormel Company's balance sheet indicates that it could develop additional debt leverage.

A small percentage of stock is owned by officers and directors and their families.

The liquidity of the company is well known. Fortune magazine listed it as one of a group of cash-rich companies. At year-end 1968 the company had $25 million in cash and government securities out of total assets of $108 million. A takeover of the Hormel Company by alien interests is inevitable. With new management also comes changes in scope and purpose together with the tragic loss of long-standing identity and fulfillment of long and well established purposes and ideals.

6.(F)(5) The Foundation has great fear of such a disaster, its implications and consequences. This fear is not for itself, but rather to this fine community and area. A takeover would undoubtedly result in the removal of the company's general offices from Austin, Minnesota, together with either a substantial reduction of operations in the Austin plant or a complete elimination of this plant location. The impact of such potential actions are enormous. The entire economy of this community and much of this area of Minnesota is dependent on the operations of the company here. There would be public and private chaos caused by the tragic uprooting of families from this location. Small communities across the nation search diligently for methods of gaining new jobs to stabilize their economic structure. Austin has an outstanding history of stability. However, the proposed unnecessary action of the Tax Reform Bill will frustrate and destroy the secure sanctity of thousands of homes and the obliteration of purposeful ideals.

6.(F)(6) The Foundation believes that this calamity can be avoided without jeopardizing either the substance or effect of the Tax Reform provisions. It appears that the committee could eliminate the stockholding limitation entirely, enact the other measures which are in the bill and accomplish the desired objective.

On the other hand, by the simple expedient of a "Grandfather Clause" the chaotic results can be avoided. H.R. 13270, page 83, contains such a clause in paragraphs (A) and (B). Therefore, we see that the House of Representatives has approved and recognized the merit and philosophy of such a clause in two specific situations. However, neither of these exceptions will protect our Foundation or community. The Foundation respectfully requests a third exception be added which would not require The Hormel Foundation to divest itself of Geo. A. Hormel & Company stock.

6.(F)(7) In the Tax Reform Bill, under the title Subchapter F–Exempt Organizations, page 84, paragraph 5(B) is a provision prohibiting a family member from serving on a Foundation board or the board of directors of a controlled corporation. James C. Hormel, grandson of Geo. A. Hormel and son of Jay C. Hormel has been serving on the Foundation board and the board of directors of the Hormel Company. Upon becoming advised of said restriction, Mr. Hormel submitted his resignation from both boards on August 11, 1969, effective immediately. Mr. Hormel had gained the respect of the members of both boards for his integrity and able contributions. With profound regret his resignations were accepted. He resigned his positions in the same spirit and with the same loyalty which motivated his grandfather and father to establish the Foundation, namely, that the charitable purposes of the Foundation pre-empt personal prestige and desires, and that nothing should jeopardize the welfare or economy of our small community which Hormels are responsible for creating, developing and sustaining. We respectfully request a change in this section which would permit a family member to serve on the controlled corporation's board.

7. Judgment should be based on performance.—

7.(A) We submit that the record of the Foundation is free of all of the evils which are sought to be eliminated by the Tax Reform Bill, and this fine record will continue without any danger of such evils even though the Foundation continues to hold controlling interest in the Hormel Company.

Furthermore, the fact that some members of the Board of Directors of the Hormel Company also serve on the Foundation board has not in any way had an adverse effect on the income available to the Foundation from dividends. The dividend record establishes this. Another safeguard is the fact that there are over 2800 other stockholders of the Hormel Company, all of whom are the normal investors seeking adequate returns on their investments.

7. (B) There are no tax avoidance schemes involved nor is there any loss of public tax revenues by reason of the Foundation's control.

7. (C) The impressive and productive use of the Foundation's income proves that its primary purposes have not been restricted or limited by reason of the control of a commercial enterprise.

Finally, there is no competitive advantage possessed or used by the Foundation or the Hormel Company over other industries or businesses.

8. Conclusion.—The matters submitted herein established that the divestiture provision of the Tax Reform Bill should not be enacted into law; on the other hand if the provision is retained, then appropriate exceptions should be enacted which would not require The Hormel Foundation to divest itself of its controlling stock interest in the Hormel Company and also permit a Hormel Family member to serve on the Hormel Company board of directors.

It is our understanding that the Tax Reform Act of 1969 is designed to establish greater equity in the tax laws. Equitable principles have never condoned punitive measures against the innocent. The gross inequity heaped upon The Hormel Foundation can be remedied without disturbing this Act's effectiveness and purpose. We respectfully request relief from the extreme hardships imposed by the Act in order to preserve our community and the home of Hormel.

APPENDIX A

THE HORMEL FOUNDATION

(A) The Foundation, as trustee of a charitable trust created under the Last Will and Testament of Geo. A. Hormel who died on June 5, 1946, holds 23,646 shares or .993 per cent of the total outstanding common stock. All moneys received are used for charitable and educational purposes.

(B) The Foundation, as trustee of Jay C. Hormel Trust No. 1 (which is an inter vivos trust created by Jay C. Hormel on July 16, 1934), and as trustee of Jay C. Hormel Trusts Nos. 101, 102, 103, 201, 202, 203, 301, 302 and 303 (which are inter vivos trusts created by Jay C. Hormel on December 26, 1950) holds 810,138 shares or 34.036 per cent of the total outstanding common stock. Jay C. Hormel died on August 30, 1954. The income from these trusts is payable to the wife and descendants of Jay C. Hormel for life and such income is fully taxable when received by the beneficiaries as in the case of any other private trusts. There is absolutely no tax avoidance. Upon the death of said wife and descendants all of said stock becomes the absolute property of The Hormel Foundation.

(C) The Foundation, as trustee of Geo. A. Hormel Trusts Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6 (which are inter vivos trusts created by Geo. A. Hormel on October 20, 1934) holds 18,480 shares, and as trustee of a trust created under the Last Will and Testament of Jay C. Hormel, holds 22,846 shares, or a total of 41,326 shares or 1.736 per cent of the total outstanding common stock. The income from these Geo. A. Hormel trusts is payable to the wife and sons of Jay C. Hormel for life; the income from this Jay C. Hormel trust is payable to a sister-in-law of Jay C. Hormel for her life; the income is fully taxable when received by the beneficiaries as in the case of any other private trusts. There is absolutely no tax avoidance. Upon the death of said beneficiaries, all of said stock becomes the absolute property of the Hormel Foundation.

(D) Upon the deaths of the above-mentioned life income beneficiaries the Foundation will own absolutely 1,090,722 shares or 45.924 per cent of the total outstanding stock of the Hormel Company, plus it will hold as trustee of the charitable trust referred to in paragraph (A) above 23,646 shares or .993 per cent of the total outstanding stock for a combined total of 1,114,368 shares or 46.817 per cent of the total outstanding stock.

(E) The Foundation as trustee of Geo. A. Hormel Trusts Nos. 13 and 14, which are inter vivos trusts created on December 23, 1943, and Lillian B. Hormel Trusts Nos. 1 and 2 which are inter vivos trusts created on February 19, 1946, and the trust created under the Last Will and Testament of Lillian B. Hormel dated February 19, 1946, holds 243,906 shares or 10.247 per cent of the total outstanding common stock of the Hormel Company. The life beneficiary of these trusts is Germaine D. Hormel, widow of Jay C. Hormel. Upon her death the total stock will be distributed to the descendants of Jay C. Hormel. These trusts are fully taxable. The Foundation will receive no ownership in these shares.

APPENDIX B

MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE HORMEL FOUNDATION AND UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA ESTABLISHING THE HORMEL INSTITUTE, AUSTIN, MINN., AS A UNIT OF THE GRADUATE SCHOOL, UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

Memorandum of Agreement between The Hormel Foundation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota, for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, and educational purposes, with its principal office in Mower

33-865 O—69—pt. 6——42

County, Minnesota, hereinafter called the Foundation, and Regents of the University of Minnesota, a constitutional educational corporation of the State of Minnesota having its principal office of business at Minneapolis, Hennepin County, Minnesota, hereinafter called the University.

Whereas, the Foundation now possesses certain income-producing securities and expects from time to time to receive additional income-bearing securities and real and personal property, particularly the home property of Jay C. Hormel, including his residence and adjacent buildings and certain land now devoted to forestry and agricultural purposes, the income from which securities and the use of part of which real property is now, and when acquired will become wholly available for educational research, and charitable purposes, and

Whereas, the Foundation, in pursuing the purposes for which it was organized, desires that under the auspices of the University, it shall devote a portion of such income and real property to the promotion of education and research in plant, animal and poultry production and utilization, including the relation of animal products to disease and the treatment of disease, animal and poultry diseases, food technology, nutrition, tree culture, and wood technology, and principles and techniques of management in relation thereto, and such other subjects as may be mutually agreed upon, and

Whereas the University organized for education and research is likewise interested in the promotion of research and education in the above mentioned fields,

Now, therefore, this agreement made this 30th day of November, 1942,

Witnesseth:

1. The University agrees to establish the Hormel Institute of the University of Minnesota as a unit of the Graduate School of the University (hereinafter called the Institute).

2. The University agrees to utilize said Institute to promote education and research in plant and animal production and utilization, including the relation of animal products to disease and the treatment of disease, animal and poultry diseases, food technology, nutrition, tree culture, and wood technology, and principles and techniques of management in relation thereto, and such other subjects as may be mutually agreed upon.

3. The University agrees that the Institute shall be under the general supervision of a board of five members recommended by the President of the University and approved by the Regents, to be nominated as follows: one from the Hormel Foundation upon nomination by that Foundation; one from the Mayo Foundation upon nomination by the Director of that Foundation; and three from the University upon nomination by the Dean of the Graduate School, at least one of which shall be from the Department of Agriculture; and that the Institute shall be under the immediate supervision of an executive director to be recommended by the Institute Board and approved by the President of the University and the Regents.

4. Amended as follows:

The Foundation agrees to make available to the Institute for the duration of this contract the woodland and other grounds, buildings and facilities on the property of Jay C. Hormel now or hereafter designated for the purposes of this Agreement, together with rights of ingress and egress.

The Foundation agrees to improve the Austin laboratory facilities so far as available funds therefor may permit through the acquisition and ownership of heavy expensive or fixed equipment and to provide on a reimbursable basis certain supplies for research projects carried on in the Austin laboratories.

The University agrees at the close of each Institute project conducted in the Austin laboratories to give the Foundation the first opportunity to purchase on an appraisal basis equipment and supplies purchased from Institute funds, and further agrees to return equipment or surplus supplies not purchased by the Foundation to the University campus.

In witness whereof the Foundation and the University have caused this Amendment to Agreement to be signed and sealed this 27th day of May, 1944.

5. The Foundation agrees to advise the University on or before April 1 of each year of the amount of funds which shall be available for the purposes of the Institute for the ensuing fiscal year from July 1 to June 30 and to turn over such funds to the University on or before July 1 or at such other times as may mutually be agreed upon.

6. It is mutually agreed and understood that the Regents may accept gifts, grants, and donations from other sources in support of the purposes of the Institute.

7. It is mutually agreed and understood that the University reserves the right to publish the results of investigations of the Institute, such publication, however, shall give proper credit to the Foundation for the cooperative character of the investigations.

8. It is mutually agreed and understood that the main research and educational activities of the Institute shall be in Mower County, Minnesota, but that research and education may be carried on in Olmstead County, Minnesota and on the campuses of the University of Minnesota and elsewhere in the State of Minnesota if it shall appear desirable in the judgment of the Hormel Institute Board to do so.

9. It is mutually agreed and understood that, unless otherwise agreed to at the time the funds are made available, any patents, discoveries and inventions resulting from research financed by funds either from the Foundation or from other sources shall be the property of the University and held by it as trustee to promote education and research. The University is obligated to grant non-exclusive licenses to utilize such patents, discoveries and inventions upon equal terms to qualified American manufacturers unless it is the judgment of the University that the public interest in the development and use of the patent is better served by some other form of license. It is empowered to grant free licenses to the United States or any municipal subdivisions thereof. For the duration of this agreement, any income from such licenses shall be used to expand and extend the usefulness of the Institute.

10. It is mutually agreed and understood that the foundation at its option may with the consent of the University, transfer to the University any or all of its assets, real or personal, which are needed, used, or constitute a source of funds for the support of the Institute.

11. It is mutually agreed and understood that either party to this agreement may terminate this agreement on any July 1 provided the party desiring termination notifies the other party by registered mail on or before January 1 of that year.

In witness whereof the Foundation and the University have caused this agreement to be signed and sealed this 30th day of November, 1942.

Appendix D

The Hormel Institute, University of Minnesota, Austin, Minn.

The purpose of The Hormel Institute is to promote research and education in various fields of biological science. It was established, in 1942, as a unit of the Graduate School of the University of Minnesota, by an agreement made between The Hormel Foundation[1] and the Board of Regents of the University.

The activities of The Hormel Institute are supervised by a Board of Directors.[2] The executive director, Dr. Walter O. Lundberg, professor of biochemistry, is responsible to this Board in administering the Institute's research activities and internal business operations. The assistant director is Dr. H. Schlenk, professor of biochemistry.

Presently, the Institute staff numbers 92; 23 members hold academic rank and the remainder hold civil service rank in the University. The Institute's research programs are conducted in several organizationally-independent sections. Each section is under the leadership of an academic staff member. Current research efforts are concerned almost entirely with lipids, and many research projects are carried on by two or more sections in collaboration.

The Institute shares only to a minor extent in the funds designated by the State of Minnesota for use by the University and, therefore, must obtain almost all of its support from outside sources. Its annual budget is somewhat in excess of $1,000,000. In addition to the support provided by The Hormel Foundation other agencies that recently have supported or are currently supporting research programs of The Hormel Institute are:

Abbott Laboratories.
American Heart Association.
Life Insurance Medical Research Fund.
Minnesota Heart Association.
National Council to Combat Blindness, Inc.
National Dairy Council.
Oscar Mayer Foundation.

Huntting, Board of Members, The Hormel Foundation; LaVell Henderson, Department of Biochemistry, St. Paul, U. of M.; David E. Donald, The Mayo Graduate School of Medicine, Rochester.

Special Dairy Industry Board.
U.S. Army Quartermaster Food & Container Institute.
U.S. Department of Agriculture, Eastern Regional Division.
U.S. Department of Interior, Fish & Wildlife Service.
U.S. Public Health Service, National Institutes of Health: Division of Environmental Health Sciences, National Cancer Institute, National Heart Institute, National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Disease, National Institute of Arthritis and Metabolic Diseases.

The Institute does not have a formal graduate program leading to advanced degrees. However, graduate students of the University of Minnesota, as well as from foreign universities, have done and are doing their thesis work at the Institute. Such arrangements are facilitated by the fact that Institute section leaders hold appointments with departments of the University, including the Department of Biochemistry, College of Biological Sciences, St. Paul; the Department of Biochemistry and Department of Microbiology, College of Medical Sciences, and the Department of Animal Science, Institute of Agriculture. Teaching responsibilities of staff members of the Institute within the University's regular curricula are limited. The principal educational function of the Institute involves post doctoral research fellows and visiting scientists. The former gain experience in planning and in working on research projects under the guidance of the Institute's section leaders. Visiting scientists, from the United States and, more often, from foreign countries, come to the Hormel Institute for periods varying from several days to several years. Their purpose in working in these laboratories is to acquaint themselves with specific techniques employed here, and to acquire training for work which they will later perform in their own laboratories.

As a result of these training programs, collaboration frequently develops between the Institute and other departments of the University of Minnesota, as well as with research groups in other sections of the United States and in foreign countries. The Institute gains from this broad exchange of research ideas and experience. Regular seminars with guest speakers are held at the Institute and serve the same purpose.

SUMMARY OF RESEARCH INTERESTS

Dr. W. O. Lundberg: Institute director. Participates in several programs, with particular interest at present in interconversion of polyunsaturated fatty acids, blood coagulation, atherosclerosis, and other chemical and biochemical aspects of lipid science.

Dr. H. Schlenk: Analysis, preparation and chemical reactions of unsaturated fatty acids; preparation of polyenoic radioactive fatty acids. Gas-liquid and other type chromatography; methods for structure identification. Fish, plants, microorganisms and rats are sources and substrates in studies of: odd-numbered polyenoic fatty acids and their metabolism; phenolic fatty acids (anacardic acids) and their effect on microorganisms; wax esters, their biosynthesis and metabolism.

Cycloamyloses (Schardinger cyclodextrins): their chemical reactions, association and complex formation with other molecules, including enzymes.

Dr. R. T. Holman: Physical properties and physical methods of analysis of lipids. Separation methods for fatty acids by various types of chromatography, applied also to glycerides and other lipid components.

Development of near-infrared spectrophotometry; study of other optical methods, including ultraviolet absorption and optical activity. Mass spectrometry of lipids, especially derivatives of fatty acids and glycerides. Gas chromatography-mass spectrometry combination analysis; pyrolysis as a means of determining structure.

Programs on metabolism of polyunsaturated fatty acids and requirements for essential fatty acids, carried out mainly with rats, but oriented also to medical aspects of humans.

Studies of enzymatic conversions of polyunsaturated acids, specificity of enzymes for polyunsaturated acid structures, chain elongation and dehydrogenation of fatty acids.

Dr. J. R. Chipault: Deterioration of lipids, autoxidative deterioration in foods and in living tissues; autoxidation of complex lipids (phospholipids, lipoproteins); secondary reactions of oxidized lipids with other tissue components, particularly proteins, amino acids and other compounds with amino groups.

Effects of radiations on lipids; influence of lipids on the action of radiations on important components of tissues (enzymes, vitamins).

Nature of fecal lipids and their origin; intestinal lipids of normal and germ-free animals.

Infrared spectroscopy of lipids.

Dr. O. S. Privett: Methods for analysis of lipid classes and molecular species within the classes, particularly triglycerides and phospholipids. Preparation and isolation of polyunsaturated fatty acids, with emphasis on improvement of techniques for distillation, crystallization and chromatography. Ozonization of lipids and study of fatty acid ozonides as organic intermediates.

Metabolism of trans acids and their influence on tissue lipid composition. Studies on metabolism of plant lipids, particularly the changes of lipids with maturation of seeds.

Dr. H. K. Mangold: Chemical synthesis of unusual lipids; physical and chemical characterization of lipids isolated from plant, animal and human tissues. Relation between structure and function of individual lipid compounds; molecular pathology.

Dr. E. G. Hill: Nutrition studies, using miniature pigs and chicks. Lipid metabolism in connection with atherosclerosis. Experimental production of atherosclerosis in miniature pigs; metabolism of bile salts and cholesterol in pigs and chicks. Effects of methionine on lipid metabolism. Polyunsaturated fatty acids in blood and tissue lipids. Provides Germ-Free and Specific Pathogen-Free baby pigs for research work for the Institute staff and other Departments of the University.

Dr. H. M. Jenkin: Studies on biochemical, biological and immunological properties of various purified microorganisms including psittacosis-trachoma agents, leptospira, arboviruses and rickettsiae, cultivated in embryonated eggs or tissue cultures. Comparative studies of lipid components present in normal and infected host cells and in different strains of the same group of microorganisms, for further investigation of lipid metabolism and its relation to infectious diseases.

Development of cell culture systems in defined medium for radioisotopic metabolism studies of normal and infected cells. Essentiality of a variety of fatty acids and their positional isomers on growth of microorganisms and their hosts. Applications of thin-layer, column and gas chromatography, light and electron microscopy, radioisotopic tracers and serology are utilized in these studies.

Dr. H. H. O. Schmid: Development and use of methods for the isolation and analysis of lipids; thermoanalytical technique. Detection, isolation and structure determination of minor lipid constituents, especially in relation to plasmalogen metabolism. Biosynthesis and metabolism of complex lipids in heart muscle.

Dr. W. J. Baumann: Chemical synthesis of lipids; chemistry and biochemistry of alkoxylipids and naturally-occurring diol lipids; chemistry of glycolipids; structure of unusual lipid constituents. Novel separation techniques and spectroscopic methods of lipid characterization and analysis. Biophysics of complex lipids.

Dr. E. M. Stearns: Studies on the biosynthesis in interconversions of fatty acids and complex lipids in higher plants, principally by use of isotopically-labeled precursors and intermediates. Isolation and purification of enzyme systems for lipid transformation from germinating and maturing seeds of higher plants.

OTHER ACTIVITIES AT THE INSTITUTE

Development of a miniature pig for research purposes: Dr. W. E. Rempel (with the collaboration of Dr. Almut Dettmers), Department of Animal Science, University of Minnesota; Development of a miniature pig for use as an experimental animal for medical and nutritional research. Study of effectiveness of selection for small size in two separate lines of pigs under identical conditions. Estimation of genetic parameters, such as: Heritability of body weight, genetic correlations among weights at different ages and litter size, efficiency of feed consumption and its correlation with growth rate, prediction of progress and limits of selection. Conduct crosses of pigs from the above two lines to study heterosis. Obtain fundamental information on genetics in swine, particularly mode of inheritance of body size.

Hormel Institute Lipids Preparation Laboratory

Dr. O. S. Brivett and J. D. Nadenicek: Highly purified fatty acids and their derivatives are prepared which are not generally available from commercial producers. Presently, more than 150 compounds are on the distribution list of "The Hormel Institute Lipids Preparation Laboratory" and requests for these materials are received from all parts of the world. Mixtures of pure compounds are prepared for use as analytical standards as well as general research purposes. Research is being carried out toward further expansion of this project, particularly in the preparation of lipid classes and polyunsaturated fatty acids in ultra-high purity for quantitative gas-liquid and thin-layer chromatography. The project is a non-profit public service to research institutions.

Production of educational movies for laboratories involved in lipid research. Two films on microanalylitical techniques for lipids have been distributed widely; a third film is in preparation on techniques for the determination of the structure of unsaturated fatty acids via ozonolysis methods.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE INSTITUTE

1942—Hormel Institute established (November 30).

1943—Work began on Minneapolis Campus.

1944—Hormel Institute laboratory opened in Austin; 6 employees in first year (share a building with horses and cows).

1949—Dedication of laboratory building; about 25 employees (last large animal displaced from laboratory building). Completion of the new swine barn.

1953—Additional laboratory opened (chickens displaced).

1960—Dedication of another laboratory building, at a different site; 52 employees.

1965—Construction of mass spectrometry laboratory.

1968—Expansion and renovation of the microbiology section. Staff of the Institute consists of 12 permanent academic appointees, 67 civil service people, 11 research fellows and 2 graduate students, 12 part-time employees (mostly students). Some 13 countries are represented on the staff personnel at The Hormel Institute.

GEO. A. HORMEL & CO., VULNERABILITY TO TAKEOVER

HARVARD BUSINESS REVIEW, MAY–JUNE 1969

The entitled article appeared in the Harvard Business Review to provide an objective measurement to vulnerability to take-over. Page 94 states that "Empirical evidence suggests that there is cause for management concern when a company's total score approaches 50, or when any two factors score above the danger line." Hormel's score, using the table on Page 95, is 78, well in excess of 50, and three factors score above the danger line.

Our computations are as follows:

LIQUIDITY—PERCENTAGE OF WORKING CAPITAL TO TOTAL ASSETS

	Amount	Percent
Working capital	$40, 497, 197	37.0
Total assets	108, 484, 480

DEBT POSITION—LONG-TERM DEBT AS A PERCENTAGE OF NET WORTH

Long-term debt	$3, 006, 000	4.0
Net worth	70, 220, 170

PRICE/EARNINGS RATIO—ANNUAL EARNINGS PER SHARE DIVIDED TO PER-SHARE MARKET PRICE

Price	$36.00	9.4
1968 earnings per share	3.84

EARNINGS STABILITY, PERCENTAGE GROWTH IN EARNINGS, PAST 3 YEARS[1]

	1965	1966	1967	1968
Earnings (in thousands)	$4,351	$3,511	$8,658	$9,134

Senator BENNETT. I have no questions except to ask when do these people leave to go around the world?

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you very much.

Mr. Hackler is our next witness.

We shall be glad to hear from you now, sir.

STATEMENT OF EUGENE T. HACKLER, VICE PRESIDENT, AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF HOMES FOR THE AGING, AND TREASURER, EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN GOOD SAMARITAN SOCIETY; ACCOMPANIED BY THOMAS M. JENKINS, IMMEDIATE PAST PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF HOMES FOR THE AGING; AND JOHN RALSTON, TAX COUNSEL

Mr. HACKLER. I have with me the past president of the association, Tom Jenkins, and John Ralston, tax counsel from my office.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am Eugene Hackler. I live in Kansas. I am representing today, however, the American Association of Homes for the Aging, the national nonprofit Association of Voluntary Denominational and Governmental Homes for the Aging and Nursing Homes with their executive offices in New York.

We represent in that association about a half million residents. The other organization I am appearing for as treasurer is the Lutheran Good Samaritan Society of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., a corporation of Lutherans operating 10,000 beds in 18 States made up of about 130 nursing homes for the aging, three hospitals and a home for delinquent boys.

The society is an old institution having been organized in 1922. Now what I will speak about deals primarily with the small community exempt-type organization.

These associations believe that the tax reform that closes loopholes and removes tax shelters needs reforming, but a distinction needs to be made between tax reform, closing loopholes and operating charitable giving. We do not oppose in the area of private foundations and charitable organizations the provisions regarding the taxation of debt finance businesses or as they are commonly called the Claybourne provisions of the regulations.

We are not opposed to unrelated operating business income tax nor tax on income for advertisement in trade journals.

Genuine charitable giving, however, should not be lumped together with foundation abuses. Charitable exemption is made for the unselfish benefit of others, and should be we believe more clearly defined.

We would suggest these improvements in the Tax Reform Act of 1969. Nonprofit nursing homes and homes for the aging should be specifically exempted as hospitals are in the House bill. We think these institutions should be put in this same category as hospitals. That would be a specific exemption under the provisions of 170(b) (1) (b), as hospitals appear to be in the House bill.

These subacute institutions, namely nursing homes and homes for the aging appear to us to be one of the major resources for the relief of the high medical costs we now find in hospitals. Nursing homes where medical care is needed can provide very similar services to the aging people of this country at from one-half to two-thirds less dollars than hospitals.

If we are to reconstruct the health delivery system in this country, we should encourage these type institutions. We need more institutions like these than we now have.

We further think that there should not be an appreciation in the value of the gifts of donors to these nursing homes and homes for aging. This exemption was granted to the hospitals in the House bill, so it would seem to us that anyone wanting to give charitable health dollars away for tax reasons would certainly favor hospitals over nursing homes or homes for the aging.

For the reasons just stated, these subacute kinds of institutions certainly need encouraging. Let me cite an example.

In the report of the executive director of the Lutheran Good Samaritan Society in August of 1969 he said that 12 new locations for homes were developed by the society, wherein all the land was given, and an additional $854,000 was contributed. This permitted the society to build nursing homes in 12 locations that would not otherwise have been built.

With this kind of contribution, funds then could be borrowed to build these new homes. In addition $135,000 in gifts were made for adding six expansion units in institutions already established, a total of nearly $990,000 was given to the society in the 12 months preceding August 1969 plus land permitting the building of 1,485 new nursing home beds.

These expansions would not have been possible in most instances without these gifts. Certainly the land would not have been so easily available in these 12 locations, had they not been able to give land at its current market value, and take a deduction for that value, even though they paid less for it when they bought it.

We are concerned also on the tax on undistributed investment income. We think this is beginning to destroy the idea of tax exemption for the operating charity and is a bad precedent of the tax exemption preserves and strengthens the idea of people volunteering to do something unselfishly for others that have special needs, and is a good balance for the private sector as opposed to the growth and dictates of government in the areas.

Once the idea is lost that tax exemption is not legitimate, and any kind of tax is imposed upon charitable income, whether it be a supervision fee of 2 percent or a 7½-percent tax, there will it seems to me be a progression of tax impositions that will eventually remove the tax exemption idea entirely.

Now tax exemption or tax benefit by giving to charity has been a part of English and American law since about 1536.

It might be interesting to note also that when this tax is imposed in the States that have conformity income tax statutes that there will be very likely a similar tax in the States as well as on the Federal tax return. In many States tax exemption for al valorem taxes is based upon a requirement that there be a Federal tax exemption. In addition, in the practical trying of these cases, very few judges grant exemptions to State ad valorem tax requests unless there is a Federal exemption. So this is a serious problem to the nursing homes in more ways than just a tax that is imposed by this statute.

If there must be a tax now on investment income as an alternative, there must be further provision and clarification of what may be set aside without being taxable for such things as life service contracts where we agree to take care of people for life, for reserves for improving services, for progressive and realistic upgrading of professional standards, for replacement costs, for the expansion of facilities, and for working capital reserves.

In the further area of the valuation of land and the distribution of investment assets when there is no 5 percent income produced, or the divestment provisions, we think you have developed in the House bill a very difficult administrative problem in permitting the Treasurer to evaluate the investment assets frequently as may be appropriate.

This is not so difficult when you are talking about assets on a major stock exchange, but it is difficult when you talk about land evaluations in the Midwest, where farms or where often closely held corporate stock is in the portfolio, or other assets that are sometimes owned. Evaluation and judgment on the value of a particular piece of real estate can vary greatly, as anyone who has practiced condemnation law knows, by the presentation of the low and high value experts under oath in the same case.

I would think that there should be a limitation of evaluation by the Treasury, perhaps not oftener than every 5 years or an acceptance of the assessed valuation of real estate by the local assessment officer, whether he be county treasurer or county assessor.

I want to speak next about small organizations within an operating exempt corporation. It seems to me that we should have reporting from the principal corporation under the 990(a) report most of us are now using. Most of these institutions, however, have small auxiliary units like ladies' aid auxiliaries, organizations of young people as Candy Stripers, other missionary groups such as the Gray Ladies who it seems would be required to report if they raised any charitable money. Our homes and institutions should not be spending a good deal of the charitable dollars for accounting and legal services to justify these reports. This would be pulling charitable dollars from their intended purposes, and where they are already badly in short supply.

The next area that concerns our association is the political activities of operating charities. We think it needs to be clarified.

Our institutions it would seem to us should not be restricted in their fight to interpret to legislators or to others their patients' or their constituents' needs or to advocate any cause for the elderly or the ill. It would be my suggestions that there be a specific enumeration of nonpermissible activities, and it seems to me that after these hearings you might have a very comprehensive list that should be included or could be included in the act.

I think, of course, that there should be included a specific prohibition against helping a specific candidate, being involved in partisan political activity, or granting funds for voter registration or other political activities in a single candidate area which are now causing grave concern to some people.

But we in our institutions need flexibility to improve patient standards for the ill and aging, for ad valorem tax problems in States throughout the country, for defining of licensure requirements of administrators, where nearly all of the standards are developed in political arenas.

In summary, we believe that the excellent intent of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 for the reduction of tax inequities are desirable, but they should be obtained without including provisions harmful to volunteerism and philanthropy in this proposal. Gifts to charities are life loans for human needs and are quite different and should be treated differently from tax shelter problems.

It might be well to repeat that society can best be served by encouraging gifts to charities and not by eliminating them. We need to appeal to people to render the best they have for mankind. Some of this is exemplified by charitable gifts. In fact, the best justification for Government relieving religious, educational and charitable activities from taxes is that Government wishes to encourage these activities as representing the highest and noblest achievements of mankind.

Thank you very much for listening to me, and as a final statement may I say that both of these associations stand ready to assist the committee at any time where our experience and consultation would be helpful or desirable.

Thank you, gentlemen.

(Mr. Hackler's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF EUGENE T. HACKLER REPRESENTING THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF HOMES FOR THE AGING, NEW YORK, N.Y., EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN GOOD SAMARITAN SOCIETY, SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK.

SUMMARY

1. Long term care institutions and homes for the aging should be specifically exempt—170(b)(1)(B).
2. Long term care institutions and homes for the aging should be exempt on any appreciation in value of gifts of donors.
3. We are opposed to any tax on undistributed investment income.
4. Political activities should permit interpretation to legislators of the needs of the ill and elderly or for advocating a cause for the elderly.
5. In the distribution of investment assets, the evaluation of real estate as frequently as "may be appropriate" needs thought and care.
6. Disclosure from auxiliaries, ladies aids or other small organizations should be eliminated.

We stand ready to assist this committee at any time where our experience and consultation would seem helpful.

STATEMENT

I am Eugene T. Hackler, an attorney of Olathe, Kansas. I appear today on behalf of the American Association of Homes for the Aging, of which I am a vice-president, and for the Ev. Lutheran Good Samaritan Society, of which I am Treasurer.

The American Association of Homes for the Aging is a national membership organization of non-profit, voluntary and governmental homes for the aging across the country, including all denominational groups. Our homes care for about one-half million people. The Association was founded in 1961 with a grant from the Ford Foundation. AAHA has been concerned with solving problems of common concern to its 1,000 member homes as well as to those dedicated to serving the institutional needs of our nation's elderly. My particular concern has been with problems relating to tax exemption.

The Evangelical Lutheran Good Samaritan Society is a non-profit, religious corporation with headquarters in Sioux Falls, South Dakota. The Society operates 130 institutions in 18 states, primarily nursing homes but several hospitals, a home for delinquent boys, providing in all over 10,000 beds. The Society was organized in 1922.

Although this testimony is technically offered on behalf of these two organizations, I am, in reality, speaking not only for the one-half million people we care for in our homes but for most of the elderly people in the country who are confronted with the burdens of illness, aging and often money.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969 is, in my judgment, long overdue. The organizations which I represent do agree with much of the Bill. We are not opposed to—

1. The elimination of the exemption in areas of debt financed business, which we often refer to as the Clay-Brown provision, and
2. The exemption on unrelated business income, and
3. We think that interest, rents and royalties from controlled corporations and income from advertising and trade journals may be taxable.

We think the Bill can be improved in the following areas:

I. LONG TERM CARE INSTITUTIONS AND HOMES FOR THE AGING SHOULD BE SPECIFICALLY EXEMPT

The long term care institutions and homes for the aging should be specifically exempted by their inclusion as a 170(b)(1)(B) type exempt organization, the same as hospitals are to be exempted.

II. GIFTS OF APPRECIATED PROPERTY

Our members think that long term care institutions and homes for the aging should be exempt on any appreciation in value of gifts of donors to long term care institutions and homes for the aging. The present value of property that has increased in price since purchase should be deducted in full when given to our institutions with no payment of capital gains tax and without taxing the increase in value. This kind of giving is a major source of charitable contributions and if exemptions are given to some institutions and not others, it will channel the money in that direction to the detriment to our long term care institutions and homes for the aging, unless we are included in the exemption. In 1938 a House bill to tax gain on gifts of appreciated property was rejected by the Senate Finance Committee which eliminated this provision because "The Committee believes that charitable gifts generally are to be encouraged."

III. TAXING LONG TERM CARE INSTITUTIONS AND HOMES FOR THE AGING

We believe that the 7½% tax on undistributed investment income, or even 2% as suggested by Secretary Kennedy, should be eliminated for long term care institutions and homes for the aging. If we tax at all in this area, we will be setting a precedent for increased taxation as experience indicates that once we start taxing in an area, it is apt to be increased. If there must be a tax for administration purposes, it should not be applied against reserves for continuation of services (life care contract obligations) and reserves for improved services, expansion, replacement and working capital.

IV. POLITICAL ACTIVITIES

The political activities prohibition section of the Bill should be further clarified, as we believe that long term care institutions and homes for aging should not be restricted in their right to interpret to legislators their constituents' needs or to advocate a cause for the elderly. We should be permitted to work with legislators or voters on such matters as licensure of administrators, state and local ad valorem tax exemption, as well as standards of care for the ill and aging. Perhaps this is the intent of the Bill but it would seem to me to need clarification. Supporting a specific candidate or contributing funds to a political campaign should be prohibited. Charitable assets are not properly used for these purposes but they should be used to improve the conditions of our ill and aging.

V. DISTRIBUTION OF INVESTMENT ASSETS

We are also concerned about that portion of the Bill which provides that to avoid tax, private foundations must distribute income currently but not less than 5% of investment assets. The Bill imposes graduated sanctions in the event of failure to distribute. The specific concern (if private foundations are to be taxed) is that assets will be evaluated as frequently "as may be appropriate" with the exception that the assets that can be easily evaluated are to be evaluated on a monthly basis. Evaluation of non-charitable assets will present a specific administration problem when you deal with the appraisal of real estate. In the Mid-west it is not unusual for charitable institutions to own farms or other real estate which might, on occasion, not produce a minimum pay-out of 5%. In these cases the Treasury Department and the taxpayer may have a real dispute as to the value of the investment. Appraising or judging the value of real estate can be most difficult. Though it needs to be done, a provision should be made limiting this appraisal so that taxpayers will not be burdened with the cost of preparing and spending money each year for expert evaluations of real estate. Having worked considerably in the field of condemnation, the evaluation of real estate can vary considerably between witnesses and recognized experts in the field. Although the courts can settle this matter, it is a difficult burden to place upon the taxpayer both time-wise and in the use of charitable dollars defending its evaluation. A judgment factor such as this needs considerable thought and care.

VI. DISCLOSURE

The Bill proposes to extend present disclosure requirements to all tax-exempt organizations with penalties for non-filing. Our concern is not disclosure by our present 990A form but clarification should be made so that every institution having auxiliaries, ladies aids or other similar small organizations should not have to report. This would take some charities additional dollars in administration.

Reasons and arguments

We believe that the excellent intent of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 for reduction of tax inequities can be obtained without including provisions harmful to volunteerism and philanthropy in their proposals. Charitable contribution should not be lumped with oil depletion, real estate depreciation and the like. Charitable gifts are not a "loophole". They are for the benefit of others, not the taxpayer. Charitable contributions should be treated quite differently from tax shelters. Gifts to charities are lifelines for human needs.

Both of the organizations I represent today are made up of homes that are "operating" charities, rather than "grant-making" type charities. These institutions are serving the ill and the aged and provide most of their funds from the residents they serve, with wide support from churches and interested citizens. Although most of them are church-related corporations, they would have difficulty in being identified as "a church" as provided in 170(b)(1)(B). If tax exemption for gifts to these institutions is eliminated, either because the institutions are no longer exempt or because the donors can give money with greater benefits to the taxpayer when making gifts to hospitals, then two major problems of this nation will increase—

(1) Increased medical cost for the aging. For those elderly people needing medical services, we find that the cost in homes for the aging and long term care institutions ranges from approximately one-third to one-half of the cost of hospitals. The nation already is concerned about the high cost of medical care for the aging. We presently need more institutions to care for the aged population.

In the work of the Ev. Lutheran Good Samaritan Society we find that most of our contributions come for the development of a new institution, in the form of donated land and money. The Tax Reform Act, if not amended, would seriously jeopardize the establishment of new institutions for us. During the last year we received nearly one million dollars, in that corporation alone, in cash contributions and approximately one-quarter million dollars in gifts of land for the development of new institutions. We can also learn to resolve the high cost of medical care problems in caring for the aging in sub-acute care institutions for use in the care of our economically deprived people in sub-acute care institutions. Sub-acute care institutions and neighborhood clinical settings can reduce high costs because sophisticated equipment is not needed. This appears to be one of the goals of the comprehensive health care planning package passed by Congress about a year ago and now getting underway in our major cities across the country. We must learn to better use the health dollar in the United States.

2. Higher cost to the elderly. If payment of taxes on investment income or the erosion of our tax exemption develops, then the costs to our residents will increase. This will be the natural result if our institutions are to survive. This will be placing an unusually heavy burden upon our aging population. This will also increase the cost of government as the care of about 54% of the people in long term care institutions and homes for aging is now being paid for by private foundations.

In conclusion, I think we should ask ourselves if society can best be served by encouraging gifts to charities or eliminating them. Isn't it time we appealed to the best in mankind? The best justification for government in relieving religious, educational and charitable activities from taxes is that government wishes to encourage these activities as representing the highest and noblest achievements of mankind.

Respectfully submitted,

EUGENE T. HACKLER.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, may I take a moment?

Senator GORE. Yes; indeed.

Mr. JENKINS. I am Thomas M. Jenkins appearing with Mr. Hackler. My comments will be very brief.

I am the past president of the American Association of Homes for the Aging, and my concerns here today relate to this area of long-term care facilities for the aging.

I know that this committee is aware that something in the neighborhood of 80 percent of all the facilities built in the long-term care field in the United States in the last 20 years has been under the auspices of these nonprofit organizations, mostly church oriented by the major church organizations in the United States.

In the San Francisco Bay area alone I am aware of something in the neighborhood of $70 million in construction costs alone which have been contributed to this field of the aging, the care of the aging in the past 10 years, and when that is multiplied by the other facilities throughout the country, this means literally hundreds of millions of dollars of nontax moneys which have been contributed to this care of the aging field.

It is my real concern that the Tax Reform Act as presently structured will be the death-knell of these facilities. It will severely restrict the existing ones, and it is my feeling it will simply prohibit the building of new ones.

I would comment then only on two particulars. One relates to the area of the definition of private foundations. At least as I read the act, most of the facilities that we represent throughout the United States could be classified as a private foundation.

If they have received endowments over a period of time, which they are now relying upon to take care of people in the lower economic strata, they will have only one choice, and that is to cease giving aid to the very people who need that aid. This can happen in many of the facilities that I am personally aware of, even in such facilities as those sponsored by the Catholic charities, the Little Sisters of the Poor, who would normally be classified by all of those on all congressional committees as the one entitled to charitable exemption. Yet as the act is presently structured, I think they would fall within the provisions of private foundations and be subject to all the restrictions of the act.

Secondly, I think that there is a problem mentioned by Mr. Hackler on this whole area of property taxation within the 50 States. Many jurisdictions, and California is one of them, requires that you have a 501(c)(3) exemption in order to qualify for property tax exemption within that State.

Under the definitions of private foundations which are now contained in the bill, that exemption would be lost. They would lose their property tax exemption, and we conservatively estimate that in California alone each resident of a home for the aging, and there are many thousands, would be required to pay $30 per month per resident in taxes to the State of California. This again could have but one result, that is that the facilities would be unable to care for the very people that they were built for, for the very people who are the objective of these charitable institutions.

We are firmly convinced that this is not the intent of the Congress, and that this is not what was meant by the House when it passed the Tax Reform Act.

We seriously urge that that be amended, and particularly then that homes for the aging receive as a needed service the classification of exempt organizations as is done for hospitals.

One final comment. The restrictions on "political activity" which is contained in the House bill, the American Association has appeared before this committee, has appeared before many other committees of the Congress as well as before many houses of legislative bodies in the various States.

Thousands of hours of time worth literally millions of dollars have been spent by well-motivated people to assist the Congress, the legislative bodies of the various States, and various State and Federal agencies in developing guidelines, in preparing rules and regulations that relate to the care of the aging. This has been particularly true since medicare.

It is our feeling that as presently structured, the House bill would prohibit this kind of volunteer activity and contribution which is sorely needed by those in the legislative field. And so in summary, Mr. Chairman, we strongly urge that there be more serious consideration given of these two areas, in order to preserve that which many years ago, as long as 1835, de Tocqueville when he traveled throughout the United States said was a characteristic unique of the American Government, and that is this participation by the voluntary segment of our society in caring for its fellow man.

Thank you.

Senator GORE. The next witness is Mr. Mitchell Rogovin.

STATEMENT OF MITCHELL ROGOVIN, THE LOUIS AND HENRIETTA BLAUSTEIN FOUNDATIONS, INC.

Mr. ROGOVIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Mitchell Rogovin. I am a partner in the law firm of Arnold & Porter. As a matter of background I perhaps should say that I was formerly Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Tax Division of the Department of Justice and Chief Counsel of the Internal Revenue Service. While I helped to formulate some of the positions in H.R. 13270, I do not believe there is any conflict in my representation of the Louis and Henrietta Blaustein Foundation.

I would like to limit my testimony to some modest suggestions that are geared to making the stock ownership provisions more workable.

As you know, section 4943 of the bill limits to 20 percent the combined ownership of a corporation's voting stock held by a foundation and those who, under very broad rules of attribution, are referred to as "disqualified persons."

To the extent that the foundation is deemed to own more than 20 percent of the voting stock, this excess business holding must be disposed of within 10 years. The Treasury and the House seem to believe that a foundation that holds more than 20 percent of the voting stock will become preoccupied with "the business of business" rather than that of philanthropy.

Much is to be said for prohibiting foundations from engaging in the business of its equity developments, but there are two basic shortcomings in the bill that have effects on philanthropy far beyond those presumably intended or socially desirable.

The rules dealing with attribution are excessively broad. The 20 percent limitation on stock ownership, when coupled with the attribution rules, tends to substitute arithmetic for reason. For example, a foundation will be deemed to be in control of a corporation in which it has no vote where it holds nonvoting common and family members hold the voting stock. The family members would find themselves in an impossible situation. Not only must they dispose of 20 percent according to the tests of the statute, but they must dispose of all of the nonvoting common because it will be deemed to put the foundation in control of the business.

Under these circumstances, the foundation simply is not involved in the corporation's business, and there is no viable support for a presumption that it is. Where nonvoting stock is in a foundation the bill would require the distribution, as I say, of all of the stock that it holds. The alternative would be to dispose of relatives, and I think that is against public policy. Hence, we are in this impossible situation when nonvoting is held.

We know that the control of a corporation can take place with as little as 10 percent of the voting stock. Yet these artificial rules of attribution make having no voting stock a greater sin than having as much as 2 times that needed to control a large industrial corporation. We would, therefore, accordingly recommend that the House bill be modified to eliminate the rules of attribution in determining whether more than 20 percent of a business is owned by a foundation.

At this point I would like to underscore the fact that in other provisions such as the self-dealing provisions in the bill, it might well be desirable to have extremely broad rules of attribution prohibiting the sales between the foundation and a broad list of related or deemed-to-be-related persons. However, in determining whether control exists, if control is the focal point, it would seem that attribution rules merely substitute, as I say, arithmetic for reason.

At the very minimum we would say that the rules of attribution should not apply to a private foundation which itself owns no voting stock in the corporation.

An equally troublesome feature of the bill is its failure to provide a realistic method for a foundation to dispose of excess business holdings. A foundation with excess business holdings of a listed stock can divest itself by sale with no difficulty at all. The bill allows the foundation 10 years to accomplish this. Presumably the foundation will use the cash it has received from the sale of the stock to reinvest in diversified securities.

But foundations with excess business holdings in a closely held business will find no public market. The problem is compounded where the securities are of a nonvoting common variety, and it is this latter situation which I would like to bring to the committee's attention. The only realistic course for a foundation under these circumstances is to seek to have the issuing company redeem the stock.

The bill does not prohibit or forbid redemption. Indeed the House bill recognizes that closely held stock may have to be redeemed by the issuing company. To facilitate this event, the House bill relaxes the provisions against self-dealing to allow for a foundation to have its stock redeemed by the issuing company for fair market value.

Nonetheless, redemption is not feasible because the Internal Revenue Service may well make the argument that the redemption route either results in a constructive dividend to the donor, or that the redemption reflects an unreasonable accumulation of earnings on the part of the company.

In this connection, the Service has sometimes taken the position that where a corporation redeems shares from a foundation which received them as a gift, that redemption amounts to a taxable dividend to the original donor. How far the courts will go in asserting a constructive dividend is another matter, but the prospect of the assertion of a dividend is a chilling one, and it certainly does not allow for the easy disposition of excess business holdings by a foundation.

As to the redeeming corporation, the possibility of the assertion of a penalty tax on reasonable accumulations of income under section 531 also exists.

There are a number of policy reasons why one would favor a redemption mechanism without developing any type of tax consequence to the donor or to the redeeming company.

Closely held and family businesses generally have been protected from the tax consequences which would bring about their economic demise. For example, Congress recognizes that the heavy burden of death taxes could force a family business to liquidate, to merge, or to go public under extreme duress. Accordingly Congress provided for the stock redemption——

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, why should this not be done in many cases? What is the virtue of perpetuating one family distributing a particular piece of wealth?

Mr. ROGOVIN. What we are saying, Senator Gore, is that if this is what is wanted by the Congress, that is fine. If the foundation is to dispose of the stock, that being the rule of Congress, we will accept it. What we are saying is that we do not have an adequate system for the sale of these valuable assets unless we sell it back to the issuing company, and that for 50 years these were perfectly legitimate assets for a foundation to hold. Now Congress is considering changing the rules of the game. We are not quarreling with the question of whether the policy is wise or not. We are simply saying give us a transitional rule.

Senator GORE. All right, now what are your suggestions?

Mr. ROGOVIN. What I am suggesting here is a provision that would say that section 531 would not apply to an accumulation used to redeem excess business holdings. Once there is a determination that a foundation has more than a permitted amount, then that excess amount could be redeemed by the issuing company without the assertion by the Internal Revenue Service of a penalty tax for unreasonable accumulations, and also without the assertion by the Internal Revenue Service of a constructive dividend to donors who were given this property perhaps many years before.

Senator GORE. Thank you. That is a helpful suggestion.

Mr. ROGOVIN. I believe, if I may conclude, for over 50 years the very holdings that the House would prohibit were perfectly legitimate holdings on the part of foundations. Here, however, we see that the holding today of the same securities would bring about a 200 percent penalty. Goodness, the Federal tax on adulterated butter is 10 cents a pound, on marijuana it is $1 an ounce, and on opium it is $300 a pound. But hold these securities that you could have held for 50 years under the House bill, and there would be a 200 percent penalty. Well, that seems to be severe.

What we are saying is that if the rules are to be changed, that there are adequate ways to allow for no tax consequence because of this change of policy on the part of the Congress.

I have nothing further.

If there are any questions I would be happy to try to answer them.

Senator GORE. Thank you for your clear testimony, Mr. Rogovin.

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you very much.

(Mitchell Rogovin's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF MITCHELL ROGOVIN, IN BEHALF OF THE LOUIS & HENRIETTA BLAUSTEIN FOUNDATION, INC.

SUMMARY

I. Five troublesome provisions of H.R. 13270

A. Viewed by a private foundation holding primarily non-voting stock in a closely held family business.

II. Stock ownership limitation

A. Attribution rules are too broad.

1. Causes private foundation with no voting stock to dispose of all its non-voting securities because of stock owned by family members.

2. Rules of attribution should not apply in determining whether a private foundation has excess business holdings.

3. Alternatively, non-voting stock should not be equated with control and no attribution should be allowed where no voting stock is held by foundation.

B. Where involuntary divestiture of excess business holdings is required, bill should affirmatively preclude adverse tax consequences on the disposition of closely held stock.

1. No market generally available for closely held securities—other than issuing corporation.

2. Redemption by issuing company of excess business holdings should not trigger:

a. Dividend consequences to the donor, or

b. Assertion of the penalty tax for unreasonable accumulations by the redeeming corporation.

3. Same result should apply where a foundation has to dispose of closely held securities because it did not obtain a 5 percent yield on its investment assets. (§ 4942).

4. Bill should permit retroactive adjustments in the redemption price so as to be able to comply with the "fair market value" requirements of § 4941(d)(1)(F).

5. An exception to § 4943(c)(4)(B) and (C) should be recognized where there is a binding agreement to redeem excess business holdings of a foundation over a period not to exceed 10 years.

6. An exception to § 4943(c)(5) should be permitted to as to allow codicils executed after July 28, 1969, that are unrelated to bequests to private foundations.

III. Charitable contributions of appreciated property

A. Develops elitist group of charities to which contribution of appreciated property is proper.

1. Creates second class of philanthropy as to which no such tax loophole will be brooked.

B. Illogical and discriminatory distinction.

1. Will shift contributions away from private charities.

2. Would, for the first time, tax unrealized appreciation.

IV. Tax on investment income

A. Tax intended to require private foundations to "make a small contribution . . . toward the cost of government."

1. Tax on private foundations and not on other philanthropy.

2. Tax-free status the hallmark of philanthropy. Precedent will cause state and local authorities to similarly tax investment income.

B. Better solution: require all exempt oragnizations to pay a small "user charge" measured by their capital.

1. Earmark such funds for audit program.

V. Distribution of income

A. 5% minimum distribution requirement unrealistic.

1. Places unwarranted burden on foundation manager.

2. Causes him to "churn" investments to seek 5 percent yield.

B. Foundations should be required to distribute earnings currently.

1. Failure to do so should be treated as failure to dedicate assets to charity.

C. Alternatively, yield minimum should be lowered to 3 percent.

VI. Clay-Brown provision

A. Provision sound and long overdue.

B. As drafted, however, unintended inequities might result.

1. Example—Where foundation borrows money in order to make a contribution in furtherance of charitable purpose and pledges recently acquired donated property as collateral for loan.

2. Language of sections 514(b) and 514(c) (1)(C) could be interpreted to cover above example.

3. While such an arrangement does not appear to be within policy of bill, ambiguity could be resolved by appropriate language in Committee Report.

Introduction

Philanthropy, with its traces beginning at the dawn of time, is currently going through what has become a recurring process, a reappraisal by the society which it serves. Such reappraisals are as old as philanthropy itself and have occurred many times, in numerous areas. Over that span of time, charitable activities have been shaped, have been fostered and have been limited by the wisdom, the fears and the prejudices of the ages in which the reappraisals occurred.

One might say that when organized society first recognized that the poor had rights and the rich had duties, philanthropy was born. All cultures and civilizations provide examples demonstrating their sense of charitable obligation.[1]

[1] See, Andrews, Philanthropic Giving, Russell Sage Foundation, p. 30; 5 Encyclopedia Britiannica (1955 Ed.) Charity, p. 250.

The development of the law of charity thus mirrors the social, religious and economic philosophies which have held sway throughout the various periods of our history. In modern times the granting or withholding of tax privileges has become a favorite tool of society in shaping the development of charitable activities and an important means through which society imposes its will on philanthropy. The result has been that the tax treatment of charitable activities at any given period of time is, in itself, a mirror of the social, religious and economic philosophies of the time.

The unanswered question is what legacy will the 91st Congress leave for generations unborn. The result of the philanthropy of the 19th Century is all about us. The colleges, libraries, concert halls and research institutes stand tall as the product of private philanthropy of years gone by. Much of the testimony Foundations' Coordinated Testimony Group bears ample witness to what philanthropy has done in the past.[2]

Some specific concerns

The need for specific legislation to curb the overreach and abuse of some foundation managers has, over the past decade, been demonstrated. The House Bill, however, is an all too broad answer to the specific problems surfaced by the Treasury Report[3] or Congressman Patman's hearings on private foundations.[4] Indeed, at a point in time when it would seem that the Congress should be seeking to encourage foundation managers—the private sector—to work toward the eradication of the formidable problems facing our nation, the Bill challenges the continued existence of private foundations. It is not a good example of "creative or new federalism."

Since the Blaustein Foundation is, in comparison to some of the foundations represented at these hearings, relatively small and like many private foundations, it holds primarily nonvoting stock in a closely-held family enterprise, our comments on certain of the foundation provisions of H.R. 13270 reflect that point of view. It is, therefore, in this context, that we focus upon:

A. Stock Ownership Limitation (section 101(b) of the Bill and section 4943 of the Code).

B. Charitable Contributions of Appreciated Property (sections 201 (c) and (d) of the Bill and section 170 of the Code).

C. Tax on Investment Income (section 101(a) of the Bill and section 506 of the Code).

D. Distribution of Income (section 101(b) of the Bill and section 4942 of the Code).

E. The Clay-Brown Provision (section 121 of the Bill and sections 512 and 514 of the Code).

II.

A. Stock ownership limitation

This provision of the Bill limits to 20 percent the combined ownership of a corporation's voting and nonvoting stock held by a private foundation and those who, under broad rules of stock ownership attribution, are referred to as "disqualified persons." To the extent that a foundation and disqualified persons own stock in excess of the 20 percent limitation, the foundation must dispose of its stock within a 10-year period. This provision will, singlehandedly, cause the liquidation of countless private foundations and, coupled with the limitation on gifts of appreciated property to private foundations, will make it impossible for many men of wealth to contribute to philanthropy the most valuable asset they have—shares of the businesses built up by themselves, their family or a small group of entrepeneurs.

The general philosophy behind such legislation is the assumption that a foundation owning (together with so-called disqualified persons) more than 20 percent of a corporation's voting stock, will become preoccupied with the business of business rather than its charitable purpose.

While there is much to be said in favor of prohibiting foundation trustees and managers from engaging in the business of its equity investments, the House Bill would unnecessarily destroy a substantial source of philanthropic support to curb some possible abuses which may arise from control. Two basic shortcomings cause the Bill to have effects upon philanthropy far beyond these presumably intended or socially desirable. The first, the rules dealing with attribution, are excessively broad in some instances and totally unnecessary in others. For example, under these rules, a foundation can be deemed to be in control of a corporation in which it has no vote and, therefore, no control. The second reflects the absence of a realistic method in which a foundation can divest itself of shares of closely-held stock to meet the House Bill's limitation on stock ownership and still make available to charity the most cash possible. Closely-held stock generally has no market and cannot be sold for its real worth. The only method of obtaining real worth for charitable purposes is through the redemption of such stock by the issuing corporation.

Attribution rule

The 20 percent limitation of combined stock ownership is an arbitrary rule which substitutes arithmetic for reason.[5] It has the sole advantage of being a clear-cut rule. But even this advantage becomes fuzzy when the rules of attribution—the deeming of stock owned by others to be owned by the Foundation—are applied. The basic presumption is that when a foundation has more than 20 percent of a corporation's voting stock, its managers will become involved in business to the detriment of philanthropy. This, however, becomes strained to the breaking point when, for example, a foundation with nothing but the nonvoting stock of a corporation finds itself charged with all the voting stock owned by:

"A substantial contributor (anyone who has contributed more than $5,000 in any one calendar year or more than any other contributor in any one calendar year), a foundation manager, an individual who owns more than 20% of a corporation which is a substantial contributor, a holder of more than 20% of the beneficial interest of a trust or unincorporated enterprise which is a substantial contributor, a member of the family (under the personal holding company and collapsible corporation attribution rules) of any such person, or a corporation, partnership, trust, or estate as to which all such persons own in the aggregate more than 35%."[6]

To equate nonvoting stock with voting common stock is like assuming that holders of Series E Savings Bonds can vote on federal legislation. The presumption of business involvement is nonsense when novoting stock is held by a foundation. The attribution rules, while properly broad when dealing with matters such as self-dealing, have no relevance in the context of the provisions of the House Bill dealing with control by a foundation of a business enterprise.

In a situation where a foundation holds nonvoting stock in a family business and the voting stock is held by family members, the foundation must (because of the application of the rules of attribution) dispose of all its nonvoting stock. It is totally illogical to reach such a result in the name of keeping foundations out of business. The proposed bill would allow a foundation to own up to 20 percent of the voting stock in a business. In many instances, 10 percent of the voting stock is enough to exercise control. Thus, business involvement is sanctioned to that extent. Yet, where a foundation has no control—no voting stock—it will be deemed to be involved in business through the fiction of attribution.

Accordingly, the bill should be modified so as to eliminate the rules of attribution in determining whether 20 percent of a business is owned by a private foundation. At the very minimum, the rules of attribution should not apply to a private foundation which itself owns no voting stock.

[6] H. Rpt. No. 91–413 (Part 1), p. 21, 91st Cong., 1st Sess. (1969). These rules of attribution include and expand upon the rules set out in § 341(d) and § 544(a), I.R.C. 1954. They are proposed to be applied in mechanical fashion to the problems of self-dealing and excess business holdings, irrespective of the vast difference between these two problems.

Redemption

A second and equally troublesome feature of the House Bill is its failure effectively to provide a realistic mechanism for: (1) private foundations to comply with a forced divestiture of stock in a closely-held company; and (2) for public charities to obtain cash for closely-held stock in a manner which will most benefit charitable purposes.

Many public charities and private foundations hold stock in closely-held companies. Indeed, for over 50 years such stock has been considered by the Treasury as perfectly legitimate holdings for foundations. Under the House Bill, private foundations required to divest themselves of closely-held stock can meet this requirement by sale, by gift to a public charity, or by redemption. Realistically, however, redemption of the stock by the issuing company is the only method for the charity to obtain a market and a fair value. The transfer by the private foundation of closely-held securities to a public charity, without the capacity of sale by the recipient, is a paltry gift unless the public charity can otherwise convert it into expendable cash.

Many persons of wealth whose property is concentrated in closely-held corporations customarily leave substantial gifts to private and public charities under their wills. The House Bill will discourage future generous gifts of such stock to private foundations if the gift will make the foundation a 20% or more shareholder, unless there is some way for the foundation to divest itself of the shares. Likewise, when testamentary gifts are made to public charities, or if the public charities receive closely-held sotck from private foundations,[7] a method must be devised to allow the conversion of the stock into cash. Unless a redemption provision is provided, charity will get something substantially less than the true worth of the securities in both instances.

Why redemption is not currently feasible

The House Bill does not forbid redemptions from public charities or private foundations. In fact, the Committee Report recognizes that closely-held stock may be redeemed. To facilitate this end, the prohibition against self-dealing is relaxed in such cases where the stock is sold for fair market value by the foundation to a disqualified person which may be the corporation. Nonetheless, certain other possible interpretations of the Internal Revenue Code may make the redemption so dangerous to the donor and to the closely-held corporation that redemption is impossible.

The Internal Revenue Service has sometimes taken the position that where a corporation redeems shares which have been received by a foundation as gifts, the redemption amounts to a taxable dividend at high rates, to the original donors.[8] How far the courts will go along with the constructive dividend position is, perhaps, another matter, but the prospect of the assertion of dividend consequences is a chilling one. It should be made clear by amendment that a redemption of closely-held stock presently held by, or received as a testamentary bequest by a private foundation or owned or received by a public charity would not produce dividend consequences to the donors or to the decedent's estate.

So far as the redeeming corporation is concerned, the problem is the possible assertion of the penalty tax upon unreasonable accumulation of income under section 531 of the Internal Revenue Code.[9] For purposes of the penalty tax the Code presently allows a deduction for corporate charitable contributions in excess of the 5 percent of adjusted gross income normally allowed corporations as a deductible charitable contribution. An additional deduction should be allowed for the indirect charitable contribution made through a redemption of closely-held shares.

Policy considerations favoring redemption

Over the history of our modern income tax, closely-held and family businesses have been protected and sheltered from adverse tax effects which would cause the demise of the closely-held business as a part of our economic life. For example, Congress recognized that death taxes could easily force a closely-held business to liquidate, merge, or "go public" under extreme duress. Accordingly, it provided for stock redemption to pay death taxes without dividend consequences to the estate.[10]

Similar protection must be given to testamentary gifts of securities in closely-held companies, if forced mergers with their resulting concentration of power in larger units are to be avoided and if our pluralistc approach to philanthropy is to continue.

A private foundation required to divest a portion of its publicly traded securities has no problem. A private foundation or a public charity holding a security with no available market other than the issuing company will have difficulty realizing the full value of such assets.[11] Consistent with the desire for charity to obtain the full value of such assets, they should be encouraged to convert the closely-held stock into cash and thereafter be on parity with other private foundations or public charities which hold marketable securities. Thus, they will be in a better position to carry out their charitable purpose. The recommended additions in the bill are intended to facilitate the policy behind this provisions; to change the type of investments held by certain private foundations.

An alternative approach which recognizes that nonvoting stock in the hands of a private foundation is substantially different than voting stock should be considered. Since a foundation holding nothing but nonvoting stock in a family enterprise is harshly treated under the rules of constructive ownership, an exception should be added to the Bill to provide that where a foundation holds exclusively nonvoting stock amounting to less than 25 percent of the total equity of the corporation, the provision of section 4943 of the Bill will not apply.[12]

Other problems re divestiture of excess business holdings

Section 101(k) provides that section 4941 (the provision that imposes sanctions on self-dealing) shall not apply to sales by a foundation to a "disqualified person" if the sale is necessary in order for the foundation to dispose of its excess business holdings and if the foundation receives an amount equal to the fair market value of the stock.

How would this provision be applied in situations where the Internal Revenue Service or a court subsequently determines that the fair market value of the redeemed stock was higher than the redemption price originally agreed upon by the foundation and the corporation? The difficulty in valuing closely-held stock is well recognized. The Internal Revenue Service has often asserted a higher value for closely-held stock than the value reported by taxpayers on their federal estate and gift tax returns; and courts have often determined a still different value. If a foundation, in compliance with the excess business holding provisions, has its closely-held shares redeemed by an issuing corporation which is a "disqualified person," and if it is finally determined by the Service or a court that the redemption price was less than "fair market value," would a retroactive adjustment in the redemption price be permitted so that the founda-

[10] Section 303 provides capital gains treatment for a stock redemption needed to pay death taxes and section 6166 provides for installment payment of estate taxes on estates composed largely of "an interest in a closely held business" defined inter alia, as consisting of 20 percent or more in value of the voting stock of a corporation. Treas. Regs. § 20.161–1(b) provides that the sale of interests in a family business to unrelated persons is a hardship justifying delayed tax collection. Simon, Hearings Before the Committee on Ways and Means on Tax Reform, 1969, N. 14 at 796.

[11] A similar problem in obtaining full value exists when, under the distribution of income provision of section 101(b) of the Bill (new section 4942), a private foundation fails to obtain a 5 percent yield on its investment assets. At that point, if its only assets are shares in closely-held corporations, some device is necessary to allow the issuing corporation to redeem the securities without adverse tax consequences to the redeeming corporation, its shareholders, the donor or the foundation. To fail to do so would only compound the foundation's inability to get a full value return on its assets.

[12] Section 4943(c)(2)(C) of the proposed Bill provides a de minimus rule under which foundations may retain not more than 2 percent of the voting stock notwithstanding the 20 percent limitation.

tion would have the opportunity to keep the transaction within the scope of section 101(k). By the retroactive adjustment, the redeeming corporation would pay to the foundation the difference between the original redemption price and the finally determined "fair market value."

If retroactive adjustments are not specifically provided for, the section 101(k) exception will be unworkable. Foundation managers and the redeeming corporations will be obliged to risk the imposition of the section 4941 sanctions because "fair market value" may subsequently be determined to be higher than the redemption price. Under section 4941(a), a tax of 5 percent of the amount involved in the self-dealing transaction will be imposed on the redeeming corporation and, if the redemption is not "undone" during the "correction period," a tax of 200 percent will be imposed under section 4941(b). A tax of 2½ percent will be imposed on the foundation manager who knowingly participates in the transaction, (section 4941(a)) and an additional tax of 50 percent will be imposed if he refuses to agree to a "correction" (section 4941(b)). Section 101(k) certainly was not intended to be so limited in application.

Accordingly, the House Bill should, therefore, make clear that a retroactive adjustment in the redemption price will comply with the "fair market value" requirement of section 101(k).

A second provision in the House Bill that will discourage redemptions is the reduced grace period that will result whenever the redeeming corporation is a "disqualified person." Section 4943(c)(4)(B) provides that the ten-year grace period for disposing of excess holdings is cut off after two years unless the foundation has disposed of at least one-tenth of its excess holdings to a person other than a "disqualified person." Section 4943(c)(4)(C) provides that by the end of the first five years, the foundation must have disposed of at least one-third of its excess holdings and (together with all disqualified persons) it must not hold as much as 50 percent of the stock of the corporation. Where family members (disqualified persons) own all of the voting stock of the business enterprise, the present rules of constructive ownership will attribute all of their stock to the private foundation even though the foundation only holds nonvoting stock. Under such circumstances, the foundation could not meet the interim requirements of either section 4943(c)(4)(B) or (C) unless it disposes of all of its holdings within two years. If it fails to do so, it must suffer the sanctions of section 4943 (a 5 percent tax and a 200 percent tax). This is unrealistic, unfair and possibly unconstitutional. In many cases, the redeeming corporation will not be able, within a two-year period, or five-year period, to redeem all the stock of the foundation (and perhaps all the stock of similarly situated foundations). Thus, even if redemption may be the only way for obtaining the real value of the stock, the redemption method will often be impossible because of the unrealistic time table set up in the statute.

The purpose for requiring partial divestiture over two, five and finally the tenth year is apparently to insure that a foundation does not wait until the tenth year and then claim hardship. It would seem that this problem would be adequately solved if the issuing corporation entered into a binding agreement with the foundation to redeem the excess business holdings over a ten-year period.[13] This would demonstrate the foundation's intention to divest and would allow the redeeming corporation to develop an appropriate plan for the redemption.

Accordingly, the House Bill should provide that the provisions of section 4943 (c)(4)(B) and (C) shall not apply where a binding agreement is entered into to redeem the excess business holdings over a period not to exceed ten years.

The effect of a codicil on pre-July 29, 1969, will

The "grandfather clause" in section 4943(c)(5) creates an inequitable result in its present form. A ten-year period is given for the disposition of excess business holdings when the assets come to a private foundation at some time in the future if there was a bequest in a will executed before July 29, 1969. If the will is dated after July 28, 1969, the foundation has only five years within which to dispose of excess holdings so received (section 4943(c)(6)).

Under state law, a codicil is generally considered to have the effect of making [13] Thus, the foundation could offer its stock for redemption, sell it to third parties (if available) or give it to public charities during the 10-year period. In any event, it would dispose of all of its excess holdings within the 10-year period.

the will speak as of the date of the codicil.[14] This being the case, a taxpayer who in a will executed prior to July 29, 1969 has provided for a testamentary bequest to a private foundation is placed on the horns of a dilemma if he wishes, for non-tax reasons, to execute a codicil. If, for example, a taxpayer has after-born grandchildren and wishes to provide for them by codicil, he will cause the private foundation to lose the benefit of section 4943(c)(5). It would not seem that the intention of Congress was to create such a dilemma.

Accordingly, section 4943(c)(5) should be amended to provide that a codicil not related to a bequest to any private foundation should not be considered as changing the date of the original will.

Summary of legislative solutions

1. Attribution—The attribution rules should be amended so as not to be applicable to section 101(b) of the House Bill. If the attribution rules are retained with respect to section 101(b), at a very minimum, they should not apply to a private foundation which itself owns no voting stock.

2. Redemption—Affirmative legislation should be added to the House Bill to permit:

(a) Private foundations to offer to the issuing corporation for redemption over a ten-year period any stock in a closely-held corporation which is an excess business holding as of the effective date of the act or becomes an excess business holding because of a subsequent testamentary bequest, with no adverse tax effects to the foundation, the redeeming corporation, its stockholders, or the donor.[15]

(b) Public charities to offer at any time closely-held stock to the issuing corporation for redemption without adverse tax effects upon the redeeming corporation, its stockholders, or the donor.[15]

(c) Retroactive adjustments in the redemption price so as to comply with the "fair market value" requirement of section 4941(d)(1)(F).

(d) An exception to section 4943(c)(4)(B) and (C) where there is a binding agreement to redeem the excess business holdings of a private foundation over a period not to exceed ten years.

(e) An exception to section 4943(c)(5) to allow for codicils unrelated to bequests to any private foundation to be executed after July 29, 1969.

B. Charitable contributions of appreciated property

Predicated upon the stated desire "to remove some of the present tax advantages of gifts of appreciated property over gifts of cash," [16] this provision of the House Bill drives a further wedge between charitable institutions. It develops an elitist group of charities to which Congressionally recognized undesirable tax advantages will be permitted and a second class of charity where no such advantage will be brooked. It presumes to distinguish between worthy and less worthy charity.

As to the first class of charity, the donor may continue to deduct the fair market value of contributed property. Where, however, the donee is a private foundation, the House Bill requires the donor to elect as the measure of his contribution of property (1) his cost or other basis in the property, or (2) the fair market value of the property, but he must include in his tax base the untaxed appreciation with respect to the property involved.[17]

This provision of the House Bill draws a line totally lacking in rationality. Under this provision, for example, a gift of appreciated property to a local P.T.A. would be entitled to a deduction measured by the fair market value while a similar gift to the Brookings Institute would, because it is a private foundation, be limited to the donor's cost or subject him to tax upon the appreciation. Such a Congressional judgment as to favored and disfavored charity could hardly be based upon objective evidence. Indeed, it smacks of crass discrimination for it is no argument to condem the gift of appreciated property and then merely select out the impact of the bill an illogical slice of charitable institutions.

[17] A tax on unrealized appreciation would be a sharp departure from the philosophy of our federal taxation scheme.

Appreciation as a measure of deductibility

Historically, the Treasury has accepted the proposition that there is no realization of income when appreciated property is donated.[18]

Since the beginning of World War II, the appreciation factor has played an increasingly large part in the stimulation of charitable giving. To that large segment of the population who wish to be generous and only have appreciated property to make large donations, if this provision remains in the bill, they realistically have no choice but to ignore the needs of private foundations and give to those charities to which the contribution will be afforded greater credit "for tax purposes." To assume the contrary is to ignore a basic fact of life in mid-twentieth century America.

Thus, the real impact of this provision is to shift donations away from the work of private foundations in certain instances and to shut off the flow completely in other instances. Such an effect is all the more troublesome when it is recognized that the work of philanthropy in the nation is as beset by inflation as is the private economy. Just at the point in our history when the demands on private philanthropy are at their high point, the Congress is considering legislation which would shut off the flow of funds to private foundations. It is illogical.

Accordingly, this provision should be struck from the Bill.

C. Tax on investment income

The House Committee Report says that private foundations should "make a small contribution, a tax of 7½ percent of their investment income, toward the cost of government." It is, however, curious indeed that the contribution is required only of private foundations; numerically but a fraction of the total number of exempt organizations. It is even more curious when one assumes that the other provisions of this bill will cause only Congressionally desirable foundations to retain exemption. In fact, the tax is actually placed on the beneficiaries of charity; a tax not placed on other exempt organizations with extensive investment income. Nor is the 7.5 percent federal tax the only concern to philanthropy. It is quite conceivable—indeed, inevitable—that state and local tax authorities will add private philanthrophy to their tax rolls once the lead is taken by the federal government.

Since literally the dawn of history the tax-free status of philanthrophy has been the favorite tool of society in shaping the development of charitable activities. The Revenue Code has never drawn a distinction among charities; making some tax-free and some 92½% tax-free. Certain activities are simply better handled in society through private charity as opposed to the business sector of government; a pattern now threatened by the 91st Congress.

It would appear that a user charge[19] to defray the administrative expenses of examining exempt foundations and other organizations would be a better alternative to a tax on investment income. Such a fee, likened to that paid by national banks to the Comptroller of the Currency, could be based on the organization's net assets. These fees could then be earmarked for the Revenue Service's audit program to insure that an adequate audit program can be developed.

Accordingly, the provision for a tax on investment income should be struck from the Bill and a "user-charge" substituted.

D. Distribution of income

The House Bill requires a private foundation to distribute all its income currently, but not less than 5 percent of its investment assets.

The 5 percent minimum distribution requirement is totally unrealistic. It imposes an unwarranted burden on the foundation manager. Instead of concentrating on philanthropy, he must turn his energies to chasing the vagaries of the stock market in pursuit of the ever-elusive 5 percent return. Certainly no precedent can be found in trust law for requiring a trustee to produce income of a fixed percent.

[18] In 1938, the House attacked this position. It, however, got no further than the Senate Finance Committee. See H. Rept. No. 1860, 75th Cong., 3d Sess. 19 (1938), Sen. Rept. No. 1567, 75th Cong., 3d Sess. 14 (1938).

[19] The fee could be based on capital assets, not investment income. Further, I would recommend such a fee be paid by all section 501(c) organizations under the theory that the IRS does (or should) examine the activities of all exempt organizations.

The House Bill requires the adoption of an inflexible foundation investment policy that unduly restricts the foundation manager in making investment judgments. The foundation manager will have to stress "yield" only and ignore highly regarded "growth" stocks needed to offset the effect of inflation on the foundation's future distributions. The foundation manager will have to adhere to this rigid investment policy even in those economic periods when it proves unwise and imprudent, because his only alternative is the gradual liquidation of the foundation's assets.

The mandatory distribution of 5 percent of a foundation's investment assets can produce serious difficulties of compliance in situations in which a foundation holds low-yield, closely-held stock for which there is no market. In addition to the obvious problem of valuing the closely-held stock for purposes of the 5 percent computation, the foundation will encounter problems in meeting the minimum distribution requirement. Sale of part of the stock is one alternative, but this alternative would not be meaningful if there is no market for the stock. Another alternative is redemption by the issuing corporation of sufficient shares to allow the foundation to meet the 5 percent distribution requirement. Redemption would not be feasible, however, because of the existence of two deterrents in the current tax laws discussed above. The Internal Revenue Service may take the position that some or all of the redemption proceeds are constructive dividends to the original donors; the Internal Revenue Service may also take the position that the use of corporate funds for the benefit of a charity has accumulated earnings penalty tax implications under section 531. Certainly prospective donors would be reluctant to contribute low-yield, closely-held securities to a foundation if the foundation may be compelled to redeem the stock and thereby create constructive dividend problems for the donor. Certainly issuing corporations would be reluctant to redeem any such stock if the redemption may create section 531 implications. Where sale or redemption of low-yielding, closely-held stock is not possible, the House Bill, in effect, requires foundations to distribute such stock to public or private operating foundations in order to comply with the 5 percent distribution requirement. It is questionable whether the public welfare is well served by such a rule that necessitates a continuous reduction of foundation assets.

Foundations should be encouraged to provide current benefits to charity. At the same time, foundation investment policy should not be unduly inhibited. Both of these objectives can be accomplished by a modification of the House Bill that would focus on the specific abuse involved in this area: that the current-benefits-to-charity principle is eroded when foundations hold non-income producing securities in corporations controlled by the foundation or by "disqualified persons" because those who "use a foundation's stockholdings to retain business control in some cases are relatively unconcerned about producing income to be used by the foundation for charitable purposes." [30]

To cure this abuse, the blanket 5 percent requirement would not be necessary. Current benefits can be assured for charity by requiring a foundation to distribute annually the aggregate of all its current net income, thus eliminating the vague standards relating to unreasonable accumulations of income under existing law. In the event that a foundation failed to invest its assets in income producing property, i.e., it does not receive an annual income, it would seem that such a foundation has failed to dedicate its assets for exclusively exempt purposes and should be penalized. In the alternative, the mandatory yield requirement should be reduced to 3 percent.

Congress should seek to encourage responsible foundation managers to work toward the eradication of poverty, the rebuilding of our central cities, the lifting of our schools to a new level of quality and the accomplishment of the other formidable tasks that challenge society at the tail end of the 20th Century, not to chase after a glamour stock that yields the magical figure of 5 percent.

Accordingly, the 5 percent minimum yield provision should be deleted from the Bill in its entirety. Alternatively, if a minimum yield is believed necessary, it should be set at 3 percent of investment assets.

E. The Clay-Brown provision

The House Bill seeks to overcome the situation where a tax-exempt organization acquires a business by agreeing to pay the former owners a percentage of future profits until the purchase price is paid in full with no commitment for payment other than from the assets or income of the transferred business. The Bill reaches this result by imposing the unrelated business income tax on the income received by the exempt organization in proportion to the existing debt on the income producing property. The legislation is sound and long overdue.

However, as drafted, the House Bill could produce certain unintended inequities. Specifically, the language of sections 514(b) and 514(c)(1)(C) could be interpreted as covering a transaction in which a charitable foundation borrows money in order to make a contribution in furtherance of its charitable purposes and pledges recently-acquired donated property as collateral for the loan.

Background

Since the specific transaction with respect to which we are concerned has already been entered into, after favorable rulings by the Internal Revenue Service (as later herein indicated), the background and surrounding facts become quite relevant in pointing up the need for clarifying language in the Committee Report.

The Foundation entered into an agreement with a university wherein the Foundation agreed to grant $500,000 to the university for the construction of a building for its Center of American Studies. The total grant is to be paid over the construction period in quarterly installments sufficient to cover the university's current construction costs.

In order to help the Foundation meet this increased financial burden, one of its founders transferred shares of publicly-traded common stock to an irrevocable trust for the benefit of the Foundation. The trust is to remain in existence for a period of ten years and one day, or until $650,000[21] in income payments are received by the Foundation, whichever occurs later. Under the terms of the trust indenture, all of the income from the corpus of the trust belongs absolutely to the Foundation and is to be paid over to it in quarter-annual installments by the bank trustee. Upon the termination of the trust, the trust principal, as then constituted, will be returned to the grantor (or his estate, in the event of his prior death) as his absolute property.

While it is anticipated that the amount of income to be derived from the trust over its entire term will be more than adequate to fund the Foundation's grant, it will not be sufficient during the construction period to cover the Foundation's obligation under the agreement. In order to raise the funds necessary to meet the quarterly payments to the university, as they become due, the Foundation arranged to borrow a total of $500,000 from a bank. As security for the loan (or loans), the Foundation assigned its income rights under the trust agreement to the bank.

By virtue of the foregoing transaction, it will be possible for the Foundation, with the then current net worth of $257,000, to make available the entire $500,000 grant to the university to meet the expenses of the building's construction as they become due during the construction period, and the Foundation will have funds to pay off the loan.

The Foundation received favorable rulings from the Internal Revenue Service determining that (1) no part of the income of the trust would be taxed to its grantor, (2) the trust would be allowed a deduction under section 642(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for all of the income paid to the Foundation, and (3) none of the described transactions would adversely affect the exempt status of the Foundation.

The Committee Report makes it clear that unrelated debt-financed income would be taxable as unrelated business income "if the income arises from property acquired or improved with borrowed funds and the production of the income is unrelated to the" purposes of the exempt organization. In the situation with which we are concerned, the property acquired, the income interest in the trust, was not acquired with borrowed funds, but was, in fact, donated. The arrangement would not, therefore, appear to be within the policy of the Bill.

Definitional problem

The Bill as drafted (proposed section 514(b)), however, defines "debt financed property" as "any property which is held to produce income and with respect to which there is an acquisition indebtedness (as defined in subsection (c)) at any time during the taxable year. . . ." Section 514(c)(1)(C) in turn defines "acquisition indebtedness" as:

"The indebtedness incurred after the acquisition or improvement of such property if such indebtedness would not have been incurred but for such acquisition or improvement and the incurrence of such indebtedness was reasonably foreseeable at the time of such acquisition or improvement. . . ."

It would appear that, as drafted, this language may inadvertently apply to the type of transaction entered into by the Foundation. While the Foundation did not borrow funds for the purpose of acquiring or improving property, the indebtedness probably would not and could not have been incurred unless the Foundation were given the income interest in the trust which could be pledged with the lender-bank.

It is difficult to believe that such a result lies anywhere within the realm of the avowed legislative purpose—to extend the unrelated business income tax provided by section 514 of existing law to the Clay-Brown type of transaction and similar cases. Certainly, no public policy is served by reaching such a result in a situation in which a foundation is merely anticipating its income in the interests of a university.

Solution

It is suggested that Congress' intention not to extend this legislation to such ends can be made clearer than it has been by expanding the Committee Report[22] to read as follows:

"Under the bill, the unrelated debt-financed income is included in 'unrelated business income.' It would be subject to tax, however, only if the income arises from property acquired or improved with borrowed funds and the production of the income is unrelated to the educational, charitable, religious, or other purpose constituting the basis of the organization's tax exemption. Borrowing by the exempt organization for its own exempt purposes would be unaffected by the bill. Thus, where a foundation pledges recently acquired property in order to borrow funds which it immediately uses for tax exempt purposes and neither the donor of the pledged property nor any other private individual receive any direct or indirect financial benefit either as a result of the transfer of the property or the borrowing by the organization, it will be assumed that the borrowing is for the organization's 'own exempt purposes' . . ." (italicized portion added).

III

Conclusion

The federal tax laws have historically encouraged private philanthropy. It is entirely appropriate that the Congress re-examine the character of and the compliance with such laws. The process should, however, be a deliberate one—directed toward the real abuses but carefully guarding the existence and effectiveness of private philanthropy.

We have attempted to come up with constructive alternatives to provisions which are unwise or inadvertently discriminate against private foundations currently holding closely held stock in a family enterprise. The President has said that this Bill "will take a long step toward making taxation, if not popular, at least fair for all our citizens." We believe the goal of "fairness" is not reached, however, unless the Senate tempers the overreach of certain of the provisions.

As the Bill now stands, it will cause the liquidation within less than a decade of many private foundations. Limitations on holdings and future giving, along with the mandatory yield provisions, will rapidly eat into the corpus of countless private foundations and cause generous benefactors of philanthropy to think twice or not to give at all. While the House Bill does not overtly address itself to the elimination of private foundations from the American scene, the overall effect of the various provisions will bring such a result about. The Senate should openly debate this result for the work of private foundations will not be found wanting.

APPENDIX A

RE PROPOSED LEGISLATIVE AMENDMENTS REGARDING TAX PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN REDEMPTION OF EXCESS BUSINESS HOLDINGS

Section 4943 (c) Disposition of closely held stock by redemption

Notwithstanding any other provisions of this section, a private foundation may dispose of excess business holdings in a closely-held business enterprise owned by a private foundation on the effective date of this section or received by such foundation by bequest thereafter, by redemption of such stock by the issuing corporation during a ten-year period beginning on the effective date of this section or beginning on the date the estate tax return for a testator has been filed. For purposes of this section, a closely-held business enterprise is defined as one in which five or fewer persons and one or more private foundations own, directly or indirectly, 85 percent or more of the outstanding stock of a corporation. For purposes of direct or indirect ownership, a person shall be considered as owning the stock owned directly or indirectly, by his brothers and sisters (of half or whole blood), their spouses, their lineal descendants, his spouse, his ancestors and his lineal descendants.

Section 302(f) Redemption of stock held by certain private foundations

Notwithstanding any other provisions of this section, distributions made in the redemption of stock held by a private foundation, as defined in section 509, or held by a public charity as defined in section 509, of a closely-held business enterprise, as defined in section 4943(e), shall not constitute the equivalent of a dividend to the private foundation, the public charity or to any other shareholders of the redeeming corporation.

The first sentence of 535(b) (2) as amended, shall read:

2. Charitable contributions. The deduction for charitable contributions, and for amounts paid out to public charities or private foundations in redemptions of a closely-held business enterprise, as defined in section 4943(e), shall be allowed, but in computing such deductions the limitations in section 170(b) (1) (A) and (B) shall apply, and section 170(b) (2) and (5) shall not apply. (New matter italicized.)

Section 4941(d) (2) (F) is amended to read:

(F) Any transaction between a private foundation and a corporation which is a disqualified person (as defined in section 4946), pursuant to any liquidation, merger, redemption, recapitalization of other corporate adjustment or reorganization shall not be an act of self-dealing if all of the securities of the same class as that held by the foundation are subject to the same terms, except for a redemption of stock of a closely held business enterprise as provided in section 4943(e), in which case redemptions need not be made or offered to other holders of shares of the same class, and provided that such terms provide for receipt by the foundation of no less than fair market value. (New material italicized.)

Add a new subsection to section 303(a) to read as follows:

(3) the amount paid out in redemption of stock of closely held business enterprises, as provided in section 4943(e).

The dividend problem created by a redemption could also be handled by a provision, the reverse of section 1111 (the DuPont-General Motors Tax Relief provision regarding the antitrust divestiture order). It could provide:

"Notwithstanding sections 301, 302, 303, 312 and 316, the gross income of no person shall include the proceeds of a redemption of stock by a private foundation, or by a public charity, as defined in section 509, in compliance with section 4943(e)."

Senator GORE. I believe that concludes our witness list that was scheduled for hearing today. We will insert at this point in the record a letter the committee has received from Mr. Jacob Blaustein.

We are now in recess until 9:30 tomorrow morning.

Thank you very much.

(The letter with attachments follow:)

BALTIMORE, MD., September 3, 1969.

Hon. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Senate Finance Committee,
Old Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LONG: You have doubtless heard from many, like myself, who are concerned with certain portions of H.R. 13270 dealing with private foundations. I hope you will consider my comments when the Senate Finance Committee examines the House Bill.

Although the enclosed memoranda are limited to just three aspects of the House Bill (i.e., Stock Ownership Limitation, Charitable Contributions of Appreciated Property, Clay-Brown Provision), I wish to register a strong general protest regarding an all too broad bill which was apparently spawned out of haste and an over-reaction to certain specific abuses of a few private foundations.

The need for legislation to curb these specific abuses goes without saying. The need is just as clear now as it was four years ago when the Treasury Report on private foundations was issued or for that matter, seven years ago when Congressman Patman's first report on foundation abuses was issued. In the same vein, the extraordinary service private foundations have rendered our society needs no repeating. It is in this context that I conclude the House Bill is unwise in its totality, and legislation should be tailored to eliminate specific abuses. The Congressional task would seem to be, in the words of Gilbert and Sullivan, "to make the punishment fit the crime." Having said that, let me briefly enumerate three specific objections to which separate memoranda have been prepared and are attached.

1. Stock Ownership Limitation

If Congress decides that after 50 years certain investments are no longer appropriate holdings for private foundations, fair play demands that transition rules be provided so that private foundations can dispose of these prohibited holdings without adverse tax consequences.

The limitation on stock ownership is a confused concept. Nonetheless, it can be made workable and the assumed goals of Congress can be reached if modest amendments are made along the lines of the attached material.

2. Charitable Contributions of Appreciated Property

The House Bill—out of charitable organizations to which contributions of appreciated property are deductible at fair market value—excludes private foundations and makes second class citizens of this group of charities. The limitations clearly reflect a misshapened intention to dry up gifts to this worthy class of philanthropy. It should be noted that the term "private foundations" covers much more than family foundations. It includes large foundations such as the Brookings Institute and all others which are not generally supported by the public. If private foundations had, as a class, sinned, then punishment might be due them. But there is no evidence of such a taint. There have been abuses among a small number of private foundations which should be stopped, but there is no evidence of widespread abuses. Consequently, a broadside attack against private foundations as a class is clearly out of order and, if not revised, will do great damage. (Memorandum attached.)

3. Clay-Brown Provision

This provision is sound and long-overdue. However, as drafted, it could produce certain unintended inequities so as adversely to affect a foundation which borrows money in order to make a contribution in furtherance of its charitable purpose and pledges recently-acquired donated property as collateral for the loan. (Memorandum attached.)

In addition to these three items separately covered in the attached material, I wish to bring two other provisions of the House Bill to your attention:

1. Tax on Investment Income

The House Committee Report says that private foundations should "make a small contribution, a tax of 7½ percent of their investment income, toward the cost of government." It is, however, curious indeed that the contribution is required only of private foundations; numerically but a fraction of the total number of exempt organizations. In fact, the tax is actually placed on the beneficiaries of charity; a tax not placed on other exempt organizations with extensive investment income.

Since literally the dawn of history the tax-free status of philanthropy has been the favorite tool of society in shaping the development of charitable activities. Certain activities are simply better handled in society through private charity as opposed to the business sector of government; a pattern now threatened by the 91st Congress.

It would appear that some sort of a user charge to defray the administrative expenses of examining exempt foundations and other organizations would be a better alternative to a tax on investment income. Such a fee, likened to that paid by national banks to the Comptroller of the Currency, could be based on the organization's net assets. These fees could then be ear-marked for the Revenue Service's audit program.

2. Distribution of Income

In particular, the "income equivalent" provision requiring a minimum 5 percent yield is totally unrealistic. Foundation managers, instead of concentrating on their task of philanthropy, will have to spend the majority of this time chasing the vagaries of the stock market to grasp the ever-elusive 5 percent return. This is an all too apparent fault in the House Bill.

Congress should seek to encourage responsible foundation managers to work toward eradication of poverty, the rebuilding of our central cities, the lifting of our schools to a new level of quality and the accomplishment of the other formidable tasks that challenge society at the tail end of the 20th Century, not to chase after a glamour stock that yields the magical figure of 5 percent.

Foundation managers are required to maintain a prudent investment portfolio which would, presumably, include a mixture of growth, as well as income type investments.[1] To peg an arbitrary figure as a minimum yield makes as much sense as if the SEC required mutual funds similarly to guarantee a 5 percent yield. The vitality of voluntary action ought not to be hobbled by the rigidity of stated annual yield.

In speaking in opposition to portions of this Bill, I do not mean to indicate that the concept of reform of tax abuse in the foundation area is not necessary or appropriate. The process should, however, be a deliberate one—not spurred by the emotion of the moment.

I know you will be good enough to do what you can to bring about the necessary relief from H. R. 13270—so essential to the preservation of private foundations and their charity and institution beneficiaries.

I would like to take the liberty of suggesting that if, after you have had an opportunity to consider this letter, you find any or all of the points to bear merit, you will call them to the attention of the Committee staff.

Sincerely,

JACOB BLAUSTEIN.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1969.

Re: Stock Ownership Limitation (Section 101(b)—H. R. 13270 New Section 4943 of the Code).

INTRODUCTION

This provision of the bill limits to 20 percent the combined ownership of a corporation's voting and nonvoting stock held by a private foundation[2] and those who, under broad rules of stock ownership attribution, are referred to as "disqualified persons." To the extent that a foundation and disqualified persons own stock in excess of the 20 percent limitation, the foundation must dispose of its stock within a 10-year period. This provision will, single-handedly, cause the liquidation of countless private foundations and will make it impossible for many men of wealth to contribute to philanthropy the most valuable asset they have: shares of the businesses built up by themselves, their family or a small group.

The general philosophy behind such legislation is the assumption that a foundation owning together with so-called disqualified persons, more than 20 percent of a corporation's voting stock will become preoccupied with the business of business rather than its charitable purpose.

While there is much to be said in favor of prohibiting foundation trustees and managers from engaging in the business of its equity investments, the House Bill would unnecessarily destroy a substantial source of philanthropic support to curb some abuses which may arise from control. Two basic shortcomings cause the Bill to have effects upon philanthropy far beyond these presumably intended or socially desirable. The first, the rules dealing with attribution, are excessively broad in some instances and totally unnecessary in others. For example, under these rules, a foundation can be deemed to be in control of a corporation in which it has no vote and, therefore, no control. The second reflects the absence of a realistic method in which a foundation can divest itself of shares of closely held stock to meet the House Bill's limitation on stock ownership and still make available to charity the most cash possible. Closely held stock has no market and cannot be sold for its real worth. The only method of obtaining real worth for charitable purposes is through redemption.

ATTRIBUTION RULE

The 20 percent limitation of combined stock ownership is an arbitrary rule which substitutes arithmetic for reason. It has the sole advantage of being a clear cut rule. But even this advantage becomes fuzzy when the rules of attribution—the deeming of stock owned by others to be owned by the Foundation—are applied. The basic presumption is that when a foundation has more than 20 percent of a corporation's voting stock its managers will become involved in business to the detriment of philanthropy. This, however becomes strained to the breaking point when, for example, a foundation with nothing but the nonvoting stock of a corporation finds itself charged with all the voting stock owned by:

> "a substantial contributor (anyone who has contributed more than $5,000 in any one calendar year or more than any other contributor in any one calendar year), a foundation manager, an individual who owns more than 20% of a corporation which is a substantial contributor, a holder of more than 20% of the beneficial interest of a trust or unincorporated enterprise which is a substantial contributor, a member of the family (under the personal holding company and collapsible corporation attribution rules) of any such person, or a corporation, partnership, trust, or estate as to which all such persons own in the aggregate more than 35%." [1]

To equate nonvoting stock with voting common stock is like assuming that holders of Series E Savings Bonds can vote on federal legislation. The presumption of business involvement is nonsense when nonvoting stock is held by a foundation. The attribution rules, while properly broad when dealing with matters such as self-dealing, have no relevance in the context of the provisions of the House Bill dealing with control by a foundation.

REDEMPTION

A second and equally troublesome feature of the House Bill is its failure effectively to provide a mechanism for: (1) private foundations to comply with a forced divestiture of stock in a closely held company; and (2) for public charities to obtain cash for closely held stock in a manner which will most benefit charitable purposes.

Many public charities and private foundations presently hold stock in closely held companies. Indeed, for over 50 years such stock has been considered by the Treasury as perfectly legitimate holdings for foundations. Under The House Bill, private foundations required to divest themselves of closely held stock can meet this requirement by sale, by gift to a public charity, or by redemption. Realistically, however, redemption of the stock by the issuing company is the only method for the charity to obtain a market and a fair market value. The transfer by the private foundation of closely held securities to a public charity, without the capacity of sale by the recipient, is a paltry gift unless the public charity can otherwise convert it into expendable cash.

Many persons of wealth whose property is concentrated in closely held corporations customarily leave substantial gifts to private and public charities under their wills. The House Bill will discourage future generous gifts of such stock to private foundations if the gift will make the foundation a 20% or more shareholder, unless there is some way for the foundation to divest itself of the shares. Likewise, when testamentary gifts are made to public charities, or if the public charities receive closely held stock from private foundations, a method must be devised to allow the conversion of the stock into cash. Unless a redemption provision is provided, charity will get something substantially less than the true worth of the securities in both instances.

WHY REDEMPTION IS NOT CURRENTLY FEASIBLE

The House Bill does not forbid redemptions from public charities or private foundations. In fact, the Committee Report recognizes that closely held stock may be redeemed. To facilitate this end, the prohibition against self-dealing is relaxed in such cases where the stock is sold for fair market value by the foundation to a disqualified person which may be the corporation. Nonetheless, certain other possible interpretations of the Internal Revenue Code may make the redemption so dangerous to the donor and to the closely held corporation that redemption is impossible.

The Internal Revenue Service has sometimes taken the position that where a corporation redeems shares which have been received by a foundation as gifts, the redemption amounts to a taxable dividend at high rates, to the original donors. How far the courts will go along with this position is, perhaps, another matter, but the prospect of the assertion of dividend consequences is a chilling one. It should be made clear that a redemption of closely held stock presently held by, or received as a testamentary bequest by a private foundation or owned or received by a public charity would not produce dividend consequences to the donors or to the decedent's estate.

So far as the redeeming corporation is concerned, the problem is the possible assertion of the penalty tax upon unreasonable accumulation of income under section 531 of the Internal Revenue Code. For purposes of the penalty tax the Code presently allows a deduction for corporate charitable contributions in excess of the 5 percent of adjusted gross income normally allowed corporations as a deductible charitable contribution. An additional deduction should be allowed for the indirect charitable contribution made through a redemption of closely held shares.

Over the history of our modern income tax, closely held and family businesses have been protected and sheltered from adverse tax effects which would cause the demise of the closely held business as a part of our economic life. For example, Congress recognized that death taxes could easily force a closely held business to liquidate, merge, or "go public" under extreme duress. Accordingly, it provided for stock redemption to pay death taxes without dividend consequences to the estate.

Similar protection must be given to testamentary gifts of securities in closely held companies, if our pluralistic approach to philanthropy is to continue.

A private foundation required to divest a portion of its publicly traded securities has no problem. A private foundation or a public charity holding a security with no available market other than the issuing company will have difficulty realizing the full value of such assets. Consistent with the desire for charity to obtain the full value of such assets, they should be encouraged to convert the closely-held stock into cash and thereafter be on parity with other private foundations or public charities which hold marketable securities. Thus, they will be in a better position to carry out their charitable purpose.

LEGISLATIVE SOLUTIONS

1. Attribution.—The attribution rules should be amended so as not to be applicable to section 101(b) of the House Bill. If the attribution rules are retained with respect to section 101(b), at a very minimum, they should not apply to a private foundation which itself owns no voting stock.

2. Redemption.—Affirmative legislation should be added to the House Bill to permit:

(a) Private foundations to offer to the issuing corporation for redemption over a ten year period any stock in a closely-held corporation which is an excess business holding as of the effective date of the act or becomes an excess business holding because of a subsequent testamentary bequest, with no adverse tax effects to the foundation, the redeeming corporation, its stockholders, or the donor.

(b) Public charities to offer at any time closely held stock to the issuing corporation for redemption without adverse tax effects upon the redeeming corporation, its stockholders or the donor.

Attached is a draft bill intended to amend H.R. 13270 accordingly.

SUGGESTED REVISED TEXT OF BILL

§ 4943(e) DISPOSITION OF CLOSELY HELD STOCK BY REDEMPTION

Notwithstanding any other provisions of this section, a private foundation may dispose of excess business holdings in a closely held business enterprise owned by a private foundation on the effective date of this section or received by such foundation by bequest thereafter, by redemption of such stock by the issuing corporation during a ten year period beginning on the effective date of this section or beginning on the date the estate tax return for a testator has been filed. For purposes of this section a closely held business enterprise is defined as one in which five or fewer persons and one or more private foundations own, directly or indirectly, 85 percent or more of the outstanding stock of a corporation. For purposes of direct or indirect ownership a person shall be considered as owning the stock owned directly or indirectly, by his brothers and sisters (of half or whole blood), their spouses, their lineal descendants, his spouse, his ancesters and his lineal descendants.

§ 302(f) REDEMPTION OF STOCK HELD BY CERTAIN PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

Notwithstanding any other provisions of this section, distributions made in the redemption of stock held by a private foundation, as defined in section 509, or held by a public charity as defined in section 509, of a closely held business enterprise, as defined in section 4943(e), shall not constitute the equivalent of a dividend to the private foundation, the public charity or to any other shareholders of the redeeming corporation.

The first sentence of 535(b)(2) as amended, shall read:

2. CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS. The deduction for charitable contributions, and for amounts paid out to public charities or private foundations in redemptions of a closely held business enterprise, as defined in section 4943(e), shall be allowed, but in computing such deductions the limitations in section 170(b)(1) (A) and (B) shall apply, and section 170(b) (2) and (5) shall not apply. (New matter italicized.)

§ 4941(d)(2)(F) is amended to read:

(F) Any transaction between a private foundation and a corporation which is a disqualified person (as defined in section 4946), pursuant to any liquidation, merger, redemption, recapitalization or other corporate adjustment or reorganization, shall not be an act of self-dealing if all of the securities of the same class as that held by the foundation are subject to the same terms, except for a redemption of stock of a closely held business enterprise as provided in section 4943(e), in which case redemptions need not be made or offered to other holders of shares of the same class, and provided that such terms provide for receipt by the foundation of no less than fair market value. (Italicized material is new.)

Add a new subsection to section 303(a) to read as follows:

(3) the amount paid out in redemption of stock of closely held business enterprises, as provided in section 4943(e).

Re Charitable Contributions of Appreciated Property (sections 201(d) and (d) of the Bill, Sections 170 and 83 of the Code.)

INTRODUCTION

Predicated upon the stated desire "to remove some of the present tax advantages of gifts of appreciated property over gifts of cash," this provision of the House Bill drives a further wedge between charitable institutions. It develops an elitist group of charities to which Congressionally recognized undesirable tax advantages will be permitted and a second class of charity where no such advantage will be brooked.

As to the first class of charity, the donor may continue to deduct the fair market value of contributed property. Where, however, the donee is a private foundation, the House Bill requires the donor to elect as the measure of his contribution of property (1) his cost or other basis in the property, or (2) the fair market value of the property, but he must include in his tax base the untaxed appreciation with respect to the property involved.

This provision of the House Bill draws a line totally lacking in rationality. Under this provision, for example, a gift of appreciated property to a local P.T.A. would be entitled to a fair market value deduction while a similar gift to the the Brookings Institute would, because it is a private foundation, be limited to the donor's cost or subject him to tax upon the appreciation. The judgment as to favored and disfavored charity could hardly be based upon objective evidence. Indeed, it smacks of crass discrimination for it is no argument to condemn the gift of appreciated property and then merely select out of the impact of the bill an illogical slice of charitable institutions.

APPRECIATION AS A MEASURE OF DEDUCTIBILITY

Historically, the Treasury has accepted the proposition that there is no realization of income when appreciated property is donated.[1]

Since the beginning of World War II, the appreciation factor has played an increasingly large part in the stimulation of charitable giving. To that large segment of the population who wish to be generous and only have appreciated property to donate, they realistically have no choice but to ignore the needs of private foundations and give to those charities to which the contribution will be afforded greater credit "for tax purposes." To assume the contrary is to ignore a basic fact of life in mid-twentieth century America.

Thus the real impact of this provision is to shift donations away from the work of private foundations in certain instances and to shut off the flow completely in other instances. Such an effect is all the more troublesome when it is recognized that the work of philanthropy in the nation is as beset by inflation as is the private economy. Just at the point in our history when the demands on private philanthropy are at their high point, the Congress is considering legislation which would shut off the flow of funds. It is illogical—and this provision should be struck from the Bill.

Re. The Clay-Brown Provision (Section 121, H.R. 13270 Sections 512 and 514 of the Code.)

INTRODUCTION

The House Bill seeks to overcome the situation where a tax exempt organization acquires a business by agreeing to pay the former owners a percentage of future profits until the purchase price is paid in full with no commitment for payment other than from the assets or income of the transferred business. The Bill reaches this result by imposing the unrelated business income tax on the income received by the exempt organization in proportion to the existing debt on the income producing property. The legislation is sound and long overdue.

However, as drafted, the House Bill could produce certain unintended inequities. Specifically, the language of sections 514(b) and 514(c) (1) (C) could be interpreted as covering a transaction in which a charitable foundation borrows money in order to make a contribution in furtherance of its charitable purposes and pledges recently-acquired donated property as collateral for the loan.

BACKGROUND

Since the specific transaction with respect to which we are concerned has already been entered into, after favorable rulings by the Internal Revenue Service (as later herein indicated), the background and surrounding facts become quite relevant.

The Foundation entered into an agreement with a university wherein the Foundation agreed to grant $500,000 to the university for the construction of a building for its Center of American Studies. The total grant is to be paid over the construction period in quarterly installments sufficient to cover the university's current construction costs.

In order to help the Foundation meet this increased financial burden, one of its founders transferred shares of publicly-traded common stock to an irrevocable trust for the benefit of the Foundation. The trust is to remain in existence for a period of ten years and one day, or until $650,000[1] in income payments are received by the Foundation, whichever occurs later. Under the terms of the trust indenture, all of the income from the corpus of the trust belongs absolutely to the Foundation and is to be paid over to it in quarter-annual installments by the bank trustee. Upon the termination of the trust, the trust principal, as then constituted, will be returned to the lender (or his estate, in the event of his prior death) as his absolute property.

While it is anticipated that the amount of income to be derived from the trust over its entire term will be more than adequate to fund the Foundation's grant, it will not be sufficient during the construction period to cover the Foundation's obligation under the agreement. In order to raise the funds necessary to meet the quarterly payments to the university, as they become due, the Foundation arranged to borrow a total of $500,000 from a bank. As security for the loan (or loans), the Foundation assigned its income rights under the trust agreement to the bank.

By virtue of the foregoing transaction, it will be possible for the Foundation, with the then current net worth of $257,000, to make available the entire $500,000 grant to the university in such a manner and at such times as will permit the university to meet the expenses of the building's construction as they become due during the construction period, and the Foundation will have funds to pay off the loan.

The Foundation received favorable rulings from the Internal Revenue Service determining that (1) no part of the income of the trust would be taxed to its grantor, (2) the trust would be allowed a deduction under section 642(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for all of the income paid to the Foundation, and (3) none of the described transactions would adversely affect the exempt status of the Foundation.

The Committee Report makes it clear that unrelated debt-financed income would be taxable as unrelated business income "if the income arises from property acquired or improved with borrowed funds and the production of the income is unrelated to the" purposes of the exempt organization. In the situation with which we are concerned, the property acquired, the income interest in the trust, was not acquired with borrowed funds, but was, in fact, donated. The arrangement would not, therefore, appear to be within the policy of the Bill.

DEFINITIONAL PROBLEM

The Bill as drafted (proposed section 514(b)), however, defines "debt financed property" as "any property which is held to produce income and with respect to which there is an acquisition indebtedness (as defined in subsection (c) at any time during the taxable year . . ." Section 514(c)(1)(C) in turn defines "acquisition indebtnedness" as:

"The indebtedness incurred after the acquisition or improvement of such property if such indebtedness would not have been incurred but for such acquisition or improvement and the incurrence of such indebtedness was reasonably foreseeable at the time of such acquisition or improvement. . . ."

It appears to us that, as drafted, this language may inadvertently apply to the type of transaction entered into by the Foundation. While the Foundation did not borrow funds for the purpose of acquiring or improving property, the indebtedness probably would not and could not have been incurred unless the Foundation were given the income interest in the trust which could be pledged with the lender-bank.

We find it difficult to believe that such a result lies anywhere within the realm of the avowed legislative purpose—to extend the unrelated business income tax provided by section 514 of existing law to the Clay-Brown type of transaction and similar cases. Certainly, no public policy is served by reaching such a result in a situation in which a foundation is merely anticipating its income in the interests of a university.

SOLUTION

We suggest that Congress' intention not to extend this legislation to such ends can be made clearer that it has been by expanding the Committee Report to read as follows (at p. 46):

"Under the bill, the unrelated debt-financed income is included in 'unrelated business income.' It would be subject to tax, however, only if the income arises from property acquired or improved with borrowed funds and the production of the income is unrelated to the educational, charitable, religious, or other purpose constituting the basis of the organization's tax exemption. Borrowing by the exempt organization for its own exempt purposes would be unaffected by the bill. Where a foundation pledges recently acquired property in order to borrow funds which it immediately uses for tax exempt purposes and neither the donor of the pledged property nor any other private individual receive any direct or indirect financial benefit either as a result of the transfer of the property or the borrowing by the organization, it will be assumed that the borrowing is for the organization's 'own exempt purposes' . . ." (underlined portion added.)

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1969

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to recess, at 9:30 a.m., in room 2221, New Senate Office Building, Senator Clinton P. Anderson, presiding.

Present: Senators Long (chairman), Anderson, Gore, Talmadge, Williams of Delaware, Bennett, Miller, Jordan of Idaho, Fannin, and Hansen.

Senator ANDERSON. The hearing will come to order. Is Senator Yarborough, Senator Percy, Congressman Blackburn, or Justice Goldberg here? No. Then I believe the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, the Honorable B. Everett Jordan would like to introduce our first witnesses. Senator?

STATEMENT OF HON. B. EVERETT JORDAN, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

Senator JORDAN of North Carolina. Thank you Senator Anderson.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee: I am here this morning to introduce to you Mr. Thomas Perkins, Chairman of the Board of the Duke Endowment; Mr. Marshall Pickens, chairman of the hospital and orphanage section of the Duke Endowment; and Mr. Richard Thigpen, attorney for the Duke Endowment.

I personally am very much interested in any tax bill that affects the Duke Endowment for the following reason: I am a member of the Board of Trustees of Duke University and I am chairman of the Board of Trustees of Alamance County Hospital in Burlington, N.C. Being in these two positions, I have intimate association with the members of the Duke Endowment and I am thoroughly familiar with the workings of the Endowment.

The entire distribution of the assets that come from the Duke Endowment goes to aid every single orphan both black and white in the States of North and South Carolina. Negro university Johnson C. Smith in Charlotte receives annually. Duke University in Durham, N.C. (the entire university and medical school) receives a large amount of aid from this Endowment and in fact could not remain in operation without this aid. Furman University at Greenville, S.C., receives annual aid from this Endowment.

Every hospital in North and South Carolina receives $1 per day for every charitable patient. Money is provided to help build rural Methodist churches in North and South Carolina. Some money is provided for retired Methodist preachers in North and South Carolina.

The above mentioned institutions and individuals are provided for in the endowment and the proceeds from the endowment cannot be used for any other purpose.

Anything that would change the tax status to curtail the amount of money that the Duke Endowment can contribute to the above agencies would come from the orphans school funds, the hospitals and churches, and retired ministers; so I hope very much that nothing will be done to change the status of the Duke Endowment.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for letting me appear before your committee this morning.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD E. THIGPEN, COUNSEL, THE DUKE ENDOWMENT; ACCOMPANIED BY THOMAS L. PERKINS, CHAIRMAN, BOARD OF TRUSTEES, AND MARSHALL PICKENS, VICE CHAIRMAN

Mr. PERKINS. Thank you Senator.

I am chairman of the board of trustees. We are very grateful for your giving us a chance of telling you how the House bill affects Duke Endowment and, more importantly, the people of North Carolina and South Carolina. Mr. Richard E. Thigpen, counsel for Duke Endowment.

Mr. THIGPEN. Mr. Chairman, this is an unexpected honor to lead off this morning but we are glad we are here and you are here so that we can proceed and not take up too much time. On my left here is Mr. Marshall I. Pickens, vice chairman of the Duke Endowment and Mr. Perkins.

I am Richard E. Thigpen, an attorney of Charlotte, N.C., tax counsel for the Duke Endowment.

We have heretofore filed our formal statement and we request that that be made a part of the record.

Senator ANDERSON. Without objection that will be done.

Mr. THIGPEN. Today I would like, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, to talk briefly about the Duke Endowment and three of the proposed sections in H.R. 13270 as they affect the Duke Endowment. Mr. Justice Holmes once said that a page of history is worth a book of logic, and when I read all that has been said about H.R. 13270, I would like to get down a few historic facts.

A page in the history of philanthropy will well show the success of Mr. James B. Duke's vision for the economic and industrial development of the Carolinas and also his great concern for the social welfare of the two States. He had a great interest in developing the water power resources of the Carolinas and just as the Carolinas have gone forward industrially he took a large portion of the revenues from the electrical development and turned those revenues into the social welfare and betterment of the people of the two Carolinas.

In 1924 he set up the Duke Endowment by an irrevocable indenture, which had as its principal asset a large block of the Duke Power Company stock. It was then worth about 40 millions of dollars, all of the assets of the Duke Endowment. At December 31, 1968, except for about a million dollars in cash the assets of the Duke Endowment were government bonds, corporate bonds, and shares of stock all productive investments, with a fair market value at that time in excess of 600 millions of dollars.

From the beginning of the Duke Endowment in 1924 through 1968, the Duke Endowment had gross income of $331 million of which nearly 63 percent came from the dividends on the stock of the Duke Power Co. Over these years, 285 millions of dollars have been distributed to or set aside for charity and religion and education in North Carolina and in South Carolina.

The actual payments to the beneficiaries over the entire period of the Duke Endowment amounted to 78 percent of the gross income, 83 percent of the net income, and 90 percent of the net distributable income.

Now, I have to use that latter phrase, net distributable income because under the terms of the indenture, Mr. Duke very wisely provided that we should set aside 20 percent of the income on the original corpus in order to increase the assets of the Duke Endowment, and we have accumulated 25 millions of dollars under that provision, which will be satisfied within a very few years now.

Since 1925 we have published reports of all the activities of the Duke Endowment, and in 1968 the annual report gives a full account of the stewardship of the trustees of the Duke Endowment administering to four universities, about 200 hospitals, all of the orphanages in North and South Carolina and the rural Methodist churches in North Carolina, and making provision to aid the superannuated ministers of that denomination.

All of the provisions for the taxation and regulation of private foundations will affect the Duke Endowment, but today we are concerned with section 506, tax on private foundation investment income, section 4942, taxes on failure to distribute income, and the section 4943, taxes on excess business holdings.

We are concerned because these taxes, if imposed, will reduce the amount of money that the Duke Endowment can disburse for health, education, and welfare in North and South Carolina.

Let's look for a moment at the section 560 tax which is 7½ percent under the House bill. This is a minimal tax on the net investment income but it is not a tax upon true net income, because only the expense of producing investment income and managing the investment property are allowed as deductions from gross investment income.

But even assuming that all expenses of operating the Duke Endowment are deductible, this tax would take at least 1½ million dollars each year out of the moneys that are available for the work of the Duke Endowment in the Carolinas. For instance, Duke University, and I happen to be a trustee of Duke University so I know something about the financial problems, Duke University would lose at least $684,000 by reason of this tax, the first year, and the 191 hospitals in North Carolina and South Carolina would be short about $596,000 by reason of this tax in 1 year.

The real distributable income of the Duke Endowment is the amount remaining after expenses and the mandatory accumulations. The 1968 net distributable income was $18,166,000 of which 99½ percent was paid to charity, religion, and education in North Carolina and South Carolina.

There remained only a balance of $98,700 and some dollars undistributed.

The thrust of these provisions should be such that if there is a flow-through to charity and there is no delayed benefit to charity the minimal tax should not apply when such payments exceed 90 percent of net income.

We also think that section 504 and 681 of the Internal Revenue Code should not be repealed because those provisions put a testamentary trust and a living trust on the same basis with regard to accumulations under instruments that became effective prior to 1951.

Let's look for a moment at section 4942 which levies an excise tax of 15 percent upon the net investment income of the Duke Endowment after qualifying distributions.

The statute prescribes a minimum investment income of 5 percent and that is based on 5 percent of the fair market value of the assets at the beginning of the year. It might be better if that tax was levied upon the book value or the cost of the assets at the beginning of the year. But let's look at an example, for instance as it affects us.

The 1968 gross income of the Duke Endowment was $21,494,000 which was about 3½ percent return on $613 million which was the fair market value of the assets at December 31, 1967.

The statutory 5 percent required return would be in excess of $30 million. The difference between the minimum investment income of over $30 million and the distributable amount of $18 million is in excess of $12 million on which the tax would be at least $1,871,000 for 1972 and subsequent years, and that must come out of corpus and thereby reduce the assets upon which or from which income is produced for these health, education, and welfare projects in the Carolinas.

The excise tax under this section would be on unrealized income, and we would be reducing our productive assets continually when we are subjected to that tax.

Let's look at another section for a few moments, section 4943, which deals with divestiture. But section 4943 imposes an excise tax of 5 percent of the value of excess business holdings. The Duke Endowment and disqualified persons own nearly 74 percent of the stock of the Duke Power Co. The stock, this stock, paid the Duke Endowment $16,845,000 in dividends in 1968, at the rate of $1.30 per share, and that dividend has gradually increased carrying out Mr. Duke's desire to provide a steady source of revenue to take care of these social welfare projects.

These dividends were 78.85 percent of gross income in 1968.

Under the proposed statute the Duke Endowment would have excess business holdings of 12 million shares of stock in the Duke Power Co. Assuming a value of $30 per share on the basic date, the aggregate value of the stock would be $360 million and that would support a tax of $18 million, which again would come out of corpus, which again would reduce the assets that were held to produce income for the benefit of the various institutions set forth in the indenture.

It is true that the statute provides for disposition of such excess holdings over a period of 10 years, but sales of 54 percent of the stock, even within that period would depress the value of the stock to a great extent.

The Duke Power Co. is a regulated public utility. It is regulated by the Public Utilities Commissions of North and South Carolina by the Federal Power Commission, by the Atomic Energy Commission, and they have to go before the SEC on matters of financing stock issues and bond issues.

The Duke Power Co. stock for many years has been traded upon stock exchanges. And the indenture of the Duke Endownment requires the retention of the Duke Power Co. stock, and it also prohibits the invasion of principal.

Back in 1963 the trustees of the Duke Endowment sought to revise the investment provisions of the indenture so as to diversify. The Supreme Court of North Carolina said that could not be done. Their exception provisions of subsection (k)(4) which should be enlarged to include such foundations as the Duke Endowment. They should extend the 55 percent limitation to 75 percent with respect to stock ownership and the provision of (k)(5) should be reduced from at least 80 percent of income from such stock to at least 75 percent with respect to income from such stock.

There are other problems which we will encounter but they can be disposed of by further exceptions to 4943 until the governing instrument of the Duke Endowment could be revised.

Briefly, the estimated effect of these three provisions of this proposed bill would cost the Duke Endowment $21,300,000, a portion of out income, a portion out of corpus, but in any event the beneficiaries, white and black orphans homes, a Negro university, Duke, Davidson and Furman Universities, United Methodist Churches and hospitals in North and South Carolina will have a whole lot less money to use for their religious, charitable and educational programs.

If such taxes are imposed then we urge that the exceptions suggested in our formal statement filed for the Duke Endowment, be incorporated in the revised bill as it comes out of this committee.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen for the opportunity of appearing before you today.

Mr. PERKINS. Could I add one thing, Mr. Chairman? The Duke Power Company is required to supply the power needs of certain portions of North Carolina and South Carolina. In order to do this we are continually building facilities. Our cash needs for the next five years are estimated at $1½ billion. Of this amount $370 million will have to be raised through the sale of equity securities. If the Duke Endowment is required to divest itself of some $400 million worth of securities at the same time Duke Power Company is seeking to sell almost an equal amount it would be very difficult for us to raise the sums of money that will permit us to properly carry out our duties. Thank you, sir.

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you very much for your appearance.

(Mr. Thigpen's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF THE DUKE ENDOWMENT, PRESENTED BY RICHARD E. THIGPEN, THIGPEN & HINES, CHARLOTTE, N.C.

SUMMARY

I. For 45 years The Duke Endowment has distributed 78% of its gross income and 90% of its net distributable income to charity, religion and education in North Carolina and South Carolina. In 1968 these distributions were 83.65% of gross income and 99.5% of net distributable income. (pp. 1–3)

II. The section 506 tax of 7½% would cost the tax-exempt beneficiaries of The Duke Endowment at least $1½ million each year. If imposed, this tax should not apply to trusts like The Duke Endowment, governed by irrevocable trust agreements. (pp. 4–7)

III. If the tax of 15%, imposed by section 4942, had been assessed for 1968, The Duke Endowment would have paid $1,871,212 out of corpus. If imposed, this tax should not apply to trusts governed by irrevocable trust agreements prohibiting the invasion of corpus and requiring the retention of productive investments. (pp. 8–9)

IV. The exclusion provided in subsection 4 of section 4943 should be enlarged to 75%, and section 4943 made inapplicable to a trust governed by an irrevocable instrument requiring the trustees to hold specified business interests. (pp. 10–11)

V. Conclusion—if section 101 of H.R. 13270 becomes law the payments to charity, religion and education in North Carolina and South Carolina will be reduced. (p. 12)

STATEMENT

H.R. 13270 and the committee report thereon have been studied to determine the effect the provisions on private foundations will have upon the operations of The Duke Endowment.

I. Background and operation

The Duke Endowment was created December 11, 1924, by James B. Duke, who placed $40 Million worth of property in trust. The trust agreement is irrevocable. Twenty percent of the net income is added to corpus, and the balance is distributed to specified tax-exempt beneficiaries. Since creation, The Duke Endowment has operated continuously under the terms of the trust indenture and, up through December 31, 1968, has made the following allocations and appropriations to the beneficiaries named in the governing instrument:

Income available for allocation and appropriation in accordance with the terms of the Trust Indenture	$285,182,859
Allocation and appropriation thereof:
Duke University, Durham, North Carolina	$143,226,522
Davidson College, Davidson, North Carolina	10,456,795
Furman University, Greenville, South Carolina	10,533,665
Johnson C. Smith University, Charlotte, North Carolina	7,235,645
Hospitals in North and South Carolina	70,883,301
Orphanages in North and South Carolina	10,585,498
Methodist Churches in North Carolina:
(a) Superannuated Preachers	2,358,693
(b) Building Rural Churches	5,233,998
(c) Operating Rural Churches	4,130,913
Funds set apart as endowment and held for the benefit of Duke, Davidson, Smith and Furman	19,261,228
Funds held for appropriation	1,276,601

These allocations were made from gross income of $331,563,772, of which nearly 63% represents dividends on stock of Duke Power Company. The disbursements to the several beneficiaries totalled $258,564,162, which were about 78% of gross income, 83% of net income, and 90% of net distributable income.

The mandatory accumulations added to principal amounted to $25,698,113 at December 31, 1968. These accumulations produced more than $20 Million of income, which thereby increased distributions to beneficiaries.

The table below summarizes the allocations, appropriations and payments for calendar year 1968.

	Allocations (in thousands)	Payments (in thousands)
Duke University	$8,034.3	$7,771.7
Davidson College	728.0	716.8
Furman University	708.0	696.8
Johnson C. Smith University	585.1	412.8
Hospitals	6,542.9	6,770.0
Orphanages	742.0	721.2
Methodist churches in North Carolina:
(a) Superannuated preachers	250.7	249.7
(b) Building rural churches	259.9	360.0
(c) Operating rural churches	341.2	368.9
	18,192.1	18,067.9

THE 1968 FINANCIAL STATEMENT

	Amount	Percent
Gross Income:
Dividends	$19,474,771.60	90.17
Interest	2,026,791.57	9.38
Capital gains	96,267.05	.45
Total	21,597,830.22	100.00
Expenses were	1,615,394.17	7.48
Net income	19,982,436.05
Mandatory accumulations	1,815,821.87	8.41
Net distributable income	18,166,614.18
Payments to beneficiaries	18,067,869.49	83.65
Balance	98,744.69	.46

Payments to beneficiaries in 1968 were 83.65% of gross income, 90.0% of net income, and 99.5% of net distributable income.

II. Section 506. The 7½ tax

Assuming that on May 27, 1969, The Duke Endowment was, and is now, a private foundation as defined in section 509, it would be liable for the 7½% tax imposed by section 506 upon net investment income for 1970 and subsequent years.

It is estimated that the net investment income of The Duke Endowment, after all expenses for 1969, will be $21,223,000. A tax of 7½% would amount to $1,591,725. Applying the ratios of 1968 payments to this amount of tax would reduce distributions to beneficiaries as follows:

Duke University	$684,664.59
Davidson College	63,143.73
Furman University	61,392.83
Johnson C. Smith University	36,370.92
Hospitals	596,419.30
Methodist Church	86,191.91

The Indenture of The Duke Endowment limits the beneficiaries to those listed above, and the Indenture further requires that they be paid specified percentages of the net distributable income. All of these beneficiaries will remain tax-exempt under H.R. 13270. In effect, a tax on The Duke Endowment's net investment income becomes a tax on organizations which remain tax-exempt under the new bill.

The "minimal tax" proposed in section 506 will reduce by at least $1½ Million the distributions to charity, religion and education in the States of North and South Carolina. The Treasury proposals and earlier suggestions were directed toward current and adequate returns to charity, with a recognition of mandatory accumulations required "by the governing instrument of existing organizations," and as permitted under section 504(a) of the Internal Revenue Code.

The published annual reports of The Duke Endowment show the vast amount of services performed in meeting "the needs of mankind along physical, mental and spiritual lines" in carrying out the responsibilities of the trustees in accordance with the terms of the trust agreement. The 1968 report contains 36 pages of such work in North Carolina and South Carolina. Schedule 2a, attached to Form 990A for 1968, lists on 20 pages the amounts and purposes for the 1968 distributions of more than $18 Million to beneficiaries. The expenses incurred in the proper distribution of the income, like the administrative expenses of a corporation, may not be treated as having been "paid or incurred for the production or collection of gross investment income or for the management, conservation, or maintenance of property held for the production of such income."

Section 506(a) imposes "a tax equal to 7½ per cent" on the net investment income of every private foundation. Mr. Mills, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, compared this tax to the tax a corporation in the 50% bracket paid upon dividends from another corporation, both U.S. corporations (pp. H. 6987–88 Congressional Record, August 6, 1969). In the case of the corporation, dividends are included in gross income, from which all expenses are deducted, and a special deduction for dividends received is allowed for 85% of the dividends received, restricted to 85% of taxable net income. But, section 506 proposes to tax the private foundation upon its gross income, less the "ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred in the production or collection of gross investment income or for the management, conservation, or maintenance of property held for the production of such income."

Mr. Duke wisely directed that "each trustee shall be paid at the end of each calendar year one equal fifteenth part of three per cent of the incomes, revenues and profits received . . . upon the trust properties and estate during such year . . . in full for all services as trustee hereunder. . . ." (Indenture, Article Second, p. 6). This rate of 3% is less than the rate of 5% allowed trustees in North Carolina. These commissions are proper costs of administration

Where, as in the operation of The Duke Endowment, there is a consistent and undelayed "flow through" to charity, the actual distributions to charity, religion and education should be deducted. At most—the "minimal tax" should apply only to the net income retained by the foundation, after accumulations (within the purview of section 504(a)), all expenses of the foundation and distributions to beneficiaries. Section 504(a) should not be repealed. The "minimal tax" is not for the purpose of raising revenue and has been characterized "as being in part a user fee."

If such a minimal tax is to be imposed, then a provision should be added excluding a trust, such as The Duke Endowment, from the application of the tax. The following provisions are suggested:

1. The tax imposed by section 506 shall not apply to a trust governed by an instrument (in effect and irrevocable on December 31, 1969) setting forth the portion of the net income distributable to designated tax-exempt beneficiaries in any year in which the payments to such beneficiaries of the trust exceed 90% of the net income for such year, which under the governing instument may be distributed.

2. The term "Private Foundation" as defined in section 509 does not include a trust or endowment fund required by terms of the governing instrument (in effect and irrevocable at December 31, 1969) to distribute specified percentages of its net income to specified beneficiaries each year and which is an exempt organization under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code, provided such distributable income is paid over to or set aside for such tax-exempt beneficiaries during or within 180 days after the close of such year.

The provisions (18) and (21) in subsection (j) relating to "technical, conforming, and clerical amendments" should be eliminated and necessary corrections made in order to continue sections 504 and 681 in the Internal Revenue Code (see pp. 66, 70, 71 of H.R. 13270).

III. Section 4942. Tax on undistributed income

In addition to the "minimal tax" of 7½% on net investment income, section 4942 of H.R. 13270 imposes an "initial tax" of 15% on undistributed income and an additoinal tax of 100% of such income "undistributed at the close of the correction period" (the time allowed for paying out amounts treated as undistributed income).

Under this new provisioin, the "Distributable Amount" is not the actual net income of a foundation, but rather whichever of the following amounts is higher:

(1) The minimum investment return, or
(2) The adjusted net income.

Minimum investment income is determined for 1970 by applying a 5% rate of return to the "aggregate fair market value of all assets."

If applicable to The Duke Endowment, the effect of the above provisions would be as follows, using 1968 experience as an example:

1. Gross income	$21,491,553.00
2. Paid Trustee Commissions & Expenses	1,487,364.00
3. Mandatory Accumulations	1,815,821.00
4. Available for Distribution	18,188,366.00
5. Minimum investment income $613,262,353 (FMV 12-31-67) @ 5%	30,663,117.00
6. 1968 Distributions	18,192,067.11

7. The undistributed income (under the proposed statute) is—

Item 5	30,663,117.00
Item 4	18,188,366.00

8. Tax at 15% 1,871,212.00

The effective date for section 4942 in the case of organizatons organized before May 27, 1969, is deferred until taxable years beginning after December 31, 1971, and until it is possible to reform the governing instrument by amendment, judicial proceeding or otherwise to meet the requirements of section 508(g)(1)(A), "so that its income is distributed at such time and in such manner as not to subject the foundation to tax under section 4942."

The Duke Endowment distributes annually all of its distributable income. The application of section 4942 would require a distribution of corpus—which may not be done under the governing instrument. The "minimum investment income" is akin to the "income equivalent requirement" proposed in 1965. Then the Treasury Department stated that: "Provisions for existing organizations whose underlying instruments require an accumulation of current income or prohibit in invasion of corpus may be desirable." The indenture may be "reformed" by judicial proceedings—but a previous attempt at reformation failed Cocke v. Duke University, 260 N.C. 1, 131 S.E. 2d 909 (1963).

If section 4942, or any similar provision is enacted, there should be a further provision, making such section not applicable to foundations such as The Duke Endowment. The exception might read:

Section 4942 shall not apply to a trust governed by an instrument (in effect and irrevocable at December 31, 1969) directing the trustees to accumulate a specified portion of the income of the trust, prohibiting the trustee from invading the corpus of the trust, and requiring the trustee to retain investments that do not produce the minimum investment return.

IV. Section 4943. Tax on excess business holdings

Section 4943 imposes a tax of 5% of the value of excess business holdings in a business at the end of any calendar year and an additional tax of 200% of such excess value at the end of the correction period. Generally, this means the amount of voting stock held by a foundation and disqualified persons in excess of 20% of the voting stock of a corporation with a permissive holding of 35% of such stock where some third party has actual control of the corporation.

Section 4943 does not apply to an organization created by an inter vivos trust which was irrevocable on December 31, 1939, which, together with disqualified persons, owned not more than 55% of the stock of a corporation, the common stock of which was traded on a public stock exchange at all times after 1960 (see Sec. (4), p. 83, H.R. 13270). This exception applies only when (1) the foundation has received at least 80% of its net income in each of the years 1966, 1967, 1968, and 1969 from such stock, (2) neither the donor of such stock nor a member of his family is a foundation manager nor a director of the corporation, and (3) the foundation does not purchase nor acquire any of such stock after July 28, 1969 (see Sec. (5), pp. 84–85, H.R. 13270).

The Duke Endowment and disqualified persons hold 74% of the voting stock of Duke Power Company, a regulated utility corporation whose stock is listed and regularly traded on the New York Stock Exchange. The daughter of the donor is a trustee of The Duke Endowment. The indenture requires the retention of the Duke Power Company stock. Litigation in 1963 (Cocke v. Duke University, 260 N.C. 1, 131 S.E. 2d 909) sought to revise the investment provisions of the 1924 trust indenture, but without success.

In 1968, the Duke Endowment had net income of $18,188,366 and received $16,945,630 from Duke Power Company, which was 78.85% of the total income and 93% of net income. Other years in the 4-year period would be comparable.

Provisions are made in the proposed statute for the disposition of excess holdings, but such provisions do not adequately provide an exception for existing foundations whose governing instruments, as presently drawn, compel them to hold specified business interests. (Tax Reform Studies and Proposals, U.S. Treasury Department, 2–5–1969, part 3, p. 302.)

If section 4943 is adopted, then the excluding provisions of subsection (4) should be changed to cover such foundations and disqualified persons owning

"not more than 75 percent of the stock of a corporation, the common stock of which was traded on a public stock exchange" on July 28, 1969. The percentage change would leave problems created by the special rules of subsection (5), which could be avoided by a provision, such as the following:

The provision of section 4943 (relating to taxes on excess business holdings) shall not apply to a trust governed by an instrument (in effect and irrevocable on July 28, 1969) which compels the trustees to hold specified business interests, if local law prevents suitable revision of the governing instrument.

CONCLUSION

The Duke Power Company has aided the economic and industrial development of the Carolinas. The power company dividends have provided funds for distributions to—

Duke University—a Methodist school,
Davidson College—a Presbyterian school,
Furman University—a Baptist school,
Johnson C. Smith University "an institution of learning for colored people," sponsored by the Presbyterian Church,
Orphanages "for the benefit of white or colored orphans,"
Rural Methodist Churches in North Carolina,
Superannuated Methodist preachers, and Hospitals—"whether for white or colored, and not operated for private gain." Mr. Duke saw the need for hospitals and directed $1 per free bed day for charity patients, and funds for building and equipping such hospitals.

For the past 45 years The Duke Endowment has sought to fulfill the vision of James B. Duke and minister to the "needs of mankind along physical, mental, and spiritual lines" without regard to race or religion in accordance with the provisions of an irrevocable trust agreement.

The benefits flowing annually to the above named tax-exempt organizations will be proportionately reduced if section 101 of H.R. 13270 becomes law.

Senator ANDERSON. Senator Yarborough.

STATEMENT OF HON. RALPH YARBOROUGH, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

Senator YARBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, and members of this committee, I appreciate very much this opportunity to appear before the committee today and discuss briefly two important measures which concern tax reform.

Although I have not read the daily transcript of these hearings in its entirety, I have read many excerpts of the testimony presented to the committee, and I shall limit my remarks to points that have not been covered by testimony before.

First, I want to discuss a measure presently pending in the Senate, of which I have the privilege of being the cosponsor, together with the distinguished presiding Senator, Senator Anderson, Senator Mansfield, the majority leader. In all there are 16 cosponsors of this measure, S. 2277. I anticipate an effort to be made to substitute for this bill, which would impose an excess war profits tax, for the 10-percent surtax. This bill would raise $9½ to $10 billion per year, according to the estimates of the Treasury. The present surtax raises $9½ to $10 billion a year. That is why I voted against the extension of the surtax. I think it is an unjust tax. It falls heaviest on the middle income and the lower middle income taxpayers.

This excess war profits tax is nothing new. We have had this type of tax in three previous wars. In World War I, the excess profits tax raised 39⁹⁄₁₀ percent of the total revenues. In World War II, from 1941 to 1945, it raised $39⁹⁄₁₀ billion which was 30⁸⁄₁₀ percent of all the revenues raised in that war, a sum of $40 billion. We had it from 1946 on, and, it raised $40.6 billion which was 23 percent, 23⁄10 percent, of all of the revenues raised by the Federal Government in that period.

In the Korean conflict, we again enacted an excess war profits tax and during that war, it raised over $7 billion, 3⁄10 percent of the total expenditures.

We have had four major foreign wars in the history of America—World War I, World War II, the Korean conflict, and the Vietnam war. Mr. Chairman, the Vietnam war has cost the American people more money than any war in our history except World War II. I think it is inexcusable that we in the Congress have not levied an excess war profits tax when we had very favorable experience with this type of tax in World War I, World War II, and in the Korean conflict, and instead have put a surtax right on the backs of the people from whom the greater portion of the Federal revenues are raised--individual taxpayers.

The corporate percentage of the total Federal revenue, is much smaller than it was six years ago. Without belaboring the point, I ask leave to print at the conclusion of my remarks in the record a copy of S. 2277, and a copy of the statement I made at the time this bill was introduced pointing out the monies raised and the profits in defense contracts.

Senator ANDERSON. Without objection it will be inserted.

Senator YARBOROUGH. And the second measure to which I would desire to call attention, Mr. Chairman, is my bill which has often been before the Congress, to raise the personal exemption. My bill would raise the personal exemption from $600 to $1,200. I have offered it for 12 years. I ran and was elected to the Senate on that platform, as many others have been, and I have offered it, not only as an original bill earlier this year, S. 1717, but also as an amendment to this pending tax bill.

I think the people of my State, are more interested in an increase in personal exemption than any other one thing in the tax structure of the United States. In support of my amendment, I ask leave to print my full statement in the record. In the interest of time of the Committee, I shall not go through my state item by item, but I think we proved the case irrefutably for an increase.

The $600 fixed in the 1947–48 law represented what was then thought to be enough to support a child in a family unit. This amounts to $50 a month. Since 1948, the cost of living has increased 52⁄10 percent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, that is 52⁄10 of what a family was living on in 1948. Furthermore, since 1948 Americans have increased their standard of living in food, in clothing, and in housing. Considering the present economic conditions, it would take $1,200 now to accomplish the purpose of the $600 exemption of 21 years ago.

But if we just keep it on the cost of living increase, since 1948, and do not allow 1 penny of 1 percent for the increase in level of living of American families, it would still have to be increased to $914 a year. If we just matched the increase in cost of living we would have an exemption of $914. If the committee thinks the stringency of the budget is such that they can't grant an exemption that would bring it up to the level of living now, I hope the committee will consider at least bringing this personal exemption to $900, which would roughly equal the cost of living increase per se if the family didn't increase its living standards, food, clothing, housing since 1948.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, could I have my question now?

Senator ANDERSON. Senator Gore.

Senator GORE. Senator Yarborough, the Secretary of the Treasury says the Government cannot afford this, but I notice that he is very strongly in support of giving tax reduction to corporations that are enjoying the highest profits in history. He is very strong for reducing the top bracket on earned income from 70 to 50 percent. Apparently we can afford those things, but cannot afford to give tax relief where it is needed most, to the man with the most children to feed, clothe, and educate. Your amendment will be the first one that I will offer when we go into executive session tomorrow.

Senator YARBOROUGH. Thank you, Senator Gore. I know from hearing the Senator on the floor, the Senator has been a member of this committee a long time, and I have heard him ably debate the late Senator Bob Kerr, who was one of the ablest debaters in the Senate, and the able Senator from Tennessee always held his ground. I have heard him debate many fair provisions and I want to commend him.

There are other witnesses, and I would like to ask leave to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks S. 1717, and the amendment to this to increase this exemption, and the statement that I made on September 22 in support of this amendment with economic data.

I will not take the time on the economic data as I did with the war profits tax. There are many other items in this bill, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, on which I have made statements in the past, public and some in the Senate, but they have been covered by prior witnesses. Maybe these points had not been, I had not seen in the press that these two had been specifically covered, and that is why I add these two now and ask leave and appreciate the kindness of the committee and I would like to print the statements and supporting data in full without taking the further time of this committee as there are other Senators and many other witnesses waiting. Thank you very much for your courtesy. Are there any other questions?

I would like to say, Senator, I was as shocked as you were when the Secretary of Treasury came here and recommended that the corporate tax be lightened when the share of the total budget paid by the corporations has gone down in 6 years, and the vast profits they are making, we read on the financial pages every day for the past years, how their profits have gone up and up, and he came here and recommended that the share the corporations were to pay be reduced over the House bill, and that the individual taxpayer pay more, when the individual taxpayers share of the budget is going up, and all of us, like you, who are elected officials, who are out actually seeing the people know the pinch that is on the average American. I don't mean just the average American in the lowest income tax bracket, but also the middle-income taxpayer. The white, black, middle-income people are the ones bearing the tough brunt of this situation.

Thank you very much.

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you for coming.

Statement of Hon. Ralph W. Yarborough, a U.S. Senator From the State of Texas

SUMMARY

1. Advocates adoption of Excess War Profits tax in lieu of 10% income tax surcharge. Excess War Profits tax proposed is similar to the one used in World War I, World War II and the Korean conflict. Believes surcharge is regressive and fails to stop inflation. Excess War Profits tax would equitably adjust the tax burden during Vietnam War.

2. Advocates increase in personal exemption from $600 to $1,200. He believes this to be necessary in order to bring exemption in line with the rise in the cost of living and further believes it necessary in order to more equitably relieve the tax burden.

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you and this distinguished Senate Finance Committee and express my views on H. R. 13270 and tax reform generally. The legislative issue that is foremost in the minds of the vast majority of the American people is tax reform. The average American taxpayer has reached the end of his patience with our present tax system which allows some wealthy individuals and big businesses to shift their fair share of our nation's tax burden to the overtaxed lower and middle-income groups. The average American taxpayer is demanding tax relief from his elected representatives in Congress, and he expects to get it.

H. R. 13270 constitutes a major attempt to achieve genuine tax reform and to close some of the loopholes that exist in our present tax system. It is too broad and comprehensive for me to try to discuss its various provisions; hundreds of other witnesses are doing that; I will take a few minutes here to mention vital matters that may not have been adequately covered.

H. R. 13270 does not contain the two tax items which I believe to be absolutely essential to any meaningful tax reform. I strongly urge the Committee to adopt as a part of its tax reform bill the following important measures: (1) an excess war profits tax in place of the 10 percent income tax surcharge, and (2) an increase in the personal exemption from $600 to $1200.

I. Excess war profits tax

The most unjust feature of our present tax system is the 10 percent income tax surcharge. The surcharge, more than any other facet of our tax laws, directly hurts the lower and middle-income taxpayers. It is particularly damaging to those people who must exist on a small fixed income, such as the poor and the aged. In short it is a regressive tax. I was very disappointed that the House included an extension of this unjust tax through June 30, 1970, in H. R. 13270.

Proponents of the 10 percent income tax surcharge have tried to justify it on the basis that it is necessary to fight inflation. No reasonable person would deny that positive governmental action is needed to curb the runway inflation which is ravaging our economy. The truth, however, is that the 10 percent income tax surcharge is not stopping inflation. On the contrary, since the enactment of the surcharge in 1968, the consumer price index and the wholesale price index have risen at the alarming rate of 6 percent. Clearly, as an anti-inflationary device, the surcharge has been a miserable failure.

One of the reasons that the surcharge has failed to stop inflation is that it is not directed at the real cause of inflation—the tremendous cost of the war in Vietnam. The ever increasing cost of this war is driving prices sky high. To effectively fight inflation we must start at the source of the problem. We aid the economy by letting more of this tax burden fall on the excess profits made by war contractors. This is why I strongly urge that the Committee strike the provisions of H. R. 13270 dealing with the income tax surcharge and substitute an excess war profits tax. Such a tax would provide the government with an effective means of financing the war without imposing the financial burden on the segments of our society who are furnishing the manpower to fight it.

The excess war profits tax is not a new concept. We had such a tax in World War I, World War II and the Korean Conflict. Our nation's experience with this type of tax has taught us that it is a fair and effective method of raising the additional revenue needed to meet the increased demands of a wartime economy.

During World War I, this tax raised a total of $6.9 billion dollars. In World War II, it raised $40.6 billion, and $7 billion in the Korean Conflict. It is estimated that the excess war profits tax I propose would produce approximately $10 billion annually in revenue, which exceeds the revenue produced by the surcharge, and aside from the surcharge, far exceeds the revenue that some of the less desirable changes contained in the House bill would probably produce.

An excess war profits tax is a fair tax. As its name implies, it is levied on "excess" not "normal" corporate profits which are attributable to war. The rationale behind this type of tax is that profits which are above normal level are not justified as a reward for past efforts or necessary as an inducement for future productive efforts. However, even more fundamental is the fact that by fighting this war, we are asking special sacrifices from the lower and middle-income groups in America; therefore, it is only right that we require those who are profiting from the war to bear its expenses. Since the hostilities in Vietnam were stepped up, aftertax corporate profits have increased by 33 percent. The simple truth is that some war contractors are getting rich on this war.

An excess profits tax is a proven tax method. It is fair and just. This is why I am a co-sponsor of S. 2277, which would establish an excess war profits tax. The substitution of an excess war profits tax for the income tax surcharge would show the American people that Congress is truly seeking a way to more fairly distribute the onerous tax burden of this nation. I request that a copy of S. 2277, together with a copy of my remarks when it was introduced, be printed at the closing of my remarks in the Record of this hearing.

II. INCREASE IN THE PERSONAL EXEMPTION FROM $600 TO $1,200

No tax reform measure which is intended to bring relief to the lower and middle-income taxpayers will be meaningful unless it includes a significant increase in the personal exemption. For over twelve years, I have worked for an increase in the personal exemption by introducing bills in different Congresses, hoping for some relief. On March 27, 1969, I introduced S. 1717 which would increase the personal exemption from $600 to $1,200. Since the passage of the House tax bill, I have reintroduced my bill as an amendment to H.R. 13270, and ask that a copy of S. 1717 and my amendment to H.R. 13270 be printed in the Record at the conclusion of my remarks.

The present $600 exemption has its genesis in the Revenue Act of 1948. In the 21 years since its adoption the personal exemption has not been increased despite the fact that the cost of living has increased 52.3 percent (based on the level of consumer index since 1948). Under present economic conditions, the $600 would have to be raised to $904 merely to equal the purchasing power of the $600 exemption 21 years ago.

Our standard of living has changed substantially over this period of time, also. Life in the '60's is quite different from that in the '40's and it will be even more different in the '70's. The Bureau of Labor Statistics recently published a study which attempts to answer the question: How much does it cost to live for an urban family of four in the spring of 1967, for three standards of living? The resulting three budgets share the basic assumption that maintenance of health and social wellbeing the nurture of children, the participation in community activities are desirable and necessary social goals.

For the moderate budget, the U.S. urban average cost was $9,076 in spring of 1967. The cost for the lower budget was $5,915, and the higher budget amounted to $13,050. The personal exemptions for a family of four totaled $2,400 which doesn't even approach the total of the lower budget. Certainly exemptions totaling $4,800, which my amendment would provide, are far more equitable.

When the present personal exemption is applied to taxpayers with children in college, the need for an increase becomes even more apparent. The U.S. Office of Education estimates that the average charges for tuition, fees, and room and board for a full-time resident, undergraduate student in a public four-year university for the 1969–70 school year will total $1,288. For other public four-year institutions, the cost for the year is estimated to be $1,043. In private institutions the average charges for the year are estimated to total $2,777 for a university and $2,274 for other four-year colleges. A college education in today's world is not a luxury, but a necessity. Consequently, an increase in the personal exemption would greatly assist the parents who are struggling to help their children prepare for life in the 1970's.

Of course, today's family earns more than its counterpart in 1948. However, the greater part of these increased earnings is attributable to inflation. Inflation together with relentless increases in taxes at every level have made real prosperity for the average American family more elusive than ever.

The most frequently heard argument against increasing the personal exemption is that the government cannot afford the amount of revenue that would be lost. To obtain meaningful tax reform, however, we cannot be blinded by short term effects. Considerations of equity to individual taxpayers must be paramount. In the long run, these tax savings to individuals resulting from an increase in the personal exemption to $1,200 will come back to the government in the form of higher tax payments from other taxpayers. Personal exependitures represent over 60 percent of the gross national product. These additional funds in the hands of consumers will increase the incomes of grocery stores, appliance dealers, clothing manufacturers and others, which will result in a correspondingly larger tax base for the Federal government and increased revenue.

The personal exemption is intended to accomplish three basic purposes: (1) to exclude from taxation those individuals and families with the lowest income; (2) to provide all taxpayers with a deduction from otherwise taxable income for essential living expenses; and (3) to provide an additional allowance to those taxpayers with dependents and for those who are aged and blind. I submit that at the present unrealistic amount of $600, the personal exemption is not fulfilling any of these purposes.

We must remove the glaring inequity of the present personal exemption from our tax structure. The provisions of the tax reform proposal do not go far enough in enabling the low and middle-income taxpayer to achieve the standard of living to which he is entitled. An increase in the personal exemption to $1200, is in my opinion, the best way to accomplish this objective.

The two measures I have discussed today—increasing the personal exemption and institution of an excess war profits tax—are aimed at redistributing this country's tax burden in a fairer way. They are designed to help people, not special interests. The overtaxed majority of our people have no one else to protect their interest but Congress. We must not let them down.

SUMMARY

Mr. Chairman, on total balance, my proposals, if adopted, would result in a much more equitable tax program than that contained in H.R. 13270, and would produce more than sufficient revenue to offset the tax relief items I support.

The essential core of my total program is to replace the surcharge with the excess war profits tax and to bring the personal exemption into line with the realities of the cost of living. I urge the Committee to give full consideration to the matters I have discussed.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before the Finance Committee to express my views.

RALPH W. YARBOROUGH FLOOR STATEMENT, MAY 27, 1969, IN SUPPORT OF WAR PROFIT TAX, S. 2277

Mr. President, I am proud to co-sponsor Senator McGovern's bill to establish an Emergency Excess War Profits Tax.

When James Otis observed in 1764 that "taxation without representation is tyranny" he had in mind the taxation of those without the voting franchise. With the franchise as broad as it is in America, no one can argue that taxes have been extracted from the people without their opportunity to exercise their right to vote.

But a more subtle variation of those famous words has sprung from the complexities of modern society. It is unfortunate, but true, that the development and passage of legislation through the halls of Congress depends a great deal upon which of contesting groups can generate the most clamor and pressure. In this context, those with large and lucrative government contracts have certainly been well represented. But, who, I ask, represents the low and middle income taxpayers when it comes to placing or adjusting the tax burden?

From the way today's tax structure places the greatest load upon those people, it becomes obvious that they have been heard but little at the bar of Congress.

President Nixon says he wants to "lighten the burden on those who pay too much, and increase the burden on those who pay too little." The time to do that is now.

The way to begin the reform of our tax system—which the people now demand and which is long overdue—is by enacting a tax upon those who have reaped high profits off the war in Vietnam, hoping that this move will open the door to eventual repeal of the regressive surtax.

"Equity and fairness demand this. I have with me some tables from articles in the April 21, 1969, issue of U.S. News and World Report reflecting the exorbitant nature of the war contractors earning profits directly and indirectly flowing from the war."

"When the blood of American lives washes into the Mekong or the Song Ba or the Song Cai, each of us are solemnly reminded of the sacrifice so many have made for a cause which many question or do not understand. The dreadful conflict is far too distant for it to be much of a reality to most of America.

"But, it is a sad reality and one that costs money as well as lives. Historically, we have always sought—with fairness and reason—to impose an appropriate tax burden upon those war profiteer enterprises which acquire extraordinary profits during wartime. If this was the road to equity during World War I, World War II, and the Korean War, it is the road to equity now. I supported such an excess war profits tax in the 90th Congress. Unfortunately, it failed. It is long overdue. If we fail to pass it, we value the profits of the war contractor higher than the blood of the men fighting and dying in Vietnam."

A BILL To impose an excess profits tax on the income of corporations during the present emergency

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Excess War Profits Tax Act of 1969".

Sec. 2. (a) Subtitle A of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to income taxes) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new chapter:

"Chapter 7.—Temporary Excess Profits Tax

"Sec. 1601. Imposition of tax.
"Sec. 1602. Definitions.
"Sec. 1603. Adjustments to income for years in emergency period.
"Sec. 1604. Adjusment to income for years in base period.
"Sec. 1605. Unused excess profits deduction adjustment.
"Sec. 1606. Excess profits deduction.

"SEC. 1601. IMPOSITION OF TAX.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—In addition to the other taxes imposed by this subtitle, there is hereby imposed on the income of every corporation, for each taxable year ending or beginning in the emergency period, a tax equal to 37 percent of the excess profits taxable income for the taxable year.

"(b) TAXABLE YEARS PARTLY IN EMERGENCY PERIOD.—In the case of a taxable year which begins before the emergency period or ends after the emergency period, the tax imposed by subsection (a) shall be an amount equal to 37 percent of the excess profits taxable income for the taxable year multiplied by a fraction the numerator of which is the number of days in the taxable year within the emergency period and the denominator of which is the total number of days in the taxable year.

"SEC. 1602. DEFINITIONS.

"(a) EXCESS PROFITS TAXABLE INCOME.—For purposes of this chapter, the term 'excess profits taxable income' means taxable income (computed with the adjustments provided in section 1603 or 1604, but otherwise as computed for purposes of the tax imposed by chapter 1) reduced by the higher of—

"(1) $25,000, or

"(2) the sum of—

"(A) the excess profits deduction for the taxable year, and

"(B) the unused excess profits deduction adjustment for the taxable year.

"(b) EMERGENCY PERIOD.—For purposes of this chapter, the term 'emergency period' means the period beginning on January 1, 1969, and ending on December 31, 1970.

"(c) BASE PERIOD.—For purposes of this chapter, the term 'base period' means the period beginning on January 1, 1961, and ending on December 31, 1964.

"SEC. 1603. ADJUSTMENTS TO INCOME FOR YEARS IN EMERGENCY PERIOD.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—For purposes of this chapter in determining the taxable income of a corporation for a taxable year ending or beginning in the emergency period, the following adjustments shall be made:

"(1) DIVIDENDS RECEIVED.—The deduction for dividends received shall apply, without limitation, to all dividends on stock of all corporations, except that no deduction for dividends received shall be allowed with respect to dividends (actual or constructive) on stock of foreign personal holding companies or dividends on stock which is not a capital asset.

"(2) DISALLOWANCE OF CERTAIN DEDUCTIONS.—The deductions provided in section 247 (relating to deduction for dividends paid on certain preferred stock) and section 922 (relating to special deduction for Western Hemisphere trade corporations) shall not be allowed.

"(3) GAINS AND LOSSES FROM SALES OF EXCHANGES OF CAPITAL ASSETS.—There shall be excluded gains and losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets.

"(4) INCOME FROM RETIREMENT OR DISCHARGE OF BONDS, ETC.—There shall be excluded, in the case of any taxpayer, income derived from the retirement or discharge by the taxpayer of any bond, debenture, note, or certificate or other evidence of indebtedness, if the obligation of the taxpayer has been outstanding for more than 6 months, including, in case the issuance was at a premium, the amount includable in income for such year solely because of such retirement or discharge.

"(5) DEDUCTIONS ON ACCOUNT OF RETIREMENT OR DISCHARGE OF BONDS, ETC.—If during the taxable year the taxpayer retires or discharges any bond, debenture, note, or certificate or other evidence of indebtedness, if the obligation of the taxpayer has been outstanding for more than 6 months, the following deductions for such taxable year shall not be allowed:

"(A) The deduction allowable under section 162 for expenses paid or incurred in connection with such retirement or discharge;

"(B) The deduction for losses allowable by reason of such retirement or discharge; and

"(C) In case the issuance was at a discount, the amount deductible for such year solely because of such retirement or discharge.

"(6) RECOVERIES OF BAD DEBTS.—There shall be excluded income attributable to the recovery of a bad debt if the deduction of such debt was allowable from gross income for any taxable year ending before January 1, 1969, or if such debt was properly charged to a reserve for bad debts during any such taxable year.

"(7) NONTAXABLE INCOME OF CERTAIN INDUSTRIES WITH DEPLETABLE RESOURCES.—In the case of a producer of minerals, a producer of logs or lumber from a timber block, a lessor of mineral property or a timber block, and a natural gas company, there shall be excluded income exempt from the provisions of this chapter under the regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate under section 1606.

"(8) NET OPERATING LOSS DEDUCTION ADJUSTMENT.—The net operating loss deduction under section 172 shall be properly adjusted in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate.

"(9) TAXES PAID BY LESSEE.—If under a lease for a term of more than 20 years entered into prior to January 1, 1969, the lessee is obligated to pay any portion of the tax imposed by this subtitle upon the lessor with respect to the rentals derived by such lessor from such lessee, or is obligated to reimburse the lessor for any portion of the tax imposed by this subtitle upon the lessor with respect to the rentals derived by such lesser from such lessee, such paymen or reimbursement of the tax imposed by this subtitle shall be excluded by the lessor and a deduction therefor shall not be allowed to the lessee. For purposes of this paragraph, an agreement for lease of railroad properties entered into prior to January 1, 1969, shall be considered to be a lease including such term as the total number of years such agreement may, unless sooner terminated, be renewed or continued under the terms of the agreement, and any such renewal or continuance under such agreement shall be considered part of the lease entered into prior to January 1, 1969.

"(10) BAD DEBTS IN CASE OF BANKS.—In the case of a bank (as defined in section 581) using the reserve method of accounting for bad debts, there shall be allowed, in lieu of the amount allowable under the reserve method for bad debts, a deduction for debts which became worthless within the taxable year, in whole or in part, within the meaning of section 166.

"(11) BLOCKED FOREIGN INCOME.—There shall be excluded income derived from sources within any foreign country to the extent that such income would, but for monetary, exchange, or other restrictions imposed by such foreign country, have been includable in the gross income of the taxpayer for any taxable year which preceded its first taxable year under this chapter. In determining the taxable year for which income derived from foreign sources would have been includable (but for such restrictions) in cases where specific identification cannot be made, such determinations shall be made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate. Where income derived from sources within any foreign country is includable (without regard to this sentence) in a taxable year succeeding the first taxable year under this chapter, and but for monetary, exchange, or other restrictions imposed by such foreign country would have been includable in the gross income of the taxpayer for its first taxable year under this chapter, such income, in case such first taxable year began before January 1, 1969, shall be considered (in the application of this paragraph) as having been includable in gross income of a taxable year which preceded such first taxable year in an amount equal to that portion of such income as the number of days prior to January 1, 1969, in such first taxable year bears to the total number of days in such first taxable year. Deductions properly chargeable and allocable to income excluded under this paragraph shall not be allowed.

(12) INTEREST.—The deduction for interest shall be reduced, with respect to interest on the indebtedness included in daily amounts of borrowed capital, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate.

"(13) PAYMENTS FROM FOREIGN SOURCES FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE, ETC.—In the case of a domestic corporation which renders to a related foreign corporation technical assistance, engineering services, scientific assistance, or similar services (such services or assistance being related to the production or improvement of products of the type manufactured by such domestic corporation), there shall be excluded the remuneration for such services or assistance if such remuneration constitutes income derived from sources without the United States. Any deductions in connection with or properly allocable to the rendering of such services or assistance shall not be allowed. For purposes of this paragraph, a foreign corporation shall be considered to be a 'related foreign corporation' if the domestic corporation at the time it renders such services or assistance owns 10 percent or more of the outstanding stock of such foreign corporation.

"SEC. 1604. ADJUSTMENTS TO INCOME FOR YEARS IN BASE PERIOD.

"For the purposes of this chapter, in determining the taxable income of a corporation for a taxable year ending or beginning in the base period, the following adjustments shall be made:

"(1) NET OPERATING LOSS DEDUCTION.—The net operating loss deduction provided by section 172 shall now be allowed.

"(2) GAINS AND LOSSES FROM SALES OR EXCHANGES OF CAPITAL ASSETS, ETC.—There shall be excluded gains and losses from sales or exchange of capital assets and gains and losses to which section 1231 is applicable.

"(3) INCOME FROM RETIREMENT OR DISCHARGE OF BONDS, ETC.—There shall be excluded, in the case of any taxpayer, income derived from the retirement or discharge by the taxpayer of any bond, debenture, note, or certificate or other evidence of indebtedness, if the obligation of the taxpayer has been outstanding for more than 6 months, including, in case the issuance was at a premium, the amount includable in income for such year solely because of such retirement or discharge.

"(4) DEDUCTIONS ON ACCOUNT OF RETIREMENT OR DISCHARGE OF BONDS, ETC.—If during the taxable year the taxpayer retires or discharges any bond, debenture, note, or certificate or other evidence of indebtedness, if the obligation of the taxpayer has been outstanding for more than 6 months, the following deductions for such taxable year shall not be allowed:

"(A) The deduction allowable under section 162 for expenses paid or incurred in connection with such retirement or discharge;

"(B) The deduction for losses allowable by reason of such retirement or discharge; and

"(C) In case the issuance was at a discount, the amount deductible for such year solely because of such retirement or discharge.

"(5) DIVIDENDS RECEIVED.—The deduction for dividends received shall apply, without limitation to all dividends on stock of all corporations, except that no deduction for dividends received shall be allowed with respect to dividends (actual or constructive) on stock of foreign personal holding companies or dividends on stock which is not a capital asset.

"(6) INSTALLMENT SALES.—In the case of a taxpayer which has made an election under the regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate under section 1606, income from installment sales and from installment sales obligations shall be computed under the accrual method without treating any portion of such income as unrealized at the close of any period and as if the taxpayer had reported such income on such accrual method for all taxable periods.

"(7) LONG-TERM CONTRACTS.—In the case of a taxpayer which has made an election under the regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate under section 1606, income from long-term contracts shall be computed under the percentage of completion method and if the taxpayer had reported such income on the percentage of completion method for all taxable periods.

"(8) JUDGMENTS, INTANGIBLE DRILLING AND DEVELOPMENT COSTS, CASUALTY LOSSES, AND OTHER ABNORMAL DEDUCTIONS.—If, for any taxable year beginning or ending within the base period, any class of deductions for the taxable year exceeded 115 percent of the average amount of deductions of such class for the 4 previous taxable years (not including deductions arising from the same extraordinary event which gave rise to the deduction for the taxable year), the deductions of such class shall, subject to the rules provided in paragraph (9), be disallowed in an amount equal to such excess. For the purposes of this paragraph, each of the following groups of deductions shall constitute a class of deductions:

"(A) Deductions attributable to claims, awards, judgments, and decrees against the taxpayer, and interest on the foregoing;

"(B) Deductions attributable to intangible drilling and development costs paid or incurred in or for the drilling of wells or the preparation of wells for the production of oil or gas, and for development costs in the case of mines; and

"(C) Deductions under section 165 for losses arising from fires, storms, shipwreck, or other casualty, or from theft, or arising from the demolition, abandonment, or loss of useful value of property, not compensated for by insurance or otherwise. The class of deductions under this subparagraph for any taxable year shall not include deductions which are excludible under paragraph (2) or which would be so excludible if such paragraph were applicable with respect to such taxable year.

The classification of deductions of any class not described in subparagraph (A), (B), or (C), shall be subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate.

"(9) RULES FOR APPLICATION OF PARAGRAPH (8).—For the purpose of paragraph (8)—

"(A) If the taxpayer was not in existence for four previous taxable years, then the average amount specified in such paragraph shall be determined for the previous taxable years it was in existence and the succeeding taxable years which begin before the beginning of the taxpayer's second taxable year under this chapter. If the number of such succeeding years is greater than the number necessary to obtain an aggregate of four taxable years, there shall be omitted so many of such succeeding years, beginning with the last, as are necessary to reduce the aggregate to four.

"(B) Deductions of any class for any taxable year shall not be disallowed under such paragraph unless the amount of deductions of such class to be disallowed for such year exceeds 5 percent of the average excess profits taxable income for the taxable years beginning or ending within the base period, computed without the disallowance of any class of deductions under such paragraph. Such average excess profits taxable income shall, for the purposes of this subparagraph, be computed by aggregating the excess profits taxable incomes of all such taxable years, dividing such aggregate by the total number of months in such years, and multiplying the quotient by 12. For the purposes of this subparagraph, the excess profits taxable income for any taxable year shall in no case be less than zero.

"(C) Deductions of any class shall not be disallowed under such paragraph unless the taxpayer establishes that the increase in such deductions—

"(i) is not a cause or a consequence of an increase in the gross income of the taxpayer in its base period or a decrease in the amount of some other deduction in its base period, which increase or decrease is substantial in relation to the amount of the increase in the deductions of such class, and

"(ii) is not a consequence of a change at any time in the type, manner of operation, size, or condition of the business engaged in by the taxpayer.

"(D) The amount of deductions of any class to be disallowed under such paragraph with respect to any taxable year shall not exceed the amount by which the deductions of such class for such taxable year exceed the deductions of such class for the taxable year for which the tax under this chapter is being computed.

"(10) TAXES PAID BY LESSEE.—If under a lease for a term of more than 20 years entered into prior to January 1, 1960, the lessee is obligated to pay any portion of the tax imposed by this subtitle upon the lessor with respect to the rentals derived by such lessor from such lessee, or is obligated to reimburse the lessor for any portion of the tax imposed by this subtitle upon the lessor with respect to the rentals derived by such lessor from such lessee, such payment or reimbursement of the tax imposed by this subtitle shall be excluded by the lessor and a deduction therefor shall not be allowed to the lessee. For the purposes of this paragraph, an agreement for lease of railroad properties entered into prior to January 1, 1960, shall be considered to be a lease including such terms as the total number of years such agreement may, unless sooner terminated, be renewed or continued under the terms of the agreement, and any such renewal or continuance under such agreement shall be considered part of the lease entered into prior to January 1, 1960.

"(11) BAD DEBTS IN CASE OF BANKS.—In the case of a bank (as defined in section 581) using the reserve method of accounting for bad debts, there shall be allowed, in lieu of the amount allowable under the reserve method for bad debts, a deduction for debts which became worthless within the taxable year, in whole or in part, within the meaning of section 166.

"(12) PAYMENTS FROM FOREIGN SOURCES FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE, ETC.—In the case of a domestic corporation which rendered to a related foreign corporation technical assistance, engineering services, scientific assistance, or similar services (such services or assistance being related to the production or improvement of products of the type manufactured by such domestic corporation), there shall be excluded the remuneration for such services or assistance if such remuneration constituted income derived from sources without the United States. Any deductions in connection with or properly allocable to the rendering of such services or assistance shall not be allowed. For purposes of this paragraph, a foreign corporation shall be considered to be a 'related foreign corporation' if the domestic corporation at the time it rendered such services or assistance owned 10 percent or more of the outstanding stock of such foreign corporation.

"(13) ADJUSTMENT FOR BASE PERIOD LOSSES FROM BRANCH OPERATIONS.—In the case of a taxpayer which during 2 or more taxable years beginning or ending within the base period operated a branch at a loss, the excess profits taxable income for each such taxable year (determined without regard to this paragraph) shall be increased by the amount of the excess of such loss above the loss, if any, incurred by such branch during the taxable year for which the tax under this chapter is being computed. For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'branch' means a unit or subdivision of the taxpayer's business which was operated in a separate place from its other business and differed substantially from its other business with respect to character of products or services. A unit or subdivision of the taxpayer's business shall not be considered to differ substantially from the taxpayer's other business unless it is of a type classifiable by the Standard Industrial Classification Manual in a different major industry group or in a different subgroup of the taxpayer's major industry group than that in which its other business is so classifiable. This paragraph shall not apply unless the sum of the net losses of such branch during the base period exceeded 15 percent of the aggregate excess profits taxable income of the taxpayer during the base period. For the purposes of this paragraph, the aggregate excess profits taxable income of the taxpayer during the base period shall be the sum of its excess profits taxable income for all years in the base period, increased by the sum of the net losses of such branch during the base period.

"(14) RULES FOR APPLICATION OF PARAGRAPH (13).—For the purposes of paragraph (13)—

"(A) A branch shall be deemed to have been operated at a loss during a taxable year if the portion of the deductions under section 162 for such year which is determined, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate, to be the portion thereof properly allocable to the operation of such branch exceeds the portion of the gross income during the taxable year which is determined under such regulations to be the portion thereof properly allocable to the operation of such branch; and the amount of the loss shall be an amount equal to such excess.

"(B) If the portion of the gross income determined to be properly allocable to the operation of the branch is a minus quantity, the amount of such excess shall be the sum of the deductions under section 162 determined to be properly allocable to the operation of the branch plus an amount equal to such minus quantity.

"SEC. 1605. UNUSED EXCESS PROFITS DEDUCTION ADJUSTMENT.

"(a) COMPUTATION OF UNUSED EXCESS PROFITS DEDUCTION ADJUSTMENT.—The unused excess profits deduction adjustment for any taxable year shall be the aggregate of the unused excess profits deduction carryovers and unused excess profits deduction carryback to such taxable year.

"(b) DEFINITION OF UNUSED EXCESS PROFITS DEDUCTION.—For purposes of subsection (a), the term 'unused excess profits deduction' means the excess, if any, of the excess profits deduction for any taxable year over the excess profits taxable income for such taxable year, computed on the basis of the excess profits deduction applicable to such taxable year, and computed without the allowance of any deduction under section 172 (relating to net operating losses). The unused excess profits deduction for a taxable year of less than 12 months shall be an amount which is such part of the unused excess profits deduction determined under the preceding sentence as the number of days in the taxable year is of the number of days in the 12 months ending with the close of the taxable year. The unused excess profits deduction for a taxable year beginning before or ending after the emergency period shall be an amount which is such part of the unused excess profits deduction determined under the preceding provisions of this subsection as the number of days in such taxable year in the emergency period is of the total number of days in such taxable year. There shall be no unused excess profits deduction for any taxable year for which the taxpayer is exempt from taxation under this chapter.

"(c) Amount of Carryback and Carryover.—

"(1) Unused excess profits deduction carryback.—If for any taxable year the taxpayer has an unused excess profits deduction, such unused excess profits deduction shall be an unused excess profits deduction carryback to the preceding taxable year.

"(2) Unused excess profits deduction carryover.—If for any taxable year the taxpayer has an unused excess profits deduction, such unused excess profits deduction shall be an unused excess profits deduction carryover to each of the 5 succeeding taxable years, except that the carryover in the case of each such succeeding taxable year (other than the first succeeding taxable year) shall be the excess, if any, of the amount of such unused excess profits deduction over the sum of the excess profits taxable incomes for each of the intervening taxable years computed—

"(A) by determining the unused excess profits deduction adjustment for each intervening taxable year without regard to such unused excess profits deduction or to any unused excess profits deduction for any succeeding year, and

"(B) without regard to section 1602(a)(1).

For purposes of the preceding sentence, the unused excess profits deduction for any taxable year beginning after January 1, 1969, shall first be reduced by the amount, if any, of the excess profits taxable income for the preceding taxable year computed—

"(C) by determining the unused excess profits deduction adjustment for such preceding taxable year without regard to such unused excess profits deduction, and

"(D) without regard to section 1602(a)(1).

If such preceding taxable year began prior to January 1, 1969, the reduction referred to in the preceding sentence shall be an amount which is such part of the reduction determined under the preceding sentence, or such part of the unused excess profits carryback to such preceding taxable year, whichever is the lesser, as the number of days in such taxable year after December 31, 1968, is of the total number of days in such preceding taxable year.

"(d) No Carryback to Taxable Years Ending Prior to January 1, 1969.—For purposes of this section, the term 'preceding taxable year' does not include any taxable year ending prior to January 1, 1969.

"(e) Unused Excess Profits Deduction of Year of Liquidation.— For any taxable year during which the taxpayer (1) completes the distribution of substantially all of its assets in liquidation, or (2) completes the conversion of substantially all of its assets into assets not held in good faith for the purposes of the business, then the unused excess profits deduction for such year shall be an amount which is such part of the unused excess profits deduction determined under the preceding provisions of this section as the number of days in the taxable year prior to the date of the completion (described in (1) or (2), whichever is earlier) is of the total number of days in the taxable year, and no part of the unused excess profits deduction for such year shall be an unused excess profits deduction carryover to any succeeding taxable year.

"SEC. 1606. EXCESS PROFITS DEDUCTION.

"(a) Computation Under Regulations.—The excess profits deduction for a taxable year shall be an amount computed under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate which (subject to the provisions of subsection (b)) shall provide—

"(1) a deduction based on average base period taxable income comparable to the excess profits credit provided for in section 435 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939,

"(2) a deduction based invested capital comparable to the excess profits credit provided for in section 436 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939, and

"(3) rules comparable to the provisions of sections 437 through 459 (other than subsections (a), (c), and (d) of section 459) and of parts II, III, and IV of subchapter D of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939.

"(b) Exceptions and Modifications.—The regulations prescribed under subsection (a) shall—

"(1) use the base period defined in section 1602(c) (in lieu of the base period defined in section 435(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939),

"(2) provide for computing the deduction described in subsection (a)(1) by taking into account 100 percent of the average base period taxable income (in lieu of the percentages provided in section 435(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939), and

"(3) provide rules containing such modifications in or such additions to the rules set forth in the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939 referred to in subsection (a) as the Secretary or his delegate determines necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter."

(b) The table of chapters for subtitle A of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Chapter 7.—Temporary excess profits tax."

SEC. 3. The amendments made by this Act shall apply to taxable years ending after December 31, 1968.

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO AMEND H.R. 13270 TO PROVIDE FOR AN INCREASE IN THE PERSONAL EXEMPTION FROM $600 TO $1,200

Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend H.R. 13270 which would provide for an increase in the personal exemption of Federal income tax from $600 to $1,200. I introduced this measure this year on March 27, 1969, as S. 1717. Since the introduction of S. 1717, the House has passed its tax bill, H.R. 13270; therefore, I feel it would be appropriate if my bill is incorporated as an amendment to H.R. 13270. This is not the first time I have introduced this proposal; I have introduced it on numerous times in the past twelve years that I have been in the Senate.

H.R. 13270 is a result of the outcry from the American people for reform of this country's system of taxation. No tax reform program will be complete unless it includes a significant increase in the personal exemption. The present personal exemption has its genesis in the Revenue Act of 1948. Since its adoption over 21 years ago, the personal exemption has not been increased despite the fact that the cost of living in America has risen by 52.3 percent since 1948. The personal exemption, more than any other provision in the Internal Revenue Code has the greatest impact on the lower and middle-income taxpayer. I was disappointed that neither the House nor the President included an increase in the personal exemption as a part of the tax reform program.

The personal exemption is intended to accomplish three basic purposes: (1) to exclude from taxation those individuals and families with the lowest incomes; (2) to provide all taxpayers with a deduction from otherwise taxable income for essential living expenses; and (3) to provide an additional allowance to those taxpayers with dependents and for those who are aged and blind. At the present unrealistic amount of $600, the personal exemption is not fulfilling any of these purposes.

According to the figures compiled by the Social Security Administration, a nonfarm family with a yearly income of $3,335 or less is living in poverty. This means that such a family does not have the income necessary for a minimum diet and must also go without many of the necessities of life. Despite the conditions, such a family would have to pay $46 dollars of income tax if they have an adjusted gross income of $3,335. This clearly demonstrates that the present personal exemption has failed to accomplish its purpose of exempting the poor from income taxation.

Not only is the present personal exemption not protecting the poor, it also is not providing the average taxpayer with a deduction for the cost of raising his family. During the years since 1948, the standard of living in America has risen greatly. According to the Bureau of Labor statistics, the cost of living for an urban family of four on the lowest budget possible would be $5,915. On a more moderate budget this amount required would be $9,076. The personal exemptions however, for a family this size would total only $2,400. This would not even begin to approach the amount needed by such a family to meet the cost of living under the lowest possible budget. Certainly in this respect the present personal exemption has failed to accomplish its purpose.

When the present personal exemption is applied to taxpayers with children in college, the need for an increase becomes ever more apparent. The U.S. Office of Education estimates that the average charges for tuition fees, and room and board for a full-time undergraduate student in a public four-year university for the 1969–70 school year will total $1,288. In a private four-year university the charges are estimated to be $2,777 and in private four-year college they are

An increase in the personal exemption from $600 to $1,200 is a necessity if Congress is to fulfill its responsibilities to the vast majority of citizens who are carrying our Nation's tax burden. Such an increase will also show that overtaxed lower and middle-income taxpayers that Congress is truly concerned about their problems and not just those of big business. We must not let the 91st Congress be remembered in history as the Congress that turned its back on the needs of the average taxpayer.

A BILL To amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to increase from $600 to $1,200 the personal income tax exemptions of a taxpayer (including the exemption for a spouse, the exemptions for a dependent, and the additional exemptions for old age and blindness)

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the following provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 are amended by striking out "$600" wherever appearing therein and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,200":

(1) Section 151 (relating to allowance of deductions for personal exemptions):

(2) Section 642(b) (relating to allowance of deductions for estates);

(3) Section 6012(a) (relating to persons required to make returns of income); and

(4) Section 6013(b)(3)(A) (relating to assessment and collection in the case of certain returns of husband and wife).

(b) The following provisions of such Code are amended by striking out "$1,200" wherever appearing therein and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,400":

(1) Section 6012(a)(1) (relating to persons required to make returns of income); and

(2) Section 6013(b)(3)(A) (relating to assessment and collection in the case of certain returns of husband and wife).

SEC. 2. (a) Section 3(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to optional tax if adjusted gross income is less than $5,000, in the case of taxable years beginning after December 31, 1964) is amended—

(1) by inserting after "After December 31, 1964" in the heading and inserting in lieu thereof "In 1967, 1968, and 1969";

(2) by striking out "beginning after December 31, 1964," and inserting in lieu thereof "beginning on or after January 1, 1967, and before January 1, 1970,"; and

(3) by striking out "After December 31, 1964" each place it appears in the tables and inserting in lieu thereof "In 1967, 1968, and 1969".

(b) Section 3 of such Code is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING AFTER DECEMBER 31, 1969.—In lieu of the tax imposed by section 1, there is hereby imposed for each taxable year beginning after December 31, 1969, on the taxable income of every individual whose adjusted gross income for such year is less than $5,000 and who has elected for such year to pay the tax imposed by this section, a tax determined under tables which shall be prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate. The tables prescribed under this subsection shall correspond in form to the tables in subsection (b) and shall provide for amounts of tax in the various adjusted gross income brackets approximately equal to the amounts which would be determined under section 1 if the taxable income were computed by taking either the 10-percent standard deduction or the minimum standard deduction."

(c) Section 4(a) of such Code (relating to number of exemptions) is amended by striking out "the tables in section 3" and inserting in lieu thereof "the tables in sections 3(a) and 3(b) and the tables prescribed under section 3(c)".

(d) Paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 4(c) of such Code (relating to husband or wife filing separate return) are amended to read as follows:

"(2) Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, in the case of a husband or wife filing a separate return the tax imposed by section 3 shall be—

"(A) for taxable years beginning in 1964, the lesser of the tax shown in table IV or table V of section 3(a),

"(B) for taxable years beginning in 1965, the lesser of the tax shown in table IV or table V of section 3(b), and

"(C) for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969, the lesser of the taxes shown in the corresponding tables prescribed under section 3(c).

"(3) Neither table V of section 3(a) nor table V of section 3(b), nor the corresponding table prescribed under section 3(c), shall apply in the case of a husband of wife filing a separate return if the tax of the other spouse is determined with regard to the 10-percent standard deduction; except that an individual described in section 141(d)(2) may elect (under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate) to pay the tax shown in table V of section 3(a), table V of section 3(b), or the corresponding table prescribed under section 3(c) in lieu of the tax shown in table IV of section 3(a), table IV of section 3(b), or the corresponding table prescribed under section 3(c), as the casé may be. For purposes of this title, an election made under the preceding sentence shall be treated as an election made under section 141(d)(2)."

(e) Section 4(f)(4) of such Code (cross references) is amended by striking out "and table V in section 3(b)" and inserting in lieu thereof "table V in section 3(b), and the corresponding table prescribed under section 3(c)".

(f) The last sentence of section 6014(a) of such Code (relating to election by taxpayer) is amended by inserting after "nor table V in section 3(b)" the following: ", nor the corresponding table prescribed under section 3(c),".

SEC. 3. (a) Section 4302(b)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to percentage method of withholding income tax at source) is amended by striking out the table and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Percentage method withholding table

Payroll period:	Amount of one withholding exemption
Weekly	$27.00
Biweekly	55.80
Semimonthly	58.60
Monthly	116.00
Quarterly	350.00
Semiannual	700.00
Annual	1,400.00
Daily or miscellaneous (per day of such period)	3.80

(b) So much of paragraph (1) of section 3402(c) of such Code (relating to wage bracket withholding) as precedes the first table in such paragraph is amended to read as follows:

"(1)(A) At the election of the employer and with respect to any employee, the employer shall deduct and withhold upon the wages paid to such employee after December 31, 1969, a tax determined in accordance with tables prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate, which shall be in lieu of the tax required to be deducted and withheld under subsection (a). The tables prescribed under this subparagraph shall correspond in form to the wage bracket withholding tables in subparagraph (B) and shall provide for amounts of tax in the various wage brackets approximately equal to the amounts which would be determined if the deductions were made under subsection (a).

"(B) At the election of the employer with respect to any employee, the employer shall deduct and withhold upon the wages paid to such employee before January 1, 1970, a tax determined in accordance with the following tables, which shall be in lieu of the tax required to be deducted and withheld under subsection (a):".

(c) Section 3402(m)(1) (relating to withholding allowances based on itemized deductions) is amended by striking out "$700" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,400".

SEC. 4. The amendments made by the first two sections of this Act shall apply only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969. The amendments made by section 3 of this Act shall apply only with respect to remuneration paid on and after January 1, 1970.

Senator ANDERSON. We will now here from the Honorable Charles Percy.

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES H. PERCY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Senator PERCY. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I am appearing this morning as a result of my very deep concern about the provisions of the Tax Reform Act of 1969, H.R. 13270. I cannot possibly support the bill in the form that it came over to us from the House, because there are simply too many questions that are unanswered in my mind as to its effect upon the whole structure of our institutions in America today.

I would like to indicate that I have had some degree of personal involvement and firsthand knowledge on the issue of private philanthropy and foundations. I served as a director and subsequently as chairman of the board for 10 years of the Fund for Adult Education of the Ford Foundation. This institution, a wholly owned subsidiary of the Ford Foundation, served as to educational television what Carnegie served to the public library. We created the concept, initiated all the early studies, helped cities across the country apply for licenses, and poured millions of dollars into the initial capital equipment that started some 45 educational television stations. I think, with due deference to all of the trustees who served on that foundation, including Milton Eisenhower, that we wouldn't have had educational television in this country if it hadn't been for the early pioneering efforts and funding of this foundation.

I also established a foundation in the Bell & Howell Co. that I headed and for which I was chief executive officer. I can say that our corporate giving substantially increased as we began to better understand the social responsibility that a major corporation had in the country. And I also founded a small modest personal foundation. I am happy to say that this foundation in the years that Mrs. Percy and

I have operated it has had zero administrative expenses, zero expenses of any kind other than the public audit that is made of it each year by Arthur Anderson & Co., and it has given no grants to anything other than Treasury approved organizations.

So that with this degree of involvement I would like to comment on the social needs of the country, which are expanding at a rate which even our prosperous society is presently unable or unwilling to meet. We do have in the United States a higher GNP and higher per capita income than any other country and yet we have very deep serious problems. We have problems of hunger. Our own Select Committee on Hunger and Human Needs has revealed the extent of malnutrition in this country.

We have problems of slums, crime, illiteracy, pollution, disease, poverty, and joblessness.

And this is why I am here this morning. Some of the financial needs of large, vitally important social sectors of our society are being met today and have been met in the past through private giving. We know that our future needs cannot be met as we are now structured without large-scale future private giving. I have no idea, nor does anyone else, as to how large this giving may be for certain key sectors of charity. I know this, however, the need is extremely large. It is being financed heavily through private charitable giving which, of course, foundations are one form.

There have been charges made in recent years that foundations have engaged in questionable activities such as self-dealing, financing political campaigns, lobbying for legislation, unfair business competition, and tax avoidance. In actuality, however, there is little available evidence to support or disown such charges, or even give us an idea as to whether the problem is a serious one or relatively unimportant. The fact is, no thorough, unbiased, professional study has ever been made concerning the financing or the operations of foundations.

I have had an opportunity in recent days to review the early preliminary findings of the Commission on Foundation and Private Philanthropy under the able leadership of Mr. Peter G. Peterson, chairman and chief executive officer, Bell & Howell Co., and my own successor in that organization. This independent commission of private citizens has been established to conduct a thorough, objective study of foundations and private philanthropy. It is using non-tax-deductible contributions to finance this, and no contributions have come from any foundations.

I have attached to my testimony a list of the distinguished members of this commission who are now giving the first really serious overall study into the nature of charitable giving and philanthropy in the United States.

The study is designed to answer questions and to present us with information that we do not know at present, but which we must know if we are not to place in jeopardy the entire social fabric of our society.

How large are the assets of private foundations and how much future growth is expected? How large is their annual investment income now and projected over the next 10 years? What percentage of income is paid out annually? To what sources and for what purposes is income paid out? What is the degree and what are the types of abuses? To what extent do charitable organizations depend upon support from private foundations? What have been the successes and failures of foundations? What will be the effects upon existing foundations and what will their policies be if the tax laws are changed as is contemplated in the Tax Reform Act of 1969? How will such act affect the formation of new foundations? How may the entire nature of our society be changed if we are strait jacketed into total reliance upon Federal philanthrophy? I can't possibly cast an intelligent vote on this bill until I know the answer to some of these problems and I know that is the purpose of these hearings.

I do not know the answer to these questions, and I most respectfully submit that no one else does. Certainly, the Treasury Department, although charged with the enforcement of foundations, is unable to supply us with answers. Yet, gentlemen, here we are seeking to tamper with and perhaps destroy a fundamental force operating within our society.

Let us remember that what we may be doing in enacting the Tax Reform Act in its present form is to place in jeopardy the YMCA, the Heart or Cancer Association, the Boys Clubs of America, and all other youth character building institutions, family planning clinics, universities, colleges, hospitals, and the host of other private organizations which are contributing so much to the fabric of our society.

I would estimate if we didn't have these institutions and we set about to try to organize them today it would take us 50 years to establish what today is the envy of the world, private philanthrophy and private giving and voluntarism in American society, and that is the heart of what we are now talking about, and the incentives we are talking about removing.

Although still in a preliminary form some of the data I have seen, which is early data from the Peterson Commission, and I studied it this week end, suggest that a drying up of foundation and private contributions would drive many vital charitable organizations to the wall.

Charitable organizations in the Chicago area, for example, are expending greater sums than ever in recent years. Yet, they are unable to keep abreast of the cry for help and a significant number are operating at a deficit. Without the substantial assistance of private foundations, serious doubt arises as to whether many could continue operation effectively. Only 63 percent of the Michael Reese Hospital budget, for example, is met through charges to the public. In the case of the Chicago YMCA, less than 40 percent is covered in this manner. The Chicago Heart Association charges no fees to the public. As we all know, few hospitals, colleges, or universities could continue to operate if they had to rely chiefly or solely upon current fees or charges. As a past or present trustee of the University of Chicago, Illinois Institute of Technology, California Institute of Technology, Boys Clubs of Chicago, and other great institutions, I can personally attest to this fact. According to the preliminary survey by the Peterson Commission, two-thirds of all Chicago charities believe they would face critical budget crisis if private giving was cut by 25 percent. I believe a survey of similar organizations in each of your own cities and States would reveal the same fact.

That is only my supposition, however, based upon a preliminary result of the Peterson Commission survey. The key question is, Are we prepared to risk the drying up of private contributions to these valuable charitable, educational, medical, and other social organizations, and thereby place their very existence in jeopardy? Must we not know more about the role of these institutions, their needs, and the effects of the proposed legislation on private giving before going ahead?

If we do discourage private giving——

Senator ANDERSON. Senator Gore.

Senator GORE. Senator Percy, you are raising a great many interesting questions. I wonder if the thrust of your testimony is that we do nothing about foundations?

Senator PERCY. No; not at all. In fact, at the end of my testimony I raise certain specific types of abuse which I think must be corrected.

Senator GORE. We have a problem that looms in much greater magnitude than specific abuses. I think we have a social and political prolem of great and historic magnitude comparable to that which came to a head back in the middle of the 17th century when the Duke of Norfolk set out to prepare his last will and testament. He sought to insure for all time to come that his progeny would have his estate intact. This led to a historic decision in the common law of England which holds that, and still holds, that property must vest, that the hand of the dead cannot rule the living; and yet in our society we have found a way around this historic rule which became necessary in Roman culture, in the Greek culture, in the Hebrew culture and in English common law. A man of wealth and fortune and vanity and imperious will and other great characteristics can create a private foundation, and thus under existing law perpetuate his property and his progeny in the influence and use and direction of that property through a private foundation. Now this creates very grave and serious public problems and particularly so when the deceased are privileged under the tax laws to exercise such great power over the living. We must recognize that encouragement of charitable giving through the tax system has a remarkable effect. When a wealthy donor creates a foundation for charitable purposes, such charity being largely subject to his own definition and will, through his gift, he is in practical effect being allowed to prescribe the use of public funds that would otherwise be paid in taxes for his own prescription, his own ideas, for all time to come of what is good for the public, and this in contravention of changing conditions. So I don't think this problem can be dismissed by merely saying we are going to look at a few abuses. In fact the abuses are so many we don't even recognize them.

The number of foundations is unknown. So I appreciate your testimony but I can't agree with you that we can forget this after a temporary treatment of abuse.

Senator PERCY. I think your question is an appropriate one. In my testimony I will imply that I do advocate even a higher payout than the House bill, and I would place limitations on stock ownership control. But I would like to say that in my judgment, in my own personal experience with foundations in this country, the dead hand of the past has not been allowed to control current giving and philanthropy policy. Let me take just a few of them. Let's take the Rockefeller Foundation. John D. Rockefeller made his money in oil. He set it up in this tremendous foundation. I was in the hearing room when Dr.

George Harrar was here testifying. Each year I study very carefully the work of the Rockefeller Foundation. Let's just take one area, that of population control, where they have been so far ahead of Government that nothing would have been done in this country if we hadn't had private philanthropy. John D. Rockefeller III, not the dead hand of the past but a forward looking man who this week in Look magazine has one of the best articles on youth, and sex and drugs and marriage, is a forward looking man carrying out measures through the philanthropy of his heritage which Government only reluctantly and timidly finally came to recognize as one of the great problems we face today.

Now, we ourselves are providing Government funds for population control but if they had not had the foresight, and the ability to carry this on irrespective of Government wishes in this regard, we wouldn't have had the momentum that we now have. I would say another trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation, my own son-in-law, John D. IV, is hardly the dead hand of the past. Here is one of the most enlightened forward looking members of your political persuasion that I could name, and he is a trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Now, has the dead hand of Henry Ford been allowed to exercise itself on American society?

Senator GORE. Yes.

Senator PERCY. Only in a sense that the Ford money contributed to the foundation has benefited society after his death.

Senator GORE. And take the Irvine Foundation we had yesterday.

Senator PERCY. Some foundations may be subject to criticism.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, I don't wish to take the time of the committee to debate with my colleague this question of the Ford Foundation here, but there are a great many good things that can be cited as having been accomplished by private foundations. But for every good example I dare say we can cite 1,000 that have been motivated primarily by tax avoidance and continued control of family assets.

Senator PERCY. Senator Gore, may I ask you the question, is that a provable fact?

Senator GORE. I said I dare say.

Senator PERCY. For every good action there are 1,000 motivated by a desire other than to do good?

Senator GORE. I said I dare say it and I do dare say it and if I had the privilege of proving it I think I can prove it. I cannot prove it without the facts. The Government doesn't know how many foundations there are. Indeed there isn't an agency of Government that can come within 10,000 of estimating accurately the number of foundations.

Senator PERCY. Let me say, I think what you are asking is a perfectly pertinent question. I do not know of any one who has ever gone in and analyzed all the 990 forms for the year 1968 except the Peterson Commission. They have pulled every single 990 form that has been filed. They have now a team of professional interviewers going out to these foundations, going out to their officers, to the original givers to find out in confidence and anonymously what motivated them. But until such time as we have this body of facts put together, I do not see how we can possibly legislate and start to destroy these foundations before we know what they are doing. If that is true then we need fundamental change.

My guess is the abuse is exactly the other way around. The abuse percentagewise to the total giving is modest and small as against the total $20 billion of assets that are now available under public trustees, subject to public censure for wrongdoing; and the wrongdoing, I think is a minuscule product of the total amount of annual contributions of $1,500 million a year.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, I want to close with this brief statement. I agree with you, Senator Percy, that we need a thorough study. None has ever been made. Why the executive department has not made it, I don't know. Why the Congress has not made it, I do not know. It ought to be done, but I don't think we can sit still and do nothing while this dangerous development continues. It has gotten so bad that now almost every time a man becomes a millionaire he begins to look for a good lawyer to set up a foundation, a private foundation, to avoid taxes and vest the control of his property in his family, and this is antidemocratic. It threatens to bring about serious political, economic and social consequences. So it seems to me that the context of this bill is not to destroy private foundations, it is really the beginning of a regulation of private foundations. I will close.

Senator PERCY. So far as regulation is concerned, proper regulation, I concur. It is needed, it is necessary. The good foundations in this country, and there are many of them, want proper regulation, in fact they are even willing to pay for it.

If I——

Senator MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question at this point? I would like to reconcile the two viewpoints that have been expressed. Would it be your opinion that as to the abuses that have been indicated, we can go ahead promptly and legislate as to those? But, with respect to the broad problem which Senator Gore raises, we need further analysis and research before we make a broad policy change.

Senator PERCY. Absolutely.

I think we know enough now about some abuses so that we can definitely regulate those. In fact, I understand as of last night this committee has scheduled Peter Peterson, Chairman of the new Commission on Philanthropy and Foundations, to appear before it on the 22d of this month, and I think you will have then the first and best chance to have as objective a view as possible, I would question him as to what he has found out with his team of interrogators as to the degree of abuse that does exist and what can be done to regulate it and I think in my own conversations with him this past weekend he is fully aware that there is some abuse, that it must be regulated in order to protect the good name of the large bulk of foundations in this country. They are anxious to see abuses stamped out.

Senator ANDERSON. We have a long list of witnesses today and I hope you can be as brief as you can.

Senator PERCY. Pardon me, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ANDERSON. We have a long list of witnesses today.

Senator GORE. I apologize for that, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ANDERSON. It is very interesting.

Senator PERCY. I will see what I can skip in the testimony, Mr. Chairman. To continue though if we do discourage private giving and if we do drive private organizations to the wall with what are we left? The answer is clear: Government philanthropy, Government education, Government medicine, Government culture, and Government control. Do any of us want this?

I am not arguing here for pure private enterprise. Federal financial assistance and Government leadership have contributed significantly in many areas of social need in recent years. This will and should continue. But, what is required is the preservation of a healthy and dynamic pluralism in our society—a pluralism that can assure us of the freedom to innovate, the ability to take risks, the freedom to stand up to public opinion. Private organizations form a unique and necessary part or that pluralism. Consider for a moment some of the innovative and forward strides taken by or under the funding of private foundations: educational television, family planning and population research, agricultural innovation, support of the arts, employment of the handicapped, and medical research in heart therapy are just a few of the areas that immediately come to mind.

In addition, it is all too infrequently recognized how society profits from contributions of volunteer service which dedicated individuals render each year in charitable work. All Chicago charitable organizations, for example, rely upon volunteer assistance; in three-quarters of the organizations surveyed, the number of volunteer workers exceeded that of paid staff.

I have here a chart which I would just like to show you revealing the results of surveys that have been taken within the past few months in Chicago by the Peterson Commission. Of the Chicago charitable organizations surveyed, 100 percent of them relied upon volunteer assistance. And I would say that this would be quite representative of the charitable organizations in the major cities and smaller communities in every single State represented by the members of the Senate here this morning.

Of organizations surveyed which rely more upon volunteer assistance than paid workers, 75 percent of them actually have more people coming into their facilities to do volunteer work than the paid staff. Voluntary assistance, valued at $3 an hour, was contributed in organizations up to 20 percent of their total budget in 60 percent of those organizations.

If we go down over here in the chart we would see that in one out of five of all the private charitable organizations in Chicago, one out of five of them have more hours put in valued at $3 an hour by volunteer workers than by paid staffs. So that in those organizations $1 of contribution or tax deductibility may mean $2 or more of effort put out. Many times you can get voluntary workers and many of them might include the wives of members of our committee, voluntary workers who are far more productive than paid workers.

The other chart I have is an interesting study of what is happening to costs in private charity. I have compared it with average production workers. Wages have gone up 23 percent in the period 1963 to 1968, and yet the type of help required by charitable organizations in each of our own cities has increased much more: hospital interns whose salaries have gone up 81 percent in this same period; nurses, 50 percent; profesional workers in general, 48 percent; social workers, 39 percent; executive directors, 35 percent; librarians, 28 percent; and clerical, 26 percent.

In every case the need is critical. As we see the value of voluntary contributed labor, we must take into account what it would cost the taxpayer if the Government had to hire that same kind of work to plan the hospital beds, to take care of our libraries, to take care of our character building organizations. Where would Government get the money to meet this kind of salary increase?

There is need to maintain vigorous private philanthropy in our society. This can only result from the expanding contributions of private persons, including private foundations. It is essential, therefore, that we not enact drastic changes in the tax law affecting charitable organizations or private foundations until the Congress has the facts to assure legislation which is right and which is consistent with our national needs and goals.

Now, Senator Gore, if I can just take specifically one area where I am deeply concerned as to what we are really trying to do, I can't figure out for the life of me what the House has in mind in the 7½ percent tax on net income. What are we trying to do? This means that 7½ percent of all the money that foundations would be contributing to organizations for educational, medical, health, cultural and other vital social purposes will be funneled into the Federal Treasury and then back out again to meet social needs, less Government overhead charges, and plus Government control and regulations. What is the rationale for this tax?

Senator GORE. It sounds like a democratic procedure to me.

Senator PERCY. But this is not a profitmaking organization. This is income that is being used for the very purposes that we say we have a tremendous need to fulfill in the United States. Do we think we are putting enough money into meeting the needs of the hungry, meeting the needs of education, meeting the needs of the sick. Absolutely not, we are all asking for more appropriation authority but we don't have the money. Now we are going to take the money right out of the charitable organizations, tax it, put it back in the Federal Treasury, then, send it back out there, less all our overhead charges. Now if——

Senator GORE. May I add one other thing there?

Senator PERCY. Yes, sir.

Senator GORE. Or to put the relatives of the donor on the payroll.

Senator PERCY. Would you repeat that again?

Senator GORE. Well, you listed many things that are being done to the income of foundations.

Senator PERCY. Yes.

Senator GORE. Very worthy things. I just added one other—to put the relatives of the donor on the foundation's payroll.

Senator PERCY. Well——

Senator ANDERSON. Let's let Senator Percy finish.

Senator PERCY. I would only indicate that before I would want to put a tax on these foundations I would want to know where the income is going and what it is being spent for and whether we are not thwarting the whole purpose of what we are trying to accomplish. If this tax is to provide revenue in order to more properly regulate and properly audit foundations, with this I would agree, but I would estimate that the cost of so doing would come closer to 1 percent than 7½. Let's find out what that cost actually would be. At 7½ I think the tax is basically senseless and is a punitive measure and so serves no social or justifiable purpose whatsoever.

In addition, proposals of deductions, charitable trusts, contributions of appreciated property, and other provisions may have the effect of diverting funds from not only foundations in particular but private giving in general and from charitable sources to other less worthy sources. If the Tax Reform Act is enacted in its present form, some additional funds will flow into the public treasury instead of directly through private sources to charities, hospitals, and schools where I estimate the value derived is at least double that of Federal expenditures in these same areas.

Before skipping over to the center of the next to the last page, I mention two specific areas in my prepared statement where I think we ought to look closely: informational activities, and those charities deriving their support from four or fewer tax exempt organizations. In urging the committee to withhold drastic changes in the tax laws as they relate to foundations and philanthropic organizations, I am in no way suggesting that Congress fail to step in to correct abuses that may exist in the administration of foundations. Abuses do exist. Preliminary results of the Peterson Commission study disclose this as well as some abuses not covered by the House bill. They have found even additional abuses that have not been uncovered yet, and Mr. Peterson, I feel quite sure, will be very candid in revealing those to the members of this committee. But let us find out what the extent and degree of these abuses are, including such studies that should be conducted by the Treasury Department, and then let us enact appropriate legislation.

Accordingly to the Peterson Commission study, many foundations are not adequately audited by the IRS or the States. They have been shocked to find the number of organizations unaudited and they can tell you statistically now how many are actually audited by the States under which they are chartered and how many have never been audited by Internal Revenue Service. If this does in fact exist, let us request the Treasury Department to audit foundations periodically and have them pay for the cost——rather than imposing an unsupportable 7½ percent tax. If foundations engage in self-dealing or in unfair competitive practices, let's put a stop to it and enact penalties to discourage such behavior. If loose recordkeeping occurs or if unsupportably high operating expenses exist, let's pass appropriate measures to curtail such activities. If excessively low payouts are found in some foundations, let's raise them to a high enough standard level to overcome "hoarding" instincts and poor investment policies that need correction.

I think the Peterson Commission will definitely show to you how low the income has been on the investment of many of the foundations and where I think many of the members of that commission feel we should require foundations to pay out a higher percentage of their income than they now do.

Finally, if some foundations are contributing their funds for improper purposes, such as partisan political activities, then let us reaffirm our intention to flatly prohibit and penalize such activities.

As indicated in the preliminary Peterson Commission study, only a small percentage of foundations appear to engage in such abusive practices to any degree and these appear to be the smaller ones. But, let us find out what abuses really exist, and to what extent they actually exist. Being more fully informed, then let us proceed to legislate. Also their study suggests that a sizable segment of foundation grants go to public charity, whereas I believe many have assumed, due to widespread publicity, that a significant percent of total foundation grants go to various kinds of partisan political activities. Revelations so far show that a very small percentage goes into political activity of any kind.

It is my understanding that in a very few weeks the Peterson Commission study can be made available and I am delighted that this committee has seen fit to have Mr. Peterson come before it October 22. I would urge that your final recommendations take into account this valuable evidence and facts, which up to now have been in extraordinary short supply not only about foundations but of the effects of this bill on private philanthropy in general. It took a Frenchman, De Tocqueville, in 1832, to discover that the genius of the United States of America lay in the organization of its private volunteer activities. Let us not take any action now that will tend to destroy or at least weaken a system that is the envy of most every nation in the world.

Mr. Chairman, as I said, when I appeared to introduce a witness to the committee yesterday, I think these hearings are among the most important hearings now going on before Congress. They are shedding light on what is the genius of the American system. As a result of these hearings and as a result of our legislation we will have a better awareness of the value of philanthropy and charitable giving but we will also have a greater sense of responsibility as to what we must do to keep it in line with the public interest. Thank you very much.

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you very much, Senator.

(Senator Charles H. Percy's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT BY HON. CHARLES H. PERCY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

SUMMARY

1. Social needs of the United States are expanding faster than our society is presently able or willing to meet them. A social gap has opened between our needs and our ability to fill those needs. Serious social problems persist: Hunger, slums, crime, illiteracy, pollution, disease, poverty, joblessness.
2. Financial needs of large social sectors of our society are being met today through private giving, primarily through foundations and charitable giving.
3. No thorough, unbiased, professional study has ever been made concerning the financing of the operations of foundations. An independent commission of private citizens is currently making such a study to answer the questions to which we do not currently have information. Are we prepared to risk the drying up of private contributions to many valuable charitable, educational, medical and other social organizations and place their very existence in jeopardy without knowing the role of these institutions, their needs, and the effects of the proposed legislation on private giving.
4. Without the answer, the tax reform bill is placing in jeopardy a fundamental private force operating within our society. A drying up of foundation contributions could drive many vital charitable organizations to the wall.
5. If private giving is dried up we will be left with government philanthropy, government education, government medicine, government culture and government control. Pluralism is essential to a healthy society.

6. The 7½% tax is basically a punitive measure unrelated to costs of supervising foundations. Other tax reform provisions would dry up private giving. The definition of "lobbying" and propaganda activities is too restrictive.

7. Abuses must be corrected. Abuses will be pinpointed and specific legislation can then be enacted. Foundations should be audited regularly and billed for that auditing. Self-dealing must be stopped. Let's raise pay-out rates. But only a few foundations engage in abusive practices.

8. Alexis De Tocqueville in 1832 said that the genius of the United States of America lay in the organization of its private volunteer activities. Let us not take any action now that will tend to destroy or at least weaken a system that is the envy of most every nation in the world.

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman, I appear before the Finance Committee today to talk about private foundations, their role in America, and the potential effects of H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969, upon both. I am not here today to attack or to defend the foundations. Rather, I am here to focus attention on the social needs of our society in the coming decades and to sound a warning that we must not undermine the means, human or financial, to meet those needs.

Before proceeding, I wish to inform my colleagues on this Committee that I bring a certain degree of personal involvement and first-hand knowledge to this issue. I served as a director and subsequently Chairman of the Board of the Fund for Adult Education of the Ford Foundation for ten years. The Fund was to educational TV what Carnegie was to the free public library, for it established the concept and underwrote the initial costs of educational television in the United States. I established a foundation in the company which I served as their Executive Officer for many years and also established a modest family foundation whose contributions go 100% to Treasury Department approved public charities. No administrative or overhead expenses exist, except for the expense of public auditing.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the social needs of the country are expanding at a rate which even our prosperous society is presently unable or unwilling to meet. The United States may have a higher GNP and a higher per capita income than any other country; yet serious social problems persist: hunger, slums, crime, illiteracy, pollution, disease, poverty, joblessness.

Chairman Russell Long made clear the other day that the costs of Medicare alone will amount to over $125 billion in the next 25 years. Commissioner of Education Allen has called for a program which will cost $100 million to do away with illiteracy in the United States. My own Banking and Currency Committee projected housing needs of 26 million units during the next 10 years. Even limited efforts to curtail water and air pollution will amount to billions of dollars a year. The list is not complete. These are merely indicators of the magnitude of the total problem facing us and future generations. Equal or greater sums will be needed for medical care, mass transit systems, family planning programs, research, drug controls, museums, crime enforcement, and many more demands.

Our country today faces a critical gap in meeting the needs of our society. A social gap has opened between our needs and our ability to fill these needs, between our expectations and our willingness to meet the expectations. Even approximate figures do not exist to give us a reasonable idea of what it will cost to meet our needs by the year 1975, let alone the year 2000. However, what we do know conservatively indicates that hundreds of billions of dollars will be required to close this gap.

As members of the Finance Committee you are in a particularly fine vantage point to understand how difficult it is to raise the necessary revenue to meet the budgetary demands of even existing Federal programs. Even upon termination of the Vietnam War, it is questionable as to how many dollars will be freed for financing presently unfunded or underfunded programs. And, even if significant sums of money are freed from existing budgetary commitments upon termination of the war or through other means, what guarantees do we have that such funds will be devoted adequately to closing the social gap?

This brings me to the reason for my appearing before you this morning. Some of the financial needs of large, vitally important social sectors of our society are being met today through past and present private giving. We know that our future needs cannot be met as we are now structured without large-scale future private giving. I have no idea, nor does anyone else, as to how large this giving may be for certain key sectors of charity. I know this, however, the need is extremely large, and it is being financed heavily through private charitable giving, of which, of course, foundations are a form.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969, now under consideration by this Committee, contains a number of provisions which alter significantly the treatment for tax purposes of contributions to private foundations and charitable institutions, and expenditures by such organizations. In addition, the Act places limitations on the administration of such organizations and their managers so as to seriously threaten their ability to conduct operations in the future in a worthwhile, viable, and efficient manner.

There have been charges made in recent years that foundations have engaged in questionable activities such as self-dealing, financing political campaigns, lobbying for legislation, unfair business competition, and tax avoidance. In actuality, however, there is little available evidence to support or disown such charges, or even give us an idea as to whether the problem is a serious one or relatively unimportant. The fact is, no thorough, unbiased, professional study has ever been made concerning the financing or the operations of foundations.

I have had an opportunity in recent days to review the early preliminary findings of the Commission on Foundation and Private Philanthropy under the able leadership of Mr. Peter G. Peterson, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Bell & Howell Company. This independent commission of private citizens has been established to conduct a thorough, objective study of foundations and private philanthropy. Attached to my statement is a list of members, staff, and consultants to the Commission. It may be readily seen those serving in this study represent a broad philosophical and professional point of view.

The study is designed to answer questions and to present us with information that we do not know at present, but which we must know if we are not to place in jeopardy the entire social fabric of our society.

How large are the assets of private foundations and how much future growth is expected? How large is their annual investment income now and projected over the next 10 years? What percentage of income is paid out annually? To what sources and for what purposes is income paid out? What is the degree and what are the types of abuses? To what extent do charitable organizations depend upon support from private foundations? What have been the successes and failures of foundations? What will be the effects upon existing foundations and what will their policies be if the tax laws are changed as is contemplated in the Tax Reform Act of 1969? How will such Act effect the formation of new foundations? How may the entire nature of our society be changed if we are strait jacketed into total reliance upon Federal philanthropy?

I do not know the answer to these questions, and I most respectfully submit that no one else does. Certainly, the Treasury Department, although charged with the enforcement of foundations, is unable to supply us with answers. Yet, gentlemen, here we are seeking to tamper with and perhaps destroy a fundamental force operating within our society.

Let us remember that what we may be doing in enacting the Tax Reform Act in its present form is to place in jeopardy the YMCA, the Heart or Cancer Association, the Boys Clubs of America, and all other youth character building institutions, Family Planning clinics, universities, colleges, hospitals, and the host of other private organizations which are contributing so much to the fabric of our society.

Although still in preliminary form, some of the data I have seen from the Peterson Commission study suggest that a drying up of foundation and private contributions could drive many vital charitable organizations to the wall.

Charitable organizations in the Chicago area, for example, are expending greater sums than ever in recent years. Yet, they are unable to keep abreast of the cry for help and a significant number are operating at a deficit. Without the substantial assistance of private foundations, serious doubt arises as to whether many could continue operating effectively. Only 63 percent of the Michael Reese Hospital budget, for example, is met through charges to the public. In the case of the Chicago Y.M.C.A., less than 40 percent is covered in this manner. The Chicago Heart Association charges no fees to the public. As we all know, few hospitals, colleges, or universities could continue to operate if they had to reply chiefly or solely upon current fees or charges. As a past or present trustee of the University of Chicago, Illinois Institute of Technology, California Institute of Technology, Boys Clubs of Chicago, and other great institutions, I can personally attest to this fact. According to the preliminary survey by the Peterson Commission, two-thirds of all Chicago charities believe they would face critical budget crisis if private giving was cut by 25 percent. I believe a survey of similar organizations in each of your own cities and states would reveal the same fact.

That is only my supposition, however, based upon the preliminary results of the Peterson Commission survey. The key question is, are we prepared to risk the drying up of private contributions to these valuable charitable, educational, medical, and other social organizations, and thereby place their very existence in jeopardy? Must we not know more about the role of these institutions, their needs, and the effects of the proposed legislation on private giving before going ahead?

If we do discourage private giving and if we do drive private organizations to the wall, with what are we left? The answer is clear: government philanthropy, government education, government medicine, government culture, and government control. Do any of us want this?

I am not arguing here for pure private enterprise. Federal financial assistance and government leadership have contributed significantly in many areas of social need in recent years. This will and should continue. But, what is required is the preservation of a healthy and dynamic pluralism in our society—a pluralism that can assure us of the freedom to innovate, the ability to take risks, the freedom to stand up to public opinion. Private organizations form a unique and necessary part of that pluralism. Consider for a moment some of the innovative and forward strides taken by or under the funding of private foundations: educational television, family planning and population research, agricultural innovation, support of the arts, employment of the handicapped, and medical research in heart therapy are just a few of the areas that immediately come to mind.

In addition, it is all too infrequently recognized how society profits from contributions of volunteer service which dedicated individuals render each year in charitable work. All Chicago charitable organizations, for example, rely upon volunteer assistance; in three-quarters of the organizations surveyed, the number of volunteer workers exceeded that of paid staff. Consider the billions of dollars of additional benefit that this source brings to our society. That benefit could not be maintained even if government could afford to assume the financial burden. Voluntarism is intrinsic to a healthy society. Voluntarism has an infinite number of roots. Many of those roots can take hold if nurtured by the people through private institutions.

There is a need to maintain vigorous private philanthropy in our society. This can only result from the expanding contributions of private persons, including private foundations. It is essential, therefore, that we not enact drastic changes in the tax law effecting charitable organizations or private foundations until the Congress has the facts to assure legislation which is right and which is consistent with our national needs and goals.

In the case of foundations, particularly, the Act imposes a 7½ percent tax on net income. This means that 7½ percent of all money that foundations would be contributing to organizations for educational, medical, health, cultural, and other vital social purposes will be funneled into the Federal Treasury and then back out to fill social needs less government overhead charges and plus government control and regulation. Just what is the rationale for this tax? It is not to defray costs of Federal supervision of foundation activities. No detailed cost estimate has been made, to my knowledge of what such supervision would cost. From what I gather, however, it could well be less than 1%. Thus, the 7½ percent tax is, in my opinion, basically a senseless, punitive measure.

In addition, proposals of deductions, charitable trusts, contributions of appreciated property, and other provisions may definitely have the effect of diverting funds from not only foundations in particular but private giving in general and from charitable sources to other less worthy sources. If the Tax Reform Act is enacted in its present form, some additional funds will flow into the public treasury instead of directly through private sources to charities, hospitals, and schools where I estimate the value derived is at least double that of federal expenditures in these same areas. It is unlikely that the increased revenues will find their way to the same sources as the private funds. Assuming they did we have seen that their effect would be drastically reduced. These and similar issues must be resolved before we enact legislation.

In addition, I strongly urge this Committee to look critically at two other key provisions of the House bill.

One provision so restricts the informational activities of foundations that they would be unable to bring reliable research and current events to the attention of the Government or the public and would likely cut them off from financial support. The manner in which the proposed legislation defines so-called "lobbying" and "propaganda" activities means that such organizations as Brookings Institutions, the Conservation Foundation, and National Education Television would be unable to present to Congress or to the public reliable new insights into the economic, social, and political problems facing us today.

The other provision also relates to organizations such as National Education Television, American Educational Research Association, Social Science Research Council, and the American Association of Learned Societies, which because they receive substantially all their support from 4 or fewer exempt organizations, are in danger of losing their tax-exempt status under the proposed legislation. Personally knowing of the reliable work being performed by National Education Television and these other organizations, I would consider it most disturbing if a too narrow redefining of the law forced to the wall highly effective, public spirited, independently oriented, educationally informative, nonpartisan organizations.

In urging the Committee to withhold drastic changes in the tax laws as they relate to foundations and philanthropic organizantions, I am in no way suggesting that Congress fail to step in to correct abuses that may exist in the administration of foundations. Abuses do exist. Preliminary results of the Peterson Commission study disclose this as well as some abuses not covered by the House bill. But, let us find out what the extent and degree of these abuses are, including such studies that should be conducted by the Treasury Department, and then let us enact appropriate legislation.

According to the Peterson Commission study, many foundations are not adequately audited by the IRS or the States. If this does in fact exist, let us request the Treasury Department to audit foundations periodically and have them pay for the cost—rather than imposing a unsupportable 7½ percent tax. If foundations engage in self-dealing or in unfair competitive practices, let's put a stop to it and enact penalties to discourage such behavior. If loose recordkeeping occurs or if unsupportably high operating expenses exist, let's pass appropriate measures to curtail such activities. If excessively low pay outs are found in some foundations, let's raise them to a high enough standard level to overcome "hoarding" instincts and poor investment policies that need correction. Finally, if some foundations are contributing their funds for improper purposes, such as partisan political activities, then, let us reaffirm our intention to flatly prohibit and penalize such activities.

Paul Freund, The Carl M. Loeb University Professor, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., President, American Academy of Arts & Sciences, 1964–67.
Martin Friedman, Director, Walker Art Center, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Commissioner, Smithsonian Commission, National Collection of Fine Arts.
Mrs. Patricia Roberts Harris, Professor of Law, Howard University, Washington, D.C., U.S. Ambassador to Luxembourg, 1965–67.
Hon. A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr., Judge, U.S. District Court for Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.
Lane Kirkland, Executive Assistant to the President, AFL-CIO, Washington, D.C., President of Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations.
Dr. Philip Lee, Chancellor, University of California, School of Medicine, San Francisco, California; former Assistant Secretary, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.
Edward Levi, President, University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois.
Dr. Franklin Long, Vice President for Research and Advanced Studies, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York.
A. S. Mike Monroney, Consultant, Washington, D.C., Member, U.S. House of Representatives 1938–50; U.S. Senator, Oklahoma, 1950–69.
Key staff members include:
Director, Everett L. Hollis, Partner, Chicago law firm of Mayer, Friedlich, Spiess, Tierney, Brown & Platt.
Walter J. Blum, Professor of Law, University of Chicago and noted tax expert.
Fritz Heimann, Associate Corporate Counsel, General Electric Company, New York.
Consultants to Staff (some):
Economists: Arnold Harberger, Milton Friedman, Joseph Pechman, George Stigler, Theodore Shultz, and Michael Taussig.
Staff: John Labovitz and William Wineberg.
Sociologists—Educators: Norman Bradburn, Terry Clark, Edward Shils, and Ralph Tyler.
Business—Tax: Charles Davis and James Lorie.

Senator Anderson. Congressman Blackburn?
Senator Talmadge. Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure indeed for me to welcome my friend and colleague from Georgia in his appearance before the Finance Committee.

STATEMENT OF HON. BENJAMIN B. BLACKBURN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE FOURTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF GEORGIA

Mr. Blackburn. Thank you, Senator, I appreciate that kind welcome.
Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your affording me the opportunity to appear before your committee. Of course, I have submitted my principal statement for the record and I will try to shorten it in my verbal testimony and only hit the highlights.
We, of course, have been hearing a great deal of testimony this morning relative to abuses of tax-exempt organizations. The field in which I wish to direct my attention is the use of tax-exempt funds for partisan political activities, and I would like to include in my discussion not only foundations but all tax-exempt organizations, whether they be for religious or labor activities.

Many of these organizations engage in political activities which, by reason of their tax privileges, are being subsidized by the Federal Treasury. My purpose in being here today is to call the Congress' attention to some examples of political activities which I personally and many others consider to be improper by groups enjoying special tax privileges and to suggest possible ways of preventing future abuses.

I would like to discuss those funds under section 501(c)(3) and section 501(c)(5).

The Internal Revenue Code provides that "no substantial part" of the activity of any such organization is to be used on propaganda or otherwise attempt to influence legislation. Many organizations avoid this language because there is some ambiguity in the definition of the term "substantial part". As an example of this misuse of privilege, I would like to direct the attention of the committee to a group which was recently formed to actively lobby against the Anti-Ballistic Missile proposal, the coalition on national priorities and military policy. This organization is supported primarily by contributions from religious organizations. Its headquarters are located in a building here in Washington. This group has lobbied against the proposed ABM system. A few days ago a representative from this group came to my office and presented my staff with further information concerning its opposition to the 1969 Military Authorization Bill. I am attaching as an exhibit a copy of the material that I received. The business——

Senator TALMADGE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question at this point?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Senator TALMADGE. Was that organization financed by a foundation?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is financed by a number of religious organizations, which themselves, are classified under the same section of the Internal Revenue Code.

Senator TALMADGE. And the language of the House bill precludes their lobbying activity?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; it would not. The House bill, as I recall, and you understand I am not on the Ways and Means Committee so I am not as intimately familiar with it as I would like to be, would permit appearing before congressional committees but it would prevent propaganda, that is attempting to sway public opinion.

Senator TALMADGE. Your point is you don't think the Ways and Means Committee language goes far enough in preventing political activity and lobbying by tax exempt groups?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; I do not. I think that I draw a distinction between lobbying in the sense of making appearances before members of Congress in their offices or before congressional committees and presenting a view. I think that any group should have that right as a matter of the extension of free speech. But to use tax exempt dollars to propagandize the American public is a radically different thing and I think this should be definitely prevented.

I would like further to invite the attention of the committee to the National Student Association. Gentlemen, if you want to see tax returns which reveals very little I would suggest that you look into the returns which have been filed by this group. I am attaching some copies to my testimony. In fact this group——

Senator TALMADGE. How is that group financed?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Primarily by foundation grants.

Senator TALMADGE. For what purpose, do you know?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Promoting educational activities among the students of the country. Of course, they have no reluctance in taking positions on partisan political matters. In fact, this National Student Association has recognized that its blatant political activity would cost it its tax exempt status so now they have set up a parallel organization known as the National Student Institute, which will be the tax exempt organization. It will solicit the funds as a tax exempt organization, and then we strongly suspect that the funds that are contributed to the National Student Institute will then be funneled ino the National Student Association to be used for political and——

Senator TALMADGE. Do you know which foundations are making those grants?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think the Ford Foundation is one of their major contributors but I don't—I can get the information.

Senator TALMADGE. You could get it and supply it for the record. I presume?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir; I will.

(Additional data supplied by Mr. Blackburn follows:)

1. OTHER EXAMPLES OF TAX-EXEMPT ORGANISATIONS ENGAGING IN POLITICAL ACTIVITIES

Numerous groups have been formed in recent years for different tax-exempt purposes. As I stated in my testimony, the Internal Revenue Service Code specifically prohibits these organizations, which are exempt under Section 501(c) (3), from devoting a substantial part of their income to support of legislation or propaganda. With regard to the latter, I would like to bring to your attention an organization entitled The Institute for American Democracy. On the surface, this group claims to oppose extremism on the right and on the left. However, after close examination, it becomes obvious that their only purpose is to oppose extremism on the right (they feel this is more of a threat to American society than extremism on the left). Attached is a copy of some general information which they distributed about themselves which gives the impression that they are completely non-partisan. However, when examining a copy of the only publication put out by them, "Home Front," we find that this is not true at all. This organisation has only one purpose and that is to attempt to eliminate all groups on the right with which it disagrees. I believe that this is a form of propaganadad as stated in the IRS Code.

Secondly, I am enclosing a copy of this group's tax return. By going over the return, you cannot possibly determine how the funds received by this group are spent. Again, I believe this points out the need for a better reporting method to be issued by the I.R.S.

Finally, I would like to bring to your attention a copy of a petition which was recently submitted to the Federal Communications Commission by Lt. Col. Floyd Oles. In this petition, Col. Oles documents activities by The Institute for American Democracy which is trying to censor the programming of radio stations. Apparently, programs with which the Institute does not approve should be banned under what the Institute refers to as its air purification plan. I think that the Committee should seriously investigate the activities of this organization when it is so blatantly trying to influence public opinion by preventing the dissemination of viewpoints with which it disagrees.

Another group which I would like to bring to your attention is the Louis M. Rabinowitz Foundation. This Foundation has been giving funds to certain people with extremely questionable backgrounds. When examining the returns from this group, we found that it had given funds to one Mario Savio, the head of the Berkeley Free Speech Movement; to Julian Mayfield and Floyd McKissick, two well-known extremist black leaders; to one Clinton Jenks who was convicted of advocating the violent overthrow of the U.S. Government (his conviction was reversed because his lawyers were not allowed to see F.B.I. reports); and to the Southern Students Organizing Committee whose avowed purpose is to become the S.D.S. of the South. For the information of the Committee, I am enclosing a copy of a publication distributed by the National Review which gives a complete history of the Rabinowitz Foundation as well as outlines various activities in which it has been engaged.

Third, I would like to go deeper into some of the activities of the Ford Foundation. As in my testimony, I stated that the Ford Foundation had given money for many questionable projects. First, there is the fact that the Ford Foundation was responsible for financing various school decentralization projects in New York City; this activity was clearly of a political nature and precipitated a strike by the New York teachers' union. The Ford Foundation has distributed over $630,000 to a group entitled the Mexican-American Youth Organization. This organization finances travel regularly to Cuba and distributes pro-Castro propaganda to Mexican-Americans in Texas. Furthermore, the President of this organization has advocated the killing of Americans in order for Mexican-Americans to take over property which they desire. Also large chunks of Ford Foundation money have gone to various black extremist groups.

2. THE FINANCING OF THE NATIONAL STUDENT ASSOCIATION

Besides receiving funds from general membership dues, the NSA has received funds from the Office of Economic Opportunity; also it is financed by grants from foundations, the leading one being the Ford Foundation. Other foundations which have contributed to N.S.A. are The Fund for the Republic, The Catherwood Foundation, The General Mills Foundation, The Asia Foundation, The Edward W. Hazen Foundation, The Edward John Noble Foundation and several other "foundations which eventually turned out to be CIA fronts." One other group which is supplying funds to the NSA is the Stern Family Fund. While I have not been able to investigate the activities of this group, I am enclosing a copy of their tax return, and I believe the Committee will again see the need to have further clarification of how tax-exempt funds are used.

3. A COPY OF THE TAX RETURN FROM THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION IS ATTACHED HEREWITH

If I can be of any further service to your Committee in its investigation of tax-exempt organizations, please do not hesitate to call on me.

INSTITUTE FOR AMERICAN DEMOCRACY, INC.,
Washington, D.C.

Memo to: NEA's PR&R Conference Delegates.
Subject: Putting YOU in IAD.
Date: January 16, 1967.

If you are one of those who do not like to see extremists hacking away at our basic democratic precepts, then IAD should interest you.

We want to cooperate with people who will rally to the defense of our democratic way of life.

We are looking for allies willing to stand up and be counted when extremists are trying to put themselves in the driver's seat.

We need the help of real patriots, the kind willing to expose the false merchandise behind the advertising slogans of the super-patriots. America always needs the support of truly dedicated citizens, the kind who can endure the taunts and ridicule often associated with the Radical Left, and the harassment and intimidation frequently ascribed to the Radical Right.

If you are devoted to the basic philosophy of our democracy and if you are concerned about extremist efforts to take over or rip apart our basic national and local decision-making processes, then you may have a deep interest in the aims and activities of IAD.

Here are some questions and answers to tell you what IAD is all about:

WHAT IS THE INSTITUTE FOR AMERICAN DEMOCRACY?

It is a non-partisan, non-profit educational organization permanently headquartered in Washington.

It is the one organziation entrusted with the task of coordinating the activities of associations and indivdiulas who wish to shed more light (for the extremists of the worst form of heat) on Radical Left and Right goals and methods.

WHO IS BEHIND THIS EFFORT?

IAD is a broadly based voluntary association of individuals, but the Sponsoring Committee includes spokesmen for many nationally significant religious, civic, labor and educational groups, as well as many prominent businessmen, public figures and researchers.

The Chairman of IAD is Dr. Franklin H. Littell, clergyman, researcher, President of Iowa Wesleyan College, a Phi Beta Kappa with an academic Ph.D., and a nationally-recognized expert on church history and totalitarianism.

WHAT NEEDS DOES IAD SUPPLY?

IAD is helping turn the spotlight on extremism and extremists at the national level.

IAD helps local groups get themselves formed.

IAD helps provide grass roots anti-extremists with materials, research guides and information on what Radical Left and Right groups are up to.

IAD gives the individual with the desire to help and the person under attack a place to turn.

IAD serves as a clearinghouse for books, pamphlets, radio and TV programs and know-how.

ANY CONNECTION WITH PREVIOUS ANTI-JOHN BIRCH EFFORTS?

This Institute is the spiritual heir to the insights and information gained through the 1962 Greenwich Conference and the 1964-65 National Committee for Civic Responsibility.

While we have drawn strength and inspiration from those who have gone before, and while many of the pioneers of this effort are again in the vanguard, in essence this represents a fresh start.

IS IAD CONCERNED WITH OPPOSING COMMUNISM?

We are deeply concerned with combatting domestic Communism and intend to do so in a responsible manner.

The super-patriots who hide their imagined self-interest in the camouflage of "anti-Communism" all too often help the Communists toward the goals of discrediting the democratic form of government and those institutions and organizations making significant contributions to the national dialogue. Both extremes work to undermine our national self-confidence.

HOW CAN THE INDIVIDUAL HELP?

You can help by speaking out in support of the democratic form of government whenever it is under attack.

You can help by studying the aims and methods of extremists and telling others about them.

You can help by becoming an associate member of IAD. (We're working out the mechanics now.)

You can help by subscribing to IAD's forthcoming newsletter, Homefront.

You can help by encouraging community groups to come to grips with the problem of extremism and by participating in their activities.

HOW DO I MAKE CONTACT WITH IAD?

One way is to write to: Dr. Franklin H. Littell, % Institute for American Democracy, 1330 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005.

[From Information Service, Mar. 26, 1967]

NEW INSTITUTE TO COMBAT EXTREMISM

An "Institute for American Democracy" has been launched as "a non-partisan, non-profit institute serving as a clearinghouse for materials on extremism" of both the left and the right.

The first issue of the organization's bulletin, Homefront, is dated February 1967 (15 cents, IAD, 1330 Massachusetts Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005). It pictures and gives brief biographical sketches of the 63 prominent citizens who compose the sponsoring committee. Among them are Morris B. Abram, Senators Case, Moss and McGee, Roy Wilkins, Bishops Burt, Grant, Pope and Thomas, Drs. David Hunter and Martin Marty. The Committee chairman is Dr. Franklin H. Littell, president of Iowa Wesleyan College.

Some of the functions of the Institute are listed as follows:

"IAD helps lay the base for local efforts to combat extremism by calling national attention to extremist activities.

"IAD attempts to analyze extremist activity patterns and to make this information available to those who can use it.

"IAD is working with individuals and groups concerned with offsetting the poisonous Radical Right radio outpouring of unfounded charges and malicious innunendoes with a healthy antidote of facts.

"IAD serves as a clearinghouse of information on available materials like the Anti-Defamation League's series of 15-minute taped radio programs: ADL and National Education Television films on extremism and pamphlets produced by many groups including both Protestant and Catholic church organizations, ADL, and the American Jewish Committee, AFL–CIO, the National Education Association, National Congress of Parents and Teachers, and others.

"We're also in the process of producing a series of Who Is—What Is leaflets to identify the persons and groups most prominent in the struggle for the mind of America. These will be available at a small charge.

"We have ready access to the Group Research, Inc. reports and a half-dozen other active files on extremist organizations. And you would be amazed at the amount of information already flowing in from concerned Americans who want to share their knowledge of extremist activity.

"We are building a bibliography of available articles, books, responsible research papers and seminar ingredients—and already the demand for speakers outpaces the supply. Early drafts of this bibliography already are in use."

Associate membership is invited at $5.00 per year.

INSTITUTE FOR AMERICAN DEMOCRACY, INC.,

To: Citizens Inquiring about Some Specific IAD Policies.
From: Charles R. Baker, Executive Director.
Subject: Where IAD Stands in the Political Spectrum.

Thank you for your thoughtful question.

A good many persons ask similar questions, so many, in fact, that we have prepared this memo to tell folks where we stand on these matters. Here are my personal answers to some frequently encountered queries:

Question—Where does IAD fit in the political scale?

Answer—In the middle. IAD does not take a position on issues, as such, or candidates, as such. We are concerned with extremist tactics which tend to shut off the free exchange of ideas so essential to democracy.

Look at the list of IAD's sponsors and you will find many top level Republicans, Democrats and Independents. You will find bona fide representatives of a broad range of viewpoints—liberals and conservatives. These distinguished Americans no doubt disagree on many specific issues, but they are in complete agreement on the need to protect the middle ground from extremist onslaughts.

IAD opposes with equal fervor the Tactics of the Communist Party and its front groups, and the John Birch Society and the various groups in the JBS orbit, as well as the even further-out Radical Right organizations like the Minutemen and the Klu Klux Klan.

Question—Why oppose extremism of both the Far Right and the Far Left?

Answer—At both extremes, the zealots attempt to stifle the free flow of ideas. Both think their ends justify means which cannot be acceptable to a democratic society. They slander their real or imaginary foes. They foment fears and hatreds and they repeat half-truths and falsehoods over and over again until they are believed.

The mental attitudes of the Far Left and Far Right are much the same. That is why former Communists periodically "defect" to the Far Right, and the Far Rightists, on occasion, switch to the opposite extreme.

Question—What do you mean by "extremism"?

Answer—The use of tactics which are clearly out-of-bounds in a democratic society that force attitudes and "facts" on more open-minded citizens.

Question—Who is employing these tactics?

Answer—On the Far Left you have the Communist Party, the Progressive Labor Party and several score so-called "front" groups. On the Far Right you have the John Birch Society, the Minutemen, [Liberty Lobby] the Billy James Hargis "Crusade", the Carl McIntire "Reformation Hour", Major Bundy's so-called ["Church League of America"] and more than a thousand lesser groups.

Question—Why so much concern over the John Birch Society?

Answer—Because the Birchers have by far the most activity of any extremist group. In both 1965 and 1966, their annual budget exceeded $5 million. The Birchers have a paid staff of about 250, their own magazines, their own publishing house, a stable of propagandists, their own corps of 50 touring professional speakers, their own radio programs—all the trappings of a modern day campaign organization.

The Birchers set the tone and the propaganda themes for the great bulk of the Radical Right activty. The Radical Right takes in and spends about $30 million annually.

The Communist Party and groups in the CP orbit have far fewer members, fewer publications, no radio programs and a relatively small paid field force.

This does not mean you can ignore them. In the 1930s and 1940s the Far Left posed by far the greater threat to democracy. Today the pendulum has swung the other way, but it can always swing back again.

Question—What about student groups and the 'New Left'?

Answer—There is substantial difference between "protest", no matter how ill-founded, and the effort to force views on others by a long campaign. Student "protest" during the transitory period of student life only rarely carries over to post graduate days. The differences between the self-styled, "ultra-conservative" Young Americans for Freedom and the "liberal" Students for a Democratic Society may be very slight. Such student groups can become dangerous when adult organizations try to manipulate them, however.

The so-called "New Left" varies in character from campus to campus. There does not appear to be a tightly-knit national organization.

A number of adult Radical Right organizations have been involved in YAF activity. The Communists have penetrated student grops on some campuses notably Berkeley.

Question—Are extremists in the Civil Rights movement?

Answer—Certainly. And on both sides. This does not mean that all who oppose Civil Rights measures are Birchers or Klansmen any more than it means those who favor more rapid change in Civil Rights are Communists.

Both extremes foment racial tensions. Both hope to divert these tensions to their private ends.

When Birch speaker Jim Clark, the ex-sheriff of Selma, Alabama falsely calls the Selma demonstrators "Communist", he actually gives the Communists undeserved prestige among some individuals and groups in sympathy with the objectives sought at Selma.

Last year, when Stokely Carmichael went to Selma to "turn out the Negro vote" against Clark, he probably helped Clark far more than his opponent, giving the viewpoint represented by Clark a status it, too, did not deserve.

Question—What about disagreements over the U.S. position in Viet Nam?

Answer—Many thoughtful Americans back our present position in Viet Nam. Others believe we should further escalate our war activities. Others believe we should seek peace more aggressively. All three are legitimate viewpoints. There are many arguments on both sides.

The Communists attempt to use the Peace movement to achieve their objectives, and accuse those who disagree of being "war mongers".

The Birchers attempt to use the escalation movement to achieve their ends, and charge those who disagree with being "traitors."

The newest Robert Welch position papers charge that Communists are now in control of the U.S. Government, and that the Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson Administrations conspired with the Communists against America, and that "bi-partisan treason (is) rampant everywhere". Welch asserts that Communists are controlling our war actions.

If Gus Hall of the Communist Party charged the chief-of-state with conspiring with foreign powers to "sacrifice American GIs" in order to achieve "Foreign ends," likely the FBI, House Un-American Activities Committee and Senate Internal Security Subcommittee would be in instant action.

Because the John Birch Society Chieftan is not under that kind of surveillance, IAD has had to expose this JBS activity as our patriotic duty.

Question—Doesn't exposing the anti-communists help the Communists?

Answer—Not in my view. The professional anti-communists, those persons President Eisenhower described as being "more patriotic than you and I or anybody else" have a financial stake in keeping the fear of Communism alive. To some of them "anti-communism" is a multi-million dollar business.

Their fund raising formula calls for them to first wrap themselves in the flag, hold high the cross, and thus protected try to frighten people out of their wits by crying "Communism". After that comes the pitch for funds.

Instead of telling people why Communist activity is dangerous, they are more likely to smear their fores with such spurious claims as, "He has three HUAC citations," which means the name came up in three places during HUAC testimony. (If you played the piano in a 1940 ward bond rally where a CP member spoke, you may have a HUAC citation.)

Among the goals of domestic communism are: 1) fomenting racial tensions, 2) undermining our faith in the U.S. government and the Office of the President, 3) making us distrust the democratic process, and 4) turning us against the mass media and other "outside" sources of attitudes like established religions and educational institutions.

These are also the goals of the John Birch Society and many in its orbit. Those who, in the name of anti-communism, oppose the United Nations, the National Council of Churches, Medicare, Civil Rights, Union Shop provisions, Social Security or the Graduated Income Tax are simply masquerading. They are trying to use our natural opposition to the Communist ideology to cover their opposition to the United Nations, National Council of Churches, etc.

What we have to fear is not a vague "conspiracy."

What must concern us are the specific tactics employed by extremists of both sides to discredit the democratic process.

Question—How can I help protect the democratic process?

Answer—By taking an active part in it. By stepping up to your responsibilities as a citizen even when doing so makes short range problems for you.

INSTITUTE FOR AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

We're Building A Bulwark Against Extremism

On November 18, 1966, Dr. Franklin H. Littell, president of Iowa Wesleyan, stepped briskly to the microphone at a well-attended press conference in Washington's Sheraton-Carlton Hotel. "I am here," he said, "because many of America's leading citizens share the concern over the rising tides of extremism in our land.

Dr. Littell (above) used the blackboard to show how the John Birch Society is the hub of the Radical Right establishment at the kickoff press conference. The resulting picture had a press run in the millions.

"Growing numbers of Americans now believe that we are facing a serious assault on the very processes of democracy. Many want the kind of factual information they must have to do something about it. As a people, we must focus the spotlight of truth on the tactics and methods of those who seek to achieve their ends by means doing violence to our whole democratic concept," Littell declared.

In response to these needs, distinguished Americans, representing a broad cross section of our nation, have decided to sponsor the Institute for American Democracy (IAD), he reported. Dr. Littell, a Ph.D., ordained Methodist minister and former Senior Protestant Advisor to the High Commissioner of Germany, made the announcement as chairman of IAD.

MOST MAJOR NEWSPAPERS and radio and TV newscasters carried the news of IAD's emergence in some depth. The New York Times included IAD's address. As a result, we were almost instantly swamped with offers of assistance and cries for help.

The Communists greeted news of IAD's existence with a snort (in the West Coast People's World) that we would be telling "Big Lies" about the Reds. At the other extreme, Robert Welch reported in the Birch Society's Bulletin that IAD would be helping the "Conspiracy."

And in the broad American middle there was (and is) a healthy interest over whether IAD could make an effective contribution to the political climate of our times.

"THERE IS GENERAL AGREEMENT ON THE NEED," Dr. Littell pointed out in a recent statement. "IAD's sponsors, 70 distinguished Americans from the fields of religion, public service, education, business, labor, people at or near cabinet level in four Administrations testify to the common concern," he asserted.

"The extremists attempt to force their perverse views on the rest of us," he said. "Making false charges against national groups on the JBS 'dial-a-smear' telephone networks; maligning established churches over the air; bearing false witness against citizens of good repute are all part of the effort to poison the wells of free discussion and each such attack must be our concern. IAD is helping America face this challenge."

If the amount of woodpulp involved is a reliable yardstick, the Radical Right zealots view IAD as their biggest problem. The nearly 3,000 John Birch cells have been told what stinkers we are in five of the past seven monthly Birch Bulletins.

Fretful that we would answer back if a personal attack were made by radio, Hargis, McIntire, Burpo, McBirnie, Bundy, Cotten and many others have produced scurrilous publications attacking the integrity of IAD's sponsors.

Fred Schwarz, the "Laymen's League" and many others have cranked out letters used in mail campaigns directed at trustees, customers and the like trying to get sponsors to drop IAD. Hargis has even publicly called for a boycott of goods and services with which they are identified.

McIntire mentions IAD on the air almost daily. Clearly, we're No. 1 on the Radical Right's "Hit [illegible]" Parade.

Why IAD?

As every Eric Hoffer reader knows, to a Bircher, nothing is more important than a "Birch-fact." That accounts for the extremist compulsion to discredit their foes, force acceptance of their views.

Driving home Birchtype "facts" takes the big share of the $30 million which Group Research, Inc., projections indicated the Far, Far Right takes in and spends annually.

The combined national budgets of the 100 or so significant Far Right groups exceed the combined national budgets of both major political parties.

Much of the money goes for a paid staff, including field organizers. The Birchers and their allies also produce more films, books, pamphlets, magazines and tapes than the two national parties. Just one unsigned Birch film, Anarchy—U.S.A., is known to have 400 prints in circulation.

Given a clear field, the Birchers and their allies can "prove" that, "We are a republic not a democracy."

They'll help "resolve" our policy problems on Vietnam by convincing citizens the Administration has "a deliberate 'no win' policy."

They will show that "liberalism equals socialism equals communism" and, in the same breath, demand the end of mental health programs, Medicare, and the graduated income tax.

They will attempt to eliminate the appeals for social action in Protestant, Catholic and Jewish groups by trying to besmirch the reputations of these religious bodies.

Driving home these basic attitudes will be the hundreds of voices of the John Birch Society, Liberty Lobby, Americans for Constitutional Action, Hargis Christian Crusade, the McIntire complex, H. L. Hunt, et al.

Those harkening to these voices are campaigning now for county, city and especially school board spots. These are the groups which captured the GOP convention and gave it to Barry Goldwater four years ago. They are back again with more money, more knowhow, and a bigger professional force.

Their speakers now crisscross the nation. They fan the flames of white backlash, demand the expulsion of the UN, call for Earl Warren's impeachment, shout you can't trust Uncle Sam.

When the Birchtype speaker comes to town, somebody has to identify him for who he is and what he represents. When the "Birchfacts" are flying, somebody has to supply the cleansing truth. Somebody has to shine a light on extremist tactics, nationally and locally.

That's part of IAD's challenge. And we're helping people meet it every day. Who would do so, if not you? If not IAD? —C. R. Baker

Why IAD?

In the 1930's the Communist Party and fronts had more influence than the Radical Right. The pendulum can always swing their way again. Indeed, both extremes can grow at the expense of the middle.

The professional "anti-communists" are just that—professionals. They join the professional "anti-fascists" in the mutual assault on the middle ground. By giving the domestic communists attributes they do not possess, they steer the malcontents their way.

We must have responsible criticism of the Far, Far Left. The real foes of communism are the church, civic and labor groups who actually came to grips with this extremist threat while the Welches of the land were still peddling fudge.

Their viewpoint is represented here. For meaningful (as opposed to hysterical) opposition to communism, who is better equipped than IAD?

Why IAD?

For the economic extremists, the ends-justify-the-means philosophy usually just covers character assassination. For the racial extremists, it covers assassination—period.

All segments of our society must understand there is no great difference between Ku Klux Klansmen killing Jewish and Negro social workers in Mississippi and RAM "hero" Robert Williams openly calling for insurrection from his sanctuary in Communist China.

When Minutemen or Black Muslims set up gun caches and train their private militia, they both court the same explosive answer to what must be settled through communication. Democracy cannot function well enough at gunpoint.

And this, too, poses a challenge to those seeking insights and information from IAD.

Many Top Aides Quit Right-Wing Group, Say Funds, Members Decline
They Say Welch ...
Welch Optimistic on Future

The first time IAD did an in-depth analysis of a John Birch Society policy project, it not only helped blunt the Birch program, it caused turmoil within the Society which all signs indicate persist to the present day.

Tightening the screws on our anguish over Vietnam, Welch set out to convince citizens that, "We are sending our men to fight . . . in a war actually being controlled by Communists or Communist influences."

He charged that a "conspiracy" of "ILLUMINATI" (capitals his) is running affairs in both Moscow and Washington. He says American boys are being sacrificed as a part of a "deliberate 'no win' policy."

All this, and more, is contained in new Welch position papers called The Truth in Time and The Truth about Vietnam. In the March, 1967 JBS Bulletin, he called upon the 4,000 or so JBS cells to distribute the Truth papers and get signatures on a petition winding up with the implication that traitors are responsible for U. S. foreign policy. They were to make the latter "the most massive plea by petition ever directed at the American Congress."

The IAD analysis pointed out that neither the petition nor the position papers bore any indication that they were produced by the Birch Society. This was pointed out in a memo sent to Congress, a selected mailing list of 30,000 civic-minded individuals and to a number of Birchers.

The Northern Illinois Citizens For Democracy reproduced the IAD material in their newsletter when the petition surfaced in Evanston. Dixon Gayer of Fullerton, Calif., did the same in his influential publication, The Dixon Line.

In Bakersfield, Calif., this helped unmask a Birch group. Their Birch booth, set up to get signatures, was removed from a supermarket parking lot after citizen protests.

Stanley J. Bier, Rahway, N. J., realtor, got letters-to-the-editor published about it in areas where the Birchers are strong . . . In Chicago, the news media was advised in advance, and the petitions did not appear. And so it went around the nation.

When Welch told chapters to seek American Legion Post help in getting signatures, we told the Legion nationally, and apparently many posts got the word locally, and that did not come off, either.

The JBS Executive Committee inserted an unprecedented letter in the May Bulletin backing Welch on the petition, blistering IAD for being "disruptive."

Ex-Sheriff Jim Clark, ex-FBI informants Lola Belle Holmes and Julia Brown, and others crisscross the nation levelling the same old charges against Martin Luther King and the Civil Rights movement.

Books, films and TACT and Support Your Local Police front groups are all part of the Birch effort to fan the flames of racial tension. The package as put together by Barbara Hogan is IAD's brochure, "The Shake-Up America Campaign." Now in its second printing, "Shake-Up" has helped provide appropriate answers to Birch propagandists all over the nation.

In its first public year, IAD has provided requested information on at least 30 different Radical Right speakers—the antidote for poison spread at the grass roots.

They Stand Up for Democracy

"There's Something You Ought to Know"

Mabel Rupe

At 74, Mrs. Mabel E. Rupe of Tacoma, Wash., maintains the lifelong habit of working to better mankind. She was a Methodist medical missionary in India, sometimes in areas where there were no doctors. When she returned she married a rancher. When they didn't have children, they raised "borrowed ones." Both of them worked for Sen. Burton K. Wheeler when the communists took after him.

When Birch Council member Floyd Paxton's Yakima Eagle started "warning" against an impending "riot," Mrs. Rupe, a widow for many years, helped organize a street dance in the target area on target night. (Tacoma had no riot.) Every day she monitors the several hours of right wing radio programming beaming into the Tacoma area; sends IAD reports. As a direct result, both IAD and the local NAACP chapter have answered aired personal attacks. Residents report a noticeable improvement in the tone of the "call-in" radio programs she monitors.

Friends worry that this publicity will lead extremists to harm her physically. "And they may," she writes. "Just reread Brooks R. Walkers The Christian Fright Peddlers . . . However, I trust and am not afraid, and if it will do any good, go ahead." When we found a tape recorder for her, before accepting, she warned, "there is something you ought to know" . . . something about her angina pectoris sometimes interfering with the carrying on of her vital, self-appointed tasks.

An Unlisted Phone Kept Ringing

Betty Mason

A housewife and mother, she was publicly refuting Birchtype speakers and letters-to-the-editor long before she heard of IAD. The Masons live in Bakersfield, Calif., a Birch stronghold. She helped rebuff the JBS petition drive there. (See pg. 3.)

When Birch callers dominate the KGEE call-in programs, she and friend Mrs. Mary Paul search out the facts, phone them in. When Mrs. Paul secured an unlisted phone number to cut down on the number of harassing phone calls, the calls persisted until she exposed that, too, on the air.

When KGEE call-in moderator Howie Wines had ex-Sheriff Jim Clark as a guest, Mrs. Mason refuted his facts, using the "Clark Packet" secured from IAD. When Wines called that "garbage" and attacked the character of IAD, Mrs. Mason taped it, and IAD got free time to reply. When Mr. Wines attacked Mrs. Paul on the air, she informed the FCC, and KGEE got a letter of reprimand.

Mrs. Mason has become so familiar with IAD's Fairness Doctrine manual, that she lectured on the subject before the Kern County Council for Civic Unity this month. Meanwhile she is using IAD material to offset propaganda impact of Anarchy-USA. in the area; writes "Thank God for IAD."

When All Else Failed, She [illegible]

Eulah Eubank

When Robert Welch came to Richmond, Va., for a mid-October appearance, local Birchers were startled by the small size of the crowd. Usually he does better. Mrs. Eulah Eubank, widow of World War II veteran, got material from IAD to alert citizens to the current nature of Welch's typical remarks. Like the Birchers, she even got a letter in the Richmond paper. Looking for support, Mrs. Eubank was once spotted passing out HOMEFRONT on the streets just to make sure "somebody knows."

Mrs. Eubank, a University of Tennesse graduate, also has been attending Anarchy-USA. showings, speaking out at the end of the showing.

She Has a Cause, and a [illegible]

Gladys Sharon

A target for considerable verbal abuse in tiny Veneta, Ore., is Mrs. Gladys Sharon. She spends most of her time at home nursing a sick husband, but tangles with Birchers on as many as three call-in programs a day. She gets her facts straight, has good university contacts (although not a college grad); friends report her secret—her fight against the Radical Right is the only "luxury" she can afford.

IAD IS A MAGNET. Several thousand concerned citizens have searched it out. In our first public year, we have filled hundreds of requests for special information. They come from senators and school boys; heads of religious denominations and small town pastors; from university presidents and school teachers, from professional social workers, and aroused housewives. The IAD story must be told in terms of people. Here are five, chosen because they well illustrate that all you need to help defend democracy is courage and a place to turn for facts.

She Received a Minutemen 'Calling Card'

Lavelle Robertson

Real estate broker Lavelle Robertson subscribed to HOMEFRONT just as soon as news of IAD reached her home in Mesa, Ariz. She has been speaking against extremism since she was a government worker in the mid-1930's. She writes letters to editors; started tangling with "witch hunters" on call-in radio programs a decade ago. Recently, she received a "calling card:" a drawing of rifle sight cross hairs, warning "traitors beware;" signed "MINUTEMEN."

Mrs. Robertson told the FBI, sent IAD a copy of the card; said she thought a little publicity was her best insurance. She continues to put out information on touring Radical Right speakers, helping form local discussion groups, tapes and monitors what she views as "offensive radio;" keeps urging friends to "get HOMEFRONT."

Grass Roots Committees Look to IAD

From Anchorage to Sarasota, from Baltimore to San Diego, citizens who oppose democracy's foes communicate with each other through IAD.

For them IAD is:

- A clearinghouse for information and insights;
- A source of usable materials;
- The stimulus that can enlarge their numbers;
- The fixed reference point with which all can identify.

Only a year ago, it wasn't that way. Good, active groups existed in San Diego, where Robert Sessions, a public relations man, donated much of his time; in Chicago, where Mrs. Norma Morrison, backed by the prestigious CCADP was a full-time volunteer; in Cleveland, where Hal Steigman was about to step aside under orders of a heart specialist; in Florida, where an early school assault on Sarasota triggered a healthy reaction; in New England, where "Birchwatchers" keep the Birch Society weakest where it is known best.

Not all the two-dozen groups existing a year ago were active then. Today most are doing something, some a great deal. And their ranks have grown.

Last month, Ken Legond, Dallas stockbroker and chairman of an ad hoc committee, gave a school superintendent materials which showed the true nature of a Revilo Oliver attack on mental health programs which a principal was circulating. The ad hoc committee was formed at a meeting addressed by an IAD staffer.

In Aurora, Ill.; Anchorage, Alaska; Westchester, Ind.; in Boise and Idaho Falls, Idaho, and elsewhere, groups identifying with IAD planned programs, where, a year ago, there were no such groups to meet.

Ad hoc committees are quietly at work in Pittsburgh and Salt Lake City; Ann Arbor and Oklahoma City and in other communities, all working toward a fullfledged program, backed by leading citizens. All are making some progress toward this goal.

In California, the response indicates a hunger for IAD appearances on the West Coast. Some community groups are forming themselves.

Here are the activists who, with the facts at hand, write letters-to-the-editor; object when local radio airs character besmirching attacks; expose the books and films and speakers and front committees which are part of the right-wing drive for power.

We have never personally met anyone from the Margaret V. Smith Discussion Group in Berryville, Va., or the Bergen Alert Committee in Ho-Ho-Kus, N. J., but they tell us they wouldn't be active without IAD's facts.

We have yet to meet with those carrying on the programs in Fort Wayne and Grand Rapids, Wichita and Trenton, but the committees exist and relate to IAD.

IAD is planning a series of seminars to help local groups get themselves formed. Anyone reading these lines want to help?

Seminars, Speeches, Call-in Shows

[illegible]

On November 16, 1967, Dr. Franklin H. Littell is scheduled to participate in a seminar on extremism exclusively for 200 suburban Chicago pastors. It probably couldn't have happened a year ago.

The first such seminar was held at the University of Oklahoma's Human Relations Center, with IAD's Executive Director Charles R. Baker the resource.

In 1966, seminars on extremism were held in Cincinnati and San Diego, to IAD's knowledge. IAD will have participated in at least a dozen this year, with more seemingly in store for 1968.

IAD's Chairman has given at least 50 speeches on extremism before nationally significant audiences. The sponsoring groups range from the Southern Baptists to the National Education Association to Detroit, Dallas, Burlington, Seattle and other church councils.

The national bodies include the YMCA Council, National Civil Liberties Clearinghouse, the Boston Ecumenical Conference. He appears in many universities.

Both Dr. Littell and Charles Baker average about one appearance a month on a call-in radio program; appeared jointly on a National Educational Television documentary on H. L. Hunt shown to prime time audiences coast-to-coast.

IAD has had national exposure in Senior Scholastic, TV Guide, literally hundreds of religious, trade union, and civic publications. We have had coast-to-coast publicity on our initial announcement; Dr. Littell called for answering personal attacks on radio shows; press, radio and TV have covered most personal appearances by IAD's chairman and executive director.

Because of this, millions of Americans know at least a little more about the nature of extremism than they did a year ago. Scores of persons have used IAD's materials in addresses to luncheon clubs, on call-in radio programs, in articles and letters. There can be no precise measurement of the numbers.

One new IAD-relating group, noting the nature of this activity, calls itself (Midland, Mich.) Candle Lighters.

We Smile at the Postman Every Day

Many of America's most socially-responsible groups loaned IAD a priceless asset, leadership mailing lists to help us get started. We mailed three free copies of HOMEFRONT to 30,000 potential leaders; had almost 100,000 copies distributed by concerned groups who paid for them to encourage HOMEFRONT subscriptions. Each day the postman brings in more subscribers, and each day IAD speaks with a little larger voice. Each day more Americans purchase and use materials many could find only by contacting their new-found friend, IAD.

Professional Radio Radicals Charge IAD with Being No. 1 Air Purifier

"Pastor Bob" Walter is one of the stable of Radical Right "evangelists" broadcasting over Carl McIntire's station in Media, Pa.—WXUR.

On Sept. 24th, he called IAD a "gestapo-like" outfit—falsely accused IAD and Dr. Littell of wanting to silence all dissent.

WXUR has aired personal attacks on IAD before. This one was different.

Last month, IAD complained to the FCC that WXUR failed to notify it of the attack, failed to make time available for a reply.

A YEAR AGO, this would have been a matter of small concern. Now WXUR can be fined up to $500 a day (maximum $10,000) for failure to tell us of the attack and offer time to reply.

Sometime in November, IAD Executive Director Charles R. Baker will testify that WXUR also failed to notify IAD when Richard Cotten and Major Bundy attacked IAD over WXUR—at a virtually unprecedented hearing in which 19 civic organizations are urging the FCC not to renew WXUR's broadcasting license.

A year ago, most of the stations airing Radical Right broadcasts were not aware of the FCC's Fairness Doctrine. When the Rev.-Dr. William Steuart McBirnie and Richard Cotten made the first personal attacks on IAD and we demanded free time to reply, indications are that neither McBirnie nor Cotten realized we had that right.

Since then, we have also replied to attacks by Bundy, Bardwell, and a half-dozen moderators on call-in programs.

THE IAD SPECIAL "Contrasting Viewpoint" program rebutting McIntire's daily misrepresentations of the Fairness Doctrine was aired by many stations carrying his program. Finally, he used it as a quarter-hour segment of his daily half-hour show carried over some 600 stations.

Scores of professional radio personalities still compete for the millions of Radical Right radio dollars on an estimated 10,000 broadcasts a week. This is America's only ideological programming. It is bound to affect basic U.S. attitudes.

When IAD first demanded its rights under the Fairness Doctrine, just about every station involved resisted. Hundreds of letters and a half-dozen FCC complaints later, the whole multi-million grossing "hate-by-air" industry knows of its obligations.

Station managements are actually listening to what they broadcast, and some are shocked at what they hear. Some are dropping right-wing programs. Some are scrambling for "balancing" programs. Some are demanding that McIntire, Hargis, Burpo, Scott, Manion, Munn (Lifeline), Cotten, Bundy, Smoot, and their seads of imitators supply scripts.

Carl McIntire and Billy James Hargis, both of whom gross over a million dollars annually, are producing reams of written material charging IAD with being the chief "force" against them. Since our only "force" is appealing to reason and our chief ploy is answering personal attacks, their wrath illuminates their intentions.

All IAD aspires to do is to help make the FCC's Fairness Doctrine a living document. The howls of anguish from those seeking to use the kilocycles to impose their views on America are good evidence that IAD is making great strides in that direction.

EVERYONE CONTRIBUTING prayers, facts, ideas, time and funds has a right to feel a personal pride in IAD's achievements to date. Together we have shown what can be done to protect our nation from those who seek to undermine its basic precepts. The challenge of history is to do more of it.

THE EXTREMISTS TRY TO INTIMIDATE or discredit their opposition. Key trustees, contributors, and stockholders of organizations identified with IAD's sponsors get bombarded with "exposes" produced by Fred Schwarz, Carl McIntire, B. J. Hargis, Major Bundy and so on.

"Pete" White, part of Hargis' braintrust, calls for a boycott of goods and services identified with IAD's sponsors in the current issue of Christian (sic) Crusade. The Hargis spokesman said the faithful should even seek "some other fuel" instead of using Nat'l Rural Electric Co-op electricity. And that shows Hargis really does want to keep his followers in the dark.

WHILE THE F.B.I. keeps tabs on everybody even remotely connected with the Communist Party, the basic information on the Far Right is collected by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and Group Research. IAD has full access to these files. This gives us a depth of information without which we could hardly function.

McIntire Buys More Cape May—Burpo, Hargis Just Buy

Right-wing evangelism is big business. Tax records show that Dr. Carl McIntire, through his Christian Beacon Press, is the biggest taxpayer in Cape May, N. J., and Christian Beacon Press just acquired, for $550,000, the 100-room Congress Hall waterfront hotel to go with the Christian Admiral. Cape May papers report the McIntire interests are also spending $75,000 to enlarge another building to 3,000 seating capacity. In Tulsa, construction records show Billy James Hargis is adding a $50,000 annex to his $525,000 cathedral.

In Mesa, Ariz., a court ruled that C. W. Burpo's $300,000-grossing Bible Institute of the Air, Inc., was a business and hence could no longer be operated out of what he calls his "little 7-room cottage" (house in foreground of picture—ranch-style home in background with pool is Burpo's residence, a $50,000 package). Burpo, appealing for funds, told his radio audience he was under attack by "anti-Christian neighbors."

A PETITION TO THE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION BY THE TRUSTEES OF THE "TRUTH AND JUSTICE FUND," RAISED BY POPULAR SUBSCRIPTION IN SUPPORT OF RADIO STATION KAYE, PUYALLUP, WASHINGTON; TOGETHER WITH THE REPLY OF SUCH TRUSTEES TO A PETITION DATED APRIL 14, 1969, AND SIGNED BY ONE EARLE K. MOORE, ALLEGEDLY ON BEHALF OF "PUGET SOUND COMMITTEE FOR GOOD BROADCASTING."

President Abraham Lincoln once said, "Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves." No more apt illustration of the force of this apothegm has come to the attention of the undersigned than the present situation with respect to the current cabal to silence Radio Station KAYE, Puyallup, Washington. In order to make clear to the Commission the situation actually obtaining here in Tacoma and surrounding Pierce County, it is necessary first to explain the political background which underlies this seeming plot.

The City of Tacoma has for some years been in the throes of a deep-seated controversy over the merits and demerits of the City Manager form of government now obtaining in this city, and which has ruled the city for a dozen years. The present City Manager has boasted publicly that he has been responsible for bringing to this city over $65 million of Federal-State funds; which has resulted, to the extent that it may be true, in the employment of large numbers of people, many imported from other areas, and in a vast program of "Urban Renewal," including a "Model City" program in a small area of the city where some 50% of the population are of a minority race. Inevitably, there have arisen vested interests in the continuation and the extension of these Federally financed programs, and in the additional, and often very well remunerated, employment which they provide. It is largely the direct and indirect beneficiaries of these Federal programs who constitute the signers of the petition of the "Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting," of whom there are 69 names on the original petition.

At the same time, there has arisen a growing tide of dissatisfaction with this increasing dependence on Federal money, and increasing disillusionment with the City Manager form of municipal government as here applied, and a wide-spread public distrust of the integrity with which certain of these Federally financed programs have been handled. This public feeling resulted in the election in November, 1967, of Mayor A. L. Rasmussen, and two City Council members, all openly opposed to the City Manager form of government, and pledged in their campaign pronouncements to seeking a change. While granting virtually unlimited air time to both sides of this controversy, Radio KAYE editorially supported Mayor Rasmussen and his colleagues, who at this time constitute a four-person minority in the nine-member City Council. Thus the City Manager system, the City Manager himself and some of his appointees, and the beneficiaries of many programs which he has promoted, find themselves in a hazardous situation, since the continuance of the benefits they enjoy could very well hang on the slender thread of one vote on the City Council. The situation is further complicated for them by the fact that two of the five-man majority, uniformly favorable to anything the City Manager wishes to do, have announced that they will not be candidates for re-election when five members are elected this coming autumn, including the Mayor. It is perhaps understandable that a certain desperation now pervades the camp-followers of the City Manager system whose benefits they enjoy. As a consequence, one of the signers of the above-mentioned petition, associated with a financial institution, and associated with two other persons similarly connected, is now collecting funds for the avowed purpose of protecting the City Manager system, and of getting rid of the present Mayor and seeking to assure a majority favorable to the City Manager and the system which he represents. This is an understandable expression of self-interest, and were the end it seeks pursued by ethical means, it would not be subject to justifiable criticism. The fact that ethical means were long ago abandoned justifies the criticism which will be contained in this petition, which criticism will form the basis for certain urgent recommendations with which we will conclude this document.

Complicating the entire situation, but by no means directly responsible for it, is what would appear to the undersigned to be some collusive activity of national scope to silence broadcasting stations all over the country whose political and economic and religious philosophy is distasteful to those involved. The undersigned have no personal information about this activity other than what they read in the public press. From that source, it would appear that there is an organization that purports to represent the United Church of Christ, address unknown, which is spear-heading a campaign in some twenty or more cities in this country, designed with the help of local satellite groups to prevail upon the Federal Communications Commission to deny license renewal to broadcasting facilities which fall under its disapproval. It appears to the undersigned that this activity has the cooperation of an organization known as the "Institute for American Democracy, Inc.," whose address is said to be Suite 101, 1330 Massachusetts Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C., 20005; and whose Executive Director is said to be a Mr. Charles R. Baker. Again relying on the public press, it is said that this collusive grouping is financed by something over a quarter of a million dollars of money contributed by several tax-exempt Foundations. According to the press, the following, possibly amongst other, contributions have been made for the furtherance of this plot:

Ford Foundation	$160,000
Marshall Field Foundation	$ 50,000

If these press reports are correct, it becomes evident that this plot for the suppression of free speech is remarkably well financed. It is the belief of the undersigned that the collaboration of the local satellite group, self-styled as the "Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting," with the national grouping is merely fortuitous. It appears to us that the local group, primarily interested in the local municipal elections, is merely taking advantage of a convenient vehicle which would appear to them to be one that could assist them in silencing the radio station whose influence in next fall's elections they regard with understandable trepidation.

In this connection, it should also be pointed out that it is not Radio KAYE alone which has become the objective of the local collaborators. Radio KOOD, in nearby Lakewood, has already been silenced, in some measure by the same efforts used against Radio KAYE; namely, intimidation and boycott of advertisers, and various forms of threat and intimidation directed at the station itself. A similar campaign has been carried on against the programs on Radio Station KMO conducted by Mr. Burt McMurtrie. It is felt that the investigation which will be requested herein should also be extended to include those two broadcasting outlets.

In summary, then, it is the belief of the undersigned that the entire campaign of harassment, law suits, intimidation, violence, and attempted assassination as applied against Radio Station KAYE is based on the local political situation, though the extent to which the national grouping above described participates in this harassment is one of the avenues of investigation recommended to be pursued.

The plot which is seeking to bring about the closure of Radio Station KAYE has not been confined to simply seeking to have the FCC deny it a license renewal. Those active in it have resorted to much more direct means of coercion. These have included, and continue at this writing to include, direct violence against personnel connected with Radio Station KAYE, threats of violence against them and the advertisers on the station, intimidation by telephone calls and anonymous letters, burglary of documents from the office of Radio Station KAYE, attempted boycott of the station's advertisers, and several attempts at the assassination of station personnel. It is believed that these matters have already been called to the attention of the Commission, and that it is needless to go into further detail on them at this time. If and when the investigation which will herein be requested is initiated, full details and documentation are readily available.

A detailed reply to the petition of the "Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting" will form an appendix to this petition and statement.

Meantime, the undersigned urgently request that there be instituted an investigation by the Federal Communications Commission, or by such other agency of the United States Government as seems appropriate, to develop, inter alia, evidence on the following points:

1. The background of the group purporting to represent the "United Church of Christ," and of the "Institute for American Democracy, Inc.," and the legality of their injection into a local political controversy.

2. The extent to which certain of the petitioners who sign themselves as members of the "Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting" are operating in violation of the Hatch Act in being engaged in political activities while holding offices compensated in whole or in part from Federal funds.

3. The source of the financing which is paying for the various forms of harassment being applied against Radio Station KAYE, including the source of legal fees being employed in certain current harassment suits against that station; and to what extent this financing is national, and to what extent local, and whether or not Federal funds are involved.

4. The extent to which certain subversive organizations are participating in this harassment, and at whose behest.

5. The extent to which certain persons with criminal records are being employed in some aspects of this intrigue, possibly compensated by Federal funds.

6. The extent to which the office of the City Manager of Tacoma, either directly or through appointees, is involved in this collusive activity.

7. The extent to which certain of the signers of the petition of the "Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting" are engaged in entrapment efforts to evade the vigilance of Radio KAYE personnel and to thus broadcast material designed to form the basis for additional litigation and additional complaints.

8. The extent to which the current harassment suits have been promoted and their basis, laid by entrapment.

9. The extent to which collusive activity to exclude from the air a Federally-licensed broadcasting facility is in violation of law and of Constitutional guarantees of free speech, with a view to the criminal prosecution of those participating in such actions.

10. The extent to which persons involved locally in this intrigue may be subversives on record as such with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

11. Finally, it is suggested that a determination be made as to whether or not an effort has been made to mislead the Federal Communications Commission by seeking to make it believe that the firm of Moore, Berson, Hamburg and Bernstein, of New York, are in fact attorneys for the local "Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting," when it well may be that in fact their employment and compensation derive from other sources.

Respectfully submitted,

APPENDIX I

PETITION OF THE TRUSTEES OF THE "TRUTH AND JUSTICE FUND," RE: RADIO STATION KAYE, PUYALLUP, WASHINGTON.

COMMENT ON PETITION OF "PUGET SOUND COMMITTEE FOR GOOD BROADCASTING," FILE NO. 2682, RADIO STATION KAYE, PUYALLUP, WASHINGTON.

First, the undersigned call attention to the fact that the petition of the "Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting" is not formally before them nor before Radio Station KAYE at this time, their only information about it being in the form of what purports to be a copy of such petition with appendices, received from one Earle K. Moore, who signs himself as attorney for petitioners, and appears to be of the firm of Moore, Berson, Hamburg, and Bernstein, of 660 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y., 10021. A communication from Mr. Moore is dated April 14, 1969, and came to the station in a cover postmarked New York. Since the undersigned are disinclined to believe that Mr. Moore is an agent for the Federal Communications Commission, it would appear that the petition is a private communication, and that any response whatsoever to it would appear to be gratuitous on the part of the station or the undersigned. Nonetheless, the allegations contained in that petition, which we have reason to feel is probably in the hands of the Federal Communications Commission, are so completely and outrageously contrary to fact that it is felt desirable to comment on them, regardless of what status, if any, they might have with the Federal Communications Commission, on which point the undersigned have no information.

These comments will be made on the basis of the numbered paragraphs of the above described petition, which is by its own terms designated as File No. BR 2682.

Para 1. We would suggest inquiry as to whether the "Puget Sound Committee for Good Broadcasting" is an independent group or merely the local branch of some other organization.

Para 2. No comment.

Para 3. This paragraph alleges that the petition is filed "on behalf of all other radio listeners within the signal area of Station KAYE." We need not belabor the fact that this is a palpably false statement.

Para 4. This paragraph is substantially and constructively false from start to finish. Contrary to its allegation, all views, whether concurring or not with those of Mr. James Nicholls, are freely aired. Failure and refusal of City Manager system proponents to take advantage of freely offered air time cannot be laid at the door of KAYE.

Station KAYE participates in dozens of worthy civic projects. Amonst those it supports are the Patriotic American Mothers, the Tacoma Servicemen's Center, a recent local school bond and millage issue, support of the local Association of the Handicapped, and many other civic activities.

The emphasis on the City Manager situation in Tacoma is pertinent to the entire surrounding area, due to the continuing campaign of the present City Manager to expand his jurisdiction by annexation of adjoining and nearby areas.

Para 5. This paragraph is entirely and demonstrably false, and without the slightest foundation in fact. Radio KAYE criticizes editorially issues and the conduct of public figures, as it has every right to do, and as all other local media also do. It does not attack either the character or motives of public figures, though even this is legally permissible, and often indulged in by other local media. No one is "subject to hostile and abusive questions" on KAYE, and any attempt of that kind is immediately suppressed, and particularly has had to be so in recent months, when City Manager proponents themselves repeatedly seek by entrapment to get onto the air items on which to base law suits and complaints. Invitations to appear and present contrasting views are often themselves met by abuse and ridicule, and we ourselves have heard the present City Manager do this on the air in response to such invitations. Furthermore, he has forbidden any city employee to appear on KAYE in defense of the official city position. We have heard him publicly say: "I would not dignify your station by appearing on it." Complaint that opponents are excluded, under these circumstances, is obviously hypocritical.

It would have been difficult to combine in one paragraph a more completely false set of complaints about Radio Station KAYE.

Para 6. Completely inaccurate except that it is true that sessions of the City Council are in fact broadcast, originally at the request of Mayor Rasmussen, and without comment. The initiative by Radio Station KAYE in broadcasting Council sessions has resulted in the sincerest form of flattery, in that two other broadcasting facilities habitually now do the same thing. Comment made by KAYE before and after Council sessions does not alter the fact that the sessions themselves are presented without comment.

Appeals to the citizenry to attend City Council sessions would seem to be an odd basis for complaint, especially since it has resulted in a large attendance and a rapidly broadening participation in city government by local citizenry.

Para 7. This paragraph is accurate as to the existance of the stated programs, and completely false with regard to their content. The innuendo contained in the words "particularly Negroes" is false and intentionally misleading. The station editorially continues to oppose violence, law breaking and the fomenting of racial discord, which critics seemingly interpret as "attacks on and innuendo about persons and groups," or as "naked abuse," all of which is a perversion of the truth. Such criticism seems to us to suggest that opposition to law breaking and to racial misconduct are regarded as offensive to those guilty of that conduct, and the complaint would thus appear to express the resentment of the guilty.

Para 8. This paragraph is completely false. The allegation that KAYE "manipulates its programs so as to favor supporters of its views" is the exact contrary of the truth, as is well known to the critics. In fact, our own criticism continues to be that KAYE goes much too far in its tolerance of the abuse, vituperation, and extremism of some of the signers of the petition under discussion, whose language frequently becomes so violent and crude as to require cutting them off the air. We who listen frequently to KAYE come to recognize many of the voices, and to realize that much of it is an attempt to "bait" or to "entrap" the station into airing something which could be used against it. Such entrapment has already resulted in legal action against the station, presumably in the hope of getting it off the air for fear of its influence in the forthcoming municipal elections. All such suits, some of which are still before the courts, have thus far failed of their intended effect, but the entrapment efforts go on.

The entire paragraph is false and misleading. Music is never used to "drown out" speakers, and in fact it is used very sparingly at all on the "Party Line" and "Round Table Forum" programs, and then only either as part of an advertisement or to illustrate a point; i.e., the Washington State Song, the Tacoma Centennial Song, and so forth.

The station has no unpublicized telephone numbers, as alleged. Callers, friendly or not, are openly invited to call in on the business line, whose number is given publicly, when they feel they have something of unusual import to communicate, and the number of that line is well known.

Most of the "repeat" callers of which this paragraph complains are in fact station critics, who often try to monopolize the lines, in what appears to be a concerted effort to black out opponents of the present form of city government. Many of these callers are readily recognized as some of the signers of the petition. Furthermore, in the illustrations given in the body of the petition, things heard over Station KAYE are inextricably intermingled with things heard over two other stations; namely, KOOD and KTNT. The confusion is understandable, since KTNT is 1400 KC, KAYE is 1450, and recently closed KOOD was 1480.

Para 9. There is no paragraph 9.

Para 10. This paragraph is completely false and misleading. Personal attacks on the character or integrity of anyone are promptly cut off by the station, even though it is obvious to listeners that some of these callers are deliberate "plants." Criticism of the official conduct or policies of public officials is evidently interpreted by this paragraph as "personal attacks."

There is no basis for the criticism that callers are not required to identify themselves, as this is standard practice on dozens of such programs, local, regional, and national.

The allegation that critics are cut off and supporters permitted to carry on is not only false, it is in fact the reverse of the station policy. Our own criticism continues to be that far too much leniency is given critics, who often become abusive in the extreme, in an obviously concerted and continuing effort to get something on the air which can be used against the station later. It is this collusive effort, its personnel and motivation, financing and background, which the undersigned, in an earlier part of this document, seek to have investigated.

Para 11. This paragraph refers to the three harassment actions brought against KAYE in the continuing effort to get it off the air prior to the forthcoming municipal elections. These actions are still in the courts, and have been set for hearings at varying dates extending into next December and January.

Recognizing these actions for what we believe them to be, a part of the current municipal campaign, a concerned group of many hundreds of citizens has raised a substantial sum of money, under the exclusive control of the undersigned Trustees, who have secured legal aid in defending Radio KAYE from this kind of harassment. Through our lawyers we have been trying to bring these actions to court as promptly as possible, hoping thus to expose the persons and influence behind this harassment, and thus to establish openly the nature and personnel behind these machinations. Due to court congestion, all three cases have been set forward many months, much to our disappointment, although this also has had the effect of defeating the attempt to use such actions to close the station down before the fall elections.

Having failed in attempts to close the station by the means thus far attempted, other means have been, and continue to be, employed as outlined elsewhere in this statement. These means have included beatings, threats, intimidation of station personnel and station advertisers, burglary of station records, anonymous threatening letters (for an example, see Appendix III hereto), continuing attempts at entrapment, and several attempts at assassination of station personnel.

In view of the fact that the three actions are still unresolved in the courts, hearings having been set forward many months, it is obvious that the statements contained in Para 11 are without foundation in fact.

Para 12. The financial condition of Radio Station KAYE is not an issue, and is wholly irrelevant to its license renewal, so long as it obeys the laws, as it is doing, and conducts itself in its present exemplary manner. We might point out that the financial condition of some of the petitioners is also open to a good deal of question, but equally irrelevant. If profits and a financial surplus were a pre-condition for licensing, there would be very few independent radio stations on the air, and radio broadcasting would be limited to stations owned by newspapers or wealthy groups or institutions. Radio KAYE is a relatively new enterprise, it is paying its bills to the satisfaction of all; even if, in common with any number of small businesses, its hopes for substantial profit lie still in the future.

Para 13. This paragraph seeks by innuendo to read some kind of sinister motives into perfectly normal activities. There is no excuse for the use of such adjectives as "ultra-conservative," and such unjustified clauses as "against everyone ------ whom it considers unduly sympathetic to minorities or the poor." The fact is that the station is editorially and openly patriotic, and to some kinds of people such conduct is habitually interpreted as "ultra-conservative." The station is certainly far from unique in criticizing U. S. Supreme Court decisions as unduly lenient to the kind of people and conduct championed by the signers to that petition. The station has never claimed that Mayor Rasmussen is "its biggest contributor," which is obviously ridiculous. Its solicitation of "bucks for broadcast" permits broadcast of City Council meetings without advertising breaks, and we see no basis for criticism therein. Other than as reporting news, KAYE has no connection with the publication to which those petitioners refer, nor with the organization referred to as the "CIA," nor does the station solicit contributions to either of them. In any case, the entire subject is irrelevant.

The reference to the "Testimonial Dinner" for Mr. Nicholls brings up a matter in which all of us take a good deal of pride. It was a birthday dinner for Mr. Nicholls on March 26, at Brad's Restaurant, and it brought together a distinguished company of many hundreds of citizens, amongst them high ranking state and local officials. At the dinner, Mr. Nicholls received congratulatory wires from this state's Senators and others in the Congress, and the award by the State of Washington of a plaque designating him as a "Distinguished Citizen of the State of Washington."

Para 14. The allegation of station insolvency is unwarranted as well as irrelevant. As to funds collected by public subscription to support the station and keep it on the air, the undersigned Trustees would gladly welcome any unbiased and impartial investigation. In their opinion, however, it would be still more important that such investigation should include a study of the source of funds being used in the continuing efforts to close the station, including the source of legal fees connected therewith.

In this connection, it has long been suspected by many concerned citizens of the area that certain Federal funds being lavishly distributed hereabouts, sometimes as salaries for persons with long criminal records, are being used to a substantial extent illicitly, and diverted to other than their intended uses. Mayor Rasmussen and a City Council minority have long and vainly demanded an investigation of this kind. It is our feeling that any investigation should include a study as to what extent, if any, these Federal funds, or funds substituted for them, are being used in the harassment of Station KAYE.

Para 15. The fact that KAYE presents syndicated religious and patriotic programs, in common with dozens of other stations in the area, seems to us a rather odd basis for criticism.

Para 16. This paragraph criticizes the broadcasting on KAYE of programs sponsored by, and advertising of the products of, the H. L. Hunt Enterprises, and alleges that "the products of H. L. H. Products are unknown in the service area."

This is a piece of bald-faced mendacity. The undersigned have repeatedly bought, and still find available throughout the area, many products of that firm. Furthermore, their availability or lack of it would appear to us to be completely irrelevant, as would the appearance of Mr. Wimpe on the station. The same broadcasts are also made on numerous other stations in the area.

Para 17. While the comment about rating claims seems to the undersigned completely irrelevant, we have been given access to reports which though indirect are regarded by us as reliable, that during certain of its broadcasting hours Station KAYE rates first in its service area. Certainly, it would appear to be the conviction of its critics that some such situation exists, since otherwise there would be no basis for what appears to be the desperation of their efforts to close it down.

Para 18. The allegations in this paragraph are completely false, in that KAYE has made no claim to having conducted any formal consultations with any of the persons therein named. On the contrary, it can claim honestly, and does so, that these people and many others have, in conversations sought for the purpose of securing such information, given the station personnel much valuable information as to community tastes and needs and problems. The substance of Para 18 is an attempt, by slanted semantics, to accuse Radio KAYE of a deception it never practiced, and of which in fact these critics are the ones who are guilty.

Para 19. This paragraph is substantially false and misleading. The petitioners have sought to give the impression that they speak for the organizations of which they allege they are members. This is an effort to mislead the Commission, since inquiry of the organizations mentioned uniformly develops that they do not regard themselves as bound by those who allege themselves to be their spokesmen. Any allegations made by KAYE with regard to conditions in certain OEO-supported areas are truthful statements, and can be substantiated. KAYE has never made an attack on the Tacoma Police Department, and has never criticized it for employing Negro Police Officers, as alleged. It has criticized the City Manager Administration for what it regards as unwise and unjustified limitations placed upon the law enforcement activities of the Tacoma Police Department, and it is still of that opinion, as are the undersigned. KAYE has never referred to the League of Women Voters in the terms alleged, though this has been done and continues to be done repeatedly by others about an organization which is best characterized by its own statements, for which see Appendix II hereto, which would seem to indicate that the organization has an equal enthusiasm for the City Manager system and for the embracing of Communist China. KAYE continues editorially to endorse, and not oppose, the employment of Negro Officers in the Tacoma Police Department, within normal Civil Service rules. KAYE stands by its criticism of perversion in certain organizations using Federal funds, and asserts that truth justifies those criticisms. The fact that the law in this area is not enforced with even-handed justice against all law-breakers is demonstrable, and capable of documentation.

Para 20. This paragraph is completely false. Mr. Nicholls has given no medical advice, but in common with hundreds of other communications media has reported, as news, some remarkable cures seemingly effected by unconventional means. The same news is to be found in any number of newspapers and other periodicals. To refer to such news reporting as the offering of medical advice vividly illustrates the paucity of facts, as well as of integrity, in the petition under discussion.

Para 21. This paragraph requests denial of license renewal to Radio KAYE, Puyallup, Washington, and appends the names of 69 signers, all allegedly represented by one Earle K. Moore, Attorney. The undersigned will refrain from personal comment on those signers, though many of them are guilty of falsehoods in their self-identification, both by inaccurate statements and by significant omissions. Nonetheless, we will confine ourselves to reference to them generically. We recognize in a majority of all the listed petitioners persons who are beneficiaries of, or publicly involved in, Federal spending programs in this area; which programs would presumably be adversely affected, as would the signers' benefits therefrom, by a change in the form or personnel of city government in Tacoma.

The entire petition is a self-serving document, primarily designed to protect the personal interests of most of its signers, and to try to enlist the help of the Federal Communication Commission in taking sides in the local political campaign. The entire anti-Radio KAYE campaign is clearly intended to protect the personal interests of most of its signers by seeking to eliminate a hazard which the popularity of Radio KAYE, and its editorial opposition both to the City Manager form of local government and to corruption is that government, poses to their individual and personal future financial security.

In contrast to this purely self-serving document, attention is called to the thousands of unselfishly concerned citizens of this area who have signed petitions in support of the continuance on the air of the fair and unbiased and informative programs which in this area are available to listeners primarily through that station's facilities.

Respectfully submitted,

Women Voters Group Urges Ties With Red China

WASHINGTON (AP) — The League of Women Voters urged the U.S. government Saturday to work actively for normal, cultural, trade and diplomatic relations with mainland China.

In a position paper on the country often called Red China, the league said also: "The United States sould withdraw its opposition to representation of the Chinese People's Republic in the United Nations."

The statement is the outcome of a three-year study of U.S.-China relations by the 157,000 members in 1,202 local leagues in the country.

Mrs. Bruce B. Benson, Amherst, Mass., league president, said the statement represents a consensus of reports from the local leagues.

LEFT BANK—The Louis M. Rabinowitz Foundation

by LAWRENCE V. COTT and RUTH L. MATTHEWS

Where does the Left get its money? Speculation, not without merit, usually centers in two sources. Communist governments abroad or rich Red angels in this country. There are documented cases, some not yet on the public record, of funds flowing in from the Soviet Union, from Cuba, from Red China. Better known are the domestic fat-cats, befuddled liberals as well as Communists, passing out their inheritance for the Cause.

There is another source increasingly important in funding the Left: Non-profit foundations. They often deal in politics, under the thin veneer of "community" projects or whatever; and often in enormous sums.

For several months, COMBAT has been examining the public records of a non-profit foundation which annually pours hundreds of thousands of dollars into the Left, to finance propaganda films glorifying Communist China and revolutionary activity in Berkeley, to finance socialist conferences, and in effect to subsidize Marxist and Communist publishing houses. This is the Louis M. Rabinowitz Foundation of 30 E. 42nd St., New York City. There seems to be a "research project" waiting for any Leftist who knocks at its door.

The Foundation was established in 1944 by a self-made New York industrialist (garment industry hooks and eyes), primarily to finance research into Jewish contributions to American life. So long as Louis Rabinowitz lived, his foundation stayed close to its charter, funding libraries and museums, endowing chairs at major universities, equipping archeological expeditions- in short, financing a hundred projects in the tradition of philanthropy. Then in 1957 Louis Rabinowitz died and direction of the foundation bearing his name passed to the hands of his son, his daughter and his daughter-in-law. The son, New York lawyer Victor Rabinowitz, has over the years been defense counsel for scores of clients called before Congressional committees investigating Communist activities. For many years he was Fidel Castro's chief legal representative—and registered foreign agent -in the United States. Rabinowitz has invoked the 5th Amendment privilege against self-incrimination when questioned about Communist activities, before a Congressional committee. So has his wife, Marcia, Secretary-Treasurer of the Foundation. His sister, Mrs. Lucille Perlman, is Vice President.

COMBAT has examined the public tax statements of the Louis M. Rabinowitz Foundation for the years since the death of Louis M. Rabinowitz. The findings indicate the Foundation's original purpose has been all but abandoned. Most of its money is now going into the pockets of well-known leftists, generally for "research" on papers, articles and books on Marxist or Communist subjects.

Those on the take include some of the biggest names of the left: Frank Donner, Hunter Pitts O'Dell, Walter Lowenfels, Clinton Jencks, Marvin Gettleman, Morris Schappes, Joseph P. Morray, James Forman, William Worthy, William J. Pomeroy, Len de Caux, Paul M. Sweezy, Andre Gunder Frank, Sylvester Leaks, Philip Reno, Christopher Koch, Frank Cieciorka, John Gerassi, Eugene Genovese, Waldo Frank, William Mandel, James Petras, John Howard Lawson, Todd Gitlin, Herbert Marcuse, Howard Zinn.

COMBAT's investigation of the Louis M. Rabinowitz Foundation reveals:

- The Foundation formerly granted large funds to Jewish foundations but this has declined from 41 [illegible] in 1960 to only 37 in 1967.
- Several years ago Senator J. William Fulbright, Arab-oriented, investigated the sources of certain funds coming into the U.S. from the Jewish Agency for Israel and found out that some were going through the Rabinowitz Foundation to pro-Israel groups in the U.S. and to the American Jewish Congress to aid its investigation of anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. Victor Rabinowitz, challenged by Fulbright, was shocked, promised his foundation would stop being a conduit. What transpired was this: Fulbright had stopped an activity offensive to the Arabs, and Rabinowitz stopped one offensive to the Soviet Union.
- The Foundation has over the years contributed funds for research for books on Marxism (in some cases disguised in the grant as "socialism") and these books have then been published by International Publishers, the Communist Party's publishing house in the United States. The other large identifiable group of authors has been associated with the "independent" Marxist publishing house, Monthly Review Press, and its magazine, Monthly Review. Its stable of authors, some of them also identified as CP members in Congressional testimony, has received tens of thousands of tax-free dollars for "research," with the publisher providing only a pittance as royalty.
- At least two other leftist magazines have received direct grants from the Foundation: the now defunct Studies on the Left (as well as its three principal officers, individually) and Science and Society, a Marxist journal described by an official government committee as a Communist publication. (Four of the six members of Science and Society's editorial board have been identified as CP members at one time or another.)
- It provided seed money for the financing of two propaganda films: "China," a transparently one-sided view of Mainland China by Englishman Felix Greene, who received $1,500 in 1963 and $7,500 in 1964. The film was produced, incidentally, by Lester Cole, named as a CP member and one of the original Hollywood Ten. The other film was "Days of Protest," a documentary of the Vietnam Day Committee protest marches in California. Producer Jerry Stoll, who has been named as a CP member and has spoken at CP street rallies, received $700 in [illegible].
- It gave $1,500 in 196[illegible] to Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam, a pressure group organized chiefly to oppose U.S. policy in Southeast Asia.
- The Foundation provided large sums to fund "research" for books and articles portraying Cheddi Jagan, who has said he wouldn't reject description as a Communist, as a popular hero of Guyana. One of the Rabinowitz Foundation's officers, Marcia Rabinowitz, was an officer of Friends of British Guiana, cited as a Communist front after Congressional investigation. Other research projects emphasize Cuba and Castro, Victor Rabinowitz's long time benefactor.
- It provided funds for operation of at least two of the Socialist Scholars Conferences, both held in New York City. The conferences are widely viewed as mis-named: the socialism discussed most frequently and with the greatest admiration is the socialism of Cuba, the Soviet Union and Red China. In the case of the second conference, in September

BEST AVAILABLE COPY

1966, 14 of the official participants who delivered papers (i.e., 25% of the speakers) have been identified as recipients of Rabinowitz Foundation funds, and the Foundation provided $2,000 to help run the conference.

The Foundation's purposes are set forth in its charter, which repeats the Internal Revenue Service statute on tax-exempt foundations, specifying its interests to include "research into Jewish law and history, contemporary Jewish affairs and scholarships, civil liberties, education specifically in areas of social work, etc." The "etc." is obviously most important. But nowadays one man's "civil liberties drive" is another man's "outside agitation," one man's "education" is another man's "propaganda" thus the mischief is done.

In 1960 the Foundation disbursed about $107,000, almost all to well-recognized and long-established charities, but there was a small amount for the Civil Liberties Docket (of Berkeley), $1,500 to Studies on the Left, $2,500 to Joseph Papp's New York Shakespeare Festival, and $2,000 to the left-wing Pacifica Foundation. Stanford and the University of Wisconsin were down for tidy amounts. Jewish philanthropies received $47,000, or about 44%. In 1962 nearly $200,000 was distributed, again mostly to legitimate organizations. Grants and scholarships, unspecified by name or amount, came to $144,619; recognizable Jewish philanthropies of one kind or another received $38,825 (about 20% of the total). In that year the Shakespeare Festival went down to $200, where it's stayed ever since; Pacifica Foundation got $1,530, and Willard Uphaus' World Fellowship received $500.

In 1963 the Foundation handed out $182,000; it was the year of the major departure. Jewish philanthropies had dropped to just $28,700 (about 15%), with a few minor contributions going to Columbia, Yale, Haverford College, and a few small charities. The bulk of the money went to leftists, some of it itemized below.

In 1964 the Rabinowitz Foundation disbursed $177,000, so much that by the end of the year its net worth had been whittled down to just under $71,000. As usual, the left got the lion's share behind the protective coloration of a few small gifts to recognized charities—a civic ballet group in Brooklyn, a guidance center in Rabinowitz's home town, New Rochelle. The Foundation also donated $26,650 to Jewish groups (about 15%). The following year the Foundation, according to its tax records, made no contributions or grants (although there is some evidence it did). Its portfolio contained $79,000 in government bonds, $41,000 in non-government bonds, $154,000 in corporate stock, and nearly $10,000 in other assets. At year's end its net worth was $286,000.

Finances were thus well enough off in 1966 for the officers to scatter $114,000 to 53 recipients: a "legal rights" group in New Haven got $1,500, a group helping retarded children $200, the Freedom Information Center in Tougaloo, Miss., $2,000. The left walked off with most of the money, though; Jewish charitable institutions received their by-now ritual 15%.

The last year for which tax records are available for study is 1967, and the figures show heavy plunging on the Marxist-Leninist-Castroite-"socialist" crowd. A few small university grants, the highest $2,500 to University of Wisconsin, a small check to a Brooklyn youth center, and only $3,000 (about 3%) to Jewish philanthropies. The rest went to the likes of Clinton Jencks ($5,750) and Prof. Harvey Goldberg ($5,000), James Aronson ($3,000) and Mario Savio ($1,500).

Here is a rundown of some of the lucky winners of the Big Sweepstakes of 42nd Street:

James Forman. Now chief fund raiser for the National Black Economic Development Conference and author of its demand for $500 million reparations from churches for centuries of alleged ill-treatment of Negroes. Forman received four grants from the Rabinowitz Foundation in 1963, totaling $22,945.50. The next year Forman returned for $13,835, a grand total of nearly $37,000. Coincidentally, Forman is married to the former Anna Constancia Romilly, daughter of author Jessica Mitford, and stepdaughter of Oakland, Calif., attorney Robert Treuhaft, both of whom have been identified as CP members in the CP press. (In 1966 Victor Rabinowitz sent $50 to help in Robert Treuhaft's campaign for district attorney.) In the years he received $37,000 from the Foundation, Forman was an executive of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, later melded into and then out of the Black Panthers, where Forman was also named Minister of Foreign Affairs. It was in August, 1967 that SNCC, followed by the Panthers, adopted a stance which can only be described as anti-Semitic, as well as pro-Communist.

Albert E. Kahn. Now living at Glen Ellen, Calif., he received $2,500 in 1964. Kahn has been named as a CP member, has turned out books like Sabotage: the Secret War Against Soviet Russia, and High Treason: The Plot Against the People. In his books the traitors and plotters are the anti-Communists.

Philip Stevenson. Received $1,200 in 1963. Was identified as a CP member (Party name: Philip Sterling) in Queens, N.Y., later moved to California. An unfriendly witness before HUAC in 1951, he also used name Lars Lawrence, spoke at People's World celebrations. Deceased 1965.

Esther Jackson. A grant of $2,000 in 1963. Wife of James E. Jackson, former editor of the Worker and now one of CP's National Committee.

Robert K. Machover. Received $2,000 in 1966. One of the new breed of young radicals. Machover made illegal trip to Cuba in 1964. Last year moved to San Francisco area, where he exercises authority in leftist film company, San Francisco Newsreel.

Todd and Nancy Gitlin. Down for $4,000 in 1966. Todd is former president of SDS, has written for Monthly Review and the Guardian, played major role in organizing SDS Radical Education Project, [illegible] recently in San Francisco with the Newsreel film company, and was active in strike agitation at San Francisco State. Nancy Gitlin was in delegation of U. S. leftist women who met with Viet Cong women in Indonesia in 1965.

Christopher Koch. Received $2,100 in 1965. Koch is best known for his illegal trip to Hanoi, which cost him his job with Pacifica Foundation's New York station (WBAI). Once was president of Radio Tougaloo Association, spoke at meeting sponsored by National Council of American-Soviet Friendship.

Michael B. Folsom. Received $2,500 in 1964. Folsom, one of the original members of W.E.B. DuBois Clubs, has spent last four years putting together biography of Mike Gold, prominent Communist and long-time columnist for Daily Worker and People's World.

Paul M. Sweezy. Co-publisher, with late Leo Huberman, of the Marxist Monthly Review, whose authors are so favored by the Rabinowitz Foundation. Sweezy is a long time Marxist, his magazine especially enamored of the life-style of Castro, Jagan and Mao. Received $[illegible]5.56 in 1964, a curious amount. The Foundation records show Stanford University refunded $685.56 that very same year, suggesting it covered Sweezy's expenses when Sweezy appeared on the Stanford campus April 3, 1964 to deliver remarks at the funeral service of the late Marxist professor Paul A. Baran.

Len de Caux. There's a name out of the past for you. Now living in Glendale, Calif., he was an enfant terrible of the leftist labor movement in the 1930's. An Oxford graduate, De Caux has lived in the U.S. since 1927, was one of CIO's chief radicals, edited the March of Labor (cited as a Communist publication), was identified as a CP member in 1953; invoked the 5th Amendment before HUAC. Received $3,250 in 1964.

Richard Krooth. Recipient of $2,500 in 1966. Krooth was in Madison, Wis., where he supervised economic research for the National Coordinating Committee to End the War in Vietnam. A former member of the Georgia bar association, by 1967 he was described in Minority of One (for which he wrote an article, "Capital Export and Leading Monopoly") as a "free-lance writer specializing in the economics of imperialism." Has also written for National Guardian.

J. M. Budish. Recipient of $3,000 in 1964. A well-known open member of the CP, whose critical articles are published in Political Affairs, the CP's theoretical journal.

Rose Russell. She received a lavish $5,500 grant in 1964. A long-time CP member, Mrs. Russell was one of the leaders of New York State's old Teachers Union, long noted for its Communist penetration. Now deceased.

William Marx Mandel. Received $2,000 in 1966. Has appeared before three Congressional committees, invoking the 5th Amendment when questioned about CP membership. A "star" of film Operation Abolition. Author of several books on USSR, generally painting rosy picture. His few criticisms of Moscow have cooled off his previous warm relations, but he can still get an article published in Political Affairs.

Robert Kaufman. Listed by the Foundation as Robert B. Kaufman of Berkeley, this is undoubtedly Robert Paul Kaufman, a chief organizer of W.E.B. DuBois Clubs on Berkeley campus, one of Bettina Aptheker's closest allies, and now a staff reporter for People's World, CP newspaper. Received $3,600 in 1966.

William J. Pomeroy. Received $3,000 in 1963 and $2,000 in 1964; Pomeroy was an American who joined up with the Communist-led Huks in the Philippines, was later captured, imprisoned and deported. Now lives in England and contributes to the Guardian. Editor of Guerrilla Warfare & Marxism, published by International Publishers.

Alexander Werth. Received $3,000 in 1963 to help him complete his book, Russia At War (E. P. Dutton & Co., 1964). Werth thanks the Foundation in the introduction. Russian-born Werth spent 1941-48 in the USSR as correspondent for the London Sunday Times; later was European correspondent of the left-wing U.S. magazine, Nation. Werth's writings generally were favorable to Stalin until he was attacked by Khrushchev, then favorable to Khrushchev until K was deposed.

Joyce Lewis Kornbluh. Received $1,000 in 1963. In her Rebel Voices: An IWW Anthology (Univ. of Michigan Press, 1964) she thanks the Foundation for "financial help at a critical time" which enabled her to complete her monumental work on the Industrial Workers of the World (the Wobblies; an almost-defunct early radical group which is on the Attorney General's list).

Bertrand Russell. The nonagenarian British pacifist, later to spawn an "International War Crimes Tribunal" to blame the U.S. for crimes in Vietnam, received $1,000 in 1963.

Ronald Radosh. Received $1,000 in 1966. In early 1960's, while a history graduate student at the University of Wisconsin, Radosh was an associate of Studies on the Left. More recently at Kingsborough College in N.Y.

John Gerassi. Former Newsweek correspondent turned radical. Made an illegal trip to North Vietnam in late 1966, the same year the Rabinowitz Foundation gave him $5,000. Made an illegal trip to Cuba in 1967. Author of The Great Fear, the Reconquest of Latin America by Latin Americans (MacMillan, 1963) and North Vietnam, a documentary (Bobbs-Merrill, 1968). When asked, in 1967, by National Guardian what white radicals should do in response to ghetto rebellion, answered, "Support them, and I mean militantly." Fired from San Francisco State College for leading students in breaking into administration building.

This is a rundown of the 1967 grants — the last year records are available:

James Aronson, N.Y., $3,000: Was editor of National Guardian (now Guardian) until staff revolted and took control; paper was cited by HUAC as "virtual official propaganda arm of Soviet Russia," but in recent years, with "polycentric" Communism, has shown fascination with Cuba and Red China. Like many other recipients, Aronson is luminary of (National) Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, cited by HUAC as Communist front, and edited "Bill of Rights Journal" of December, 1965, which curiously featured articles and advertisements by or about many other Louis M. Rabinowitz Foundation recipients.

Richard J. Barnet, Washington, D. C., $1,500: With left-wing think tank, Institute for Policy Studies, in Washington. Has written book (with Marcus Raskin) on Cold War alternatives in Europe, several others on disarmament. Active in get-out-of-Vietnam work, and a sponsor last year of New University Conference in Chicago, which called for "radical university reform."

Donald L. Barnett, Iowa City, Iowa, $2,500: A Marxist professor, refused to provide university with students' grades in effort to help them escape draft; close to SDS. Author of book, Mau Mau From Within, published by Monthly Review Press. Has written for Monthly Review and National Guardian.

Cedric Belfrage, Cuernavaca, México, $3,000: Former editor of National Guardian; named as CP member (Party name George Oakden) and deported to his native England. Now living in México, he contributes occasionally to Guardian.

Norman Birnbaum, N.Y., $1,625: Involved in anti-Vietnam War activity; participant in New University Conference; a prime mover in SDS Radical Education Project. Also received $1,625 from Foundation in 1966.

Bernard Conal, La Jolla, Calif., $3,000: Former official of Progressive Citizens of America, cited as CP front by California legislative committee, Conal was Stakhanovite in Henry Wallace's Progressive Party in 1948. (Conal's son, Robbie, was W.E.B. DuBois Club activist in San Francisco in 1964-5, where he was roommate of Steven Kahn, son of Albert E. Kahn, another Foundation recipient.)

Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam, N.Y., $1,500: A left-wing pressure group established to alter U.S. foreign policy in Southeast Asia; not a tax-exempt organization. "We act to influence public and legislative opinion - from our pulpits, in the courts, at draft boards, in the streets."

Frank Donner, N.Y., $500: A N.Y. attorney; identified as a CP member by witnesses before Congressional committees; invoked 5th Amendment in declining to answer questions. Author of book, The Un-Americans, a thoroughgoing leftist smear of HUAC (Donner thanks Victor Rabinowitz, among others, for being "most helpful in furnishing information and suggesting leads").

Horace B. Davis, Jamaica Plain, Mass., $1,900: Has been identified in testimony as a CP member. In his 1967 book, Nationalism and Socialism: Marxist and Labor Theories of Nationalism to 1917 (Monthly Review Press, naturally) Davis thanks the L. M. Rabinowitz Foundation for making it possible for him to visit Holland in 1965 to do basic research. The Foundation tax statements do not record any grant to Davis until 1967. Davis has taught economics at major universities and at two schools cited by Congress as Communist enterprises.

Harvey Goldberg, Madison, Wis., $5,000: Professor Goldberg earned his radical reputation at Ohio State, has been a member of the National Council of the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee (like many other Foundation favorites), has been involved in various anti-Vietnam War groups. His American Radicals, Some Problems and Personalities was published by Monthly Review Press in 1957.

Marvin Gettleman, N.Y., $1,800: Active in Vietnam protests; was contributor to Studies on the Left in 1962, Science and Society in 1965. Persons attending the First Socialist Scholars Conference in 1965 were instructed to make their checks payable to Marvin Gettleman.

Hashomer Hatzair, Inc., N.Y., $500: A very minor, but also the most leftist, of the Zionist groups. Once received $5,000 grant, but in recent years only $500 annually.

Len Holt, Washington, D. C., $2,000: Negro attorney and author of book on 1964 Mississippi voter registration drive launched with support of National Lawyers Guild, cited by HUAC as a Communist front. Board member of Southern Conference Educational Fund (also cited as CP front by HUAC); has written book reviews for Guardian, and was sponsor of 1966 Herbert Aptheker testimonial dinner.

Donald Jelinek, Selma, Ala., $5,000: Attorney now in San Francisco area with Office of Economic Opportunity, a protege of SF attorney Aubrey Grossman, who leads legal panel assisting draft resisters (Grossman has been a paid functionary of CP).

Clinton Jencks, Denver, Colo., $5,750: Was official of Communist-dominated Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers Union, and was convicted of falsely denying CP membership in Taft-Hartley affidavit; Supreme Court overturned conviction (the Jencks Decision) on grounds his attorneys could not see FBI reports. Now teaching economics at San Diego, Calif., university.

Gaylord Leroy, Philadelphia, Pa., $2,000: Of Temple University, Philadelphia; one of main speakers at Second Socialist Scholars Conference.

Walter Lowenfels, New Jersey, $1,500: Has been open CP member; convicted of Smith Act violation in Philadelphia. Regular literary contributor to CP newspaper, Daily World, and its predecessors. Book of poetry published by International Publishers, with acknowledgement of Rabinowitz Foundation help.

Julian Mayfield, N.Y., $3,000: Was Fair Play for Cuba Committee activist; sponsored the Monroe Defense Committee to help Robert F. Williams, a fugitive now living in Red China.

Jack Minnis, New Orleans, La., $1,500: A young white radical who was SNCC research director after most whites were persona non grata.

New York Shakespeare Festival, $200: Foundation regularly supports this arts festival, which is directed by Joseph Papp who has been identified as a CP member (also 5th Amendment before HUAC). In 1964 the festival received $2,500, has received only $200 annually in subsequent years.

Norman Rudich, Middletown, Conn., $2,520: Wesleyan professor, associated with Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, was sponsor of Herbert Aptheker testimonial dinner; active in anti-Vietnam War activity; speaker at Second Socialist Scholars Conference. Also received $2,200 in 1966.

Morris Schappes, N.Y., $1,000: Editor of CP-line magazine, Jewish Currents, identified as CP member by several witnesses, invoked 5th Amendment privilege.

Jack O'Dell, N.Y., $1,250: Jack O'Dell is J. H. O'Dell is Hunter Pitts O'Dell, former CP organizer in South. When New Orleans police raided his home they found it crammed with CP literature. Was closely associated with late Dr. Martin Luther King, who ritually fired him when questions were raised, would then re-hire him. Now lives NYC, writes for CP-line magazine, Freedomways. O'Dell also received $1,250 in 1966.

Daniel B. Schirmer, Cambridge, Mass., $2,000: Daniel Boone Schirmer, a descendant of the famous frontiersman, was a leading figure of the Communist Party in New England.

Mario Savio, Berkeley, Calif., $1,500. Born Robert Savio, alias Jose Marti. Leader of the Free Speech Movement at UC, Berkeley in 1964. Anyone who hasn't heard of Mario Savio is less than five years old.

Southern Students Organizing Committee, Kenbridge, Va., $1,000: Organized to radicalize students in South, SSOC operates in close liaison with Southern Conference Educational Fund, the cited Communist front run by Anne and Carl Braden, both identified as CP members. SSOC tried to be recognized as the SDS in the South, but was attacked by SDS hard-liners as not being revolutionary enough.

Thorne Sherwood, Jr., Hartford, Conn., $1,000: Candidate for PhD at Stanford; grant was for book on priest killed in 1966 when Colombian military ambushed a guerrilla band.

Michael Tanzer, N.Y., $7,200: An economic consultant (PhD, Harvard), who has written for the left-wing Nation, attended the Socialist Scholars Conferences. Received $1,800 in 1966 (for total of $9,000) to finish book, The Political Economy of International Oil and the Underdeveloped Countries (Beacon).

George Wiley, Washington, D. C., $1,000: Is the national executive of the National Welfare Rights Organization, which agitates for larger grants, fewer restrictions on welfare recipients, and similar raids on the Treasury.

Other grants went to the Brooklyn Heights Youth Center, Brooklyn; Lillian Boehm Foundation, N. Y.; Judith Coburn, Washington, D. C.; Columbia Survey of Human Rights Law, N. Y.; Foreign Policy Roundtable, Inc., St. Louis, Mo.; Jill Hamburg, Hoboken, N. J.; Ivan Kovacs, Bronx, N. Y.; Jon Katz, N. Y.; Debbie Louis, Venice, Calif.; Law Students Civil Rights Research Council, N. Y.; Floyd McKissick, N. Y.; Samuel Rohdie, Oxford, England; Leon G. Summit, N. Y.; Socialist Scholars Conference, N.Y.; United Jewish Appeal; Regents of UCLA, Los Angeles, Calif.; University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.

Mr. BLACKBURN. One of the things I would like to call to the attention of the members of the committee is the fact that in looking over the list of the recipients of National Student Associations funds, we found listed numbers of organizations which have no identities. No one can find—the Library of Congress has done extensive research and they can't find—who these organizations are that have been receiving $25,000, $30,000, $40,000 a year from the National Student Association. And you understand for the last 2 years they haven't even bothered to file a tax return which is a matter that I think should direct itself not only to this committee, but to the Internal Revenue Service.

Now, the reason I make such a point of this is the fact that the whole reporting procedure for tax exempt organizations is, not to say, deficient but wholly inadequate. They can list the name of an organization, and we don't know who the principals are. Some of them may well be principals in the donor organization. The purpose for which the money has been granted doesn't appear on the tax return of the organization. So we know from looking at the returns that money is given to a group that may bear any name, XYZ Charities, whatever you want to call it. But we don't know what the purpose of the grant is and we don't know who actually handles the money or what it actually goes for. So if there is one grave area in which the Congress must give further attention it is in the area of requiring more complete reporting from recipient as well as donor organizations to show who handles the money by name, and the purpose for which the money was granted. Then if it is found, as a matter of fact, that the recipient organization and the managing individual have used the money for other purposes, in my opinion, there should be criminal sanctions.

Some feel perhaps that loss of tax privileges or perhaps civil penalties would be enough against the organization. But I frankly feel that some criminal sanctions would be required because if a person takes money and abuses it, he should be held accountable under the criminal laws.

Senator FANNIN. Congressman, so far as money I am certainly in agreement with you. But also isn't it true that many of these organizations use vast manpower, staffs that work on these programs and they are just as much in violation as if they contributed money.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, I can give you a current example. In Atlanta, Ga., we just had an election for mayor and for school board. The National Education Association, which again is a tax exempt organization employing special tax privileges, organized for the purpose of promoting education among the teaching profession and promoting the teaching profession which are worthy objectives. I have attached a copy of the return of that organization, and it doesn't bother to even list the funds that it has received or spent or who they went to or anything else. It is practically a blank piece of paper. But in a news story appearing in The Atlanta Constitution within the past week, a report filed or issued by the National Education Association was highly critical of some of the individuals who are incumbents on the Atlanta school board. Well, obviously, this report is going to have political repercussions in the sense that here is a report which supposedly has been issued by a nonpartisan, nonpolitically oriented organization which is highly critical of some individuals who are running for office.

Without question the staff people who were working for the National Education Association were being paid with tax exempt dollars; they were being paid for supposedly educational purposes. But a staff member admitted, as quoted in the paper, that the report was issued with political implications. In other words, they were telling the people of Atlanta, "don't re-elect certain members of the school board because they are not doing the proper thing in our opinion."

In my opinion this is clearly political activity, and one of the—and I recall the testimony of the gentleman preceding me from Illinois in which he stated in his opinion the use of tax exempt dollars for political purposes is very small by these organizations, I would have to differ with him very greatly. In fact, I would have to differ with him on two scores. First of all, nobody really knows to what extent staff personnel are used for political purposes and, secondly, the biggest functioning political organizations in this country are the labor unions, and if I recall from—and they make no bones about this, they don't attempt to cover this up. It is just that the Internal Revenue Service completely ignores their political activity.

Senator FANNIN. And the Congress.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And the Congress has been ignoring it. But I don't think the Congress should be ignoring it.

Senator FANNIN. I agree with you, and I have introduced a bill in that regard.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Senator, I have read your bill, and if you will forgive me for being presumptuous, I don't think your bill goes far enough.

Senator FANNIN. You stated that in the first part of your testimony and I will agree with you.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would like at this point to read into the record the provisions which I would suggest relative to prohibitions against partisan political activity by a tax exempt organization. And here again I want to be sure that everyone understands that when I use the term "tax exempt organizations" I mean all tax exempt organizations, whether they be foundations, religious organizations, or labor unions. I would prohibit the promotion of political candidates. I would define, any organization described in section 501(c), which, (1) endorses—you understand that labor unions have no reluctance to endorse political candidates, in fact they have no reluctance to endorse candidates for the Supreme Court or oppose them—or opposes, directly or indirectly, political candidates or (2) expends directly or indirectly—and this would attack use of staff personnel—any of its funds to promote the candidacy of any political candidate or (3) provide goods, services or anything of value to any political party or political organization, shall not be exempt from tax under section 501 for the taxable year in which it so endorses or so expends funds and for the 3 suceeding taxable years; provided further, that activities prohibited by this section shall not be exempted from these prohibitions by being termed "education." Of course, that is the guise under which many political activities are carried out.

Senator FANNIN. This would also include registration, where, of course, we realize they just go into districts they desire and it is not a blanket registration, it is a specialized registration. That would also be included under your recommendation?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would strongly recommend that the language be clear that that would be prevented because we do know that the registration drives are channeled in certain areas of the cities.

Senator FANNIN. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Senator GORE. Could I ask one question?

Congressman, could I ask you to exercise your imagination a bit?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do it rarely.

[Laughter.]

Senator GORE. Well, change parties and you will be encouraged to do so more.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We are finding out it requires it when we are in control.

Senator GORE. I really want to ask you a serious question. Could you imagine the possibility that a family who was associated with and in indirect ways had control of, distribution of, a fund from a multimillion dollar foundation might very well succeed in identifying themselves with good and worthy causes in one important State after another, one rich State after another, might very well succeed to public favor in almost direct proportion to the distribution of the funds from a multimillion dollar foundation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Senator, I can well recognize that possibility. I suspect the possibility might exist.

Senator GORE. It is possible for a common man, whether a Republican or Democrat, to recognize this, isn't it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It certainly is and no matter what the partisan flavor of the individual or family concerned, I don't think it is a proper use of tax exempt dollars. In fact, Representative Rooney—I don't know if he has appeared before your committee or not, but he appeared before the Ways and Means Committee—pointed out how Mr. Richmond, whose family controlled the Richmond Foundation, ran against him in the Democratic primary and it turns out that the staff of the Richmond Foundation was also the campaign staff of Mr. Richmond. The Foundation would make it a point to go into certain areas of the city and perhaps purchase a building and donate it to the residents of the area for charitable purposes, and of course, Mr. Richmond, the political candidate, would be very prominent there in handing over the keys to the building, and otherwise participating in the ceremonies. I think that no matter whether you are a Democrat or Republican, you will concede Mr. Rooney was facing unfair competition in the funds that the foundation controlled.

Senator GORE. It might even be possible for scions of such a family to move to sparsely settled states and become political figures.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have heard it speculated.

Senator BENNETT. Sparsely settled like New York. [Laughter.]

Senator GORE. Or Arkansas or West Virginia.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is entirely possible, Senator.

Senator TALMADGE. Congressman, will you file for the record as part of your testimony the specific instances of any further specific charges of political activity on the part of these exempt organizations?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will, and I want to thank you, Senator. Your questions were well put, Senator Gore.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman, while you are here I might mention a story which I have heard concerning foundation abuses. Here were two men who set up foundations and part of their charitable purpose was to give young people a chance to get a college education. Let's say one is Mr. Black and the other is Mr. White. Mr. Black sends Mr. White's son to college and Mr. White sends Mr. Black's son to college. Neither one pays a penny out of his own pocket.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, how dare you criticize such a charitable purpose. [Laughter.]

Senator GORE. Educating your neighbor's son.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think this goes——

The CHAIRMAN. On a reciprocal basis.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think this goes to the point that I was making earlier, gentlemen, and that is that the reporting procedures for these tax exempt organizations are wholly deficient. We have got to have them report the names of the recipients, not only organizations but the individuals who receive funds. If this were done, this sort of thing would turn up very quickly in a study.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you so much.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Thank you.

(Hon. Ben Blackburn's prepared statement and attachments follow:)

STATEMENT OF HON. BEN BLACKBURN, A U.S. REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF GEORGIA

Mr. Chairman: I appreciate your affording me the opportunity to appear before your Committee. We are all aware of the need for tax reform and the elimination of the abuses now occurring under the present Internal Revenue Code.

I would like to discuss the tax abuses of organizations enjoying special tax-exempt status under existing provision of law. Many of these organizations engage in political activities which by reason of tax privileges are being subsidized by the Federal Treasury. My purpose in being here today is to call the Congress' attention to some examples of political activities which I personally, and many others, consider to be improper activities by groups enjoying special tax privileges and to suggest possible ways of preventing future abuses.

Tax-exempt organizations are classified under Section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Under this section, 17 types of organizations are excluded from taxation. I would like to discuss those found under Section 501(c)(3) and Section 501(c)(5).

The organizations operating under the provisions of Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code exist for purposes of charity, scientific research, religious functions, public safety, promotion of literary or educational endeavors or the prevention of cruelty to children or animals. The Internal Revenue Code further provides that no substantial part of the activity of any such organization (generally referred to as a "foundation") is to carry on propaganda or otherwise attempt to influence legislation. The Internal Revenue Code further prohibits participation in political campaigns.

In my opinion some organizations have flagrantly violated this section of the Code. The violations have been tolerated due to ambiguity in construing the phrase, "substantial part." It has been commonly held by I.R.S. and other authorities in this field that 10% or more of the funds of any organization would be considered a "substantial part." 10% of the Ford Foundation's assets as of 1968 would be approximately $3,060,436, whereas 10% of some small church group could amount to less than $500.

Tax-exemption is a privilege! There are many different spokesmen for groups presenting their views on legislation before both Houses of Congress. Most of these spokesmen do not enjoy tax-exempt status. The government should not subsidize one group's political activities by allowing any tax-exempt organization to engage in lobbying activity.

As an example of this misuse of privilege, I would like to direct the attention of the Committee to a group which was recently formed to actively lobby against the ABM proposal. The Coalition on National Priorities and Military Policy. This organization is supported primarily by contributions from religious organizations. Its headquarters is in space granted to it in the Methodist Building at 100 Maryland Avenue, N.E. This group has lobbied against the proposed ABM system. A few days ago a representative from this group came to my office and presented my staff with further information concerning its opposition to the 1968 Military Authorization Bill. Attached as Exhibit A is a copy of the material which I received, along with a list of the organizations. The business of the nation's defense can in no logical way be related to religious undertakings.

I would also like to invite to your attention the National Students Association (NSA). I have closely reviewed the tax returns of this group. The group is clearly and heavily engaging in political activity. In fact, political activity has become such a large part of the group's activity that a subsidiary organization, the National Students Institute has been formed to conduct the non-political activities the NSA was previously performing. It appears that the National Students Institute, which is now a tax-exempt organization, will serve the function of raising funds through soliciting tax-deductible contributions and then contributing these funds to the National Students Association. The national convention of the National Students Association has advocated the abolishment of the House Un-American Activities Committee (now the House Committee on Internal Security), the repeal of the McCarren Act, passage of Civil Rights legislation, the admission of Red China to the United Nations and various "Vietnam Summer Activities." Attached as Exhibit B is documentation of these activities. Furthermore, I was distressed to learn that the new National Students Institute, as incorporated under laws of the District of Columbia, has a Board of Directors identical to that of the now tax-paying NSA. Its bylaws are very similar and it utilizes the same facilities as the NSA. The NSA has not filed tax returns for the past two years, and no explanation is forthcoming from the IRS.

The 1965 and 1966 returns of this organization list its specific grants and their purposes. Present reporting laws are wholly inadequate for any person to know whether or not the National Students Association is engaged in legal activities under its tax-exempt classification. The NSA granted in 1966 to the Southern Student Union Relations $36,317.18, the Fast for Freedom Fund $20,365.39, the Student Stress $890.52, and Southern Literacy Project $363.75. These are just a few of the specific grants listed by this organization which dispensed a total of $551,397 in 1966. The Library of Congress has advised me that it is impossible to discover the purposes or functions of the recipient organizations. A close examination of the tax returns does not provide sufficient information. For the Committee's information, attached as Exhibit C are copies of the NSA's tax return for 1965 and 1966.

Briefly, one more group I would like to bring to your attention is the National Education Association (NEA). This group, which is organized for the promotion of education has endorsed numerous political positions including Home Rule for the District of Columbia and fair housing legislation. I do not feel that this activity is related to the promotion of education.

I know that the members of this Committee have followed the revelations of various activities of tax-exempt foundations. In the hearings on Tax Reform before the House Ways and Means Committee, Representative John Rooney of New York presented a clear picture of the misuse of tax-exempt funds. In Representative Rooney's race in the Democratic primary, he was opposed by one Frederick Richmond. Mr. Richmond is head of the Richmond Foundation. During the election, Mr. Richmond's foundation gave numerous grants to different ethnic groups within the Congressional District. The campaign staff of Mr. Richmond was also the staff of the Foundation. In Mr. Rooney's statement he revealed that some of the expenses of the campaign were paid out of the Foundation funds under the title of such things as printing expenses and stationary accounts. Finally, Mr. Richmond encouraged his contributors to give directly to the Foundation, thus making their contributions deductible on their income tax returns. I would advise members of the Committee to read Mr. Rooney's testimony since it gives one of the best examples of political activities by tax-exempt groups.

In July of 1967, the Ford Foundation made a grant of $175,000 to the CORE Special Purpose Fund of New York to be used for: (1) a youth training institute; (2) an adult training institute; and (3) a voter regisration drive. This grant was supplemented in 1968 with another $300,000. These funds were actually used in voter registration drives in Cleveland, Ohio. Many political analysts believe that because of the registration activity by CORE through the financing of the Ford Foundation, Carl B. Stokes was elected Mayor of Cleveland, Ohio in 1967. By such activity the Ford Foundation through its economic power, augmented by special tax privileges, is having a decisive political power which is resulting in the election of political candidates. No more effective political influence can be found!

I have stated many times that in the political arena all combatants should operate under the same set of rules. I know that every member of the Committee would object strongly to having a tax-exempt group pour funds into his opponent's campaign. Under the Tax Reform Act recently passed by the House, foundations are precluded from engaging in voter registration drives except when the foundation supports voter registration drives in five states. Thus, the Ford Foundation, for example, can avoid the effect of the legislation by supporting five different voter registration drives in five different states.

No discussion of political activities by tax-exempt groups would be complete without some attention to labor organizations as classified under Section 501 (c)(5). From mutual experience in politics, I think we would all agree that money is the mother's milk of a political campaign. To the degree that one candidate receives direct or indirect financial or material support for his campaign from a source that enjoys financial subsidy through a special tax privilege, to that degree the equality of rules between two political candidates is greatly upset. Labor unions do not deny the use of union dues for political activities. When a member of a union pays his dues, he is paying for political action. The organization insists that their political activities are carried on by a separate organization known as the Committee on Political Education (COPE). However, as it was reported during the last election, the full staff of the national office of the AFL-CIO was brought to work for COPE and on the local level union officials were employing their union staff to engage in campaigning for favored candidates. Numerous cases have come before the Federal Judiciary in which union members have objected to political use of dues for political activity. For the information of the Committee the cases are as follows: United States v. Anchorage Federal Labor Council 193 F. Supp. 504 (1961); United States v. Planters Local #481 et al 172 F. sd 854 (1949); United States v. International Union United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America 352 U.S. 567 (1957); and United States v. CIO 335 U.S. 106 (1947).

There is a contention that political funds are contributed voluntarily. To work on an American flag ship, a seaman must be a member of the International Seafarers Union. Members of this union have been compelled at times to "contribute" (or as the union leaders would say, have voluntarily given) ⅛ of their income to political activities. I think it is insulting the intelligence of Congress to argue that these funds are granted voluntarily. Not even politicians devote ⅛ of their income to political campaigns.

The Internal Revenue Code provides that all 17 types of organizations classified under Section 501(c) cannot engage in support or opposition to any political candidate. However, for some strange reason, the IRS has consistently ignored the mandate of the law. Attached as Exhibit E are copies of letters sent by the Internal Revenue Service to one Mr. Reed E. Larson and one Mr. F. R. Dickerson attempting to explain why only labor unions are exempt.

The Federal Corrupt Practices Act provides that neither corporations, or trade organizations, or labor unions are allowed to contribute funds to the support or opposition of any political candidate or party. It seems that the IRS is not aware of the Corrupt Practices Act which is enforced by the Justice Department. In Baltimore, a Grand Jury hearing is now being conducted concerning campaign contributions by the Seafarers International Union to various candidates for Senatorial seats. I think it would be appropriate for the Congress to demand that the IRS investigate the tax-exempt status of the Seafarers Union.

During the course of my testimony today, I have cited several problems which exist under the present IRS Code. When the members of the Committee examine the tax returns of tax-exempt organizations, you will see that it is virtually impossible to determine how these funds are being used. I propose that the Committee require a full explanation of the purpose of each grant, contribution or gift made by a tax-exempt organization along with the identities of the chief officers and executive directors of recipient organizations. The law should provide criminal sanctions should such officers or executive directors use funds for purposes other than those permitted by law. Only by requiring full disclosure from tax-exempt organizations can we possibly curb the misuse of funds.

Earlier this year, when I appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee on this matter, I outlined for them the legislation which I was introducing. My ideas are contained in H.R. 7432. Essentially this bill is divided into two sections. The first section pertains to organizations classified under Section 501(c)(3). I will not take credit for the ideas found in this section since they were originally proposed by the Subcommittee on Tax-Exempt Organizations of the American Bar Association. The Subcommittee recommended that all organizations classified under this section shall have the right to defend themselves whenever their tax-exempt status is threatened. Furthermore, they should be permitted to appear before Congressional Committees and submit reports to them concerning matters of direct interest to the organization. By direct interest I specifically mean the purpose for which the organization was granted exemption.

The second purpose of my bill is to prevent any tax-exempt organization from directly or indirectly contributing any material support for the promotion or opposition to any candidate or any political party. I would sincerely urge the Committee to give consideration to my proposal. My bill, H.R. 7432 is attached as Exhibit F. I would request that the Committee review the House language with regard to voter registration drives conducted by tax-exempt foundations. In my opinion the present language is inadequate.

Finally, if meaningful control over the use of special tax-exempt funds is to be achieved, more complete reporting laws are essential. Criminal sanctions are a necessary adjunct to such control where abuse of funds for non-permissible purposes is discovered.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that you and the members of your Committee are anxious to provide the American people with needed tax reform. I appreciate your affording me the time to make this brief contribution.

The Coalition is a coordinating body for national religious, peace, liberal and scientific organizations which seek to reverse the militarizaton of Amerca's policies and resources. It serves the representatives of its affiliated organizations as a channel for communication and cooperative action to oppose deployment of new weapons systems, to support arms control and disarmament agreements and to redirect resources into programs to meet human needs at home and abroad.

The Coalition does not present policy positions for its affiliated organizations unless specifically agreed upon, since its function is not the making of policy but the coordination of action.

The Coalition is financed by contributions.

COALITION ON NATIONAL PRIORITIES AND MILITARY POLICY,
Washington, D.C., September 24, 1969.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We understand that the Department of Defense Authorization bill will be reported by the House Armed Services Committee on Thursday and may come to the floor next week.

We appeal to you to participate in that most vital debate. If you are not already convinced of the need for major cuts, we urge you to give serious consideration to the broad cross section of amendments that will be offered. We ask this because we are deeply uneasy over the fact that last year a comparable bill passed the House in one day with only two hours allocated to general debate.

Surely the House would lay itself open to the charge of irresponsibility if a similar timetable were adhered to now when so many questions are being raised about U.S. priorities and the size and direction of the U.S. military establishment—so many questions, in fact, that the Senate spent two months discussing the bill. Couldn't the 435 Members of the House spend at least two weeks discussing these basic issues which affect so many aspects of their constituents' lives?

The American people are discouraged over the conflicts racking our society. Many are turning away from the legislative process. They need reassurance that their representatives in Congress are willing to come to grips with major problems—including the problems of the ever expanding arms race and the U.S. propensity toward unilateral military involvements. Some of our membership look forward to coming to the gallery and hearing you deliberate over the Department of Defense Authorization bill. Please do not disappoint them.

Most sincerely,

JOSEPH S. CLARK, Chairman.

TWO GIANT RALLIES PLANNED

Two rallies—one in New York City, the other in Los Angeles—have been planned for June 25.

The rallies will focus on the ABM and American militarism.

In New York, George Wald, Nobel Prize winner, and Jerome Wiesner, the science advisor to President Kennedy, will speak at Madison Square Garden. Members of Congress and several top entertainers will also be on hand.

Plans for the Los Angeles event are still underway, and details will be announced later.

The New York City rally will begin at 7:30 p.m. Tickets—priced from $1 to $10—are available at the boxoffice or from Hannah Weinstein, 101 W. 57th Street, New York, New York.

AN ERROR OF OMISSION

Because of an oversight, the names of three organizations affiliated with the Coalition on National Priorities and Military Policy were omitted from the listing in the first edition of this newsletter last week.

They are: The Federation of American Scientists, the Mennonite Central Committee and the Department of International Affairs of the National Council of Churches.

They're not listed this week either because the cover sheets were printed in advance in sufficient quantity for three weeks. But the omitted groups will be in week after next. In the meantime, our apologies.

GOP SENATOR SUSPECTS ABM PRESSURE

Although he's not charging cause and effect, Republican Senator James B. Pearson of Kansas told the New York Times last week that after he broke with the Administration on the ABM issue, the following things happened:

*An Army general told a plane manufacturer in Kansas that if the ABM were defeated, the Pentagon might not be able to go through with an airplane contract.

*The Agriculture Department decided that it would not publicly endorse a rural job development bill sponsored by Pearson, despite the Department's private expressions of support for the bill.

*The White House decided in Pearson's favor in a dispute involving the moving of some federal offices—but failed to give the Senator advance notice of the decision.

Pearson is one of some 15 Republican Senators who are opposed to the ABM.

ABM HARD SELL TO LABOR FLOPS

A Nixon Administration hard sell has failed to convince the 29-member AFL-CIO Executive Council to support the ABM.

The Washington Post reported that AFL-CIO President George Meany was "skeptical, to put it mildly" to please by Defense Secretary Melvin R. Laird and Secretary of State William P. Rogers to back the ABM.

Rogers and Laird met with the Council in early May.

ABM INFORMATION CENTER, UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, DIVISION OF WORLD PEACE, Washington, D.C., July 14, 1969.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLACKBURN: Enclosed for your use are several items pertaining to the Safeguard Anti-Ballistic Missile System which we hope will be helpful to you in the ABM debate.

1. Bibliography of selected information pertaining to the ABM which has appeared in the Congressional Record over the past several months.

2. Series of remarks by various Senators, prominent scientists, union and church leaders explaining why they oppose deployment.

3. Rebuttal to the Administration Press Packet on the ABM, prepared by an independent group of citizens including Dr. Jeremy J. Stone, a member of the Institute for Strategic Studies and currently working under a grant for the Social Science Research Council of New York.

If we can be of any assistance to you, please let us know.

Sincerely,

ON-THE-SPOT CONVENTION REPORT: IS NSA HEADING TOWARD OBLIVION?

(By Harvey H. Hukari, Jr.)

During the same torrid month that the Republicans and the Democrats held their party conventions in the glare of national publicity, another convention, noteworthy in its own right, took place in the rather remote environs of Manhattan, Kans. There on the tree-lined campus of Kansas State University, the National Student Association (NSA), a loose amalgamation of some 360 colleges and universities, brought nearly 1,000 student delegates together for 10 days to plan programs, share ideas, and express their dissatisfaction with the state of the nation.

Over the past few years NSA conventions have been marked by vast quantities of leftist rhetoric and little meaningful action towards dealing with student problems. Customarily, this year's gathering was treated to an array of attacks by speakers on the evils of racism, the Selective Service System and the Establishment as well as the penultimate spectacle of an anti-war dissident burning his draft card. But after all the heated resolutions were proposed and the impassioned pleas were made by a galaxy of left-wing spokesmen, the summary tone of the convention differed only slightly from NSA's established tradition of oral radicalism and physical lethargy.

Founded in the summer of 1947 at the University of Wisconsin, NSA has sought for 21 years—with an embarrassing lack of success—to act as the legitimate representative for the needs and opinions of the American student. It has been handicapped in that role by the fact that its member schools account for only 15 percent of the more than 2,000 universities and colleges across the country. In fact, it is not individual students who are members of NSA but student body governments, which are all too frequently about as representative of student views as Walter Ulbricht is representative of the hopes and aspirations of the East German people.

The dramatic revelation by Ramparts magazine in February 1967 that NSA was being financed by the Central Intelligence Agency severely damaged the image of the organization and shocked even its most staunch supporters. Whereas condemnation of NSA had formerly been the exclusive prerogative of such conservative groups as Young Americans for Freedom, the disclosure of financial ties with the CIA brought almost universal outcry from the academic community.

CIA SCANDAL EFFECTS

A number of schools, including the University of Southern California, the University of Michigan, and the University of Houston withdrew their membership in the wake of the furor which erupted. At its 1967 congress, held at the University of Maryland, NSA faced the very real prospect of disintegration due to the dissension among delegates over the CIA scandal. Conservative and liberal students alike were outraged and members of the radical Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) broke away from the Maryland meeting and hosted their own rump convention to protest NSA's ties with the CIA.

By comparison with last year's tumultuous convention, this year's Kansas gathering was a rather pallid affair, enlivened only by the antics of a "guerrilla theatre" and various sophomoric protests against the draft. SDS, along with a number of other radical students groups, was conspicuously absent from the convention and even Young Americans for Freedom, which operates a Stop NSA Committee out of its Texas headquarters, declined to send any representatives. The radicals, nevertheless, made their presence felt at Kansas State, but their ranks were seriously depleted by the lure of demonstrations at the Democratic convention in Chicago.

While student power was the announced theme of the conclave, it became readily apparent that white racism, drugs and the draft were the issues uppermost in the minds of the majority of delegates.

The convention was immediately snarled by the charge that the all-white delegation from the University of Alabama was racist in composition. In rebuttal, the Alabamians argued that it was inevitable that the school was not represented by Negroes since the black students had declined to participate in the selection of NSA delegates during the spring semester. Following a confusing round of parliamentary haggling, the convention responded to pressure from the black caucus and voted to replace one white delegate from Alabama with a Negro.

RADICAL SPEAKERS

The lengthy debate over the status of the Alabama delegation delayed consideration of other important business and created dissatisfaction among those who felt that Alabama was being treated unjustly. Many of the students who had been sent by their schools as observers to the convention for the purpose of deciding whether or not to join NSA were disillusioned by the abuse heaped upon Alabama and vowed to return to their campuses and campaign against affiliation.

Many delegates were also disturbed by the predominantly radical orientation of many of the programs and speeches. One of the featured speakers was Negro militant and self-proclaimed presidential candidate Dick Gregory. Addressing an overflow audience, Gregory labeled Chicago Mayor Richard Daley a "slick, slimy, racist hoodlum" and later received a standing ovation when he declared that people have a duty to destroy and abolish the present government. "We don't need white liberals anymore," said Gregory. "We need white radicals."

Typical of the "balanced" presentation of views which NSA afforded delegates was a panel entitled "Theories, Strategies, and Directions for Change." Participants in the discussion were Rev. Joseph Duffy, the Connecticut chairman of the McCarthy for President committee, Tom Hayden, founder of SDS and presently co-director of the National Coalition to End the War in Vietnam, and Robert Scheer, an editor of Ramparts and a well-known California radical.

The "dialogue" consisted of Rev. Duffy urging young people to stay in the political system and Hayden and Scheer calling for increased militancy on the part of students. Hayden, who was later arrested during the demonstration in Chicago, predicted that there would be more campus disorders like the one at Columbia and was applauded by the delegates. He went on to proclaim that "No presidential candidate will be safe speaking at any university in this country."

SELECTIVE SERVICE HIT

The Selective Service System was the subject of a panel presentation by Michael Ferber, convicted in Boston along with Dr. Benjamin Spock for counseling young men to avoid the draft, and David Harris, husband of folk singer Joan Baez, who is presently appealing a three-year prison sentence for draft evasion.

While Harris startled some with his comment that "I find no more honorable thing to be in modern America than a criminal," the high point of the panel discussion came when Wayne Hayashi, a 20-year-old pre-law student at the University of Hawaii, read a letter he had written to his draft board condemning the Selective Service System and then burned his draft card amid cheers from more than 500 delegates.

As if it were not enough for the speeches and panel presentations at the convention to be mostly radical in their orientation, the entertainment provided the delegates also had a distinctly left-wing flavor to it. Among the films that were shown were Felix Greene's "Inside Viet Nam," which gives a sympathetic view of North Viet Nam under communism, "The War Game," a British picture that attempts to illustrate the horrors of a nuclear missile attack on England, and "Point of Order," which deals with the Army-McCarthy hearings.

In past conventions, NSA has approved resolutions calling for the abolition of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, admission of Red China to the United Nations and repeal of the Internal Security Act of 1950. This year the delegates were somewhat more reserved in their approach towards legislation, but their bias was still apparent to even the most naive observer.

33-865 O—69—pt. 6——51

While condemning the Soviet Union for its invasion of Czechoslovakia the convention could not resist including the fillip, "This denunciation is done in the same spirit that we denounce the act of aggression of the U.S. government against the people of Viet Nam." The convention also called upon local, state, and federal governments to "stop all punitive and criminal approaches to the use of Cannibus [marijuana], a mind-altering, non-additive drug, [and] re-evaluate their laws on hallucinogenic drugs in light of current research. . . ."

Perhaps the most significant measure passed by the delegates was one providing for the restructuring of NSA into a dual corporation. Under such a set-up, NSA would consist of two separate organizations, one which would continue to provide "student services" and remain tax exempt and the other which would pay corporate taxes and engage in political lobbying.

Maintaining a tax-exempt status is of crucial importance since around 40 percent of NSA's $800,000 budget consists of grants from such philanthropic groups as the Ford Foundation, which recently gave the student organization over $350,000, and the Federal Government, which funnels thousands of dollars to NSA through the Office of Economic Opportunity for various social service projects.

With the impact that the campaign of Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy for the Democratic presidential nomination has had on the college campuses across America, much has been made of the phrase "new politics"; i.e., the politics of candor, grass-roots participation in the democratic process and the involvement of youth in the political system. "New politics" connotes a force in opposition to the bossism and machine politics of the Establishment. Ironically, the anti-climactic election of the new president of NSA was almost the complete antithesis of this concept.

Bob Powell, the former student body president at the University of North Carolina and presently a graduate student at Princeton, was clearly the NSA establishment's choice to succeed Ed Schwartz, as president of the organization, and, like Hubert Humphrey in Chicago, Powell steamrollered over his opposition to win the post. The election of the other national officers was also merely a confirmation of the establishment's choices rather than a truly democratic contest.

NSA'S INEFFECTIVENESS

It was sad for some to watch the student delegates acting in much the same way that their older counterparts did in Miami and Chicago, declining to vote independently, participating in frivolous demonstrations for favorite son nominees and reading newspapers or flying paper airplanes when the convention proceedings became dull. A bit of tasteless levity was provided on the final night of the convention's legislative session when the guerrilla theatre, an amateur troupe of students that had played the role of pranksters throughout the 10-day congress, attempted a mock assassination of the newly elected NSA president as he was delivering his acceptance speech before a solemn gathering of delegates.

Given the nature of NSA it is appropriate to ask just what is it that causes even 15 percent of the nation's colleges to maintain their membership in such an organization. For most of the schools in NSA it is the services such as travel discounts, insurance and educational information which are important. The small colleges which comprise the bulk of the NSA membership often acknowledge that they do not agree with the policies of NSA or its radical complexion, but they do find the financial benefits of the various services to be of sufficient value to justify continuing their affiliation.

Some students are not so certain as others of the importance of NSA on college campuses. They attend NSA conventions and they find the organization to be unrepresentative of national student opinion and often irrelevant to student needs.

Reflecting on his experiences at this year's convention, Dean Henry, student body president at the University of Puget Sound, summed up the feeling of many delegates disturbed by the week's events. "A lot of schools will go back and give serious consideration to disaffiliating." Henry said, "I think that a of the schools should consider dropping out of NSA."

National Teacher Corps

FACT

The National Teacher Corps was established on May 13, 1966, with an initial appropriation from Congress of $9.5 million. Since that time 1600 persons (300 experienced teachers and 1300 recent graduates) have been selected from over 10,000 applicants and are presently undergoing the pre-service training.

Upon completion of the pre-service training, these Corpsmen will work in poverty and slum area schools while at the same time the teacher-interns will study for advanced degrees in Education or related fields at nearby universities.

"They will extend teaching beyond the classroom, and look for new ways to involve parents in the mysteries of the learning process. They will work with adults education programs, and with local health and welfare agencies, with youth organizations, social clubs, and civic groups." (NTC Brochure.)

At present, needed appropriations for the National Teacher Corps are bogged down in the Senate Appropriations Committee. Without these appropriations no salary funds are available for the Corpsmen except through already over-taxed school budgets in slum areas. The appropriations are necessary to insure that each Corpsman will be able to obtain a job in a slum area school district.

PRINCIPLE

In our world of rapidly advancing technological changes, it is important for all men to have the opportunity to receive adequate education. USNSA supports efforts to assure the maximum amount of education to all individuals. (BPD–XVIII, Equal Educational Opportunities-Free Public Higher Education.)

DECLARATION

USNSA reaffirms its support for the National Teacher Corps as a valuable supplement to the educational process in slum area school districts because it provides experienced and new teachers with opportunities to assist slum area children in new and relevant ways. Furthermore, USNSA feels that the NTC program will suffer if Congress fails to appropriate funds for salaries, since local school districts in slum areas cannot afford to hire additional teachers.

Therefore, USNSA expresses its belief that the Chairman and the members of the Senate Appropriations Committee should approve the appropriations for the National Teacher Corps and submit them to the floor of the Senate with a recommendation for passage.

MANDATE

The Nineteenth National Student Congress mandates the Educational Affairs Vice President to prepare copies of this special resolution and submit them to all interested parties.

Home Rule for the District of Columbia

FACT

Washington, D.C. was granted a Charter in 1802. For almost 75 years, the citizens practiced local self-government as had been anticipated by the drafters of the Constitution. Now, however, the legislative and fiscal responsibility for the District of Columbia rests with Congress. A limited amount of this authority has been delegated by Congress to a three-man Board of Commissioners who are appointed by the President.

Washington, D.C. has a population greater than that of 11 states (Alaska, Delaware, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, South Dakota, Vermont, and Wyoming). And each of these states has a governor and an elected state legislature to administer local affairs; each is represented in Congress by two Senators and at least one Representative. The District of Columbia, however, enjoys neither representation in Congress nor local self-government.

Among the results of this situation are these:

—A significant number of school buildings in the District are in such a bad state of repair as to be unsafe for use. The Superintendent of schools has stated that more money is spent for a child in white sections than in Negro areas. Half-day sessions and crowded classrooms are commonplace (the school population is 90% Negro; 10% white).

—Housing in Washington is inadequate. According to a report issued by the National Capital Planning Commission in April, 1966, 25% of the District's residents live in a state of "abject poverty, total deprivation." In the same report, 41% of the housing is called "inadequate"; 104,700 people live in "substandard" housing (lacking such common amenities as bathrooms); some 114,000 people are said to pay "too much rent." Other facts brought out in the report are that there are 27,500 families eligible for public housing for which there is no room; 5,800 families are on public housing waiting lists; there is no minimum wage for male employees except government workers; unemployment in the Negro slums is estimated to be as high as 10%; and underemployment (long hours for sub-poverty-line pay) is indeed much higher.

—Welfare benefits are totally insufficient. Thousands of school-age children have been forced to stay home from school during cold weather because of inadequate clothing.

—Medical facilities for the poor are not adequate. Even in serious cases, waits of 8-12 hours are frequent.

—Some city jails are, in fact, barbaric "human stockyards," in which up to 500 people have been crowded into a single room, 150' x 180', sometimes for months, awaiting trial—with no work or recreation.

The Metropolitan Board of Trade has thrown the weight of its powerful lobby against efforts to secure home rule for the District of Columbia and is, by far, the most effective local obstruction to reform. It opposes urban renewal, higher real estate taxes, and increased welfare payments.

In February, 1966, the "Free D.C. Movement" was organized by the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee and the leaders of other civil rights groups. The Movement has demanded that Washingtonians have the right to elect their own local government and has instituted action programs to implement its goal.

At present, the United States Senate District Committee favors self-government for the District; the House District Committee does not favor such a change.

PRINCIPLE

"The role of the student involves a commitment to an educational process that extends beyond classroom training . . . A student operating in this role . . . must be prepared to face the challenges of modern life and he must be willing to confront the crucial issues of public policy that affect him beyond the classroom and that determine the course of his society . . . USNSA recognizes the great value of student involvement in programs of political and social action and the integral connection of these programs with the educational process . . . And in this connection the student should be concerned . . . with those great problems and issues of our national . . . life." (BPD-XIII Student and the Total Community.)

DECLARATION

USNSA affirms its support for the "Free D.C. Movement," and its goal of home rule under the mayor-city council system for the District of Columbia. USNSA commends the leaders of the "Free D.C. Movement" for their efforts in this area. Furthermore, USNSA applauds the efforts of those members of Congress who have been in the vanguard of the home rule movement; particularly, Senators Morse (D-Ore.), Kennedy (D-N.Y.), Tydings (D-Md.), and Representatives Multer (D-N.Y.), and Mathias (R-Md.).

MANDATE

The Nineteenth National Student Congress mandates the Educational Affairs Vice President to give all forms of legitimate assistance to groups seeking to secure home rule for the District of Columbia under the mayor-city council system.

The Nineteenth National Student Congress further mandates the Educational Affairs Vice President to send copies of this resolution to all appropriate parties concerned.

EXHIBIT E

[91st Congress, 1st sess., H.R. 7432]

A BILL To amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to deny tax exemption to organizations which endorse political candidates, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 501 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by redesignating subsection (e) as subsection (f) and inserting after subsection (d) the following new subsection:

"(e) APPEARANCES, ETC., WITH RESPECT TO LEGISLATION.—

"(1) None of the following activities by an organization described in subsection (c)(3) shall be deemed 'carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation':

"(A) Appearances before, submission of statements to, or sending communications to, the committees, or individual Members, of Congress or of any legislative body of a State, a possession of the United States, or a political subdivision of any of the foregoing with respect to legislation or proposed legislation of direct interest to the organization.

"(B) Communication of information between th organization and its members or contributors with respect to legislation or proposed legislation of direct interest to the organization.

"(2) For purposes of this paragraph, matters of direct interest to the organization include—

"(A) those directly affecting its exemption under this section;

"(B) those directly affecting the deduction of contributions to such organization under sections 170, 642, 2055, 2106, 2522;

"(C) those directly affecting any exempt purpose or function for which the organization was organized and is operating, in the case of an organization which normally receives a substantial part of its support (exclusive of income received in the exercise or performance by such organization of its charitable, educational, or other purpose or function constituting the basis for its exemption under this section) from the United States or any State or possession or political subdivision thereof, or from direct or indirect contributions from the general public.

"(3) Activities described in paragraph (1) shall not include any attempt to influence the general public, or segments thereof, with respect to legislative matters, elections, or referendums."

SEC. 2. Section 170(c) is amended by adding the following new sentence at the end thereof: "For purposes of this subsection, the phrase 'carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation' in paragraph (2)(D) shall be subject to the qualifications set forth in section 501(e)."

SEC. 3. Section 2055(a) is amended by adding the following new sentence at the end thereof: "For purposes of this subsection, the phrase 'carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation' in paragraphs (2) and (3) shall be subject to the qualifications set forth in section 501(e)."

SEC. 4. Section 2106(a)(2)(A) is amended by adding the following new sentence at the end thereof: "For purposes of this subparagraph, the phrase 'carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation' in clauses (ii) and (iii) shall be subject to the qualifications set forth in section 501(e)."

SEC. 5. Section 2522 is amended by redesignating subsections (c) and (d) as subsections (d) and (e) and by inserting after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) CARRYING ON PROPAGANDA, OR OTHERWISE ATTEMPTING TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION.—For purposes of this section the phrase 'carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation' in paragraph (2) of subsection (a) and in paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (b) shall be subject to the qualifications set forth in section 501(e)."

SEC. 6. The amendments made by the preceding sections of this Act shall be applicable to taxable years beginning after the date of enactment thereof and to estates of decedents dying after the date of enactment thereof.

SEC. 7. (a) Part 1 of subchapter F of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to exempt organizations) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC 505. EXEMPTION DENIED TO ORGANIZATIONS ENGAGED IN POLITICAL ACTIVITIES.

"(a) PROMOTION OF POLITICAL CANDIDATES.—Any organization described in section 501(c) which—

"(1) endorses or opposes directly or indirectly, any political candidate, or

"(2) expends directly or indirectly any of its funds to promote the candidacy of any political candidate, or

"(3) provides goods, services, or anything of value to any political party or political organization, shall not be exempt from tax under section 501 for the taxable year in which it so endorses or so expends funds, and for the three succeeding taxable years: Provided further, That activities prohibited by this section shall not be exempted from these prohibitions by being termed 'educational'.

"(b) CERTAIN POLITICAL ACTIVITIES.—Any organization described in section 501(c)(3) which—

"(1) makes any contributions of goods, services, or anything of value to any person or organization when there is reason to believe that part or all of such contribution will be used—

"(A) to promote or oppose the candidacy of any political candidate, or

"(B) to support, directly or indirectly, any political party or political organization whose purpose is to provide candidates for political office or to promote the candidacy of persons for political office.

"(2) has any officr or employee who is actively engaged in a political campaign (within the meaning of section 7324 of title 5 of the United States Code) during his hours of employment by the organization shall not be exempt from tax under section 501 for the taxable year ending after the date on which it so endorses, makes such a contribution, or has such an officer or employee and for the three succeeding taxable years.

"(c) POLITICAL CANDIDATE.—For purposes of this section, the term 'political candidate' means any individual whose name is presented for nomination for or election to public office."

(b) The table of sections for such part I is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Sec. 505. Exemption denied to organizations engaged in political activities."

SEC. 8. The amendments made by section 7 of this Act shall apply to acts occurring after the date of the enactment of this Act.

EXHIBIT F

[Excerpt from the Congressional Record, Feb. 24, 1969]

SEPTEMBER 2, 1966.

HON. SHELDON COHEN,
Commissioner, Internal Revenue Service,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. COHEN: As you know, for the past ten months the National Right To Work Commitee has been the subject of an intensive investigation by the Internal Revenue Service for the purpose of determining whether the Commitee is entitled to retain its tax exemption status under section 501(c)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code.

During the course of this investigation your representatives have made an intensive effort to find some evidence of political activity on the part of the National Right To Work Committee. They have quite frankly advised us that this is what they are looking for, and in this connection they have scrutinized all of our expenditures for printed material, staff travel, legal services, and membership promotion, have asked us for a breakdown of the activities of staff personnel particularly during the period preceding the 1964 national elections and even subpoened the books of those printers who have done business with us. We have been expressly told by your representatives that if they turned up any evidence of political expenditures or political activities by our staff on paid time our exemption could be cancelled.

We are, of course, well aware that as an exempt organization we cannot engage in any political action, and we have scrupulously avoided any involvement in politics or political activities. The only purpose of the National Right To Work Commitee is to promote the principle of voluntary unionism. By reason of this we have incurred the enmity of union officials who have publicly expressed their intent to bury us by one means or another.

This brings us to the point of this letter. Are not labor unions, as tax exempt organizations under section 501(c) (5), subject to the same restrictions on political activities as the National Right To Work Committee and other exempt organizations? And, if this is so, why is it that labor unions can openly and flagrantly use the monies collected from membership dues to make contributions to political candidates, and assign their staff personnel to electioneering activities on behalf of union-endorsed candidates? That they do all of these things on a large scale is, of course, well known and well documented. Just by way of example, in International Association of Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. 740 (1961), the defendant unions stipulated that the dues monies collected from their members under compulsory union shop agreements were "used in substantial amounts to support the political campaign of candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, and for the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States . . . and candidates for state and local offices." 367 U.S. 740, 745, footnote 2. In May of this year the newspapers in Washington reported a public announcement by Charles Della, president of the Maryland-District of Columbia (AFL–CIO, that that organization would contribute the sum of $200,000 to support the campaign of Carlton Sickles for Governor of Maryland. Enclosed is an article written for the May 1966 issue of Commonweal magazine by Sidney Lens, a long-time union staff official, which points out, among other things, that the United Auto Workers Union recently donated $30,000 to the campaign of Senator Paul Douglas of Illinois. The article goes on to point out:

"Equally important is manpower. Around election time labor mobilized thousands of workers from the shops as well as many full-time organizers. The office of the auto union, perhaps the most active of all politically, become depopulated by as much as one-half of the regular staff, all working the hustings for union-endorsed candidates. These are men, it should be noted, with considerable organizational talent, usually far above the caliber of ordinary Democrats. . . . Union-leased autos, painted over with the names of union-endorsed aspirants, plastered with signs, participate in parades and make tours with loudspeakers blaring their message. In small towns especially, such as Peoria, Illinois or Muncie, Indiana, big unions like steel or auto can mobilize the thousands of members to fill a meeting hall or listen to an open-air speech. On the first Tuesday in November innumerable union men, paid from the union treasury, can be seen driving voters to and from the polling booths, acting as watchers to assure an honest count, and calling on 'sure' voters who have not yet cast a ballot. Thus by concentrating on marginal areas, by doling out $1,000 to $5,000 for Congressional hopefuls who need just a little push to put them over, labor can make an important contribution."

Also enclosed is a recent article by one of the well known labor columnists, Victor Riesel, who points out that the AFL–CIO has assessed its 13.7 million members at a nickel a head for a special election fund of $850,000 to be spent for campaign activities in this year's national elections.

Since the Internal Revenue Service insists that the National Right To Work Committee must strictly observe the rule against political activity, and since the flagrant political activities of labor unions are largely ignored, it would seem that a double standard is applied under the Internal Revenue Code. As the public becomes more and more aware of this selective enforcement of the law the effect can only be to break down respect for the law, a trend which seems to be rapidly undermining the foundations of orderly society.

We feel that you can quickly restore public confidence in the integrity of the Internal Revenue Service by issuing directives to your agents and offices throughout the country to undertake a sweeping investigation of the political activities of organized labor in this year's state and national elections, and revoke the tax exemption status of any union that engages in such political activities.

Very truly yours,

REED E. LARSON,
Executive Vice President.

U.S. TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., September 28, 1966.

Mr. REED E. LARSON,
National Right To Work Committee,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LARSON: Thank you for your letter of September 2, 1966, with attachment, concerning the political activity of labor unions.

You asked whether labor unions, as tax-exempt organizations under section 501(c)(5), are subject to the same restrictions on political activities as other exempt organizations. Although certain sections of 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code and their implementing regulations contain various definitions, limitations, and prohibitions relative to political and legislative activities, there is no such proscription with respect to a labor organization otherwise qualifying for exemption from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(5).

The qualifying character of a labor organization, as the term is used in section 501(c)(5), is that it has as its principal purpose the representation of employees in such matters as wages, hours of labor, working conditions and economic benefits, and the general fostering of maters affecting the working conditions of its members. As a mater of law, a labor organization does not lose its right to exemption under section 501 because it engages in political activities, unless by reason of the organization's improper activities it can be established that the organization is not sufficiently engaged in the union or labor activity to be characterized as a labor organisation in the sense that that term is used in section 501(c)(5).

As you may know, contributors to labor organizations are not entitled to a charitable deduction: however, under certain conditions payments may qualify as a business expense under section 162. With respect to the deductibility of dues paid to a labor union or trade association as a business expense, the Revenue Act of 1962 amended section 162 by adding a new subsection (e) which provides for the deduction of ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1962, for certain activities directly connected with legislation or proposed legislation of direct interest to the taxpayer. In no event shall a deduction be allowed for that portion of a special assessment or similar payment (including an increase in dues) made to any organization for any activity which does not constitute an appearance or communication with respect to legislation or proposed legislation of direct interest to the organization.

We appreciate your concern in this matter and want to further assure you that the Service is primarily interested in applying the internal revenue laws fairly and unformly in all cases. We do everything we can to administer the applicable law and regulations without regard to the political leanings of any taxpayer or organization.

We trust this information will be helpful for your purposes.

Sincerely yours,

S. B. WOLFE,
Director, Audit Division.

U.S. TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., October 10, 1966.

Mr. F. R. DICKERSON,
President, Roper Industries, Inc., Commerce, Ga.

DEAR MR. DICKERSON: Thank you for your leter of September 6, 1966, concerning the political activities or organized labor and the tax-exempt status of the National Right to Work Committee and the Sierra Club.

The records of the National Office disclose that the National Right to Work Committee has qualified for tax-exempt status under section 501(c)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code, while the Sierra Club is exempt under section 501(c)(3), and labor unions frequently qualify under section 501(c)(5).

The Internal Revenue Service maintains a program of periodic audit and review of the operations of tax-exempt organizations. If it is determined as a result of the audit program that any tax-exempt organization is engaged in activities to an extent proscribed by that section of the Code under which it has been held exempt, we will take appropriate action to revoke or modify our prior ruling.

This is a factual question in each case, and the Service must examine all of the operations for the years involved.

You expressed concern regarding the possible nonuniform application of restrictions on political activities for various tax-exempt organizations. It should be noted that although certain sections of 501(c) of the Code and their implementing regulations contain various limitations and prohibitions relative to political and legislative activities, there is no such proscription with respect to a labor organization otherwise qualifying for exemption from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(5).

The qualifying character of a labor organization, as the term is used in section 501(c)(5), is that it has as its principal purpose the representation of employees in such matters as wages, hours of labor, economic benefits, and the general fostering of matters affecting the working conditions of its members. As a matter of law, a labor organization does not lose its rights to exemption under section 501 because it engages in political activities, unless by reason of the organization's improper activities it can be established that the organization is not sufficiently engaged in the union or labor activity to be charactized as a labor organization in the sense the term is used in section 501(c)(5).

As you may know, it is the responsibility of the Service to administer the Federal income tax laws enacted by Congress as efficiently and impartially as possible. We have no power to amend the laws or to act contrary to their provisions. Your concern in this matter is appreciated and we want to further assure you that the Service is interested in applying the internal revenue laws fairly and uniformly in all cases. We do everything we can to administer the applicable regulations without regard to the political leanings of any taxpayer or organization.

We trust this information will be helpful in explaining the varying limitations or organizations qualifying for tax-exempt status under different sections in the Code.

Sincerely yours,

FORREST P. NEAL,
Chief, Technical Coordination Branch.

The CHAIRMAN. Next we hear from the Honorable Justice Arthur Goldberg, representing the Denver Post Employees Stock Trust. He has served this Nation with great distinction. Aside from being a Supreme Court Justice he has served this Nation as its representative at the United Nations and as Secretary of Labor. We are glad to have you, Mr. Justice, or Ambassador, or Mr. Secretary.

STATEMENT OF HON. ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG ON BEHALF OF THE DENVER POST AND THE DENVER POST EMPLOYEES STOCK TRUST

Mr. GOLDBERG. Thank you very much for adverting to my service in various capacities. I am glad to be called as you have designated, mister. That is an honorable title in American life.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is a great privilege to appear before you as I have done in other capacities, and once again to discuss with you some of the problems that affect our country.

I appear in a very limited capacity. I am not appearing to testify broadly on the question of foundations and would not be qualified to do so, although in the spirit of public disclosure which should animate all of our actions in all capacities, I should say at the beginning that I once served as unpaid director of a foundation which we created in the memory of Phillip Murray, a great labor leader. That foundation had no administrative expenses and wound up all its activities in the course of 1 year. Having made that comulete disclosure I now turn to the immediate subject of my testimony.

I have a statement and in the interest of time, if you will permit me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would like to offer it for the record. I shall be very brief.

The CHAIRMAN. Your statement is already printed, Mr. Goldberg.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Today I come before you on behalf of the Denver Post, which is the largest newspaper and only independent daily in Denver, and the Denver Post Employees Stock Trust.

Under the stock trust the employees of the Post purchase a beneficial interest in the trust under a formula price, and the funds supplied by the employees are then used by the trust to acquire Post stock.

They have a particular problem under this bill, and it is that particular problem that I want to address myself to.

I should say parenthetically that none of the employees of the employees trust receive any compensation whatsoever and no administrative expense is charged to the employees trust.

I am appearing in these hearings with your kind permission on a limited aspect of the foundation provisions of the tax reform bill as reported from the House, because the principal source of the Post stock to be purchased by the trust is the Helen G. Bonfils Foundation, which owns approximately 42 percent of the total outstanding Post stock, and having heard some of the earlier testimony, I should like to say that neither the trustees nor anyone connected with this foundation are compensated. The foundation is not charged with any administrative expenses and there were virtually no tax consequences involved in the transfer of the Post stock to this particular foundation. That is so because Miss Bonfils had virtually exhausted her charitable deduction. So this foundation, whatever may be said of others, is not involved in that aspect of the problems which the committee is considering.

The foundation stockholdings in the Post were acquired by gift in 1966 subject to a reservation of the income and voting rights for the donor's life for Miss Helen Bonfils, who was the daughter of the founder of the Denver Post. In order to have the value of that stock devoted to charitable purposes after her death while making the foundation stock available for the Post employees, the gift was made subject to a restriction that the foundation was to sell such stock to the trust from time to time, at a fair price determined by formula.

There was a purpose, an object in this plan, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, relevant to that aspect of the bill that I want to talk about.

A fundamental purpose of the plan was, by this daughter of the founder of the paper, to insure that the Post would survive as a vigorous and independent newspaper owned by its employees. That was a fundamental purpose of this particular arrangement.

Now, I am sure that this purpose, which Congress has been very much concerned with, which is to insure the independence of newspapers in a period when there has been a growing monopolization of the means of public communication, I am sure that this purpose is one that the members of this committee and certainly the Members of Congress generally would applaud.

Our first problem under the tax reform bill as it comes from the House, arises under proposed code section 4943. Under this provision a foundation which together with certain related parties, owns more than 20 percent of the voting stock of a business enterprise must divest itself of sufficient stock to bring such holdings to no more than 20 percent. All of the excess over 20 percent must be disposed of within 10 years and at least one-third of the excess must be disposed of within 5 years.

Now, I express no opinion here today about the general applicability of such a provision, but I do want to point out a special circumstance which arises in this particular instance. Under these provisions the Helen G. Bonfils Foundation would have to dispose of over two-thirds of its holdings of Post stock. However, while its deed of gift obligates it to sell these shares to the trust, the trust can purchase stock from the foundation only as funds are made available by the employees themselves, and it is up to the employees to decide when their resources will permit them to purchase shares.

As a result, it is almost inconceivable that the trust will be able to purchase all the foundation's execess holdings within 10 years or one-third of it within 5 years and, as written, to comply with section 4943 would, therefore, require sales to a third party which would violate the foundation's contractual obligations and, more importantly than that, defeat the entire purpose of the trust which is to give the employees the right to acquire controlling ownership of the newspaper.

The plan to have control of the Post transferred to the trust for employees is also threatened by proposed code section 4942, which requires a foundation annually to distribute for specified charitable purposes 5 percent of the value of its investment assets. This provision could require sales of Post stock to third parties who might be unwilling to pay a reasonable price for such stock since the Post stock is closely held and not publicly traded.

The ultimate result would be sales at inadequate prices which would violate the trust contractual rights and defeat the foundation's purpose.

Now, equally importantly, if these sections, as I have said, are rigidly applied to the foundation a grave injury would also be imposed upon the more than 400 employees who have purchased an interest in the trust with the legitimate expectation that the plan would be carried through, and one of the great aspects of the Post, as you will see from the exhibits attached to my prepared statement, one of the beneficial aspects of this plan which gives the employees an interest in the newspaper, are very harmonious labor relations exist at the Denver Post. This is in great measure due to this plan and also the fine leadership that the Post has in one of the great publishers and editors in America, Palmer Hoyt.

Now, I have said I do not wish, it is not my purpose here, to wander broadly into this question which this committee is considering.

My purpose is to suggest to the committee a very limited amendment which would propose that the Helen G. Bonfils Foundation and any other foundation which was given holdings in a business enterprise at or before the same time for the same purpose, which is to convey it to an employees trust, would be permitted to dispose of its interests in the enterprise to the trust for employees in accordance with the pre-existing, I emphasize, preexisting plan adopted for that purpose. In other words, what I am proposing, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, is a very limited amendment that does not deal broadly with the problems that you have to consider, which, in effect, says that where there is a plan under which a foundation has committed, obligated itself, to transfer its shares to an employees trust that such a plan, which was conceived a long time ago, without reference to any tax incidence, be exempt from the operation of section 4943 and 4942.

The amendment that I am suggesting to the committee, and I have suggested language, Mr. Chairman, in the prepared statement, which I am sure the staff and the members of the committee would like to review, is thus a very narrow application intended only to prevent the frustration of employee expectations and to protect the public interest in preserving independent newspapers in the case of preexisting plans for the sale of such newspapers to their employees.

As is apparent from my complete statement, in addition to the Denver Post, the Denver Post Employees Stock Trust Council, representing the employees who have beneficial interests in the trust, and the labor organizations representing the employees of the Post, join me in urging adoption of the amendment which I have proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador, Mr. Justice, and Mr. Secretary. We have your statement, it is already printed, and it starts at page 111 in our committee print.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to advise all the witnesses if they would like to they should take a look at their statement because it is the way they would want it to appear in the record and it is summarized. Both the summary of the principal points and also the back-up information of the statement that supports the information is printed. You have presented a very fine statement here and I think it is very well documented. I can assure you this will receive consideration.

Unfortunately, there are a lot of people who are going to be adversely affected by this bill if we pass it in its present form who do not even know about it. It may be that we will have no opportunity to consider their problem because they are not aware of it themselves and fail to bring it to our attention. But I appreciate your bringing us this information.

May I say to all members of the committee as well as to our witnesses, that we have at least 14 more distinguished witnesses to hear from today so I am going to suggest to all members of the committee if they wish to interrogate the witness tell our staff that you would like to interrogate the witness and they will inform the witness and you can meet with him here in our conference room and ask whatever questions that you would like to ask to be presented in the written record.

Senator MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not have any questions but I would like to request that Mr. Justice Goldberg furnish for the record an additional statement. I have filed an amendment number 222, which I think will cover your situation, but it is much broader and I would appreciate it if you would analyze it and then furnish for the record a statement as to whether or not that amendment would cover your problem.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Senator Miller, I would be very glad to do so.

(The information had not been received at the time of printing.)

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator FANNIN. We do not get one question?

The CHAIRMAN. I would like the Senator, if you would like to interrogate Justice Goldberg, to meet with him in our executive room here but if you insist, go ahead.

Senator FANNIN. Do you think as a general principle, the divestiture stipulation is inequitable? As a general principle, in other words, you are being specific as to the type of organization that is involved, but cannot the public interest be protected in another manner without having this stipulation?

Mr. GOLDBERG. Yes. There could be a general provision, but I did not know what other problems might arise, if there would be a broad provision encompassing many situations where there might be differences.

Senator FANNIN. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask, since we have so many witnesses left that we meet in the other room.

The CHAIRMAN. Justice Goldberg, right next door here. Senator Fannin would like to interrogate you and get your statement.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Our next witness will be Mrs. Bruce Benson, president of the League of Women Voters of the United States.

Mrs. Benson, the Senate seems determined to act on this bill before we go home Christmas and that being the case we have a very abbreviated fashion of doing business as I am sure you detected. We have your entire statement here in the record and we also have a summary, I believe, prepared by you. So you are invited to summarize your statement and make any points in addition to it that you would like to.

STATEMENT OF MRS. BRUCE B. BENSON, PRESIDENT OF THE LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF THE UNITED STATES; ACCOMPANIED BY ALBERT E. ARENT, COUNSEL; AND MRS. JOHN CAMPBELL

Mrs. BENSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. I have with me on my left the league's general counsel, Albert Arent and on my right Mrs. John Campbell of Indianapolis, Ind.

I am Mrs. Bruce B. Benson of Amherst, Mass., president of the League of Women Voters of the United States. I am appearing in behalf of the league and our two funds, the overseas education fund and the education fund. The league, which will be 50 years old next year, is an organization of nearly 160,000 members in 1,285 local leagues in the 50 States, the Virgin Islands, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. During its history the league throughout the country has been actively involved in working to increase citizen participation in government at all levels.

In 1947 the League of Women Voters of the United States established a nonprofit, educational affiliate now known as the overseas education fund of the League of Women Voters. This fund was established in response to requests coming to the league from individuals and organizations in other parts of the world who were seeking assistance in developing responsible citizenship and effective citizen action applicable to their own societies.

In 1957, we established the League of Woman Voters Education Fund to work within the United States to carry out educational programs.

The League of Women Voters itself is a social welfare organization exempt under section 501(c)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code. Our two funds are exempt under section 501(c)(3) and contributions to them are tax deductible.

Both the Treasury and the Ways and Means Committee have recognized the value of the nonpartisan work done by the League of Women Voters Education Fund in connection with voter education and registration and have tried to make it clear through a Treasury press release of May 9, 1969, and through a statement on page 34 of the committee report that the proposed legislation was not intended to inhibit such activities by the Fund. However, it appears to us that the House bill not only fails to achieve this objective, but actually creates some very serious problems for us as well as for many of the outstanding organizations working in the field of citizen education.

I would like to mention a few of the things that are troubling us. Under proposed section 4942, contributions to nonoperating private foundations are excluded from the definition of "qualified distributions" and, therefore, will not help a donor or foundation avoid the tax on undistributed income. Unless it is absolutely clear that our education fund and overseas education fund are not nonoperating private foundations, we fear that private foundations will withhold their contributions to these funds—contributions which are vital to the continuation of their work in teaching the responsibilities of citizenship.

The line between private foundations as defined in proposed section 509 and publicly-supported charities is a shadowy one and it will be difficult to predict from year to year whether the education fund and overseas education fund will qualify as publicly supported organizations. It appears unlikely moreover that they will be able to meet the precise requirements for qualifying as an "operating foundation."

We respectfully suggest (1) that an effort be made to define the category of private foundation more narrowly, (2) and that the effective date of the new legislation be deferred until sometime after the Treasury Department has promulgated its final regulations thereunder.

In addition, we support the very helpful proposal made by the Treasury Department in its technical memorandum of September 30 of this year that distributions to private foundations be considered qualified if the recipient organization applies the contribution directly to charitable activities within 1 year of receipt.

We are also greatly disturbed over the provisions of proposed section 4945, which impose a 100 percent tax on private foundations and a 50 percent tax on foundation managers for any amounts expended—(1) to carry out propaganda, or otherwise attempt to influence legislation or (2) to influence the outcome of any public election—including voter registration drives carried on by or for such a foundation.

With respect to the first of these provisions only, an exemption is made if the activity is making available the results of nonpartisan analysis or research. However, any organization operating in the area of citizen education and dealing with subjects of civic concern, runs the risk that those who deem themselves adversely affected by the organization's activities, no matter how nonpartisan or objective, will accuse the organization of attempting to influence legislation and demand that the punitive taxes of section 4945 be imposed. This could easily happen right now, in fact, if H.R. 13270 were in effect.

Let me cite an example. With the funds provided by the Department of the Interior and various foundations and with the assistance of hundreds of voluntary workers of the League of Women Voters, our education fund has for many years studied the problem of polluting of our waterways. We have held seminars and produced a book and a number of brochures designed to increase public understanding of this dangerous problem.

There is right now in the House an attempt to increase the appropriation for pollution control. Undoubtedly there will be proposals before the State legislatures attempting to solve the problem of water pollution. There will likely be sharp differences of opinion as to the need for the expenditures involved. It would be relatively easy for unrelated persons to attempt to make partisan use of the fund's studies and it might be difficult for the fund to defend the nonpartisan character of its analysis and research.

Furthermore, there is the risk that such subjects may become issues in an election, in which case the exemption for nonpartisan analysis or research is not even applicable.

These risks are intrinsic to educational work in the field of government and politics. Organizations like our education fund, never certain whether in any particular year they will be held public or private, can continue to function only at great peril. Reasonable protection is given to foundation managers by imposing a penalty only if they make the expenditure knowing it is a taxable expenditure. The same good-faith defense, we believe, should be available to the foundation itself.

The League of Women Voters believes that even more intensified efforts are needed in our country to involve more citizens at all levels of Government, that a responsible democracy depends on citizens learning the importance and the responsibility of voting and of participating in the democratic process.

Private philanthropy plays a significant role in supporting the educational work needed to achieve the goal of an informed and active electorate. H.R. 13270 appears to go further than necessary to correct the abuses which have been revealed in the operation of the private charitable foundations.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, we think this bill is bound to do much more harm than good. Unless these problems which I have outlined are cleared up, our education fund and our overseas education fund, like other organizations which have come into existence to carry out citizen education, will not know where we stand. We will not know if we are public or private and we undoubtedly will not be able to divine what is safe educational activity. It seems to us we will be hardly able to stay out of trouble.

Our two funds are managed by volunteers from all over the country. They work terribly hard to raise money to carry out education in citizen responsibility. This bill will make their job infinitely more difficult especially in this 50th anniversary of the League of Women Voters when we are trying to raise funds to expand our work.

In addition to our education fund and our overseas education fund, we have several local and State funds which have been created by our members to carry out nonpartisan educational work—the citizens information service of the Chicago League of Women Voters and the Texas Fund of the League of Women Voters of Texas. It seems clear that they will be completely unable to meet the requirements of this bill.

We believe that our political parties are vitally important to our country. We also believe that our voluntary nonpartisan associations are an essential part of the political process as we all know it, and that it would be a mistake to jeopardize an important source of their funds.

There are already great difficulties involved in carrying out nonpartisan citizen education. To put more hazards in the way it seems to us, would be a disservice to the country.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you. Certainly, your suggestions will be considered.

(Mrs. Benson's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF MRS. BRUCE B. BENSON, PRESIDENT, LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF THE UNITED STATES

SUMMARY

H.R. 13270 raises serious problems for organizations like the League of Women Voters Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund of the League of Women Voters, which are independently engaged in nonpartisan educational work but which receive a significant part of their financial support from private foundations.

I. Under proposed section 4942, contributions to non-operating private foundations are excluded from the definition of "qualified distributions" and therefore will not help a doner foundation avoid tax on undistributed income. Unless it is absolutely clear that the Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund are not non-operating private foundations, we have reason to fear that private foundations will withhold their contributions to these Funds—contributions which are vital to the continuation of their work in teaching the responsibilities of citizenship. The line between private foundations as defined in proposed section 509 and publicly-supported charities is a shadowy one and it will be difficult to predict from year to year whether the Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund will qualify as publicly-supported organizations. It appears unlikely, moreover, that the precise requirements for qualifying as an "operating foundation" can be met.

We suggest (1) that an effort be made to define the category of private foundation more narrowly and (2) that the effective date of the new legislation be deferred until some time after the Treasury Department has promulgated its final regulations thereunder. In addition we support the very helpful proposal made by the Treasury Department in its Technical Memorandum of September 30, 1969, that distributions to private foundations be considered "qualified" if the recipient organization applies the contributions directly to charitable activities within one year of receipt.

II. We are also greatly disturbed over the provisions of proposed section 4945 which impose a 100 percent tax on private foundations and a 50 percent tax on foundation managers for any amounts expended—

> "(1) to carry out propaganda, or otherwise attempt to influence legislation," or
> "(2) to influence the outcome of any public election (including voter registration drives carried on by or for such foundation)".

With respect to the first of these provisions only, an exception is made if the activity is limited to "making available the results of nonpartisan analysis or research". However, any organization operating in the area of citizen education and dealing with subjects of civic concern runs the risk that those who deem themselves adversely affected by the organization's activities, no matter how nonpartisan or objective, will accuse the organization of attempting to influence legislation and demand that the punitive taxes of section 4945 be imposed. Furthermore, there is the risk that such subjects may become issues in an election, in which case the exception for nonpartisan analysis or research is not even applicable. These risks are intrinsic to educational work in the field of government and politics. Organizations like the Education Fund, never certain whether in any particular year they will be held public or private, can continue to function only at great peril. Reasonable protection is given to foundation managers by imposing the penalty only if they make the expenditure "knowing that it is a taxable expenditure". The same good-faith defense should be available to the foundation itself.

STATEMENT

I am Mrs. Bruce B. Benson of Amherst, Massachusetts, President of the League of Women Voters of the United States. I am appearing in behalf of the League and our two affiliated organizations, the Overseas Education Fund and the Education Fund. The League, which will be 50 years old next year, is an organization of nearly 160,000 members in 1285 local Leagues in the 50 States, the Virgin Islands, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. During its history, the League throughout the country has been actively involved in working to increase citizen participation in government at all levels. Through election Voters Service the League encourages people to register and to vote and helps them to vote as informed citizens by providing objective nonpartisan information about candidates and pro and con information on issues. Our Voters Service work is not limited to election time. Throughout the year, the League works to involve people in learning about and participating in government and politics at all levels.

Overseas education fund

In 1947 the League of Women Voters of the United States established a nonprofit, educational affiliate now known as the Overseas Education Fund of the League of Women Voters. This was in response to requests coming to the League from individuals and organizations of other countries for assistance in developing responsible citizenship and effective civic organizations. It is the goal of the Overseas Education Fund to encourage and assist the development of citizen initiative, participation, and action in other countries within the framework of their own culture and to help voluntary groups work together to identify realistically their needs and evolve ways of meeting them. The methods employed by the Overseas Education Fund include briefing and scheduling travel of nationals of other countries who are in the United States and interested in aspects of United States government; conducting annual seminars for women community leaders from Latin America to observe citizenship and volunteer activity in the United States; and administering a four-month Institute presently based at Boston University for foreign women leaders which focuses on organization techniques and citizen involvement in community programs and includes field work in Boston and surrounding communities. Field representatives provide technical assistance and consultative services in organization techniques to groups in other countries upon request. The program is carried out through carefully coordinated efforts of volunteers and professional staff.

Education fund

In 1957 the League established the Education Fund to promote and carry out nonpartisan citizenship education within the United States. The work of the Education Fund falls into two categories: communicating to other organizations and individuals the experiences and techniques in citizen education that the League of Women Voters has developed over the years and, where these established techniques lack effectiveness, to carry out experimental projects resulting, hopefully, in adaptations that will be more effective. Specifically under these two categories the Education Fund has made surveys of local and state government structure for distribution in local communities, has disseminated information on selected issues of the day, and has helped teach citizen groups methods of stimulating the registration and involvement of voters. The Education Fund has no membership of its own. It depends upon the grass-roots support of League members in the 1285 local Leagues from coast to coast and of citizens who are not League members to carry out its activities.

Effects of H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969

The League understands the concern of Congress regarding the misuses of funds by some foundations and is sympathetic with the problems of writing legislation which will prohibit "self-dealing" and at the same time permit private resources to be used to encourage informed citizen participation in government. It appears to us, however, that the proposed legislation on private foundations goes far beyond what is necessary to remedy any known abuses. To avoid duplicating the testimony of others, I shall address myself only to the provisions which raise serious problems for the League of Women Voters Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund.

Difficulty of distinguishing between private foundation and public charity

The League of Women Voters is a social welfare organization exempt under section 501(c) (4) of the International Rvenue Code. The Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund are exempt under section 501(c) (3) and contributions to them are tax deductible. We believe that both of these Funds are publicly-supported charities, but the line between private foundations as defined in proposed section 509 and public charities appears to be a shadowy one. Under the mechanical test set forth in section 1.170-2(b) (5) of the Income Tax Regulations, defining a "publicly supported" organization under current law, an organization may be public one year and private the next. Because of the rule excluding from the catgory of public support that portion of large contributions which exceeds 1 percent of the organization's total support for a prescribed period, it is possible for one unusually large contribution to change the status of the organization overnight from public to private. This same situation would exist under the provisions of H.R. 13270.

Both the Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund depend heavily for their support upon contributions from private foundations. Under proposed section 4942, contributions to nonoperating private foundations are excluded from the definition of "qualified distributions" and therefore will not help a donor foundation avoid the tax on undistributed income. Unless it is absolutely clear that the Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund are not nonoperating private foundations, we have reason to fear that private foundations will withhold their contributions to these Funds—contributions which are vital to the continuation of their work in teaching the responsibilities of citizenshp.

Inability to qualify as operating foundations

The definition of an "operating foundation" in the proposed section 4942(j) (3) appears to exclude the Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund for a variety of reasons. For example, if the present 50th Anniversary Campaign for $11 million to expand our work over a ten-year period is successful, both the Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund will have substantial endowment and reserve funds and could not meet the requirement of subparagraph (b) (i) that substantially mor than half of their assets be devoted directly to the active conduct of their educational programs. Their income from Government grants might also present them from meeting the alternative test of subparagraph (B) (ii). The Education Fund, but not the Overseas Education Fund, might also fail under subparagraph (A) if its grants to the League of Women Voters for specific educational projects were not construed as direct expenditures for the active conduct of its program.

Accordingly, unless a narrower and more practical definition of private foundation can be devised, organizations like the Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund stand in constant jeopardy and the significant public service which they render to this nation may be severely curtailed. At the very least an opportunity should be provided for organizations to clarify their status before the new structures on private foundations are made effective. Perhaps the effective date could be deferred until some time after the Treasury Department has promulgated its final regulations under the new statute. In addition we support the very helpful proposal made by the Treasury Department in its Technical Memorandum of September 30, 1969, that distributions to private foundations be considered "qualified" if the recipient organization applies the contributions directly to charitable activities within one year of receipt.

Exposure to drastic penalties

We are also greatly disturbed over the provisions of proposed section 4945 which impose a 100 percent tax on private foundations and a 50 percent tax on foundation managers for any amounts expended

"(1) to carry out propaganda, or otherwise attempt to influence legislation," or

"(2) to influence the outcome of any public election (including voter registration drives carried on by or for such foundation)."

With respect to the first of these provisions, attempting to influence legislation, an exception is made if the activity is limited to "making available the results of nonpartisan analysis or research." Any organization operating in the area of citizen education and dealing with subjects of civic concern runs the risk that those to whom the results of its analysis and research are displeasing will attack the nonpartisan character of the work or charge that the organization has gone beyond merely making the results available. The risk is intrinsic to educational work in the field of government and politics. Present law respects honest and fair educational efforts and provides a safety valve for error or misunderstanding through the "substantiality rule." No such safety valve exists in the proposed legislation, and organizations like the Education Fund, never certain whether in any particular year they will be held public or private, can continue to function only at great peril.

Let me cite an example. With funds provided by the Department of Interior and various foundations and with the assistance of hundreds of volunteer workers from the League of Women Voters, the Education Fund studied the problem of pollution of our waterways, held seminars, and produced a book and a number of brochures designed to increase public understanding of this dangerous problem. Undoubtedly there are and there will be proposals before the federal and state legislatures attempting to solve the problem of water pollution, with sharp differences of opinion as to the need for the restrictions and expenditures involved. Under such circumstances, when unrelated persons may attempt to make partisan use of the Fund's studies, it may be difficult for the Fund to defend the nonpartisan character of its analysis and research.

With respect to the second provision previously quoted, relating to the influencing of elections, it is also conceivable that anti-pollution legislation may become an issue in some election battle. At this point expenditures made for an objective study may be attacked as amounts paid to influence the outcome of a public election, in violation of section 4945(b) (2), as to which, it should be noted, no exception is provided for "making available the results of nonpartisan analysis and research."

In view of such possibilities, should the Education Fund be subject to the risk of a 100 percent penalty tax and its officers, directors, trustees and key employees be subject to the risk of a 50 percent penalty tax? The 50 percent penalty on foundation managers is imposed only if they make the expenditure "knowing that it is a taxable expenditure." At the very least, should not be same good-faith defense be available to the Fund itself?

Inadequacy of special provision for nonpartisan activities

Both the Treasury and the Ways and Means Committee have recognized the value of the nonpartisan work done by the League of Women Voters Education Fund in connection with voter education and registration and have tried to make it clear through a Treasury press release of May 9, 1969, and through a statement on page 34 of the Committee Report that the proposed legislation was not intended to inhibit such activities by the Fund. Unfortunately, if the Education Fund is determined to be a private foundation, the statute as drafted may not provide the intended relief. Among other things, the proposed section 4945(d), excluding from taxable expenditures "nonpartisan activities carried on by certain organizations," which was drafted with the Education Fund in mind, requires that substantially all of the income be expended directly for the active conduct of the Fund's program*—a requirement which may be difficult to meet if, as part of its program, the Education Fund continues to make grants to the League of Women Voters for its traditional nonpartisan voter education pro-

*Paragraph (3) of Section 4945(d). Paragraph (2), which requires that the principal activity be "nonpartisan political activity in 5 or more States," may also be troublesome for semantic reasons--the Education Fund is engaged principaly in nonlpartisan educational work, which may or may not be embraced within the term "political activity."

grams, such as its panel discussions between candidates, its factual presentation of their stated positions on the issues, and its voter registration drives. In any event, section 4945(d) deals only with the prohibition in section 4945(b)(2) on influencing public elections and leaves the Education Fund fully exposed on the proscription of section 4945(b)(1) against attempting to influence legislation, with the hazardous consequences previously mentioned.

Conclusion

The League of Women Voters and its affiliated organizations have a long and honorable record of constructive nonpartisan service to this nation. Unless the new legislation makes it absolutely clear that organizations like the Education Fund and the Overseas Education Fund are not to be treated as private foundations, enormous damage will be done. Furthermore, with respect to all organizations doing honest work in the area of political education, whether they are private foundations or public charities, a decent respect for human frailty requires either than the substantiality test be restored with respect to influencing legislation or that the penalty tax be limited to willful and premeditated attempts to influence legislation or the outcome of an election.

We believe that even more intensified efforts are needed in our society to involve more citizens at all levels of government; that a responsible democracy depends on citizens learning the importance and the responsibility of voting and of participating in the democratic process. Private philanthropy plays a significant role in supporting the educational work needed to achieve the goal of an informed and active electorate. H.R. 13270 appears to go further than necessary to correct the abuses which have been revealed in the operation of private charitable foundations. We hope this Committee will make the proper changes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the next witness will be Mr. Paul Anthony, executive director, Southern Regional Council.

Senator TALMADGE. I would like to welcome Mr. Paul Anthony and his associates.

STATEMENT OF PAUL ANTHONY, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL; ACCOMPANIED BY JOSEPH F. HAAS, SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL; AND VERNON JORDAN

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, thank you for this opportunity. As executive director, I represent the Southern Regional Council, a body of 100 distinguished southerners. With me are Mr. Joseph Haas, our legal counsel and Mr. Vernon Jordan, director of the council's voter registration.

Recognizing the demands made on you I shall be very brief. Before citing some of our specific concerns I should like to make two observations. One, for 25 years the Southern Regional Council has recognized that we enjoyed the benefit of tax exempt funds in proper exchange for certain restrictions on the use of those funds. We have attempted to operate within the spirit as well as the letter of the law. We do not appear before you to request that the existing regulations and laws which have created this method of operation, be altered.

Secondly, it may be that the present tax laws have allowed individuals to abuse those laws by creating so-called foundations for personal gain. We believe that the Congress is justified in seeking to stop those abuses. Our concern is that honorably conceived and legally operated foundations and those whom they support not be unduly restricted because of the activities of others. Among our specific concerns are section 4945(c)(1). The wording that prohibits an agency from engaging in any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to effect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof disturbs us greatly. That our publications are properly a part of the dissemination of ideas in a free society, and are not an attempt to directly influence legislation, has been upheld by the Georgia courts. We feel that this bill is drawn too broadly. Literally interpreted the provision in the proposed legislation would prevent responsible agencies now engaged in serious research from making meaningful comment on the society. This is incompatible with a democratic society.

Section 4945(d). This section includes the provision that under certain circumstances a foundation could provide no more than 25 percent of an agency's support. We know of a number of worthy institutions that would not be in existence had this been the law. We believe the sole criterion for grant making should be the program's legality and merit and the ability of those connected with it to properly administer the funds.

Section 4945(f). This section requires foundations to be fully responsible for grants made. While the three requirements would seem to be reasonable on the surface, there are serious consequences. It is conceivable that the enforcement of this provision would require such stringent supervision of grants made that private agency staff would in effect, become merely employees of the foundations and their policy leaders. We urge you give serious consideration to the implications of this situation.

Slums, poverty, discrimination, misunderstanding, unemployment are as vital as support for medical research; university faculty salaries, laborers.

Furthermore, work in the immediate area not only must be done in the interest of the public welfare, they can be done honorably and legally.

You have had impressive testimony on the results of foundations supporting private efforts at basic research in medicine and food, for instance. We need equal and perhaps even more research in the area of our socioeconomic concerns. I would welcome the committee's exploration of this and questions for me and my colleagues.

In conclusion, we believe it most important to stress that this bill as it relates to foundations and those whom foundations support, is widely regarded to be punitive gains those agencies and those foundations dealing with social reform, poverty and minority affairs. Of those agencies of which the Southern Regional Council is one, that have attempted not only to contribute to the general welfare but to bring into reality the potential and the promise of this Nation for all our people, in a sense it could be said we occupy the middle ground, recognizing need, tragedy and aspiration on the one hand, and holding, on the other hand, a deep faith in the ability of the society and this government to be the means by which wrongs can be corrected and a wholesome society created. In this critical time of crisis, polarization, misunderstanding, we urge you do not cripple, as this bill would, those agencies which with increasing difficulty are attempting to occupy that middle ground where the faith remains that the capabilities and intents of our government can be equal to our promises.

Thank you again, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman. Thank you very much, sir.

(Mr. Anthony's prepared statement follows:)

A STATEMENT BY THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE RE. HR 13270

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee:

Thank you for this opportunity to be heard. As Executive Director, I represent the Southern Regional Council an organization formed in 1944 for the purpose of contributing generally to the development of the region and more specifically to race relations within the region and the nation. Our five incorporators were Bishop Arthur Moore of Georgia; the late Dr. Howard Odum of the University of North Carolina; the late Dr. Rufus E. Clement, president of Atlanta University; the late Dr. Charles Johnson, president of Fisk University; and the late Mr. Ralph McGill, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution. The Council consists of one hundred distinguished Southerners, black and white, Protestant, Catholic and Jew. There is maintained in Atlanta an office and a staff of approximately forty persons. As indicative of our interests we have on that staff, or use as consultants, specialists in urban planning, manpower resources, health and nutrition, community organization, and related areas. We emphasize in our work research and publication on those matters which we feel most pertinent to the region. We also sponsor special projects such as the Voter Education Project, which has been the subject of some interest to the Congress in the formation of this bill.

Our concern about HR 13270 arises from our belief that the bill before you jeopardizes a valuable and unique operation by which our society is served. That operation is the partnership which has been created between private tax-exempt foundations and private tax-exempt agencies. We are confident this partnership has been to the public good. And, it is important that a significant part of the needs and the stimulation of the private sector are served by private funds, under private control, apart from the undue involvement of government.

Before we cite those particulars of the bill which most concern us, we should like to make two general observations:

(1) For twenty-five years the Southern Regional Council has recognized that we enjoyed the benefit of tax-exempt funds in proper exchange for certain restrictions on the use of those funds. For instance, our implementation of the requirement that no substantial portion of our effort be partisan has been to attempt to see that no portion of our activity is political. We have attempted to operate within the spirit of the law as well as the letter of the law. We are confident this is true of many other agencies. We do not appear before you to request that the existing regulations and laws which have created this method of operation and our reasoning be altered.

(2) It may be that the present tax laws have allowed individuals and groups to abuse those laws by creating so-called "foundations" for personal gain rather than to serve the public interest. We believe the Congress is justified in seeking to stop those abuses. Our concern is that honorably conceived and legally operated foundations—and those whom they support—not be punished and unduly restricted because of activities of others.

Our particular concerns with HR 13270 are as follows:

(1) SEC. 306—TAX ON PRIVATE FOUNDATION INVESTMENT INCOME

While the precedent may be ominous, the proposed 7½% tax probably would neither significantly alter foundation operations nor add substantially to the public treasury. The true effect would be to reduce by 7½% those funds available to the private agencies. These private tax-exempt groups are, therefore, those really being taxed. This must be recognized by those who believe that there are limitations on the capability of the public sector and that there is, therefore, an important role for private agencies.

(2) SEC. 4945(C)(1)—TAXES ON TAXABLE EXPENDITURES

It is extremely important to note that this section of the bill removes from the current Internal Revenue Service regulations the requirements that no substantial part of a tax-exempt organization's resources be used in partisan political activity or in support of a candidate for office. Rather, there is substituted excessive stipulations to preclude any political activity.

We have been told this has been done because some tax-exempt agencies have abused the present regulations by engaging in substantial partisan political activity. These abuses may have occurred. But, if they have it has not been because of the inadequacy of current laws and regulations, but rather because of the failure of adequate enforcement of those laws and regulations.

* * * * * * *

While we subscribe completely to the concept that tax-exempt funds should not be used for partisan purposes, we are gravely concerned, for instance, by the wording in the proposed legislation, "any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof, . . ."

Literally interpreted, we believe this provision would prevent responsible agencies now engaged in serious research and publishing from making any meaningful comments on the society in which we operate. We assume, for instance, that at best the Council could publish statistics on migration from the region, but not offer opinions on the causes or impact of that migration. We assume that, at best, we could publish a medical report on hunger and malnutrition, but not offer remedial proposals. We assume we could publish statistics on black-white registration, but not offer any analysis of processes which affected that registration. We would not expect, and do not request, that we be allowed to propose specific legislation nor to support or oppose legislation being considered. However, under the provisions of this bill we assume that regardless of the effort and integrity we invest in forming them, we could not share our opinions with "the general public or any segment thereof."

It is in the public interest that agencies such as the Southern Regional Council be allowed not only to collect information but analyze and comment on that information. Our publications have been used extensively by the media, by scholars and others, and they have figured in the deliberations of the Congress. This contribution to public consideration and to public debate is, we believe, not only valuable, but non-partisan.

We have been upheld by the courts of Georgia in that opinion. In 1963 the Georgia Department of Labor informed the Council that we had been held taxable by virtue of their interpretation that we had a point of view, shared it with the public, and, thereby, engaged in "propaganda" and influenced legislation.

In Court, the State readily accepted the fact that the Council did not lobby, did not support or oppose any specific legislation, nor any candidate for public office. Rather, the State introduced as evidence a collection of Council publications and rested its case on the statement of the executive director that these publications were circulated to the general public.

The Superior Court found in favor of the Council and that decision was appealed to the Supreme Court of the State of Georgia. That Court unanimously upheld the decision of the lower court. We would like to quote the following statement from the Court's decision, Williamson vs SRO, Inc., 223 Ga. 179:

"If the word 'propaganda' is given the broad meaning that it is any dissemination of ideas, then no religious or educational institution could qualify under Code Anno. 64–657(h)(7)(H), since a substantial part of the activities of such institutions is the dissemination of ideas and beliefs. Under the constitutionally protected right of freedom of speech, an organization cannot be penalized for disseminating ideas and beliefs which are not opposed to our system of government, even though such ideas may not meet with the approval of all of the people in the area in which they are advanced."

* * * * * * *

We submit that the process of public dialogue and the dissemination of ideas is essential in a democracy. We submit, further, that such dialogue should be especially encouraged, not prohibited, by organizations that have established themselves in that society.

(3) SEC. 4945(D)

We are grateful that the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives specifically recognized the Council as an agency which could—subject to the information they had available—engage in programs in support of voter registration.

Within this section of the bill, however, and perhaps more importantly elsewhere in the bill, there are requirements that certain programs can receive no more than 25% of their support from any one source. There are implications to this stipulation which may not be readily apparent.

The most important of these are:

(a) There are still relatively few foundations which are willing to support programs of social reform. These foundations and the programs they have supported should be commended, not discouraged, for venturing substantially into new areas since frequently these programs—like the Council's Voter Education Project which could not have come into existence under this provision—have made an important contribution to the public welfare.

(b) Occasionally an unusually imaginative foundation has had the courage and foresight to support exclusively, or almost exclusively, a new group which has promise and a sound idea. We know of a number of now established agencies—many of which now enjoy the financial support of federal, state, or local governments—which would not be in existence had one foundation been limited to providing no more than 25% of a beginning budget.

Subject to other proper consideration, there is no more rationale to restricting a foundation to a maximum of 25% support for a deserving effort than restricting an agency of the federal government to the same limitation on any publicly funded program.

(4) SEC. 4945(F)—EXPENDITURE RESPONSIBILITY

This section would require that foundations be "fully responsible" for the use of grants made. While the three requirements under this section would, on the surface, seem to be reasonable, there are serious consequences to these requirements if they are literally enforced. We believe the enforcement of the three requirements of this section of the bill would be severely damaging to foundations and cause recipients to loose a substantial degree of their independence and autonomy. It would also probably mean that the smaller foundations would have to cease giving to those affected by this provision, since they have neither the staff nor the resources to meet these requirements.

Please do not misunderstand us. We are for the full and complete reporting on the use of tax-exempt funds. During the 25 years of our existence the great majority of our support has come from foundations. During the current year the Council will receive support from at least fourteen foundations totalling more than a million dollars. During all this time and dealing with foundations, large and small, we have never known an instance where a foundation staff did not satisfy itself beforehand as to the pertinence of our request and our competence to administer any funds granted. Nor, have we known of an instance where this process was not further reviewed by the foundation board. Further, we always at least annually issue a full audit of our expenditures and a complete report on our activities for the foundations and other interested parties.

However, the current situation is that the Internal Revenue Service is charged with determining whether or not an agency is tax-exempt and this serves as a guide to foundations. Earlier, we made a request to the IRS regarding our own process of granting funds to other agencies and in a letter dated March 22, 1960 the IRS stated:

(1) "If you make a distribution of your funds to an organization which presently has exemption as a charitable or educational organization described in Section 501(c)(3) of the Code, there is no further obligation on your part to satisfy yourself as to the use of the funds distributed.

(2) "Contributions made by you to organizations, which have not established an exempt status for Federal income tax purposes, will not jeopardize your exempt status if the contributions are made and used only for one or more of the exempt purposes specified in Section 501(c)(3) of the Code. In such an event you should use reasonable care in ascertaining that the contributions will be used only for an exemption purpose and you will be able to substantiate that fact if called upon to do so by the Internal Revenue Service."

We submit this is a workable and efficient method. The burden of requiring foundations to be "fully responsible," as interpreted in the bill, would be harmful to all concerned. Small foundations, with small staff, do not now generally give to non-tax-exempt agencies because they do not have the resources for the necessary supervision, and few large foundations make such grants because the requirements are too burdensome. Under this bill, small foundations would likely have to treat currently exempt organizations as they have non-tax-exempt ones in the past; simply removing them from their list of potential recipients of funds.

Equally disastrous, from the standpoint of all concerned, large foundations would probably have to be so vigorous in complying with these provisions, including their own on-the-spot staff supervision and auditing of their funds being spent, that they would in effect become the supervising grantee as well as the grantor. It is not an exaggeration to state that under these conditions, the independent tax-exempt agency staffs become employees of the donating foundations and the boards of those tax-exempt agencies become bystanders. We urge you to give the most serious consideration to the implications of this situation.

In conclusion, we believe it most important to stress that this bill, as it relates to foundations and those whom foundations support, is widely regarded to be punitive against those agencies and those foundations dealing with social reform, poverty, and minority affairs.

There are those agencies, of which the Southern Regional Council is one, that have attempted not only to contribute to the general welfare but to bring into reality the potential and the promise of this nation for all of our people. In a sense, it could be said we occupy the middle ground; recognizing need, tragedy and aspirations on the one hand, and holding on the other hand a deep faith in the ability of this society and this government to be the means by which wrongs can be corrected and the wholesome society created.

In this critical time of crisis, polarization and misunderstanding we urge you, do not cripple—as this bill would—those agencies which, with increasing difficulty, are attempting to occupy that middle ground where the faith remains that the capabilities and intent of our government and our society can be equal to our promises.

PAUL ANTHONY,
Executive Director, Southern Regional Council.

THE SOUTH OF THE FUTURE

(A Statement of Policy and Aims of the Southern Regional Council December 12, 1951)

Eight years ago, the Southern Regional Council was born out of the conscience and high resolve of a democratic nation at war. Today, in another period of international tension, we are faced with a renewed challenge to provide leadership and direction in a troubled region. It is essential that we assess clearly and wisely the role that the Southern Regional Council is to perform in this critical time.

We do not believe in the exclusive validity of any single approach or any single organization. There is not only room, but a desperate need for a wide variety of programs concerned with broadening democracy through legal, economic, legislative, religious, and educational means. Moreover, such programs are needed on all levels—national, regional, state, and local. Every group, like every individual, should chart its course with due regard for the special contribution it is fitted to make.

The role appropriate to the Southern Regional Council is evident in its origin and make-up. The Council's main asset is and has always been the people of the South who understand and want the full practice of democracy, and who at the same time know intimately the old evils that burden the South, and their causes. From such people is the Council's membership drawn. They have wanted a regional organization, not out of any provincial desire to separate the South's problems from the nation's, but out of the conviction that such an organization has unique advantages. It can express the best and often neglected elements of Southern thought and conscience; it can serve as a convincing demonstration of Southerners working together as fellow citizens without regard to race; and it can tap local resources and initiative often inaccessible to agencies outside the region.

The Council seeks to be a practical organization, emphasizing working solutions rather than spectacular pronouncements. Indeed, that philosophy is basic to an organization which hopes to open closed minds and substitute reason for prejudice.

The Council, by its very nature, is not a "mass pressure" organization. The number of persons in the South who are able and willing to reject the taboos on interracial effort in their own communities is growing, but it has not yet reached mass proportions. Meanwhile, the Council's membership can function effectively as enlightened citizens acting through the civic life of their communities in behalf of our common principles. Their methods are the established ones of conference, factfinding, and persuasion.

The Council takes no part in political activity. However, it can and does consult with public agencies and officials and makes its influence felt for truly representative government.

The council's functions may be briefly summed up as follows:

To serve as a meeting ground for citizens of all races, occupations, and religious persuasions.

To present the facts about the region, and their implications, through newspapers, radio, magazines, pamphlets, and other public media.

To counteract appeals to prejudice and violence by demagogues, professional bigots, and hate organizations.

To provide a program adaptable to local need in both the relatively backward and the relatively advanced areas of the South.

To translate appropriate research findings from universities and other centers to the practical situations with which the action program will be concerned.

To give special emphasis to the development of leadership among promising young Southerners of all races.

To convene, by interest group, key persons in the various fields of Southern life, so that steps to genuine integration may be representatively agreed upon.

To stimulate local initiative to work for local solutions in full democracy, so that legislation and judicial rulings may be translated into justice for the individual in his everyday life.

The basic machinery necessary to enable the Council to work effectively at these tasks is: (1) trained, competent, professional persons of both races working in each Southern state as agents of improvement in public life; and (2) staff in a central office of the Council to direct and service the field people.

The declared purpose of the Southern Regional Council is "to attain through research and action the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the region." This objective has lost none of its timeliness since it was first adopted. Although the past eight years have brought notable progress in the South, the job remaining is a vast one, and the pressures of national and international events demand an even speedier advance. Many of our institutions continue to make unfair and unwarranted distinctions between citizens solely on the basis of race. Outmoded tranditions, unjustified fears, and ancient prejudices continue to exact a heavy toll on the unity, productiveness, and integrity of our society.

It is the ultimate hope and aim of the Council that it may help in bringing solution to regional problems that transcend the question of race—problems economic, social, ethical, which affect impartially people of all races. But, for the present, the unique liability under which the South labors arises out of an unreasoning racial disharmony. The first task of informed and conscientious Southerners is to strive to create here the atmosphere in which artificial distinctions and discriminations based upon race will no longer persist. Only when that goal has been attained will the energies of enlightened men be fully released for the great task of realizing all our potential resources, natural and human.

The south of the future, toward which our efforts are directed, is a South freed of stultifying inheritances from the past. It is a South where the measure of a man will be his ability, not his race; where a common citizenship will work in democratic understanding for the common good; where all who labor will be rewarded in proportion to their skill and achievement; where all can feel confident of personal safety and equality before the law; where there will exist no double standard in housing, health, education, or other public services; where segregation will be recognized as a cruel and needless penalty on the human spirit, and will no longer be imposed; where, above all, every individual will enjoy a full share of dignity and self-respect, in recognition of his creation in the image of God.

Equal opportunity, truly defined, includes all this and more. We have no illusion that it can be realized in the South quickly or easily or perfectly. Nor do we imagine that the Southern Regional Council can play more than a modest but creditable part toward its achievement. Yet it is the ideal toward which we strive and, short of which, we have a duty to remain dissatisfied. For it is nothing less than the American ideal.

A Statement on the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, Inc.

The Southern Regional Council launched the first Voter Education Project in 1962. A major purpose of the new undertaking was to be research into the causes of low political participation, particularly among blacks, in the South. And a major method of this research was to be the direct funding of voter registration drives in the South as a means of determining the types of difficulties encountered.

While the SRC Executive Committee felt this project to be of the first importance, it stipulated that the Council could not sponsor this effort without review and assurance from the Internal Revenue Service that this program would be in accordance with tax-exempt activity as interpreted by IRS. The Council received that assurance from IRS on March 22, 1962. In addition, of course, the Southern Regional Council has filed annual reports with IRS on this as well as all of its programs and expenditures.

SRO's first Voter Education Project began in March of 1962 and ended in the fall of 1964. As a result of these efforts, an increase in Negro registration of nearly 700,000 was recorded in 11 Southern states.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965, suspending literacy tests in six states and otherwise providing new protection for prospective black voters, substantially changed the circumstances of civic participation in the South. Accordingly, the Southern Regional Council decided to launch a second Voter Education Project.

This second VEP began work in early 1966 and remains in operation today. Research into the causes of low political participation remains a major function. Support of voter registration activities continues to be a method of determining the causes of low political participation. However, the second Voter Education Project has placed an increasing amount of emphasis on non-partisian citizenship education and leadership training programs, particularly the latter.

As Congress recognized in the adoption of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the recent history of the South is darkly stained by the systematic exclusion of Negroes from the political process. A summary of the repressive statutes and practices which enforced this exclusion can be found in "Political Participation," published in May of 1968 by the Civil Rights Commission, and in "Climbing Jacob's Ladder," by Pat Watters and Reese Cleghorn, published by Harcourt, Brace and World in November of 1967. The latter book is largely a description of the work of the Voter Education Project. A feeling for the importance of the research activities of VEP may be gained by noting the number of citations of VEP material in the Civil Rights Commission's report.

The activities of the Voter Education Project have unquestionably brought more Negroes into the political process in the South. With the passage of the Voting Rights Act a contributing factor, the second Voter Education Project—like the first—estimates that its programs have added 700,000 blacks to the registration rolls in the South. Year-by-year progress can be seen in the following table:

INCREASES IN BLACK REGISTRATION, 11 STATES

Year	Black registration	White registration
1960	1,463,333	12,276,127
1962	1,480,720	12,109,680
1964	2,164,200	12,263,820
1966	2,689,000	14,309,704
1968 (summer)	3,112,000	15,702,000

It should be noted that although black registration has risen to 62 per cent of the black voting-age population in the region, white registration stands at 78 per cent of the white voting-age population. Much remains to be done before it can be said that Negroes in the South are full partners in the regional and national political process.

The amount of money allocated for each project hardly can be described as large (although it must seem large to an organization with no other source of support). An average grant for voter registration runs between $1,000 and $2,000. The allocation generally covers a period running from one to two months.

A grant letter is sent to the local organization (see attached sample) which sets out in unequivocal terms that the money is to be used only for non-partisan voter education and voter registration and may not be put to any partisan or other use, and specifically not to serve any political campaign. The grant letter is followed by a research letter which sets our reporting requirements. Organizations receiving funds are required to submit both financial and status reports weekly. These reports are reviewed in the VEP office in Atlanta. All money spent must be accounted for precisely.

Money is supplied on a cash-draw basis. No lump-sum grants are given. This furnishes VEP with a means of cutting off support instantly when a report indicates partisan activities or any other irregularity.

In addition to all this, VEP employs a full-time field diretcor. The field director makes both announced and unannounced visits to all projects receiving VEP support. The field director also visits projects prior to funding to determine that they qualify for support. Non-partisanship is a major item checked by the field director in these on-the-spot inspections.

It should be pointed out that VEP does not endeavor to pay the entire cost of voter registration activities in the South. Local organizations, to the extent possible, are expected to raise funds of their own, particularly in urban areas. Candidates and others directly connected with political campaigns are not permitted to hold positions of responsibility in VEP-supported registration activities or in any way utilize VEP-supported projects, funds or facilities in aid of their own campaigns. While VEP has never found instances of partisan activity to warrant terminating a grant, several grants have been discontinued on other grounds.

Registration activities are not limited to blacks. Several projects have involved registration of Indians and Mexican-Americans. A few projects have reported registering some white Southerners. Relevant to the last point, however, is the fact that white registration in most of the South already is quite high.

The weekly reports are the backbone of VEP research. It is through these reports that VEP learns of difficulties Negroes continue to encounter in their attempts to register and vote in the South. Directors of voter registration projects supply the research department with a wide variety of facts and figures relating to Negro political participation in the South. VEP is the central point of such information by government, the press, scholars and universities, publications, research organizations, authors, and foreign visitors.

As already mentioned, the registration drives provide tremendous amounts of information and knowledge that otherwise would not be available. For many years, the Southern Regional Council has been the main source of information about black registration and voting in the South. Because several states have discontinued publication of registration figures by race, these local registration drives have become increasingly important in arriving at registraton figures by race. The Voter Education Project continues to be the main source of this information.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

During the last three years, VEP has held a number of seminars, workshops and conferences for candidates and officeholders.

We have felt that black candidates and black officeholders, like black voters, have been so long denied a part in the political process that these special educational programs were warranted and, indeed, necessary.

The seminars and conferences are restricted to discussions of the duties and responsibilities of candidates and/or officeholders. Discussion of campaign techniques and strategy, of how to get elected, etc. is not permitted. Incidentally, VEP has consistently rejected requests for funds for get-out-the-vote activities and has cautioned grant recipients against using VEP funds for this purpose. Similarly, we have felt that the new voters should be informed about the government they now are helping elect, and that is the basis for the programs in the field of citizenship education.

As the number of black elected officeholders in the South climbed rapidly toward 400 last year, VEP scheduled the first Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials. The conference was held in Atlanta last December with approximately 200 black elected officials attending. With the total number of black elected officials now standing at about 460, VEP has set up service centers for elected officials at five predominantly black colleges in the South. Although these centers now serve mostly black officials, we look forward to the day when they will be serving officials of any race who need technical and research advice. The centers may be compared, in terms of techniques and approach to the problems of government, with the Institutes of Government of the Universities of North Carolina and Georgia.

FINANCES

The Voter Education Project is but one of the many programs conducted by the Southern Regional Council, but it is the largest. Although VEP continues to receive small gifts from individuals, the bulk of funds comes from foundations.

Between 1966 and 1968 VEP received $1,163,446. Foundations which gave $2,500 or more each during this period include Aaron Norman, Abelard, Field, Ford, Irwin-Sweeney-Miller, Mary Reynolds Babcock, New World, New York, Rockefeller Brothers, Robert E. Moton Memorial and Taconic.

Grants for 403 programs, most of which involved voter registration totaled $736,956.70, for an average of approximately $1,830 per grant. The rest of the expenditures went for publications research and consultants, scholarships, student interns, meetings and seminars (including the Southwide Conference), and salaries and administration.

The first Voter Education Project (1962–64) received $870,371. Principal supporters were Taconic Foundation, Field Foundation, and the Edgar Stern Family Fund.

CONCLUSION

The Voter Education Project was formed as a result of widespread urgings from many concerned persons and groups, including high government officials, particularly in the Justice Department, that the energies of the sit-ins and freedom rides of the early '60s be channeled also into voter registration and citizenship education. It should be noted that there was some resistance within youthful civil rights circles to this development, the objection being that the idea sounded like an "Establishment" effort to blunt the thrust of activist undertakings.

It is true that the voter registration, citizenship education and leadership training programs have sought to bring black Southerners into the political process as a means of correcting the injustices that black people have historically suffered. The registration of thousands and the election of scores of black people have given many blacks in the South some hope of improving their lives through the existing political structure.

The Voter Education Project is the only organization conducting such programs on a region-wide basis. VEP could not have undertaken its task without foundation support. Without foundation support, VEP could not have existed. And without VEP, the black registration in the South would be substantially less than it is today.

Yet, as already pointed out, much remains to be done. Some two million voting-age Negroes in the South have not been registered to vote. Gradually, there are signs that white officeholders are responding to the needs of black voters. There are encouraging signs, here and there across the South, that blacks and whites can work together in the councils of government.

In large part these gains were made possible through voter registration, which in turn was made possible in large part through foundation support. To continue and sustain these gains will require a continuing effort, which in turn hinges upon continued foundation support. Gradually white southerners are becoming accustomed to Negroes as a part of the political process. To roll back that trend now would be tragic. Discontinuance of foundation funds for voter registration, coupled with the prospective expiration of the Voting Rights Act, would surely halt and reverse the trend toward full political participation in the South.

Sustained registration campaigns are needed to test the willingness of Southern registrars to follow non-discriminatory procedures (especially if the Voting Rights Act is not extended). However, most black people in the South are poor and can scarcely meet their daily needs. A few communities would be able to raise local funds to finance a voter registration campaign, but most would not. For all practical purposes, voter registration in the South would grind to a halt without foundation support.

In the years after Reconstruction came a dark period called Redemption. During this period, white Southerners turned back the clock and reasserted their control over the lives of black people. Tragic and bloody years followed, and the nation is still undoing the damage. Total exclusion of blacks from the political process was a major factor in that Redemption period.

A second Redemption is unthinkable if the region—and the nation—is to survive as a multi-racial society.

The CHAIRMAN. Our next witness is Mr. Lawrence Speiser. He is the director of the Washington office. We had scheduled Miss Victoria Popkin, assistant director of the office, to testify for the American Civil Liberties Union. Unfortunately for all of us, Miss Popkin passed away and Mr. Speiser is presenting her testimony and testifying in her stead. We are pleased to have you today, Mr. Speiser.

STATEMENT OF VICTORIA POPKIN, ASSISTANT DIRECTOR, WASHINGTON OFFICE, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, AS PRESENTED BY LAWRENCE SPEISER, DIRECTOR

Mr. SPEISER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am glad you made it clear for the record the testimony I am giving was prepared by Miss Popkin and I hope it is indicated in the record in that fashion.

We are here concerned with the provisions of H.R. 13270, to drastically restrict the so-called political activities of private tax-exempt foundations.

We believe that although there may be some specific abuses that they should be taken care of by legislation, and not this blunderbuss approach to make the changes that are proposed in this law. The bill would impose severe tax penalties ranging from a tax of 100 percent for improper expenditure to loss of tax-exempt status, and also to a tax of 50 percent on the officer authorizing improper expenditure of a foundation which carried on propaganda or otherwise attempted to influence legislation.

Specifically barred are attempts to influence legislation by affecting the opinion of the general public or private communications of legislative bodies. It would eliminate a substantial part of active qualification which exists under present law. There is a specific provision which would permit nonpartisan analysis and research. We do not feel that exemption from the provision is a satisfactory one.

Our first objection to this in considering the penalties that can be imposed, is that the restriction is too broad and too vague. What is meant by the term "propaganda"? Is this publishing materials that would draw one irrevocably to a single conclusion? There have been, for example, studies made by foundations which have had an impact on legislation that have been to the benefit of the general public. I could think, for example, not only of a study but of a conference that was held jointly by the Department of Justice and the Vera Foundation, primarily financed by the Vera Foundation, which highlighted the bail abuses within this country. Obviously, that conference was held to focus attention on that very critical problem, and it was aimed, it was fairly clear, to make changes in not only Federal law but to institute bail projects throughout the country in order to change the laws in the various States.

Under this provision that kind of conference would be prohibited for the Vera Foundation, which was set up to improve criminal justice, and there would be penalties imposed in attempts to hold conferences of that kind even in joint sponsorship with the Federal Government. This also shows the vagueness of the term of the "attempt to influence legislation."

Although the American Civil Liberties Union does not fall within the 501(c)(3) category because it feels it would not be affected by this legislation, we are not quite sure. We do have a tax-exempt foundation called the Roger Baldwin Foundation, which is engaged in litigation involving constitutional rights and rights of individuals, and much of it is test-case litigation to highlight problems and has done so successfully in the past. For example, the man-in-the-house rule was involved in a case brought by the Roger Baldwin Foundation, and which was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court; highlighting defects in the social security law. Would engaging in litigation of that kind be considered an attempt to influence legislation?

The exemption for nonpartisan analysis does not seem to be a satisfactory one. The various kinds of studies that have been made could be considered partisan, depending on whether political parties would be likely to make them part of their political program. Studies such as the defects in mental commitment procedures throughout the country may very well be major political problems. Studies on the effect of violence or sexual materials on television, on movies, may very well become political issues, and picking up with studies that have been made in foreign countries, with recommendations made in foreign countries, and circulating that may very well be considered to be partisan activity.

The effect of this vagueness and uncertainty is bound to be self-censorship. When you are in doubt as to whether or not you are going to be subjected to a penalty, the easy way out is not to extend yourself to it because you do not want to chance it.

As has been pointed out in a number of Supreme Court cases that are referred to in the full statement, this has been considered in the first amendment area as a sufficient basis for striking down legislation, where the fear of a sanction lies overhead—which gets me to the second question, the first amendment activity problem. There has been a Supreme Court case which is usually used as the justification for this proposal of Commarano v. The United States, which barred the deduction as a necessary business expense for attempts to influence legislation. That is far different than imposing a penalty of 100 percent for doing so. The penalization is a different kind of situation than refusing the tax deductibility.

For those who contend we are only talking about privileges, that tax deductions are privileges, Congress does not have to give, and you do not have to create, tax-exempt organizations. True enough. But in a number of cases the court has has pointed out that even though Congress has created some kind of thing by bounty, by grace you may not impose limitations on it which would have the effect of infringing on first amendment rights even though in the first case you did not have to grant the tax exemption at all.

Lastly, on voter registration activity, the prior speaker can speak with a good deal more knowledge and concern about that, and it would seem that if there is a congressional concern about the use of funds by foundations for partisan political activity or for campaigns that aimed at particular candidates can be done in a far less violent fashion than this bill would do it because it really makes it—it imposes limitations on the smaller foundations and I had always thought that is not really the major concern. The concern was about the larger ones. But you are suggesting that the smaller foundations, those who may not be able to engage in activities in more than one State, are going to have limitations, and they are prevented from doing anything at all, again it seems to me that this is a throwing out the baby with the bath water kind of approach, and if there are abuses, and I think there are abuses, I think it has been highlighted both in congressional hearings and in the public press, by some foundations, that the proper way of doing it is aimed at the abuses themselves and not the broad overall approach which I think is implicit and explicit in these provisions of the tax reform bill.

Thank you very much.

Senator WILLIAMS (now presiding). Thank you, Mr. Speiser.

STATEMENT OF VICTORIA POPKIN, ASSISTANT DIRECTOR, WASHINGTON OFFICE, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

SUMMARY

The ACLU opposes and urges deletion of provisions in H.R. 13270 to drastically restrict the so-called "political activities of private tax-exempt foundations."

While there are undoubtedly a number of specific abuses by these foundations which can and should be corrected, the contemplated restrictions jeopardize the continued effectiveness if not the very existence of these unique institutions which have made an enormous contribution to our national well-being.

Attempts to influence legislation

H.R. 13270 would impose severe tax penalties—ranging from a tax of 100% on an improper expenditure, to loss of tax-exempt status, to a tax of 50% on the officer authorizing the improper expenditure—on foundations which "carry out propaganda or otherwise attempt to influence legislation." Specifically barred are attempts to influence legislation by affecting the opinion of the general public or private communication with a legislative body. Specifically permitted is "non-partisan analysis and research."

1. As a standard by which a foundation is to guide its activities, the proposed restriction is too broad and too vague, raising substantial questions under the First Amendment which guarantees the right to publish, to speak and to petition the government. To cite just a few of many possible examples:

> What is propaganda? Is it published material espousing a particular political point of view? Publication by a foundation of a "scientific" opinion on the effects of malnutrition on intelligence could be banned.
> What is an attempt to influence legislation? Is it the mere publication of an opinion with the hope that it will spur a legislative response or must the publication include specific recommendations? Does it include "test-case" litigation, as in the welfare rights cases which have exposed some glaring infirmities in current law?
> What is "non-partisan" analysis? Is it only that analysis specifically sponsored by a recognized political party or does it extend to any analysis likely to be endorsed by such a party? The well known "One Year Later" report on the effects of the Kerner Commission might be precluded.

The effect of this vagueness and uncertainty will be a rigorous self-censorship by foundations far beyond any that exists under present law which provides a "safety-valve" in that its restrictions apply, only to activities which are a "substantial part" of the foundations program.

2. There is also a fundamental question as yet unresolved by the Supreme Court as to the underlying permissibility of so broad a regulation of First Amendment activities. Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959), for example, which is usually cited to advance the proposition that restrictions on lobbying are clearly constitutional decided only that Congress was not required to provide a tax deduction to business for lobbying. It did not deal directly with the question of severe penalties in the form of complete denial of a tax-exemption and individual tax liability for enaging in First Amendment activities.

Moreover, recent cases have made clear that to be valid, a condition attached to a government benefit which broadly limits First Amendment rights must advance a "compelling" government interest and be no broader than is absolutely necessary to do so. The proposed restriction is apparently intended to ensure that foundations not be used as "tax-dodges" to support a narrow private interest instead of to advance a broader public interest. That admittedly proper interest is adequately protected by present law.

Voter registration activity

H.R. 13270 also unduly restricts voter-registration activity supported by tax-exemption foundations. If Congress is truly worried about the use of funds for partisan drives or in campaigns aimed at a particular candidate, that can be prevented without curtailing legitimate on-going voter registration merely because the resources available to a foundation be insufficient to support activities in five or more states.

STATEMENT

I am Victoria Popkin, Assistant Director of the Washington, D.C. Office of the American Civil Liberties Union. The ACLU is a private, non-profit organization which devotes its entire resources to the protection of the Bill of Rights of the United States Constitution. We are neither a tax-exempt organization under § 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code nor are contributions to the Union tax deductible, although we do have a separate tax-exempt and tax-deductible arm, the Roger Baldwin Foundation of the ACLU, which engages in litigation and other charitable activities, primarily in the emerging areas of poverty and welfare law. Thus, we appear here today neither as tax "experts" nor as an organization necessarily affected directly by the proposed tax law changes contained in H.R. 13270. Rather, we appear to voice our profound concern for the deleterious impact on orderly and progressive social change which would result from proposals to restrict the activities of private foundations, and to raise with you important constitutional considerations which must be brought to bear in weighing the proposed restrictions.

There can be no doubt that tax-exempt private foundations have made an enormous contribution to our national well-being and continued social progress. Traditionally, they have engaged in a wide variety of philanthropic work and have been an important source of artistic, cultural and scientific endeavor. In recent years, with the rapid acceleration of social and technological change, both within the country and without, their activities have expanded to include the experimental and the innovative, and, more importantly, to support and direct the forces of change to which government has been slow to respond. Often this has involved criticism of government action or inaction. As a result, foundations have inevitably engendered controversy and now encounter opposition. Current attempts to restrict their activities are in large part manifestations of his reaction.

We have no doubt that there a number of abuses by private foundations which can and should be corrected—as, for example, when a private foundation which enjoys tax-exempt status as an incentive to engage in activities for the social welfare fails to distribute its income or engages in self-dealing. H.R. 13270, however, is not limited to correction of specific abuses such as these. While the provisions in H.R. 13270, as passed, are less restrictive than those originally reported by the House Ways and Means Committee, they remain sufficiently broad and ambiguous to pose a major threat to the independence of private foundations, the inevitable effect of which will be to curtail severely the constructive contribution which these unique institutions have made to American society. Some specific abuses of tax-exempt status which Congress can legitimately prevent may well be cured, but at the expense of crippling the very institutions created by the Congress to carry out what it has deemed to be important and beneficial social ends. A tax on foundation investment income, for example, while contributing little in terms of revenue to the public treasury, will serve only to assure that fewer private funds are available to meet social and charitable needs and that ultimately the public treasury, itself, will have to take up this slack.

Of primary concern to the ACLU are the provisions in Title I of the bill which restrict so-called "political" activities of private foundations, the violation of which would result in severe tax penalties to the foundation and/or its officers and trustees, and, ultimately, to loss of tax-exempt and tax-deductible status.

Any attempt to curtail "political activities," whether those activities are undertaken by individuals, business organizations or, in this case, private foundations, must be reconciled with the First Amendment guarantees of freedom to speak, to publish and to petition the government. While it may be clear that the government is not required to subsidize these activities by way of a tax-exemption or any other means, it does not follow that it is therefore wholly free to limit or ban them as a condition of receiving a benefit to which the taxpayer would otherwise be entitled. See e.g. concurring opinion of Douglas, J. in Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959); Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958); Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963). Thus, the proposed restrictions on foundation "political activities" must be velwed and judged in the light of established limits on governmental regulation of speech, press and the right to petition the government.

First, the bill would impose a tax of 100% on expenditures by a private foundation, "to carry out propaganda, or otherwise attempt to influence legislation." Such taxable expenditures specifically include (but are not limited to):

"(1) any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof, and (2) any attempt to influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, or with any other person who may participate in the formulation of the legislation," but specifically permit, ". . . making available the results of nonpartisan analyses or research." Trustees and officers of the foundation who knowingly authorize such expenditures incure an individual tax liability equal to 50% of the amount improperly expended. Flagrant or repeated violations can result in the loss of tax-exempt status.

As a standard by which a foundation is to guide its activities on pain of incurring severe financial penalties, the ban on propagandizing or otherwise attempting to influence legislation is both too broad and too vague. It is fundamental that "a law forbidding or requiring conduct in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates due process of law." Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964); Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278 (1961). The tremendous "chilling" effect of a vague and uncertain rule on the exercise of First Amendment freedoms has consistently been underlined by the Supreme Court. In Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1966) the Court stated,

"We emphasize once again that [p]recision of regulation must be the touchstone in an area so closely touching our most precious freedoms, NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (438); [f]or standards of permissible statutory vagueness are strict in the area of free expression . . . . Because First Amendment freedoms need breathing space to survive, government may regulate in the area only with narrow specificity. Id. at 432–33 . . . When one must guess what conduct or utterance may lose him his position, one necessarily will steer far wider of the unlawful zone . . . Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 526. For '[t]he threat of sanctions may deter . . . almost as potently as the actual application of sanctions, NAACP v. Button, supra at 433 . . . . (at 603)"

The total lack of "precision of regulation" in the proposed restrictions in H.R. 13270 is apparent from even the most cursory examination of their terms.

What is "propaganda?" Is it published material espousing a particular political point of view, or any particular point of view? As commonly used, the term can include spreading a scientific or artistic point of view. Is it forbidding, then, only if it becomes a topic of political controversy or if it is merely likely to become such a topic. Realizing that the restriction has an exemption for non-partisan analysis and research, which we deal with specifically below, it still must be noted that there may be specific "scientific" opinions which are not strictly speaking objective research reports, for example as to the therapeutic effect of fluoridation of water, or the pathological effect of cigarette smoking, or the effect of television violence on children, or the effect of hunger and malnutrition on a child's intelligence and performance, all of which are highly controversial matters, which could be termed "propaganda" by those who disagree with the opinion expressed as opposed to "analysis" by those who concur. Are foundations to be precluded from sponsoring and disseminating the results of all studies in such areas? If so, the restriction is virtually without limit.

Similarly, what is an attempt to influence legislation? Is it the mere publication of an opinion with the hope that the problem will spur some kind of legislative or executive action? Must the report contain specific legislative recommendations, or is it enough that it be relevant to a specific proposal already known to be under consideration? For example, a study of efforts in European countries to deal with the problems of obscenity and pornography, which reaches a specific conclusion and postulates recommendations for legislative solutions here might be forbidden only if it includes legislative recommendations, or not forbidden at all.

The two specific statements of what the general ban on attempting to propagandize or influence legislation is to include, and the one statement of what it is to exclude, provide little more in the way of precision or clarity of meaning. (And, significantly, it is stated in the bill that the ban is not limited to these examples.)

First, making "available non-partisan analysis and research" is specifically allowed, but, as we have seen, the line between analysis and propaganda is indeed a fuzzy one. Moreover, what does "non-partisan" mean in this context? If it is to include all analysis and research except that specifically sponsored by or to promote a recognized political party it would not appear to be overly restrictive. The same cannot be said, however, if it is to include any analysis or research with which a particular party may or may not agree, or indeed, any analysis and research which has an element of advocacy to it. If the latter is the case, foundation sponsored studies such as the Urban Coalition's "One Year Later" report on the effects of the Kerner Commission would be proscribed. So too would be studies by the American Bar Foundation or the Conservation Foundation and so forth.

Secondly, what is meant by an "attempt to affect the opinion of the general public," which is specifically disallowed? Any published study or report which is circulated to the public whose conclusions are other than benignly neutral could come within this category. Last year's well-publicized and effective studies exposing hunger in America are examples. Moreover, important activities other than studies and reports could be affected, as well. Litigation, for example, is often more than an attempt to vindicate the rights of a specific individual, but is also an important means of bringing injustices to the attention of the public in the hopes of securing a change in the law. For example, last year's Supreme Court decisions exposing violations of individual rights in administration of welfare programs have had an important impact in focusing public opinion on the need for welfare reform. Such reform has been proposed by the Administration and is becoming a prime legislative topic. One of those cases, Smith v. King was funded by the Roger Baldwin Foundation of the ACLU. Under the new law, is this a forbidden activity?

Lastly, precisely what is included in the prohibition on private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, or with any other person who may participate in the formulation of the legislation. Is an individual to incur liability by explaining the results or recommendations of a foundation-sponsored study to someone planning to testify before Congress on a bill, and, thus, "participating in the formulation of the legislation?" Government cooperation is often essential to philanthropic projects carried on by private foundations. An example is the renowned Carnegie libraries. Before these could be built, consultation with numerous local officials and actual legislation to make available the land used and guarantee the maintenance costs was necessary. This type of "communication" and activity is surely an attempt to influence legislation, and would be forbidden by H. R. 13270.

The effect of this vagueness and uncertainty on foundation activities will necessarily be profound and far-reaching. Under present law "no substantial part" of the activities of a tax-exempt (§ 501(c)(3)) organization may be used in "carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting to influence legislation." While obviously some of the same problems of vagueness inhere in this, the effect on foundation activities is far less severe. While undoubtedly some self-censorship results, in cases of uncertainty a particular project judged to be important may nevertheless be undertaken if it is not a "substantial" activity of the foundation. The proposed changes would eliminate this "safety-valve". Moreover, the new danger of individual liability by the foundation officers and trustees would obviously mitigate in favor of erring on the safe side. Furthermore, the elimination of the "no substantial part" provision in present law would bring a complete halt to joint government-foundation activities which have been so promising in recent years. Where government and foundation join in sponsoring a pilot project or program (such as a children's TV workshop) in which the government itself is interested, since the government funding aspect of this, even though already authorized by specific legislation, will be a line item in its budget, its implementation involves "formulating legislation."

In short, since the proposed changes are obviously intended to be more restrictive of so-called "political activities" than is current law, foundation officers and trustees, fearing that the foundation may be taxed or that they, themselves, may be subject to severe financial liability, will resort to a kind of rigorous self-censorship, previously unknown, which will likely expand the limitations on First Amendment activities far beyond even those intended by the bill.

"Seeking to stay on the safe side of an uncertain, often unknowable line . . . [foundations] are likely to eschew any activities that might incur official displeasure. Beneficiaries of government bounty fear to offend, lest ways and means be found in the obscure corners of discretion to deny these favors in the future." Reich, "The New Property," 73 Yale L.J. 5 (April, 1964), at 751.

While the problem of vagueness is the most readily apparent constitutional difficulty evidenced by these restrictions, another more fundamental question also arises which has yet to be finally resolved by the Supreme Court. That is the problem of the underlying permissibility of this kind of broad regulation of First Amendment activities. There have been only a few Supreme Court cases dealing with federal "lobbying" legislation, and for the most part these have been resolved without reaching this constitutional question.

In Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959), which is usually cited to advance the proposition that restrictions on lobbying in the form of denial of a tax-exemption are clearly constitutional, it was held that expenses incurred in an attempt to defeat certain legislation threatening the continued existence of petitioner's business were not deductible from income as "an ordinary and necessary" expense of doing business.

The Court dismissed the taxpayer's First Amendment claim, stating,

"Petitioners are not being denied a tax deduction because they engaged in constitutionally protected activities but are simply being required to pay for those activities entirely out of their own pockets, as everyone else engaging in similar activities is required to do. . . ."

That was of course true with regard to the business expense deduction being considered in the case but is not true with regard to a 100% penalty tax or to the complete denial of a tax-exempt status to a foundation because it engages in First Amendment activities or to the individual tax penalty on its officers for authorizing these. As Justice Douglas concurring in Cammarano, noted,

"If Congress had gone so far as to deny all deductions for 'ordinary and necessary business expenses' if a taxpayer spent money to promote or oppose initiative measures, then it would be placing a penalty on the exercise of First Amendment rights."

Under H.R. 13270, a foundation could be denied its tax exemption, and its officers penalized if they attempted to influence legislation.

In United States v. Rumley, 345 U.S. 41 (1952), decided on statutory grounds, the Court interpreted a Congressional resolution authorizing the investigation of "all lobbying activities intended to influence, encourage, promote or retard legislation" as limited to inquiry into representations made directly to Congress, explicitly recognizing that

". . . the power to inquire into efforts of private individuals to influence public opinion through books and periodicals, however remote the radiation of influence which they may exert upon the ultimate legislative process, raises doubts of constitutionality in view of the prohibition of the First Amendment." (At 46)

Justices Black and Douglas, concurring specifically pointed out that—

"The privilege of pamphleteering, as well as the more orthodox types of publications, may neither be licensed (Lovell v. Griffen, 303 U.S. 444) nor taxed, Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105."

H.R. 13270 apparently places a tax on certain kinds of "pamphleteering" and publications, among other things.

Finally, in United States v. Harris, 347 U.S. 612 (1953), the Court, dealing with a case in which petitioner had failed to register under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act (2 U.S.C. §§ 261–270), again avoided the constitutional question of regulating lobbying activities other than direct communication with Congress by construing the Act as only applying to that kind of activity. Moreover, it stressed that Congress was not prohibiting attempts to influence legislation but was merely seeking to make the public so as to enable Congress to evaluate the pressures being brought to bear upon them. Thus, the case lends no support to the proposition that regulation of propagandizing or influencing the opinion of the general public is constitutionally permissible. Moreover, Justices Black and Douglas dissented, stating:

"Can Congress require one to register before he writes an article, makes a speech, files an advertisement, appears on radio or television, or writes a letter seeking to influence proposed legislation? That would pose a considerable question under the First Amendment as Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 indicates . . . I mention the First Amendment to emphasize why statutes touching this field should be narrowly drawn to prevent the 'supposed evil' (see Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296). . . ."

H.R. 13270 clearly attempts to restrict foundation political activities in ways which have been untested in the Court, and in ways which the Court has itself consistently acknowledged raised profound First Amendment difficulties. In our view, there is reason to believe that even apart from problems of vagueness it could not overcome constitutional barriers. Recent cases have made clear that a condition attached to a government benefit which has the purpose and effect of drastically limiting First Amendment rights is not constitutionally permissible unless a compelling governmental interest is demonstrated. Speiser v. Randall, supra; Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963), and even then, the condition will survive constitutional scrutiny only if it is no broader than necessary to protect that interest. Similarly, a condition used to distinguish those who are eligible for a benefit from those who are not, which in effect broadly restricts First Amendment rights, does not meet the constitutional requirements of due process and equal protection unless it can be shown to be a carefully limited means of advancing a compelling government purpose. Shapiro v. Thompson, 37 U.S. Law Week 4333 (April 21, 1969).

It has not been demonstrated that the government's interest in protecting against propagandizing or attempting to influence legislation by private foundations, or, indeed, any other group is a sufficiently compelling one to justify a prohibition of the breadth contemplated by this bill. The concern which has been evidenced is not that the public be able to evaluate the pressures brought to bear upon it by foundations, or that a large amount of tax-free funds will be channeled into political campaigns, so that foundations can exercise an inordinate influence on elections or on government policies. Rather, it is apparently that such private foundations not become "tax-dodges" allowing funds to be spent to support narrow private interests to secure a benefit intended to advance a broader public interest. That admittedly proper interest on the part of the government, however, can be adequately protected by present provisions denying a tax exemption only when a "substantial" part of the organization's activities can be deemd "lobbying."

The argument is made that to permit private foundations to attempt to influence legislation either by direct communication with legislators or by affecting the opinion of the general public is to give them an advantage not enjoyed by all others and thus inequitable. We disagree. Since the Commarano case, the Internal Revenue Code has been amended to allow corporations, businesses and other profit-making organizations to deduct expenses incurred in influencing legislation which directly affects them, by direct communication with legislators. (Sec. 162) H.R. 13270 would deny similar benefits to private foundations. Thus if, for example, Congress was considering proposals to tax motion pictures deemd objectionable for minors, theatre owners lobbying against this would receive tax benefits to spur their drive. Non-profit parent's or citizens' groups who might support it would be denied similar benefits and thus be handicapped in their efforts. The same effect is possible in controversies over commercial development of a natural resource and countless other areas.

Furthermore, while it is still true that businesses and corporations are prohibited from deducting expenses of attempts to influence the general public on legislative matters, they can often accomplish this by way of advertising, the costs of which are deductible. Thus the Internal Revenue Code as a whole under these new provisions would be sharply skewed in favor of those corporate and business interests already most financially able to make their voices heard in the legislative process, and against those traditionally least able to do so, such as consumer groups, the poor, conservationists and so forth, and who in recent years have increasingly relied on private funds channeled through foundations to make their muscle felt. A tax exemption has been a significant incentive for private funds to support these groups, reducing their overall reliance on government to itself initiate and support change. To attempt to reverse this trend at this time would only serve to increase and spur the alienation and frustration already dividing our country and threatening our institutions, and to deny Congress and the country an important source of information and opinion.

Turning briefly to the second major "political activity" restriction of concern to the ACLU, H.R. 13270 provides that amounts payed, "to influence the outcome of any public election (including voter registration) drives carried on by or for such foundation" are "taxable expenditures" and thus prohibited. Excepted are amounts paid or incurred by a § 501(c)(3) organization, the principal activity of which is non-partisan political activity in five or more States, if that organization expends substantially all of its income directly for such activities, is supported by other tax-exempt organizations or by the general public, does not receive more than 25% of its income from a single source, and does not accept contributions earmarked for use in a particular state or election. These provisions amount to legislative "overkill."

If Congress is truly worried about the use of such funds for "partisan" voter activity or in selected campaigns aimed at a particular candidate, surely that possibility can be prevented with a more narrow restriction that does not threaten to curtail legitimate and important on-going voter registration activity merely because the resources available to a foundation may be insufficient to support activity in five or more States.

The danger which inheres in these new restrictions is not to any one group of persons or single ideological persuasion. Rather it is to the unique role which the tax-exempt foundation so effectively fills in our pluralistic society. Restrictions of this kind, strictly interpreted and enforced, could remove the incentive to innovate, to experiment, to persuade and to act as a source of ideas, which is, after all, both one of the primary purposes for which tax-exempt foundations were created and one of the main advantages of their continued existence. Ultimately it could reduce foundations to mere financial conduits for charitable giving, and dry up a source of information and ideas vital to both the public and the Congress itself.

H.R. 13270 was considered by the House under a closed rule so that amendments could not be proposed. The Senate Finance Committee thus presents the first, if not the last, occasion to consider closely and hopefully to revise the proposed restrictions on foundation political activities. We believe that they are both unwarranted and ill-advised. The grave constitutional questions which they raise cannot be swept under the rug and should not be left to the courts to resolve. We urge that the Finance Committee delete the proposed changes in the law relating to political activities of private foundations from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Our next witness is Hon. Ralph Harvey of New Castle, Ind.

Senator WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, may I take just a moment of the committee's time to introduce a good friend and former Congressman from Indiana. For 9 years, Mr. Harvey was a Member of the House of Representatives, and among other responsibilities he served on the Select Committee on Small Business. During that time, the Select Committee inquired into the matter of tax-exempt foundations. I know his testimony will be most helpful to the committee in our deliberations on the foundations sections of the bill. Mr. Harvey, you may proceed with your statement.

STATEMENT OF HON. RALPH HARVEY, FORMER CONGRESSMAN, NEW CASTLE, IND.

Mr. HARVEY. My name is Ralph Harvey, a former Member of the House of Representatives. During my 9 terms of service, the last three were as a member of the Select Committee on Small Business. This statement relates particularly to the subcommittee chaired by Congressman Wright Patman and devoted to the study of tax-exempt foundations.

It was my privilege to serve as the ranking Republican on this subcommittee until my retirement at the end of 1966. During this period —1961–66—Mr. Patman conducted—almost single-handed—an investigation into the activities of tax-exempt foundations and held numerous hearings. In addition, a detailed questionnaire was sent to a select group of several hundred foundations in an effort to determine the nature of their philanthropic activities. The Secretary of Treasury and Commissioner of Internal Revenue were questioned and cross-examined in public hearings on the treatment and auditing of such foundations. During the period of which I speak, there was much acrimony between those involved and the hearings sometimes developed more heat than light. Anyone who sat through these hearings could not help developing some convictions * * * it will be my purpose to set them forth as objectively as possible.

Permit me to state in the beginning that I do not have any prejudice with regard to foundations, in fact most of them are devoting their resources to worthy projects. They are able to explore various possible social developments in an unfettered fashion, to make mistakes and to proceed along given lines of activity without regard to public opinion or fiscal accountability in contrast with the limitations of the Government. The history of such foundations extends more than 50 years. Two very early ones, the Carnegie and Rockefeller contributed much to the advancement of health and knowledge. In fact their names became synonymous with humanitarianism and progress. Since World War II the number of tax-exempt foundations has proliferated immensely.

Out of this welter of charges and countercharges, one fact has become obvious to me. This is that a life expectancy limitation should be enacted as an amendment to that provision of the Revenue Code that gives license to tax-exempt foundations. Reasons for my conviction are as follows:

1. The present Federal tax system encourages those who hold vast estates to convert them to a tax-exempt status to avoid estate taxes.

2. This tendency has become more obvious during recent years because our affluent times have enabled many to become very wealthy.

3. As we continue to have more and more wealth sequestered from the Federal tax base, the burden upon those who are not so privileged becomes greater.

4. While most of these foundations have not had enough longevity to date to become tools of professionals to use for selfish purposes there is ample evidence that this is a growing tendency * * * especially is this true as these self-perpetuating organizations become further removed from their founders.

5. While it is not my purpose to recommend a specific period of life expectancy for tax-exempt foundations, it would be my recommendation that consideration be given to a 50-year period with another 10 years in which to phase out the holdings of those so licensed. Of course, no such provision be retroactive.

6. That enough IRS agents be employed to audit the accounts of such foundations regularly to insure that the bad eggs among them do not use their authority for either selfish economic or personal gain.

Senator Williams. Mr. Harvey, that was a fine statement. We do appreciate your being with us.

The next witness is Mr. Reed Larson, executive vice president of the National Right to Work Committee.

STATEMENT OF REED LARSON, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL RIGHT TO WORK COMMITTEE

Mr. Larson. Members of the committee, I want to thank you for the opportunity to appear before this group. What we have to discuss, I think, is an extremely important aspect of this question and one which to a large extent has escaped the attention of all those who are considering the question.

My name is Reed Larson, I am executive vice president of the National Right to Work Committee. We are a single purpose organization, a citizens organization, devoted to the concept that no individual should be compelled to pay money to any private organization in order to work.

Our appeal to this committee, we believe, is in keeping with the spirit in which this broad review of tax legislation has been undertaken, that is to insure that all persons and organizations receive fair and even handed justice under the tax law. We are not here to oppose any specific provisions of H.R. 13270 or to ask for relief from any of its provisions for any group or segment of society.

In fact, we are completely in accord with the Executive Council of the AFL–CIO in its resolution calling on the Senate to improve and strengthen the tax reform proposal.

We agree strongly with the drafters of this bill and their recognition of the fact that a comprehensive drive for tax justice must seek not only to broaden the base of tax revenues but also must reexamine the structure of tax exemption to insure that it serves the public interest and does not confer undue privileges on any special interest group.

In that connection, the present bill endeavors to restrict, as we have heard in testimony this morning, certain tax exemptions of foundations, groups, those exemptions which tend to distort or thwart the will of the electorate in choosing its governmental officials.

As you know, section 101(b) of this bill takes a step in this direction by limiting the political and lobbying activity of certain tax-exempt organizations. It imposes a heavy tax on any foundation and on the manager of that foundation which uses any of its funds "to carry out propaganda or otherwise attempt to influence legislation or to influence the outcome of any public election including voter registration drives carried on by such foundation."

The bill drafters must be credited with exceptional insight for recognizing how supposedly nonpartisan registration drives may be transformed into highly effective partisan political operations. This factor was confirmed by AFL–CIO president, George Meany, whose organization probably spends more money for voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives than all of the tax-exempt organizations combined.

Mr. Meany has observed and I quote:

> When you pay a candidate's bills you are not sure where the money is going. When you make a donation to a candidate you cannot be sure. But when you spend your money to get people registered, and then spend a lesser proportion to get them out to vote, you know you have got a vote in the ballot box.

Mr. Meany continues—

> Of course, we are a little bit choosy when we choose districts in which we want to better those votes in the ballot box, so when they go in we have a pretty good idea of how they are going to vote.

Due in a large measure to special privilege loopholes in our tax laws, millions of Americans are today being denied basic civil rights and political freedom. They are compelled, in order to work at their jobs, to help finance political and ideological objectives with which they may strongly disagree.

Thomas Jefferson wrote:

> That to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves and abhors is sinful and tyrannical.

Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas placed this principle in a contemporary setting in 1961 when he wrote and I quote:

> If dues are used or assessments are made to promote or oppose birth control, to repeal or increase taxes on cosmetics, promote or oppose the admission of Red China into the United Nations or the like, then the group compels an individual to support with his money causes beyond what gave rise to the need for group action.

Justice Douglas continues:

I think the same thing must be said when union dues or assessments are used to elect a Governor, a Congressman, a Senator or a President.

This committee, we believe, has an opportunity and, we suggest, a responsibility, to address itself to one of the most basic, albeit politically sensitive, needs in the whole spectrum of tax reform. That need, in our judgment, is to apply broadly and evenly the restrictions on political activity by tax-exempt organizations, including particularly those tax-exempt organizations which spend for political purposes funds collected from individuals as a condition of employment.

While officials of labor unions are the most notorious offenders in this connection, the practice is equally objectionable when carried on by any private organization.

The present bill recognizes this topic as germane to the tax reform issue but it touches only the remote edges of the problem.

Tax-exempt foundations whose political activity would be curtailed by this bill, at least use voluntary contributions to finance any politically oriented undertaking.

On the other hand, labor unions, whose open and undisguised politicking dwarfs that of all other tax-exempt organizations, finance their multimillion-dollar political education campaigns and highly selective voter registration drives largely with funds collected from individuals as a condition of employment.

Our tax laws, as presently written and interpreted, encourage this practice. Here is what the Internal Revenue Service told us in a letter dated September 26, 1966:

A labor organization does not lose its right to exemption under 501 because it engages in political activity.

Mr. Chairman, I request that the full text of that letter from the Internal Revenue and the letter to which it responded, be placed in the record.

Senator WILLIAMS. Your letter and your statement in its entirety, will be placed in the record.

Mr. LARSON. Thank you, sir.

I have some more in summarizing this, if I might run on through.

Senator WILLIAMS. If you will make it short.

Mr. LARSON. Some apologists for the union hierarchy have endeavored to maintain the fiction that all union spending for political activity is carried on with voluntarily contributed funds. This is patently untrue. The record of union activity, including admissions by many union officials, demonstrates conclusively that the backbone of union political activity is based on compulsory dues and fees.

I have here and have summarized in this statement, a wide assortment of authoritative articles and documents citing union officials' statements and other authoritative sources and will summarize a couple and will request, if I might, the full text——

Senator WILLIAMS. It will all be placed in the record if you can summarize it.

Mr. LARSON. To summarize the gist of these documents, Joe Rauh, attorney for the United Auto Workers, told the U.S. Supreme Court as far back as 1956, and I quote:

> The only funds available to the union are those that come from dues for the purpose of buying radio time, television time, and newspaper advertising. The small amount that has been collected as voluntary dollars has all gone as very small contributions to the candidates. When a union member pays his dues he has paid for this political action.

From the United Auto Workers counsel.

Justice Hugo Black of the U.S. Supreme Court wrote in 1961:

> There can be no doubt that the federally sanctioned union shop contract here, as it actually works, takes a part of the earnings of some men and turns it over to others who spend a substantial part of the funds so received in efforts to thwart the political, economic, and ideological aims of those whose money has been forced from them under authority of law.

From this record, and from the documents that I am providing, I think it is very clear that the spending by union officials of compulsory dues for politics is indeed astronomical.

In our judgment, this practice, whether carried on by chambers of commerce, a labor union, the National Right to Work Committee, or any other special interest group, threatens the underpinnings of representative government.

Contrary to a widely held misconception, there is no effective means of escape for the compulsory union member who objects to the use of his dues for politics. The idea that union members can successfully withhold their dues from politics is a snare and a delusion of the cruelest sort.

In the only two cases in which such a challenge was successfully made the employees involved spent more than 12 years in litigation at a cost hundreds of times the relief they obtained. And the court acceded to the pleas of union lawyers that the case be decided on a basis which would prevent its being applied as a general rule.

In fact, other cases of employees now making a similar challenge have dragged on for more than 2 years, and not even the first step toward granting relief has been made.

We believe a golden opportunity now confronts those Members of Congress who are interested in achieving genuine tax justice. Removing the special tax privileges of all private organizations using compulsory dues for any kind of political activity will gain the applause of overburdened taxpayers. It will also demonstrate the willingness of the Congress to deal equitably with a powerful special interest lobby.

This recognition is reflected in editorials which I have summarized here, letters, and it is growing throughout the country.

Senator Fannin's proposed amendment to H.R. 13270 represents a giant step in the right direction and merits your favorable consideration. It would deny tax exemption to unions which use compulsory dues for political partisan purposes. We support this proposal and we recommend that it be broadened to include not just labor unions but all private organizations. The principle is the same.

This committee has an unusual opportunity to strike a blow for the freedom of all Americans by applying to all tax-exempt organizations the same basic standards of conduct insofar as political activities are concerned. We urge that you amend the bill to achieve that end.

I thank you.

Senator FANNIN. Mr. Chairman, since he referred to my bill, could I just ask one question? Do you have knowledge of any tax-exempt organizations, other than labor unions, which are using compulsory dues or fees for political purposes?

Mr. LARSON. Well, there is growing evidence that this practice is occurring among affiliates of the National Education Association. In Michigan, teachers are being fired for their refusal to pay dues to locals of the NEA, and they, of course, engage, as many private organizations do, in some legislative and possibly politically oriented activities. I cite this only as one superficial evidence, and I would say it would need to be checked out more thoroughly.

Senator FANNIN. Is it your opinion that the staff manpower provided candidates by unions is more vital than the monetary contributions given candidates by unions?

Mr. LARSON. Yes, it certainly is. Union officials acknowledge this themselves, as I have cited in my documents.

Senator FANNIN. Are these available for the committee to check?

Mr. LARSON. Yes, they are. The committee reported expenses amounted to about $7,600,000, but that if we are to include the manpower expenses, the total will exceed $600 million.

Senator FANNIN. According to the very recent Wall Street Journal article quoted in your statement, voter registration drives sponsored by the AFL-CIO were formerly financed by voluntary donations to COPE, but are now underwritten with funds from the AFL-CIO's general treasury. Is there a ruling by the Internal Revenue Service which permits the practice of financing voter registration campaigns with money from a union's general treasury?

Mr. LARSON. There is no evidence to my knowledge that Internal Revenue Service places any restrictions whatsoever on spending general union funds on voter registration drives. I do know that a ruling sanctioning union political spending was issued by the IRS in 1966. We have asked recently for an updating. We received just a form letter in reply.

Senator FANNIN. Did the form letter state that it was still in effect?

Mr. LARSON. Yes.

Senator FANNIN. Your statement effectively documents the active participation of an army of salaried union personnel in partisan politics. Would you state how the salaries of these people are paid and from what source during political campaigns?

Mr. LARSON. According to the statements of union officials themselves (which are in the record) these salaries are paid from union general funds—made up mostly of compulsory dues and fees.

Senator FANNIN. I noticed in your statement that you said Japanese and Filipino merchant seamen would contribute, although not voluntarily, some of whom have never even voted in an election. Do you have documentation of that?

Mr. LARSON. I have the newspaper report.

Senator FANNIN. If you do have additional information, I would appreciate it if it could be furnished for the record. Any other information you would like to furnish at this time would be helpful.

Mr. LARSON. I might mention that as a trustee of a foundation myself, we certainly believe that foundations should be treated no differently from anyone else on the question of political spending. The same rule should apply to all.

Senator FANNIN. Thank you very much for your comments, Mr. Larson.

(Mr. Larson's prepared statement and attachments referred to follow:)

Senator Fannin's proposed amendment to H.R. 13270 represents a giant step in the right direction and merits your favorable consideration.

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I am Reed Larson, Executive Vice President of the National Right to Work Committee. Ours is a single-purpose citizens' organization devoted to the concept that no individual should be compelled to pay money to any private organization as a condition of employment.

Our appeal to the Committee is, we believe, in keeping with the spirit in which this broad review of tax legislation was undertaken—that is, to insure that all persons and organizations receive fair and even-handed justice under the tax law. We are not here to oppose any portion of H.R. 13270, or to ask for relief from its provisions for any group or segment of society.

We are, in fact, in complete accord with the Executive Council of the AFL–CIO in its Resolution calling on the Senate to "improve and strengthen" the tax reform provisions. That same body has pointed out the need to "guard against attempts by lobbyists to preserve and widen their special interest loopholes." It is difficult to believe they mean this since AFL–CIO officials themselves enjoy one of the most flagrant of all "special interest loopholes."

We agree strongly with the drafters of this bill in their recognition of the fact that a comprehensive drive for tax justice must seek not only to broaden the base of tax revenues, but also must reexamine the structure of tax exemption to insure that its serves the public interest and that it does not confer undue privileges upon any special-interest group. In that connection, the present bill endeavors to restrict certain tax-exemptions which tend to thwart or distort the true will of the electorate in choosing its governmental officials and policies. As you know, Section 101(b) of H.R. 13270 takes a step in this direction by limiting the political and lobbying activities of certain tax-exempt organizations. It imposes a heavy tax on any foundation, and on the manager of that foundation, which uses any of its funds "(1) to carry out propaganda or otherwise attempt to influence legislation, or (2) to influence the outcome of any public election including voter registration drives carried on by such foundation . . ."

The bill's drafters must be credited with exceptional insight for recognizing how supposedly nonpartisan voter registration drives may be transformed into highly effective partisan political operations. This fact has been confirmed by AFL-CIO president George Meany, whose organization probably spends more money for voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives than all other tax-exempt organizations combined.

Mr. Meany has observed:

"When you pay a candidate's bills you are not so sure where the money is going. When you make a donation to a candidate you can't be sure.

"But when you spend your money to get people registered, and then spend a lesser proportion to get them out to vote, you know you got a vote in the ballot box. Of course, we are a little bit choosy when we choose districts in which we want to better these votes in the ballot box, so that when they go in we have a pretty good idea how they are going to vote."

Due in a large measure to special-privilege loopholes in our tax laws, millions of Americans are today being denied basic civil rights and political freedom. They are compelled, in order to work at their jobs, to help finance political and ideological objectives with which they may strongly disagree.

Thomas Jefferson once wrote "that to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves and abhors is sinful and tyrannical."

Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas placed this principle in a contemporary setting when he wrote in 1961:

"The collection of dues for paying the costs of collective bargaining of which each member is a beneficiary is one thing. If, however, dues are used, or assessments are made, to promote or oppose birth control, to repeal or increase the taxes on cosmetics, to promote or oppose the admission of Red China into the United Nations, and the like, then the group compels an individual to support with his money causes beyond what gave rise to the need for group action.

"I think the same must be said when union dues or assessments are used to elect a Governor, a Congressman, a Senator, or a President. It may be said that the election of a Franklin D. Roosevelt rather than a Calvin Coolidge might be the best possible way to serve the cause of collective bargaining. But even such a selective use of union funds for political purposes subordinates the individual's First Amendment rights to the views of the majority. I do not see how that can be done, even though the objector retains his rights to campaign, to speak, to vote as he chooses. For when union funds are used for that purpose, the individual is required to finance political projects against which he may be in rebellion."

This Committee has an opportunity, and, we suggest, a responsibility to address itself to one of the most basic—albeit, most politically sensitive—needs in the whole spectrum of tax reform. That need, in our judgment, is to apply broadly and evenly the restrictions on political activities by tax-exempt organizations—including particularly those tax-exempt organizations which spend for political purposes funds collected from individuals as a condition of employment. While officials of labor unions are the most notorious offenders in this connection, the practice is equally objectionable when carried on by any private organization.

The present bill recognizes that this topic is germane to the tax reform issue, but it touches only the remote edges of the real problem. Tax-exempt foundations, whose political activities would be curtailed by this bill, at least use voluntary contributions to finance any politically-oriented undertakings. On the other hand, labor unions, whose open and undisguised politicking dwarfs that of all other tax-exempt organizations, finance their multi-million dollar political "education" campaigns and highly-selective voter registration drives largely with funds collected from individuals as a condition of employment.

Our tax laws, as presently written and interpreted, encourage this practice. Here's what the International Revenue Service told us in a letter dated September 28, 1966: "Although certain sections of 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code and their implementing regulations contain various definitions, limitations and prohibitions relative to political and legislative activities, there is no such proscription with respect to a labor organization otherwise qualifying for exemption from federal income tax under section 501(c)(5) . . . As a matter of law, a labor organization does not lose its right to exemption under Section 501 because it engages in political activity . . ." Mr. Chairman, I request that the full text of this letter and the letter to which it responded be placed in the record.

Some apologists for the union hierarchy have endeavored to maintain the fiction that all union spending for political activities is carried on with voluntarily-contributed funds. This is patently untrue. The record of union political activity, including admissions by many union officials, demonstrates conclusively that the backbone of union political activity is based on compulsory dues and fees.

I have here a wide assortment of authoritative articles and documents which I will summarize as briefly as possible and then request that the full texts be placed in the hearing record.

As far back as 1956 Mr. Joe Rauh, attorney for the United Auto Workers, told the U.S. Supreme Court that "The only funds available to the union are those that come from dues, for the purpose of buying radio time, television time, and newspaper advertising. The small amount that has been collected as voluntary dollars has all gone as very small contributions to the candidates . . . when he (a union member) pays his dues, he has paid for his political action."

Spokesmen for fifteen labor unions who were defendants in the lawsuit filed in 1953 (International Association of Machinists et al v. Street, et al, 367 U.S. 74 (1961)) admitted using compulsory union dues "to support ideological and political doctrines and candidates which plaintiffs . . . were, are and will be opposed to and not willing to support voluntarily." The plaintiffs were employees who objected to the use of their forced dues for political purposes.

Justice Hugo Black of the U.S. Supreme Court wrote in 1961: "There can be no doubt that the federally-sanctioned union shop contract here, as it actually works, takes a part of the earnings of some men and turns it over to others who spend a substantial part of the funds so-received in efforts to thwart the political, economical and ideological aims of those whose money has been forced from them under authority of law."

The late Senator Dirksen, revered member of this Senate Committee, dealt with the subject at some length in an article published three years ago by the DePaul University Law Review: "It is well known to everyone that American unions have for the past many years been highly active in politics and have played a very important role in election campaigns of members of Congress, of state legislators, state officials, and local city and county officials. The union chiefs make no apologies for this, but rather assert that it is their right to make sure that those elected to public office are sympathetic towards the aims and purposes of labor unions. Large armies of union staff personnel are assigned to work in political campaigns at the precinct level in getting out the vote for "union-endorsed candidates; union newspapers and other publications are heavily devoted to promoting favored candidates, and union funds derived from membership dues and fees are liberally distributed to such candidates.

"Where does this leave the individual worker who is required under a compulsory unionism agreement to pay his dues and fees into the union as a necessary condition to holding his job?"

The official magazine of the AFL-CIO for January 1968 reported on that organization's convention held a month before: "The Convention called for top priority for political action . . . All unions are urged to assign as many full-time staff members as possible for full-time political education work as early as possible in 1968 . . ."

On November 11, 1968, U.S. News & World Report stated: "Organized labor reported that it spent more than ever before—in money and effort—in the drive to elect Hubert Humphrey and save as many pro-union votes as possible in Congress . . . the reports to Congress, however, do not reveal the true extent of the labor campaign. Politicians say the manpower provided by unions is a big asset, going mainly to Democratic candidates."

A long-time union official, Sidney Lens, wrote in the Commonweal magazine May 27, 1966: "Around election time, labor mobilized thousands of workers from the shops as well as many full-time organizers. The offices of the auto union, perhaps the most active of all politically, become depopulated by as much as one-half of the regular staff, all working the hustings for union-endorsed candidates . . . On the first Tuesday in November innumerable union men, paid from the union treasury, can be seen driving voters to and from the polling booths, acting as watchers to assure an honest count, and calling on 'sure' voters who have not yet cast a ballot."

Authoritative labor columnist Victor Riesel, in a column printed November 11, 1968: "But all this ($7,600,000 in officially reported campaign spending) is petty cash when compared with the local spending from the kick-off, massive Labor Day Parade up Fifth Avenue to the last-minute caravans and get-out-the-vote telephone squads. There were hundreds of radio and television broadcasts. Mr. Labor, himself, George Meany, hit a network of some 330 stations five times. The Ladies Garment Workers put on four national broadcasts . . . America's labor leaders poured out well over $60 million for Hubert H. Humphrey."

An AFL–CIO spokesman said that raising money for favored candidates is not the federation's primary political function, according to a Daily Labor Report article published on October 29, 1964, by the Bureau of National Affairs. " 'Skills and manpower are what labor has to contribute,' says its spokesman."

In his nationally-syndicated column of May 17, 1968, David Lawrence observed: "It is possible in America for a labor organization with a vested interest in legislation to spend a huge sum of money to bring about the defeat of a Member of Congress even though the Federal Corrupt Practices Act bars any corporation or labor organization from contributing 'anything of value' to a federal election, including primaries. Frank J. Lausche . . . was defeated in a Democratic primary for a third term a few days ago by the expenditure of a large sum of money collected in part from dues of labor union members."

"A labor union has shown how to hand $100,000 to Presidential-campaign committees and avoid a law limiting donations to $5,000," U.S. News & World Report disclosed in its issue of August 5, 1968. "This lesson in practical politics was given by the Seafarers Union with the money starting to flow to Democratic groups shortly after Secretary of State Dean Rusk declined to extradite a former official of the union . . . Union spokesmen said the money came from members as voluntary contributions for political purposes—not from regular union dues."

Methods used by the Seafarers Union to obtain "voluntary" contributions for political purposes were questioned by a comprehensive article in the January 3, 1969, edition of the Wall Street Journal. It reported: "The most ardent opponents of Richard Nixon's incoming Administration apparently are some Japanese and Filipino merchant seamen who have never even voted in an American election. That, at any rate, is the case if dollar donations to election campaigns are a reliable guide to political convictions. For, month after month, these sailors have been contributing as much as a third of their wages to American political candidates, mostly Democrats. The sailors, hundreds and perhaps thousands of them, have given as much as $500 each after a single sea voyage . . . Ostensibly, the money comes in the form of voluntary donations . . . In reality, though, much of the union's contributions represent payments accepted—or exacted—from alien seamen who work on high-paying U.S. flag ships bound for Vietnam. Most of these seamen are not even members of the union, which distributes the collected cash to favored political candidates."

In a column headlined "Unions' Wallace Line Out of Line," Washington Star writer Frank Getlein wrote on September 4, 1968: ". . . in theory, if the members of a union want to support George Wallace, what the leadership ought to be doing is either finding ways to help the members in this political desire or else resigning and going to work for people more in tune with their own feelings . . . When you get right down to it, people don't join labor unions to get their brains washed by their elected leaders on questions with only a remote connection to the conditions and wages of their employment."

According to the September 5, 1968, edition of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, "A Cape Girardeau steamfitter told a federal court jury here today that he was 'laid off without reason' in 1963 several days after he refused to make increased contributions to the voluntary political fund of Steamfitters Local 562 . . .(William W.) Copeland was the first witness today in the trial against Local 562 and three of its top officers who allegedly made illegal political contributions through their so-called voluntary political fund."

Four days later the same newspaper reported that another steamfitter "told a jury today that he had signed political fund pledge cards when working on jobs under the jurisdiction of Steamfitters Local 562 because 'I knew I had to sign them or I wouldn't work.' Norman Baker . . . was the first Government witness called today at the trial of Lawrence L. Callanan, business manager of Local 562, and two assistants. They are facing charges of illegally contributing $140,800 to political candidates and campaign organizations."

At the conclusion of the Callanan trial, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat editorialized on September 20, 1968, as follows: "Conviction of Steamfitters Local 562 and three of its top officers on the charge of conspiring "to violate federal election laws brings nearer a successful close to a long, hard fight by The Globe-

Democrat to bring these men to justice . . . While it is a vindication of The Globe's efforts, this conviction is a greater victory for the people. It represents the first time that any union has been convicted for this offense. The impact of this verdict will undoubtedly be felt nationwide and could result in a federal crackdown on other unions circumventing the law."

On September 19, 1968, the Wall Street Journal revealed that "the chieftains of organized labor are about to launch a massive rescue operation designed to save the foundering Presidential campaign ship of their candidate, Vice President Hubert Humphrey . . . participants in the huddles here say the 15-state battle plan envisions putting 'hundreds' of union staff men to work full-time on the Humphrey drive. They report that Mr. Meany has released the entire AFL-CIO organizing staff, totaling around 100 men, to work steadily on recruiting voters for Mr. Humphrey rather than new members for unions. In addition, individual unions are being asked to assign squads of their staff members to the drive."

In its October 2, 1968, issue, the Wall Street Journal characterized "the AFL-CIO's use of hundreds of paid union staffers to aid Mr. Humphrey's campaign" as "a move that is, at best, in the gray area of legality."

"Many of the political activities of labor and management, conservatives and liberals, border on illegality," according to an article published by the Los Angeles Times on October 21, 1968. With reference to the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, it quoted a Washington lobbyist for the UAW as follows:

"This law makes us all terrible fakers. The amount of chicanery being used on all sides to help candidates is becoming a tragic situation."

The same article attributed this statement to AFL-CIO publicity director Al Zack: "Sure, the AFL-CIO News, our official publication, runs pro-Humphrey stories, not pro-Nixon or pro-Wallace ones. But the giant, conservative daily newspapers around the country have been doing just that for years, and still do." (For reasons that are readily understandable, Mr. Zack did not add that American workers are not compelled to subscribe to certain newspapers as a condition of earning their livelihood.)

The Daily Oklahoman reported on October 30, 1968, that "Richard Nixon's Oklahoma campaign organization accused the AFL-CIO Tuesday of using dues of union members to campaign for Democratic presidential nominee Hubert H. Humphrey . . . 'This misuse of funds is in direct violation of the regulations that give the AFL-CIO tax-exempt status and it violates the moral obligation of the organization to its members who are not for Mr. Humphrey,' Broaddus (the Nixon spokesman) said."

On June 10, 1969, Victor Riesel wrote about the 1968 political operation of the United Auto Workers. "Virtually all of the union's $2.1 million 'Citizenship Fund' went for political stakes in the '68 race," he reported. "This does not include the pay and expenses for 916 national headquarters field men known as 'International Representatives.' In the final months of the campaign, virtually all of these men spent virtually all their time campaigning against the Republican front runner. On the cost line, as the accountants say, this would come to many millions of dollars."

"AFL-CIO president George Meany—worried about prospects for Senate and House liberals in the 1970 elections—already is gearing organized labor for a mighty political effort next year," the Chicago Daily News Service disclosed on September 1, 1969. "He praised the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) and its director, Al Barkan, for running 'one of the best political machines ever put together.' In a backward glance at the 1968 campaign, Meany aired one of his rare public criticisms of the Democrats. 'Even though the party of our presidential candidate, the Democratic Party, was woefully ineffective and torn asunder by internal strife, the fact that Hubert Humphrey came close is to the credit of COPE, not to the party whose label he carried,' the labor leader said."

Last Friday (October 3, 1969), the Wall Street Journal reported the AFL-CIO "has also begun to conduct annual rather than biennial voter registration drives, financing them from its general treasury; in the past, COPE had to depend on voluntary union contributions for such work . . . Labor politicians say that Mr. Meany, who once doubted the need for an organization such as COPE, has never been more responsive to their needs. In fact, it was Mr. Meany who proposed in February that registration drives be financed out of the AFL-CIO treasury and conducted on a continuing basis whenever and wherever registration books are open."

From this record, I believe it is clear that the spending by union officials of compulsory dues money for politics is, indeed, astronomical. In our judgement, this practice, whether carried on by a Chamber of Commerce, a labor union, or any other special-interest group, threatens the underpinnings of representative government. Sixty-three years ago, Samuel Gompers, founder of the AFL, recognized this danger when he said: "It is doubtful to my mind if the contributions and expenditures of vast sums of money in the nominations and elections for our public offices can continue to increase without endangering the endurance of our Republic in its purity and in its essence . . . the necessity for some law upon the subject is patent to every man who hopes for the maintenance of the institutions under which we live . . ."

Contrary to a widely-held misconception, there is no effective means of escape for the compulsory union member who objects to the use of his dues for politics. The idea that union members can successfully withhold their dues from politics is a snare and a delusion of the cruelest sort.

In the only two cases where such a challenge was successfully made, the employees involved spent more than twelve years in litigation at a cost hundreds of times the relief they obtained. And the court acceded to the pleas of union lawyers that the case be decided on a basis which would prevent its being applied as a general rule. In fact, the cases of other groups of employees now making a similar challenge have dragged on for more than two years, and not even the first step toward relief for the aggrieved employees has been made.

The high-handed arrogance of union officials operating under their special tax-exempt shelter was reflected in a recent incident reported in the Philadelphia Inquirer, Thursday, November 7, 1968: "A group of 104 employes at Leeds & Northrup's North Wales plant have asked for a refund of dues paid to the United Auto Workers which were used for political campaign promotion.

"All members of UAW Local 1350, the workers sent individual letters to local president Arthur Stump stating their demands.

"Stump told The Inquirer that he reacted in direct fashion.

"'When I got the letters, I threw them all in the wastebasket,' he said."

A golden opportunity now confronts those Members of Congress who are interested in achieving genuine tax justice. Removing the special tax privileges of all private organizations using compulsory dues for any kind of political activity will gain the applause of overburdened taxpayers. It will also demonstrate the willingness of the Congress to deal equitably with a powerful special interest lobby.

The growing public recognition for the need of action in this area is reflected on the editorial pages of hundreds of newspapers across the country. For your interest here are highlights of what a few of them have been saying in recent weeks:

The Chicago Tribune on September 8: "One trouble with trying to eliminate tax loopholes is that the people who holler loudest about loopholes available to others are often trying to divert attention from even bigger loopholes of their own . . . in short, tax reform is for others—not for the unions."

Wheeling Intelligencer on September 15: "What is hard to understand is why the House has seen fit to tax this type of income if it goes to a church but not if it goes to a labor union."

The Milwaukee (Wisc.) Journal, on July 8: "The tax reformers should show no fear or favoritism. They should close the loophole on labor organizations which have investments in a wide variety of unrelated business activities "as surely as on churches and any other tax-exempt organizations."

Jacksonville (Fla.) Times Union on September 18: "What's good for tax-exempt foundations and commercial interests of churches should be good for labor unions."

Lancaster (Pa.) New Era, on September 8: "The Senate should most certainly consider taxing private organizations that use compulsory dues for political purposes."

The Daily Oklahoman on August 30: "No justification exists for the taxation of the charitable foundations when the unrelated business activities of the not-so-charitable union bosses continue to be the most noxious tax haven in sight."

The St. Louis Globe Democrat on August 28: "Certainly Congress has an obligation to see that unions neither abuse their members' funds, nor enjoy special benefits from the use of them at the expense of taxpayers . . . And organized labor, which prides itself on being a watchdog against social ills, should volunteer its help in bringing about equitable tax reforms for all—including unions."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch on September 1: "Congress has an obligation to insure that the funds of union members are not used for political or other purposes without their approval, and to see that unions do not enjoy other special privileges at the expense of the tax payer."

And finally, the New York Daily News said on August 30:

"It is beyond argument, we believe, that political activities of some foundations should cause those outfits to lose some or all tax-exempt status. Nonreligious enterprises of some religious organizations could with justice be taxed . . . So how about labor unions whose leaders habitually (1) take compulsory dues out of their members, and (2) spend large wads of the dough for political purposes—backing favored candidates, financing lobbies, etc.?

Senator Fannin's proposed amendment to H.R. 13270 represents a giant step in the right direction and merits your favorable consideration. It would deny tax exemptions to unions which use compulsory dues for political purposes. We support this proposal, and recommend that it be broadened to include not just labor unions, but all private organizations. This Committee has an unusual opportunity to strike a blow for the freedom of all Americans by applying to all tax-exempt organizations the same basic standards of conduct insofar as political activities are concerned.

We urge that you amend the bill to achieve that end.

NATIONAL RIGHT TO WORK COMMITTEE,
Washington, D.C., September 2, 1966.

Hon. SHELDON COHEN,
Commissioner, Internal Revenue Service,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. COHEN: As you know, for the past ten months the National Right To Work Committee has been the subject of an intensive investigation by the Internal Revenue Service for the purpose of determining whether the Committee is entitled to retain its tax exemption status under section 501(c)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Duing the course of this investigation your representatives have made an intensive effort to find some evidence of political activity on the part of the National Right To Work Committee. They have quite frankly advised us that this is what they are looking for, and in this connection they have scrutinized all of our expenditures for printed material, staff travel, legal services, and membership promotion, have asked for a breakdown of the activities of staff personnel particularly during the period preceding the 1964 national elections and even subpoened the books of those printers who have done business with us. We have been expressly told by your representatives that if they turned up any evidence of political expenditures or political activities by our staff on paid time our exemption could be cancelled.

We are, of course, well aware that as an exempt organization we cannot engage in any political action, and we have scrupulously avoided any involvement in politics or political activities. The only purpose of the National Right To Work Committee is to promote the principle of voluntary unionism. By reason of this we have incurred the enmity of union officials who have publicly expressed their intent to bury us by one means or another.

This brings us to the point of this letter. Are not labor unions, as tax exempt organizations under section 501(c)(5), subject to the same restrictions on political activities as the National Right To Work Committee and other exempt organizations? And, if this is so, why is it that labor unions can openly and flagrantly use the monies collected from membership due to make contributions to political candidates, and assign their staff personnel to electioneering activities on behalf of union-endorsed candidates? That they do all of these things on a large scale is, of course, well known and well documented. Just by way of example, in International Association of Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. 740 (1961), the defendant unions stipulated that the dues monies collected from their members under compulsory union shop agreements were "used in substantial amounts to support the political campaigns of candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, and for the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States . . . and candidates for state and local offices." 367 U.S. 740, 745, footnote 2. In May of this year the newspapers in Washington reported a public announcement by Charles Dalla, president of the Maryland-

District of Columbia AFL-CIO, that that organization would contribute the sum of $200,000 to support the campaign of Carlton Sickles for Governor of Maryland. Enclosed is an article written for the May 1966 issue of Commonweal magazine by Sidney Lens, a long-time union staff official, which points out, among other things, that the United Auto Workers Union recently donated $30,000 to the campaign of Senator Paul Douglas of Illinois. The article goes on to point out:

"Equally important is manpower. Around election time labor mobilized thousands of workers from the shops as well as many full-time organizers. The offices of the auto union, perhaps the most active of all politically, become depopulated by as much as one-half of the regular staff, all working the hustings for union-endorsed candidates. These are men, it should be noted, with considerable organizational talent, usually far above the caliber of ordinary Democrats. . . . Union-leased autos, painted over with the names of union-endorsed aspirants, plastered with signs, participate in parades and make tours with loudspeakers blaring their message. In small towns especially, such as Peoria, Illinois or Muncie, Indiana, big unions like steel or auto can mobilize thousands of members to fill a meeting hall or listen to an open-air speech. On the first Tuesday in November innumerable union men, paid from the union treasury, can be seen driving voters to and from the polling booths, acting as watchers to assure an honest count, and calling on 'sure' voters who have not yet cast a ballot. Thus by concentrating on marginal areas, by doling out $1,000 to $5,000 for Congressional hopefuls who need just a little push to put them over, labor can make an important contribution."

Also enclosed is a recent article by one of the well known labor columnists, Victor Riesel who points out that the AFL-CIO has assessed its 13.7 million members at a nickel a head for a special election fund of $850,000 to be spent for campaign activities in this year's national elections.

Since the Internal Revenue Service insists that the National Right To Work Committee must strictly observe the rule against political activity, and since the flagrant political activities of labor unions are largely ignored, it would seem that a double standard is applied under the Internal Revenue Code. As the public becomes more and more aware of this selective enforcement of the law the effect can only be to break down respect for the law, a trend which seems to be rapidly undermining the foundations of orderly society.

We feel that you can quickly restore public confidence in the integrity of the Internal Revenue Service by issuing directives to your agents and offices throughout the country to undertake a sweeping investigation of the political activities of organized labor in this year's state and national elections, and revoke the tax exemption status of any union that engages in such political activities.

Very truly yours,

REED E. LARSON,
Executive Vice President.

U.S. TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., September 28, 1966.

MR. REED E. LARSON,
National Right to Work Committee,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LARSON: Thank you for your letter of September 2, 1966, with attachment, concerning the political activity of labor unions.

You asked whether labor unions, as tax-exempt organizations under section 501(c)(5), are subject to the same restrictions on political activities as other exempt organizations. Although certain sections of 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code and their implementing regulations contain various definitions, limitations, and prohibitions relative to political and legislative activities, there is no such proscription with respect to a labor organization otherwise qualifying for exemption from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(5).

The qualifying character of a labor organization, as the term is used in section 501(c)(5), is that it has as its principal purpose the representation of employees in such matters as wages, hours of labor, working conditions and economic benefits, and the general fostering of matters affecting the working conditions of its members. As a matter of law, a labor organization does not lose its right to exemption under section 501 because it engages in political activities, unless by reason of the organization's improper activities it can be established that the organization is not sufficiently engaged in the union or labor activity to be characterized as a labor organization in the sense that that term is used in section 501(c)(5).

As you may know, contributors to labor organizations are not entitled to a charitable deduction; however, under certain conditions payments may qualify as a business expense under section 162. With respect to the deductibility of dues paid to a labor union or trade association as a business expense, the Revenue Act of 1962 amended section 162 by adding a new subsection (e) which provides for the deduction of ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1962, for certain activities directly connected with legislation or proposed legislation of direct interest to the taxpayer. In no event shall a deduction be allowed for that portion of a special assessment or similar payment (including an increase in dues) made to any organization for any activity which does not constitute an appearance or communication with respect to legislation or proposed legislation of direct interest to the organization.

We appreciate your concern in this matter and want to further assure you that the Service is primarily interested in applying the internal revenue laws fairly and uniformly in all cases. We do everything we can to administer the applicable law and regulations without regard to the political leanings of any taxpayer or organization.

We trust this information will be helpful for your purposes.

Sincerely yours,

Director, Audit Division.

U.S. TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., October 10, 1966

Mr. F. R. DICKERSON, President, Roper Industries, Inc.
Commerce, Ga.

DEAR MR. DICKERSON: Thank you for your letter of September 6, 1966, concerning the political activities of organized labor and the tax-exempt status of the National Right to Work Committee and the Sierra Club.

The records of the National Office disclose that the National Right to Work Committee has qualified for tax-exempt status under section 501(c)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code, while the Sierra Club is exempt under section 501(c)(3), and labor unions frequently qualify under section 501(c)(5).

The Internal Revenue Service maintains a program of periodic audit and review of the operations of tax-exempt organizations. If it is determined as a result of the audit program that any tax-exempt organization is engaged in activities to an extent proscribed by that section of Code under which it has been held exempt, we will take appropriate action to revoke or modify our prior ruling. This is a factual question in each case, and the Service must examine all of the operations for the years involved.

You expressed concern regarding the possible nonuniform application of restrictions on political activities for various tax-exempt organizations. It should be noted that although certain sections of 501(c) of the Code and their implementing regulations contain various limitations and prohibitions relative to political and legislative activities, there is no such proscription with respect to a labor organization otherwise qualifying for exemption from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(5).

The qualifying character of a labor organization, as the term is used in section 501(c)(5), is that it has as its principal purpose the representation of employees in such matters as wages, hours of labor, economic benefits, and the general fostering of matters affecting the working conditions of its members. As a matter of law, a labor organization does not lose its rights to exemption under section 501 because it engages in political activities, unless by reason of the organization's improper activities it can be established that the organization is not sufficiently engaged in the union or labor activity to be characterized as a labor organization in the sense the term is used in section 501(c)(5).

As you may know, it is the responsibility of the Service to administer the Federal income tax laws enacted by Congress as efficiently and impartially as possible. We have no power to amend the laws or to act contrary to their provisions. Your concern in this matter is appreciated and we want to further assure you that the Service is interested in applying the internal revenue laws fairly and uniformly in all cases. We do everything we can to administer the applicable regulations without regard to the political leanings of any taxpayer or organization.

We trust this information will be helpful in explaining the varying limitations of organization qualifying for tax-exempt status under different sections in the Code.

Sincerely yours,

FORREST P. NEAL,
Chief, Technical Coordination Branch.

LABOR WEEK: UNION SPENDING ON CAMPAIGN SETS A NEW RECORD

(NOTE.—As the campaign drew to a close, spending by organized labor hit the 4-million-dollar mark. Never before had unions spent so much in a single election. Prounion candidates for Congress got the bulk of the funds, more even than Humphrey.)

Organized labor reported it spent more than ever before—in money and effort—in the drive to elect Hubert Humphrey and save as many prounion votes as possible in Congress.

By late October, a check of reports filed with Congress showed that more than 3.5 million dollars had been spent by unions on the 1968 campaign.

When the final reports are in, the total is expected to run well above 4 million dollars. Some went to help Mr. Humphrey, but, as in the past, most was in contributions to candidates for the Senate and House.

In the 1964 campaign, labor organizations reported expenditure of more than 3.8 millions, according to a compilation by "The Congressional Quarterly." The "Quarterly" also said that union spending ran to nearly 2.5 millions in 1960; 1.8 millions in 1956; and 2 millions in 1952—as reported to Congress.

The reports to Congress, however, do not reveal the true extent of the labor campaign. Politicians say the manpower provided by unions is a big asset, going mainly to Democratic candidates.

Volunteers from labor organizations help in many ways, such as passing out leaflets, taking voters to the polls, telephoning to get out the vote.

"Education" funds.—The financial statements required by law also do not reveal union expenditures for so-called "educational" programs, which legally can be paid for with members' due money. The AFL-CIO alone, for example, expected to spend about 1 million dollars this year in political education.

Part of this money went for more than 55 million leaflets distributed to union homes—attacking Richard Nixon and George Wallace while praising the Humphrey record on labor issues. Unions had to put on an extra drive this time because many members defected to Mr. Wallace early in the campaign.

More than 1.2 million persons were added to voting lists through AFL-CIO efforts, financed by union funds.

The campaign contributions for candidates, however, are supposed to come from special funds made up of voluntary donations by union members.

Each labor group is required to report to Congress on such voluntary funds, and their distribution.

What one union spent.—One of the big surprises of this year's campaign was the large size of the contributions made to candidates by the Seafarers Union. With some 85,000 members, it is one of the smaller affiliates of the AFL-CIO.

Two "voluntary" funds set up by the Seafarers reported political expenditures totaling $536,814 through August "for federal and nonfederal elections." That was nearly four times as much as the same union reported for 1964's campaign.

The national AFL-CIO, led by George Meany, told Congress it spent $1,013,470 through October 23 from its voluntary fund.

This indicated that another million dollars was expended by area branches of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education, or COPE. Half of the money members gave to COPE was to be kept in the local areas for campaigns there.

Other labor expenditures listed in the official reports included $253,599 by the Machinists, $197,817 by the Steelworkers, $128,290 by the Trainmen, $104,- 555 by the Auto Workers, $99,049 by the Carpenters, $75,057 by the Laborers, $63,045 by the Building and Construction Trades Department, $48,816 by the Brotherhood of Electric Workers, and $26,657 by the Painters.

In each case, the figures were those reported spent by the voluntary funds. Any dues money used for "educational" efforts would not be included.

Where the money went.—Most of the donations went to campaign committees in races for the Senate and House, although AFL-CIO spent part of its money on radio broadcasts backing the Democratic presidential ticket. One contribution of $5,000 to a Humphrey committee was reported by AFL-CIO.

The Seafarer reports, covering the period up to August 31, showed contributions totaling $114,000 to various Democratic committees and $21,000 to Republican groups.

The $114,000 given to Democratic committees included $95,000 in donations of $5,000 each—the legal limit—to 19 different committees backing the presidential ticket. There also was $5,000 to the Democratic National Committee and $14,000 to the Democratic campaign committees of the Senate and House.

For the Republican groups the total came to $20,000—$15,000 to congressional-campaign funds and $5,000 to the Republican Campaign Committee.

In addition to money going to congressional candidates through their Senate and House committees, the Seafarer funds listed payments of $1,000 or more for six senatorial candidates and for 49 House members and five new candidates for House seats. Dozens of other nominees got smaller amounts. Most of those on the long lists were Democrats, although 10 House Republicans received checks of $1,000 or more.

One of the larger donations went to committees backing Representative Emanuel Celler (Dem.), of New York, chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Seafarer reports showed payment of printing bills totaling $5,096 plus a donation of $2,000.

The chairman of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee—Edward A. Garmatz (Dem.), of Maryland received $3,500 for his campaign.

Among Seafarer donations to senatorial candidates were: $7,500 for Democrat Allen Cranston, in California; $7,000 for Senator Daniel B. Brewster, Maryland Democrat; and $5,000 for Democrat John J. Gilligan, in Ohio.

Few details on candidates backed from cash were visible in the reports filed by AFL-CIO's COPE. Listings showed mainly money sent from the national fund to State COPE funds, which in turn shifted it to candidates' committees. * * *

Special interest was indicated by COPE through the larger amounts handed over to State groups, such as $63,000 to Texas, $29,000 to Ohio, $30,000 to California, and $23,000 each to New York and Michigan committees.

Extra effort.—Reports filed by individual unions gave some indication of extra labor effort in certain senatorial races.

The Gilligan campaign in Ohio, as an example, got $10,000 from the United Auto Workers and $5,000 from the Steelworkers. Also, some COPE money went to Mr. Gilligan; who defeated veteran Senator Frank J. Lausche in the Democratic primary with heavy union support.

For the final election, Mr. Gilligan faced Republican William B. Saxbe.

Another hard-fought race was in Oregon, where union leaders sought to keep Senator Wayne Morse in office. He will be the chairman of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee if re-elected over Republican Robert W. Packwood.

Mr. Morse survived a bitter contest in the primary, although the Machinists Union fought him. For the November test, however, the Machinists switched to support him, even with money. The Auto Workers gave $2,500 to the Morse drive; the Steelworkers, $1,000.

In the California battle, union help for Democrat Cranston included $6,500 from the Machinists and $5,000 from the Auto Workers. Other unions also aided the Cranston effort against Max Rafferty, the Republican nominee, and Paul Jacobs, nominee of the Peace and Freedom Party. The three were seeking the seat of Senator Thomas H. Kuchel, who lost out in the Republican primary.

Labor also was working hard for Democratic Senator Joseph S. Clark in Pennsylvania. The UAW gave $4,500. The Steelworkers reported $9,800 of its voluntary funds went to Clark committees.

Various other Democratic Senators got financial aid for their campaigns, including Warren G. Magnuson, Washington; Birch Bayh, Indiana; and Abraham A. Ribicoff, Connecticut.

On the Republican side, Senator Jacob K. Javits, of New York, was aided by various unions.

In most of the Senate and House races, it was the Democratic nominee who had the support of organized labor.

The House elections were viewed as extremely important by union officials this year, because they feared heavy losses there among their supporters.

The unions were confident that a majority of Senators would back most labor bills in the next Congress.

The labor effort in the House races was to hold the losses to a minimum. To accomplish that, organized labor was willing to spend its millions.

LABOR AND POLITICS: THREAT TO THE DEMOCRATS

(By Sidney Lens)

There were some raised eyebrows not too long ago when George Meany laid down the gauntlet to the Democratic Party. "I don't buy the idea," said the AFL–CIO President, "and there is nothing in the record to sustain the idea that labor needs the Democratic Party. I am sure it is the other way around."

Could it be that Meany was prepared to sunder an alliance that had survived through thick and thin for three decades—especially now that Great Society reforms were running off the Congressional assembly line at a greater pace than at any time since the New Deal? Was he threatening to reduce labor's participation in politics, back to where it was, say, in Sam Gompers' or William Green's time? Did he have a labor party in mind? Or was he just speaking out of pique?

The element of pique was certainly obvious—and justified. Congress, for the second time around, was rebuffing labor on Section 14(b). The repeal of this portion of the Taft-Hartley law, which would have legalized the union shop in 19 states where it is now outlawed, was only a small payment to expect from the Democratic administration. But Mr. Johnson has failed to deliver. The suggested guidelines of 3.2 percent maximum wage increase proposed by the President and his Council of Economic Advisers also rankled Meany, and above all his friends in the building trades. Furthermore, with the war in Vietnam diverting Congressional and Executive thinking from domestic reforms, proposals for improving the minimum wage laws and unemployment compensation, seemed to be evoking less than robust enthusiasm. Efforts by Secretary of Labor Willard Wirtz and other Administration stalwarts to twist labor's arm on these matters did not sit well with Meany. His outburst therefore was an understandable reflex action, and though it exaggerated labor's importance in the alliance with the Democratic Party, was not wholly without substance.

But is pique was a factor, Meany's ploy also was a calculated move. Assuming its present policies, labor's leadership, admittedly, had no place else to go. Meany himself made it categorically clear that he entertained no farout notions about building a labor party, as in England or elsewhere in Europe. Nor was there much prospect of a modus vivendi with the Republicans, as was once practiced by John L. Lewis or the elder Hutcheson of the Carpenters' Union—if for no other reason than the paucity of liberals in the Grand Old Party.

But there was room for a better deal between the partners, and Meany was intent on squeezing what he could from his Democratic Party allies. He is not naive enough to believe, as do some unreconstructed rightists, that the AFL–CIO can deliver the vote of thirteen million workers and their wives on a gilt-edge platter. He knows the limitations of his organization. But he is also aware of the increased bargaining power he enjoys in this mid-term election. In this sense Johnson and the Democrats need labor more than vice versa.

The Administration is certainly bound for trouble come November; only a bumbling Republican leadership can save it from a severe rebuff. In addition to the normal losses for the ruling party in off-year voting, which over the last sixty years has averaged thirty-seven seats in the House and five in the Senate, there is the pervasive anxiety over Vietnam. Gallup poll or no, this is a most unpopular war, and the inflation and contemplated tax increases that go with it make it even more so. Though President Johnson has enjoyed clear sailing on most of his program, some of his victories (on the rent subsidy, for instance) have been razor thin. There are 51 first-term liberals in the House whose tenure can be cut short by a small shift of two or three percent in the electorate. Trouble looms in the Senatorial race in Michigan; a four-tenths of one percent change in Montana would retire Senate Lee Metcalf and a seven-tenths of one percent shift on Oklahoma would have the same effect on Senator Fred Harris. Four or five other incumbent Democratic Senators are fishing in turbulent waters.

It is with this in mind that labor's role becomes significant. In many marginal districts, union efforts, though far from overpowering, nevertheless represent the difference between defeat and victory. AFL–CIO's COPE raises $800,000 or $900,000 in dollar contributions from individual members, which are then dispensed around the country where needed. In addition various international unions have their own "free funds" to distribute; the auto union, for instance, recently donated $30,000 to the campaign of Senator Paul Douglas of Illinois. Here and there a labor organization finds its way around the strictures of the Taft-Hartley law, which prohibits direct contributions to federal campaigns from the union's own treasury, by making a gift to a local candidate with the quiet understanding that he himself will pass some of the funds on to Congressional or Senatorial aspirants. A million or two million dollars can make a difference if it its spent wisely in close races.

Equally important is manpower. Around election time labor mobilizes thousands of workers from the shops as well as many full-time organizers. The offices of the auto union, perhaps the most active of all politically, become depopulated by as much as one-half of the regular staff, all working the hustings, for union-endorsed candidates. These are men, it should be noted, with considerable organizational talent, usually far above the caliber of ordinary Democrats. In the central offices of COPE the lists of perhaps half the local unions in town are broken down by ward and precinct so that they can be polled by the activists and enrolled in the cause. A special effort is made to get union men to register, on the theory that workers are more apt to disregard their function as voters than members of the middle-class, and this can sometimes be a major factor in the election itself. Union-leased autos, painted over with the names of union-endorsed aspirants, plastered with signs, participate in parades and make tours with loudspeakers blaring their message. In small towns especially, such as Peoria, Illinois or Muncie, Indiana, big unions like steel or auto can mobilize thousands of members to fill a meeting hall or listen to an open-air speech. On the first Tuesday in November innumerable union men, paid from the union treasury, can be seen driving voters to and from the polling booths, acting as watchers to assure an honest count, and calling on "sure" voters who have not yet cast a ballot. Thus by concentrating on marginal areas, by doling out $1,000 to $5,000 for Congressional hopefuls who need just a little push to put them over, labor can make an important contribution.

SOLID LABOR SUPPORT

Someone like Congressman Roman Pucinski in Chicago, who has solid labor support, can expect union watchers to man every one of the 472 precincts in his district on election day. Perhaps 50 or 100 will work some of these same precincts for three or four weeks prior to the balloting, distributing shopping bags at shopping centers, handing out leaflets, visiting a few homes. Pucinski is now fairly safe, but when he won the first time, some years ago, the unions certainly were the decisive factor; without them he would have lost.

How much COPE's activity (and that of DRIVE, the teamster union equivalent) translates into actual votes is difficult to say. An old-time Chicago union leader claims that he gauges his effectiveness by the number of ballots his man gets over and above the highest man on the local party ticket. That can be five or seven percent, he says, no small figure where a few percentage points determines the outcome. Labor theorists estimate that their work is decisive in some 35 or 37 districts. It may be only 10 or 20, but in a Congress so delicately balanced as ours that is enough to tip the scales on many pieces of legislation.

UNIONS LICKING COSTLY WOUNDS, LABOR CAMPAIGN BILL $60 MILLION

By Victor Riesel

NEW YORK.—For the union chiefs, this campaign was a labor of love and hate, at a cost so fantastic only a computer's memory box could count up the millions of dollars.

Sabotaged by the Kennedy clan, mocked by the McCarthyites, derided as old fuddy-duddies by the Americans for Democratic Action, gleefully walloped by George Wallace in their own strongholds, America's labor movement poured out well over $60 million for Hubert H. Humphrey.

Of course, reaction of weary labor chiefs to this figure will be derisive denunciation. This is understandable. No powerful political force is enthused over listings of the gold flow. But never in labor's history has it given so much heart and treasury to crush its opponents. In this campaign, George C. Wallace, even more than Richard M. Nixon, was the enemy.

The high cost of living through a campaign such as labor unleashed is inconceivable until you put a pencil to work on just a few projects and unions.

Labor's central headquarters mailed and shipped over 55 million pieces of literature—some of it mighty expensive printing. Easily, the rest of the labor movement deluged the nation with several times that central mailing. This printed flood was so vast even Al Barkan, director of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) had no way of keeping track of what was happening in the field among the 60,000 local unions.

Thus, on Oct. 21, he urged regional labor leaders to send COPE "two copies of all campaign materials you produced and distributed to members. This would include special campaign editions and other heavily political editions of your international union or state AFL-CIO journals, as well as leaflets, pamphlets, etc."

In two months of this campaign, these came to tens of millions of pieces and full newspapers.

The Carpenters spent almost $100,000 on one membership mailing alone.

On the record, the Machinists (1,900 lodges) spent over $500,000; the Ladies' Garment Workers (200 locals), another $500,000; the Seafarers, $1 million; the National Maritime Union, half a million; the Teamsters (900 locals), over two million; the Auto Workers (1,275 locals), another two million; Steelworkers (3,250 locals), about a million.

But all this is petty cash when compared with the local spending from the kickoff, massive Labor Day Parade up Fifth Avenue here to the last-minute caravans and get-out-the-vote telephone squads.

There are hundreds of radio and television broadcasts. Mr. Labor himself, George Meany, hit a network of some 330 stations five times. The Ladies' Garment Workers put on four national broadcasts. Thousands of locals hit the airwaves with their own appeals. There were special drives for the "nationalities" vote—sometimes known as the foreign language appeals. From labor's point of view, it was their most splendid hour.

All these are on-the-record expenditures. There are thousands of indirect costs. No Humphrey caravan, on land, sea or in the air, by ship, jet or truck, was without its share of international union presidents. They were seafarers, longshoremen, plasterers and electricians, building service leaders and retail clerks. They were advance men—though some of them lead unions of a million members in less political moments. They were fellow travelers. And they stayed behind to make certain the candidate's visit would not be forgotten.

"It was the most all-out effort the labor movement ever has made," said Al Zack, one of a handful of men close to George Meany. "It was more intense than the effort to beat Barry Goldwater. I never saw anything like it. I saw more hard work, more intensity, more evidence of union signs, sound trucks, billboards, union registration drives, than ever before. We even had union registration headquarters deep in Watts. It was American labor's greatest political push."

Whatever else it did, it did not wipe out George Wallace. His nine million votes put him permanently in the political party business. Those votes came from AFL-CIO members and their families. Local labor leaders will have to reckon with this every minute from now until 1972.

In the early hours of the morning after, as I wandered from my radio and TV studio mikes to the Democrats' plush Bastille at the Hotel Pierre and Richard Nixon's posh 35th floor soft music and tinkling glasses retreat at the Waldorf, I thought that most of my colleagues had missed one essential point in the final election commentaries.

They talked of Wallace "running a poor third." For the man from Montgomery, it was a victory. He was a sideshow this time. He'll be the main eventer next time. His nine million votes gives him a powerful base now—and much of it is inside labor.

The campaign is over, but the past is prelude.

[From Daily Labor Report, Oct. 29, 1964]

BIGGEST POLITICAL DRIVE EVER PUT ON BY AFL–CIO

The pamphlet writers are relaxing after a record outpouring but the speakers are still out exhorting and the organizers are preparing to give their all to get out the vote in the biggest political campaign organized labor ever has put on.

Its purpose: To elect Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey to the Presidency and Vice Presidency, and as a bonus, to get a more liberal House and Senate.

AFL–CIO President George Meany told the labor federation's general board meeting at the beginning of September that the 130 national and international union affiliates should assign all their organizers to work on registration and get out the vote campaigns.

Meany himself has worked overtime on the election. On a recent day, he flew from Washington to San Francisco to address the Iron Workers, then back to New York to speak to the Stone Workers, and went on to a Liberal Party rally at night. Since September 1, every convention of a national affiliate of or a State AFL–CIO Council has been addressed by Meany or a vice president with the single theme, plugging the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

As a result of the new fervor, internationals that have disdained political endorsements in the past have come out for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket. The Printing Pressmen, the Chemical Workers, and the State, County, and Municipal Workers are examples.

AFL–CIO and COPE (Committee on Political Education) publicists turned out 12 special pieces of campaign literature, loosing a flood of 60 million pieces of paper. This was two to three times the number produced by labor for the Kennedy campaign.

The material is designed for easy consumption. The smallest piece is a four-page folder no bigger than a business card. The cover says, "The issue is PEACE" and the inside asks, "whose finger do YOU want on the nuclear trigger?" Quotations from President Johnson and Senator Goldwater, the Republican Presidential candidate, are given for the answer. Five other folders, the size of a post-card, were kept very simple. They are devoted to different issues: Unions, jobs, peace, "so-called 'right-to-work,'" and hospital card for the elderly.

Two larger folders are devoted to the nuclear bomb issue and to "20 Questions." The questions are this type: "Do you believe the federal government should launch programs to reduce unemployment and help create jobs?" According to the folder, Goldwater has answered "no" to all the questions, on the basis of his record and statements, and President Johnson has answered "yes."

Another COPE publication is headed "The Republican Hidden Labor Plank." It reproduces the heading on S. 87, a bill introduced by Senator Goldwater on January 14, 1963. The leaflet says that bill would outlaw union security agreements in all 50 States, require a government strike vote on petition of 30 percent of the workers, "force the federal government to sue any union if a member complains that he has been denied his rights under the Landrum-Griffin Act," and block use of union funds for non-bargaining activities such as legislative work, community services, education, etc. Still another campaign piece purports to give Goldwater's voting record 1961–1964. The biggest piece, decked out in red, white, and blue, tells "Where They Stand" on issues of concern to working people.

AFL–CIO itself took on the job of dealing with the reported "white backlash." It had distributed at plant gates, union meetings, and every place it could a leaflet, "Civil Rights: Facts v. Fiction."

It gives the basic provisions of the Civil Rights Act in capsule form, and the "fact" to answer three pieces of "fiction." The "fictions" are that "If you sell a house, you have to sell to a Negro." Your children will be sent out of the neighborhood to some Negro school," and "A certain number of Negroes will have to be hired on every job, even if white people have to be fired to make room for them."

The Administration gave potent help in the fight against the backlash, sending Acting Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach to speak to the AFL–CIO state convention in Indiana where Alabama's Governor George Wallace made a strong primary showing in the Gary steel district.

As a result of all this activity, an AFL–CIO spokesman thinks the backlash has subsided. He ticks off "peace, the 53 wrong votes on the COPE list, and identifying Goldwater as the right-to-work man" as the three factors that have negated the Republican candidate's repeal.

Still, a "Labor for Goldwater" label pops up every now and then. The AFL-CIO spokesman calls any such source "pure crackpot—way out."

Meany goes beyond the charges made by COPE in his speeches and compares Goldwater's candidacy to the early days of Hitler in Germany—not that Goldwater is the same as Hitler, but the forces behind both men are similar, he claims.

The labor federation's chief activities have been to get workers and the population generally registered to "educate" its own members, to organize get-out-the-vote programs for November 3, and to collect voluntary contributions of $1 or more in order to help its chosen candidates.

In all except the last activity, union funds are used. The AFL-CIO affiliates have pitched in $1 million for a registration campaign, run by Roy Reuther of the United Auto Workers. The literature has been paid for out of regular income because unions have the right to educate their members on the issues and tell them the union position on candidates under the CIO News case that went to the Supreme Court, as AFL-CIO lawyers see it. None of the AFL-CIO material is for general distribution.

But the federation doesn't look at its primary political function as being that of money raiser for its favorite candidates. "Skills and manpower are what labors has to contribute," says its spokesman.

Even so, COPE has been doing somewhat better than it did four years ago. On October 24, 1960, it had collected $527,928 (DLR 210-1960-A-1). On October 23, 1964, it had collected $579,460, according to its latest report to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, required under the Corrupt Practices Act. And it shows greater optimism about more coming in than it did in 1960. On October 24 that year, it had spent $728,405. On October 23 this year, it had spent $885,407. This deficit spending is common on the part of most of the union political organizations, because the money has to be spent when it will do some good, while the donations get bigger as the election nears and some has not cleared the pipeline by election day.

Half of COPE's income goes back to the state COPE's for them to dole out. The other half is used nationally and in states with little labor organization. Even with one-half, its direct contributions to candidates are very minor, adding up to only $27,500 all of this year up to October 23. Senator Williams (Dem., N.J.) has been the biggest beneficiary, receiving $10,000. The only other Senatorial nominee listed as getting a direct contribution is Robert Byrd, the Democratic incumbent in West Virginia, down for $2,500.

Other direct COPE contributions have gone to the following Democratic candidates for reelection to the House: James Roosevelt (Calif.), Frank Thompson (N.J.), and Charles Joelson (N.J.), and Joseph Minish (N.J.), $2,000 each; Joseph Addabbo, (N.Y.), John Murphy (NY.), and Hugh Carey (N.Y.), $1,000 each.

William T. Cahill, a Republican Congressman, has received New Jersey COPE's endorsement and $2,000 from national COPE. Paul J. Krebs, former United Auto Workers staff member and a Democratic candidate for the House in New Jersey, is the only non-incumbent to get a direct contribution, which was $2,000.

Several CIO unions have pulled out of the AFL-CIO state and COPE organization in New Jersey, which have have something to do with the number of direct contributions in that state.

Unions Spend To Defeat Lausche

(By David Lawrence)

It is possible in America for a labor organization with a vested interest in legislation to spend a huge sum of money to bring about the defeat of a member of Congress even though the Federal Corrupt Practices Act bars any corporation or labor organization from contributing "anything of value" to a federal election, including primaries.

Frank J. Lausche, former mayor of Cleveland who served five terms of two years each as governor of Ohio, is perhaps one of the most objective and conscientious members the United States Senate has ever had. Yet he was defeated in a Democratic primary for a third term a few days ago by the expenditure of a large sum of money collected in part from dues of labor union members.

Although most of the prominent newspapers in Ohio supported Lausche for renomination, he went down to defeat at the hands of Cincinnati Councilman

John J. Gilligan, presumably because the senator did not have available financial support sufficient to overcome the intensive drive made by the state labor federation, which is affiliated with the AFL–CIO.

Up to now, the courts have ruled that labor unions could conduct "educational" campaigns and could participate in "get-out-the-vote" movements. But the many ways by which labor-union members are at the same time individually told how to vote are not specifically covered in any existing law. Does "education," for instance, include "electioneering"?

Ken W. Clawson, Washington Post staff writer, tells of the methods by which the campaign in Ohio was conducted directly into the homes of 800,000 union members. He writes:

"Gilligan, who said that he wouldn't run against Lausche unless labor put up a $1 million kitty, reportedly settled for somewhere around $300,000 . . .

"The chain that eventually led into the home of nearly every union member in Ohio started with international unions affiliated with the AFL–CIO. From these unions, the Ohio federation obtained the much-guarded membership lists for the Buckeye State.

"These lists were sent to local unions where telephone numbers, political party membership, registration status and address changes were added. Back to Columbus went the lists and then to the International Association of Machinists Building in Washington, where a computer indexed over 800,000 Ohio union members by party, registration status, Congressional District and by respective union.

"Canvassers, when they knocked on doors, were equipped with information about the fellow trade unionist and his family ahead of time. This efficiency was particularly helpful the Monday before the election when the AFL–CIO distributed a million pieces of literature. Knowledge of the identities and addresses of Ohio unionists permitted the AFL–CIO for the first time to get directly into 800,000 members' homes."

The state labor federation selected the strategic industrial areas in which Democratic primaries may be won and concentrated on them, so the "educational" campaign was not necessarily applied throughout the state in every district. Per-capita union dues were used to pay the expenses for political work in the primaries.

Some of the national unions made direct contributions of their own and gave political dollars to district and regional offices. The Ohio AFL–CIO will report to the state government that $8,750 was contributed to the "educational" campaign. But it is estimated that the cost of just setting up the computer-program system for identifying union members would alone run between $80,000 and $100,000.

If the executives of a group of corporations turned over their mailing lists to a campaign committee, supplied the money to canvass voters, told them to "register and get out the vote," and urged them to support a particular candidate, it may be taken for granted this would be called "scandalous." Many members of Congress would promptly introduce legislation to mete out severe punishment for the use of money to buy an election.

But the "civil rights" of a senator or member of the House who votes according to his conscience in an endeavor to serve the public interest impartially seem to be ignored. It is doubtful whether either the House of Senate will take any corrective action, as labor unions now believe they control a majority of both Houses of Congress.

[From U.S. News & World Report, Aug. 5, 1968]

LABOR WEEK: A LESSON FROM ONE UNION ON HOW TO FINANCE THE CAMPAIGN

(NOTE.—The law seemed clear enough: No single contribution bigger than $5,000 to a presidential campaign committee. Yet one labor union managed to donate $100,000 to the Democrats—after an Administration ruling favorable to one of its leaders.)

A labor union has shown how to hand $100,000 to presidential-campaign committees and avoid a law limiting donations to $5,000.

This lesson in practical politics was given by the Seafarers Union, with the money starting to flow to Democratic groups shortly after Secretary of State Dean Rusk declined to extradite a former official of the union.

The labor leader had jumped bond in Canada after being sentenced in 1964 to serve five years on his conviction of hiring a man to beat up an official of a rival union.

Advice rejected.—Mr. Rusk disregarded recommendations of Department aides in making the decision to reject Canada's request for extradition of Harold C. Banks, the former head of the Seafarers Canadian branch.

Banks fled to the U.S. in 1964. Under the extradition treaty involved, assault is not an extraditable crime. Perjury is, however.

Canada in August, 1967, asked that Banks be sent back because of a perjury charge based on a contention that he lied four years earlier at an inquiry in denying knowledge about the assault. Banks is an American citizen.

The State Department said no political considerations were involved in Mr. Rusk's decision not to surrender Banks. It said the ruling was based on the fact that "the charge of perjury arose directly out of a denial of guilt of a nonextraditable offense."

Secretary Rusk later commented that "a man has the right to protest his own innocence."

Mr. Rusk added that he knew nothing of any contributions from the Seafarers to political funds. He said that no one in the White House or Democratic National Committee tried to influence his decision.

The Seafarer contributions were reported in June, in a list sent to Congress by the Seafarers committee on political-activity donations.

Curbs on contributions.—Union spokesmen said the money came from members as voluntary contributions for political purposes—not from regular union dues.

Federal law prohibits use of dues funds in primary or election campaigns for the White House or Congress.

The statutes also say that no person or group can give more than $5,000 a year to any campaign committee for a person seeking federal office.

With that rule in mind, the Seafarers officials split their $100,000 into 20 checks for $5,000 each and sent them to different campaign committees. Some of these committees have been described as committees in name only, lacking offices or officers—a device for helping big contributors chip in more cash.

Supporters of candidates for both political parties have used this method to comply with the limit of $5,000 on donations to a particular committee. This time the distribution attracted attention in the press, in Congress and in Canada's Parliament.

Where checks went.—It was noted that the union's checks at first went to the President's Club, the Democratic National Committee, several Johnson-Humphrey committees and groups in Texas, Illinois and Rhode Island.

That first outlay was made early in April, soon after Mr. Rusk on March 25 rejected a Canadian appeal on Banks. The checks went out despite President Johnson's March 31 withdrawal from the presidential race.

Later, 10 checks for $5,000 each went to committees backing Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey's campaign for the presidential nomination—after he got into the race formally.

Labor Secretary Willard Wirtz, a supporter of the Vice President, conceded, when the Seafarers' contributions were publicized, "It worries me greatly." He expressed concern that the incident could hurt Mr. Humphrey.

Mr. Wirtz said he had known nothing about any Seafarers' contributions. In December, the Labor Secretary had sent a memorandum to Mr. Rusk about the Banks case. This memo was described as outlining the violence that had marked the Canadian Seafarers in recent years.

Query from a Senator.—A Republican Senator—Paul Fannin, of Arizona—wrote to Mr. Wirtz asking for a copy of the Banks memo and for an explanation of "any possible recommendation" against extradition.

Senator Fannin also asked for the names of any union or Administration officials who might have asked the Secretary to intervene in the case.

Senator Fannin stated: "I am particularly alarmed by the published reports of sizeable political contributions that are reported to have followed in the wake of this intervention and the subsequent release of Mr. Banks."

Protests came, too, from Canadians. On March 18, after Mr. Rusk's original decision, H. W. Herridge told his fellow members of Parliament that the ruling "is an insult to this country."

Mr. Herridge, who later retired from Parliament, referred to reports "that some political influence and pressure have been used in this regard." He said this was "the first failure to apply the extradition treaty in 50 years."

In his speech, Mr. Herridge asked the Canadian Government to "make inquiries whether there was any union influence on this decision because this is an election year in the United States."

Heward Grafftey, another member of Parliament, since defeated for re-election, demanded to know if U.S. officials "suggested that Canada's plea might fall on more favorable ears after the forthcoming election in the United States."

In reply to Secretary Rusk's first denial of extradition—on March 13—the Canadian Government said it believes perjury is included in the treaty list of extraditable crimes "without differentiation or distinction as between various types of perjury."

Canada sought reconsideration by Mr. Rusk or international arbitration of the case, but the American Secretary of State reaffirmed his decision and rejected arbitration.

As for the Seafarers' checks, union spokesmen said that Paul Hall, president of the union, has been a consistent supporter of the Johnson Administration. He is a member of the labor committee backing Mr. Humphrey's candidacy.

A Seafarers' statement said: "Political activity is nothing new for the Seafarers . . . . These political contributions were made openly, as are all Seafarer contributions. They were made legally [and] reported publicly . . . . Any suggestions that the exercise of this right is linked to any other situation or circumstance is wholly without justification."

FEEDING THE KITTY: UNION'S POLITICAL FUND IS SWELLED BY DONATIONS FROM FAR EAST SEAMEN—SEFARERS USE MONEY TO AID DEMOCRATS, BUT THE DONORS DON'T KNOW WHO GETS IT—SOME GIVE $500 AT A CRACK

(By Jerry Landeur)

WASHINGTON.—The most ardent opponents of Richard Nixon's incoming Administration apparently are some Japanese and Filipino merchant seamen who have never even voted in an American election.

That, at any rate, is the case if dollar donations to election campaigns are a reliable guide to political convictions. For, month after month, these sailors have been contributing as much as a third of their wages to American political candidates, mostly Democrates. The sailors, hundreds and perhaps thousands of them, have given as much as $500 each after a single sea voyage.

But the contributions—many of which violate Federal law by going unreported—aren't simple, direct gifts to candidates that the foreign seamen happen to admire. The sailors don't know to whom they are contributing, and the recipients don't know the source of their windfalls.

Ostensibly, the money comes in the form of voluntary donations, as the law requires, from members of the Seafarers International Union, an American maritime union affiliated with the AFL-CIO. In reality, though, much of this union's contributions represent payments accepted—or exacted—from alien seamen who work on high-paying U.S.-flag ships bound for Vietnam. Most of these seamen are not even members of the union, which distributes the collected cash to favored political candidates.

THE SECRET, CIRCULAR ROUTE

All told, several hundred thousand dollars have traveled this secret, circular route:

From the U.S. Treasury to operators ships owned by the Government or chartered by the Pentagon's Military Sea Transportation Service; from the operators to foreign seamen in the form of premium wages; from the seamen to the union, and from the union to elected officeholders—some of whom try to tap the Treasury for more dollars in the form of maritime subsidies that tend to strengthen the union.

Officials of the union won't comment on allegations that the union takes political contributions from the foreign seamen. "We file all the necessary information in Washington, and that's all the information we give out," says a spokesman at the union's Brooklyn headquarters. But records the union files with the clerk of the House of Representatives do not name individual contributors of over $100, as required by law.

In the most recent election, the union backed some winners and some losers. It put up at least $185,000 for President Johnson, who withdrew, and Vice President Humphrey, who lost. It contributed $20,000 to a voter registration drive to help Daniel Brewster, Democratic Senator from Maryland, and it gave another $7,000 to his campaign, but the Senator lost.

BACKING SOME WINNERS

However, it contributed $15,000 to Washington state's Warren Magnuson, chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee; it offered him even more. It gave $10,000 to Brooklyn's Emanuel Celler, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. It gave $7,800 in cash and kind (the union prints campaign literature for some politicans at its own plant) to New York Congressman Jacob Gilbert, who was recently assigned to the House Merchant Marine Committee. And it contributed at least $9,000 to Edward Garmatz of Maryland, chairman of that House committee. These men, all Democrats, all won.

With friends sprinkled through Congress, the union seems well protected on Capitol Hill, no matter who rules in the White House. Indeed, observers say that the Seafarers, together with other maritime unions and associations of ship owners and shipbuilders, probably are strong enough to strangle any Nixon Administration attempts to make the U.S. merchant marine less dependent on subsidies.

These observers say there is no reason to believe the shipping interests will fare worse in the 91st Congress than they have in the past. The 90th Congress, which was known for being economy-minded, didn't tamper with the Johnson Administration's suggested appropriations of $110.8 million for ship-construction subsidies and $206 million for ship operating subsidies in the fiscal year that started last July 1.

In fact, the maritime bloc nearly succeeded in persuading Congress to boost construction subsidies. And it helped persuade Congress to reject Johnson Administration proposals to stop subsidizing the operations of passenger liners and to build some subsidized ships in cheaper, foreign yards.

HELPING 150 CONGRESSMEN

One major element in the maritime lobby's extraordinary strength is the secret payments from the alien seamen. Lacking these payments, the Seafarers Union couldn't keep doling out sizeable campaign gifts to as many as 150 Congressmen, from ship-conscious Maine to landlocked Utah. Nor could the union so easily have raised the $100,000 given to the Democrats last summer, a contribution that, perhaps coincidentally, followed the State Department's refusal to honor Canada's request for extradition of former Canadian Seafarers boss Hal Banks on a charge of perjury.

Generally, the foreign sailors who contribute so generously come aboard the American ships as replacements for American union members at Subic Bay in the Philippines, a stopping-off point for Vietnam-bound ships, and at Yokohama in Japan, terminus of a shuttle service to Vietnam.

The foreign seamen are needed because many of the original American crewmen get sick, yearn for home or jump ship for pleasure spots after months of strenuous, high-paying duty sailing in the Far East.

The unions, which handle hiring, have no difficulty signing up the foreigners. Wages are high, with seamen on Vietnam-bound ships getting $700 a month against $500 for other duty. With overtime and other extra pay, a foreign sailor can draw as much as $1,000 a month working on a U.S. ship. "You can't imagine how eager those fellows are to sign on," says one Naval officer.

Frequently, however, the foreign sailors don't get to keep all they earn. Often, they must pay so-called service fees to union agents who control hiring, and if the agent is a Seafarer, he remits all or part of these fees to Brooklyn, where the money goes into a special fund for political activity. The fund is maintained by one district of the Seafarers, the Atlantic, Gulf, Lakes and Inland Waters District.

The fund is by far the lushest electioneering kitty maintained by any American union. Not all the money in the fund comes from foreigners, of course, but it is the aliens' payments that help explain how one union district, with just 12,800 men at sea, manages to raise more money for Federal candidates than the giant Steelworkers, Auto Workers or Teamsters unions.

If the American members were the only contributors to the district's fund, the average gift from the 12,800 men would have to to top $35 to yield the $497,338 collected through Nov. 10 this year. In contrast, the average Steelworker or Auto Worker gives a $1 a year, at most, for union political activity. But the Seafarers Union sees nothing extraordinary in its members' munificence.

THE UNION'S STATEMENT

"For years our members have voluntarily contributed to our political activity funds and have thus expressed their right to participate in the American political process," says a statement issued from the union's headquarters in Brooklyn.

"Our political contributions to various candidates for public office are made openly. They are made legally. They are reported publicly. Any suggestion that the exercise of this right is linked to any other situation or circumstance is completely without justification."

Perhaps, as the union suggests, sailors are more interested in politics than land-based wage earners are. But it seems significant that only the Seafarers district headed by Internation Union President Paul Hall operates a political action arm of any size. None of the parent union's 32 other affiliates has reported any political activity to Federal authorities.

At any rate, the union's statement that its contributions are legal is at least partly right. In fact, in at least one respect the Seafarers exceed legal requirements to disclose political income and disbursements. The loosely enforced Federal Corrupt Practices Act requires public accounting of donations to candidates for only these posts: President, Senator and Representative. But the union, going beyond the law, this year reported $20,000 in speaking fees paid to Congressmen and $313,000 in campaign contributions to candidates for state and local offices.

At the same time, however, the union fails to comply with another—and more significant—legal requirement. It neglects to identify by name and address every individual whose contribution to the political fund exceeds $100.

This is a requirement the union could meet only at the risk of exposing the undercover payments flowing in from Asia. If the donors' names were listed, of course, all would be legal. But a listing of hundreds of Asian contributors to American political campaigns might prompt investigations into whether the contributions were voluntary.

WASHINGTON CLOSE-UP: UNIONS' WALLACE LINE OUT OF LINE

(By Frank Getlein)

A number of big unions have commissioned the writing and distribution of a booklet exposing George Wallace for the right-wing, fascist-minded, anti-labor, bigotted racist he seems to them to be. That's O.K. They're entitled, within the laws of libel and defamation, which are increasingly difficult to apply for the protection of public, political figures.

What is interesting is not that unions are engaging in political propaganda. They've been doing that since they invented Labor Day, and they ought to. The interesting thing is that the object of the propaganda is not the voting public at large but specifically union members. The leadership is finding it necessary to haul its own membership back from the fleshpots of racism and onto the path of righteousness.

To the most casual observer of appresticeship procedures in the construction trades and other craft unions, it will come as no surprise that there is racism among the rank and file of organized labor and even, in some cases, among the leadership itself. In the case at hand, all signs tell us that a very large percentage of Wallace's northern support comes from union labor.

From the point of view of right-thinking, therefore, the new expose seems to be addressed to exactly where it is needed most and where it may do some good.

Except that:

When you get right down to it, people don't join labor unions to get their brains washed by their elected leaders on questions with only a remote connection to the conditions and wages of their employment. They join labor unions to deal more effectively with their employers.

It can be argued that politics obviously affects labor relations and that therefore organized labor has both a right and a duty to be involved in politics. This right and duty, in the nature of our politics, extends also to the backing and non-backing of specific candidates.

But does it extend also to instructing the members to correct their thinking on political candidates?

A labor union is, in theory at least, a membership organization. The self-perpetuating nature of the leadership is only de facto, not de jure. Therefore, in theory, if the members of a union want to support George Wallace, what the leadership ought to be doing is either finding ways to help the members in this political desire or else resigning and going to work for people more in tune with their own feelings.

On the record of primary voting patterns, there have to exist union locals—in Indiana, in Wisconsin and in Maryland, among other states—which if they followed the wishes of the majority of the members, would endorse Wallace. It won't happen.

What does this say about participatory democracy? Or is democracy only supposed to apply when right thinking is in the majority?

This is far from being a problem of unions alone. It is prevalent among most groups with official representation, official voices in the public dialogue. Suddenly we discover that what has been touted as the fervent demand of millions of members is in fact the demand of the president, or the executive committee, or merely of the permanent paid secretary.

Examples are everywhere. One is always running into medical doctors who are relaxed, civilized and genuinely interested in their patients and in the progress of health generally, despite the American Medical Association's strident insistence that doctors are exclusively interested in the big dollar and will fight against any improvement in public health that doesn't pay them.

Again, for years the Roman Catholic Church lobbied effectively for the retention of anti-birth control laws in Massachusetts and Connecticut on the presumption that the official spokesmen for millions. It now appears that they spoke chiefly for themselves, their bishops and their monsignori. Among laymen and the lower clergy, the sentiment was and is the other way.

Among organizations in business chiefly for legislative ends, the situation is different. No doubt the vast majority of members of the truckers lobby really do want to take over the national highway system with their three-trailer monsters. And the lumber lobby can count on 100 percent membership support in the battle to ruin the redwoods.

But most people are not in unions or churches or professional associations to choose candidates for public office. It is high time the hired hands of such organizations got off their power dreams and back back to work.

Pipefitter Refused To Give and Lost Job, He Testifies

A Cape Girardeau steamfitter told a federal court jury here today that he was "laid off without reason" in 1963 several days after he refused to make increased contributions to the voluntary political fund of Steamfitters Local 562.

The witness was William W. Copeland, a member of Steamfitters Local 318 in Cape Girardeau. He said several attempts to find new employment in St. Louis later under Local 562 jurisdiction met with failure.

Copeland was the first witness today in the trial against Local 562 and three of its top officers who allegedly made illegal political contributions through their so-called voluntary political fund.

ADMITS DISLIKE

Under cross-examination later, Copeland admitted that he had "strong feelings" against Local 562. He said, "As I understand the law, I'm not required to make any political contributions. This is why I'm bitterly opposed to it."

In reply to questions from Government attorneys, Copeland said he signed a pledge card for the voluntary fund "because I was afraid I wouldn't work if I didn't."

Shortly after the lunch hour today, United States District Judge John K. Regan announced that he would hear testimony in the case until 4 p.m. today and then adjourn court until 9 a.m. Monday. A death in the family of defense attorney Murray Randall prompted the decision to adjourn.

Copeland testified that he was laid off in August 1963 when working as a steamfitter at Anheuser-Busch, Inc. He said he refused to pay an additional 50 cents a day into the political fund when requested to do so by a foreman. Copeland told the jury he already was paying $1.50 a day into the fund, and that the increase would have brought his dues and assessments to $80 a month.

LOAN OFFERED

The foreman, Copeland related, offered to lend him the money, but Copeland said he refused. At the time Copeland was working under Local 562 jurisdiction and held a travel card from his home local for that purpose. He now operates his own business, but maintains his membership in the Cape Girardeau local.

In later testimony, Emil C. Endermuhle, a Local 562 foreman, told the jury that Copeland's brother in 1963 refused to pay anything into the voluntary fund. Endermuhle said the man continued to work without any problems for about three months, and then quit his job of his own free will.

Defense attorneys established also that Copeland had been laid off at an earlier steamfitter job in Farmington, Mo.

Throughout testimony yesterday and today, Government attorneys attempted to establish that the political fund was not voluntary as its name implies. The official name of the fund is the Voluntary Political, Educational, Legislative, Charity and Defense Fund.

Two veteran union members testified yesterday that most members contributed to the fund, but emphasized that no attempt was made to coerce them.

They were Edward W. Gissing and Thomas J. Williams, shop sewards, who said that as foremen they had collected money for the fund from union members on the job. Both said they had used contribution sheets to keep track of the donations, and that the contributions were usually made on Mondays.

United States Attorney Veryl Riddle, after noting that the word "owe" was written by some names on the contribution sheets, asked Gissing what would happen if a steamfitter did not donate to the fund.

"Very seldom would something like that happen," Gissing said.

The Government has charged that Local 562 and three of its top officers conspired to make illegal political contributions from the fund. The indictment names Lawrence L. Callanan, Local 562 business manager; John L. (Doc) Lawler, assistant business manager, and George Seaton, vice president.

Gissing and Williams were two of six witnesses for the Government called yesterday.

Riddle asked Gissing why the contribution sheets were kept if the donations to the voluntary political fund were in fact voluntary.

Gissing said that the "purpose of bookkeeping was to know who contributed and who didn't."

FBI TESTIMONY

Earlier John J. Buckley, a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent and an accounting specialist, said that the St. Louis steamfitters had contributed to organizations backing candidates for federal office in several states.

Buckley said the fund had collected a total of $1,230,986 in a four-year period ended with 1966 and that $151,412 of the total amount collected was spent for federal political contributions between 1964 and 1966.

Under cross-examination by Randall, one of four defense attorneys for the union leaders, Buckley read into the record canceled checks that had been sent to the candidate's groups in several states.

These checks included ones sent to organizations backing both Missouri Senators—Stuart Symington and Edward V. Long; Senator Fred Harris of Oklahoma; Senator William Proxmire of Wisconsin; Senator Philip A. Hart of Michigan and the late Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York.

Randall made the point that all candidates receiving contributions were Democrats. Some checks were sent also to the Democratic National Committee.

CONTRIBUTED TO KEEP JOB, PIPEFITTER SAYS

A former Cape Girardeau steamfitter, now a member of Pipefitters Local 798 at Tulsa, Okla., told a jury today that he had signed political fund pledge cards when working on jobs under jurisdiction of Steamfitters Local 562 because "I knew I had to sign them or I wouldn't work."

Norman Baker, 37 years old, said that at the time he signed the cards he was a member of Steamfitters Local 318 in Cape Girardeau.

Baker was the first Government witness called today as the trial of Lawrence L. Callanan, business manager of Local 562, and two assistants. They are facing charges of illegally contributing $140,800 to political candidates and campaign organizations. The trial entered its second week in the court of United States District Judge John K. Regan.

Baker, who is working on the Mississippi river pipeline construction job near the Jefferson Barracks bridge, identified two pledge cards he had signed.

He said he signed one in 1963 and the other in 1965 when he was a member of Local 318 in Cape Girardeau and was working on jobs under the jurisdiction of Callanan's local here.

Asked by United States Attorney Veryl Riddle why he signed the cards, Baker said, "I knew I had to sign the cards or I wouldn't work. It was my understanding that, if I wanted to work, if I wanted the job, I had to sign them."

Baker referred to the donations as a "doby" and in response to a question by Riddle said that "assessment and doby mean the same thing." He testified that he had never "paid a doby" to any local other than Local 562.

Riddle asked him whether he knew what was done with the money paid into the political fund of Local 562. Baker replied that he did not know and never had asked anyone because "I always thought it was better if I did not ask."

On cross-examination defense attorneys asked Baker whether he ever had been told by any steward or officer of Local 562 that he had to pay into the fund. He said he had not been told, "but it was understood that if you don't pay you don't work."

Three witnesses, members of Local 562, later testified that they had collected money for the political fund. They said that the donations were voluntary, although sometimes they were incorrectly referred to as "assessments."

One of them, John Patrick O'Laughlin, a riding foreman, at one point in his testimony referred to the contributions as "assessments," but hastened to correct himself and said that the contributions were voluntary.

Two other union members who testified that they had collected funds were James M. Stiffler and Eugene J. Marshall, both foremen.

Charged with Callanan in an indictment returned by a federal grand jury May 9 are John L. (Doc) Lawler, assistant business manager of Local 562, and George Seaton, vice president of the local.

GLOBE INITIATED STEAMFITTER PROBE: PRECEDENT-SETTING CONVICTION

Conviction of Steamfitters Union Local 562 and three of its top officers on the charge of conspiring to violate federal election laws brings nearer a successful close to a long, hard fight by The Globe-Democrat to bring these men to justice.

All of this newspaper's efforts would have been in vain, however, had it not been for the determined and skillful preparation and presentation of the case against the union and the defendants by United States Attorney Veryl L. Riddle and the conscientious performance of duty by the jurors who had to weigh a veritable mountain of evidence.

It was in August of 1965 that the late Globe Publisher and crusading newspaperman Richard H. Amberg ordered a full investigation of the steamfitters. This probe was continued under the direction of Publisher Duncan G. Bauman who succeeded Mr. Amberg.

Two outstanding reporters, Denny Walsh and Al Delugach, conducted the non-stop investigation. In the fall of 1965 they wrote their first article of a series that was to run to more than 100 articles exposing the steamfitter finances, productivity and political activities.

As a result of these stories the Justice Department in early 1966 began a federal grand jury inquiry in South Bend, Ind., into one phase of The Globe-Democrat exposures by Walsh and Delugach; a stock bonanza given in connection with a pension insurance purchase by Local 562 from First United Life Insurance Co. of Gary, Ind.

Edward Henry, director of Local 562's welfare and pension funds, and William E. Long, president of First United, are among four persons now under indictment and awaiting trial in Indiana on charges from this million-dollar kickback conspiracy in the insurance deal.

Hugh J. Gorham, steamfitter and former Florissant city councilman, another defendant in this kickback case, was convicted last year and has served a prison term on a charge of perjury before the federal grand jury in South Bend.

In July of 1967 The Globe dropped another bombshell by printing a story by Walsh and Delugach revealing that Steamfitters Local 562 had poured thousands of dollars into federal elections in states all over the country and has failed to report these to the United States government as required by the federal Corrupt Practices Act.

Contributions were shown to have gone to Rep. George Fallon of Maryland, Sen. Philip Hart of Michigan, Rep. Melvin Price of Illinois, Rep. Donald Fraser of Minnesota and Senator William Proxmire of Wisconsin. Earlier stories had unearthed contributions to President Johnson's political campaign of 1964 of about $60,000 and $10,000 to the senatorial campaign of the late Robert F. Kennedy of New York.

The Justice Department showed little interest at first. So The Globe pounded away with more articles exposing the illegal contributions until the Department agreed to look into the case. In October of 1967 a federal grand jury was convened and heard evidence until late January.

But once again there was a strange silence as the case lay dormant, apparently under heavy political pressure from high places to keep the issue from coming to trial during an election year.

The Globe ran more articles and editorials demanding that the case be brought to a conclusion. On May 9 of this year the indictments were returned against Lawrence L. Callanan, the ex-convict business manager who has run the union with an iron hand for years; John L. (Doc) Lawler, assistant business manager, and George Seaton, vice president of the local.

The Globe-Democrat is proud of its role in bringing the power-lusting steamfitter leaders to book and for exposing the odious practice of putting a "lug" on workers to try to spread the corrupting Callanan-Lawler tentacles into the highest echelons of government.

While it is vindication of The Globe's efforts, this conviction is a greater victory for the people. It represents the first time that any union has been convicted for this offense. The impact of this verdict will undoubtedly be felt nationwide and could result in a federal crackdown on other unions circumventing the law.

Meany's All-or-Nothing Political Bet

(By James P. Gannon)

Washington.—George Meany is staking the future of his powerful AFL–CIO on the gamble that the "old politics" is not yet dead.

Daring to bet all his chips that labor's own political machine and the remaining old-line Democratic Party bosses can somehow save Hubert Humphrey from defeat, the old man of organized labor has put his 13.5-million-member institution in a dangerously exposed position. Consider the situation confronting labor's hierarchy less than six weeks before the Presidential election:

—Their own house is in deep disorder, beginning to break apart, as United Auto Workers chief Walter Reuther and his newfound Teamster allies form a sort of "new politics" movement to the left of the old-politics AFL–CIO.

—A substantial segment—perhaps a third or more—of labor's ranks is in open stampede toward the racist blandishments of third-party candidate George Wallace.

—The Meany hero, the Vice President, is running such a poor race that he threatens to drag down with him some of the very Senate and House candidates whom the movement may desperately need next year to defend itself against anti-union legislation.

LUNGING AHEAD

Faced with this grim triple threat, the 73-year-old plumber and his claque of aging yes-men lunge ahead with an all-out Humphrey campaign, scarcely seeming to consider how they got into such a mess or how they'll get out in November if they fail. Though many of their problems stem from a backward-looking approach, they respond with more of the same. With characteristic heavy-handedness, they:

—Worsen the division in the labor movement with a hard-line decree (which could have been avoided) that any member of the club who throws in with the Reuther crowd gets thrown out;

—Mount an anti-Wallace drive that key labor politicos consider doomed to failure by its irrelevance to the Alabamian's basic appeal;

—Concentrate their resources on the Humphrey campaign ("It's hard to get anyone's attention, including mine, on anything else," says a Meany aide) rather than hedge what looks like a long-shot bet by channeling more money and manpower toward liberal Congressional candidates with better chances to win. In fact, some of these candidates are being short-changed by the AFL–CIO because of their unforgivable lack of enthusiasm for Mr. Humphrey and the Administration's Vietnam policy.

The breakup of organized labor into two hostile camps is itself a consequence of the "old politics" methods and mentally of the AFL–CIO. Walter Reuther's revolt is rooted in many causes, not excluding his personal ambition to lead the labor movement but certainly going beyond that. It is, among other things, a protest against a system in which a chief executive can hand a supposedly democratic organization's endorsement to a Presidential candidate without so much as consulting his alleged peers. (It was September before the AFL–CIO general board rubberstamped Mr. Meany's Humphrey endorsement of last April.)

Mr. Reuther's breakaway is also a rejection of the mentality that moved AFL–CIO leaders to condemn as anarchistic "invaders" the youths who demonstrated in Chicago in August during the Democratic convention, when those protesters were using much the same tactics that union "radicals" employed in the great organizing strikes of the 1930s and 1940s. At that time labor chiefs were outraged when police cracked skulls of pickets and strikers; now, viewing the protest from a lofty Establishment perch, labor's leaders applaud police for routing the "dirty-necked and dirty-mouthed group of kooks," as Mr. Meany branded the protestors.

So now Mr. Reuther and friends are trying to build a second union coalition, the Alliance for Labor Action, along the lines of the new politics of participation rather than the old bossism. Whether they'll succeed is highly uncertain. The relevant fact at this time is that Mr. Reuther's move, and Mr. Meany's typical cold-war-style response, have weakened the forces of labor at a most critical hour.

In dealing with the Wallace threat, the AFL–CIO is again falling back on a traditional union tactic whose 1968 efficacy is open to serious question. Though their own membership surveys show that newly affluent unionized workers are much more concerned about rising taxes, climbing welfare costs and Negro integration into their suburban neighborhoods, the AFL–CIO's anti-Wallace drive rests on such old-line issues as right-to-work laws, unemployment compensation and minimum wage.

ON THE REAL ISSUES

Alexander Barkan, Mr. Meany's top political operative who heads the AFL–CIO's Committee on Political Education, has a stock speech for union groups in which he attacks George Wallace and Richard Nixon for trying to "sidetrack" the voters' attention onto "phoney issues," such as riots, crime waves and war frustration. The real issues, in Mr. Barkan's unique book, are such things as what Mr. Nixon might do to the National Labor Relations Board if he's elected, and Mr. Wallace's record on minimum wage legislation as governor of Alabama.

Candid union politicians privately admit it's foolish to pretend that the race problem, lawlessness and the war aren't the real issues swaying voters in 1968.

"I make a speech to the membership about the NLRB," confides one union's top political aids, "and they listen quietly and say, 'Well, that's nice, but what does it all mean?' " Another union politico concedes doubt that members attracted to Mr. Wallace's tough law-and-order stance will be much put off by hearing that as governor he wasn't a champion of labor legislation.

So labor's anti-Wallace effort is an anachronism of bread-and butter concerns in a steak-and-mushroom age, purposely avoiding the Alabamian's gut issues. But an organization whose leader has cheered rough police action against "kooks" who demonstrate, and has decried an "atmosphere of arson and anarchy" in America, may be in a difficult position to fuss over Mr. Wallace's use of similar terms to stir up the electorate.

The AFL–CIO decision to direct the vast bulk of its effort toward Mr. Humphrey's campaign may prove a costly mistake, some labor lobbyists worry. They fret that COPE won't have the money and manpower available to help liberal Congressional candidates who'll be coming around to Mr. Barkan soon pleading for just a little more help.

Whether by design or coincidence, is seems that the candidates least likely to get what they want from COPE are those who display less than full loyalty to Mr. Humphrey and the Administration's Vietnam line.

In Ohio, national COPE officials have told dovish Democrat John Gilligan to find other sources of funds for his Senate race, saying they gave him more than his share of help in the primary. In Illinois, Democratic Senate candidate William Clark, who bucked Mayor Richard Daley and union backers in supporting war-critic George McGovern for the party's Presidential nomination, is also apparently finding union dollars hard to come by. And in New York, the state AFL–CIO refused to endorse Senate candidate Paul O'Dwyer, a liberal Democrat, because he has declined to support Mr. Humphrey; with baffling logic, it instead endorsed incumbent Jacob Javits, a liberal Republican who supports Mr. Nixon.

The irony of labor's lukewarm or non-existent support for such dissident Democrats could become grim indeed if their defeat helps tip the Congressional scales toward the sort of anti-union legislation that the AFL–CIO can see on the 1969 horizon. Consider the situation that will confront labor's hierarchy next year if the Humphrey gamble fails.

They will have pushed to the limit of Federal laws—and perhaps beyond—their efforts to defeat the man moving into the White House. He will owe them nothing, except perhaps a retaliatory jab, and they will have almost no lines of communication open to him. A Congress turned more conservative on the strength of Mr. Nixon's coattails would obviously be responsive to his bidding. And the pressures for restructuring the labor movement will have been multiplied in the ignominy of defeat and the distasteful prospect of at least four years in political exile.

"There will be a major realignment in the labor movement if Nixon wins the election, just wait and see," predicts an official of one big union unhappy with Mr. Meany's leadership.

But a Humphrey defeat might present an external threat even more serious than internal division. One key Meany aide worries that a President Nixon, though trying to establish ties with Negroes, disaffected youth, intellectuals and liberal doves in order to govern more effectively, would reward his conservative backers with proposals to Congress for curbing union power. And the AFL–CIO's use of hundreds of paid union staffers to aid Mr. Humphrey's campaign—a move that is, at best, in the gray area of legality—wouldn't be forgotten.

TREMENDOUS MISTAKE

Outside the closed doors of an AFL–CIO political huddle in New York City's Commodore Hotel last month a Javits campaign aide shook his head and said grimly: "These guys are making a tremendous mistake by not trying to throw out some lines to the Republicans. Admittedly, Nixon doesn't make that easy, but they aren't going to have a single line into him when he's elected." Yet any thought of trying to quietly open some communication with the Nixon camp, if there ever was such a thought, has surely been banished by Mr. Meany's all-or-nothing bet on Mr. Humphrey.

The spectre of defeat that haunts many labor politicians today may prove to be merely a shadow without substance. Mr. Meany's old politics may yet usher in a Humphrey Administration, in which case he'd be one of the top barons in the court while Walter Reuther, who played a political Hamlet before supporting Mr. Humphrey, would be labor's lesser light.

But in their private moments, labor's nervous political operators worry that all those AFL–CIO eggs in the Humphrey basket will create the year's costliest political omelet.

UNIONS TAKING IT ON CHIN IN POLITICAL ARENA

(By Harry Bernstein)

Organized labor, battered by a series of political blows, is failing in its effort to make 1968 its greatest political year.

Major reasons are:

—Union leaders are either fighting with or, worse, being ignored by New Left militants, by black nationalists and by antiwar liberal intellectuals.

—Richard M. Nixon and George C. Wallace are getting more union membership support than Vice President Humphrey.

—Old coalitions are breaking up. Within the unions, this is evidenced by the fight between Walter R. Reuther's United Auto Workers and the AFL–CIO leadership.

—Outside the unions the coalition of unions with liberal intellectuals is being shattered by their differences over Vietnam and police treatment of war protestors and black revolutionaries.

—Pro-labor, liberal senators and congressmen who opposed President Johnson's Vietnam policies are getting lukewarm support from the AFL–CIO.

MAY BE ONLY HOPE OF UNIONS

Yet the election of these men may be the only hope unions have of beating back proposed laws aimed at weakening the economic and political muscles of unions.

Despite these contradictory factors, unions today remain the nation's biggest single political force other than the major parties themselves.

With widely varying degrees of effectiveness, local and national union bodies function politically in all states, in every major city, and in most small towns.

No precise estimate can be made of how much clout there is in labor's political actions, but a cross-country look at unions reveals much of their strengths and weaknesses.

Unions—with 19 million members—can be expected to put between $20 million and $30 million into all political campaigns this year, including both cash and manpower. In comparison Nixon is expected to spend $20 million on his campaign.

Unions propagandize for liberal causes all year long. But that effort costs far less than the estimated $50 million a year spent by the right wing forces on radio and TV programs, preaching views that are mostly antiunion.

Many of the political activities of labor and management, conservatives and liberals, border on illegality—yet in estimating the political strength of unions, this activity must be taken into account.

The law says, "It is unlawful for a union as well as any corporation to make a contribution or expenditure for any national election, primary, political convention or caucus."

This law "makes us all terrible fakers," admits Bill Dodds, legislative representative for the United Auto Workers in Washington.

Dodds, sitting at a table stacked with union newspapers filled with Humphrey's pictures and favorable stories about him, knows that those publications are not listed as a political contribution for Humphrey.

"The amount of chicanery being used on all sides to help candidates is becoming a tragic situation," he said.

Al Zack, publicity director of the AFL–CIO, observed:

"Sure, the AFL–CIO News, our official publication, runs pro-Humphrey stories, not pro-Nixon or pro-Wallace ones. But the giant, conservative daily newspapers around the country have been doing just that for years, and still do."

Andrew Biemiller, legislative director of the AFL–CIO, said labor is pushing for a law which would require "truly full disclosure" of all political contributions, but they will fight "the halfway measures aimed at unions alone."

Unions want new laws to take into account the corporation which gives an executive a $10,000 pay raise, with the understanding that he will "volunteer" about half of that to a political candidate the corporation officers feel will best represent their interests.

There is a law which prohibits any individual from contributing more than $5,000 to a federal political campaign.

But the law is violated so openly that nobody complained when Mr. and Mrs. Richard K. Mellon, of the Pittsburgh Mellons, formally reported their $23,500 joint contribution to the Republican Party in the 1964 election, even though that was $13,500 more than they were legally entitled to make.

Company planes are used by political candidates on many occasions. For example, the plane of a San Diego firm just happened to be en route from San Diego to San Francisco when a friendly politician wanted to go there for a fund-raising dinner.

He and his entourage had free, unreported transportation from San Diego to San Francisco then back to Los Angeles for another meeting.

Do such activities violate the law? Generally the courts have said no, and the same goes for the border-line cases of labor's political contributions.

The AFL-CIO will have about 100 full-time staff members working in a 15-state target area to help the Humphrey campaign, while additional hundreds of others from local, state and national labor bodies are being enlisted while they remain on their union's payroll.

This procedure is deemed legal because the courts have held that unions can use staff personnel to reach the union membership.

Unions say they are aiming their political efforts at their members, and if the general public hears or sees those efforts, it is incidental.

Recently, William Clark was going to give a speech in Peoria during his campaign for the U.S. Senate seat from Illinois.

He had no one to meet him on his arrival in Peoria, nor plans for getting to his next stop, Springfield, about 80 miles to the south.

One phone call to a union official solved that problem. Clark was met by a union staff man at the airport, delivered by car to the Peoria rally, then, along with his aides, taken down to Springfield in time for the next rally.

At the Springfield session, a large portion of the audience was turned out by union leaders.

The assist to Clark was not unlike the San Diego corporation's plane ride for another candidate, but it points up a major asset unions have:

The San Diego company operates its plane only for the benefit of a few politicians. Unions are usually able to coordinate their efforts on a national scale for hundreds of political candidates.

Businessmen are often dismayed that their own organizations are less effective than labor's Committee on Political Education, and they are trying now to copy it with such groups as BIPAC (Business-Industry Political Action Committee).

An example of the difference between union and business support for a political candidate is seen in Rep. James Corman's 22nd Congressional District in the San Fernando Valley, where he has the endorsement of all organized labor.

Recently Corman talked far less about labor and more about a Volkswagen dealer in Van Nuys.

"Life has been good to Jack Foreman. He is an auto dealer who sees politics as a way to help people. And he alone will produce more cash for my campaign this time than all of organized labor."

ARRANGES DINNER

Foreman calls 20 or so of his business friends, has a "little dinner" for which he charges a nominal amount, then asked for contributions to the man he admires most in Congress: Corman.

Corman estimates he will spend about $60,000 in this year's race against Republican Joe Holt, but only 15% will come from labor.

While the Volkswagen dealer will collect more from his fund-raisers, the difference is that he is an individual, and his influence is limited to Van Nuys.

Unions usually support not just Corman in Van Nuys, but most other liberal congressmen.

This is not always true, of course, but it is this kind of potential coordinated strength which labor is beginning to realize more and more.

But that strength is not always coordinated. For instance, AFL-CIO President George Meany was pushing Humphrey into the campaign this year within hours after President Johnson announced he would not run for reelection.

Other union leaders were urged to do the same.

Shortly thereafter, the Chicago Federation of Labor leaders drafted a resolution to endorse Humphrey.

But Chicago's Mayor Richard J. Daley said, "No," and the idea was dropped.

Daley wanted to withhold support for Humphrey until the last minutes of the Democratic Convention, and he did—not just his own political machine's support, but that of Chicago labor, too.

While that kind of local pressure weakens labor's political muscles, the Vietnam war is cutting even further into the strength of labor in politics.

In Ohio, the AFL–CIO unions gave a reported $400,000 to John J. Gilligan for his successful primary campaign against Democratic incumbent, Sen. Frank J. Lausche.

Lausche had long been a target of unions because of his conservatism. Gilligan is pro-labor and liberal, and dovish on the Vietnam war.

After the primary, Al Barkan, AFL–CIO political director, at Humphrey's request, wrote Gilligan for clarification of his Vietnam position. When Gilligan stuck to his anti-war stance, reports circulated that labor money to him had been halted.

"Sure we slowed down our support for him," said one labor official. He said Gilligan's war position "was like a kick in the rear to his labor friends . . . and to President Johnson."

Barkan, however, insisted that labor money and manpower is still going to help toward the election of Gilligan, "although maybe there is a little less ethusiasm for him."

This kind of dilution of labor's strength in politics because of the Vietnam issue is evident in other Senate races, including those of Sens. J. William Fulbright of Arkansas, George S. McGovern of South Dakota; Wayne Morse of Oregon; Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin, Frank Church of Idaho, and Sen. Joseph Clark of Pennsylvania.

Clark said recently that "I have got to get the peace vote in Pennsylvania, or I am dead."

Yet if he pushes too hard for that peace vote, the far more hawkish labor leaders at the national AFL–CIO level are going to be less than enthusiastic in pushing for Clark's election.

The battle between union leaders and the antiwar doves was also clearly in evidence in New York where Paul O'Dwyer, the Democratic candidate for the Senate charged that "Meany laid down the law in an effort to punish me for my refusal to back Hubert Humphrey and my opposition to the war in Vietnam."

JAVITS BACKED

The AFL–CIO has endorsed Sen. Jacob K. Javits, a liberal Republican, who generally supports Administration policy on the war, against O'Dwyer.

Another weakening effect on labor's political clout for liberalism are local self-interests of unions.

Charles Halleck, the former House Republican leader, had the support of the Northern Illinois building trade unions even though to most union leaders he was the symbol of the Republican-Dixiecrat coalition which has often blocked labor-backed legislation.

The building trades backed Halleck because he supported their opposition to creation of the Dunes National Park on Lake Michigan, a project which the building trades saw as a damper on industrial construction along the lakeshore.

These local self-interest situations go contrary to the generally broad-based effort of unions to back liberal legislation even if it is unrelated to unionism, such as federal aid to education.

NOT MONOLITHIC

But they also disprove the charge by labor's enemies that it is a monolithic operation, with no local level control.

Some of the most active unions politically spend most of their money and manpower on issues pertaining almost exclusively to their own industry.

Paul Hall's Seafarers' International Union raises about $500,000 a year from its 80,000 members, and most of it goes to support congressmen sympathetic to the maritime legislative goals of the union.

This raises another point in connection with labor's political strength: How much of the voluntarily collected money unions raise is truly voluntary?

Hall says all of it. But his opponents contend that when a sailor docks at his home port and is paid off, he is hard-pressed to reject an SIU port agent's request for political donations when the agent may have a voice in the sailor's next trip.

Spot checks of voluntary collections indicate that while many unions use high-pressure political salesmanship to get the donations, there are no widespread instances of improper tactics being used.

OPPOSITE EXAMPLES

But there are examples to the contrary. Take Lawrence L. Callanan, head of the Pipefitters Local 562 in St. Louis, who was recently convicted of falsely claiming that his union's political fund was voluntarily given.

Callanan, a major power in St. Louis politics for the last 20 years, has a political fund of between $400,000 and $600,000 a year.

After Callanan was fined $1,000 and sentenced to a year in jail for conspiring to make illegal contributions to a federal level political campaign, he issued a statement, saying:

"The very least we hope that will result from this trial is that Congress will see fit to pass realistic laws governing election and campaign expenses that are fair and equitable to everyone."

The case is being appealed.

Plans for the future intensification of union activities in politics are elaborate, ranging from computerized crosschecks of every union member in the country to payroll deductions for union political funds.

NINETY PERCENT PARTICIPATION

The Teamsters Union is pushing a program in which its members authorize employers to deduct $5 a year from their paychecks.

Ted Merrill, head of the Southern California Joint Council of Teamsters, said that while the program is just getting started in the Los Angeles area, "we are getting up to 90% of those asked to okay the deductions."

And the only pressure used, he said, is to "explain what it means for workers to join in electing political candidates who are pro-labor."

Unions are still the strongest organized force for old-fashioned liberalism in the country, backing almost every piece of liberal legislation whether or not it is related directly to labor matters.

Union leaders did play the major role in getting Vice President Humphrey the Democratic nomination, and if he is elected, they will have played the decisive role in that now unexpected achievement.

But as of today the unions are not only failing to deliver the political clout they hoped for, but they are suffering the most severe wrenchings of their political muscles in modern times.

GOP ACCUSES UNIONS OF USING DUES FOR DRIVE

Richard Nixon's Oklahoma campaign organization accused the AFL–CIO Tuesday of using dues of union members to campaign for Democratic presidential nominee Hubert H. Humphrey.

Goodwin Broaddus, Jr., state chairman of the Republican presidential nominee's state campaign committee, called for an investigation by the state corporation commission, the internal revenue service and the state tax commission.

"It is absolutely unfair to members who are opposed to Mr. Humphrey to spend their union dues to support a man in whom they have no faith and cannot believe," Broaddus said.

Broaddus said the state AFL–CIO last week mailed tens of thousands of letters to both union and non-union members over the signature of Humphrey.

"This mis-use of funds is in direct violation of the regulations that give the AFL–CIO tax-exempt status and it violates the moral obligation of the organization to its members who are not for Mr. Humphrey," Broaddus said.

Broaddus said the letters carry a postage meter stamp granted to non-profit organizations, which he said permits the organization to mail letters for 1¼ cents each. He said the meter is registered by the post office to the Oklahoma State AFL–CIO.

Officials of the union could not be reached for comment.

REUTHER'S CONGLOMERATE: AUTO UNION WORTH HITS $125 MILLION MARK—PREPARES FOR NEW GLOBAL CAMPAIGNS

(By Victor Riesel)

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Walter Reuther, now preparing for national and global campaigns, hates thinking of himself as part of the establishment. But he is. The red-haired, new revolutionary, rhetoric notwithstanding, is deep in the black. As a union chief who has been needling other labor leaders with "charges" of "banker's mentality," the auto union head now runs a labor conglomerate worth at least $125 million.

If he is not careful, the United Auto Workers (UAW), of which he is chief executive officer, soon will rival some of those 200 capitalist corporations he denounces so passionately so regularly.

A shuffling of the UAW's latest financial records disclose some startling Keynesian spending.

The small print reveals that Mr. Reuther and his board of directors spent mightily last year to defeat Richard Nixon. Virtually all of the union's $2.1 million "Citizenship Fund" went for political stakes in the '68 race. This does not include the pay and expenses for 916 national headquarters field men known as "International Representatives." In the final months of the campaign, virtually all of these men spent virtually all their time campaigning against the Republican front runner. On the cost line, as the accountants say, this would come to many millions of dollars.

Nor does the "Citizenship Fund's" $2.1 million spent last year, include the monies poured out by the national union's regions and its 1,383 local unions.

The money is there—it all comes out of an average dues payment of $7 per member per month—or roundly some $126 million annually.

Some of this money goes regularly into the "Strike Insurance Fund"—now well over $86 million. But this figure apparently still is in the petty cash stage. Mr. Reuther plans to have a record-breaking $120 million in this strike fund by August, 1970—when the "Big Three" car company contracts start expiring.

The union's high command just doesn't want to get caught short again as it was during the 1967-1968 rounds of negotiations. At that time, the UAW spent some $80 million paying its people an average of $35 a week in strike relief.

Mr. Reuther knows that the phasing out of the Vietnam War will hit his membership hard, for his conglomerate union reaches into the aerospace, aircraft, jet engine and agricultural implement fields as well as the car and truck factories.

It's too early to predict a strike wave. But certainly the redhead is preparing for long walkouts as it gets tougher to overheat a deflating economy.

The Union's records show that this division spent almost one million dollars abroad last year. And that the cash source, known as the "Free World Labor Defense Fund", has still another million dollars in reserve.

Much of this money goes for Mr. Reuther's own brand of global unionism. The UAW supports quite heavily, an international Swiss-based metalworkers federation. In it is an automotive division headed by Mr. Reuther. In it is a network of "Automotive Councils" headquartered in Geneva, Switzerland. One council covers all locals in General Motors' plants ranging from Britain to Australia, another council covers Ford. Still a third covers Chrysler-Roote.

They are nurtured by the continent hopping Victor Reuther, who with his brother, hope some day to be able to run simultaneous world-wide strikes. It is not difficult to spend a million dollars to dig deeply into labor movements abroad.

At the same time the big union will spend over $3 million organizing on the home front. This will not include another $1.7 million annually to help subsidize the Alliance for Labor Action.

Rarely has a single international union poured out so much of its cash. Rarely has a union experimented so readily with its funds.

Rarely has a union been able to turn conglomerate so easily, for rarely has one been so deeply in the vortex of war production with its constant steady employment.

Rarely has a union had a steady income of $126 million annually.

It's indeed an establishment of its own.

MEANY GEARING LABOR FOR BIG POLITICAL EFFORT

WASHINGTON.—AFL–CIO president George Meany—worried about prospects for Senate and House liberals in the 1970 elections—already is gearing organized labor for a mighty political effort next year.

"This is where the blue chips will be down," Meany said in a recent speech to the painters' union convention. "We could be badly hurt in 1970 if we lost a few friends in the Senate and a few more in the House."

He said at least eight labor-backed senators who won by less than 5% of the vote in 1964 are "facing a real tough election" in 1970. The same holds true for 30 liberal House members who scored narrow victories last year, Meany added.

"The John Birchers, the so-called right-wing forces, would like to take control of the Senate in 1970, and you know what that means," said Meany. "That would put us under the domination of 'old curly locks'—an obvious reference to Senate Republican leader Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois.

"There is not much sense in thinking about 1972 until we have solved the election problems of 1970," Meany added.

He praised the AFL–CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) and its director, Al Barkan, for running "one of the best political machines ever put together."

In a backward glance at the 1968 campaign, Meany aired one of his rare public criticisms of the Democrats.

"Even though the party of our presidential candidate, the Democratic party, was woefully ineffective and torn asunder by internal strife, the fact that Hubert Humphrey came close is to the credit of COPE, not to the party whose label he carried," the labor leader said.

Although Meany did not mention any names in his address to the painters' union delegates, labor sources said substantial AFL–CIO support probably would be extended to the following Democratic senators in 1970: Quentin A. Burdick, North Dakota; Philip A. Hart, Michigan; Vance Hartke, Indiana; Henry M. Jackson, Washington; Gale W. McGee, Wyoming; Joseph Montoya, New Mexico; Frank E. Moss, Utah; Joseph D. Tydings, Maryland, and Ralph W. Yarborough, Texas.

Republican senators who may receive some labor backing include Hugh Scott, Pennsylvania, and Hiram L. Fong, Hawaii.

Meany warned against candidates who used the "law and order" slogan to fight against progressive public officials.

"The high-power publicity people of this country, who are employed by the extreme right wing, by the Birchers, have converted the so-called 'law and order' slogan into something that is antiliberal and antiprogressive," Meany said.

"In other words, they are trying to make crime synonymous with liberalism," he added. "This campaign has been used recently in a few city elections and this gives us a great deal of concern."

He apparently referred to mayoral contests in Los Angeles, Minneapolis and New York City where candidates most strongly espousing "law and order" won upset victories.

WORKERS PROTEST DUES FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES—104 DEMAND REFUND FROM UAW LOCAL

(By Gerald McKelvey)

A group of 104 employes at Leeds & Northrup's North Wales plant have asked for a refund of dues paid to the United Auto Workers which were used for political campaign promotion.

All members of UAW Local 1350, the workers sent individual letters to local president Arthur Stump stating their demands.

Stump told The Inquirer that he reacted in direct fashion.

"When I got the letters, I threw them all in the wastebasket," he said.

DO NOT RECOGNIZE

"These men are not proceeding in a proper fashion. If they write to me individually and express real sincerity, I'll be glad to take the matter up with the local's executive committee and from there to the top," Stump stated.

He added that the letters were all sent in one envelope, with the imprint of Montgomery Employes for Right-to-Work, "an organization I do not recognize."

The county group is affiliated with Pennsylvanians for Right-to-Work, a group which advocates abolition of compulsory union membership in industry.

William Lemon, an employe at the eastern Montgomery county plant and chairman of the county Right-to-Work chapter, said the refund request was a test of the UAW's "sincerity" on changes in its constitution which allow members to request a return of that portion of their dues for political purposes.

"We want to find out whether the changes in the UAW charter are really meaningful or just a smokescreen to dodge more lawsuits like those filed by UAW employes in California and Oklahoma challenging the use of compulsory union dues for political purposes as a violation of their constitutional rights," Lemon said.

Informed of the junking of the letters, Lemon said his group "will take action, but right now, we're not sure what action."

OUTLINES DIFFERENCES

Lemon added that he was surprised at Stump's action and went on to outline differences which have arisen at the North Wales plant since the union entered it about a year ago.

"The Right-to-Work group has been forming for the past six months," said Lemon, "and is the outgrowth of a larger unit, Workers for Leeds & Northrup for an Honest Union."

He explained that before the UAW arrived on the scene, the approximately 2000 workers at the plant had their own, independent bargaining unit.

When a vote was taken for accepting UAW as the bargaining agent, the ballot was marked three ways: For the UAW, for retaining the independent union, or for having no union at all.

"The UAW got in on a little less than 50 percent of those voting," Lemon said, "so it had the support of less than half of the workers to start. It's been slipping since then."

Stump suggested that the letters asking for a refund were prompted more on political grounds than on the basis of testing the UAW's sincerity.

"Most of these people are not Republicans (the union supported Humphrey and Muskie) but are Wallaceites," Stump said.

He went on to say that the UAW local had not violated any political rules and that it was within the law in supporting the Democratic standard-bearers.

"We are not allowed to directly contribute to a candidate's campaign," said Stump, "but according to our counsel, we're all right in soliciting support." This would not apparently invalidate the refund request, however.

Under a 1961 decision by the U.S. Supreme Court, which was written for the railway union but has been extended to all unions, a man who was compelled to join a union was given the right to ask for a refund of dues money spent for political purposes.

UNION VERSUS THE GOP: LABOR MAPS BIG DRIVE TO ASSIST DEMOCRATS IN RACES FOR CONGRESS—WORK BEGINS AT THE DISTRICT LEVEL FOR 1970—AFL-CIO TO HIT NIXON TAX STAND—GEORGE MEANY AIDS EFFORT

(By Richard J. Levine)

ATLANTIC CITY—Organized labor's political strategists, starting earlier than ever before, are readying a massive defense of their last major national stronghold—the Democratic Congress.

Though the 1970 Congressional elections are still more than a year away, AFL-CIO politicos have been hard at work for the last half-year on ways to help elect or reelect liberal lawmakers friendly to union causes. These include such Senate Democrats as Labor Committee Chairman Ralph Yarborough of Texas, Albert Gore of Tennessee and Vance Hartke of Indiana, to name just a few.

Building on lessons learned in 1968, when it played a crucial role in Hubert Humphrey's fast-closing finish, the AFL-CIO is developing new techniques that demonstrate the growing sophistication and scope of its political operation.

For the first time, the Committee on Political Education (COPE), the AFL-CIO's political arm, has quietly set up a special subcommittee to concentrate on close House races. The committee has already assigned to one union or another the responsibility for coordinating all political activity in each of some 80 House districts. The closely guarded assignment list shows, for instance, that the United Steelworkers' responsibility includes the 3rd in Colorado, held by Democrat Frank Evans; the 4th in New Jersey, represented by Democrat Frank Thompson, and the 2nd in New Mexico, where Republican Edgar Foreman is considered beatable.

REGISTERING UNION VOTERS

The federation has also begun to conduct annual rather than biennial voter registration drives, financing them from its general treasury; in the past, COPE had to depend on voluntary union contributions for such work. COPE expects to dole out about $500,000 this year for registration activity. About $250,000 has already been approved for operations in 17 states. These efforts, while broad and nonpartisan, will concentrate first on registering union members, their families and others likely to vote for labor's friends.

A particularly intensive drive is just now getting under way in Texas, where registration opened Wednesday for a four-month period and where voters must be registered anew for each Congressional election. COPE plans to pour $20,000 into Texas and expects local labor groups will add perhaps $140,000. Union politicians figure Sen. Yarborough will be nearly unbeatable if 4.5 million voters register. "We're going to win this election in the registration period," says one Yarborough backer.

"In two decades," declares James Cuff O'Brien, the steelworkers' savvy and dapper political action director, "I haven't seen as early and thorough preparation" by labor for an election.

The importance to labor of the 1970 elections will be strongly stressed during the AFL-CIO biennial convention, which opened here yesterday. According to federation President George Meany, who proudly describes COPE as "one of the best political machines" in the country, "1970 is the year when the chips are really down."

GAINS IN SPECIAL ELECTIONS

"There isn't much sense in thinking about 1972 until we solve the election problems of 1970," he said recently. "This is no time to rest on our laurels."

Heeding such advice, labor has plunged into the five special House elections held so far this year. The results have been encouraging to union men: Four victories, three of them in districts formerly held by Republicans.

To snatch GOP seats in Wisconsin, Montana and just this week in Massachusetts, labor committed considerable money and manpower. John Schmitt, president of the Wisconsin AFL-CIO, estimates that unions contributed about $20,000 to the successful campaign of state Assemblyman David Obey for the seat formerly held by Melvin Laird, now Secretary of Defense. Mr. Obey had the help of nine full-time and nine part-time volunteers from the ranks of labor.

Montana Democrat John Melcher says union support was "a strong factor in my election." Labor contributed $10,400 to his $73,000 campaign, in which the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Carpenters, the Steelworkers and the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers were active.

Even in their one losing battle—the California race in which Barry Goldwater Jr. defeated Democrat John Van de Kamp—labor men figure their efforts helped to reduce the Republican margin from the previous election. In the final four days of the campaign, the Machinists Union had 60 members working full-time.

FEARS OF NEW CURBS

Spurring this unprecedented off-year activity is the contention of labor officials—whether right or wrong—that loss of Congress next year could produce a flood of legislation designed to curb union power. Declares COPE's national director, Alexander Barkan:

"We've lost the White House. We've lost the Supreme Court. Our only hope is holding the Congress. . . . We're well aware of the stakes."

The dimensions of the task confronting labor's political strategists are formidable, particularly in the Senate, where the Democrats now hold a 57–43 edge. Next year 35 Senate seats will be contested, 25 of which are occupied by Democrats and only 10 by Republicans. Among the Democrats, 21 are ranked by the AFL-CIO as "liberals on labor and social welfare issues," with a combined record of 707 "right" votes and only 95 "wrong" votes.

COPE officials figure that nine of these Senators—including Howard Cannon of Nevada, Joseph Montoya of New Mexico, Quentin Burdick of North Dakota, Frank Moss of Utah, Gale McGee of Wyoming and Stephen Young of Ohio along with Sens. Yarborough, Gore and Hartke—face tough races in 1970. Some of these men were elected by less than 55% of the total vote in 1964.

On the House side, where the Democrats outnumber Republicans 245 to 188, union politicos believe 78 seats could easily go either way; of these, 48 are now Democratic and 30 Republican.

To maintain Democratic control of both Houses in the face of this arithmetic, labor planners readily concede they'll need the right issues as well as effective organization.

Until recently, says a top AFL–CIO staffer, "Nixon has kept a low profile. There hasn't been a helluva lot to swing at." But, he adds, "he laid himself wide open" when he proposed that the corporate income-tax rate be reduced while tax relief provided low-and-middle-income families in the House-passed reform bill be cut back.

A glance at almost any union newspaper these days shows how labor is using this issue. Under a bold headline in the Machinists' paper that reads "Nixon Tax Plan Reverses Steps Toward Tax Justice" is a story that starts: "The Nixon Administration has bowed to Wall Street and the corporation lobbies and is now moving to halt Congress' modest progress toward tax justice. . . ."

KEEPING THE ISSUES FRESH

Many labor strategists believe the health of the economy may prove the key issue in 1970. If the Administration's anti-inflationary policies produce "an additional million unemployment, another million on short-time and a few million more worried that they're next, anything can happen," observes Mr. Barkan of COPE.

The efforts of union lobbyists on Capitol Hill next year will dovetail with labor's election goals. Most of Congress' work on Nixon proposals opposed by labor, including welfare reform, job safety and unemployment compensation, will be left till 1970. For tactical reasons, "it's good the fights in Congress will come next year," says the AFL–CIO's chief lobbyist, Andrew Biemiller. "That way the issues will be fresh in our members' minds."

As part of the get-ready-early-for-1970 process, the COPE operating committee held a three day meeting here this week before the convention started. On the agenda were status reports on voter registration drives and the subcommittee dealing with close House contests.

That subcommittee, headed by Amalgamated Clothing Workers Vice President Howard Samuel, was formed last February. Represented on it are 15 unions, among them the Steelworkers, Seafarers, Machinists, Meatcutters, Airline Clerks, Clothing Workers and Ladies Garment Workers. The Steelworkers and the Machinists, the AFL–CIO's two largest affiliates, have been assigned political coordinating responsibilities in 12 Congressional districts apiece.

ASSIGNING STAFF MEMBERS

The top officials of the unions designated to coordinate efforts in Congressional districts are just starting to call meetings of other unions in their areas to form COPE district committees. In some places, they have also begun to designate union staff people to work on political activities.

Mr. Samuel views the project as an attempt to organize the labor movement for political activity "along Congressional lines." By getting staff people who know a district involved in politics well before Election Day, it's hoped that labor's efforts will be more productive. "Staff people can't be effective when they're thrown into a strange district on Aug. 30," Mr. Samuel says. "By the time they're operating at full capacity it's Election Day."

In addition, Mr. Meany has given his okay to tentative plans to assign union presidents as coordinators in states were labor's political organization is weak or the races are especially tough.

Indeed, labor politicians say that Mr. Meany, who once doubted the need for an organization such as COPE, has never been more responsive to their needs. In fact, it was Mr. Meany who proposed in February that registration drives be financed out of the AFL–CIO treasury and conducted on a continuing basis whenever and wherever registration books are open.

CONTRIBUTIONS LAG

Not so promising at this point are individual union efforts to raise voluntary contributions for COPE that can be used for partisan political activity. While a few unions such as the Communications Workers and the Allied Industrial Workers report donations are running ahead of last year, many others are encountering difficulty.

Don Ellinger, national director of the Machinists Nonpartisan Political League, says COPE contributions are running about $100,000 behind last year's pace, when rank-and-filers contributed a total of $480,000.

As they look ahead to 1970, COPE officials find it difficult to avoid a proud backward glance at their accomplishments in 1968, when in Mr. Barkan's view labor proved itself as a "major political force." Recently the AFL-CIO distributed an excerpt from Theodore H. White's book The Making of the President 1968, in which he details the federation's effort on behalf of Mr. Humphrey. Writes Mr. White:

"The dimension of the AFL-CIO effort . . . can be caught only in its final summary figures: The ultimate registration, by labor's efforts, of 4.6 million voters; the printing and distribution of 55 million pamphlets and leaflets out of Washington, 60 million more from local unions; telephone banks in 638 localities, using 8,055 telephones, manned by 24,611 union men and women and their families; some 72,225 house-to-house canvassers; and, on Election Day, 94,457 volunteers serving as car-poolers, materials-distributors, baby-sitters, poll-watchers, telephoners."

Comments Mr. Barkan:

"We're going to try to mount the same kind of campaign among our members in 1970. We think our organization is getting more effective each campaign."

LABOR AND HUMPHREY: UNIONS MAP BIG DRIVE FOR DEMOCRATIC TICKET BUT REMAIN PESSIMISTIC—AFL-CIO PLAN CALLS FOR USE OF ORGANIZERS IN CAMPAIGN—15 KEY STATES ARE TARGETS—FIGHTING LOSSES TO WALLACE

(By James P. Gannon)

NEW YORK—The chieftains of organized labor are about to launch a massive rescue operation designed to save the foundering Presidential campaign ship of their candidate, Vice President Hubert Humphrey.

The elaborate scheme, rated the most detailed vote-getting plan ever drafted by the AFL-CIO's political agents, is an admission by union leaders that they believe the Humphrey ship is headed for disaster on its current course. The effort involves an unprecedented mobilization of labor's resources, including money, machinery and especially manpower, in 15 big industrial states with lots of union members and enough electoral votes to elect a President.

This campaign plan was approved by AFL-CIO President George Meany this week as he met with top union men in closed-door sessions at the Commodore Hotel here; the sessions were climaxed yesterday as the AFL-CIO's general board of 125 union presidents formally ratified Mr. Meany's earlier endorsement of the Humphrey candidacy.

ORGANIZERS ASSIGNED TO CAMPAIGN

Many details of the save-Humphrey drive remain secret, but participants in the huddles here say the 15-state battle plan envisions putting "hundreds" of union staff men to work full-time on the Humphrey drive. They report that Mr. Meany has released the entire AFL-CIO organizing staff, totaling around 100 men, to work steadily on recruiting voters for Mr. Humphrey rather than new members for unions. In addition, individual unions are being asked to assign squads of their staff members to the drive.

The goal is to get at least two union staffers working for candidate Humphrey in each Congressional district of the 15 states. To oversee their work and to signify the importance of the effort, the AFL-CIO's top brass has been assigned specific states. For example, P. L. Siemiller, president of the million-member Machinists Union, will command the Illinois operation, and United Steelworkers Chief I. W. Abel will direct the campaign in his home state, Pennsylvania.

The tasks of the 15-state army will include spurring Democratic voter registration, organizing volunteer door-to-door canvassers and starting telephone get-out-the-vote drives. The union staff workers, says one labor politico, are "versatile, mobile guys, who have organizational skills, contacts in the community and access to a union hall and facilities."

The campaign will feature a blizzard of pro-Humphrey, anti-Nixon, anti-Wallace leaflets and other handouts. The AFL-CIO's political arm, the Committee on Political Education (COPE), is reportedly preparing over 50 million pieces of such literature for distribution by unions. A top planner says: "We want our people who may not have seen an organizer in years to see that guy out at the plant gate at 5:30 in the morning passing out leaflets so they'll realize just how important this election is."

WALLACE'S INROADS

The rescue operation seeks to shore up or even supplant the deteriorated and disorganized Democratic Party machinery and reverse the phenomenal tide toward third-party candidate George C. Wallace among labor's rank and file, a development that has shocked and embarrassed labor's hierarchy and has severely shrunk Mr. Humphrey's support within this usually solid Democratic voting bloc.

Despite the grandiose scheme, labor political experts remain worried that Mr. Humphrey is running so far behind Republican Richard Nixon that no amount of effort by labor can save him. "I'd feel much better if someone could explain to me how to win an election without carrying either New York or California," remarks one strategist, reflecting on Mr. Humphrey's uncertain prospects in the two most populous states.

At a press conference here yesterday, Mr. Meany did offer some apparently cheerful tidings for labor's political warriors. He disclosed that the national COPE has received a record-smashing $800,000 in voluntary contributions from union members so far this year, up from about $600,000 four years ago. And he reported that a COPE drive in eight major industrial states has so far registered an additional 1,160,000 union members to vote in November.

But most of the dollars raised will go into Congressional campaigns rather than the Presidential race. And many of the newly registered union voters are far from being sure Humphrey supporters.

Indeed, the decision to use union staffers for political operations on an unprecedented scale reflects labor's judgment that the regular Democratic organization is in sad shape.

"Lyndon Johnson left the party machinery almost in ruin," says one union's top political agent, complaining that the Democratic National Committee has shrunk in size and effectiveness during the Johnson years. Adds another: "The labor movement is the crutch Hubert Humphrey has to lean on" because of the crumbling of city and state Democratic machines.

A DISTURBING POLL

But the labor crutch now looks wobblier than ever because of the Wallace appeal to union members. Tales of "the Wallace problem" dominated corridor talk at the strategy sessions here. From one official's recounting of a Hammond, Ind., Wallace rally that was "wall-to-wall Steelworkers" to another's lament about union locals that are 65% to 75% for Wallace, the evidence of the Alabamian's inroads into the labor vote piled up. Even Mr. Meany has publicly admitted that "Wallace is fooling a lot of people, and among the people he is fooling are our members."

A Louis Harris poll, released during the three-day meeting here, underscored labor's political problem. It showed that 27% of union members preferred Mr. Wallace and as many picked Mr. Nixon, leaving Democrat Humphrey with a shockingly low 40% of the labor vote (the other 6% were undecided). There's quibbling, of course, over the exact size of Mr. Wallace's union support, but none of the strategists here doubts it is substantial.

Labor's counterattack against Mr. Wallace will vary from place to place and from union to union, but basically it will stress a bread-and-butter message: That he's antilabor. This line came through strong in yesterday's AFL-CIO statement endorsing Mr. Humphrey; expressing "open contempt" for the Wallace candidacy, it said "his pretense to be the friend of the worker is especially galling to the American labor movement."

The union's anti-Wallace campaign will involve a barrage of carefully conceived propaganda. In Maryland, the state AFL–CIO is putting out a four-page tabloid newspaper, to be distributed to workers at plant gates, which is headlined: "Do Maryland Workers Want Birmingham Wages?" and "How George Wallace Would Drag Our State Down to the Alabama Level." Inside, readers are told that per-capita income is only $2,166 a year in Alabama, compared with $3,454 in Maryland. On a similar pitch, a COPE pamphlet proclaims: "George Wallace could cost you $1,000 a year."

Besides stressing Alabama's lower-than-average wages, poorer unemployment benefits and "anti-union" right-to-work law, some of the anti-Wallace propaganda will try to hit back at the Alabamian's strong point—his law-and-order pitch.

The Pennsylvania AFL–CIO, for instance, plans blanket mailings to the state's 1.2 million AFL–CIO members of a pamphlet called "A Letter From Alabama." The state is identified in headline type as "The Crime Center of the United States." A handwritten message, purported to be a real letter from someone in Alabama to a friend in Pennsylvania, is reproduced. An excerpt: "Would (you) believe that Alabama actually has much more violence and murder than Pennsylvania or almost any other state in spite of Wallace's propaganda?"

But the unions generally won't attack the Alabamian as a racist. "If we talk about his civil rights record, half our members would shout 'hurray!'" says one strategist.

Significantly, it's understood that union officials are having trouble getting some local leaders to stand up against Mr. Wallace because of his popularity among the rank and file. Any local leader who senses a Wallace tide running among his constituents may fear to struggle against it. "If Mr. Meany had to face his members for reelection, he might change his tune, too," snaps one bold union politician.

Also bothering some union men is the thought that their voter registration drives, for which COPE has budgeted $695,000, may partly backfire by putting lots of Wallace supporters on the voting rolls. Of every 100 union members registered, one labor strategist figures, the yield of sure Humphrey votes will be "maybe 55 or 57."

Another worry nagging some labor officials is that the stress on bread-and-butter issues won't effectively counter the Wallace appeal. Frets a Steelworkers official: "I just don't think our people could think that the threat of anti labor legislation is as important an issue this year as the riots in Newark or Detroit. I just don't think that message reaches them."

Many labor officials, it's true, believe the members can be wooed away from Mr. Wallace on the basis of bread-and-butter issues, but they fear that the campaign messages grandly conceived at COPE headquarters don't ever filter all the way down to the rank and file. Not many members attend union meetings regularly, and many don't pay much attention to their union newspapers, these officials worry.

Finally, there are pessimists in the labor camp who doubt that even a brilliantly executed COPE campaign can win the election for Mr. Humphrey. Says one: "I think Humphrey should resign as Vice President and really go out and cam-

Livonia To Fire Teacher for $96 Dues

(By Mary Lou Butcher)

Refusal to pay annual dues of $96 to the Livonia Education Association (LEA) under an agency shop agreement has cost Mrs. Ruth E. Williams her job as a teacher in the suburb's school system.

The Livonia Board of Education voted, 6–1, last night to fire the Garfield Elementary School fourth grade teacher when the term ends next month.

Mrs. Williams, 57, a Livonia teacher for six years, said she had belonged to the LEA but dropped out last fall when the clause was included in the contract with the board of education.

In an agency shop, workers are not required to join the union, but they must pay dues.

Mrs. Williams said she regards this as "coercive and unprofessional."

"I have always believed that if one prepared and qualified himself for a profession and did a commendable, conscientious job, there would always be a place for him in that profession," she told a hearing last week. "Apparently, Livonia educators do not agree with this concept."

The board and LEA spokesmen said her dismissal was required if she refused to make the payment.

"The board had no alternative," said School Supt. Benton Yates. "They were merely following the advice of their attorney to honor the contract."

Roger Stephon, LEA executive secretary, called the action "unfortunate," and said Mrs. Williams is a "fine teacher whose professional qualifications were never in question."

"The purpose of the agency shop," he declared, "is to encourage people to pay what we consider their fair share for negotiation and representation."

Mrs. Williams was the only one of 1,600 teachers in the Western Wayne County district to be fired for refusing to pay. Another who balked at the agency shop requirement resigned last month.

Senator WILLIAMS. The next witness is Roger A. Clark, of the Morris and Gwendolyn Cafritz Foundation.

STATEMENT OF ROGER A. CLARK, COUNSEL, MORRIS AND GWENDOLYN CAFRITZ FOUNDATION; ACCOMPANIED BY CHARLES SIMMONS

Mr. CLARK. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this committee. I am a partner in the law firm of Royal, Koegel & Wells, which is counsel to the Morris and Gwendolyn Cafritz Foundation. I am accompanied this morning by my partner, Charles Simmons, who is, unlike myself, a tax lawyer.

My testimony this morning is limited to three narrow aspects of the business ownership and self-dealing provisions of H.R. 13270 which will have severe, unintended, and completely unwarranted consequences for the Cafritz Foundation and, I believe, other foundations similarly situated.

The Cafritz Foundation was formed in 1948 by Morris Cafritz, a major builder and developer in the Washington area. Until recently it has had relatively minor assets amounting to at the end of last year only $2.4 million. But over the past 15 years this small foundation has contributed over $1.7 million to charitable causes which represents over 123 percent of its earned income during that period.

Now in addition to regularly supporting established charities in this community, the Washington community, the foundation has made significant contributions to many special projects, many of which is helped formulate itself. I just want to mention briefly some of these contributions to illustrate the diversity of worthwhile charitable causes that a small foundation can serve and how these foundations can play a special role in the community in enriching its social and cultural life.

In the social field, for example, the foundation has made a major contribution which enabled the construction of a new hospital in Anacostia, contracted to pay the renovation cost of a community center in the Adams-Morgan area, and funded a program whereby District schoolteachers can work on masters degrees during the summer. These are things that the Government cannot effectively do and the private foundations are capable of doing.

In the cultural area, the foundation has purchased a monument for the Smithsonian Institution, which is located at the west end of the new Smithsonian building and it is currently financing an exhibit of the works of the famous sculptor David Smith at the Corcoran Art Gallery, a program which all children from the fourth to the sixth grades in this community will have an opportunity to see by special tours.

This foundation is soon to receive a substantial increase in its assets. It is the principal beneficiary under the will of Mr. Cafritz who died in 1964. Mr. Cafritz left a substantial real estate empire consisting primarily of stock in numerous corporations which directly or indirectly own a number of highly valuable real estate investments, office buildings, apartment houses, warehouses, and, in some instances, unimproved real estate. In addition, there is a hotel, a construction business, and a real estate management business.

Mr. Cafritz' will adopted a very common estate plan, which is still highly recommended although it may be changed by this legislation. But anyway, it was a very common estate plan at the time it was adopted. The effect of that estate plan is that a fractional two-thirds interest in most of his assets goes to a private foundation, the Cafritz Foundation, with the remaining one-third interest in each asset owned by a marital trust for the benefit of his wife.

Thus, the foundation will soon receive two-thirds of the voting stock of each of these corporations with one-third owned by the marital trust which would be a disqualified person.

Since Mr. Cafritz' death in 1964, the executors, with the approval of the directors of the foundation and the trustees of the marital trust, have acted to conserve these valuable real estate investments so that upon distribution they can be operated in a manner to yield the maximum annual income for charity and for the marital trust—their interests coincide in that regard.

In anticipation of receiving these funds, the foundation has formed an advisory committee of leading citizens in this community which are active in the arts and public service. They included William Walton, Chairman of the Fine Arts Commission; Congressman Fulton; Dillon Ripley, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution; Quincy Mumford, Librarian of Congress; and John Walker and Carter Brown, the past and present Directors of the National Gallery. Thus the Cafritz Foundation is well-prepared to make wise use of the substantial income which it expects to receive from these valuable investment properties.

Continued ownership of these assets by the foundation presents no realistic basis for potential abuse. At the same time it offers the clear prospect of a high yield for worthwhile charitable causes.

Now, I said when I started that my testimony would be limited to three narrow aspects of the legislation. I am not discussing the policy considerations for or against the business ownership limitation in general. I merely want to point out to you that two very narrow aspects of the business ownership limitation as it is presently drafted could, I believe, unintentionally require the foundation to sell its entire interest, possibly within a 2-year period, not only in the hotel business, the construction business, and the real estate management business, but also in the remaining real estate investment properties which are of a passive nature and which constitute the bulk of Mr. Cafritz' assets.

Moreover, because of the practical limitations upon the sale of fractional interests in closely held real estate ventures—it is simply not realistic to think we can sell 10 percent on the market with the large ownership interest held by the marital trust—it may also be necessary for the marital trust to dispose of some or all of its holdings during that period. Thus, it is possible that under the present bill both the foundation and the marital trust will be deprived of their entire interests in these valuable income-producing assets left to them by Mr. Cafritz.

Moreover, a forced sale of real estate properties of this magnitude in a single metropolitan area, even over a 10-year period, will undoubtedly risk substantial losses in value.

What are the two narrow aspects of the bill I am talking about?

First of all, the broad language of the business ownership limitation would appear to limit foundation ownership of real estate investments of a passive nature which traditionally have been recognized as appropriate investments for charitable foundations.

Second, the transition provisions do not provide the necessary flexibility whereby the foundation and the marital trust or other disqualified parties can separate their combined ownership of these properties in an orderly manner.

Both of these narrow aspects of the bill can be remedied without in any way blunting the effectiveness of the business ownership limitation.

As I pointed out, real estate holdings of a passive nature have traditionally been recognized by the Congress and by others as appropriate investments for private foundations. The Treasury Department has consistently recommended in its 1965 report and again in 1969, that these investments be excluded from the business ownership limitation.

More importantly, there is simply no evidence in the extensive hearings before the Ways and Means Committee and the Patman committee, that real estate investments of a passive nature present a potential for abuse or they are in any way contrary to the public interest.

Now, in view of this absence of any evidence of potential abuse, we feel that the failure of the House to pick up the Treasury recommendation and expressly exclude real estate investments from the business ownership limitation was inadvertent. In any event, it is completely unwarranted and the Senate ought to correct it.

The need for adequate transition provisions is equally clear. The estate plan adopted by Mr. Cafritz is a very common one whereby fractional interests are left to a foundation and to members of a family. To avoid hardship in this situation, a foundation and disqualified persons should be given an opportunity to unscramble the eggs in a way that will not unnecessarily cause risk of loss. This can be done simply by allowing the foundation and the marital trust during the 10-year disposal period, to exchange stock or property interests in commonly held assets or to employ any of the wide range of corporate techniques such as liquidations or redemptions that would achieve the same purpose. This should reduce the risk of serious loss since fewer forced sales may be necessary if the parties can unscramble their interests, and foundations will be able to sell what excess business holdings they have left much more readily because they will be able to sell full ownership interests which should be more marketable than fractional interests in closely held companies.

At the same time, the purposes of the bill, and of the business ownership provision in particular, will be fully served.

To produce a fully equitable result in this regard it is also necessary to have nonrecognition of gain or loss in connection with the exchanges of stock for stock. The reasons for this and the precedents in the code in similar situations are set forth in my statement.

Senator BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the witness' attention that his time went out with the bell and I hope he is not about halfway through.

Mr. CLARK. I did not realize the time was going that fast.

The last point I would make, Senator Bennett, and very quickly, is that all of these properties are managed by a common management company. The problem that we face is that in order to maintain the value of that company as an asset of the foundation and in order to allow the properties to be managed in an orderly fashion, we believe that a limited exception from the self-dealing rules is required. Otherwise there will be a substantial loss in the value of this company, and the foundation will be deprived of an opportunity to realize its maximum return from these investment properties.

Accordingly, we request a limited exception from the self-dealing rules which would permit continuation of these common management services. In the alternative, we request a transition provision that would allow us to provide such services during the disposal period so we can dispose of the company without a substantial loss in value.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask Mr. Clark, would you furnish for the record your comments on whether you can live with amendment No. 222.

Mr. CLARK. I will. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

(The comments referred to above had not been received at the time of printing. Mr. Clark's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF ROGER A. CLARK, COUNSEL, MORRIS AND GWENDOLYN CAFRITZ FOUNDATION

SUMMARY

Three narrow aspects of the business ownership and self-dealing provisions of H.R. 13270 will have severe, unnecessary and completely unwarranted consequences on the Cafritz Foundation—which during the past 15 years has distributed over 123% of its annual income to charity—and other foundations similarly situated. These consequences can be avoided or their impact reduced without in any way blunting the effectiveness of the proposed reforms.

These three aspects of H.R. 13270 and the reasons that they warrant revision or clarification can be summarized as follows:

1. Passive real estate investments should be expressly exempted from the excess business holdings provisions of the bill. The reasons for this are:

(a) Real estate investments of a passive nature have traditionally been recognized as appropriate investments for private foundations.

(b) The Treasury Department has consistently recommended that they be excluded from the business ownership limitation.

(c) There is no evidence in the extensive hearings that they present a potential for abuse or are otherwise contrary to the public interest.

(d) Neither of the arguments advanced for the business ownership limitation apply to passive real estate investments.

2. The transition provisions of the bill need additional flexibility so as to permit orderly separation of interests owned by foundations in combination with disqualified persons. Under the will of its donor, the Cafritz Foundation will receive a ⅔ interest in a number of business and investment assets while the remaining ⅓ of each asset will be owned by a marital trust. The resulting combined ownership of assets is probably common to many foundations. To avoid unnecessary hardship and the risk of serious loss, foundations and disqualified persons need to be expressly allowed to separate their combined ownership during the 10-year disposal period by

(1) exchanging stock or property interests in commonly owned assets and

(2) employing any of the wide range of corporate techniques, such as liquidations or redemptions, which would achieve the same purpose.

This will result in reduction of risk of serious loss since fewer forced sales will be required and foundations will be able to sell full ownership interests, which are far more marketable. At the same time, the purposes of the bill will be fully served.

In this regard, it is also important that nonrecognition of gain or loss be permitted in connection with exchanges of stock for stock which are made in order to comply with the bill.

3. Continuation of common management services should be permitted.—

(a) All Cafritz real estate properties are managed by a common management company which will also be owned ⅔ by the foundation and ⅓ by the marital trust.

(b) Unless this management company can continue to manage all of the properties, its business will be severely disrupted and the value of its stock as an asset of the foundation will sharply decline. Moreover, the foundation's ability to maximize its income from its real estate investments might also be diminished since it would not have the services of a highly efficient managerial staff which is fully familiar with the properties involved.

(c) There is no possibility for abuse in permitting a continuation of common management services on a nonpreferential basis since such services are commercially available and their value can be readily determined.

STATEMENT

My name is Roger A. Clark and I am a partner in the law firm of Royall, Koegel & Wells which is counsel to The Morris and Gwendolyn Cafritz Foundation. My testimony is limited to the following narrow aspects of the business ownership and self-dealing provisions of H.R. 13270:

1. The apparent limitation upon ownership by private foundations of real estate investments of a passive nature.

2. Inadequacies in the transition provisions with respect to divestitures of excess business holdings in the common situation where a testator has left fractional interests in business and investment assets to a private foundation and other members of his family.

3. The self-dealing rules insofar as they prohibit a disqualified person from supplying services to a foundation at nonpreferential commercially available rates.

These aspects of the bill will have severe, unintended and completely unwarranted consequences for the Cafritz Foundation and many other private foundations similarly situated—consequences which can be avoided without in any way blunting the effectiveness of the reform proposals. This statement outlines these consequences, the public policy considerations which require that they be remedied, and our recommendations as to the technical modifications of the bill necessary.

The Cafritz Foundation

The Cafritz Foundation was formed in 1948. Until recently, the foundation has had relatively modest assets amounting at the end of last year to approximately $2.4 million. Over the past 15 years, however, it has contributed over $1.7 million—amounting to over 123% of its income—to charity. In addition to regularly supporting established charities, major contributions have been made to the Cafritz Memorial Hospital in Southeast Washington and to the Smithsonian Institution, the latter in the form of a gift of the monument by the renowned sculptor, Alexander Calder, located at the west end of the New History and Technology Building.

The foundation is the principal beneficiary under the will of Morris Cafritz, a major builder in the Washington area who died in 1964 leaving an estate of very substantial value. Mr. Cafritz's will adopted a common estate plan, the effect of which is that a fractional ⅔ interest in most of his assets is soon to be distributed to the Cafritz Foundation with the remaining interest in each asset going to a marital trust for the benefit of his widow. These assets consist primarily of stock in numerous corporations which directly or indirectly own a number of highly valuable real estate investment properties such as office buildings, apartment buildings, warehouses and unimproved land. In addition, there is a hotel, a construction company and a real estate management company. Thus, the foundation will soon own ⅔ of the voting stock in each of these corporations, with the remaining ⅓ stock interest owned in each instance by a marital trust.

Since Mr. Cafritz's death in 1964, the intention of the executors of his estate, the directors of the foundation and the trustees of the marital trust has been to conserve the valuable assets of these corporations so that, upon distribution, they can be operated in a manner which will maximize annual income to the foundation and the marital trust.

Continued ownership of these assets by the foundation presents no realistic basis for potential abuse—and at the same time offers the clear prospect of a high yield for worthwhile charitable causes.

Unless H.R. 13270 is clarified or modified in the respects requested herein however, the foundation may be forced to sell—possibly within a two-year period—its entire interest not only in the hotel, construction and real estate management businesses, but also in the remaining real estate investments which are of a passive nature. Moreover, because of practical limitations upon the sale of fractional interests in real estate ventures, it may be necessary for the marital trust to dispose of some or all of its holdings during the same period. Not only would the foundation and the marital trust be deprived of valuable income-producing interests, but a possible forced sale of very substantial real estate holdings in a single metropolitan area—even over a 10-year period—would undoubtedly risk serious losses.

Such drastic consequences would be completely unwarranted and contrary to the public interest. They can be avoided—or at least reduced—without undermining the proposed reforms if:

1. foundations are premitted to own real estate investments of a passive nature, and
2. there are adequate transition provisions to allow the foundation and the marital trust to separate their combined ownership of the various holdings.

Passive real estate investments should not be limited

Real estate investments of a passive nature have traditionally been recognized as appropriate investments for charitable foundations. When the Congress in 1951 first provided that normal tax rates would apply to unrelated business income of charitable foundations, it specifically excluded from such taxation all rents from real property (except with respect to business leases in excess of five years on property acquired with borrowed funds). (Code § 512(b)(3)) The rationale for this exclusion was clearly stated in the report of the House Ways and Means Committee of the 81st Congress as follows:

"The tax applied to unrelated business income does not apply to dividends, interest, royalties (including, of course, overriding royalties), rents (other than certain rents on property acquired with borrowed funds), and gains from sales of leased property. Your committee believes that such 'passive' income should not be taxed where it is used for exempt purposes because investments producing incomes of these types have long been recognized as proper for educational and charitable organizations." (Emphasis supplied) H. Rep. 2319, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 38.

The propriety of foundation real estate investments was reaffirmed in the 1965 Treasury Department Report on Private Foundations which concluded that real estate investments of a passive nature should be excluded from its recommended business ownership limitations. Thus, the report stated (p. 36):

"Appropriate standards should be developed to identify leases of real property (and associated personal property) which are of a clearly passive nature, and rent arising from such leases should not be deemed to derive from the conduct of a business."

Elsewhere in the report, it was assumed that a private foundation could properly own an office building or other type of commercial building. See e.g., pp. 22–3.

In 1969, the Treasury again recommended to the House Ways and Means Committee that the proposed business ownership limitations specifically exempt "holding of leases of real property (and associated personal property) of a passive nature." Hearings on Tax Reform Before the Committee on Ways and Means, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., Pt. 14, p. 5100.

There is nothing in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee or in the earlier Patman Committee Hearings on private foundations (Hearings Before Subcommittee No. 1 on Foundations of the Select Committee on Small Business, 88th Cong., 2d Sess., 90th Cong., 1st Sess.) that challenges these consistent recommendations by the Treasury that private foundations should be allowed to retain their real estate investment holdings provided they are of a passive nature.[1]

H.R. 13270, in its present form, however, does not expressly exempt passive real estate investments from the 20% business ownership limitation. Moreover, while the bill qualifies the broad term "business enterprise" by reference to the definition of unrelated business income in Section 513 of the Code, it fails to pick up the long-standing exception to that definition for passive rental income contained in Section 512(b)(3) of the Code. As a result, there is a real danger that H.R. 13270 will be construed to require that foundations severely limit their real estate investments despite the fact that such investments are completely passive in nature.

Such a drastic limitation—which would require wholesale divestitures of foundation real estate holdings with attendant risks of substantial loss—clearly cannot be justified in view of the complete absence of any evidence in the extensive hearings with respect to private foundations that such real estate investments present a potential for abuse or are otherwise contrary to the public interest.

Indeed, the principal argument advanced for the business ownership limitation is that a foundation's ownership of an operating business will tend to divert the interest of the foundation managers to the maintenance and improvement of the business and away from their charitable duties.[2] This argument is completely inapplicable to foundation ownership of passive real estate investments for three reasons:

1. Under present law, passive real estate investments by definition cannot involve substantial activity on the part of the foundation or its managers. Thus, the regulations interpreting Section 512(b)(3) of the Code strictly proscribe any activities by the foundation beyond simply renting the premises and maintaining the public areas. See Reg. § 1.512(b)-1.(c)(2).
2. Most commercial buildings are managed, like the Cafritz buildings, by professional real estate management companies which make all of the day-to-day decisions with respect to the operation of the buildings. In the normal situation, the foundation managers consult with the management company only as to general policy questions in much the same manner as they would need to consult with a broker or investment advisor with respect to a securities portfolio.
3. The proposed income distribution requirement in H.R. 13270 and, to a lesser extent, the proposed Clay Brown provision will effectively deter foundation managers from any temptation to attempt to expand the foundation's real estate-holdings by accumulating tax-free earnings or borrowing.

Thus, there is very little possibility that the interest of foundation managers will be diverted from their charitable duties as a result of foundation ownership of passive real estate investments.

These same reasons equally refute the other argument advanced in support of the business ownership limitation, which is that a foundation may operate a business "in such a way that it unfairly competes with other businesses whose

---

[1] Foundation ownership of passive income-producing property was criticized in these hearings in only two respects, neither of which is relevant here. The first situation involved acquisitions through borrowing and will be adequately covered by the proposed Clay Brown provisions (§ 121 of H.R. 13270). The second situation involved the alleged tying up by a single foundation of large tracts of undeveloped real property which will be effectively prohibited in the future by the mandatory distributions of income provisions (Proposed Code § 4942).

[2] Summary of H.R. 13270 prepared by the staffs of the Finance Committee and the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, p. 15.

owners must pay taxes on the income they realize."[3] Indeed, the complete lack of relevance of this argument to passive real estate investments—as distinguished from operating businesses—was recognized by the Congress in 1951 when, as noted above, it exempted the income from such investments from the tax on unrelated business income.

The only specific example of possible unfair competition developed during the hearings was the alleged ability of private foundations to accumulate tax-free earnings to acquire additional business interests at higher prices than could be paid by taxpaying businessmen.[4] As noted above, this is effectively precluded in the future by the requirement that the foundation pay out to charity its entire net income annually. If anything, this requirement will place the foundation at a slight disadvantage vis-a-vis other real estate owners who will be free to accumulate their earnings for expansion or other competitive purposes.

Thus, there is no real or even theoretical justification for limiting foundation ownership or passive real estate investments. Accordingly, it is urged that Section 4943 of H.R. 13270 be amended to expressly exclude such investments from the proposed business ownership limitation. This would be accomplished by adding a new subsection (5) to proposed Section 4943(d) [pp. 41–2 of the bill] which would provide as follows:

> (5) OWNERSHIP OF REAL PROPERTY.—The term "business enterprise" does not include ownership of real property the income from which, except for the provisions of Section 514 (relating to debt financed property), would not constitute unrelated business income under Section 512(b) (3).

Two important collateral points with respect to foundation ownership of passive real estate investments are:

1. Depreciation Deductions Should be Expressly Allowed.—The proposed income-distribution requirements do not expressly allow deductions for depreciation to computing "net investment income" under Section 506 and "distributable amount" under Section 4942. As a practical matter, a foundation could not continue to own real estate investments unless a deduction for depreciation is allowed in these computations. The foundation would not only have to pay the investment income tax on the depreciation allowance, but it would incur a confiscatory penalty if it failed to fully distribute that allowance as income. As a result, the foundation would be left without funds for necessary capital improvements and replacements. Accordingly, we suggest that the phrase "and depreciation provided for in Section 167" be added at the end of Section 506(b) (3) [pp. 5–6]and Section 4942(f) (3) (A) [p. 20] and that the following new paragraph be inserted after Section 4942(e) (3) [pp. 27–8]:

> (4) ADJUSTMENT FOR DEPRECIATION.—The minimum investment return for any taxable year shall be reduced by the deduction for depreciation allowable with respect to such taxable year by Section 167.

2. Combined Ownership May Be Prohibited.—The Treasury has recommended that passive real estate investments be subjected to the 20% business ownership limitation to the extent that they are owned jointly by a foundation and disqualified persons.[5] The Cafritz Foundation is not opposed to separating its ownership interests in the various properties from that of the marital trust provided there are adequate provisions for doing so in an orderly and equitable manner. The transition provisions should provide full flexibility for separation of combined ownership.

The business ownership limitation will require divestitures by private foundations of substantial business assets. The bill contains two principal transition provisions—a 10-year disposal period and a limited exception from the self-dealing prohibitions for sales to disqualified persons—which are designed to enable the required divestitures to be made in an orderly manner thereby minimizing the risk of losses. The transition provisions, however, do not provide adequate flexibility where there is combined ownership of business and investment assets by a private foundation and disqualified persons.

The problem of combined ownership should not be unique to the Cafritz Foundation. The plan of distribution adopted by Mr. Cafritz in his will, whereby fractional interests in his estate were left to a foundation and a marital trust, is, and has been for some time, a very common and frequently recommended estate plan. It would not be surprising, therefore, if there are a number of other foundations similarly situated.

Unless adequate provision is made for the separation of these combined ownership interests in an orderly and equitable manner, the number of the divestitures required may be greater and their potential adverse effect unnecessarily magnified. This clearly will be the case in the Cafritz situation—particularly if the 20% combined ownership limitation is applied to those passive real estate investments that are owned jointly by a foundation and a disqualified person. For, unless the Cafritz Foundation and the marital trust—which will be a disqualified person—can separate their combined ownership interests, the Foundation may have to sell its entire ⅔ interest in all of the Cafritz companies to comply with the 20% limitation.

The risk of possible loss would be great not only because of the magnitude of the divestitures required, but also because the substantial minority interest of the marital trust in the properties might well inhibit outside purchasers and make it extremely difficult for the foundation to realize full value.

The marital trust, on the other hand, would be faced with a "Hobson's Choice" of either also selling its ⅓ interest in the companies, thereby reducing its corpus—at least to the extent of any capital gains taxes payable—and possibly its income, or retaining its stock as a minority owner vis-a-vis new owners who may not share its desire to maximize current income. In this latter regard, most potential customers for large commercial real estate holdings are likely to be interested in speculative development and capital appreciation rather than in simply collecting rents and distributing them as ordinary income.[6]

These consequences can be avoided—or at least minimized—if during the 10-year disposal period the foundation and the marital trust are given full flexibility to, in effect, "swap out" between themselves their respective fractional interests in the various companies. To the extent that the foundation ended up with full ownership of real estate investments of a passive nature and such investments are not limited by the bill as previously recommended, forced sales would be avoided. Conversely, if the foundation ended up with an operating business, the greater salability of its full ownership interest in that business would facilitate its divestiture and reduce the risk of loss. In both cases the purposes of the bill would be fully served.

The proposed transition provisions, however, do not provide the flexibility needed to achieve this result. The inadequacies that exist and our technical suggestions for remedying them are set forth in Appendix A. Briefly, we recommend that H.R. 13270 be clarified or modified to clearly allow private foundations and disqualified persons to separate their combined ownership of business or investment assets during the 10-year disposal period—without incurring confiscatory tax penalties—by (1) exchanging stock or property interests in commonly owned assets and by (2) employing any of the wide range of corporate techniques, such as redemptions or liquidations, which would achieve the same purpose. Existing law would, of course, require that the foundation receive full value in any such transactions.

To produce a fully equitable result, provision must also be made for nonrecognition of gain or loss in connection with exchanges of stock for stock to comply with the bill. Otherwise the marital trust—which except for the bill would have no need or desire to enter into such exchanges—may be severely penalized in that it may be forced to incur substantail capital gains taxes which would reduce its corpus and earning capacity. There are ample precedents in the Code for comparable relief in connection with forced divestitures. See, for example, Section 1071 relating to gain from sales or exchanges pursuant to orders from the Federal Communications Commission; Section 1081 relating to the nonrecognition of gain or loss on exchanges or distributions pursuant to orders of the Securities and Exchange Commission; Section 1101 pertaining to distributions pursuant to the Bank Holding Act of 1956, and Section 1111 pertaining to distributions pursuant to an order enforcing the antitrust laws.

The appropriateness of similar relief here is particularly compelling since the stock interests involved were acquired pursuant to an estate plan encouraged by the Code which was adopted well before the proposed stock ownership limitation was even suggested.

[6] For this reason, while the Foundation and the marital trust might try to dilute their combined ownership below the 20–35% limitation by a public offering or merger with a large company, it is doubtful that such a solution would meet their common need for maximum distributable income.

Accordingly, we suggest that a new provision be added to the Code patterned on Section 1071, allowing: "the sale or exchange of property (including stock in a corporation) between a private foundation and a disqualified person (within the meaning of Sections 509 and 4946(a), respectively) pursuant to a plan, approved by the Secretary or his delegate, to enable the foundation not to be liable for tax under Section 4943 (relating to taxes on excess business holdings)" to be treated by either party as an involuntary conversion of such property within the meaning of Section 1033.

Continuation of common management services

The third area in which H.R. 13270 will have a severe impact upon the Cafritz Foundation raises a more difficult problem of balancing legislative interests.

All of the Cafritz real estate investment properties are managed by a common management company, the Cafritz Company, which in turn will be owned ⅔ by the Foundation and ⅓ by the marital trust. Through the years, the Cafritz Company has developed a highly efficient staff which is familiar with the properties involved.

In order for the Cafritz Company to continue to function efficiently, it is necessary for it to be able to continue to provide management services for all of the various Cafritz buildings. This will not only maximize the income to the foundation from its holdings in the various buildings, but it is essential to maintain the value of the Cafritz Company stock itself as an asset of the foundation. For unless the foundation and the marital trust were both willing to enter into long-term management contracts with respect to all of their properties, which might well be unwise in connection with a change-over in management, it would be very difficult to find any purchaser for the company at a reasonable price.

If Cafritz Company's services are provided to all of the properties on a non-preferential basis, i.e., at the same rates commercially available from outside companies in the same business, the potential for abuse is negligible, the interests of charity will be better served and the unnecessary and unwarranted destruction of this valuable business will be avoided.

Section 4941(d)(2)(C) [p. 21], however, excludes from prohibited self-dealing the furnishing of goods, services or facilities by a disqualified person to a private foundation only if "the furnishing is without charge and if the goods, services or facilities so furnished are used exclusively for purposes specified in Section 501(C)(3)." The effect of this provision will be to prevent the Cafritz Company from continuing to render management services at least to those properties which the foundation holds outright.[7]

The harsh consequences of the self-dealing rule in this situation can be avoided by a limited exception permitting services to be provided by disqualified persons with respect to property in which the foundation and the disqualified person had a joint or common interest on the operative dates in Section 4943. Such an exception is fully warranted since it is necessary to prevent a substantial loss in value of the business involved and the services to be provided are generally available commercially so that their fair market value will be readily evident and the potential for abuse nonexistent. Accordingly, we suggest that a new Section 101(k)(2)(E) be added as follows:

"(2) SEC. 4941. Section 4941 shall not apply to—

> "(E) the furnishing of services by a disqualified person to a private foundation with respect to property in which the foundation and the disqualified person had a joint or common interest (either directly or through ownership of stock in a corporation which owned such property) on May 27, 1969 (or acquired under the terms of a will executed on or before July 28, 1969, which are in effect on such date and at all times thereafter) if the compensation received by the disqualified person for such services is at a rate comparable to that at which such services are commercially available and such rate does not exceed the lowest rate charged by the disqualified person for furnishing similar services with respect to any other property."

[7] Since there is no prohibition against self-dealing between disqualified persons, Cafritz Company presumably could continue to manage those properties which the foundation continues to hold in corporate form. If this were not the case, Cafritz Company's business would be seriously disrupted and possibly destroyed immediately upon the effective date of the self-dealing provisions.

At the very least, such an exception is absolutely essential during the full 10-year divestiture period in order to permit an attempt to dispose of the Cafritz Company in an orderly manner without a substantial loss in its value.

Conclusion

H.R. 13270 will have a severe, unnecessary and completely unwarranted adverse impact upon the Cafritz Foundation and many other foundations unless (1) the apparent limitation upon foundation ownership of passive real estate investments is removed and (2) necessary flexibility is provided in the transition provisions for separating the combined ownership of business and investment assets by foundations and disqualified persons in an orderly and equitable manner.

Real estate investments of a passive nature have traditionally been recognized as appropriate investments for charitable foundations, and the Treasury Department has consistently recommended that they be excluded from the business ownership limitation. Moreover, there is a complete absence of any evidence in the extensive hearings with respect to private foundations that such real estate investments present a potential for abuse or are otherwise contrary to the public interest.

The need is equally clear for adequate transition provisions to avoid unnecessary forced sales by foundations of partial interests at the risk of substantial loss.

With respect to the third concern of the Cafritz Foundation—the need for continuation of common management services—we recognize that the Congress may be concerned about granting an exception to the general prohibition against self-dealing. We respectfully urge, however, that any such concern should be more than outweighed by the severity of the consequences to charity and upon a valuable business of blind application of the self-dealing rules in a situation that presents no realistic potential for abuse.

Appendix A

Technical Recommendations With Respect to the Transition Provisions

To avoid severe and unnecessary hardship, foundations and disqualified persons should be given full flexibility during the 10-year disposal period to eliminate or separate their combined ownership of business and investment assets in an orderly and equitable manner by (1) exchanging stock or property interests in commonly owned assets and (2) employing any of the wide range of corporate techniques for achieving the same purpose.

The 10-year divestiture period in Section 4943 and the limited exception from the self-dealing rules for divestiture sales in Section 101 of the bill are clearly not adequate to permit such a necessary unscrambling of property interests and an orderly divestiture of the excess business holdings that remain outstanding for the following reasons:

A. Exchanges

Section 101(k)(2)(B) [p. 81] excludes from the self-dealing rules only "the sale of property which is owned by a private foundation on May 26, 1969. . . ." Limiting the exemption to the "sale" of property could be construed to prevent exchanges of stock or property. Moreover, keying the exemption to property which is "owned on May 26, 1969" may make it completely inapplicable to the stock interests which are yet to be distributed to the Cafritz Foundation under Mr. Cafritz's 1964 will. It is suggested that Section 101(k)(2)(B) be amended to provide as follows:

* * * * * * *

"(B) The sale or exchange of property interests held by a private foundation or a disqualified person on May 26, 1969 (or acquired under the terms of a will executed on or before July 28, 1969, which are in effect on such date and at all times thereafter) if such sale or exchange is required in order for the foundation not to be liable for the tax under Section 4943 (relating to taxes on excess business holdings) and the foundation receives in such sale or exchange an amount, or an interest in property having a fair market value, which equals or exceeds the fair market value of the property sold or exchanged by it; and

B. SECTION 351 ORGANIZATIONS

Section 4941(d)(2)(F) [p. 22] does not specifically encompass a Section 351 organization which might be necessary to consolidate the various corporations if a public offering of the foundation's stock interests proved to be the only feasible method of divestiture. For complete clarity, it is suggested that the word "organization" be inserted after the words "corporation adjustment" on page 22, line 10.

C. NON-PRO RATA REDEMPTIONS

The report of the Committee on Ways and Means [p. 21, n. 1] clearly envisions a non-pro rata redemption by a corporation of its stock which is excess in the hands of a private foundation as one method of achieving a divestiture required by the excess business holdings rule. Section 4941(d)(2)(F) [p. 22], however, may cast doubt on the availability of this necessary divestiture technique since it permits redemptions and other corporate adjustments only if "all of the securities of the same class as that held by the foundation are subject to the same terms. . . ." It might be argued that all of the securities of the same class in a non-pro rata redemption are not "subject to the same terms." The possible ambiguity regarding this important corporate technique can be eliminated by (1) deleting the phrase quoted above from Section 4941(d)(2)(F); or (2) clarifying what is meant by "subject to the same terms"; or (3) the following amendment to Section 101(k)(2)(A):

(2) SEC. 4941. Section 4941 shall not apply to—

"(A) Any transaction between a private foundation and a corporation which is a disqualified person (as defined in Section 4946), pursuant to (i) the terms of securities of such corporations in existence at the time acquired by the foundation before May 27, 1969; or (ii) any liquidation, merger, redemption, recapitalization or other corporate adjustment, organization or reorganization, the purpose of which is to enable the foundation to dispose of property in order not to be liable for tax under Section 4943 (relating to taxes on excess business interests) and the foundation receives in return an amount, or an interest in property having a fair market value, which equals or exceeds the fair market value of its stock interest; and

D. CARRYOVER OF THE HOLDING PERIOD

It is not clear that the 10-year divestiture period would carry over to assets acquired by the foundation as a result of an exchange or a corporate redemption, liquidation, organization or reorganization. Unless there is such a carry-over of the holding period, such transactions will not be a meaningful method of complying with the excess business holdings requirement since the foundation would be required to immediately divest itself of any business holdings received as a result thereof. It is recommended that the following provision be added to the bill, possibly as a new Section 101(k)(2)(D):

"(D) The divestiture periods provided for in Section 4943(c)(4) shall carry over to any property interests acquired by a private foundation pursuant to a transaction referred to in subsection (B) above or Section 4941(d)(2)(F).

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the next witness will be Mr. Lyman C. Conger, chairman of the board of Kohler Co.

STATEMENT OF LYMAN C. CONGER, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF THE KOHLER CO.

Mr. CONGER. Thank you for allowing me the privilege of appearing here.

My name is Lyman Conger. I am chairman of the board of Kohler Co., of Kohler, Wis., also vice president of the Kohler Foundation.

Kohler Co. is a large manufacturer of plumbing fixtures and engines. It is a privately held company. Its stock is not on the public market and there is no publicly established marketplace for the stock.

Kohler Foundation is a relatively small foundation. It was organized as a nonprofit, nonbusiness corporation in 1940. All of the organizational incorporators are now deceased and all of the organizational contributors are now deceased. In fact, all of those who ever made any contribution are now deceased. It does not engage in political activity. It operates no business, and has no business connections except stockownership in a business corporation. It does own 28⁴⁄₁₀ percent of the stock of Kohler Co., and has held almost half of that stock for 25 years, most of the stock for over 15 years.

In its past 10 years of operation it has disbursed $1,812,000 for educational, cultural, and charitable purposes, and I might say that relative to its net income and its expenses through that period, its operating expenses have been seven-tenths of 1 percent of the income. That is because all the officers and directors serve without salary or compensation.

We do not oppose all the provisions of this bill, some of them are very good, we think, but we do think the bill goes beyond the correction of abuses and in particular it would disrupt long-established relationships. The divestiture provisions and the ex post facto application of them creates a severe problem for us. In our case it would require the Kohler Foundation to devest itself of the Kohler Co. stock that it now owns and practically all of it. And that would require creating a public market for the stock that does not now exist. That could probably be done in one of two ways. It would mean the Kohler Co. would have to become a public corporation or, alternatively, it would have to merge with some conglomerate organization, and the latter course appears the easiest although possibly not preferable.

I think other corporations and small foundations that own stock in privately held corporations are faced with the same situation, and we believe that this bill would force many small companies into conglomerates, probably against their will.

Now, it is not my purpose to condemn all conglormerates or go into the pros and cons of conglomerates but what we do suggest is that the conglomerate form of organization has not proved itself so distinctly superior to the privately held small corporation that it ought to be encouraged by legislation at the expense of the privately held corporation.

Turning to the specific provisions of the bill, the definition of "substantial contributor" includes anyone who contributed more than $5,000 in any one year. We think that is very unrealistic because it bears no relationship to the size of the foundation. A foundation may have millions of dollars of assets, I think there is one in excess of a billion dollars, but still a $5,000 contribution establishes one as a substantial contributor. We are suggesting in the amendment that I am filing as part of my prepared statement, that that be changed, and that a substantial contributor be defined as one who contributed 5 percent or more of the total assets of a corporation.

In our case, the bill has a strong effect on us because one contributor, now deceased, and who contributed less than 2 percent of the stock of the foundation, nevertheless is defined as a substantial contributor, and all his descendants are disqualified persons.

With respect to the control aspects of the bill, we think it makes several quite unrealistic assumptions. As it is now drafted it assumes that 20 percent voting stock ownership is control, and has a conclusive presumption that 35 percent is control. In our prepared statement we have shown instances where this definitely is not true.

What percentage of stock is control or is not control varies from time to time and from company to company, and from time to time in the very same company. There seems to be an implied assumption in the bill that members of the family always act in concert and if they belong to the same family they will always be voting the stock unanimously, but I would submit to you that family feuds and battles for control are just about as common as unanimity of operation. In our particular case we have had one such case of interfamily litigation that even went up to the circuit court of appeals.

This amendment would make actual control of the foundation immaterial. These disqualified persons may not even be members of the foundation, yet their ownership, the fact one of their ancestors donated stock, would prevent the foundation from continuing to hold their stock.

We are suggesting an amendment which would substitute fact for theory and make actual control of the foundation and actual control of the corporation the criterion.

We agree that a foundation, together with people who control it, should not own more than 50 percent of the stock of a corporation. But we think that should be based on actualty, and not on assumptions that people who may actually be fighting each other are acting in concert.

Our last serious objection to the bill is on the distribution-of-income provision, and that has a serious impact on a company whose stock is not publicly listed and has no regular market value, because it requires distribution of 5 percent of assets by the foundation. In the case of a closed corporation, I think there is no more difficult subject than valuation of the stock of a closed corporation. I know in all the estates and gifts we have had involving Kohler Co. stock we have always had controversy with the Internal Revenue Service and in one case even went to the Tax Court. So we would not know, the foundation would not know, on what basis to base this 5 percent distribution. We might base it on a good faith estimate of the value of stock, yet maybe years later the Internal Revenue comes along and says no, your value of the stock is too low, you should have distributed more than you did, and then the very heavy penalties of this bill would be automatically put into effect.

We would have no objection at all to a requirement that a foundation distribute its actual income within a reasonable period, although we think a year is a little too long. Actually——

Senator BENNETT. Long or short?

Mr. CONGER. Too short, excuse me.

We are suggesting a period of 2 years. And our foundation has over the last 10 years distributed practically 100 percent of its actual income. What we do object to is a distribution requirement on hypothetical rather than actual income.

In our prepared statement we have displayed a table showing that of the 30 companies listed on the Dow, Jones stock average, only four would yield a return of 5 percent or more, and the average would be three, I think 3.64. So that would practically bar any foundation from investing in the stock of most industrial companies.

We are suggesting as an alternative to that, that a foundation be required to distribute its actual income within a certain period, which we are suggesting is 2 years.

We are also suggesting that if the foundations choose to invest in non-income-producing property and, I suggest, there is an objective in this bill which prohibits a foundation from making such an investment which is contrary to the purposes of the foundation; that, therefore, a simple amendment there saying that investments solely for capital gain would be considered as contrary to the purposes of the foundation would solve the problem.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Thank you.

Senator MILLER. May I ask the witness, Mr. Conger, would you be good enough to furnish the committee for the record, a statement as to whether or not amendment 222 would satisfy your problem.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, I will.

(Mr. Conger's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF KOHLER CO., KOHLER, WIS., PRESENTED BY LYMAN C. CONGER, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

SUMMARY

Kohler Co., a privately held corporation, opposes the proposed tax reform legislation as passed by the House because it unjustly requires the Kohler Foundation, an eleemosynary organization, to divest itself of its stock holdings in Kohler Co.

For Kohler Foundation to sell this stock would require the creation of a public market for the Kohler Co.'s stock which is now privately held or a merger of Kohler Co. with some conglomerate.

The proposed legislation goes beyond the raising of revenue and correction of abuses and penalizes foundations which have not been guilty of abuses.

The proposed legislation is harsh and punitive. It affects—not only foundations—but corporations in which foundations own stock. It requires drastic changes in existing ownerships—ownerships established years ago in reliance on then existing law. As a consequence it would force a drastic reorganization of Kohler Co. (p. 9)

The definition of "substantial contributor" in the bill as presently drafted has no relevance to the size of the foundation, and is consequently unrealistic. The definition of "substantial contributor" should bear a reasonable relationship to the size of the foundation. In our proposed amendment we propose defining "substantial contributor" as one who has contributed more than 5% of the total assets of the foundation. (pp. 9-10)

The bill is aimed at private control of corporations and assumes that private control of a corporation is an evil to be tolerated as short a time as possible. This is an unsound assumption. (pp. 11-12)

An alternative to private control is the conglomerate or merger route. (pp. 13-14)

The conglomerate-merger type of organization is not so clearly superior to the private corporation that it should be encouraged by legislation which discourages and makes the continuance of private corporations more difficult. (p. 13)

If this bill is enacted into law it will force a drastic reorganization of Kohler Co., requiring it to change its status as a private corporation—and, quite likely, to merge with a conglomerate. (pp. 14-15)

The bill, as drafted, goes far beyond the mere objective of preventing the use of foundations to control business enterprises. It establishes presumptions of control, not realistic in many cases. Unrealistic presumptions are:

(1) that a percentage of voting stock less than 50 per cent can be presumed to constitute control;

(2) that all "disqualified persons" will always act in unison and never disagree among themselves, and

(3) that the stock of any private foundation will always be voted the same as the stock of "disqualified persons" regardless of the extent of control of the foundation by such "disqualified persons".

We submit that regulation should apply on the actual facts of the situation—not on arbitrary and unrealistic presumptions.

The amendment which we suggest makes actual control the test and—if the disqualified persons in fact control the foundation —adds their stock to that of the foundation in determining control. (pp. 15-18)

The provision relating to the distribution of income has objectives with which we do not quarrel, i.e., (1) to insure that the income of a foundation will be distributed on a reasonably current basis and not be re-invested for "growth" purposes, and (2) to require that the resources of the foundation be invested mainly for the production of distributable income and not principally for capital gain. But the bill attacks the problem circuitously rather than directly and goes too far.

The "minimum investment return" prescribed in the bill, or any "minimum investment return", is unrealistic. Of the 30 industrial corporations whose stocks are included in the Dow Jones averages only 4 had a dividend yield of over 5 per cent and the average dividend yield was 3.54 per cent. The bill creates enormous administrative difficulties where a foundation's investment is in stock of a private corporation, or in other property not having an established market value.

The objectives can be accomplished by requiring a reasonable concurrent distribution of actual income and by prohibiting foundations from investments solely for capital gain. (pp. 18-20)

The harshness of the bill has been recognized by tailoring exemptions to fit the specific circumstances of two foundations. This is the wrong approach. The bill as a whole should be amended so that it will be fair and equitable to all foundations, regardless of their specific circumstances. (pp. 20-21)

We believe that our proposed amendments would accomplish this purpose.

STATEMENT - KOHLER CO.

Kohler Co., a Wisconsin corporation founded in 1873, is a prominent manufacturer of plumbing fixtures and fittings, small gasoline engines, engine driven electric generating plants and precision controls.

It has, since its inception, been a privately held corporation. Its stock has never been listed on any stock exchange or over the counter market and there has never been any public market or established market price for its stock.

Its outstanding common (voting) stock is distributed as follows:

Employees	8.4%
Individuals or trusts whose stock was acquired through inheritance	58.5% [1]
Kohler Foundation	28.4%
Others	4.7%
	100.0%

Only one of its eleven directors is a "disqualified person" as defined in H.R. 13270. Only one of its eleven officers (one of five vice presidents) is a "disqualified person".

Kohler Co. has an outstanding record of length of service of employees.

With a present complement of approximately 5,500 employees, over 1,300 have become members of the 25-year club (25 or more years of continuous service) of whom over 780 are still actively employed.

Many Kohler Co. employees including management personnel have been attracted to and remain associated with Kohler Co. because it is a privately owned corporation and they can expect to receive, and do receive, more individualistic treatment than they would from an absentee owned company under policies made elsewhere and applied arbitrarily and sometimes ruthlessly. One of the most unsalutary features of the present rash of mergers and conglomerates has been the disruption of personnel of acquired companies, and the arbitrary and often ruthless dumping of management personnel, many of whom have devoted much of their lives to the acquired company and are at an age where they find it difficult or impossible to secure equivalent employment elsewhere.

[1] Included in this percentage is 31.7 per cent of the outstanding stock owned, directly or by beneficial interests, by individuals who are within the definition of "disqualified persons" in H.R. 13270.

For Kohler Co. to be forced to merge with a conglomerate or to be subjected to "raiding" would seriously disturb the personal plans and expectations of its present personnel.

KOHLER FOUNDATION, INC.

Kohler Foundation is a Wisconsin non-profit corporation, incorporated in 1940. It is restricted by its articles of incorporation to charitable, religious and educational activities.

It conducts no foreign activities or philanthropies and is limited by its articles of incorporation to disbursement of funds exclusively within the State of Wisconsin.

The original incorporators were—

Evangeline Kohler
Marie C. Kohler
Lillie B. Kohler
Herbert V. Kohler
O. A. Kroos

All the original incorporators are now deceased.

All persons who made any contributions to Kohler Foundation are now deceased.

The principal contributors were Marie C. Kohler (by bequest) and Lillie B. Kohler (by inter vivos gift).

All of the incorporators, with the exception of O. A. Kroos, would be "substantial contributors" as defined in H.R. 13270, Sec. 507(b)(2)(A). Although Herbert V. Kohler gave no Kohler Co. stock to the Foundation and contributed less than 2 per cent of its total assets, he is within the definition of "substantial contributor" contained in H.R. 13270 since he gave more than $5,000 in a single calendar year. Consequently his "lineal descendants" would be "disqualified persons" as defined in H.R. 13270.

Kohler Foundation has 10 members (reduced from 12 by two recent deaths) of whom only 3 are "disqualified persons" as defined in H.R. 13270. It has 5 directors of whom only 2 are "disqualified persons". Only 2 of its 6 officers are "disqualified persons".

Kohler Foundation does not operate any business or commercial enterprise and has no interest in any business or commercial enterprise other than as a stockholder.

Kohler Foundation presently owns a beneficial interest in 47,606 and a fraction shares of Kohler Co. common (voting) stock which is 28.4 per cent of the 167,403 and a fraction shares outstanding and 23.8 per cent of the 200,000 shares authorized. It has owned most of this stock for 15 years and nearly half of it for 25 years.

It also presently owns 4,154 shares of preferred (non-voting) stock of Kohler Co., a Wisconsin Corporation, which is 43.2 per cent of the 9,625 shares outstanding and 10.4 per cent of the 40,000 shares authorized.

Kohler Foundation makes direct expenditures of approximately 15 per cent of its total disbursements for certain cultural programs, scholarship awards, and for the operation and maintenance of a building used as a meeting place for Girl Scouts and a woman's club.

The balance of its income is distributed by contributions to organizations conducting educational, historical and cultural, religious or charitable activities.

Kohler Foundation, in the past ten years, has made actual disbursements of $1,812,562.45 for educational, cultural and other philanthropic purposes out of a total income (before expenses) of $1,826,486.11.

No officer, director or member of Kohler Foundation receives any salary or compensation for his services. It employs no professional managers.

In the past ten years Kohler Foundation's administrative expenses have been less than $13,500.00 or seven-tenths (00.7%) of one percent of its income.

Thus Kohler Foundation has, over the past ten years, distributed practically 100 per cent of its actual net income after expenses.

PROVISIONS OF H.R. 13270 RELATING TO PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

Alleged Purposes of the Bill

The bill purports to be a revenue bill and in some respects it is.[2] On the other hand some of the regulatory provisions of the bill, by increasing administrative costs, will reduce net revenues.

The bill also purports to correct abuses by foundations. We do not deny that some foundations have been guilty of abuses, although we would not agree that all practices which are characterized by some as abuses actually are abuses. But we do deny that the majority of foundations have abused their status or have been guilty of acts detrimental to the public welfare.

But the bill goes further than the mere prohibition of abuses. There is a clear distinction between prohibition of abuses and regulation of details of operation of foundations which deprives foundation managers of the ability to exercise sound judgment in good faith in the management of the assets of the foundation.

KOHLER CO. POSITION ON H.R. 13270

We do not oppose all of the provisions of H.R. 13270 relating to foundations.

We recognize the objectives of raising revenues and correcting abusive practices and to the extent that the bill would actually accomplish these purposes we do not oppose it.

But the legislation should not penalize foundations which have not been guilty of true abuses. The innocent should not be punished along with the guilty.

---

[2] The 7½ per cent tax imposed by Sec. 506 (a) (p. 5) is a revenue provision.

Because it applies retroactively the proposed legislation is harsh and punitive.

It does not seek merely to regulate future conduct.

It would seriously disrupt existing ownerships and corporate organizations—ownerships and organizations which were established many years ago in reliance on then existing law.

As we show later, it would force a drastic reorganization of Kohler Co. making it difficult, if not impossible, for it to continue as a private corporation—and making it likely that its best course would be to merge with some conglomerate.

We submit that legislation having such disruptive and retroactive effect is not warranted.

SUBSTANTIAL CONTRIBUTOR

The definition of "substantial contributor", Sec. 507(b)(2)(A)(B) p. 8, is unrealistic in the extreme.

It bears no relationship to the size of the foundation, its total assets or the total of contributions by others.

One who contributed $5,000 in any one year would have contributed only one-half of one percent of the assets of a foundation having assets of one million dollars. He would not be a "substantial contributor" in any ordinary or common meaning of the term.

Yet under the definition of Subsection (A) he is a "substantial contributor" as are also his children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren and other "lineal descendants" in perpetuity.

Many foundations have assets of more than a million dollars and at least one is reputed to have assets in excess of three billion dollars.[8]

[8] Subcommittee Chairman's report to Subcommittee No. 1 Select Committee on Small Business, House Representatives, 90th Congress, Sixth Installment 3-26-68, p. 242, Ford Foundation. See also Kellogg Foundation Trust p. 236.

The same source reports 26 foundations having assets in excess of 100 million, pp. 228-259, yet anyone who donates $5,000.00 or five-thousandths of a per cent would be "substantial contributor" under the definition of H.R. 13270.

The definition of subsection (B) is even more unrealistic. One who gave a donation of $1,000 or one-tenth of one percent of the total assets of a foundation having assets of a million dollars would be a "substantial contributor" if that fortuitously happened to be the only contribution in that calendar year.

We submit that what is a "substantial contributor" or a "substantial contribution" should be relevant to the total contributions.

One who contributed less than 5 per cent would not be considered a "substantial contributor" in the general understanding of the term, nor would he be in a position to exercise much domination over the foundation.

The amendment which we suggest (Proposed Amendment—Exhibit 1) would make one who contributed more than 5 per cent of the total contributions to a foundation a "substantial contributor".

BASIC PHILOSOPHIES UNDERLYING THE BILL

Our main objection to the bill in its present form is to the basic economic philosophies underlying some—but not all—of its provisions.

Implicit, albeit unstated, are certain economic assumptions which are accepted as truisms.

The bill departs from basic revenue purposes and enters the field of economic regulation. And it does so on the basis of certain economic assumptions which we believe to be false.

Certainly they are not so self-evident as to be accepted without consideration on their merits and hearing arguments against them.

We submit that Congress should not adopt these far-reaching regulatory measures—which affect not only taxes but the general economy—as an appendage to a revenue bill but that if they are to be considered at all they should be considered as frankly regulatory measures with full appreciation of their consequences and after adequate hearing on the objections to them.[4]

Assumptions basic to the bill to which we object are—

PRIVATE CONTROL OF CORPORATIONS

The underlying philosophy behind the bill (particularly Sec. 4943 which limits the combined holding of a foundation and "all disqualified persons" to 20 per cent of any corporation's voting stock)[5] is that private control of a corporation is bad per se—that it is an evil to be discouraged as much as possible and to be tolerated, if at all, only for a limited time.

That this is the assumption and the purpose clearly appears from the report of the House Committee on Ways and Means accompanying H.R. 13270 (Part 1, Page 28) where it is suggested that the limit of 20 per cent combined holding of corporate stock by foundations and "disqualified persons" may be met without the foundation disposing of its so-called "excess holdings" but by the "related parties" disposing of their stock.

Clearly the bill is directed not at foundation control but at private control of a corporation.

This is also shown by the suggestion (Id. p. 28) that if "disqualified persons" hold more than 20 per cent of the voting stock, the foundation's holding of non-voting stock "might effectively remove from outsiders any practical opportunity to gain control."[6] (emphasis supplied)

---

[4] There has, up to now, been no hearing or opportunity for hearing on the provisions to which we object. The House Ways and Means Committee did hold hearings but that was before any bill had been drafted. The present bill differs in important respects from proposals considered at the hearings. The present definitions of "substantial contributor", "disqualified persons", etc. appeared for the first time in the draft of the bill, little more than a week before passage, with no hearing held on them or opportunity given to consider objections or to present amendments.

[5] Under some circumstances an additional 2 per cent would be permitted under the so-called "de minimus" provision, Sec. 4943 (c)(2)(C) p. 37.

[6] Of course the statement that ownership of non-voting stock can, as a "practical" matter, affect the control of the corporation—which rests in the voting stock—is far-fetched in the extreme.

Implicit in this statement is the assumption that battles for control of corporations are in the public interest. We question this assumption.

The "raiding" tactics which have accompanied some of the present mergers and attempted mergers are one of the most unsalutary features of our present corporate financial picture.

The managements of many corporations are today spending more time trying to defend the corporation against "raiding" tactics, than in the actual operation and management of the business. We cannot see how this is in the public interest.

It is significant that the control provisions of this bill have no relevance to any revenue objective. Whether a corporation is or is not privately controlled makes no difference in the taxes it will pay on its income. Nor would it result in any increase in revenue from tax on the income received by a foundation. So long as the foundation avoids owning more than 20 per cent of the stock of any corporation having "disqualified persons" as stockholders, it may still receive 100 per cent of its income tax exempt.[7]

The proposal is clearly directed against private control of corporations.

Respectfully we ask, why this bias against private corporations? The private corporation has traditionally played an important role in the economic development of this country. Individuals start a small business as individual owners or partnerships. If the business serves the public need, is successful and grows it becomes a private corporation. If it continues to grow and prosper it may become a public corporation—but it will do so as a result of economic conditions—by a process of natural development and at a favorable time—not by legislation.

Many, if not most, of the large commercial enterprises today had their start through the private corporation route—Du Pont, Chrysler, Ford, Allis Chalmers, Kimberly Clark, etc. to name but a few.

---

We submit that it is not in the public interest to destroy or to sterilize this seed bed by legislation.

The assumption that private control of a corporation is an evil to be terminated as soon as possible deserves more careful consideration than it has received in the drafting of this bill.

In particular it demands consideration of the alternatives to private control.

Corporations must be controlled by someone.

If this proposal is adopted it will make mandatory the disruption of many private corporations.

The alternative is obvious. The past few years have seen an amazing proliferation of a relatively new form of commercial organization—the "conglomerate" corporation created by mergers.

The impact of this development on the economy is questionable. Some view it with alarm.[8]

It is not our purpose to review the pros and cons of the present trend toward mergers, acquisitions, conglomerates and toward debt rather than equity financing.

What we do want to point out is that if—through adoption of this proposal—liquidation of private control is made mandatory—the presently most available market is through the conglomerate merger route. Unquestionably most private or foundation holdings would be divested in that manner.

For Congress to adopt this proposal would be tantamount to saying "We think that private control of a corporation is evil—the conglomerate merger is preferable—therefore we will force private corporations to merge with conglomerates."

We submit that Congress should not adopt a proposal having such implications without careful consideration of the consequences—which go far beyond any revenue consideration.

---

[8] Burck—"The Merger Movement Rides High"—Fortune Magazine, February 1969, p. 79 et seq.

The conglomerate-merger type of organization is not so clearly preferable to a privately controlled corporation that it should be made virtually mandatory by legislation.

If this bill, as presently drafted, is enacted into law, it will:

1. Require Kohler Foundation to dispose of 28.4 per cent of the outstanding common (voting) stock of Kohler Co.
2. Require Kohler Foundation to dispose of 43.2 per cent of the outstanding preferred (non-voting) stock of Kohler Co.[9]

There is no presently established market for either of these securities. They are not listed on any exchange or traded on any over-the-counter market.

Since sale to any "disqualified person" is restricted, (Sec. 4943(c)(1)), for the Kohler Foundation to sell this stock would require either:

(a) The creation of a now non-existent public market for both classes of stock thus forcing Kohler Co. to become a public rather than a private corporation, or

(b) The sale to a single purchaser. In practical effect this means a merger or conglomerate.

This appears at present to be the easiest way out of the dilemma which would be created by the enactment of this bill as presently drafted.

Either alternative would mean a drastic reorganization of Kohler Co.—a reorganization not compelled or induced by any economic or business considerations.

We submit that such drastic reorganizations of corporations and disruption of long existing situations should not be compelled by purportedly tax reform legislation, particularly when the purposes of tax reform can be accomplished by less drastic and disruptive means.

---

[9] Even to apply the so-called "de minimus" rule would require an estimate of the value of each of these two classes of stock (Sec. 4943 (c)(2)(C) p. 37), an estimate which would always be subject to challenge by the Internal Revenue Service.

THE PRESUMPTION OF CONTROL

The Bill (Sec. 4943(C)(2) p. 36) seeks to prevent the use of foundations to control business enterprises.

But, as drafted, it goes far beyond this objective and becomes a punitive rather than a remedial measure, particularly as it requires change and divestiture of ownerships established long ago in reliance on the then existing law.

This is because it seeks to base the regulation on arbitrary and unrealistic presumptions rather than on the actual facts existing in each particular case.

This proposal is based on several unrealistic presumptions, namely:

(1) The prima facie presumption that ownership of 20 per cent of the voting stock (one-fifth of the total) constitutes control of a corporation.

(2) An irrebuttable presumption that ownership of 35 per cent of the voting stock constitutes control of a corportation.

(3) An irrebuttable presumption that all "disqualified persons", regardless of the number, will always be in agreement and will vote their stock unanimously.

(4) An irrebuttable presumption that the stock of "any private foundation" will always be voted the same way as the stock of "disqualified persons" regardless of the extent of participation in or control of the foundation by "disqualified persons".

The basic defect of this proposal is that it seeks to do the impossible—to substitute some arbitrary percentage assumed, usually incorrectly, to constitute control—for the actual facts.

Obviously complete and permanent control of a corporation requires ownership of more than 50 per cent of the voting stock. It may be true that at times ownership of less than 50 per cent can enable an individual or group to appear to exercise control but this apparent control is always subject to divestiture by the owners of a majority of the stock whenever they become dissatisfied with the manner in which the enterprise is being run.

The assumption that 20 per cent constitutes control means that there could be at least four groups each having control. The 35 per cent assumption means that there could be two groups each conclusively presumed to have control.

Such situations are neither impossible nor unlikely. Privately held corporations frequently develop out of partnerships —not merely out of individual or one family ownerships. Hence there may well be two or more individuals or family groups each conclusively presumed to have control.[10]

Nor is there any arbitrary percentage of stock ownership having universal application which can be said to afford even temporary control. The percentage varies from company to company and even from time to time with the same company.

In these days of mergers, raids, acquisitions, etc. numerous examples could be cited where 20 per cent, 30 per cent or even 40 per cent voting stock ownership has not constituted control —but three will suffice.

WESTINGHOUSE AIR BRAKE CO.

1. As shown by the attached Exhibit 2, Crane Co. desired to effect a merger with Westinghouse Air Brake.

In pursuance of this objective Crane Co. acquired 31 per cent of the stock of Westinghouse Air Brake Co., 11 per cent more than the 20 per cent which the bill presumes constitutes "control".

So, Crane Co. having "control", the merger should have proceeded without difficulty.

But, on the contrary, despite Crane Co.'s "control", Westinghouse Air Brake merged with American Standard, Inc., a competitor of Crane Co.

---

ALLIS-CHALMERS CO.

2. As shown by the attached Exhibit 3, White Consolidated Industries, Inc. announced its intention to acquire Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company. In pursuance of that objective it acquired one-third of Allis-Chalmers stock, 13 per cent more than the 20 per cent which, according to the bill gave it "control".

But the acquisition did not take place. 33⅓ per cent was not "control".

PIPER AIRCRAFT CORP.

3. As shown by the attached Exhibit 4, Bangor Punta Corp. and Chris Craft Industries both desired control of Piper Aircraft Corp.

Although each owned more than the 35 per cent of voting stock—which under the bill is conclusively presumed to constitute control—neither was able to exercise control. Bangor Punta was forced to acquire 50.7 per cent of the stock to have actual control.

THE ASSUMPTION THAT FAMILIES ALWAYS ACT IN CONCERT IS CONTRARY TO HUMAN EXPERIENCE

This bill impliedly assumes—as an irrebuttable presumption —that members of a family or related parties always see eye to eye and act in unison. This is contrary to all human experience. Families fall out—family feuds develop as frequently, perhaps more frequently, than feuds between unrelated individuals. And they are often pursued more intensely and obdurately than disagreements between unrelated persons.

Family feuds and interfamily litigation may be unfortunate—but they are not uncommon. The history of Kohler Co. includes an instance of such interfamily litigation.[11]

Members of a family may be engaged in a family feud and battling each other for control of a corporation yet under this bill, as presently drafted, they are conclusively presumed to be acting in concert.

---

Similarly the bill conclusively presumes that stock owned by a foundation will be voted the same as that owned by the "disqualified persons".

Proof that the "disqualified persons" did not control the foundation—or even had no connection with it—or that the foundation stock was actually voted differently than that of the "disqualified persons" would not overcome the conclusive presumption of the bill as presently drafted. The foundation would still have to dispose of its stock at a probable loss.

We submit that rather than relying on percentages and presumptions which will fit few if any actual cases, the regulation should be based on the actual facts.

The question is "Does the foundation together with any 'disqualified persons' who actually control the foundation, in fact have control of the corporation?"

The amendment which we suggest, (Proposed Amendment—Exhibit 5), makes this the test by providing that no foundation together with any "disqualified persons" who actually control the foundation may own more than 50 per cent of the voting stock of a corporation. It substitutes fact for fallacious theory.

DISTRIBUTION OF INCOME

Sec. 4942 (p. 25 et seq.), has, as we understand it, two principal objectives:

1. To insure that income of a foundation will be distributed on a reasonably current basis and not re-invested for growth of the foundation, and
2. To insure that the resources of the foundation would be invested with the main purpose of producing distributable income and not mainly for capital gain.

We do not quarrel with these purposes but here again the bill, as presently drafted, attacks the problem circuitously rather than directly, and in so doing goes too far and creates more problems that it solves.

"MINIMUM INVESTMENT RETURN"

Subsection (e)(3) prescribes a "minimum investment return" of 5 per cent for 1970 and thereafter such return as is fixed in the discretion of the "Secretary or his delegate".

This provision casts almost intolerable burdens on the managers of foundations. It requires foundation managers to commit themselves to obtain a minimum fixed return on investments, each and every year, regardless of economic conditions. Yet, at the same time, it greatly restricts their investment opportunities.

How are foundation managers to meet this new and onerous responsibility?

1. As shown by attached Exhibit 6, of the 30 companies the market price of whose stock is included in the Dow Jones average, only 4 had a dividend yield for 1968 of 5 per cent or over on the basis of the market price. The average dividend yield was 3.54 per cent.

Furthermore were foundation managers to invest in one of these four companies that do presently yield 5 per cent in dividends they would constantly have to watch the fluctuations of the market, guess at probable dividends and dump the stock, possibly at an inappropriate time whenever it appeared likely that market fluctuations and/or dividend prospects might reduce the yield below 5 per cent.

This proposal, as a practical matter, bars foundations from investing in the stock of any industrial corporation.

2. The situation is still worse where stock in a private corporation, having no established market value is concerned.

This bill requires foundation managers to guess, at their peril, what market value the Internal Revenue Service will agree to.

Suppose the managers of Kohler Foundation in good faith determine that the market value of Kohler Co. common stock would be $125 per share and make the 5 per cent distribution on that basis.

But the Secretary, perhaps years later, says "Oh, no. The stock is worth $200 a share. You should have distributed 5 per cent of $200. A penalty of 15 per cent is due and if you do not yield to my arbitrary edict within 90 days, no matter how unreasonable you deem it to be, the penalty becomes 100 per cent."

If this bill passes in its present form there appears to be only one logical thing for a foundation owning unlisted corporate stock to do—dump it as fast as possible no matter what the loss to the foundation and to charity or the damage to the corporation may be.

It is not necessary to prescribe a harsh and arbitrary rule which requires foundation managers to obtain a fixed minimum return on investments to accomplish the objectives of the bill.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT—EXHIBIT 7

The purposes can be accomplished by

1. Requiring a reasonable distribution of actual net income within a reasonable period.

   We think that the requirement of 100 per cent distribution is too rigid and the distribution period of one year too short. A more realistic requirement would be 90 per cent of actual income distributed within two years.

2. Amending Sec. 3944 to specify that investments made solely for capital gain purposes be considered investments which would jeopardize the carrying out of the exempt purposes of the foundation.

THE DRAFTERS OF THE BILL HAVE RECOGNIZED THE HARSHNESS OF THE BILL BY MAKING SPECIAL EXCEPTIONS FOR INDIVIDUAL FOUNDATIONS

The drafters of the bill have recognized the harshness of the bill by making special exceptions, tailored to fit the specific circumstances of two individual foundations.

Subchapter F(4) Section 4943

p. 83 (Kellogg Foundation)
p. 83-84 (Benwood Foundation)

We agree that the Kellogg Foundation and the Benwood Foundation are deserving of relief from the harsh and punitive provisions of the bill.

But to give them this relief by exemptions tailored to meet their peculiar circumstances is the wrong approach.

There are many other foundations equally deserving of exemption from the harsh and punitive provisions of the bill.

We submit that the bill should be amended to treat all foundations fairly and equitably—without discrimination or favoritism.

The bill should be amended so that its effect will not be harsh or punitive as to any foundation which has not been guilty of abuses.

CONCLUSION

We submit that any legislation passed should be remedial—not punitive. It should not penalize the many for the misdeeds of a few. It should be directed to revenue purposes and the prevention of true abuses—not to the prescription of arbitrary rules which will damage or destroy legitimate, properly conducted foundations nor to discourage or destroy private corporations.

Respectfully submitted,

KOHLER CO.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO H.R. 13270

Sec. 507(page 8)

Substitute the following in paragraph (2) hereunder as a definition of "Substantial Contributor":

"(2) SUBSTANTIAL CONTRIBUTOR: For purposes of paragraph (1), the term 'substantial contributor' means—

"any person who (by himself or with his spouse) contributed or bequeathed more than 5 percent of the total contributions to the foundation since it was originated. Contributions or bequests other than cash shall be valued as of the date of such contribution or bequest.

"In the case of a trust, such term also includes the creator of such trust."

Westinghouse Air Holders Approve Merger With American Standard; Judge Bars Delay

A WALL STREET JOURNAL News Roundup

Westinghouse Air Brake Co. announced in Pittsburgh that its shareholders approved a proposed merger with American Standard Inc., and a Federal judge in New York said he wouldn't interfere with the merger despite pending lawsuits that seek to prevent it.

Westinghouse Air Brake management promptly filed certificates of merger with the secretaries of state of Pennsylvania, where Westinghouse Air, is incorporated, and Delaware, where American Standard is incorporated. The companies could merge as soon as Wednesday if further legal action doesn't interfere.

The lawsuits seeking to prevent a merger were filed in recent weeks by Crane Co., New York, which owns directly or beneficially about 31% of Westinghouse Air's outstanding stock. Crane has challenged both the validity of proxy statements sent out by Westinghouse Air concerning the merger and the validity of certain votes cast by shareholders in favor of the merger.

The suits filed by Crane challenging the merger attempt have been combined into a single action before Federal Judge Sylvester J. Ryan in New York. He hasn't yet ruled on the case, but said Friday that he would permit the merger to proceed nonetheless.

Approved by American Standard Holders

Crane has sought to merge with Westinghouse Air and continued to acquire Wabco stock through a tender offer even after its merger offer was rejected. The Wabco-American Standard merger was announced in March and already has been approved by American Standard holders.

In trading on the New York Stock Exchange Friday, Westinghouse Air rose $1.875 to $47.50; American Standard climbed $2.375 to $38.

Westinghouse Air, based in Pittsburgh, makes railway, construction and mining equipment; Crane and American Standard are competitors in the plumbing and heating-supply field and both are engaged in other manufacturing businesses as well.

Westinghouse Air holders approved the proposed merger by a vote of 2,903,868 to 1,180,298, company officials announced at a special shareholders meeting on Friday. The meeting originally was convened on May 16, but was postponed three times while judges of election conducted their tally of ballots.

As soon as the results were announced, Crane lawyers objected on the ground that the proxy statements were invalid, that certain votes were invalid and that Crane was entitled to vote more shares than it had been permitted to vote—essentially the same contentions contained in Crane's lawsuits.

However, A. King McCord, chairman of Westinghouse Air, declared the merger resolution adopted and adjourned the meeting.

Annual Meeting Convened

Immediately afterward, Mr. McCord convened the annual meeting; this also had been postponed pending outcome of the merger vote.

But the annual meeting was recessed immediately to permit a tally of votes cast on a Crane Co. proposal to eliminate staggered terms for Westinghouse Air directors. The meeting is scheduled to reconvene today.

The Crane proposal would reverse an action taken by Westinghouse Air directors in December, when they changed the company's bylaws to permit election of only three of the nine directors at a time for staggered three-year terms. Mr. McCord stated then that the company feared a take-over attempt.

Crane has nominated three candidates to the Westinghouse Air board, including Thomas Mellon Evans, Crane's chairman. Voting on directors also is scheduled today—though, of course, election of directors will be moot if the Westinghouse Air-American Standard merger is completed.

Allis-Chalmers Is Sued By White Consolidated To Rescind Acquisition

White Says $8 Million in Common Paid by Allis for Standard Steel Was an 'Unconscionable Price'

Special to THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

MILWAUKEE — White Consolidated Industries Inc., a Cleveland conglomerate, filed suit in Delaware Chancery Court, Wilmington, asking that the acquisition of Standard Steel Corp. of Los Angeles by Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. be rescinded.

Allis-Chalmers completed the acquisition in January. Standard Steel, a manufacturer of asphalt plants, fishmeal plants, small kilns and rotary dryers and coolers, has factories at Los Angeles and Decatur, Ill.

The agreement called for Allis-Chalmers to purchase the assets of Standard Steel for 280,000 Allis-Chalmers common shares, then trading at $28.75 each. That represented a market value of about $8 million.

The White suit charges that Allis-Chalmers paid an "unconscionable price" for Standard Steel, and that Standard Steel knew the price to be unconscionable.

The suit also says the purpose of the acquisition of Standard Steel was an attempt by Allis-Chalmers management to dilute White's holdings in Allis-Chalmers, which White has announced it intends to acquire.

White currently owns about one-third of Allis-Chalmers' 10,365,000 outstanding common shares. It purchased 3,248,000 of them last Dec. 6 from Gulf & Western Industries Inc., a New York conglomerate.

Allis-Chalmers has filed several suits in an attempt to stave off acquisition by White, which in turn has filed counter suits for the acquisition.

White's newest suit asks for damages from Allis-Chalmers' directors and Standard Steel for the alleged dilution of White's interest in Allis-Chalmers. The suit also asks that Allis-Chalmers directors be enjoined from entering into certain other negotiations or acquisitions in the future.

Allis-Chalmers attorneys called White's action "a nuisance suit brought in an effort to harass the Allis-Chalmers management. The facts are that negotiations for purchase of assets of Standard Steel Corp. began long before White purchased its block (of stock in Allis-Chalmers) from Gulf & Western. Also, the purchase of Standard Steel's assets was a good and wise investment for Allis-Chalmers."

Bangor Punta Claims 50.7% Piper Control; Rival Chris-Craft Insists Fight Isn't Over

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

NEW YORK—Bangor Punta Corp. claimed victory in the battle to acquire control of Piper Aircraft Corp. But Chris-Craft Industries Inc., rival suitor for Piper, contended the battle isn't yet over.

Bangor Punta said it raised its Piper holdings to 50.7% of Piper's 1,640,000 shares outstanding by purchasing, on the open market, an additional 101,564 shares. The purchases, at prices that weren't disclosed, were made after approval was given Aug. 7 by Bangor stockholders to Bangor's recent exchange offers for Piper stock, Bangor said. Bangor said it filed a statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission reporting the purchases and stating that a portion of the shares haven't yet been delivered.

In its last previous public announcement of its holdings, Bangor said it owned 44.3% of Piper stock.

Chris-Craft, which previously reported a 40% ownership of Piper, said it currently owns 42% of Piper stock outstanding.

Chris-Craft contended that Bangor Punta owns only 35% of Piper on an uncontested basis. Chris-Craft has filed suit against Bangor, asking that Bangor be required to divest itself of blocks representing 15% of Piper stock.

Last month, a Federal district judge denied a preliminary injunction requested by Chris-Craft to restrain Bangor from retaining the stock in question. But Chris-Craft announced yesterday that the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has granted an "expedited hearing" Sept. 19 on an appeal of the lower court's ruling.

Chris-Craft said its appeal is based on an alleged "irreconcilable" conflict between the district court ruling and an SEC action that resulted in Bangor agreeing to cease "gun jumping" in making statements about its exchange offers.

Bangor Punta also has filed suit against Chris-Craft. When asked if Bangor would continue its suit, David W. Wallace, Bangor's president and chief executive officer, said yesterday that the suit was filed "in response" to Chris-Craft's, seemingly, indicating that if Chris-Craft withdrew its litigation, Bangor would reciprocate.

Mr. Wallace said also that Bangor has "no immediate plans" to bid for Chris-Craft's stock in Piper.

Last month, Bangor gained control of Piper's eight-man board. Four Bangor officers were elected and a fifth member, William T. Piper Jr., president of Piper, said that "with my affirmative vote" Bangor would have a 5-to-3 majority. Piper management and the Piper family has supported Bangor's bid for the company.

Piper is a Lock Haven, Pa., maker of low and medium-priced airplanes. Bangor makes pleasure boats, textiles, and law-enforcement equipment and operates farms, a railroad, and consulting firms. Chris-Craft makes pleasure boats, plastic and latex foams, organic chemicals, carpet yarns and operates television stations.

Mr. Wallace said Piper's operating results will be consolidated with Bangor's by 1970. Aircraft sales then will represent about 25% of Bangor's revenue, he said.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO H.R. 13270

Sec. 4942 (page 25)

Substitute the following in paragraph (a)

"(a) Initial Tax—

There is hereby imposed on any undistributed income under 90 per cent of a private foundation for any taxable year, which has not been distributed before the first day of the third (or any succeeding) taxable year following such taxable year (if such first day falls within the taxable period) a tax equal to 15 per cent of the amount by which the undistributed income is less than 90 per cent of the adjusted net income at the beginning of such third (or succeeding) taxable year. This section shall not apply to a private foundation which is an operating foundation (as defined in subsection (J)(3)) for the taxable year.

(b) No change

(c) Undistributed Income

For purposes of this section, the term 'undistributed income' means, with respect to any private foundation for any taxable year, the amount by which—

(1) the distributable amount for such taxable year, exceeds

(2) the qualifying distributions made out of such distributable amount prior to the first day of the third taxable year thereafter.

(d) Distributable Amount

For purposes of this section, the term 'distributable amount' means, with respect to any foundation for any taxable year, 90 per cent of the adjusted net income.

(e) Eliminate

(f) Change subsection designation to (e)—no other change

(g) Change subsection designation to (f)—no other change

(h) Change subsection designation to (g)—no other change

(i) Change subsection designation to (h)—no other change

(j) Change subsection designation to (i)—no other change

Sec. 4944

Substitute—

INVESTMENTS WHICH JEOPARDIZE CHARITABLE PURPOSE

(a) Tax On The Private Foundation

If a private foundation invests any amount in such a manner as to jeopardize the carrying out of any of its exempt purposes there is hereby imposed on the making of such investment a tax equal to 100 per cent of the amount so invested. The tax imposed by this subsection shall be paid by the private foundation. Any investment in non-income producing property solely for capital gain will be considered as jeopardizing the carrying out of the exempt purposes of the foundation for purposes of this section, to the extent of such investment.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF KOHLER CO., KOHLER, WISCONSIN, RE: AMENDMENT NO. 222, TO H.R. 13270 BY SENATOR MILLER, SUBMITTED BY LYMAN C. CONGER, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

This statement is filed, with a request that it be made part of the record, in response to the request that we submit a record statement of our position on proposed amendment No. 222 and the extent to which it would obviate our stated objections to H.R. 13270 in its present form.

PERMITTED HOLDINGS IN A CORPORATION

The proposed re-definition of "permitted holdings" in amendment No. 222 [Sec. 4943(c)(2), amdt. p. 4] bases the test of control or lack of control of a corporation by a foundation on activities rather than on presumptions.

This, we think, is the only logical approach. (Our statement pp. 15–18).

In our opinion the proposed revision of subsection (2) would not only be an adequate substitute for our proposed amendment (our statement Exhibit 5, p. 26) but is, in fact, superior thereto. We request permission to amend our statement to substitute Subsection 2 (p. 4) of amendment No. 222 for our Exhibit 5.

CONTROL OF A FOUNDATION

The proposed revision of subsection (2), in effect, adds the stock of those who actually control the foundation, i.e., the officers, directors, trustees and related foundations to the stock owned by the foundation itself.

It relies on realities rather than on theoretical presumptions of control by "substantial contributors" or "disqualified persons".

Adoption of amendment No. 222 would therefore obviate the necessity for our proposed amendment relative to the definition of "substantial contributor". (Our statement Exhibit 1, p. 22.)

Of course if the realistic approach of amendment No. 222 should not be adopted and the theoretical presumptions of control by "substantial contributors" and "disqualified persons" retained, we believe that the definitions should be made more realistic, as suggested in our Exhibit 1.

TAXES ON FAILURE TO DISTRIBUTE INCOME

The suggested revisions of Sec. 4942, Pages 1 and 2 of amendment No. 222, are a very considerable improvement to the bill as now drafted, since they apply the 5% "minimum investment" only to excess business holdings. They do not leave the determination of the minimum investment standard applicable to "permitted holdings" to the sole discretion of the Secretary but provide a reasonable standard upon which exercise of his determination must be based.

However it still leaves one problem for foundations like Kohler Foundation, which have assets in the form of corporate stock which is unlisted and has no established market value or quotation. Such foundations will still be unable to predetermine, in advance of income distribution, that the basis upon which they apply the distributable percentage will be acceptable. They would still face the hazard that the value which they place upon the stock in good faith might not be accepted by the Internal Revenue Service, with the result that a distribution made in good faith would be held to be inadequate.

We would suggest revising subsection B of amendment No. 222 (p. 2) by rewriting Sec. 4942(e)(2) to read:

> "(2) VALUATION.—For the purposes of paragraph (1) (A) the fair market value of securities for which market quotations are readily available shall be determined on a monthly basis. The fair market value of securities for which market quotations are not readily available but as to which a fair market value has been agreed to by the Internal Revenue Service for estate or gift tax purposes shall be the most recent such determination of market value. For all other assets the fair market value shall be determined at such times and in such manner as the Secretary or his delegate shall by regulations prescribe."

We wish again to thank the Committee for affording us the opportunity to present our views.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Albert E. Arent, Phoebe Waterman Foundation, Inc.

STATEMENT OF ALBERT E. ARENT, COUNSEL, PHOEBE WATERMAN FOUNDATION, INC.

Mr. ARENT. I am appearing here today as a member of the law firm of Arent, Fox, Kintner, Plotkin & Kahn, in behalf of the Phoebe Waterman Foundation.

Like all the others who have appeared here, I profess our purity and virtue by having contributed all of our income to the standard charities, health, education, cultural, and welfare organizations, organizations of which I am sure all of you thoroughly approve.

The foundation owns 19 percent of the stock of the Rohm and Haas Co. of Philadelphia, a corporation 51 percent of whose stock is traded on the New York Stock Exchange.

The foundation was established in 1945. Its donors, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Haas, are both deceased, and we state without apology that the establishment of this foundation was designed to effect two purposes: One, to achieve a major philanthropy, and I am talking now in terms of $100 million; and, secondly, to enable the family to satisfy their desire for such philanthropy without jeopardizing their control of a family business which has been a credit to the State of Pennsylvania and other States in which it has plants, which has been the source of employment and stability and good citizenship of admirable character.

It is a company which is a prime target for raiders, and is protected from the corporate raiders only by the fact that as much as 49 percent of the stock in the company can be considered to be in friendly hands.

Under the constructive ownership rules of this bill, perhaps 36½ percent is the combined percentage of all sources, but certainly the family can muster support to the extent of 49 percent, and we think this is good. We think that our laws for many years have fostered the independence of family businesses.

They have adopted——

The CHAIRMAN. Let me just ask you, do you think you establish these foundations for the purpose of helping a family to control a corporation in perpetuity; is that why we established a corporation?

Mr. ARENT. No. It was a collateral purpose to achieving a philanthropy. People who have their fortunes in self-made businesses cannot give major sums of philanthropy except in terms of the stock of those businesses, and if they have respect for their businesses and a desire to operate them well in the community in which they live, they are unwilling to dispose of so much stock that the conglomerates will gobble them up.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you know the fellow who might buy some of that stock, might not be a very good American and a very good businessman? That is always possible. You proceed on the assumption that if your foundation loses control of that corporation, whoever gains that control is going to be some big first-class crook or some big monopolistic giant in violation of the law.

But is it not quite possible that whoever might buy control of it might be a good American?

Mr. ARENT. We would not want to take that chance, sir, because magazines like Finance.

The CHAIRMAN. It happens all the time on the Wall Street Stock Exchange where all kinds of corporations can be bought if people have the desire and the money.

Mr. ARENT. This company has been listed in Finance Magazine recently as a target for a takeover were it not for the family-controlled stock.

I would also say that a bill like this present H.R. 13270, which goes to such trouble to adopt legislation throwing roadblocks in the way of conglomerate acquisition of independent businesses, is doing something inconsistent and undesirable when it forces a very substantial group of independent family businesses into a position of jeopardy with respect to those conglomerates, as it does by requiring the disposition of this stock.

The CHAIRMAN. But now, isn't that a matter for the antitrust law, for the antitrust division of the Federal Trade Commission laws?

We here in the Tax Committee are trying to say who should control your corporation?

Mr. ARENT. I can only throw that question back to the committee, in view of the legislation that it has included in this bill, which attempts to deal with the conglomerate problem.

But with respect to this kind of family foundation, as a member of many organizations doing this kind of charitable work that nobody disputes, I know how much money comes to them, the dimensions of the giving that has been encouraged by the existence of these private foundations; and with respect to their threat of domination of our country, I can only refer back to the testimony that Prof. John Simon gave here yesterday which demonstrates that the private foundations are a very small factor compared to the other major organizations like insurance companies, and so on, that control our corporate wealth, that they do not represent any real risk of impact upon the control structure of our country; that they have done enormous good, and that they are expiring as rapidly as they are being created.

What Professor Simon was pleading for was a healthy atmosphere for the creation of this kind of philanthropy in order to maintain the present balance, which is a good one, and he admits frankly, as I do that without the collateral benefit of being able to maintain the family relationship to your business with this philanthropy, the philanthropy simply could not go on. I think that one should regard the fact that family control is involved in the same way one regards charity to a university. When the donor says, "I want in 4-foot letters my name on that building." Sure, it serves a private purpose, too, but the charity gets the money. The dollars go to charity, and I think that is the basis for the tax exemption.

Well, so that I do not take too much of your time, permit me to go on and make a couple of points which I think are really a kind of summary of what has been said by a number of other clean, worthwhile foundations.

One, that it is against our national public policy to force a private foundation to divest itself of stock in a family-controlled business, and unfairly retroactive in stripping away family control, because whether you agree with my statement of public policy or not with respect to the future, it is unfair, really contrary to our traditions, to take people who have planned their whole estate in terms of protecting a family relationship to a business, rooted in a local community, to expose them retroactively to movement out of the community, to Wall Street centralized control, when they have given away the beneficial aspects of most of their wealth, in order to let their families continue to play their constructive role in the business and in the community.

Now, existing policy has been encouraging the retention of family control of businesses. I think our statutes and the legislative reports on section 303 and section 6166 demonstrate that our policy has been to encourage the use of family foundations to preserve the independence of family-controlled businesses.

The policy has unquestionably enlarged the scope and dimensions of charitable giving.

There are abuses in the foundation field. I think many of them have been magnified beyond their perspective in terms of the overall performance of the private philanthropy. But still these abuses can be and are being dealt with very effectively by provisions, other provisions, of the bill.

A measure as extreme and damaging as divestiture is unnecessary.

Finally, the persons, who, in reliance upon our longstanding public policy favoring the creation of private foundations, have committed to charitable purposes stock needed for the protection of the family business from corporate raiders should not have their control jeopardized by new ground rules having retroactive effect.

To anticipate a question from Senator Miller, whether or not you buy the point of view I have expressed with respect to national policy, this particular clean, meritorious foundation will be protected adequately by his amendment No. 222.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

(Mr. Arent's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF ALBERT E. ARENT, IN BEHALF OF THE PHOEBE WATERMAN FOUNDATION, INC., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SUMMARY

I. The provisions of H.R. 13270 (proposed section 4943 of the Internal Revenue Code) which would force a private foundation to divest itself of stock in a family-controlled business are unsound as a matter of public policy and unfairly retroactive in stripping away family control.

II. Existing policy which encourages the use of business holdings to fund charity has —

A. enlarged the scope and dimensions of charitable giving, and

B. helped to preserve the independence of family-controlled businesses.

III. Specific abuses arising in connection with the operation of private foundations can be and are dealt with by specific provisions relating to the abuses. A measure as extreme and damaging as divestiture is unnecessary.

IV. Persons who, in reliance upon the long-standing public policy favoring the creation of private foundations, have committed to charitable purposes stock needed for the protection of a family business from corporate raiders should not have their control jeopardized by new ground rules having retroactive effect.

STATEMENT

My name is Albert E. Arent. I am an attorney in Washington, D.C. and am appearing before the Committee on behalf of the Phoebe Waterman Foundation, Inc. of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. This Foundation, established in 1945 by Mr. and Mrs. Otto Haas, who are now both deceased, owns approximately 19 percent of the stock of the Rohm and Haas Company, a manufacturing company listed on the New York Stock Exchange. Haas family interests beneficially own approximately 14 percent of the stock and nonexempt trusts, paying their entire income to charity, own approximately 16 percent.

Under the provisions of H.R. 13270, the Phoebe Waterman Foundation would be classified as a private foundation and, pursuant to proposed section 4943 of the Internal Revenue Code (which would be added by section 101(b) of H.R. 13270), would be forced to dispose of practically all of the stock it owns in the Rohm and Haas Company. I respectfully submit that these provisions are unsound as a matter of public policy and unfair in their retroactive effect of stripping a family of management control of the business which it created and successfully developed.

Public policy favors family control of business

A significant number of private foundations now in existence, and probably the great majority of them, came into being primarily because of the impact of the Federal estate tax on family businesses. The availability of private foundations has permitted a family to fund its charitable activities with the principal wealth of the family—its business holdings—without jeopardizing the family control of the business. Were it not for the available alternative of creating private foundations to hold substantial interests in such businesses, the extremely high rates of estate tax would have caused the disassembly of a great many successful family businesses. Unquestionably, the charitable deductions provided in the tax laws, and available for contributions to private foundations, have intentionally encouraged the establishment of private foundations.

This was no loophole. It was not an abuse or perversion. Rather, it was a matter of national policy. Giving up beneficial ownership of substantial interests in a family business in favor of charity was the price to be paid for preserving to the family voting control of the business. Private foundations so established have played two important roles: (1) the public and social role of supporting charitable endeavors and supplying human needs; and (2) the private role of preserving the independence of family businesses.

These are not inconsitent roles. They can and do co-exist. Thousands of private foundations have performed both functions with complete fairness and without abuse. In their charitable functions they have relieved both taxpayers and Government of the burden of such social obligations. They are a major source of funds for local hospitals, schools, churches, and other community services. Because of the zealous interest of the founding family, they are usually among the group most responsive to the special needs of the community and most ready to take the initiative in meeting new problems or bringing new solutions to old problems.

The preservation of family control of a business originated, managed, nurtured, and brought to a position of outstanding success by an individual family cannot be socially undesirable, sinister, or evil in itself. On the contrary, the traditions of the United States have fostered such enterprises. Congress has previously recognized this policy in the tax laws: section 303 of the Internal Revenue Code precludes dividend treatment on the redemption of stock to pay death taxes, and section 6166 of the Code provides a ten-year period for the payment of the estate tax in respect of a closely-held business.[1] No aspect of national or other public policy would be served by legislation which would either deter the creation of new charitable foundations or force existing foundations to dispose of those business interests which enable the founding family to preserve management control of the very businesses that begot the foundations.

Indeed, the forced sale of business interests held by private foundations would make the businesses highly vulnerable to acquisition by conglomerates and lead to a field day for corporate "raiders". This would be inimical to the public interest and in conflict with national anti-trust policy. Does it not seem strange that the same House Bill which seeks in section 411 to impede conglomerate mergers by limiting the deductibility of interest on corporate acquisition indebtedness, should by the divestiture provisions of section 101 weaken or destroy the ability of many independent businesses to ward off the corporate raiders and avoid being swallowed up by corporate giants?

[1] See Report of Committee on Finance to Accompany Revenue Act of 1950, relating to Section 303, and Report of Committee on Ways and Means to Accompany Small Business Tax Revision Act of 1958. Relating to Section 6166. S. Rept. 2357, 81st Cong., 2d Sess. (1950) states:

"It has been brought to the attention of your committee that the problem of financing the estate tax is acute in the case of estates consisting largely of shares in a family corporation. The market for such shares is usually very limited, and it is frequently difficult, if not impossible, to dispose of a minority interest. If, therefore, the estate tax cannot be financed through the sale of the other assets in the estate, the executors will be forced to dispose of the family business. In many cases the result will be the absorption of a family enterprise by larger competitors, thus tending to accentuate the degree of concentration of industry in this country."

That there have been some instances of abuse does not warrant wholesale punitive legislation unjustly affecting the hundreds of private foundations and family-controlled businesses which have long functioned in exemplary fashion. The instances of abuse—which must certainly be comparatively few in the whole broad range of private foundation endeavors—can be corrected by adequate enforcement of existing laws and by the enactment of narrow remedies limited to the specific problem areas, as provided in other provisions of H.R. 13270.

Unfair retroactivity

In any event, if there is to be a change in national policy it should be prospective only. Even if it should be deemed socially desirable for the future to take away the incentive for the creation of new private foundations, principles of fair play and elementary justice dictate that there be no retroactive legislation penalizing existing foundations and the families who created them.

It must not be forgotten that Government policy until now offered the inducement—the consideration so to speak—for the establishment of private foundations. In reliance thereon the creators of private foundations contributed to charity far more stock than would have had to be reserved for estate taxes. In forcing the divestiture, the proposed section 4943 has the brutally retroactive impact of stripping a family of the control of its business even though the family has irrevocably relied upon the existing law to satisfy its philanthropic goals without endangering such control.

Although the bill purports to allow reversion of control to the family by exempting from the self-dealing provisions arm's-length sales of stock in the family business by the foundation back to the family, this does not provide the necessary relief. The proposal in H.R. 13270 to limit the deduction of interest to acquire or carry investment assets, as well as Federal Reserve Board margin requirements, will probably preclude financing of the purchase of substantial blocks of stock; and, in any event, family resources may be insufficient in relation to the present value of the stock which must be repurchased in order to maintain control.

At the very least, the divestiture provisions of the bill should not apply to existing arrangements. This can be accomplished simply by inserting the words "acquired after May 26, 1969" in the definition of "excess business holdings" contained in proposed section 4943(c)(1) of the Code. It may be noted that this would eliminate the need for the three pages of the bill (sec. 101(k) (4) and (5)), containing the special exemptions for two existing foundations.

Without any doubt private charitable foundations fulfill an urgent social need. They have played a vital role in the betterment of mankind. They can and do perform some functions which neither individuals nor public agencies can do as well. Society would be the loser if new legislation should either impair the effectiveness of existing foundations or discourage the creation of new ones.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Mr. Isaac Stokes, who is chairman of the board of trustees and general counsel of the Phelps-Stokes Fund.

STATEMENT OF ISAAC N. P. STOKES, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD AND GENERAL COUNSEL, PHELPS-STOKES FUND

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman and Senators, I appreciate the opportunity to lay before this committee the problems created by this bill for a relatively small foundation which has been in operation for more than 50 years, performing a somewhat specialized function; namely, improving the quality of education for Negroes in the United States and in Africa.

This organization has a small endowment, as foundations go, of about $3 million. Its income from this endowment is spent almost entirely on its overhead expenses, maintaining its staff of experts in the education field and operating in its office.

The actual programs which it carries out are financed by contributions which it receives and has received over many years on usually an annual basis or for 2 or 3 years at a time from the larger foundations, sometimes from business corporations, and in very large measure in recent years from the U.S. Government itself.

During the past 5 years grants made to the Phelps-Stokes Fund for the conduct of its operations have averaged $500,000 a year or a total of $2,500,000, of which approximately $1 million came from the Federal Government.

Now, this organization would be very seriously affected by the proposed bill in a number of respects, which I have described in detail in my statement, and will only touch on at this time.

It would apparently, within the definition of a private—come within the definition of a private foundation. This is because of one feature in the bill which I hope and believe is not intended.

The bill excludes from the definition of private foundations organizations which receive a specified proportion of their income from broadly diversified sources. Unfortunately, private foundations are, in fact, tax-exempt foundations are, excluded from that category. Thus in determining whether this organization is a broadly supported organization, contributions which it receives would be largely excluded because of the provision that contributions in these tax-exempt private foundations which largely support it would not be counted.

I do not think that that is necessary to achieve the purposes of this bill.

Another feature of this definition, and again I think, perhaps, unintended, is in the defining of these broadly supported organizations which are excluded from the definition of a foundation, of foreign governments are excluded.

Now, the Phelps-Stokes Fund has performed many important services in improving the level of education in Africa. So far these services have, in general, been financed by grants from larger foundations.

But as African countries improve their own economies, it is entirely possible that they will be in a position to pay for these services. There is no reason why they should not pay for them. But this definition would discourage the fund from receiving payment for services rendered in the field of technical assistance and in improving education from foreign governments.

The changes which I have suggested and which are spelled out in detail in my statement would, I believe, remove the Phelps-Stokes Fund from the definition of a private foundation. If so, the problems that I am now going to describe will not exist for the fund.

But assuming that it remains a private foundation, it will be seriously hampered by the fact that it will not come within the definition of an operating foundation. The major foundations are very drastically discouraged by this bill from making contributions to other foundations unless they are operating foundations.

Although the fund is essentially an operating organization it does not come within the technical definition, again because of the sources from which it receives assistance.

In this respect also I have proposed some specific amendments which would eliminate this problem.

The major foundations would also be discouraged from contributing to organizations such as the Phelps-Stokes Fund by the very strict requirements of expenditures responsibility which would apparently require the granting foundation to audit the books of the receiving foundation, and to satisfy itself by its own efforts that these funds were being properly spent.

Of course, we do not question the purpose of this provision. It would, however, impose a very heavy burden on the granting foundation, which would discourage its contributions, and in cases where, as in many of our programs, contributions received from several granting foundations to give each of them this expenditure responsibility would involve an almost impossible duplication of supervision.

I believe there is a simple solution to this which would achieve the purposes of the framers of the bill, namely, to require very precise audits of the expenditures of the funds received. These audits to be made by a certified independent public accountant, and satisfactory to the granting foundations. This is the normal responsibility of auditors, and it seems to me that the granting foundations should be entitled to rely on audits made by professional auditors rather than to have to undertake to supervise themselves the expenditure of the funds which they grant.

I will touch only briefly on the provisions regarding influencing legislation. As a citizen and as a lawyer, I am very deeply concerned with the constitutional issues involved. Those, however, have been, I think, very adequately represented by the American Civil Liberties Union.

I would like to point out a specific problem that may well confront organizations as the one I represent, namely, that where an organization is actually operating on behalf of the U.S. Government or a State government—we have done both—situations may well arise where it is imperative in order to determine what contributions should be made by the Government to the organization to have conferences with the interested Government officials.

These may well involve legislation in the form of appropriations.

I suggest, therefore, that contacts with legislators regarding appropriations for funds to be spent by a foundation in the public interest should be excluded from the category of activities influencing legislation which is outlined in the bill.

Thank you very much.

Senator BENNETT (presiding). Thank you very much, Mr. Stokes.

(Isaac N. P. Stokes prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF ISAAC N. P. STOKES, CHAIRMAN OF BOARD AND GENERAL COUNSEL, PHELPS-STOKES FUND

SUMMARY

1. The Phelps-Stokes Fund is a relatively small, independent foundation (with assets of about $3,000,000), devoted primarily to the improvement of Negro education in the U.S. and Africa. Its investment income (about $100,000) is substantially all required for staff and other administrative expenses, and the Fund depends on grants (averaging about $500,000 a year for the past five years) from larger foundations, the U.S. government, and other contributors to finance its operations. The Bill would subject it to restrictions on its activities and on grants to it that would seriously impair its usefulness.

2. Contributions to a foundation from unrelated tax-exempt organizations—as distinct from individuals or business corporations—should be included without limitation in determining whether it comes within the description of broadly supported organizations that are excluded from the definition of "private foundation" by proposed section 509(a)(2)(A) of the Code.

3. In the same definition, payments from foreign governmental agencies for services or facilities should likewise be included without limitation.

4. The waiting period for termination of status as a private foundation under section 507(e) should be left to administrative discretion instead of being fixed at 60 calendar months.

5. The provisions regarding influencing legislation in sections 4945(b)(1) and 4945(c) would involve unreasonable restrictions on the rights of foundations and their managers to communicate with legislative and other officials. The constitutionality of these restrictions on free speech should be studied. As a minimum, section 4945(c) should be amended to permit communications regarding a government grant to a foundation in the public interest.

6. The requirement of section 4945(b)(4) that a private foundation making a grant to another private foundation must assume expenditure responsibility, would unnecessarily discourage grants from large private foundations to small ones like the Phelps-Stokes Fund. The definition of "expenditure responsibility" in section 4945(f) should be amended to place reliance on audits by approved independent certified public accountants.

7. The definition of "operating foundation" in section 4942(j) should be clarified. The 25% limit on support from any one exempt organization should be increased to 33⅓% or, preferably, made in applicable to grants that are subject to expenditure responsibility. Government support should be included without limit.

8. The statement includes the text of proposed amendments.

Statement

I am appearing before this Committee to urge that the proposed Tax Reform Act be modified so that it would permit the Phelps-Stokes Fund and other foundations similarly situated to carry on their present valuable functions of performing specialized services for the benefit of the public with funds largely furnished by the bigger foundations and the United States Government itself. I represent the Fund as Chairman of its Board of Trustees and general counsel. Its address is 22 East 54th Street, New York, N.Y. 10022.

THE PHELPS-STOKES FUND

The Phelps-Stokes Fund was incorporated in 1911 by special act of the New York State legislature to receive and administer a bequest under the will of Caroline Phelps Stokes.[1] Its purposes, as stated in the act of incorporation, are to apply the income from this bequest and such other funds as it may receive "to the erection and improvement of tenement house dwellings in the City of New York for the poor families of that city . . .; and for the education of Negroes, both in Africa and the United States, North American Indians and needy and deserving white students, through industrial schools, the founding of scholarships, and the erection or endowment of school buildings or chapels." The corporation is authorized "to use any means to such ends which shall from time to time seem expedient to its members or trustees including research, publication, the establishment and maintenance of charitable or benevolent activities, agencies and institutions, and the aid of any such activities, agencies or institutions already established."

The Fund has concentrated its activities in recent years on improving the education of black Americans and Africans, and on related services. In the field of New York City housing, it has confined its activities recently to the making of small grants to other organizations, because it has not found it practicable to develop a staff with the experience to operate directly in this field, as it does in the educational area.

Over the period of more than half a century during which it has been in operation, the Fund has achieved a reputation as, I think it is fair to say, the outstanding institution devoting its activities specifically to the improvement of the education of Negroes. I will mention only a few of its principal contributions.

In 1916 a survey entitled Negro Education in the United States, prepared by the Phelps-Stokes Fund was published by the United States Government. This provided the first authoritative compendium of information about all Negro institutions of learning in the United States, together with studies of public facilities for Negro education in the states operating separate facilities for Negroes. Among other things, this study brought to public attention the relative expenditures per student devoted to the public education of Negroes and whites in separate school systems.

Before the end of official segregation in state public school systems, the Fund undertook an extensive program for improving the standards of education in public high schools for Negroes, with the active cooperation of state school officials. This involved conferences and refresher courses for Negro high school teachers to enable them to keep up with improvements in teaching methods.

In Africa, the Fund conducted surveys in the 1920's of the educational facilities and programs of the British colonies. The resulting reports were important landmarks in the development of the educational policy of the British Colonial Office and resulted in redirection of that policy to give the Africans an education more suited to their local needs. Although most of the recommendations of these reports have been overtaken by events, they are of such historical importance that they were recently republished to meet the demands of students of African education.

The major current activity of the Fund is the Co-operative College Development Program, under which thirty predominantly Negro colleges have learned the techniques of efficient planning and financing. The results have been most encouraging in terms of greatly increased alumni support for these institutions and also improved relations with, and financial support from, the communities in which they are located. With funds contributed by the United States Government under Title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965 as well as one of the larger foundations, this program has been expanded to include 70 institutions of which four are predominantly white colleges.

The full-time President of the Fund, Dr. Frederick D. Patterson, formerly President of Tuskegee Institute, has devoted a substantial part of his time, with the encouragement of the Fund, to service on the boards of educatonal institutions and to service with committees of the United States Government, international organizations and other institutions concerned with Negro education in the United States and Africa, and related activities. The Trustees of the Fund feel that this is a very important part of the contribution of the Fund to the public service, although he acts in these capacities as an individual rather than as a representative of the Fund.

The Fund played a leading role in establishing the Robert R. Moton Memorial Conference Center, at Capahosic, Virginia, which has been the scene of many important interracial conferences on education, housing and related matters of interracial concern, attended by educators, students, governmental officials and representatives of interested organizations.

In cooperation with two other foundations which provide the financing, the Fund administers a program which grants fellowships for post-graduate study by Africans in the United States. The Fund also provides financial assistance to African undergraduates in this country to enable them to complete their studies.

The recognized special competence of the Fund in the field of its activities is evidenced by the many grants it has received for the purpose of carrying out programs either proposed by it or undertaken at the suggestion of the grantors. In the past five years, these grants have included over $1,000,000 from the United States Government and nearly $1,500,000 from other sources, mostly larger foundations. In addition, two old established organizations, the American Colonization Society and the New York Colonization Society, recently turned over all their remaining assets to the Fund for use in improving education in Africa.

With the exception of one activity, the Fund does not seek support from the general public. The contributions on which it depends for its operations come from larger foundations, the United States Government, and occasionally from corporations or other organizations or individuals who are especially interested in its work. The only exception is that it has organized an affiliate known as the African Student Aid Fund, which actively seeks and receives public support for the specific purpose of furnishing financial assistance to destitute African students in the United States.

The Phelps-Stokes Fund is small as compared to the well-known major fundations. It has total assets of approximately $3,000,000 including partial ownership of the small building which it uses for offices. Its annual income from investments is approximately $100,000, which does not even cover salaries of its seven professional and seven secretarial staff members and other expenses of administration. To carry on its services, it is dependent on the contributions I have mentioned, averaging over half a million dollars a year during the past five years.

After the original bequest from the founder, the Fund received a gift of about $65,000 from the founder's sister during the latter's lifetime and bequests of $87,000 at her death in 1927. Otherwise, it has received no financial support from the family of the founder other than a bequest of $500 from a nephew of the founder who died in 1957. Its investments are in no way connected with any business of the funder or the founder's family except for a holding in a small, inactive family corporation, which is expected to be liquidated shortly on a basis that will provide a final distribution of less than $1,000 to the Fund. The Fund has no other connections with the founder's family, except that four of the eighteen members of the Board of Trustees, including myself as Chairman, are grandchildren of a brother of the founder.

STATUS AS PRIVATE FOUNDATION

The Fund is near the borderline between publicly supported "thirty-percent organizations", as to which contributors may take income tax deductions up to 30% of income, and organizations as to which deductions are limited to 20%. Which side of the line the Fund will fall on, depends on the amount of contributions received from the federal government, which vary substantially from year to year, and on detailed analysis of the varying sources and amounts of other contributions in the light of the applicable Treasury Regulations defining public support. The sources and amounts of future contributions are so uncertain, that we must assume that the Fund will not be excluded from the definition of "private foundation" in proposed section 509(a)(1) as a "thirty-percent organization" described in section 170(b)(1)(B).

Nor will the Fund come within the second excluded category, described in proposed section 509(a)(2) and referred to in the House Committee Report as "broadly supported organizations", receiving more than a third of their support from certain sources. This is because the specified sources exclude grants or contributions from any "disqualified person" as defined in section 4946 and that definition includes any "substantial contributor", a term which is defined, by reference to section 507(b)(2), as any person who either contributes more than $5,000 to the foundation in a year or is the largest contributor in a year.[2] This brings me to the first specific changes in the Bill which I would like to propose.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS OF SECTION 509(a)

In view of the undesirable influence which large individual or corporate contributors may exert over foundations to which they contribute, there are obvious reasons for treating them as "disqualified persons" for purposes of the definition of a private foundation. I submit, however, that the position of contributors that are themselves tax-exempt organizations is quite different, as long as they have no connection with the organization to which they are giving. If such contributing organizations are not themselves private foundations, their gifts are not likely to involve any risk of the sort of impropriety which the Bill aims to prevent. If they are private foundations, any abuse should be adequately discouraged by the provisions of the Bill (especially section 4941 regarding self-dealing) which will be applicable to them as contributors. An organization which otherwise meets the test of being a broadly supported organization exempt from treatment as a private foundation, should not be disqualified by accepting a contribution of any size from a tax-exempt charitable organization. I suggest, therefore, that section 509(a)(2)(A) be amended by inserting after "with respect to the organization," the words "from any unrelated organization described in section 170(c)(2) which would not be a disqualified person as so defined if it were not a substantial contributor as defined in section 4946". The term "unrelated organization" could be defined by regulation so as to preclude undesirable relationships between granting and receiving foundations.

The category of broadly supported organizations that are excluded from private foundation treatment contains another limitation which I believe should be likewise amended. This is the provision that gross receipts from performance of services exclude receipts from any person which are in excess of 1% of the organization's support in the year of receipt. As in the case of contributions from substantial contributors, I submit that this limitation should also be qualified to exclude receipts from non-profit institutions. For example, in the Cooperative College Development Program of the Phelps-Stokes Fund, which I referred to in describing the functions of the Fund, a substantial part of the financing of the program comes from payments made by the participating colleges. An organization which, like the Phelps-Stokes Fund, is engaged in furnishing extensive services to unrelated tax-exempt organizations, should not be discouraged from making reasonable charges for such services but should, on the contrary, be encouraged to make its services as broadly available as possible by receiving payment from those recipients that can afford to pay. I would, therefore, suggest that section 509(a)(2)(A)(ii) be amended by inserting after "receipts from any person" the words "(other than an unrelated organization described in section 170(c)(2) or which would be so described if it were created or organized in the United States)".

[2] "Thirty-percent organizations" that are substantial contributors are apparently qualified sources for the "broadly supported" category, but this would not substantially affect the Fund's status because most of its large contributions are from organizations that are not "thirty-percent organizations."

A further difficulty with the present definition of the category of broadly supported organizations is that the reference to support from "any person other than a disqualified person . . . , or from any organization described in section 170(b)(1)(B)" excludes contributions from foreign governments. Organizations like the Phelps-Stokes Fund, whose services include technical assistance to foreign governments, should not be discouraged, or perhaps precluded, from receiving payment for such services. There is always the possibility that newly discovered mineral wealth or other resources will put the governments of the developing countries in a position where they will have ample funds but will still be desperately in need of the kind of technical assistance which an organization like the Phelps-Stokes Fund can furnish. I therefore suggest adding to the language I have quoted the words "or from any governmental agency of a foreign state in payment for performance of services or furnishing of facilities".

TAX ON PRIVATE FOUNDATION INVESTMENT INCOME

For the reasons already stated, I would hope that the Bill will be amended in a manner that will exclude organizations such as the Phelps-Stokes Fund from the definition of private foundation. In case these amendments are not adopted, however, I feel I should call the Committee's attention to certain other provisions which would affect the Phelps-Stokes Fund as a private foundation.

The first of these is the tax on private foundation investment income under proposed section 506. I will not discuss the general arguments against this tax, which are well known to the Committee, but I would like to point out that it would impose a special hardship on organizations, like the Fund, which now devote substantially all their investment income to administrative expenses, relying on outside support for their operating budgets. Unless contributors can be induced to make bigger allocations than they now do for the overhead expenses involved in the programs which they finance, this tax will probably require a substantial reduction of staff on the part of the Fund or its gradual liquidation.

TERMINATION OF STATUS

The provisions of sections 507 and 508 relating to termination of status as a private foundation apparently require that an organization which in all respects has ceased to come within the definition of a private foundation must nevertheless continue to be treated as such for a minimum of five years, unless it terminates its entire existence by distributing all of its assets to other organizations meeting specified requirements. Since the Secretary has complete discretion under the proposed provisions to impose a drastic tax upon termination of status, it would seem that this would provide sufficient deterrence to termination for improper purposes. There does not appear to be any reason why a private foundation whose sources of support and methods of operation have changed so that it no longer comes within the category of private foundation should nevertheless continue to be treated as one for five additional years. I suggest that section 507(e)(1) be modified by changing the words "for a continuous period of at least 60 calendar months beginning after December 31, 1969" to read "for such period as the Secretary or his delegate deems appropriate to establish termination of its status as a private foundation."

INFLUENCING LEGISLATION

The provisions regarding the influencing of legislation by private foundations in proposed section 4945(b)(1) and (c) give me grave concern as a private citizen and a lawyer, because I believe that they would violate the constitutional guarantee of free speech. They would cut off, with certain narrow exceptions, any private communication between foundations and legislators "or any other person" (including apparently even private citizens) participating in the formulation of legislation. This, I submit is to preclude foundation managers from exercising the normal rights of citizens in a democracy. I believe that the remedy for improper pressures on the legislative process lies in enforcement and, if necessary, revision, of existing legislation with respect to lobbying.

I hope the Committee will instruct its staff to make a careful study of the constitutional issues involved. However, if these provisions are not to be eliminated, I would like to propose a specific modification to take care of a practical problem that could be faced by organizations such as the Phelps-Stokes Fund which receive grants from governmental agencies that enlist their aid in service to the public. Such grants may require legislative approval in the form of authorization or appropriation. Private communication between the organization which will administer a grant and legislators or officials concerned with the necessary legislative action will often be a normal part of this process, and may even be requested by the legislators or officials involved. I suggest, therefore, that the exceptions contained in the last sentence of proposed section 4945(c) be expanded by inserting a reference to any communication with respect to "a government grant to the private foundation for activities to be conducted in the public interest."

EXPENDITURE RESPONSIBILITY

The most serious effect on the operations of the Phelps-Stokes Fund from treatment as a private foundation would probably arise from the taxable expenditure provisions of proposed section 4945(b)(4) which would preclude any other private foundation from making a grant to the Fund unless the granting foundation exercises "expenditure responsibility". Under proposed section 4945(f) the grantor would apparently have to supervise the Fund's conduct of the program and audit the Fund's books with respect to expenditures under the grant. It is obvious that grantor foundations will find this a burdensome responsibility and will prefer, wherever possible, to make their grants to foundations which are not private fuondations, so that they will not have to undertake this task. Moreover, in the case of organizations like the Phelps-Stokes Fund, which often receive grants from several foundations for a single program, the duplication of expenditure responsibility would be a virtually insuperable obstacle to multiple grants.

I believe that the purpose of the provision for expenditure responsibility could be adequately achieved in a way that would avoid all the duplication of effort involved in having the granting foundation supervise and audit the operations of the receiving foundation. This would be to place the responsibility where it normally rests: in the hands of independent certified public accountants. I suggest that section 4945(f) be revised by changing subparagraphs (1)-(3) to read as follows:

"(1) to see that the books of the grantee are audited by an independent certified public accountant approved by the auditors of the grantor,

"(2) to provide as a condition of the grant that any failure to spend the grant solely for the purpose for which granted must be fully corrected to the satisfaction of the grantor's auditors, and

"(3) to make such reports with respect to the foregoing as the Secretary or his delegate may require."

DEFINITION OF OPERATING FOUNDATION

The amendment which I have suggested regarding expenditure responsibility would remove one of the impediments to the receipt of grants by the Phelps-Stokes Fund from the larger foundations, but it would not remove the other: the fact that grants by the big foundations to the Fund would not be qualifying distributions for purposes of their own compliance with the mandatory distribution requirements of proposed section 4942, because proposed section 4942(g)(1) excludes from the definition of a qualifying distribution a payment to a private foundation which is not an operating foundation. It is therefore important that organizations such as the Phelps-Stokes Fund should, if they are to be treated as private foundations, be included in the category of operating foundations.

I trust that the description which I have furnished of the operations of the Fund indicates that it comes within the class of organizations which the House Committee had in mind when it made the following statement regarding operating foundations:

". . . it has come to the attention of your committee that a number of charitable foundations are regularly used by many private foundations to funnel charitable contributions into certain areas. The operating foundations, in such circumstances, have developed an expertise which permits them to make effective use of the money through grant programs or otherwise." House Report, p. 26.

But the definition of operating foundation in proposed section 4942(j)(3) does not fit organizations such as the Phelps-Stokes Fund. The first requirement of the definition is that substantially all of the income must be "expended directly for the active conduct of the activities constituting the purpose or function for which it is organized and operated". This provision is difficult to understand, since every non-profit organization is required by law to use its income only for its authorized purposes. If "expended directly for the active conduct" excludes grant making organizations, then the Phelps-Stokes Fund would apparently not qualify, because it does make grants to students and to other organizations. A possible interpretation is that "income" in this context means only investment income. If so, the Fund could probably arrange its expenditures so that grants made by the Fund would be made out of grants received, but it is difficult to see what public purpose would be served by this arrangement. I submit to the Committee that the language of proposed section 4942(j)(3)(A) needs substantial clarification or that the entire requirement be eliminated.

To qualify as an operating foundation the Phelps-Stokes Fund would also have to comply with one of the limitations of proposed section 4942(j)(3)(B) with respect to more than half the assets being devoted to its lawful activities and with respect to sources of support. If the former limitation means that half the assets cannot be in the form of investments, which is the apparent intention, then the Fund could not qualify under the first test. As to the second, or support test, the language of the Bill requires that substantially all of the support, excluding investment income, come from five or more unrelated exempt organizations, or from the general public, and that not more than 25% of such support be received from any one such exempt organization. In recent years, the exempt organizations contributing to the Fund have been normally five or more in number, and we hope that this situation will continue. However, it is very likely that in some years more than 25% of such support will come from a single organization. Generally speaking, different organizations support different programs of the Fund, and if one program happens to be much larger than the others, it is quite likely that the support received from the organization sponsoring this program will constitute more than 25% of the Fund's entire support from sources other than investment income.

This 25% limitation must be considered in relation to the expenditure responsibility which is placed by proposed section 4945 on the granting foundation. It may be possible, especially if this responsibility is modified in the manner which I have suggested, to get private foundations to make grants to other private foundations for specific programs. But if a program is to be supported by grants of more than one private foundation, it will obviously be highly impractical to impose expenditure responsibility on each of them. In other words, the expenditure responsibility provisions of section 4945 are designed to limit the financing of a particular program to a single foundation grantor, whereas, the 25% limitation in section 4942(j)(3)(B)(ii) would preclude this in the case where the program in question represents 25% or more of the activities of the recipient organization. I suggest that the 25% limit be increased to 33⅓% or, preferably, that it be made inapplicable to grants which are subject to expenditure responsibility on the part of the grantor.

A third difficulty, as far as the Phelps-Stokes Fund is concerned, with the support test for qualification as an operating foundation is that it eliminates support from governmental agencies unless these are deemed to be included in support "from the general public". There would seem to be no reason why an organization which otherwise qualifies as an operating foundation should lose this status merely because a government agency thinks well enough of it to make a large contribution to its support. I suggest that the definition of operating foundation be amended to include government support as described in the definition of private foundation in section 509(a)(2)(A) with the additional inclusion of payments from foreign governments which I have proposed above for that denfinition.

CONCLUSION

The Phelps-Stokes Fund is an independent foundation engaged primarily in operations which are financed by grants from the United States Government, larger foundations and various other sources. As such, it should not be treated as a private foundation. The Committee is requested to consider the amendments I have proposed, which would exclude foundations of this kind from the definition of private foundation. Private foundations should not continue to be treated as such for five years after their activities cease to come within the statutory definition. The provisions regarding influencing legislation and expenditure responsibility would impose impractical restrictions on grant-receiving foundatons, which would be alleviated by the amendments I have suggested. Finally, the definition of operating foundation should be broadened to include organizations of the type I have described.

Senator BENNETT. The next witness is Mr. William H. Baldwin, president and trustee of the Kresge Foundation.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM H. BALDWIN, PRESIDENT AND TRUSTEE, THE KRESGE FOUNDATION

Mr. BALDWIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My name is William H. Baldwin. I am the president and chief executive officer and a trustee of the Kresge Foundation. I will try not to belabor the obvious.

There are one or two points I think may be mentioned to the committee with respect to this particular foundation.

The Kresge Foundation was established in 1924 by Sebastian Kresge, and he was the sole doner of all the assets of the foundation. The market value of the gifts at the time he made them was approximately $16 million. The present market value is about $410 million.

For the year 1969 approximately $8.3 million had been granted largely on a conditional challenge basis to some 158 grantees out of a total of 514 applicants who made requests. Including the year 1969 to date, The Kresge Foundation has, in the 45 years of its existence, made grants from income totaling approximately $100 million to over 1,800 recipients.

Reports have been published covering each of these years containing complete financial and grant data. The report for 1968, for example, was sent out in about 8,000 copies. The distribution was made, among others, to every member of Congress, to every member of the legislature of the State of Michigan, and to most of the libraries in the United States.

The foundation has been audited by Price Waterhouse since its inception.

In the main, our grants are concerned with construction projects and capital equipment for colleges, universities, hospitals, graduate theological schools and homes for the aged.

In addition, we make grants for the providing of buildings to house projects involving music and the arts, youth development and medical research, and such grants are customarily made on a challenge or conditional basis.

In general, our feeling about the tax reform act, insofar as it applies to foundations is that the longstanding policy of the Congress favoring foundation existence should not be changed by indirection or by first step taxation, which is simply a punitive beginning of the end.

If foundations are taxed out of existence, however slowly, and if private philanthropy founders because of tax policies, it will remain for Government to be the sole source of support for all educational, scientific, and charitable activities, and if there is only one doorbell to ring for funds, then those who prefer not federalism, but variety, flexibility, dispersion of initiative, and competition of ideas will too late realize the stultifying burden of a conformed central control of all such support, and I make that statement regardless of the ability and the dedication of those administering such a centralized source.

Specifically we, as others, oppose the 7½ percent tax. It will be a tax on our grantees, not on ourselves.

You might be interested in knowing if the net investment income tax had been applicable in 1968 it would have meant $544,350 less for us to give away. Such a tax, moreover, conflicts with your congressional policy of 50 years standing and the revenue effect is minimal for the Government but is critical for the persons to whom we might give.

For example, it would not just simply be a loss of the assumed 1968 tax of $544,350 to potential donees. In view of the fact that the foundation makes most of its grants on a challenge basis, it seems likely that the raising of, 20 times that amount might fail by reason of our inability to make the grants.

If we are to have some sort of provision for funds for surveillance, our tepid preference would be for an audit fee of 1 percent.

The required distribution section No. 4942 bothers us, as a matter of fact. That section, as you know, requires us by the end of the year following the close of the accounting period, to distribute or use the larger of our minimum investment return or adjusted net income in qualifying distributions. These must be paid out. Regardless of the fact that we will not be subject to the minimum investment and distribution provision for taxation for years prior to January 1, 1972, since we obviously were in existence before May of this year, this concept presents major investment difficulties to us.

Approximately 75 percent of the Kresge Foundation assets are represented by some 6,057,000 shares of S.S. Kresge Co. common stock. This, I might say parenthetically, represents only 17 percent of the total outstanding issues and, therefore, we do not have an excess of business holdings problem, and it seems likely that the adjusted net income of our foundation will be under 5 percent for the foreseeable future if we retain the Kresge stock.

Assuming, however, we were to decide to further diversify it—at one time we owned 34 percent, some 10 or 8 years ago—assuming we decided to further diversify this investment in an effort to bring up the adjusted net income to equal or exceed the 5 percent figure which would become effective, you see, January 1, 1972, it would require, according to our best present analysis, the sale of about $150 million of such stock and the investment of the proceeds in fixed income proceeds which would yield 7 percent, this would get us pretty close to the 5 percent requirement. But it is literally impossible, gentlemen, to contemplate the disposition of such an amount of stock in 2 years, even assuming that that would be the move, the most desirable investment move, we could take.

There are important and presently unknown market considerations which apply, and in addition it would probably be unwise or unworkable to sell such shares, which we would have to register with the SEC, in one offereing.

The point is that application of the minimum investment return concept as early as 1972 for us might force us into possible premature and unwise investment decisions.

In addition, it seems unlikely to us that the curbing or continuation of present inflationary trends will be sufficiently understood prior to January 1, 1972 so as to permit us to adopt with some degree of sanity the proper investment decisions.

We are suggesting to this committee that the effect of the minimum investment portion of the act be delayed for 5 years to apply on January 1, 1975, rather than 1972. This will give us 5 years then to consider what investment decisions we might make and, of course, this sort of disposition is taken account of in the excess business holdings portion which permits 10 years in the event that you have over 20 percent or control.

We think it would be fair to allow a variant of that particular measure here, which would be longer than 2 years and might be as long as five.

The qualifying distribution concept bothers us. We receive applications, 500 or 600 a year. Most of our grants are on a challenge basis. Folowing investigation we will make the grants for building purposes, and it might go on as long as 3 years.

For example, we just made a grant to Meharry Medical College of a million and a half dollars upon the condition that they will raise the balance of $2 million my January 1 of 1970.

The conditional grants are considered by us as a charge to income at the time of the appropriation. Under the act it seems to us, at least, as far as I can read it correctly, in order to be a qualifying distribution in a given year you have got to pay it out.

Now, gentlemen, as far as we are concerned, when we appropriate it this is a charge to income, and we would like to have that considered as a qualifying distribution because otherwise we are simply going to have to tighten the time within which the conditions will be met. Money-raising is a tough business at best, and there is no sense, in our view, of imposing an additional unwarranted burden on the colleges and universities to whom we make grants.

So we would like to have these challenge grants which we show always as appropriations income to be considered as qualifying distributions under the act.

The taxable expenditures section, 4945, does not bother us in its present form. We have never made any grants, individual grants. We have never contributed to voter registration drives, and have not attempted to influence legislation. I do not suggest that others who have done similar things are on the wrong side of the fence. We just have not done it.

We, therefore, cannot say that the section as presently drafted constitutes a restriction on our present program.

We are very much concerned, however, about the precedent established by the section. The Kresge Foundation is mainly in the business, as I said, for making grants for construction purposes, except for certain program grants in Metropolitan Detroit, and we wonder, for example, will the next step be to require that we may only give to certain types of building projects, and then only if they are built in a particular sort of way.

It seems to us this is an extremely delicate area and should be approached with the greatest caution.

In summary, as far as we are concerned, taxing our income and burdening us in the other respects that I have mentioned in this act—and if I have not mentioned them we have no objection to them—if they are not in my statement—does not assist us in performing our assigned tasks.

Moreover, since many of our challenge grants join Federal challenge grants, about 30 percent of our grants do this—in the same project, it seems a questionable dilution of institutional fundraising to cut our challenge grant by taxing us. It would seem to follow up that if we give less because we have less to give, then someone else will have to give more, your constituents.

This foundation is in its 45th year, and we are glad to share our deeply held belief that we have operated—and I say this with great sincerity—we have operated usefully, honorably, legally, and openly. We have no doubt there are foundation abuses. Regretably, the correction of man's nature has not proceeded as rapidly as one might wish.

In brief response, however, we would say that this foundation has done and can do some things better and quicker than Government, some things very nicely in tandem with Government, and that the derelictions of the very few should not cripple our contributions or stifle our independence.

Thank you.

Senator BENNETT. Thank you.

Senator MILLER. Mr. Chairman—Mr. Baldwin, I have been troubled by the 5 percent payout rule in the bill, too.

Mr. BALDWIN. Yes, sir.

Senator MILLER. And with a view to trying to meet that problem, part of my amendment No. 222 dwells on that point.

Mr. BALDWIN. I see.

Senator MILLER. If you would be good enough to check that amendment and furnish a statement for the record as to whether or not this would meet your problem, I would appreciate it.

Mr. BALDWIN. I will be glad to do that, sir. Does the office here have a copy of it?

Senator MILLER. I am sure they can supply it.

Mr. BALDWIN. Thank you very much.

Senator BENNETT. Thank you, Mr. Baldwin.

(Mr. Baldwin's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF THE KRESGE FOUNDATION, PRESENTED BY WILLIAM H. BALDWIN, PRESIDENT AND TRUSTEE

SUMMARY

1. The Kresge Foundation has net assets with a present market value of approximately $410,000,0000 and has given away about $100,000,000 in grants during the forty-five years of its existence.

2. The proposed 7½% tax on net investment income is discriminatory, reverses long, standing policy and deprives both public and private health, welfare and educational institutions of badly needed support. If the foundations must provide funds for their own supervision, it should be done by an audit or filing fee of 1%.

3. Long term capital gains should not be included in the concept of net investment income.

4. Allowable deductions from gross investment income should include all expenses reasonable and necessary to carry out the exempt purpose which are not excessive. This formula should also be used in calculating adjusted net income in the distributions section of the Act.

5. The application of the minimum investment return concept in connection with required distributions should be delayed until taxable years following January 1, 1975. In addition, the applicable percentage of 5% used to calculate such return is too high and should be reduced to 3½% or 4%.

6. The valuation provisions to be used in calculating minimum investment return should be clarified.

7. Conditional challenge grants which are charged to income at the time of appropriation should be given the status of qualifying distributions.

8. The provisions concerning speculative investments (sec. 4944) should be eliminated or clarified.

9. Restrictions on program, explicit and implicit, in the taxable expenditures section, create a dangerous precedent for future more wide-spread regulation of foundation activities.

STATEMENT

The history and policies of the Kresge Foundation

The Kresge Foundation is a private trustee coporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan. Its purpose is the promotion of the well-being of mankind and its six trustees are authorized to expend the income of the Foundation toward this purpose. The Foundation is not associated or affiliated with any other corporation or organization.

The Foundation was established in 1924 by Sebastian S. Kresge and he was the sole donor of all of the principal assets of the Foundation. The market value of such gifts when made by him was approximately $60 million. The present market value of the net assets of the Foundation is approximately $410 million. For the year 1969, approximately $8.3 million has been granted largely on a conditional challenge basis to some 158 grantees out of the total of 514 applicants who made requests. Including the year 1969 to date, The Kresge Foundation has, in the 45 years of its existence, made grants from income totaling approximately $100 million to over 1800 recipients. Reports have been published covering each of these years containing complete financial and grant data. In the main, Kresge Foundation grants are concerned with construction projects and capital equipment for colleges, universities, hospitals, graduate theological schools and homes for the aged. In addition, the Foundation makes grants for the providing of buildings to house projects involving music and the arts, youth development and medical research. The Foundation ordinarily makes grants on a challenge or conditional basis and its grants are principally extended to non-profit tax exempt well established institutions which combine sound character and stability with progressiveness and purpose. The Foundation generally excludes from consideration all applications for grants for operating budgets, for loans of all types, for debt retirement, for endowment, for church building programs, for educational institutions of less than four-year college and university levels, for scholarships, for research programs and for grants to individuals for any purpose.

Kresge Foundation comment on private foundation portion of Tax Reform Act of 1969 (H.R. 13270)

General:

At the joint request of the Senate Finance Committee and The House Ways and Means Committee the Treasury Department in 1965 reported at length on private foundations and repeated many of their 1965 findings in part 3 of the 1969 Treasury Department Tax Reform Studies and Proposals. In brief, The Treasury Department findings were and are that foundations play a special and vital national role, have the virtues of quickness, flexibility and dedication and that they perform functions not possible for government to fill. In this assessment, we concur. The Report also set out certain specific serious tax abuses of the foundation form. We agree that abuses exist and should be corrected. The Report indicated that such abuses existed among a "minority" of private foundations. We have never seen figures from the Treasury Department or any other source which would demonstrate more precisely the quantative or qualitative extent of such abuses. Using either total number of foundations or total amount of foundation assets as a base, we would guess the percentage of those abuses to be an extraordinarily small "minority." If we are correct in the assumption, and if the Congress is not to repudiate the affirmative statements by the Treasury Department about Foundations, then great care should be taken to be certain that the means of correcting admitted abuse is not horrendously disproportionate to the amount of abuse.

Foundations by and large do their work well. They, quoting from the 1965 Treasury Department Report, "play a special and vital role in our society; government service cannot provide a satisfactory substitute"; they "possess important characteristics which modern government necessarily lacks"; they "have also preserved fluidity and provided impetus for change within the structure of American philanthropy"; and they "evoke great intensity of interest and dedication of energy—these values in themselves, justify the tax exemptions and deductions which the law provides for philanthropic activity." The long standing policy of the Congress favoring their existence should not be changed by indirection or by first-step taxation which is simply a punitive beginning-of-the-end. If foundations are taxed out of existence, however slowly, and if private philanthropy founders because of tax policies, it will remain for government to be the sole source of support for all educational, scientific and charitable activities. And, if there is only one doorbell to ring for funds, then those who prefer federalism, variety, flexibility, dispersion of initiative and competition of ideas will too late realize the stultifying burden of a conformed central control of all such support. This would be true, we feel, regardless of the abilities and dedications of those administering such a centralized source.

Investment income tax (section 506):

The 7½% tax proposed by this section will, in fact, be borne by the organizations who would have received the funds and not by the foundations. In 1968 for example, applying the 7½% tax to Kresge Foundation "net investment income" would have meant $544,350 less for us to give away. The tax is discriminatory in that it applies alike to foundations who have not abused the law and to those who have. And, having taxed foundations, would that precedent be used to permit taxation of pension funds and churches? The proposed tax prevents the foundations who have conformed to the law from giving away as much as they could and, at the same time, is not a sufficiently high tax to end the abuses intended to be corrected. To the extent that the tax is a means of providing resources for the Treasury Department to oversee the activities of foundations, its yield at 7½%—estimated as somewhere in the neighborhood of $50 to $75 million—is far too large for such an office. Moreover if the intent of the tax is to provide such funds for such an office its places foundations in the unique situation as being the only entities who are asked to give up money which would otherwise go to charity to provide for their own supervision. The tax moreover conflicts with fundamental congressional policy of over fifty years standing and the revenue effect is minimal for the government but is critical for the persons to whom The Kresge Foundation might give. For example, it would not simply be just a loss of the assumed 1968 tax of $544,350 to potential donees. In view of the fact that The Kresge Foundation makes most of its grants on a challenge basis it seems likely that the raising of perhaps twenty times that amount might fail by reason of our inability to make the grants.

While we see no justification for any tax on foundation net investment income, if it seems necessary to have the foundations provide funds for foundation surveillance, then our tepid preference would be for an "audit" fee (not a "tax") which would be at the rate of 1%. Certainly such a fee would provide ample means for the establishment of a capably staffed office within the Treasury Department which could provide any supervision which Congress may think is required.

In further criticism of Section 506, there is no justification, in our view, for the inclusion of net long term capital gain within the concept of net investment income. We would have no objection to the inclusion of short term capital gains but the inclusion of long term capital gains, even using a stepped-up basis of stock, would violate equity and could well occasion the making of investment decisions on an unwise basis.

In addition, the deductions allowable from gross investment income seem extraordinarily restricted. We know of no reason why ordinary and necessary expenses should be limited to those of investment advice or property management only. We see no reason why all expenses of the foundation should not be allowed assuming that such expenses are reasonable and necessary to carrying out the exempt purpose of the private foundation and if such expenses are not excessive. This is precisely the formula allowed in the computation of compensation paid to disqualified persons and it should be used to define allowable deductions in arriving at net investment income.

Required distribution (section 4942):

This section requires us, by the end of the year following the close of our accounting period, to distribute or use te larger of our "minimum investment return" or "adjusted net income" in "qualifying distributions." Regardless of the fact that The Kresge Foundation will not be subject to the "minimum investment return" distribution provision for taxable years prior to January 1, 1972, this concept presents major investment difficulties to us. Approximately 75% of The Kresge Foundation assets are represented by some 6,057,000 shares of S. S. Kresge Company common stock (approximately 17½% of all outstanding shares), and, it seems likely that the "adjusted net income" of our Foundation will be under 5% for the foreseeable future if we retain the Kresge stock. Assuming the trustees were to decide to further diversify this investment in an effort to bring up the adjusted net income to equal or exceed the 5% figure it would, according to our best present analysis, require the sale of approximately $150 million of such S. S. Kresge Company common stock and the investment of the proceeds thereof in corporate bonds or stocks yielding at least 7%. It is literally impossible to contemplate the disposition of such an amount of stock over a two-year period of time—even assuming that such a move is the most desirable investment direction we could take. There are important and presently unknown market considerations which apply and in addition it would probably be unwise or unworkable to sell such shares (which would have to be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission in every instance) in one offering. The point is that application of the "minimum investment return" concept as early as 1972 places an unduly heavy burden on this foundation and might force us into possible premature and unwise investment decisions. In addition, it seems unlikely to us that the curbing or continuation of present inflationary trends will be sufficiently understood prior to January 1, 1972 so as to permit us to adopt, with some degree of sanity, the proper investment decisions.

The portion of the Act having to do with excess business holdings indicates its awareness of the difficulty of disposing of large blocks of stock except over an extended period of time and it seems to us that the "minimum investment return" portion of the Act should likewise show this recognition. In our view, in the case of organizations organized before May 27, 1969, section 4942 should, for taxable years beginning before January 1, 1975, (instead of January 1, 1972, as presently proposed) apply without regard to the "minimum investment return" provision. In addition, it is our opinion that the applicable base point percentage of a 5% return is unreal. It would seem to us that a more proper point of beginning might well be 4% or less. All fair applicable market indicators known to us and the yields of other well managed funds, would seem to make the 5% figure too high—especially in the light of present market instability.

In Section 4942 as well as in the investment income tax section, we see no reason why deductions should be limited to simply the ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred for the production or collection of gross income or for the management or maintenance of property. Once again we would suggest that the more proper and fair definition of deduction should be one which allows expenses which are reasonable and necessary to carrying out the exempt purpose of the private foundation and which are not excessive.

The valuation portion of section 4942 indicates that the fair market value of securities for which market quotations are readily available shall be determined "on a monthly basis." This definition surely needs more precision. The method of determining value on a monthly basis is not spelled out and should be made clear by statute and not by regulation. Shares of S. S. Kresge Company stock owned by The Kresge Foundation are traded on the New York Stock Exchange but, in view of the large number of shares held by the Foundation, would, for example, the concept of "blockage" apply to any such monthly valuation?

The concept of "set-asides" creates some problems for The Kresge Foundation. The Foundation accepts applications during the first two months of a given year. During this period of time we will receive, on an average, approximately 500–600 applications. Based on prior experience, the total aggregate amount requested in such applications will exceed $100 million. Approximately 95% of our grants are made on a conditional or challenge basis—this is, the successful applicant is told that we will give him so much money if he is able to raise the balance required for the project involved. Following consultation, a time is set by which he must raise such balance of funds. Upon his certification to us that such balance of funds have been raised—our money is paid over. In many cases—especially where the balances required to be raised are large—up to three years may be given to meet the conditions of our grant. All such conditional grants made by us are considered as a charge to income at the time of appropriation. As far as we are concerned the definition of qualifying distribution should be expanded to cover any contribution which we make on a conditional basis which is listed as a charge to income at the time of appropriation. It is impossible for us to tell, under the present wording, whether the so called "set-aside" provisions mean to apply to such conditional grants.

If our present practice of making contributions charged to income at the time of appropriation is disallowed as a "qualifying distribution" and is not considered as "paid", it will probably mean that our challenge grants can be no longer than one year in duration—so as to assure their pay out prior to the end of the year following the year in which the income was earned—and it will mean a general tightening of the time within which conditions must be met. Money raising is a tough business at best and there is no sense in imposing additional unwarranted burdens on the colleges, universities, hospitals, etc. to whom we make grants. Since we make grants largely for construction purposes the amounts to be raised are often considerable and it takes time to raise such funds. In addition, more often than not government funds are involved and, regrettably, the length of time required to process a government grant is great. And, if our challenge grants are not allowable as qualifying distributions we are certain that it would unduly and unnecessarily hamper our grant system if it was necessary to establish to the satisfaction of the secretary or his delegate that the amount to be paid out will be paid out within five years and, in addition, that the project is one which can be better accomplished by such set-aside and by the immediate paying out of funds. The imposition of such a bureaucratic clearance would surely cause us to seriously consider discontinuance of our present carefully considered and liberal challenge conditions.

Apparently the act proposes that, where the distributions during the preceding five year period have exceeded income, the distributable amount for the taxable year should be reduced by an amount equal to such excess. In the wording of the section, however, the five-year prior period is referred to as "the five taxable yeaı immediately preceding the taxable year." This raises the question of whether or not the five years preceding the effective date of such an act is involved or whether we will have to go five "taxable years" before any excess can be used against distributable amounts. It appears to us that any "excess" availabl at the time of effect of the Act should be available for use.

Speculative investments (section 4944)

Under this section foundations may not invest funds so as to "jeopardize" exempt purposes. It seems to us that this provision is not only vague but impossible to understand. Regulations and court cases defining it would take years. In the interim the private foundation would find itself in an almost impossible condition with respect to investments. Obviously there are some extreme situations which would clearly fall under the concept of the section but there is a very large grey area in which greater definition is absolutely required. Or, in the more desirable alternative, the provision should be dropped completely. In its present form, its meaning is not only unclear and its purpose cloudy, but it lends itself to almost endless interpretations.

Taxable expenditures (section 4945)

None of the activities restricted by this section have ever been engaged in by The Kresge Foundation to our knowledge. We have never made individual grants, have never contributed to voter registration drives and have never attempted to influence legislation. We, therefore, cannot say that the section as presently drafted constitutes a restriction on our present program. We are very much concerned, however, about the precedent established by this section. The Kresge Foundation is mainly in the business of making grants for construction purposes, excepting for certain program grants in the Metropolitan Detroit area.

Will the next step be to require that we may only give to certain types of building projects, for example? And then only if they are built in a particular sort of way? It seems to us that this is an extremely delicate area and should be approached with the greatest caution.

Summary

As far as we are concerned, taxing our income in the time of vastly increasing social and financial complexity would hardly make it easier to perform our assigned task of promoting the well-being of mankind. Lack of funds causes us to decline many meritorious applications as it is. Moreover since many of our challenge grants join federal challenge grants in the same project, it seems a questionable dilution of institutional fund raising to cut our challenge grant by taxing us. It would seem to follow that if we give less because we have less to give, then someone else will have to give more.

This Foundation is in its forty-fifth year and we are glad to share our deeply held belief that we have operated usefully, honorably, legally and openly. Nonetheless, we have no doubt that there are foundation abuses. Regretably, the correction of man's nature has not proceeded as rapidly as one might wish. In brief response, however, we would say that this foundation has done and can do some things better and quicker than government, some things very nicely in tandem with government and that the derelictions of the very few should not cripple our contributions or stifle our independence.

Senator BENNETT. The next witness is Sydney Howe, president of The Conservation Foundation.

STATEMENT OF SYDNEY HOWE, PRESIDENT, THE CONSERVATION FOUNDATION

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Chairman, I am Sydney Howe, president of the Conservation Foundation of Washington, D.C.

We appreciate this opportunity to testify on H.R. 13270 with particular reference to title I.

The Conservation Foundation conducts programs of research, education and training in the field concerned with the conservation of air, water, and land.

In general, our efforts are designed to advance the conservation and wise use of the physical environment.

We are financed by grants from endowed foundations, from the Federal Government, from other organizations and individuals. We are not an endowed foundation in the normal sense. We do not have an endowment. We are not a membership organization.

We are, and we have been declared tax exempt under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code, and we have been declared a publicly-supported corporation under section 170(b)(1)(A) of the code. We doubt that our own tax status is directly affected by this legislation.

Our status, in other terms, however, might be profoundly affected. We are deeply concerned. Specifically we oppose the 7½ percent tax that might be inflicted upon the net investment income of private foundations simply because of the corresponding cut in funds available to organizations like our own.

We suggest a registration fee upon endowed foundations in lieu of such a tax, set at a level designed to fund full enforcement of whatever law may be pertinent to the operation of endowed foundations.

We oppose the provision that private foundations must distribute all net income currently and distribute it to entities other than private foundations or pay a tax. There are a number of concerns about this provision, but we would emphasize that some very good organizations that would be described as private foundations would lose their funding.

We oppose the complex accounting and legal procedures as they would affect the very small private foundations under this legislation. Perhaps the large ones, by substantial effort and expense, could handle it, but we fear that the small operations might be so overburdened with attorneys' fees and tax documentations that it would be a real hindrance and, perhaps, put them out of business.

We oppose section 4945 in its levying of a hundred percent tax penalty upon, and I quote, the funding of "any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof," and I am still quoting, "any attempt to influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, or with any other person who may participate in the formulation of the legislation, other than through making available the results of nonpartisan analysis or research."

We consider this the most dangerous portion of this bill. We believe that tax counsel to endowed private foundations would advise support of only the safest theoretical and technical work of 501(c)(3) organizations.

We are already advised by private foundation officers whose organizations support ours that they will be reluctant to support some of the kinds of public affairs analysis that would be conducted in the environmental field unless there is careful clarification of these provisions I have just read.

A specific kind of clarification that is needed is as follows:

Section 501(c)(3) of the code now says that an organization qualified thereunder may devote no substantial portion of its activity to influencing legislation. This already puts us in a kind of limbo because the definition of "no substantial portion" is very awkward. The proposed legislation would allow an endowed foundation to fund the purposes of 501(c)(3) organizations. Our question is would no substantial influencing of legislation be defined as a purpose. This is not clear in the bill as now written, and would be very troublesome.

We are deeply concerned also about what we foresee as an inevitable delay in IRS implementation of regulations to carry out such legislation as this. There might well be a period of years, and there has been in the past on IRS implementation in this kind of legislation, a period of years in which our donors and our organization would be in limbo. We would be without funds because donors were waiting to see what the actual impact upon them of support of our organization might be.

We would like to endorse heartily Mrs. Benson of the League of Women Voters' suggestion that the effect of this legislation take place only sometime after the completion of IRS regulations implementing it.

In general, from the conservation point of view, we would like to note that there are many organizations throughout the country whose staff work is funded by the gifts of endowed foundations. Many of these staff activities are helping citizens who in increasing numbers care about what is happening to their environment, helping them to understand what is going on and how they can play an effective role in conserving their environment.

These staff services would be crippled as they are funded by private foundations, because you cannot do this work without dealing with public policy that might well lead to legislation, whether you take it up with that in mind or not.

Obviously, legislation is one major kind of solution to environmental problems. The Congress now provides tax benefits that encourage business expenditures for public information programs dealing with legislation. At the same time section 501(c)(3), as now written, discourages information programs concerned with legislation affecting the broad public interest in our field and many others.

We believe that 501(c)(3) organizations should be permitted to conduct the same kind of information programs that private businesses carry out as normal, tax-deductible activities.

In lieu of the approach taken by H.R. 13270, we believe Congress should hold hearings to explore thoroughly the accuracy of existing legislation on lobbying—in a positive instead of a punitive framework, and with full consideration of the impact of any new legislation upon all institutions in our society.

We strongly recommend that if this legislation is acted upon, at the very least section 4945 be revised by (1) deleting the words "or otherwise attempt" in subparagraph (b)(1); (2) deleting in its entirety subparagraph (c) which I read a moment ago; and (3) revising subparagraph (f) to require a simple reporting function from the donee to the donor foundation. With reference to title II of the act, we urge that the committee reconsider provisions reducing tax incentives for gifts of appreciated property. We do appreciate that some abuses of foundation privileges have caused legitimate concern in the Congress and among the public. But if this bill becomes law, as it is now written, many conservation organizations could not continue to serve the public usefully.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN (presiding). Thank you very much, sir.

(Mr. Howe's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF SYDNEY HOWE, PRESIDENT, THE CONSERVATION FOUNDATION

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, The Conservation Foundation appreciates this opportunity to appear before you to present our views on H.R. 13270, specifically on certain provisions of Title I, Subtitle A, dealing with a newly-proposed category of organizations called "private foundations."

The Conservation Foundation conducts research, education, and training programs designed to expand and apply knowledge regarding the earth's resources—its water, soils, minerals, air, plant and animal life—and the interrelationships among them. We believe that pollution, blighted surroundings, inadequate open space, and development which degrades landscapes and natural systems—all intensified by growing population and advancing technology—represent high priorities for positive conservation programs.

Our activities include environmental studies and surveys, demonstration planning projects to minimize conflict between preservation and development, information services, consulting services to civic groups and educational institutions, and, to a lesser extent, comparable international programs. Our work is financed by grants and gifts from endowed foundations, the Federal government, and other organizations and individuals. The Conservation Foundation does not have an endowment and is not a membership organization within the usual meaning of that term.

The Conservation Foundation is a nonprofit corporation established in 1948 and certified as tax-exempt under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. By a ruling of the Internal Revenue Service we are a "publicly supported" organization within the meaning of Section 170(b)(1)(A) of the Code, and therefore our donors can qualify for the additional 10% deduction allowed by that section.

As a so-called "30%" organization we doubt that our own tax status would be altered by H.R. 13270. However, the bill as now written will seriously impair our ability to carry out our tax-exempt purposes. Equally important to us is the probability that several of the provisions of Title I will inhibit or cripple the work of a large number of other conservation groups throughout the country. Our concern about the proposed legislation centers in three areas.

First, Section 506 of Title I of the bill imposing a 7½% tax on the net investment income of every so-called "private foundation" will harm this Foundation and other conservation organizations by reducing the amount of funds available for grants to us and to them from private foundations. We believe that the resulting limitations upon our activities and those of other conservation organizations are not in the public interest. We suggest, in lieu of a tax upon the investment income of private foundations, that a foundation registration fee be imposed. Such fee should be set at a level necessary to finance full enforcement of existing law and any new legislation needed to correct existing abuses, and no higher.

Second, under Section 4942 private foundations, as defined in Section 509, must distribute all income currently to avoid graduated tax sanctions. For the purpose of this mandatory payout requirement, qualifying distributions include distributions to public charities and direct expenditures for charitable purposes, but not distributions to private foundations—unless the recipients can meet the complicated test specified in Section 4942(j) for an "operating foundation."

We fear that a host of educational, research and civic organizations, large and small, which constitute a major constructive element of our public life, could not qualify as private operating foundations under the present definition. Thus they would cut be down by the inability of their major contributors, which are frequently endowed private foundations, to finance their work. We doubt that any endowed private foundation would continue to make grants to another private foundation if this would subject the donor to tax.

One limited alternative, of course, is simply to amend Section 4295 by broadening the definition of "operating foundations." Such revision, however, would not affect the overwhelmingly complex accounting and legal procedures required throughout the bill for the small private foundations whose value we have noted. Ambiguous provisions on "disqualified" persons (Section 4946) and "termination of private foundation status" (Section 507) are only a few examples of legal intricacies that may eventually cripple small 501(c)(3) organizations—a result stemming both from restrictions on the organizations themselves and on the new rules for donors. It may well be that if the bill passes, as written, only the large "private foundations" will be able to survive.

Our third area of concern, and perhaps the one that troubles us most, is Section 4945. This section imposes a 100% tax penalty on each "taxable expenditure" by a private foundation. Under subparagraph (c), the term "taxable expenditures" includes but is not limited to:

> "(1) any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof, and
> "(2) any attempt to influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, or with any other person who may participate in the formulation of the legislation, other than through making available the results of nonpartisan analysis or research . . ."

We believe that subparagraph (1) quoted above is perhaps the most dangerous provision in the bill. It is so broad and general that it places under a cloud all but the most theoretical or scientific and technical work of many 501(c)(3) organizations.

The most fanciful semantic exercise could never clearly define what is and what is not an "attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof" for the purpose of influencing legislation. Furthermore, the difficulties of defining what is or is not "nonpartisan analysis or research" are even more serious. For, in one sense, every charitable organization is and should be "partisan" in the performance of the charitable duties and objectives for which it was established.

Let us assume for a moment that one private foundation makes a grant to a second private foundation organized by concerned citizens to enable them to study the causes of environmental pollution in their community or state, or to analyze existing attempts to protect the environment from further degradation. Assume that the results of such study are made public—as one would certainly hope—and that the findings then become part of the justification for a variety of remedial actions, including new local, state or federal legislation to deal with environmental pollution. Would the Internal Revenue Service, under the provisions of Section 4945(c) quoted above, then be in a position to impose a 100% tax on the expenditures made by receipient foundation for the study, on the grounds that such study was an illegal attempt to affect public opinion and influence legislation?

This is an incredible spectre, but apparently one we must take your time to contest.

There is another aspect of this matter which causes us real concern. Under another provision of Section 4945, any grant by one private foundation to another is subject to a 100% tax, unless the grantor polices the grant and verifies that it is spent for a proper purpose. In the hypothetical situation outlined above, might not the Internal Revenue Service also seek to assess a 100% tax on the grant made by the donor foundation, on the basis that the donor had failed to properly police the grant and verify that it was spent for a proper purpose?

In light of this policing requirement, we fear that tax counsel to endowed private foundations might simply conclude that for several reasons it would be wise to support only 100% "safe" projects. First, there are obvious practical difficulties in supervising grants made to other 501(c)(3) organizations. Second, under Section 4945(b)(5), questions will arise regarding 501(c)(3) "purposes." For example, could some small portion of a private foundation grant support an insubstantial attempt by a publicly-supported organization to influence legislation? Finally, and most conclusively, the cost to private foundations, should they violate these provisions, would be excessive. If private foundations are to be guarantors of the activities of their grantees, tax counsel may be expected to be conservative. Already, we have indications that endowed private foundations may withhold support from publicly-supported organizations if the grant could by any stretch of the imagination be considered an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public.

The practical effect of Section 4945 would be to stifle innovation. Exploration of many public problems would be seriously curtailed. The new and the experimental would be shunned. The role that endowed foundations would play in stimulating public programs would be vastly diminished. Even if IRS regulations eventually seek to alleviate some of these effects, the inevitable IRS delay may nevertheless cause irreparable damage to 501(c)(3) organizations as they and their donors wrestle with the ambiguities and risks of the bill. The absence of funds during such a period of delay might well force some organizations out of business.

If this spectre should be realized, it would be a tragedy of immense proportions for our nation. Open inquiry and discussion of public issues are central to our way of life. Foundations have financed independent studies which have led to innovations and improvements of benefit to the people of the United States and of the world. They are often the only source of funds for such studies. It is simply beyond comprehension that Congress would now seek to impose prohibitive tax penalties upon this major source of free and open inquiry and discussion.

We are also troubled by the provisions of the second subparagraph quoted above which defines as a taxable expenditure "any attempt to influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body or with any other person who may participate in the formulation of the legislation."

Many conservation organizations are from time to time asked by members of Congress, as well as by state and local legislative bodies, to comment—formally or informally—upon contemplated or pending legislation. For example, our Foundation has, on request, provided information in recent months to members of Congress, state legislatures and administrative agencies on offshore oil exploration, pesticides, highway route selection, mineral leasing, water pollution control, and other environmental subjects. In fact, our present resources permit us to supply only a small portion of the assistance sought on such subjects.

Does Congress intend that private foundations shall no longer finance basic information services for the public? If part of an organization's operating funds is received from private foundations, should the organization refuse to submit a statement to a legislative body, to return a congressional telephone call, to reply to a letter, or to meet personally with "any member or employee of a legislative body," lest the result be prohibitive tax penalties against the organization and/or the foundation?

Throughout the country, many local, state and national organizations are working to conserve the American environment. The more substantial among these are 501(c)(3) organizations whose trained staffs serve educational or scientific needs of literally thousands of unstaffed citizen conservation groups. Much of the support of these staffed organizations is received from endowed foundations, with a large number of small donations coming from the general public. If these organizations are found to be private foundations under Section 509, which seems possible, many of them could not function. At best, their limited resources would be sapped by tax attorney bills and by a morass of clerical work and reporting requirements.

We urge the Committee to consider the problems of handling public information directed toward the solution of environmental problems. In the environmental field, virtually all issues require decisions based on social, economic, scientific and political considerations. The resolution of environmental consrevation problems may—and most often does—encompass "legislation." We suspect that legislators and their staffs would welcome more information on legislative solutions, because their constituents are demanding better environmental management. Informed natural resource and environmental specialists employed by 501(c)(3) organizations are often a legislator's only non-governmental source of such information, aside from the delegations of commerce and industry.

Private businesses, of course, may take tax deductions for expenses incurred in connection with legislation directly related to their interests. Congress thus provides tax benefits that encourage business expenditures for public information programs dealing with legislation. At the same time, Section 501(c)(3), as now written, discourages information programs concerned with legislation affecting the broad public interest.

We believe that 501(c)(3) organizations should be permitted to conduct the same kind of information programs that private businesses carry out as normal tax-deductible activities. While private businesses and their associations could continue to lobby, H.R. 13270 would make private foundations pay a 100% penalty for funding activities which are somehow determined to be attempts to influence public opinion and legislation.

Existing law already prohibits foundations from carrying on or financing propaganda or other efforts to influence legislation if such activities are "substantial" in relation to other activities of the organization. Existing law also prohibits 501(c)(3) organizations from engaging in any activity on behalf of a candidate for public office.

In lieu of the approach taken by H.R. 13270, we believe Congress should hold hearings to explore thoroughly the adequacy of existing legislation on lobbying—in a positive instead of a punitive framework, and with full consideration of the impact of any new legislation upon all institutions in our society.

We strongly recommend that, at the very least, Section 4945 be revised by (1) deleting the words "or otherwise attempt" in subparagraph (b)(1), in order to limit the scope of this restriction to the carrying out of "propaganda to influence legislation"; (2) deleting in its entirety subparagraph (c), which was quoted in part above and which drastically expands the restrictions of subparagraph (b)(1); and (3) revising subparagraph (f), so that the "expenditure responsibility" imposed upon a donor private foundation making a grant to another foundation would be satisfied by the donee executing and sending to the donor a certificate setting forth the manner in which the grant was spent.

We have touched only a few of the disturbing elements of the bill, but there are many others, such as the new complications and restrictions affecting charitable contributions in Title II. We urge that the Committee re-examine provisions concerning gifts of appreciated property and less than fee interests in real property, in the light of their potential damage to many organizations.

The Conservation Foundation shares the concern of Congress and the public for the need to correct abuses which have been disclosed in the foundation world. We endorse reform which will prevent the misuse of foundations as tax havens and which will prevent manipulation of foundation funds for the personal benefit of donors. The provisions of Title I, Subtitle A, of H.R. 13270 would, however, constitute a radical departure from a public policy which has encouraged private scientific, educational and research efforts in support of public objectives. We feel that many conservation organizations could not continue to serve the public usefully if this bill becomes law as written.

To conclude, we would like to reiterate the recent words of John W. Gardner, former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and former president of the Carnegie Corporation. Mr. Gardner wrote in an article in the June 8, 1969, Washington Post:

"* * * tax exemption is a means of preserving the strength of the private sector and insuring that our cultural and educational life is not wholly subject to the monolithic dictates of government. It would be quite possible for a nation to insist that government be the sole source of support for all educational, scientific, charitable and perhaps even religious activities—and in some nations, the government is precisely that. But our policy of tax exemption asserts that it is in the public interest for many varied groups outside of government to be engaged in charitable, religious and educational activities.

"The policy is based on the wise conviction that we will be better off if these activities so crucial to the core of our national life are participated in by individuals and groups with a wide range of points of view. We don't believe that Big Government has all the answers; we want a lot of people in the act."

We share Mr. Gardner's views, and we urge Congress not to restrict the pioneering role which foundations play in our society.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the indulgence of the committee because I will have to leave on an airplane shortly, and I would like to call out of order for just a few minutes Dr. Albert W. Dent, president of Dillard University in New Orleans. Is Dr. Dent here?

We are pleased to have you, Dr. Dent. Could you summarize your statement briefly.

I will be glad to put your entire statement in the record.

STATEMENT OF ALBERT W. DENT, PRESIDENT, DILLARD UNIVERSITY, NEW ORLEANS

Dr. DENT. Thank you very much, Senator.

I would like to have Dr. Henderson join me and Dr. Patterson.

I am Albert W. Dent. Until August 31 of this year, I had been for 28 years president of Dillard University in New Orleans, but today I am here representing the United Negro College Fund, an organization of 36 private colleges all located in the South except one.

The primary purpose of the United Negro College Fund is to raise funds for the support of these institutions.

Most of the funds which the United Negro College Fund raises for distribution to its member colleges for current operating expenses come from the foundations of the country. Now, this group of colleges has a peculiar history. Most of them are approximately 100 years old. For many years they received quite inadequate support and, as of today, these colleges are receiving quite inadequate support as compared with the other colleges of the country.

One of the reasons for this is that for reasons well known to all of you on the committee and to the American public generally, we have not been able to develop a wealthy group of alumni who can make contributions to their colleges, as is true with other colleges. So that we have had to seek contributions from people who were in position to make the contributions.

Now, we think that our problems with regard to the proposed tax reform——

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you, has the Rosenwald Foundation been helpful to Dillard?

Dr. DENT. It was very helpful to us, and the successor foundation, which you know, Mr. Chairman, the Stern Family Fund.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Edgar Stern, senior and junior, I think, have both been helpful to you, and also Mrs. Edgar Stern.

Dr. DENT. They have been on the board of trustees for 30 years, and that entire family has been very helpful through that private foundation to support the work of the institution.

The CHAIRMAN. We are very proud of the fine work they are doing, you might say.

Dr. DENT. Thank you very much.

Our position here, representing all of these colleges, is that these private foundations are one of our primary sources of support, and we will need to continue to rely on that support for some time, and anything which is done through the amendments to the tax structure which will cut down the amount of money which these foundations have for grant purposes will very directly affect us.

We do not have, as the other colleges of the country have, wealthy alumni and other sources to which we can go for substantial support.

So I will file a written statement with some documentation for the record. But I simply wanted to make this very special case for a group of colleges in the country which would be very seriously affected if the amount of money which foundations have to give is seriously curtailed through the tax which is being proposed.

Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Dent, you and others have made such a fine case for the universities with regard to this foundation area that I would be tempted to vote to say that anything we raised over and above the cost of a reporting fee for foundations ought to be distributed to the colleges and universities so that they would have the benefit of it.

Dr. DENT. One of your constituents would strongly support that position.

The CHAIRMAN. I am certainly happy you came up here.

Dr. DENT. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness will be Mr. Herman W. Liebert, curator and librarian, Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library, Yale University.

STATEMENT OF HERMAN W. LIEBERT, LIBRARIAN, BEINECKE RARE BOOK AND MANUSCRIPT LIBRARY, YALE UNIVERSITY, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Mr. LIEBERT. My statement is addressed only to that aspect of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 (H.R. 13270) on which I can claim competence: the provisions concerning gifts to public and institutional libraries and museums, treated at title II, subtitle A, section 83, certain gifts to charity treated as sales of property, which appears at page 125, line 9 and following of the printed act.

This provides that the taxpayer who elects to treat the fair market value of property as the amount of the contribution shall regard this contribution as a sale and shall be liable for the tax on the gain.

Because our library receives many grants from foundations and gifts of securities from individuals, I have a natural interest in the tax provisions with respect to these. So does our whole university and the whole national structure of charitable and educational institutions. But I believe that gifts in kind (books, manuscripts, pictures) present a more complicated and less well-understood problem, and I will limit myself to this area, feeling confident that the foundations and potential donors or recipients of securities have already been fully heard, but that donors or recipients of gifts in kind have not.

There has certainly been abuse of the existing credits which taxpayers are allowed for gifts to libraries and museums. Reforms are desirable, and the new statute should be drawn to bar abuse by greedy persons masquerading as patrons.

But such persons are a very small minority among donors to libraries and museums, the overwhelming majority of whom are, according to my experience, genuinely motivated by a wish to contribute to the preservation in America of man's cultural heritage. And the ability of our libraries and museums to continue increasing their resources for the use of all students and scholars and for the educational enjoyment of the public is far too important to be endangered by a few persons who use the role of donor for selfiish profit. The law must not destroy great benefit in pursuit of lesser evil. The bathwater yes, but not the baby.

No staff members of any legitimate libraries or museums oppose legislation to prevent the abuse of gift benefits; indeed, such a reform would provide welcome relief from the constant vigilance they now exercise to avoid involvement with donors of questionable motive. But it is not necessary, it is not tolerable to endanger the whole structure of benefits for legitimate gifts which has made possible the unique growth in America of resources, both in quantity and in quality, for education, research, and public edification.

I have spoken in generalities, with which Senators must already be surfeited, and surfeited sufficiently to know that there are generalities of two kinds: those designed to sweep inconvenient facts under the rug, and those which extract for consideration the essence of a mass of disparate data. Let me for a moment present some facts.

The first fact is that, under the present regulations, however abused, the collections of American libraries and museums have in recent years grown at such a rate as is not equaled, except by conquest or theft, in the whole history of the world. Let me speak of what I know best. The Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library at Yale, since it opened in 1963, has acquired material for special research, through contributions in funds or in kind, equal in importance to similar material acquired during the entire 260 years since the founding of Yale. I do not say this boastfully, for it is not of my doing. It is the concrete result of (among other factors such as loyalty to the institution) the tax benefits presently allowed.

Disbelief will quickly be dissipated by looking abroad. There are no similar provisions in the tax laws of foreign countries. And, as a result, libraries and museums there are starving. One of the world's greatest libraries, the Bodleian Library at Oxford University, depends on major help from American friends who believe in the growth of libraries everywhere. The flow of books, manuscripts, and pictures to this country results from private purchase or from institutional purchase made possible by gifts. It would slow to a trickle if foreign owners of books, manuscripts, and pictures were not driven to sell by the absence of tax benefits in their own countries.

Such limitation of tax benefits for legiitmate gifts as are proposed will produce the same result here. Not only will American acquisitions of culturally important material decline, but the tide will also reverse. It will become more attractive for American owners of private collections to dispose of them by sale abroad, where prices are higher, and the yields from such sales may not be repatriated. But much more important than any financial consideration is the dissipation of cultural resources already in America or accumulated in the future. Those who have the instinct of the collector will, in any country and under any statutes, bring together material which is much more meaningful for world scholarship when it is together than when it is scattered. Gifts to institutions of such whole collections, often the result of a lifetime of effort, preserve for future scholars all these related materials in one place where they can be consulted not only together but also in association with the whole array of reference works.

Among many across our country, let me adduce three examples in this city: the National Gallery of Art, the Smithsonian Institution, and your own distinguished Library of Congress. All of these are places of recourse for scholars from all over the world. None of them would be as great as it is without the encouragement of gifts by existing tax benefits, or would grow at the same rate as it has in the past, if tax benefits for gifts are restricted in the manner proposed in H.R. 13270.

I do not know whether the heads of these great national collections have testified before this committee. I do not know whether gifts to them will be excepted from the provisions of the 1969 act. But I am sure that if gifts to these three national collections are to be subject to the act, the heads of these three institutions will agree with me that gifts to them will be seriously curtailed, and the national cultural heritage will be the poorer.

The second fact, which I am sure this distinguished committee understands is that rare books, manuscripts, pictures, are not rich men's playthings. Such visual, literary, and historical materials, for whatever motive they may have been collected, are the necessary ingredients, the very stuff (through use and exhibition) of education, research, and public improvement.

The fact that rare books and manuscripts are used I can confirm from my own experience. At the Beinecke Library we have over 10,000 registered readers; we supply for readers' use between 65,000 and 70,000 books and manuscripts in an average year; and about 90,000 visitors come to see our exhibitions. Other rare-book libraries will exhibit similar statistics, and of course attendance figures at the major art museums of the country are very much larger. And the great majority of the books, manuscripts, and pictures that these visitors come to use or to see have been given to the institutions through the encouragement of the existing tax benefits.

Let me, for the next fact, take my own circumstance as an example. For 40 years, on a modest income, I have collected books and manuscripts relating to the English author Samuel Johnson. I have used this collection for my own research; it has been used by the editors of the various volumes of the Yale edition of Samuel Johnson; it is available to all other scholars in the field; and I have always intended to give it to Yale. Indeed, it has been formed in concert with Yale, and I have purchased books for my own collection that are not at Yale with the understanding that they will be given to the library.

I estimate that the present fair market value of the collection is about 10 times my cost. If my gift of this collection to Yale is to be treated as a sale by which I become liable to tax on the gain (as the act proposes) I will not be able to afford the gift, the collection will be sold at auction abroad, and the aim of a lifetime of collecting for the benefit of my alma mater will be vain.

Tax reform that is truly responsible must distinguish between the speculator who purchases for the sole purposes of establishing a future tax benefit by a gift that has appreciated in value, or the artist, writer, or public figure who seeks an inflated valuation of the gift of self-created materials, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the financially disinterested collector who assembles pictures, books, manuscripts for his own purposes, holds them for his own use and that of other scholars, and then wishes to benefit future scholarship by the gift of his collection to an institution.

It is a matter of great difficulty to determine the criterion for tax liability on account of gifts. I suggest that the fairest criterion might be the motive for which property is acquired. If property is a grandfather's dairy, of no monetary value when it was created, preserved by family piety, later proved to be of both historical and financial value, or if the property has been collected by purchase for scholarly purposes and has incidentally increased in value, then it would be possible to find a form of words for a test which would preserve the scholarly value permanently by gift to an institution without incurring a tax liability.

I do not pretend to be a legislative draftsman. I would not presume to tell this committee how the just distinction I perceive between the profit motive and the true collecting motive should be translated into statute. But I know that, if the distinction is not made, every library and museum in this country will suffer bitterly by a decline in gifts, and that later generations of scholars will wonder at the legislation by which in 1969 gifts to libraries and museums were suddenly dried up. The tax structure may in future years be amended so as at one time to favor and at one time to impede gifts to libraries and museums, but the gifts themselves, the books, the manuscripts, the pictures, that will be lost to institutions by the act of 1969 will then be gone beyond recovery. They will not be lost just to our library, or just to our university; they will be lost to the whole American people. The responsibility for the preservation of our cultural heritage which rests on you gentlemen who will frame this year's statute is both heavy and haunting.

The public good is served if cultural materials privately assembled are given to places of public use, and it is the business of the law to encourage such gifts within legitimate limitations. A law that will prevent such gifts, and encourage the dispersal of collections by public sale instead of their gift to institutions where they will be available to all comers, is contrary to the public interest. I cannot believe that this committee in its wisdom will sponsor such an act.

I am deeply grateful to the committee for the opportunity to present my views, and I shall gladly attempt to answer any questions its members may care to put to me.

Senator BENNETT. Thank you very much, Mr. Liebert. Under the chairman's rule we may not ask any questions unless you have some.

Thank you.
Did Dr. Kenneth Clark return?
All right. The last witness then is Mr. John M. Stalnaker, president emeritus, National Merit Scholarship Corp.
Mr. STALNAKER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
Senator BENNETT. Mr. Stalnaker, I think you are No. 369, and that is the number of witnesses this committee has heard since it began these hearings.
Mr. STALNAKER. Thank you.
Senator BENNETT. I asked them if they could not please turn up one more so we could have a nice round figure, but I am not going to call for volunteers.

STATEMENT OF JOHN M. STALNAKER, PRESIDENT EMERITUS, NATIONAL MERIT SCHOLARSHIP CORP.

Mr. STALNAKER. My name is John M. Stalnaker, and I am president emeritus of the National Merit Scholarship Corp., with which I have been associated since its founding and development.
This corporation operates the Nation's two most widely known and influential but privately supported public scholarship competitions, the national merit program and the national achievement scholarship program for outstanding Negro students. Some 800,000 students enter these programs each year, representing about 17,500 high schools in the country.
We are supported by some 500 sponsoring organizations which sponsor merit and achievement scholarships. These include corporations, colleges, labor unions, professional societies, individuals, and private foundations, including many corporate foundations.
In no case, however, are the awards of their scholarships directed to individuals. The awards are made by the National Merit Scholarship Corp. The programs are extremely competitive, as is detailed in our written testimony.
Many of the sponsors provide funds for completely unrestricted scholarships that anyone can win. Almost all of them also offer scholarships for the most outstanding students who meet certain criteria of interest to them. Thus, the Army and Air Force central welfare funds limit their scholarships entirely to children of members of these services.
Corporations and corporate foundations provide awards for the most highly qualified children of employees.
Labor unions specify children of members. Those wishing to help Negro students use the facilities of the national achievement scholarship program for outstanding Negro students.
National Merit Scholarship Corp. has been ruled to be an exempt organization under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.
We believe that it will continue to be an exempt organization under the changes in the tax reform bill of 1969, and would also qualify as a publicly supported organization.
Most of the 500 scholarship donors are also not private foundations.
However, a significant number are, and while they do not make their scholarship grants directly to individuals, the restrictions of this bill dealing with direct grants to indivduals may be subject to differing interpretations. This may result in interruption or widespread cancellation of completely desirable scholarship programs, and we do not believe this to be in the national interest.

We are concerned with section 4945(e), pertaining to taxable expenditures, which requires that individual grants be "awarded on an objective and nondiscriminatory basis pursuant to a procedure approved in advance by the Secretary or his delegate."

We fear that this standard may be so imprecise as to cause a private foundation to hesitate to award scholarships, even to the winners of bona fide scholarship competitions such as that conducted by National Merit Scholarship Corp. Because an advance ruling must be obtained and because of the severe penalties attaching should such a grant be ruled to be a taxable exenditure, some private foundations may be inclined to suspend their scholarship support activities pending clarification.

We do not believe that the word "nondiscriminatory," as read in the bill, is meant to affect competitive scholarship programs with criteria similar to ones that are limited to children of members of the Armed Forces, to children of employees of corporations, or who are Negroes, or American Indians, or children from low-income families. But some private foundations may not wish to risk the severe penalties to find out.

We are also concerned with the employment of the word "nondiscriminatory" because of the possibility that the wording and interpretations which may develop concerning it in the context of the provisions governing private foundations will be extended and used as precedents in Treasury rulings on other scholarship programs.

National Merit Scholarship Corp., for instance, operates one of the Nation's major competitive scholarship programs for Negro students. We think that the Nation truly would be the loser if this voluntary program, which is entirely privately supported, were to become the unintentional and indirect victim of this bill.

The black community would have lost a valued friend.

We are also concerned that some private foundations which are donors to national public scholarship competitions administered by organizations which the Treasury has ruled tax exempt may now conclude that for safety's sake, they should now also get a Treasury ruling themselves for their scholarship grants to that program.

Obtaining a ruling typically requires many months, and could result in substantial interruptions of these activities and the Nation's more able students would be the losers.

Some clarification of the bill is needed where grants to individuals are concerned, especially to undergraduate students. The public supports public scholarship competitions which are important to the national welfare, as interest in the Merit program attests. Private foundations play an important part in making such competitions possible. Regardless of the intent if this bill, we believe that some interpretations may place new restrictions on these worthy activities.

The possible severe penalties associated with misinterpretations may cause some donors who want to be certain beyond a shadow of a doubt to cancel their scholarship programs.

There are undoubtedly a number of ways in which the ambiguity of section 4945(e) might be eliminated.

One possibility might be to simply exempt from the bill expenditures for undergraduate scholarships, the winners of which are chosen in a bona fide competition conducted by an independent organization which has been ruled exempt by the Treasury.

We believe that the problem areas we perceive in the tax bill as now written could cause interruption or curtailment of important scholarship programs which are in the Nation's best interest.

There may also be unfortunate implications in section 4941 and 4946 for scholarship programs supported by private foundations. Our detailed testimony suggests modifications to avoid these results.

We would hope that modification will be made in these provisions.

Thank you very much.

Senator BENNETT. Thank you very much, Mr. Stalnaker.

(Mr. Stalnaker's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL MERIT SCHOLARSHIP CORPORATION, PRESENTED BY JOHN M. STALNAKER, PRESIDENT EMERITUS

SUMMARY

My name in John M. Stalnaker. I am president emeritus of National Merit Scholarship Corporation of Evanston, Illinois, and have been associated with it since its founding in 1955.

I am executive director of the Commission on Presidential Scholars, chairman of the Midwest Regional Panel for White House Fellows, and have served as chairman of the Board of Foreign Scholarships (Fulbright Program). Presently I am also a member of the Board of Higher Education of the State of Illinois.

National Merit Scholarship Corporation operates the nation's two most widely known and most influential public scholarship competitions—the National Merit Scholarship Program and the National Achievement Scholarship Program for outstanding Negro students. Some 800,000 students enter these programs each year representing over 17,500 high schools. Over 25,000 scholarships have been awarded to date.

Some 500 organizations sponsor the scholarships, including corporations, colleges, labor unions, professional societies, other organizations, individuals, as well as private foundations, including many corporate foundations.

In no case do the 500 sponsoring organizations of the Merit and Achievement programs award their scholarships directly to individuals; the awards are made by National Merit Scholarship Corporation.

The programs are extremely competitive as is detailed in our written testimony. Most of the winners are in the upper one half of 1% of the secondary school graduates.

Many of the sponsors provide funds for completely unrestricted scholarships that anyone can win. Almost all of them also offer scholarships for the most outstanding students who meet certain criteria of interest to them. Thus, the Army and Air Force Central Welfare Funds limit their scholarships entirely to children of members of these services. Corporations and corporate foundations provide awards for the most highly qualified children of employees. Labor unions specify children of members. Those wishing to help Negro students use the facilities of the National Achievement Scholarship Program for outstanding Negro students.

National Merit Scholarship Corporation has been ruled to be anexempt organization under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. We believe that it will continue to be an exempt organization under the changes in the Tax Reform Bill of 1969, and would also qualify as a publicly supported organization. Contributions to it would continue to be deductible by the donors under Section 170 of the code.

Most of the 500 scholarship donors are also not private foundations. However, a significant number are, and while they do not make their scholarship grants directly to individuals, the restrictions of this bill dealing with direct grants to individuals may be subject to differing interpretations. This may result in interruption or widespread cancellation of completely desirable scholarship programs, and we would not believe this to be in the national interest. We are concerned with Section 4945(e), pertaining to taxable expenditures, which requires that individual grants be "awarded on an objective and nondiscriminatory basis pursuant to a procedure approved in advance by the Secretary or his delegate."

We fear that this standard may be so imprecise as to cause a private foundation to hesitate to award scholarships, even to the winners of bona fide scholarship competitions such as that conducted by National Merit Scholarship Corporation. Because an advance ruling must be obtained and because of the severe penalties attaching should such a grant be ruled to be a taxable expenditure, some private foundations may be inclined to suspend their scholarship support activities pending clarification.

We do not believe that the word nondiscriminatory, as read in the bill, is meant to affect competitive scholarship programs with criteria similar to ones that are limited to children of members of the armed forces, to children of employees of corporations, or who are Negroes, or American Indians, or children from low income families. But some private foundations may not wish to risk the severe penalties to find out.

We are also concerned with the employment of the word nondiscriminatory because of the possibility that the wording and interpretations which may develop concerning it in the context of the provisions governing private foundations will be extended and used as precedents in Treasury rulings on other scholarship programs. National Merit Scholarship Corporation, for instance, operates one of the nation's major competitive scholarship programs for Negro students. We think that the nation truly would be the loser if this voluntary program, which is entirely privately supported, were to become the unintentional and indirect victim of this bill. The Negro community would have lost a valued friend.

We are also concerned that some private foundations which are donors to national public scholarship competitions administered by organizations which the Treasury has ruled tax-exempt may now conclude that for safety's sake, they should now also get a Treasury ruling themselves for their scholarship grants to that program. Obtaining a ruling typically requires many months, and could result in substantial interruptions of these activities and the nation's more able students would be the losers.

Some clarification of the bill is needed where grants to individuals are concerned, especially to undergraduate students. The public supports public scholarship competitions which are important to the national welfare, as interest in the Merit Program attests. Private foundations play an important part in making such competitions possible. Regardless of the intent of this bill, we believe that some interpretations may place new restrictions on these worthy activities. The possible penalties associated with misinterpretations may cause some donors who want to be certain beyond a shadow of a doubt to cancel their scholarship programs.

There are undoubtedly a number of ways in which the ambiguity of Section 4945(e) might be eliminated.

One possibility might be to simply exempt from the bill expenditures for undergraduate scholarships, the winners of which are chosen in a bona fide competition conducted by an independent organization which has been ruled exempt by the Treasury.

Another approach might be to exclude from the term taxable expenditures, "scholarship and fellowship grants which are subject to the provisions of Section 117(a) and are to be used for study at an educational institution described in Section 170(b)(1)(B)(ii)", the language used in section 4941(d)(2)(G)(ii) of the Tax Reform Bill of 1969.

There may also be unfortunate implications in Sections 4941 and 4946 for scholarship programs supported by private foundations. These have to do with self-dealing and disqualified persons. As our more detailed testimony indicates, these sections might be interpreted to bar a highly qualified student from winning a scholarship because the father was a substantial stockholder of a corporation. Our detailed testimony suggests modifications to avoid this result.

We believe that the problem areas we perceive in the tax bill as now written could cause interruption or curtailment of important scholarship programs which are in the nation's best interest. We also believe that some modification in the manner which we have suggested or in some other appropriate manner is necessary to eliminate these problem areas. We urge that such modification be considered.

We are at your disposal to explain further any aspects of this testimony either with the committee or with the appropriate members of your staff.

STATEMENT

My name is John M. Stalnaker. I am president emeritus of National Merit Scholarship Corporation of Evanston, Illinois, and have been associated with it since its founding in 1955.

I am executive director of the Commission on Presidential Scholars, chairman of the Midwest Regional Panel for White House Fellows, and have served as chairman of the Board of Foreign Scholarships (Fullbright Program). Presently I am also a member of the Board of Higher Education of the State of Illinois.

National Merit Scholarship Corporation operates the nation's two most widely known and most influential public scholarship competitions—the National Merit Scholarship Program and the National Achievement Scholarship Program for outstanding Negro students. Some 800,000 students enter these programs each year representing over 17,500 high schools.

The primary objective of these two nation-wide programs is to identify publicly each year the most promising high school seniors in the 50 states—on a state by state basis—and to encourage scholarship donors throughout the United States to provide these students with the financial assistance they need to attend college.

The National Merit Scholarship Program is now in its 15th year, and over 25,600 scholarships have been awarded in these Merit and Achievement programs to date. This year some 12,000 students will be in college with assistance from NMSC and several times as many will have been benefitted in some way from participation in the program.

The scholarship assistance awarded to students through the Merit and Achievement Scholarship programs comes from some 500 sponsoring organizations, a total which has increased each year. These include corporations, colleges, labor unions, professional societies, other organizations, individuals, as well as private foundations, including many corporate foundations. This complex of sponsors, nearly all non-governmental, but including such federal instrumentalities as the U.S. Army and Air Force Central Welfare Funds, makes it possible for this country to have a massive public talent search and the stimulation of a 50-state scholarship competion without dependence upon federal or state funds.

In no case do the 500 sponsoring organizations of the Merit and Achievement programs award their scholarships directly to individuals. A group of Merit and Achievement finalists are selected by rigorously defined procedures.

The selected students in the Merit program for example, are in the upper one half of 1% of the secondary school graduates. They are so highly selected that all are assumed to be fully qualified for scholarship help. The object of the Merit program is to obtain financial assistance to the extent such assistance is required by the student so that all of the finalists will be able to attend the college of their choice and to study in the field of their interest. Sponsors are invited to support scholarships for any of the finalists since every finalist is qualified and they may define the type of person they wish to have receive their awards. However, the awards are made by NMSC and where appropriate, the need for financial aid is determined by NMSC and NMSC handles all details administering the scholarship.

While no Merit scholarships are awarded to anyone who does not qualify as a finalist, some sponsors wish to offer a fixed number of awards each year and in those cases NMSC, where it cannot meet the full requirements from the finalists, will award a special scholarship to the next candidate in line who meets the criteria for that award. The selection of special scholars is made by NMSC and the scholarships administered by NMSC and all details handled in a way which is parallel to that of the Merit program.

The Merit Scholarship sponsors, collectively, offer some 1000 Merit Scholarships each year that can be won by any student in the country—they are completely unrestricted as to who can win. Winners are chosen by a national committee of educators skilled in academic selection.

Nearly all the sponsors, including the private foundations, also offer Merit and Achievement and Special scholarships for the most outstanding students who meet criteria of interest to the sponsors and these total 2700 a year at present.

For example, the Army Central Welfare Fund and the Air Force Central Welfare Fund limit their Merit Scholarships to children of members of the U.S. Army and the U.S. Air Force.

Several hundred corporations and corporate foundations, besides giving unrestricted Merit Scholarships, provide awards for the most highly qualified children of employees.

Over a hundred and fifty colleges provide that their Merit Scholarships be awarded to Merit finalists who choose to attend their colleges.

Labor unions specify some of their awards for children of members, a medical research fund for potential workers in the health care field, etc. Organizations wishing to award scholarships to the nation's outstanding Negro students use the facilities of the National Achievement Scholarship Program in a similar manner.

National Merit Scholarship Corporation has been ruled to be an exempt organization under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. We believe that it would continue to be an exempt organization under the changes in the Tax Reform Bill of 1969 and would also qualify as a publicly supported organization. Contributions to it would continue to be deductible by the donors under Section 170 of the code. National Merit Scholarship Corporation itself will be affected by the Tax Reform Bill of 1969 chiefly if the influence of the bill causes sponsors to withdraw scholarship support in the face of possible severe government penalties.

Most NMSC donors are not private foundations and would not be directly affected. However, a significant number of the donors are private foundations that do come under the bill. These sponsoring foundations do not make their scholarship grants directly to individuals, but to NMSC, and to this extent they would not constitute the type of activity at which the bill seems to aim.

However, it appears to us that the sections of this bill dealing with direct grants to individuals may be subject to differing interpretations, and could unintentionally affect the continuity of various independently operated scholarship activities which are in the public interest but which make scholarship awards directly to able students.

We fear that the enactment of this legislation in its present form will cause sponsors of completely desirable scholarship programs to suspend their scholarship programs until further clarification is made. Such effects could result in widespread cancellation of privately supported scholarship activities and thus would be undesirable for education generally. It would not be in the national interest if there were, at this time, a significant reduction in undergraduate scholarship support by private foundations, both because it would reduce the amount of student aid available nationally, and even more significantly because the nation would lose the very important side benefits of these activities—talent search and student encouragement.

In particular, we are concerned with Sections 4945(e), 4941 and 4946 of the Tax Reform Act as they may relate to grants made by private foundations directly to individual undergraduate students and students about to enter college.

Specifically, Section 4945(e), pertaining to taxable expenditures, requires that individual grants must be "awarded on an objective and nondiscriminatory basis pursuant to a procedure approved in advance by the Secretary or his delegate." We fear that this standard may be so imprecise as to cause a private foundation to hesitate to award scholarships, even to the winners of bona fide scholarship competitions such as that conducted by National Merit Scholarship Corporation. Because an advance ruling must be obtained and because of the severe penalties attaching should such a grant be ruled to be a taxable expenditure, some private foundations may be inclined to suspend their scholarship support activities pending clarification.

In a sense, any scholarship competition by its very nature must be discriminatory. A scholarship competition distinguishes winners from losers.

This point aside, a great many scholarship activities in this country are discriminatory in the sense that the donor, even if it be the federal government, limits eligibility to students who meet some specified criteria. Some examples are programs that are:

1. Limited to children of members of the Air Force and Army.
2. Limited to members of certain churches.
3. Limited to children of employees of companies.
4. Limited to Negroes, or American Indians.
5. Limited to students willing to attend a certain college.
6. Limited to members of a Boys' Club from a certain city.
7. Limited to students from low income families.
8. Limited to students wishing to major in certain fields.

There are many other types.

One commonly used criterion is that of being a child of an employee of a sponsoring corporation. Many corporate foundations have scholarship programs for children of employees. In fact, many of the Merit Scholarships and Achievement Scholarships for outstanding Negro students are designed for children of employees. The number of students receiving awards is a very small fraction of the total number of employee children of the age group—the programs are extremely competitive. There is a very large number of non-winners for every winner.

We do not believe that the word nondiscriminatory as read in the bill, is meant to affect such programs, but some private foundations may not wish to risk the severe penalties to find out.

We are also concerned with the employment of the word nondiscriminatory because of the possibility that the wording and interpretations which may develop concerning it in the context of the provisions governing private foundations will be extended and used as precedents in Treasury rulings on other scholarship programs. National Merit Scholarship Corporation, for instance, operates one of the nation's major competitive scholarship programs for Negro students. We think that the nation truly would be the loser if this voluntary program, which is entirely privately supported, were to become the unintentional and indirect victim of this bill. The Negro community would have lost a valued friend.

We are also concerned that some private foundations which are donors to national public scholarship competitions administered by organizations which the Treasury has ruled tax-exempt may now conclude that for safety's sake, they should now also get a Treasury ruling themselves for their scholarship grants to that program. Obtaining a ruling typically requires many months, and could result in substantial interruptions of these activities and the nation's more able students would be the losers.

Some clarification of the bill is needed where grants to individuals are concerned, especially to undergraduate students. The public supports public scholarship competitions which are important to the national welfare, as interest in the Merit Program attests. Private foundations play an important part in making such competitions possible. Regardless of the intent of this bill, we believe that some interpretations may place new restrictions on these worthy activities. The possible penalties associated with mis-interpretations may cause some donors who want to be certain beyond a shadow of a doubt to cancel their scholarship programs.

There are undoubtedly a number of ways in which the ambiguity of Section 4945(e) might be eliminated.

One possibility might be to simply exempt from the bill expenditures for undergraduate scholarships, the winners of which are chosen in a bona fide competition conducted by an independent organization which has been ruled exempt by the Treasury.

Another approach might be to exclude from the term taxable expenditures, "scholarship and fellowship grants which are subject to the provisions of Section 117(a) and are to be used for study at an educational institution described in Section 170(b)(1)(B)(ii)", the language used in Section 4941(d)(G)(ii) of the Tax Reform Bill of 1969.

There also may be unfortunate implications in Sections 4941 and 4946 for scholarship programs which are supported by private foundations. Section 4941 pertains to self-dealing between private foundations and disqualified persons. Section 4946 defines disqualified persons to be, among others, members of families who own more than 20% of the voting control of a corporation which is a substantial contributor to the private foundation. Among the acts which will be considered to amount to self-dealing under Section 4941 are the "transfer to or use by a disqualified person of the income or assets of the private foundation" and "agreement by the private foundation to make any payment of money or other property to a government official. . . ." Section 4941(d)(2)(G)(ii) specifically exempts scholarship and fellowship grants from the penalties for self-dealing, but only in the case of government officials. The presence of this limited exemption in the statute in its present form leads to the implication that other scholarship payments will not be so exempted. As a result, it could be interpreted that the child of a substantial stockholder of a corporation, qualified in every other way as a recipient of a scholarship, would be disqualified. While we do not believe that this result was intended, even if it was intended we believe any abuses at which it might have been directed are adequately prevented by Sections 117 and 1170.

The absence of any significant number of either Treasury rulings or reported cases indicates to us that this has not been an area in which there has been abuse by private foundations. Our personal experience supports this conclusion.

Therefore, we would again suggest some modification of the bill as presently written. One possible way of taking care of this problem might be to extend the exemption of qualified scholarship payments from the self-dealing provisions so that it would apply to all such scholarship payments and not just to those made to government officials or their children. Of course, there may be other ways of solving this problem.

We believe that the problem areas we perceive in the tax bill as now written could cause interruption or curtailment of important scholarship programs which are in the nation's best interest. We also believe that some modification in the manner which we have suggested or in some other appropriate manner is necessary to eliminate these problem areas. We urge that such modification be considered.

We are at your disposal to explain further any aspects of this testimony either with the Committee or with the appropriate members of your staff.

Senator BENNETT. I understand Dr. Kenneth Clark has just come in. Is he here?

Will you come forward, then, and you become the last witness.

Senator FANNIN. The most sought-after witness of all the witnesses we have had before use.

Senator BENNETT. Dr. Kenneth Clark of Metropolitan Applied Research Center.

STATEMENT OF DR. KENNETH B. CLARK, PRESIDENT, METROPOLITAN APPLIED RESEARCH CENTER, INC.

Dr. CLARK. I want to thank the committee for permitting me to testify. I think this is the first testimony that I have ever given on my own initiative, but I feel this matter before us is so important——

Senator BENNETT. Will you talk into the microphone a little more clearly? It is hard for us to hear you.

Dr. CLARK. I believe that the legislation being discussed is of such importance that I sort of broke a long-standing rule of my own never to initiate a request for testifying.

I am particularly concerned about this legislation, as my written remarks indicate, for two reasons:

First, because of my life involvement and career as a social scientist who believes that desired social change, the struggle for justice and equality and decency in our society, can be obtained through rational process, through man's attempt to use his intelligence to plan how to make a society more equitable.

In my work as a social scientist, both with graduate and undergraduate students, I assert in the very beginning that this is my faith and my hope—that human intelligence can counteract human irrationality.

The second reason is very closely related to the first, namely, my role as president of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center in New York, which is attempting to test whether the rational intelligent planning approach to social change can be effective.

I believe that there are some serious questions about this proposed legislation, particularly the section which would prohibit any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof or any attempt to influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body or with any other person who may participate in the formulation of legislation other than through making available the results of nonpartisan analysis or research. I believe that those are the most disturbing and dangerous portions largely because of a meeting from which I have just come. The committee should know that I just left the office of Herbert Stein, a member of the President's Council on Economic Advisors, where in my role as president of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center, and as the former coordinator of the Institute for Black Elected Officials, I was doing precisely what this legislation would prohibit.

Mr. Stein, a representative from HEW, a representative from the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and four Negroes were sitting around the table rationally, calmly, with mutual respect and understanding, discussing the implications of some of the administration's policies for the black community throughout the Nation, North and South.

I was doing this in my role as president of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center. Dr. Phyllis Wallace, an analyst in my office, had put together a plan containing various subjects to be discussed with Mr. Stein and which reflected our concern that Federal programs could be administered in such a way as to increase problems rather than to solve problems.

My associate, Dr. Farrar, who came with me here, said, "Do you think it would be wise to share this fact with the Senate Finance Committee?

I said, "Yes, it is wise because it is directly related to our concern."

Restrictive legislation, legislation which would interfere with the right of responsible social scientists to do relevant research, research relating to social action and social policy and social change, any such legislation which would impair this would not only interfere with academic freedom but would, it seems to me, increase the chances of nonrational, volatile, emotional, and what I have been criticized for calling, mindless rhetoric and action becoming the dominant ways in which deprived people sought social change.

The MARC Corp. was founded by foundations at my request to test the degree to which it is possible to use intelligent and rational analysis and methods to bring about social change.

Some of the more extreme "militant" members of the minority community criticized this approach from the very beginning, with the usual cliches, such as "lackeys of the establishment." For these individuals any Negro or white or minority group person who sought and obtained grants from foundations was by virtue of that fact demonstrating that he was an Uncle Tom or that he was an agent of the establishment; they sometimes have been rather explicit in saying that the rational approach to achieving social change is doomed to failure, it just cannot work. And those of us who are identified with this approach have been called all sorts of names.

It is my deep belief that this type of legislation would strengthen the nonrationalists, would strengthen not just their rhetoric, but their reality, and would certainly weaken those of us who are identified with seeking admittedly difficult, frustrating, not-easy-to-come-by rational and democratic answers to long-standing social problems.

In summary, then, our statement maintains that the proposed legislation restricting foundations' support of social action oriented groups would be dangerous, and that it would deny congressional support for action research in the public interest while Congress itself continues to subsidize nonsocial change, private, profitable interests.

We believe it would be dangerous, also, because it would undermine the uniquely American system of private support for the public good through the foundations, and would thereby increase reliance upon already heavily committed public funds.

My own feeling is that if such legislation were passed the availability of public funds for social change and social change activity would be limited.

Senator BENNETT. I am sorry, they are voting on the floor of the Senate, and we have no choice but to run. Your statement will be put in the record complete.

Dr. CLARK. Thank you, Sir.

(Dr. Clark's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF DR. KENNETH B. CLARK, PRESIDENT, METROPOLITAN APPLIED RESEARCH CENTER, INC.

SUMMARY

The proposed legislation restricting foundation support of social action-oriented research would be dangerous because:

1. It would deny congressional support for research in the public interest while the Congress continues to subsidize profitable private interests;

2. It would undermine the uniquely American system of private support for public good through foundations, and would, thereby, increase reliance upon already heavily commited public funds;

3. It would withhold from legislatures and from the public the significant findings of action-oriented applied research;

4. It would curtail or destroy many promising experiments in education, social welfare, and civil rights by denying the right of a "private operating foundation" to receive more than 25% of its income from a single source;

5. It would injure the poor, the deprived, and minorities most of all;

6. It would encourage foundations to withdraw from applied social research or to "play it safe" by avoiding areas of public policy;

7. It would gravely weaken the confidence of the poor and deprived and those in urban ghettos—particularly the young—in the feasibility of non-violent rational means of social change of just grievances and encourage a cynical reliance on non-rational devices, stimulating urban explosions and other violent responses consistent with hopelessness and despair.

American democracy has survived precisely because it has developed flexible means for rational processes of necessary social change. Therefore, it is urgent that the proposed legislation, which would endanger that flexibility, be reconsidered.

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman, my name is Kenneth B. Clark. I am professor of psychology at the City University of New York and President of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center, an organization incorporated in New York State.

Let me begin by thanking you, your committee, and the members of your staff for enabling me to appear today to testify on the Tax Reform Act of 1969 as it affects private foundations. From time to time during the past 20 years or so, I have been asked to testify before a Congressional Committee. If my memory is accurate, I have never previously initiated a request to be heard in these chambers. I have done so now because I am deeply concerned about the implications of the legislation before you.

I should like to address my own remarks in regard to the Tax Reform Bill not to the specific prohibitions against the expenditure of funds by foundations—against voter registration, against activities intended to effect legislation, and a tax on foundation income—but, rather, to the implications of the bill as they would affect the democratic process.

The bill now before this committee would prohibit foundations from:

(a) any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof, and

(b) any attempt to influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, or with any other person who may participate in the formulation of the legislation, other than through making available the results of non-partisan analysis or research.

Through this provision that no program can be undertaken which is intended to influence legislation through approaches to members of legislative bodies or through public opinion, Congress would attack action-oriented social research devoted to the public interest while it continues to permit intensive lobbying by vested private interests, such as oil, medicine, agriculture. Groups concerned for self-interest are many and rich. They do not need tax exemption (though many are heavily subsidized by various forms of tax exemptions and governmental subsidies, and in other ways). Those concerned with the public interest, on the other hand, are few, and their total assets are relatively small compared to the wealthy coffers of private interests. How ironic if Congress should abandon its primary responsibility, which is the public interest, while continuing to give support to profitable private interests.

Private foundations are uniquely American institutions. With the exception perhaps of our public education system, there is nothing quite so American as the means we have found over generations to apply private wealth to public causes—private help for public causes instead of public help for private causes.

That part of the legislation with which I am primarily concerned would have the effect of crippling or killing foundation activities in support of social programs the government itself has supported. It would place more and more emphasis on the growth of the central government and public sector, stemming the balancing contribution of the private sector, discouraging American institutions from participation in social research and (relevant) public education. In a representative society, public opinion, and those who will mold legislation, need more not less access to non-governmental and non-profit perspectives.

The pending legislation would also have the effect—through its dangerous provision that no "private operating foundation" can receive more than 25% of its income from a single source—of curtailing or destroying many promising experiments in education, social welfare and civil rights, since the fact is that the number of foundations willing and eager to support such experiments are few, not many. It would encourage competition among agencies concerned with social action research and divert administrative time and talent away from study to wasteful soliciting of funds.

Those who would be hurt by such legislation are the poor, the deprived, and those minorities who have not yet been incorporated into the economic and political power of our societies, those who have for so long been excluded from the political process—not the affluent, and not the foundations themselves (as presently defined), most of whom do not engage in imaginative action-oriented applied social research. The masses of your constituencies would be the direct victims of such a bill; and, in the end, the surest victim would be this democratic society itself.

Rather than compel foundations to withdraw from social action research, or to "play it safe" by avoiding areas of public policy, Congress should devise all manner of enticements to encourage foundations to invest even more widely than they do in social research and social programs, and to encourage dissemination of findings and to advocate policies to legislatures. This would certainly increase the chances that desired social change would occur within the context of rational, systematic and democratic process—and decrease, I hope, the chances of irrational and demogogic approaches to social change. We must increase the capacity of the society to solve its problems peacefully. To prevent the fruits of the free inquiry of applied social research from reaching the members of the Congress and of State Legislatures would be to deprive them of essential knowledge as a basis for their own actions. In addition, it would deprive the public, who is responsible for the Congress, of an informed perspective on social need.

It is extraordinary that such a bill would see the light of day at this particular time, when the confidence of minority groups and others in the orderly process of social change is at a low ebb. In my testimony before the Kerner Commission, I expressed my frustration about the failure of government to heed the findings of its own research. To document a need, and then to refuse to act on that need is to provide fuel for the cynical who do not believe our government is capable of rational change. For if ever we needed a demonstration of the possibilities of rational and orderly change, it is now. Many in the urban ghettos—particularly the young—are convinced that democracy is not flexible enough to provide for necessary change. They observe that riots, melodramatic rhetoric, a militant stance, reliance on the irrational, are far more likely to stir leadership to action than are the rational attempts of nonviolent persuasion based on informed research. The legislation proposed would feed this cynicism, this distrust of reason, and the democratic process. For it would legislate rigidity, fear of change, penalizing American institutions for seeking rational nonviolent means to achieve necessary change. This, without question, would encourage, if not stimulate, the resort to the non-rational explosions of frustration and cynical explosions of just grievances.

American democracy has survived precisely because it has been a flexible institution. It has survived longer than any freely elected government because it has adapted to new requirements; the Constitution has proven extraordinarily flexible for the needs of each new age. This legislation would weaken this living vital instrument and raise doubts about the nation's capacity to admit to past error or new needs. This nation should have nothing to fear from the search for knowledge, and nothing to fear from rational change.

Should this legislation circumscribing the role of foundations pass as it stands, the Congress must assume responsibility for an impetus toward the final abandonment of the process of reason that is the foundation of any orderly democratic government, and must assume responsibility for any irrational acts of civic disorder engaged in by those despairing people not yet admitted to equality in this society, those for whom the force of reason has become no longer possible. So this legislation would go far beyond a crippling of the freedom of foundations to experiment with new approaches to social problems. It would be a declaration that social research, relevant to social change, is not sanctioned by this society, that human values and the struggle for justice are regarded as unpatriotic, and unworthy of governmental support, and that peaceful social change is now seen as improper and illegal. Two alternatives alone would remain to the deprived should any such stand become the policy of this nation—acquiescence in continued degradation and despair, or a resort to violent, irrational means.

This Congress has given wide support to scientific research in weapons of war—nuclear farfare, nerve gas, and other devastating chemical instruments of destruction. But it has also enabled the nation to achieve scientific triumphs of peace. A nation that has willingly spent billions to send two men to the moon cannot now reject men here on earth. It would be an irony of historic proportion if the strongest and greatest nation on earth retreated in fear in the face of social-action research that could help man to a better life. If social science research is rejected by this Congress, it will be rejecting the essence of democracy—respect for humanity and unquestioned faith in the rational process.

It is, Mr. Chairman, because I believe that this is contrary to the best in the American tradition and in conflict with the urgent needs of our time, that I hope this Committee and the Senate of the United States will reconsider these measures.

Thank you.

Senator BENNETT. The committee is adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning when we begin the pleasant task of trying to winnow all the advice you have given us and make a bill out of it.

(Thereupon, at 1:20 p.m. a recess was taken in the hearing to reconvene at 10 a.m., Thursday, October 9, 1969, in executive session at 10 a.m.)

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1969

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:05 a.m., in room 2221, New Senate Office Building, Hon. Clinton P. Anderson, presiding.

Present: Senators Long (chairman), Anderson, Gore, Talmadge, Byrd Jr. of Virginia, Williams of Delaware, Bennett, Curtis, Miller, Fannin, and Hansen.

Senator ANDERSON. The hearing will come to order.

The Committee on Finance has interrupted its executive sessions on the Tax Reform Act of 1969 to receive a report from Mr. Peter G. Peterson, chairman of the board and president of the Bell & Howell Corp., in Chicago. Mr. Peterson serves as chairman of the Commission on Foundations and Private Philanthropy, a commission comprised of a group of distinguished Americans who have spent several months looking into the impact of private foundations on philanthropy in this country. A considerable portion of the study has concerned itself with abuses of the foundation privilege.

Mr. Peterson, we will be pleased to hear what you have to say this morning. Next week, we take the foundation provisions of the tax reform bill under consideration in executive session. I know the thoughts you will express today will aid us in the work we do next week.

Mr. Peterson, we will start with you now, if you please.

STATEMENT OF PETER G. PETERSON, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD AND PRESIDENT, BELL & HOWELL CORP., CHICAGO, ILL., CHAIRMAN, COMMISSION ON FOUNDATIONS AND PRIVATE PHILANTHROPY

Mr. PETERSON. Good morning, gentlemen. If I could introduce myself, my name is Peter G. Peterson, chairman and president of Bell & Howell Co., in Chicago. But today I am here in my capacity as chairman of the Commission on Foundations and Private Philanthropy. If I may, I would like to handle this presentation this morning in the following way: I would like to suggest, first of all, that my written statement be inserted in the record.

Senator ANDERSON. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. PETERSON. Off the record, Mr. Chairman.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. PETERSON. I think, in the interest of time, what I would like to do is present you a summary of our key findings. First of all, I would like to tell you about our group.

I was approached last spring by Mr. John Rockefeller III, on behalf of several of the major foundations, who asked me if I would head a group of private citizens to launch this study. I indicated to them that I would accept the assignment on three bases: First, that leaders in the executive and legislative branches of the Government would be contacted to see whether they felt a study of this type would be helpful. As I indicated in my written testimony, this was done.

Secondly, I told them that I thought it was extremely important that a study of this kind be as objective as possible, both in substance and in appearance. For that reason, I told them I would have to insist on selecting my own commission and my own staff. I thought this independence should extend to financing of this effort as well. Thus, we are raising our money from individuals, from companies, labor unions, all kinds of institutions, and we have not accepted any money from the foundations.

As to the commission itself—I would like to show you who they are so you can arrive at your own judgment about their competence. I guess everybody is an advocate in this world for something. My bias is toward audiovisual presentations and I hope you will not be bothered by that.

Let me show you who is on this commission. We wanted representatives of several sectors of the society. We wanted to be awfully sure the revenue aspects were looked at, someone who really knew the question of abuses and revenue; thus, Sheldon Cohen, former Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest we accept the validity and authenticity of the organization and get to the substance of this presentation.

Senator ANDERSON. Without objection.

Mr. PETERSON. Thank you, sir.

To tell you how we went about this work, we first listened and made note of the criticisms of foundations from a wide variety of sources. Briefly stated, the allegations go as follows: First, many or most foundations are nothing more than tax dodges for millionaires.

Second, that foundations are heavily involved in politics and not in charity and why should these activities be fostered at the public expense?

Third, foundations often use their money to further extreme ideologies, left and right.

Fourth, that many foundations represent great concentration of in-perpetuity power and money controlled by an Ivy League, self-appointed establishment.

Fifth, that foundations spend a great deal of money internationally and ignore the needs of our own society.

Sixth, that they squander money that would otherwise go to charity and they squander it on high salaries and high overhead expenses.

And finally, that foundations hoard money as though it were their own when it belongs to the public and should be spent on charity.

Now, I am sure that you have heard many of these criticisms and others besides. But the one thing this commission determined early in its life was that while these allegations were common, there was remarkably little evidence to either support or refute them. One of the first major surprises of this commission was to find how little was really known about what foundations did with their money.

For example, the question of abuses bothers many people. It certainly bothered us on this commission. But when we tried to find out how frequently each kind of these abuses occurred and whether the allegations were a single anecdote or part of a real pattern, we could get no evidence.

We had, therefore, to launch our own studies of abuses. The Arthur Andersen Co., accounting firm in Chicago, anonymously, interviewed some 200 tax accountants across America to get them to estimate the nature and frequency of tax abuses. The National Opinion Research Center acted as consultants and Market Facts, Inc., in Chicago, did what is perhaps the first systematic set of field interviews of foundations across America, of all sizes and types. While our study is not complete and I am going to present to you a preliminary report only, I believe that most of the trends are pretty well established by now.

We took a look at a significant number of 990–A forms, which I think many of you realize are an annual report for the Government required of each foundation. May I say parenthetically and perhaps gratuitously that while we think that 990–A forms can be greatly improved so as to help you gentlemen understand much better what foundations do, I find it very ironic that, in view of some of the widespread concerns and equally widespread ignorance, this form remains one of the less utilized forms in the Government information warehouse.

Today I will present to you as a result of these studies recommendations that deal with further abuses that we think should be covered in the legislation. I will talk to you about our recommendation for much more intensive auditing of foundations by the IRS, and some different concepts and we hope valid concepts for a much expanded form of public disclosure and public reporting.

Today I will also explore our findings on the question of whether the money is spent on politics or on charity and where the money is spent. Frankly, gentlemen, as we tried to get evidence on this question, we found nothing more than guesses. We found some people thinking this was a sizable portion of the activity of foundations. Today I will report to you how foundations do in fact spend their money and how much is spent on various kinds of grants.

On the allegation of whether they are hoarding their money and the payout of funds to charity, we are going to show you today the rate of return of foundations and how much they do pay out to charity. You will see how this evidence has led us to make a fundamental recommendation to you: that you consider legislating a high payout requirement for foundations.

I should also say that we have been a bit appalled by the lack of really basic descriptive information. You have heard testimony that there are 22,000 foundations; you have heard testimony that the assets are $20.5 billion. You have heard others say there are 45,000 foundations. And may I say, on the reported assets of foundations, it is very clear from our in-depth examination of 990 forms that a fair number of foundations are reporting those assets on a cost basis instead of a market-value basis, with the result that we think it is distinctly possible that the estimates of foundation assets that you have heard are substantially understated.

Senator TALMADGE. May I ask a question at that point?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator TALMADGE. Do you have any idea of how many foundations there are in the country and what their total assets are at the present time?

Mr. PETERSON. The question of how many there are is really beyond our scope. I can tell you, Senator, we went to the IRS and got their total list. It is a number slightly over 30,000. As far as the assets are concerned, they are reported at $20.5 billion, which I believe is a substantial understatement. In our final report, we are going to take the largest ones and make our own appraisal of the market value.

I indicate in my testimony we are already doing that on one large one from which you heard testimony, the Irvine Foundation, which is, interestingly enough, listed as having assets of $6 million. You had testimony that I think could have strongly suggested that the foundation was worth $120 million or so. Our information suggests that the value, the true value, of that foundation may be much higher than that number. In our final report, we hope to be able to answer that question of total assets more specifically.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (now presiding). Senator Gore.

Senator GORE. We are finally beginning, just beginning, to focus upon the problem of tax exemption for foundations. I suggest that our Government and our society need to focus upon charity and upon our policy, Government policy, with respect to charity. Though you say the number of foundations is not known, the fact that the U.S. Treasury has been unable to give us any sort of reliable estimate, number, yet is it not true that foundations are only a relatively small part of the tax-exempt organizations? I have heard estimates of as high as 400,000 tax-exempt organizations in our country. This illustrates, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, the need to focus finally in the development of our organized society upon governmental policy with respect to charity. I hope no one would think this statement would indicate an uncharitable attitude on my part toward charity. But a great many selfish acts of various, myriad kinds have been undertaken under the cloak of charity. We are subsidizing bogus, phony charities.

Would you respond to that at this time?

Mr. PETERSON. Our study, of course, focused necessarily on foundations. I would like to focus on an answer to one of your questions, Senator.

I think it is fair to say that one of the reasons that no one knows how many foundations there are is that I do not think enough time has been taken to define what is meant by a foundation. I think the current legislation, for example, makes it very clear that certain institutions that have never thought of themselves as foundations can be considered so. In the interest of making clear that my testimony may not be without prejudice, I am a trustee of the National Educational Television, Inc., and Brookings Institution here in Washington. I found after accepting this assignment that, by definitions in the House bill, these are considered foundations. I think a point you are making is an important one: First, that we should define carefully what we mean by various kinds of charitable organizations and a study of the type we have taken on one small segment might be in order for the society as a whole.

Senator GORE. And once an organization has achieved tax-exempt status, there is no Federal agency adequately equipped for regulation, supervision, recordkeeping, or knowledge of what happens. Under the present law, the organization enjoys that status forever.

Senator BENNETT. May I make the point, there has been a very dramatic demonstration that, pushed hard enough, IRS will remove the exemption. They took the exemption away from the Sierra Club for engaging in political activity about 2 years ago.

Senator ANDERSON. Well, did it not?

Senator BENNETT. Yes, it did, and they took it away. But you say nobody is watching it; at least in that one case they watched it.

Senator GORE. I am not sure that "watched" is the right description there. It was called to their attention by the flare of publicity. Here is one out of perhaps 400,000. I think we have a problem here. I am not sure that I have the correct solution. But at least a start, it seems to me if I may interject at this point, a start would be to put some limit on the time for which tax exemption would be granted.

Now, you describe foundations as having the various purposes, some of which may be charitable, some of which may not. Purposes become entirely out of date.

I was reading in a book the other night that some rich dowager had left her estate to a foundation to build a sanitarium for the protection of needy cats and kittens. Well, maybe they need protection, but we have some hungry children, too.

Anyway, I am diverting here. I am sorry.

Mr. PETERSON. We will make precise recommendations in an area in which I feel we have some competence: much increased auditing of the foundation segment very shortly.

Mr. Chairman, we have thought it was very important to remember something that some of us tend to forget; namely, that foundations exist to support charity. Until we have some idea of the needs of charitable organizations in America, it is very hard for us to see how we can make rational recommendations to you on the role of foundations.

Thus, in our final report, we will present to you our projection of needs of these charitable organizations in the year 1975. We have now about 10 experts in each of those fields attempting to project those needs. I understand you gentlemen have done something similar to this in the field of medicare, in the field of medicaid. I can simply tell you that our original estimates of what the needs of these charitable organizations are going to be in 1975 is so high as to cause us to go back and reexamine them. But it would now appear to us there will probably be a deficit in the range of tens of billions of dollars for these charitable organizations, if we think in terms of projecting current trends of private giving and Government support.

Now, how else might we take a look at what the needs of these charitable organizations are? One approach, gentlemen, was to get interviews with 750 distinguished and informed citizens all the way across America. We talked, for example, to a sample of labor leaders, a sample of presidents and chairmen of major business companies; we talked to religious leaders, to scientists, Nobel Prize winners; we talked to medical people in medical organizations, others running medical educational institutions. We think we have here a pretty good cross section of the people who do take a lot of the responsibility in this country for the operation of charitable organizations.

We asked these people to tell us what field of charity they felt most knowledgeable in. We then asked them if they would kindly tell us what they thought the needs of these kinds of organizations were going to be over the next 5 years or so. I would like now to report to you what they tell us.

The way we asked them the question was as follows: "Over the next 5 to 10 years, what would you expect to be the trend in the financial needs of the charitable organizations in the section of society about which you know the most? Would you think that the trends are going to go up rapidly over this period, significantly more than the gross national product? Do you expect them to go up about like the gross national product? Do you expect them to stay about the same as they are now, or do you expect them to go down over this next 5- to 10- year period?"

Senator Gore. Could I interrupt?

Mr. Peterson. Yes.

Senator Gore. I am having difficulty seeing the label on this projector. Is that a Kodak or Bell & Howell?

Mr. Peterson. Unfortunately, our company doesn't make transparencies. If you are having trouble seeing, it is obviously a deficiency in the transparencies, and not the equipment.

You will notice that 77 percent of these distinguished citizens told us that they expect the needs of charitable organizations over the next 5 years to go up significantly more rapidly than the gross national product. This is very important, I think, gentlemen, because charitable giving in this country has tended to follow the gross national product pretty closely. About 21 percent said they expect it to go up about like the gross national product and a very small percentage said they expect it to stay about the same.

Senator Anderson. Where are you reading it from? Nobody can see it.

Mr. Peterson. I will show it to you now, gentlemen, by group. I hope you can see that.

We then asked people in each field to tell us how they felt the needs were going up. Here is what the people in medicine said, the people in arts, science, education, and so forth. Two points I would make: In the field of education, 86 percent of these knowledgeable people, as I say, the leaders of our society, felt that the needs would go up much more rapidly in education than the gross national product. Science is a little lower than the rest of them; perhaps they have been chastened a bit by recent funding experience.

In all the heat and furor and anger over foundations, it is easy to miss, I guess, that the recipient is the charitable organization. Thus we also decided to take a careful look at charitable organizations themselves.

Senator Gore. How did you reach the conclusion that charitable organizations are generally the recipients?

Mr. Peterson. We shall show you very shortly, Senator, what foundations do with their money.

What we did, gentlemen, with our limited resources of time and money was to interview about 50 leading charitable organizations in Chicago. These organizations were very cooperative and generous. They gave us 2 to 3 hours, they permitted us to go in and look at their cost records so we could see what their problems were.

Now, you might say that every good charitable organization is also a good fund raiser and you would not expect them to say they did not have financial problems. However, after a look at their books and deficits that some of these major organizations are now experiencing, such as the Chicago Symphony, the YMCA, and the Art Institute, we had considerable faith in their answers.

We said: "Looking ahead to 1975, which of these statements do you lieve comes closest to representing your own situation as a hospital, as a university, as an art museum, et cetera?" The first statement is "to be sure, costs are rising, needs are growing, but I am confident we are going to be able to get the money from our outside needs and contributions"; 17 percent felt that way.

Twenty-six percent said they are concerned, they are not at all sure they can get the money, they think there are going to be some cutbacks necessary. But we are impressed with the fact that 57 percent of Chicago charitable organizations indicate to us that they think they will be facing a budget crisis unless major new sources of money are found.

One might ask how can this possibly be in view of the enormous funds that are being pumped into the charitable and social sector by the Federal Government itself? As a businessman, I should have known this. But what was not clear to me until we had done this study is that the charitable activities of this country, this business of charities, is essentially a people business. Let me show you some numbers: In 1963, 59 percent of the budgets of these charitable organizations were spent on people and people-related expenses. In 1968, for the same institutions, you will notice that they have risen 5 percent as a percentage of the total. This is a striking increase and you might ask: "How did this happen?"

What we did, gentlemen, was to look at salaries of charitable organizations which account, as I have indicated, for the significant majority of their total expenses. Notice here what we find: For example, if you will look at the average production worker in America, you will see that since 1963 the wages rose 23 percent. Now we are looking at salaries of charitable organizations. There is good reason to believe that the salaries are rising at a significantly higher rate than that.

For example, hospital interns, up 81 percent in Chicago since 1963; nurses up 50 percent. We have gone to the universities. Their academic salaries are up 34 percent in 5 years. Social caseworkers, up 42 percent, and so forth. There is no question but there is a great pressure on the salary levels of charitable workers.

Senator MILLER. May I ask a question at that point?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator MILLER. Is it not true, however, that there was an abnormal increase in, especially, hospital employees because for so many years they had been so far behind, and that in view of the fact that in the last few years they have come up fairly well to what other related types services in private industry are we could expect that that would level off from here on out?

Mr. PETERSON. I was just going to make the point, Senator, that part of this, there is no question, there is a catching-up phenomenon. That is what you are saying. In our final report, we intend to show you what their own budget estimates are for the year 1975. As a trustee of the University of Chicago, however, I can say that I can see no current evidence that the pressure, for example, on faculty salaries is now off and that they have caught up.

Senator BYRD. May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

Do I interpret this correctly, that 64 cents of each dollar goes—put it this way: For each dollar which an individual contributes to charity 64 percent goes to administrative personnel costs?

Mr. PETERSON. For all people costs, sir, in the charitable institution. To professors, nurses, doctors. In other words, charitable organizations are made up largely of people, only some of them in what you would call administration. The very vast majority of them are case workers, the nurses, the teachers, people actually doing the work of charity.

Senator BYRD. Thank you.

Mr. PETERSON. Now, another thing that we are now trying to study on charitable organizations is this very delicate question of productivity of the charitable organizations. It is a subject that raises both the temperature and the blood pressure, I might say, of charitable organizations. What we seem to be finding is the following: that, in many charitable organizations in America, it is taking more people to serve the same number of people simple because the services are getting more complex, more sophisticated. This is true in hospitals. It is true in universities where they are teaching many more courses. Therefore, the cost per person is going up very substantially, and even when prices to the public have been raised substantially as in hospital room rates, university tuitions, and symphony tickets, these organizations still face a budget crisis.

Now, with all this financial news, we asked these distinguished leaders: "What do you think the national policy should be?"

There are clearly three alternative policies, though this oversimplifies it a bit. One can take the position that the thing to do is to have the Federal Government take on the preponderant part of the load of these charitable organizations and be quite content to have the role of private giving diminish substantially. The second basic policy position is to say the Government is going to have to take a good deal of the load. Frankly, gentlemen, as I look at the financial projections of some of these charitable sectors I do not care what the private incentive system is, it is going to be very difficult to get all the additional money from the private sector. But it is the policy to encourage the private sector to maximize its role. And the third policy, which I do not think many people are supporting, is the policy of letting a significant number of these charitable organizations simply fade or decline.

We asked this question of our distinguished leaders. We find that the vast majority of American of all political parties, all backgrounds, all categories, take the point of view that it would be very unfortunate indeed if charitable organizations got to the point where the preponderance of their money came from Government sources at the expense of a diminishing private sector.

Now, it is already true that in some fields, such as science, this Government preponderance has already happened. I want to report to you that I think if you were to have talked to these 750 leaders you would see very quickly that most of them, even in science, greatly respect this private sector and want not to see it diminished.

Now, we asked these people "What do you think the tax policy of this country should be? Do you think the tax policy of this country should be as it is? Do you think we should put disincentives into the system? Do you think we should put more incentives into the system?" Here is what happens. 70 percent of these leaders of our country said: "We believe that the policy of the United States should be to further encourage private philanthropy, to increase the incentives that are now given." Only 6 percent, who suggested present incentives should be reduced; that is, that we should not encourage private giving—a significant portion of that small percent are concerned with the problem that I am going to talk about a little later, the question of abuses by some of the people who give the money and we will have some recommendations to make about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me get this straight. The people that you are talking about, whose opinion you asked, are those in the foundation field already?

Mr. PETERSON. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I did not make this clear. We are not now reporting on what foundations are saying, because I think the place to start this analysis is at the charitable level, not at the foundation level.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you talking about charitable organizations who receive money from foundations?

Mr. PETERSON. Who receive money from the foundations and from the leaders of the country who, incidentally, are people who play a leadership role. For example, people in my position are often on the board of several charitable organizations, and presumably know something about their problem. So, I am now talking at this precise point not to foundations, not to charitable organizations, but to the leaders of the country to find out what they think the policy should be.

The CHAIRMAN. Are not those the people who depend on receiving donations from the foundations?

Mr PETERSON. Charitable organizations are, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So, to some extent at least, they are prejudiced in favor of foundations?

Mr. PETERSON. But the people I was just talking about, Senator, are not charitable organizations or foundations, they are individuals of the following type: We are taking leaders of labor organizations, presidents and chairmen of businesses in America, Nobel Prize winners, medical prize winners, heads of AMA State organizations, a section of America that I think has interest and knowledge about these private, charitable organizations.

Now, you may argue their prejudice. On the other hand, most of these people are leaders, I think, of our society and we wouldn't know where else to go to get really informed judgments.

Now, another aspect of the private sector that we are looking at is the enormous value of volunteer labor. This is just one of the reasons we think it is so important to preserve this sector. We find in Chicago, for example, a very impressive number of charitable organizations—YWCA, Red Cross, the Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, Cerebral Palsy group, where if you only put a value of $3 on the volunteer labor that is contributed to that institution, and $3 these days does not buy a great deal in either talent or motivation, we will show you a whole list of charitable organizations in Chicago where the value of that volunteer labor is more than the total personnel budget of the institution.

We think for those reasons, dollars and cents, and for deeply philosophical reasons that lie at the very heart of what makes this country what it is, you should in your tax policy reaffirm your faith in this private sector.

Now, against this broad policy let us evaluate the House bill in terms of what its impact might be on these charitable organizations. I have listened carefully, I hope, to what people tell me about this bill. It goes something like this. We have no intention to hurt charitable organizations at all. All that we are doing is to close loopholes, to broaden the tax base and eliminate special preferences so that the very rich cannot get away with paying a pittance in taxes.

Now, I do not think there is any question that the vast majority of the Americans are very much interested in tax equity and certainly I am. But one of the interesting questions we want to explore with you briefly before we get to the foundation question is what the total effect of this bill is. I use a word in my testimony to describe these effects, a new word I would like to share with you, that I learned from a doctor friend of mine. It is the word "iatrogenic" and I asked him what that means. He said it is a word used in medicine to describe the situation where, in the course of treating a patient, the side effects are more serious, even though unintended, than the original disease that doctor was trying to cure. It comes from the Greek, meaning diseases caused by the doctor.

I think in some ways what we have here in the House bill is a very understandable attempt to do something about tax equity and, in the course of doing that, I think we may see some very significant negative effects on the charitable giving, and therefore on these very precious American institutions.

Now, there is no private commission in America that can tell you gentlemen exactly what these dollar effects are. I can tell you that I have tried very conscientiously at several levels of the Government to try to find out what the effect of each of these House bill provisions is likely to be on charitable giving in America.

As yet, I have been unable to get the answer to that question. And I think the reason is certainly no lack of cooperation but the people in Treasury and elsewhere have been so busy with other aspects of this bill that they have not had the time to make this determination. I would strongly urge anybody in coming to a final decision to be sure he understands what the effects of this bill are on the charitable organizations of this country.

We have made one small effort to get some facts for you on this.

Anybody that has done any fund raising for charitable organizations in America will tell you that some of the key gifts, some of the large gifts, are enormously important. I do not pretend that what I am going to show reflects the effect of the House bill on all charitable giving but only on those large charitable givers in America.

I would like to describe these men to you that we studied. These are 85 large donors that we got from a variety of sources across the country and if there is any question about their being large donors let me show you what they report having given to charity over the last 5 years on an annual basis. Their median annual giving is $375,000. I must say that this finding is sobering to some of us on the commision. We had not realized what failures we were, how impoverished we were. In my own case I recently made a grant to the University of Chicago, my favorite university, of $25,000 over 5 years. I had not thought that was picayune but there is obviously a group in America who made really large and really decisive contributions. Seventy-four percent of these people that we interviewed had foundations, 82 percent had reached the 30-percent ceiling.

My reasons for going through this is to be sure you understand this is the large giver we are talking about. This is not anything like a cross section of America.

Senator WILLIAMS. Are these cash gifts?

Mr. PETERSON. These are total gifts, Senator, and I will show the form of the gifts shortly.

Senator ANDERSON. Where you did the work, the foundation?

Mr. PETERSON. These are large donors to charity, Senator, large donors to charity. You might be interested that 78 percent of these people had discussed the House bill with their tax advisers and certainly this finding and many others make it clear to me that taxes are very important as part of this philanthropic picture.

Now, what do these big givers in America give?

Senator GORE. So is personal profit.

Mr. PETERSON. So is what?

Senator GORE. So is personal profit a large part of it. When the ordinary citizen gives to his church or his community charity, he digs down in his pocket and gives, but the big professional eleemosynary individuals are improving their cash flow and their cash position.

Mr. PETERSON. Well, I think I will now show you what form they do use for making these good.

Senator GORE. Good.

Mr. PETERSON. For example, 67 percent of the gifts of the large donors is in the form of appreciated property, the most significant class being stocks, bonds, items of that sort; 25 percent is reported as cash. I think we probably made a mistake in our study because some of these people counted in here grants that were made from foundations and what we were trying to really determine was the original gift, not the grant. But 25 percent was reported as cash, 8 percent were future interests.

The main point I am trying to make here is that, in the case of large givers, a very significant part of the giving is not in the form of cash. It is in the form of property of one form or another.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us just be fair about that. A lot of those gifts involve money which they owe the Government anyway, and the Government would have received almost 100 percent if they had not given it.

Mr. PETERSON. It depends when they would have sold it, of course. I am not equipped to——

The CHAIRMAN. In some instances those people actually made a profit. The Government would have collected 105 or 110 percent of what they gave if they had not given it.

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, very shortly we will make some specific recommendations for abuses of this type. They are not covered appropriately, in our opinion, in current legislation. In our view, the people should not make money in the course of giving money to charity. That is our position.

The CHAIRMAN. I am happy to hear that. They ought to give something of their own.

Mr. PETERSON. You will find, I believe, unanimity on this.

Senator WILLIAMS. How near do you think they should break even?

Mr. PETERSON. This discussion could take me a long, long way.

Senator GORE. All of this illustrates, it seems to me, that the average citizen who is genuinely charitable he must comply with a tax law that gives him a deduction from taxable income, a fair system of taxation. But for the large donor, there are unfair provisions of law which give him a chance to make a profit out of charity.

Mr. PETERSON. Sir, I would like to repeat, we do not believe that people should make a profit out of charity and we will have some specific recommendations on that score.

Senator GORE. Well, I think a majority of this—well, I cannot speak for a majority. At least, there is one member of this committee who is dedicated to taking profit out of charity and that is not uncharitable.

Senator MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question at this point? You have given us a result of a survey of 85 large donors?

Mr. PETERSON. That is right.

Senator MILLER. When we were discussing the problem of the unlimited charitable-contribution deduction, our staff advised us that, out of some 154 of the very large income people who paid no income tax, that 52 of that total had traced their position to the unlimited charitable-contribution deduction. So, my question would be, do you know how many of those 85 relied upon the unlimited deduction?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes, I am sorry I went over it very quickly. Of the 85, 13 percent of this 85 are qualifying for or have qualified for the unlimited deduction; 86 percent have not qualified of the group I am now ——

Senator BENNETT. That is 12 people?

Mr. PETERSON. That is right, out of the 85. Who did not qualify. The vast majority of these did not qualify. However, if you will look here, 82 percent of this group did reach the 30-percent ceiling.

Now, where did these big givers give money? And again, I have to emphasize they may not be representative but we think they are important. Higher education got 45 percent of the money from these particular people; 12 percent to welfare, social community services; hospitals got about 10 percent. There is probably some overlap between higher education and hospitals because of university affiliations. Cultural institutions got 10 percent. Education other than higher education, seven, et cetera. It is very interesting to see that the patterns of the large giver, I think it is fair to say, are quite different from the patterns of the population as a whole. For example, if you were to look at charitable giving in America, roughly 50 percent of all charitable giving goes to religious organizations and churches, but of the large donor you will notice here that only 5 percent of their gifts go to religious activity. A much higher proportion goes to higher education.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Peterson, what percent of that 45 percent goes to institutions that are operated by churches?

Mr. PETERSON. You mean higher education institutions?

Senator CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. PETERSON. I am not sure we asked that question, but I think I would guess it would be not too large a number. We did not ask the question that way. We simply said: "What is the kind of institution you gave it to?"

Senator CURTIS. In your native State of Nebraska, church colleges carry 30 percent of the load of higher education and that might—some of those 85 people have money in it.

Mr. PETERSON. I can only guess, Senator, because the categories in our study were "church or religious affiliated," and "higher education" that there is some in both categories. I just cannot separate it out for you. But the point I am trying to make is that a smaller portion of the large-giver giving goes to churches than is true of society as a whole.

Senator CURTIS. Did you say you were on a hospital board or two?

Mr. PETERSON. I am on the board of the University of Chicago, which has a hospital, yes.

Senator CURTIS. Could hospitals stand a 5-percent cut in receipts?

Mr. PETERSON. We asked these institutions, Senator, what would happen to them if their private giving were reduced 25 percent. Approximately 82 percent of them reported either a budget crisis or, perhaps a little melodramatically, that they would go out of existence. It is clear that the private giving is vitally important to virtually all of these institutions.

Senator GORE. Why is it that foundations are not listed on the chart you just took off there?

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, the purpose of this study was to show the charitable organization that was the recipients of the gifts, where they made the gifts to the charitable organization directly.

Senator BENNETT. The end recipient.

Mr. PETERSON. The end of the process, in other words, the institutions that get the money. This is intended to show the recipients.

Senator GORE. In other words, this chart is not to show who gave the gift and for what purpose, but who got it and for what purpose.

Mr. PETERSON. Who got the money from these large givers. Where does this money flow.

Senator MILLER. In other words, what you are saying here is that this chart has nothing to do with foundations at all because if there were any foundations giving to higher education, and, of course, there were, they are not included in these 85 large donors.

Mr. PETERSON. This was intended to focus on the gifts essentially, Senator, and I am going to come to foundations very shortly.

Senator MILLER. If a large donor gave to a foundation which in turn gave to higher education, that is not in here?

Mr. PETERSON. I think in most cases that probably would not be here.

The CHAIRMAN. If I might just suggest, I am as bad an offender as anybody at this table, but I think we ought to let Mr. Peterson go ahead and make his presentation in chief, because some of the questions, I think will be answered in the course of the presentation.

Mr. PETERSON. I think so. I hope so, anyway. Members of your staff, Mr. Vail and others, who, incidentally, were terribly helpful to us in posing questions we should look at.

Senator TALMADGE. Will you yield at this point? In your testimony here, these 85 largest donors, you state that 69 percent currently give through their own family foundation.

Mr. PETERSON. That is right, sir.

Senator TALMADGE. I presume, then, that this money first flowed to the foundation and then from the foundation to the ultimate recipient. Is that correct?

Mr. PETERSON. Could I answer that question shortly by referring to my staff member, who is here, who did the analysis and I will have him tell me the answer to that question very shortly.

Now, something that your staff was very much interested in was what the importance is of tax benefits on charitable giving. Is it important to large givers to get tax benefits? We asked the question, "If there were no tax benefits at all; that is, if you gave money to charitable organizations out of your after tax income, what effect would this have on your charitable giving?"

Now, this is obviously a statement of their opinion of the effect on their giving. I will show you some facts shortly. But the median effect was a reduction of 75 percent. They said without tax incentives their giving would go down 75 percent.

Only 4 percent of the large givers said there would be no reduction at all if there were no tax incentive at all. This chart shows you the range of estimated reduction in giving and the middle point is about in here or reduction of 75 percent.

We then went to these big givers and to get some harder facts. We said: "We would like you to take the House bill. We would like you to imagine that your income is the same as last year, that your charitable giving is the same as last year What is the effect on your taxes?" A fair number of the people who answered this question actually had their tax people make the computation. The median increase in taxes of these large givers under the House bill, if their contributions remain the same, if their income remains the same, if their distribution among various kinds of income remains the same, the median increase in their taxes would have been 25 percent.

Senator GORE. Have you got the median effective rate of these same donors?

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, when I say that a private commission works under certain limitations that is one of them. We thought we were being a little presumptuous maybe even to ask them to compute what the increase was. We do not have subpena powers obviously. We did not see their tax return, and I do not know what their tax rate was.

Senator GORE. You might be interested to know that the committee in executive session has had information to show that the median effective rate paid by taxpayers with over $1 million annual income is less than 30 percent, a lesser effective rate than is paid by many salaried persons making only a fraction of that amount.

Mr. PETERSON. We then said to these people. "Now that you have a feel of the effect of the House bill on your taxes, what do you feel will be the effect of this bill, if any, on your level of charitable giving?"

This is clearly an opinion, gentlemen. I am not presenting this as a fact. None of us could possibly tell you what they are in fact going to do. But what I am trying to report is that these large givers reported their charitable giving will be reduced by 50 percent. Three percent told us they thought their giving would go up or remain the same. Seven said it would remain the same, but the vast majority of the people indicated they will reduce their charitable gifts if this bill were to go into effect.

Now, what are the provisions of the bill that, on these people, had the largest effect on their charitable giving? Gentlemen, there is no way without a computer and without looking at their tax returns that we can answer that question precisely. We can tell you what appeared to be the important provisions of this bill in affecting gifts. The most important as you can see by this chart, by a significant margin, was the allocation of the deductions provision.

Second was the limit on tax preferences followed by this particular set of categories.

Another comment I would want to make about this bill for your judgment and considerations is the complexity of the calculations. We had a number of these people tell us that, in order to calculate the tax, it was necessary to solve several simultaneous equations simultaneously. Several of them thought they might need computer help in order to determine the effect of this bill on them. Edward Levi, the president of the University of Chicago, is on our commission. Edward is a brilliant man. He is a man that also has to raise money for the university. Edward pointed out to the commission that it is hard for some to believe that for most people it is kind of difficult to make a gift. It is a difficult decision because in a significant majority of the cases the donor does end up with less money. Mr. Levi and other people in hospitals and universities we have talked to are concerned about a bill that gives the donor a series of new excuses for waiting until he determines whether to make a gift. For example, under the House bill, I think it is true that a fair number of people would not know what their effective tax rate was until the latter part of the year.

I think I should simply say that there is a strong feeling of great complexity in the computations that are required with this bill.

This commission would not want to take the position, I know I would not, that one should encourage charitable giving to the point that there are strong inequities in the giving. On the one hand, we think this would be a very inappropriate time for the leaders of this country to be saying to the citizens of the United States that you do not want to strongly encourage private giving. I think it would be a serious problem if that was what the American people thought this bill meant. Incidentally, 92 percent of our distinguished citizens who were familiar with the bill think this bill discourages private giving.

Now, we think there are at least three specific areas where this can happen and we would recommend specific surgical legislation that aims at those specific abuses.

First, we think it is very obvious that as long as a significant portion of the giving is in the form of appreciated property, and particularly with so-called bargain-sales provisions, an overevaluation of the appreciated property can result in the effect that the person clearly ends up with more money as a result of having given something away than by having sold it or even kept it. You will note, I think, that in the case of art in this country, big pieces of art, techniques have been developed for the independent appraisal of the true value of the property. We would urge that the legislation should carry with it requirements of objective appraisals quickly verified and validated on any significant appreciated property contributions where there is any question as to its value.

We think there is a potential here for abuse, and may I add that a charitable organization is unlikely to report that abuse for the simple reason, if I can be a bit crude about it, that one rarely bites the hand that feeds him. I do not think we could expect logically that charitable organizations, if a donor overvalues a gift, will report that. I think it is very important that procedures be set up to prohibit the overevaluation of appreciated property.

Second, we think there are situations, our tax experts tell us, where the donor has fully depreciated what he is giving away and which would have produced ordinary income—I think that is the case, Senator, you are probably talking about—and, therefore, the donor can improve his after-tax position by giving something away. We believe that such efforts should be dealt with in this legislation. We see examples, for example, where somebody has already written off the cost of the item he is giving away. I refer to farm products, for example, where he has already taken a deduction for the expense of growing that product. Then, if he gives the product away, he gets the deduction for the full market value. I do not think there is any question but that that can be specifically handled.

Finally, there is a third category of what I would call moneymaking from charity. This is the case where, for example, a company makes a product. It is a very low cost product in relation to its sales. In this category, for example, might be items like drugs, items like certain categories of equipment. For example, if you are making a product where the cost of goods sold is 10 percent of the value and you give it away, and get a 50-percent deduction for it, it is clear that you can end up with significantly more money after you have given it away than had you not made a gift.

We think rather than a bill that lumps all charitable contributions in this moneymaking class, and in so doing I am told by experts have a very significant negative effect on charitable giving, that perhaps another approach you might consider is to define those cases where people make money off charity and specifically prohibit that kind of abuse.

Our final recommendation on broad tax policy—we have made two. One, that we would urge you to consider getting detailed estimates of the effect of the House bill on charitable giving. We have been unable to get official estimates. Leading tax experts tell us that they could be very significant.

Second, that you prescribe those cases where people can make money off of charity and specifically, surgically, eliminate those.

Our third recommendation is a longer term recommendation but I think we should make it anyway even though you cannot deal with it now.

Senator MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that Mr. Peterson has covered this point. I would like to clarify the chart which shows the percent of donors who are concerned about various provisions in the House bill. One of those provisions, which I have heard a lot of complaint about, provided in the case of a gift of appreciated-value property, that the donor would have to make up his mind whether to take only a deduction for his low basis or, if he took the deduction on the fair-market value, that he would have to report the appreciation of capital gains. I do not find that phase of the House bill in this chart.

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, thought I am both a nonlawyer and a nontax expert and those are not very good qualifications for doing this job, I believe that provision you refer to applies only to foundations where appreciated property given to foundations must be either considered at cost or after the taxes are paid on the appreciation. But I do not believe that is the case on charitable gifts generally. Am I right on that or not? That is my impression.

Senator MILLER. Thank you.

Mr. PETERSON. In the material that will be in your written report, we asked these citizens of this country to tell us what they thought the total effect of this tax bill would be on private giving. Sixty-one percent of these people thought they knew enough to have opinion. These interviews were completed in August and early September. The bill, you recall, was reported out, I believe, in early August. Ninety-two percent of these distinguished people—these are not big givers, now, this is the leadership segment of the country—92 percent of those people felt that this House bill discouraged private philanthropy. That was its total effect, to discourage it.

We have demonstrated most people would like to encourage private giving and we would suggest that you give consideration to the following concept. It is not something you can do in time for this bill but we think most Americans would like to see a new kind of tax incentive for private giving that meets the following four criteria.

First, one that provides significantly more money for charity in the range of several billion dollars more. I think there is no question that the seventies are going to be a period of great crisis for charitable organizations and, if we want to preserve the position of the private sector, we will need to greatly accelerate private giving.

Second, a tax incentive that is equitable, that is not a device a few can use to avoid paying any taxes.

Third, a tax movement that spreads the giving among people more. There is no question, gentlemen, that the wealthy are the people who, by definition, will make large gifts and they obviously need to be encouraged to make large gifts. On the other hand, we think an ideal tax incentive for philanthropy would be one that would encourage more people to make gifts than are making significant gifts at the present time. I say this not only because it will produce more money. I say this philosophically. I think the more people in America who make charitable gifts and who participate in how these decisions are made, the better off we are going to be. And while we currently depend very heavily on a few wealthy people, I think we should try to figure out ways of broadening that base.

Four, that we should do this at the lowest possible cost to the Federal Government consistent with these guidelines.

In the course of our commission efforts, gentlemen, we have reviewed with tax economists, tax lawyers, I think the best ones in the country, this general need for a new tax approach. They have reported the following to us:

First, that very little attention has been given in tax circles to really new tax-incentive approaches to charitable giving. I think it is fair to say that very little thought in this particular bill was given to incentives. For example, the raising of the deduction, of the limit on charitable giving, from 30 to 50 percent, in our studies, at least, is not likely to have a large effect because of the other provisions of the bill.

Secondly, much of the data that is needed to develop that kind of tax incentive is simply not available anywhere except in the Government where the Treasury has it.

Thus, every expert we have talked to about tax incentives to philanthropy is not satisfied with the current system, and believes that a better system of tax incentives for private philanthropy can be developed that meets these criteria. It is clear that this is not something that is going to be done in the next days or weeks. We simply would urge Congress and the administration to come up with a really new set of approaches to philanthropic giving.

Among the criteria we suggest for a better system of tax incentives is not only one that takes the moneymaking out of charity but one that spreads the giving across more people in the country. Tax experts tell us they think such a system could be evolved if it were assigned to them as a very specific assignment.

Senator GORE. Well, in view of your statement that without tax incentives they would cut back their charity by 75 percent, can you think of any way other than tax that we can really stimulate charity?

Mr. PETERSON. No, I am saying, sir, it clearly has to be a tax incentive. It is our feeling that a better tax-incentive system can be developed that not only produces more money in total but does spread the giving more among more people. That is not something that we have a specific recommendation on at this time.

Senator GORE. My question is, is there not some way to motivate charity other than tax reduction? It seems to me that there should be a matching system or some way other than tax gimmicks to stimulate charity.

Mr. PETERSON. Of course, Senator, the words "tax gimmicks" mean different things to different people.

Senator GORE. I know.

Mr. PETERSON. We have already defined one of the problems as one where people make money out of charity and that is something we would propose your doing something specific about and which I think is in the distinct minority. You still have the situation today, do you not, where most people share in the giving, that is, the Government gives some and the person gives some. And all I am reporting to you is that of 10 top tax economists we have talked to, they are unanimous in feeling that a better system can be evolved than the one we have now and we would urge that this be given very systematic attention in time for action perhaps next year.

The CHAIRMAN. The kind of thing you are talking about is making it more attractive for people in the middle-income brackets, particularly upper-middle-income brackets, to donate money to charity. Is that the kind of thing you are talking about?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes. For example—and this may seem a little self-serving, I hope not—there is a group of people in this country who do have significant incomes but it tends to be earned income rather than income from other sources. One might be able to imagine an incentive system that makes it attractive for those people as well. I am not prepared to indicate what that specific system is. I think it is an assignment that is indeed worthy of tax reform.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, may I make a point? This bill, features that have not been mentioned, destroys that very thing. I know a great many people of very modest income that give generously to things, and they are going to be put at a great disadvantage under this bill. And it is through standard deduction and the problem is accentuated by allowing a minimum standard deduction and now the minimum standard deduction in this House bill is increased, and you can have a situation where someone, probably in about the $7,000 to $14,000-a-year income, a person who gives generously to his church, to the Red Cross, to the United Givers Fund, gives a few hundred dollars to his alma mater, will not get 1 cent of tax incentive because the individual who does not support anybody can take the standard deduction plus the minimum standard deduction and have his taxes reduced by an equal amount.

Mr. PETERSON. I would include that, Senator, in my recommendation of an in-depth appraisal of the effects of this bill on charitable giving. I can only tell you that 92 percent of the leaders of the country who do talk to people think that this bill is a disincentive to charitable giving. Most of the tax counsel on our commission, and we think we have got some very good ones, tell us that by any standard this bill is antiphilanthrophic in its total effect and, rather than simply make a general statement to that, I think all I can suggest is that you get in-depth studies of what those effects might be. I do not think many people intended that effect. I certainly do not think the country wants that effect. I certainly do not think the country wants that effect and I am simply suggesting that it be reviewed in detail.

Senator WILLIAMS. Mr. Peterson, may I just make one point. Earlier in your statement you placed great emphasis, very properly, upon one phase of charitable work which is done by the volunteers of the various organizations. You mentioned several of them.

Now, is it not a fact that they are not in any way affected by the bill? They are voluntary charitable contributions made through their work giving their services on a basis that they want to do something for charity?

Mr. PETERSON. That is right.

Senator WILLIAMS. And it is really that type of charity which we are referring to and this bill only affects those who are giving charity on the basis of the tax incentive. Those who are really charitably motivated are not in any way affected by the bill.

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, I think the discussion of mixed motives and incentives would take us all day to cover. I do not think there is any question that tax incentives in our system are a very important part of giving. It is a part of our whole system. And personally I think in many ways it is a pretty good system. All I am suggesting is that you study what the effects of this will be on giving with the experience and data that must reside in the Treasury and elsewhere.

Senator WILLIAMS. I agree that we need some tax incentives. I am not speaking against that. But I am just pointing out as you did earlier, that much of the charitable work is done by those who do not get the benefit of any tax incentive.

Mr. PETERSON. That is right.

Senator WILLIAMS. While we may need tax incentive in the law, we do want to guard against moving off to the point where it stops being charity and becomes rather a self-serving device.

Mr. PETERSON. I hope I have commented sufficiently on that to indicate my agreement.

Senator WILLIAMS. Thank you.

Mr. PETERSON. Now, can I move on to foundations?

The CHAIRMAN. Might I say that I will let you ask a——

Senator MILLER. May I?

The CHAIRMAN. I will let you ask a question but this witness is going to have to accelerate this statement. We are just getting to foundations and the witness is about one-third the way through his statement in chief and we had hoped to have time to ask some questions in closed session that might be of a confidential matter.

Senator WILLIAMS. I think the questions could be asked in open session and I would want to ask my questions and get the answers publicly.

The CHAIRMAN. That is perfectly all right but there are a few things that this witness can tell you in confidence that he cannot tell you in open session. I would suggest that we accelerate this matter because if each of us keeps interrogating the witness before he tells us what he wants to say here, we might never hear it.

Mr. PETERSON. All right. Let me move on now to foundations and our studies there.

First of all, I have said there is no accepted definition of a foundation. This is simply a sample of the list of foundations as defined by the Treasury. Some of you have been interested in where the foundations are located in America.

It is true as this chart shows that there is a higher proportion in the East and Northeast sections of America than is true otherwise.

The first bar on the chart shows you the percent of population in each region and the second bar shows you the percent of the foundations.

Notice, for example, that New York has 9 percent of the population and 22 percent of the foundations. New England has 5.7 percent of the population and 9.9 percent of the foundations.

On the other hand, in other sections of the country, a number of Southern States, for example, there is a somewhat lower proportion of foundations to population.

We think there are many reasons for this but one of the reasons is that some of the older wealth, the businesses that have been established the longest have been established in the East and we would expect to see this trend change.

We also tried to find out, gentlemen, how many of the foundations operate regionally in their efforts and how many operate nationally.

Let me tell you the various kinds of foundations that we covered in our field study, which I should emphasize is not yet complete. We covered various sizes of foundations because there is no question as we look at the evidence that patterns, giving and operating patterns, vary significantly depending upon the size of the foundation.

We have analyzed separately foundations under $1 million in assets, $1 to $10 million, $10 to $100 million, over $100 million in assets. Also, we show company foundations separately. I do not wish to confuse these with a foundation on which a donor has put company control stock. This is a foundation that companies use for the company's giving.

The reasons companies set up foundations are several. Many companies in America today have decided to give a certain percentage of their earnings over a period of time. One of the advantages of a foundation to them, gentlemen, is that it permits them to even out their charitable contributions. In a good year they put in more and in a not so good year they put in less. They also put appreciated property in the foundation.

The community foundation is another type—I do not know how many of you are aware of those. They are not well known, though they are quite an interesting institution to us. These are foundations that usually have public trustees on them. The trustees are often appointed by political officials. The mayor may appoint one, for example. They are located in major cities. Often the bar association will appoint a trustee—the head of a university, et cetera.

Now, what is the geographical focus of foundations? We asked these foundations that we interviewed, "Do you essentially make grants in a city? In a State? In your region? Are you national or what?" You will notice here that about 61 percent of the foundations could be categorized as being regional or local. That is, they give the vast majority of their money to local areas. Towns, 43 percent. State, 9 percent. Regions, 9 percent.

About 21 percent of the foundations are what you might call nationally oriented. That is, they give their money across the entire country but they do not give it internationally. About 9 percent of the foundations in America give their money both nationally and internationally and a small percentage, 6 percent, give their money for international purposes alone.

Now, what do foundations give their money for? What is the kind of organization that gets the money from foundations?

The reason we thought it was terribly important to get this for you is there has been a great deal of concern about the amount of foundation money going to individuals, money going to international organizations, and we wanted to get from these foundations where and who got the grants.

Now, these numbers, I should tell you, have to be weighted very importantly by the assets of the foundation because the foundation movement, as you have heard before, is characterized by a good deal of concentration. Too much of the previous data on foundations has been done on the basis of numbers of foundations rather than in terms of dollars of grants. Of all the grants made in America, according to our studies, here is where the money goes in terms of the category of recipient.

You will see that 74 percent of the foundation dollars go to so-called 30 percent public charity organizations. Nineteen percent of the money goes to other qualified charitable organizations. Thus, 93 percent of foundation money goes to a qualified charitable organization. Five percent of the money goes to individuals. About 1 percent goes to foreign organizations. And 1 percent goes to tax exempt, for profit, and other kinds of institutions.

Now, this is rather interesting because in terms of the reasons for setting up a foundation, I believe you know that foundations can make grants that individuals cannot make. Foundations can make grants to individuals. They can make grants to international purposes. They can make grants to other tax-exempt organizations.

What I think this tells you is that the very substantial majority of the money goes for purposes to which an individual could also have given and, therefore, this wider grant authority that foundations have is not something that is widely used. Ninety-three percent of the money that foundations give, in other words, goes to qualified organizations that individuals can also give to and get a deduction.

Another reason foundations are set up is that they can have a staff to give them more expertise in giving. An individual cannot do that currently.

Now, let us look at the sizes of the staff of foundations of various types. You will notice here something that surprised us, that a significent percentage of the foundations do not have any professional staff. That is, the donor, someone closely related to the donor, is the essential person involved. In 84 percent of the foundations we studied there was no professional staff.

You notice here that 11 percent had a part-time professional staff and only 5 percent of the foundations interviewed in our study have full-time professional staff.

You can appreciate that this is importantly a function of the size of the foundation. Ninety-three percent of the big foundations have a staff. But rather surprisingly, only 42 percent of the foundations between $10 million and $100 million assets have full-time professional staffs.

In our final reports we are going to be able to tell you, we hope, the number of people on the staffs of foundations. I would have to say that it is likely to be a surprisingly small number. I would guess that it numbers in the very low thousands across the entire country.

Another reason given for people setting up foundations, of course, is that they can even out their gifts between bad years and good years and we have evidence that in practice this is important to some.

Still another reason for setting up a foundation is to insulate people from the charitable organization. Many companies receive almost unlimited numbers of requests to give. For example, at Bell & Howell, I suppose we feel rather offended if we do not receive eight or 10 letters a day asking for money.

I think the honest thing to say is that another purpose a foundation fills is to act as a kind of a buffer between the giver and the recipient and indicate that the "foundation will look into this matter and review it."

We think, however, that one of the more important reasons for setting up a foundation has to do with the desire to perpetuate the owner's name and his charitable interests at his death.

Finally, I think it would be fair to say that one of the very attractive features of the use of the foundation is in some way to enable the donor to have his cake, as it were, and to eat it, too. By that I mean while on the one hand having given a gift to charity and received a deduction, he maintains some control over what happens to that gift.

Now, I am not one, frankly, that believes it is appropriate to speculate unduly on the motives of people for giving because there are obviously many motives and they are mixed. I think rather we should focus, which is what I intend to do, on the more objective question of what charity and society gets. So, if I may elaborate on the appeal of having your cake and eating it, too, I think, on the one hand, if we take away this opportunity there will simply be significant numbers of donors who will not make the cake available to society.

On the other hand, I think it is very fair for the public to ask that the society get their share of the cake. One of our recommendations deals with this subject.

Now, what is the form of giving to foundations? You will recall that the House bill excludes appreciated property except on the basis, Senator, that I mentioned. It also has some very important restrictions on the giving of stock in companies where there is in effect a control provision that amounts to about 20 percent in total. I think as you evaluate those provisions it would be helpful to you to know what form contributions have been made to foundations.

Now this shows you the form of contributions to foundations. Tangible appreciated property which, of course, deals with works of art, personal objects of various kinds, is a very small percentage of the total. Intangible stocks, appreciated property, are clearly a very important part of the giving of foundations, about 80 percent of the total. You can see that in every category of foundations that we studied, appreciated property is very significant.

What I am trying to indicate is that any provision that puts appreciated property in a different category as far as foundations are concerned could be expected to have a very serious effect on the formation of new foundations.

The finding that in some ways has surprised us a good deal in our study is to see how important, particularly in the large foundations, contributions of stock are in companies in which the donor or the family has a controlling interest. In the past, gentlemen, much of this information has been reported in terms of percentages of foundations having control stock and not in percentage of assets. As this study makes very clear, it tends to be the very largest foundations which get a very important part of their money from this kind of stock.

Notice, for example, the Ford Foundation. We have the permission of the Ford Foundation, in view of your deep interest in that foundation, to report these findings separately to you. Ninety percent of their contribution came from company-control stock; 48 percent of the over $100 million foundations came from that kind of situation. Of all the foundations over $100 million, you will notice that 62 percent of those particular foundations, the contribution came in that form. Notice in the foundations between $10 and $100 million; 75 percent of the original contribution was in control stocks. So there is no question but that in terms of total assets going into foundations, company stock in this form is one very important part.

We do not show it here, but in total it is about 53 percent of the total contributions; 53 percent of all of the contributions to foundations in their original form was in the form of control stock.

I, therefore, suggest to you that if the provisions in the House bill on the one hand deal with restrictions of gifts of any appreciated property and, on the other hand, restrictions on company control stock, that the practical effect of the legislation will be to, in very substantial ways, reduce the contributions that go into foundations since those are clearly the major sources of the money to foundations.

You can see the pattern of cash contributions. In the case of the smaller foundations cash is more important. Stocks are still quite important; 40 percent of the small foundations, for example, use appreciated property in the form of stocks. And even here 18 percent of them are company control situations.

So, what we are trying to report to you is that across every category of foundation, regardless of size, the substantial majority of the contributions are either in the form of appreciated property of company control stock and, therefore, those two provisions will have a very significant negative effect.

Now, we have told you about the company control stock in terms of percentage of contributions. We would now like to report this data to you differently.

First, how many of the foundations ever had company control stock and how many of the foundations today have company control stock? You can see once again what is happening. In this column we show the percentage of foundations by size that have company control stock in them. You can see that for the smaller foundation the number is much smaller but as you look at the larger foundations, 57 percent of the over $100 million foundations had stock in them that was control stock.

If you look at where it sits today, you can see there has been some reduction on those percentages. But even today for the two size categories of large foundations over $10 million, 39 and 36 percent of those foundations still own 20 percent or more of the stock in companies. In terms of total current assets it is clear it is still a significant percentage of the total.

I think I would like now to talk very briefly about a problem we grappled with which is how do you go about assessing the contribution of foundations? You have heard a great deal of testimony here on the contributions of foundations and I will not elaborate on that because I know you know there are many, many such contributions. But we are a private citizens group who saw our mission as trying to come up with an objective appraisal. I think I would have to say it is one of the world's most difficult tasks because an objective appraisal of what the contribution of foundations it would require that, on the one hand, a person would have an idea of what would have happened with that money if it had been given directly by the donor or if the Government on the other hand, had supported it through the tax dollar, it is not clear to me how we, at least, could make that kind of an analysis.

So, what we have tried to do in our study is to do two things.

First, to go to our distinguished leaders in various fields who presumably are aware of what happens in those fields—the 750 men that we interviewed, scientists, artists, people in medicine—and get their report on what they thought the overall contributions were. Members of your staff were interested in finding do the people in these fields feel that we would be better off with foundations or would we be better off just letting people give the money directly.

The 750 people who are in these various fields, not donors, not charitable organizations, but the people in the field, were asked this question:

"In your view is our society better off with foundations or would it be better off if they did not exist and all private charity went directly from the giver to the recipient?"

I can simply report to you that of the 750 distinguished citizens that we interviewed, 95 percent said we would be better off with foundations rather than giving the money directly, a truly preponderant percentage of the leadership of country. We wanted to be sure to find out if they knew what they were talking about so we said in our written questionnaire to them, "Could you give us examples of contributions in your field that represent significant developments?"

We found that about 81 percent of these people in a written questionnaire were able to identify contributions from their field.

We then said, "Will you kindly give us the following rating of foundations in your field of specialty, scientists, doctors, artists, educators, et cetera."

We gave them their choice of five ways of rating the contributions of foundations. First, that they played a very significant role. Without them, some very important things would not have happened. That they have played a positive role. They have tended to support——

Senator MILLER. On that point there, do I read this correctly, that first one, or at least "would not have been delayed."

Mr. PETERSON. I marked that out. That is a typographical error. It should have said the development "would have been delayed" without foundation contributions. I am sorry, Senator.

The second category, they played a positive role, they supported worthwhile projects. On balance they have been worthwhile.

The third is a mixed one. You know, some good things, some not so good things, some significant, et cetera.

Finally, very little contribution in my field, and last, that foundations played a negative role. In short, our field would be better off without them.

We tried to present this matter fairly so they could pick whatever they thought was the appropriate rating of foundations in their field. Here are the results of that study; 85 percent of the distinguished leaders, citizens, said something quite positive, with 60 percent of the distinguished citizens telling us they felt foundations had played a significant role in their field.

Those thinking they played a negative role is 1 percent of the people. Those saying they have not made much difference in our society are 2 percent. Those saying it is good and bad, it is spotty, I am not sure, is 12 percent. But I think it is fair to say that about 85 percent of the distinguished citizens in the country do feel that they have made a significant contribution.

Now, I would like to move on to this appraisal field by field. In other words, we asked the experts in medicine, the experts in the arts, how they felt. You will notice that in all fields, medicine, in the arts, and education and other fields, a substantial majority felt foundations had made a significant development in that field.

In the field of science you will notice that significantly fewer felt that way about foundation contributions; 43 percent felt foundations had made a significant contribution. We would speculate that perhaps one of the reasons for this is that, in the last 10 years or so, a very high amount of Government funding has gone into the scientific arena.

Now, let us talk about what the roles of foundations might be in our society. I thought you might be interested in what these distinguished citizens told us they thought the role should be, particularly with regard to the Government. These citizens are intelligent people. They are aware of the fact that the Government is playing an increasing role and the question we asked them was, "What do you think the roles of foundations, if any, should be with regard to Government programs in these fields?"

What we observe here is the following. About 18 percent said we think foundations should be a partner of the Government and cooperate very closely, almost on joint programs, 25 percent said we think they should cooperate but still be quite autonomous.

Very interesting I think is the preponderant number of these people feel that a significant role of foundations should be to carve out new areas that later might receive public support. There is a pretty widespread feeling, I would say, in the country that the Government is now ideally suited for doing some of these kinds of work; 20 percent said that foundations should act as evaluators and critics of government programs since in many cases they are at least concerned as to whether these programs are being evaluated and, of course, this segment talks about support of the private philanthropic sector.

Now, let us tell you what our commission has concluded about possible roles of foundations vis-a-vis Government programs because in most areas the Government expenditures are much larger, much, much larger than the foundation expenditures.

The first conclusion that we reach about Government programs is that it is much easier, we believe, for a private institution, a foundation being one of them, to carry out experiments, even noncontroversial ones, than it is for the Government. We have looked at cases where experiments have been tried in the Government and there certainly have been some. We are impressed with the fact, gentlemen, that there are certain aspects of experimental programs in Government that may not be the ideal atmosphere for such experiments. Fore example, it is quite possible that if the experiment has early negative results it will be killed very promptly.

On the other hand, we know that political administrations have a way of not lasting over a long period of time. The administration in power is impatient to get ahead, to make a record. If the experiment in reality takes 5, 6, 7 years before one knows whether it works, there is at least a question we have as to whether the Government will wait in some cases for that.

You gentlemen are much better informed than I am of the great tendency in Government programs to want to move them out into the districts very, very rapidly. In some cases perhaps before anybody really knows whether they have or have not been effective.

Senator MILLER. On that point, Mr. Peterson, you said that a great many of them do not think that the foundations should get into innovative areas which may later receive public support.

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator MILLER. But you would not conclude from that, I suppose, that they should get into areas which are contrary to a public policy announced by Congress. Granted that the public policy announced by Congress may change later on at a particular time——

Mr. PETERSON. Is that another way of saying foundations should not engage in illegal activities, for example, like certain political activities?

Senator MILLER. Well, that is not illegal. But if Congress has, for example, voted against a certain program, demonstrated they are opposed to it as a matter of public policy, then are you suggesting foundations should be permitted to get the tax deductions and go ahead and—tax exemptions to go ahead and pursue that policy?

Mr. PETERSON. Well, of course, that is a much broader question, as you know, Senator, because in the entire private charitable sector in America, the foundation is clearly a small part of that total picture. I think the identical question should be asked about the total charitable sector of America and whether it should engage in programs that are or are not consistent with a national policy.

Senator MILLER. Precisely.

Mr. PETERSON. This is a personal opinion that you may not agree with. In my view, one of the great strengths of the private sector is its freedom, is its ability to engage in programs that it believes are important. My answer to your question, therefore, would be that unless something is specifically prohibited or illegal, which in the area of foundations, I think you would agree certain kinds of partisan activity are not charitable activity, my bias would be in the direction of giving these institutions the freedom to perform the kinds of activities that they think are in the public interest.

Senator MILLER. Is it not anomalous, Mr. Peterson, to have the Congress and taxpayer in general keep money from going into the Treasury through the tax exemption and then turn around and say go ahead and use that tax-exempt money for purposes which Congress itself has indicated are contrary to public policy?

Mr. PETERSON. Would it be fair, though, Senator, to suggest that the logical extension of that reasoning would be perhaps to have all the money flow through some public mechanism and allocate the money the way the Congress thinks it should be allocated?

Senator MILLER. No. I do not think that follows. I am troubled by having Congress legislate over here against something and then turn around and letting a private foundation through the tax-exempt process, spend the money for something contrary to what Congress has already decided.

Mr. PETERSON. Can you give me an example?

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, we cannot be debating all this. I would like to know what the witness wants to recommend here on behalf of his commission and with all due deference to the gentleman, he will make it known what he recommends to us and we will find that out for a certainty.

Mr. PETERSON. I think in the interests of time, Mr. Chairman, you have my written statement. We think there are many areas of our society where there are very important roles for foundations where the Government is unlikely to act with leadership or perhaps objectives. I spell these out in our testimony.

Now let me move on to the regulation of foundations which I know is a subject of great interest to you.

It seems to us that there are three kinds of concerns that any private citizen can legitimately have about the operation of foundations. The first is the category of what we call financial abuses, self-dealing, transactions in which the individual benefits in a material way, as a result of having a foundation.

The second category of abuse in our opinion, and this is only partly responsive, Senator Miller, to your question, are what we call grant making abuses. That is where money for which a deduction has been taken, for which an exemption has been granted, is spent for purposes that are not charitable.

And the third abuse and one I am going to spend some time on today, because I think in some ways it is the most important question for you gentlemen to consider, is the question of the amount of money that is paid out to charity. It is our view after all, that the purpose of the foundation is to help charity, to pay money to charity, and we think a very important question that you should address yourselves to is how much money is in fact going out to charity.

Let us take each of these abuses separately. The first category of abuses deals with the whole field of self-dealing, various kinds of transactions where the donor has a relationship with his foundation. In effect, the donor is in some ways on both ends of the transactions. He is both the benefactor and the recipient of that transaction.

There have been a lot of allegations as to the extent of these abuses. There is no way that I know of that a private commission can give you a precise percentage because you need subpoena powers, you need auditing power, and all we have tried to do, Mr. Chairman, is give you a rough idea of the magnitude that might exist.

On the current 990 form, foundations by law are required to report to you certain kinds of self-dealing transactions. Borrowing money, receiving compensation for services, et cetera. We have taken a significant sample of these foundations and this tells you the extent to which these transactions take place.

In 1½ percent of the cases they said they borrowed income; 2½ percent, they receive compensation; 0.5 percent reporting used services or assets in common; 3.5 percent reported purchased securities or property, one from the other; 5.5 percent said they sold services or property and they received income.

We looked at 492 forms picked at random and we analyzed them. I want to be sure I emphasize that under the current laws it is not illegal for a foundation to have this kind of a transaction between the foundation and the donor. All this indicates, therefore, to you is that the percentage of times that this kind of event happens where there is a potential for abuse.

Now, whether the transaction is a fair one or done at arm's length is a second question. I think one of the things that these findings tell us is that in a very substantial majority of the foundations there are not these kinds of relationships.

We did a second thing to try to get some data on abuses. I do not have to tell people as sophisticated as you that you do not find out whether an abuse takes place by simply asking the person whether he is engaged in an abuse. Clearly, those who have engaged in abuses are either inclined not to answer the question or perhaps not to answer it honestly.

Thus, what we asked the Arthur Andersen Co., a national accounting organization located in Chicago, to ask 200 tax accounting people across America anonymously so that there was no possible problem here of any self or client implication.

Here is what Arthur Andersen asked these tax accountants, all of whom have had personal experience with foundations, "There are loose financial self-dealings between small foundations and the donor or friends which work to the advantage of the donor or friends.

"Tell us how frequently in your experience this happens."

The answers speak for themselves. In about 9 percent of the cases the tax accountants say they think this happens either fairly common or very common and the other 91 percent not so common.

"There is loose recordkeeping by small foundations which makes it difficult to know whether personal advantage is being taken by the donor or his friends."

Here, about 8 percent report some pretty loose recordkeeping by foundations.

Next, "There are high operating expenses relative to the assets or income." About 6 percent of the tax accountants felt this kind of situation occurred quite frequently.

Our commission's recommendation to you on the question of abuses is as follows.

First we argue that the integrity of the tax system is at stake here. Unless there are very clear benefits to society from permitting transactions between the donor and his foundation, the suspicions that are aroused, the enormity of the regulative process to make such definitions as what is reasonable, what is arm's length, and so forth, are of such a magnitude that we do not believe that the benefits of such transactions are equal to the potential damage. Therefore, we would strongly support legislation that prohibits any self-dealing transactions between the donor and his foundation.

We have also gone beyond this and, through our many studies, have identified a series of additional abuses that we would recommend that you consider including in your recommendations.

For example, in much of the legislation, company foundations have been largely ignored. You recall the company foundation is the one that the company uses as a conduit largely for its charitable contributions. We believe that you should seriously consider drafting provisions that make it clear that the company cannot run through its foundation expenses that are more legitimate business expenses rather than charitable expenses. We do not know the incidence of this possibility but its very existence suggests to us that something should be done.

I believe this is the equitable thing to do for the following reason. Let us compare a company that does not have a foundation and a company that does have a foundation. The company with a foundation not only gets a deduction which the company could get anyway for its business expense deductions, but the company foundation also gets a tax exemption as well on the income from the money that has been contributed that the company without the foundation does not get. For that reason, we think it is very important that it be made clear that only charitable expenses can be supported through a company foundation.

Now, what kind of cases are we talking about? I am reasonably sure they are not too frequent. For example, suppose a company supports research in its particular industry through its foundation. I think some of the questions that need to be asked carefully and thoughtfully are: How is the public at large made aware of that research because at this point the public has a large interest in the expenditures since a major deduction has been granted? How do the competitors of that firm learn of the research that is being done by that foundation?

Likewise, you have situations where gifts of various kinds may be made from the foundation to a charitable organization. These charitable organizations, these recipients, may also be customers of that company. We think it is important that you give some thought to this question and at the very least the disclosing of any transactions between the company foundation and the outside world that could be considered a business expense rather than a charitable expense.

Senator GORE. Do you think this is a matter for tax law?

Mr. PETERSON. What?

Senator GORE. Is this a proper subject of a tax bill or what are you suggesting here?

Mr. PETERSON. I am suggesting, Senator, that our business tax laws say in effect that reasonable business expenses obviously are deductible for the purpose of computing your profits to be taxed. I am suggesting that, if a foundation engages in practices that could be considered a business-related expense rather than a charitable expense, that some precautions be taken to be sure either that it is disclosed very carefully. In other cases it may be prohibited, because I do not think it is proper to permit business expenses through a foundation.

I think another potential abuse that is not adequately covered in the current legislation, either contributions to charitable organizations or contributions to foundations, is the problem of overevaluation that I mentioned earlier. I would think that the legislation should be made more specific with regard to the evaluation of property given to foundations. We would recommend that you require valuation procedures on any significant contributions of property whose value cannot be easily determined.

Next, as we have already shown you, there is some substantial overlap between the ownership of stock in a company by individuals and stock that is owned by the foundation. I think as a private citizen group, looking and hopefully representing the public interest, we need to be concerned about whether the portfolios and the investments of the foundation are being handled in a reasonable manner to further the best interests of the foundation. Clearly, if a donor who has stock in his own name also has stock in the foundation, there are conflict of interest opportunities here that should be looked at, probably handled best through some kind of disclosure procedure.

Incidentally, these same provisions now apply, for example, to insiders in the case of business corporations, and I am simply suggesting to you that since the same opportunity exists in the case of foundations, that you make it clear that those kinds of transactions should be ventilated.

On the subject of abuses by foundations, we have seen a few cases, not many but a few, where excessive administrative expenses result in a diversion of funds to charity.

Now, in the case of business corporations, you will recall that the code makes it very clear that the only business expenses that are deductible are those that are categorized as ordinary and necessary and this is an important part of the code as it relates to business. We would suggest that you consider that a similar rule of reason be applied to foundations so that the IRS agents in making their particular investigations could explore whether the expenses are in fact, ordinary and necessary or not for the operation of the foundation.

Senator BENNETT. You skipped No. 4.

Mr. PETERSON. I am sorry. I did not mean to. The tax accountants that were in the Arthur Andersen study said that in a few cases, Senator, it is possible—and this, incidentally, applies not to foundations alone but to any charitable gift—to give money to a charitable organization but to have an individual be the beneficiary of that contribution.

Perhaps this is most likely, sir, in a case where the institution in addition to being, for example, a religious institution also supports educational institutions. We do not think this is very frequent but the possibility exists where a charitable contribution is, in some part at least, really a payment for the education of an individual and we think you should take a look at that kind of problem.

Now, let us talk about auditing. Clearly with all the questions you and others have about foundations and the level of abuses, we think the first step to this problem is to be very precise and complete about the abuses that you wish to be limited. Then, I think it is extremely important that you also use the weapon and regulatory tool that you already have, which you very clearly use in the case of business corporations, which is, of course, very intensive IRS auditing.

Our study asked the foundations whether they had been audited or not and with what frequency over the last 10 years.

Here is what the question was:

> To the best of your knowledge, has the foundation been audited in the last 10 years or so by State officials or by the Federal Internal Revenue Service?

Only 34 percent of the foundations reported to us that they had been audited in the last 10 years by any Government agency, either State or local—only 8 percent by a State body, and 29 percent by the IRS.

We understand why the IRS with limited budget and with an understandable desire to focus its efforts where it can increase Federal revenues has perhaps not done this. On the other hand, I think it is very inconsistent if I may say so, and quite irrational at the same time, to have widespread doubts about the extent of certain abuses and on the other hand, not to use the regulatory tool that is available for this purpose.

You might be interested, for example, that in our interview of the Ford Foundation, even though it is the largest foundation by far, we find that it is now being audited for only the second time in its history. I do not wish to suggest by this that there is any improper behavior there. I simply use it by way of illustration to indicate that if this were a business institution of this relative size, you can rest assured that there would be very intensive auditing.

Our specific recommendation is the following: that all foundations will be audited at least once over the next 3 years. We know this will take a significant step-up in IRS activity. We know as some of you pointed out, that it will require additional personnel but it is our view that you gentlemen and the public need a period of time where you can find out what the level of abuses is, particularly when you have prescribed the kinds of abuses that should be prohibited.

The question has come up who should pay for such audits. You recall that the original proposal was a 7½-percent tax on income of foundations.

Our Commission would strongly oppose that provision for several reasons.

In the first place, I think I have demonstrated to you, and I will demonstrate shortly in greater detail, that the very substantial amount of money that flows out of foundations goes indeed to charitable organizations that have already been qualified by the IRS to receive individual contributions, to be specific 93 percent of foundation grants. It seems clear to me, therefore, that any significant tax on foundation income is in effect, a reduction in the amount of money that is going to charity at a time when these charitable organizations are having very serious problems.

If, as a matter of principle, you decide that you think that foundations should bear the cost of IRS supervision, we would argue as follows:

First, that you should take a 3-year period, announce this 100% auditing policy.

Second, that you should ask the Department of the Treasury and IRS to cost justify to you what these costs are and to set up an earmarked fund for this purpose. At the end of that period we think you will be in a better position to decide whether as a matter of long-term policy you want to charge a tax on the income of foundations.

Therefore, we would propose a fee for this purpose rather than a tax on the income.

Our Commission looked at State regulation. We have had many suggestions from many people, I think most of them well meaning, that resented the notion of too much Federal or IRS intervention in the foundation process. They suggested to us that the States should play a much more important role in the regulation of foundations.

We have looked thoughtfully, I hope, at State regulatory agencies and resources. We have looked at the personnel and staffs that they have. The fact that only 8 percent of these foundations have ever been audited by a State, I think, is some testimony to the fact that a very significant percentage of the States in this country at the present time do not have adequate staffs, and have not assigned a high auditing priority to the foundation area.

It is our view, therefore, that until there is a good deal more assurance of both adequate resources and motivation that shifting of the responsibility to the States would in effect be no regulation at all.

Senator ANDERSON. So, if the States do not do it and the Federal Government does not have time to do it, who does it?

Mr. PETERSON. I am suggesting, sir, that the IRS engage in 100 percent auditing over the next 3 years of all foundations. Our suggestion is that the IRS audit the foundations in this country on a much more intensive basis than they have done to date.

There have also been many people who have proposed to this Commission that we should rely on self-regulation. We are sympathetic to the notion that free institutions of this sort do flourish best with the least amount of regulation consistent with lack of abuse. Quite frankly, gentlemen, we have looked at the self-regulation effort. While we applaud it, while we think it is a step in the right direction, we are not persuaded at this time that it represents a sufficient percentage of the foundatiton world. Quite frankly, we are concerned that the people that would cooperate with such an effort are the people who in some ways need regulation the least. Therefore, while we applaud it as a long-term effort, we do not think at this time that self-regulation is sufficient as a way of getting at this problem.

Senator GORE. The fellow who needs regulation most is likely to be the last to self-regulate.

Mr. PETERSON. That is quite possible, sir.

Senator GORE. It is likely.

Mr. PETERSON. I now would like to talk about public disclosure because we think some new dimensions are required in public disclosure with regard to foundations.

You might be interested that when we asked these 750 distinguished citizens in the country what do you think are the right approaches for making foundations more accountable to the public, here is what they said. They said full public disclosure—58 percent, said this—is a very important way of regulating foundations. Following this were suggestions of full reporting and audits, increased Government regulatory activities. But it is clear that many Americans feel that public disclosure as in many fields, is an important, even though indirect regulatory process.

We have some specific recommendations in our report to make to you on public disclosure. I think there is a very important distinction between making information available in some technical or legal sense and really making it available so that the public is really aware of it.

Let me give you an example of this. At the present time foundations do report annually on a 990(a) form. They do report the sizes of their grants, their administrative expenses, the grants themselves. In many cases actually they list the grants. The fact that so little is known about foundations is perhaps testimony to the fact that these forms have not been widely referred to.

Why have they not been referred to? The experience of this Commission, I think, is revelant. We needed the 990A forms to draw a random sample of foundations across America. We found in order to get them we, as a number of private institutions, had to go to Philadelphia and look them up on microfilm. While our company sells microfilm and I support the medium, I do not feel one can argue the availability of centralized microfilmed source, and having to go to Philadelphia where it costs us $3 or $4 to get a copy, is adequate disclosure. Thus, we would like to recommend a change in public disclosure of foundations.

First, we would like to suggest that a major overhaul be made in the 990A form for several reasons. First, anybody in the business world understands that until you have uniform accounting standards, until it is clear what certain terms mean, then putting all the numbers together they by definition are meaningless because the original data had different meanings.

We are prepared to aid in such an effort because Peat, Marwick & Mitchell, the accounting firm in New York, have assigned some people to define meaningful terms in uniform charts of accounts for foundations.

Let me illustrate this. What do you mean by the value of an asset? Do you mean its cost or its market value? What do you mean by an administrative expense? And I can give you 20 different examples. But until you gentlemen can be assured that the original data has meaning that you can put your arms around, then it is quite possible that the reporting will not be as good as it should be.

We would also propose that the 990 form define the purposes of the grants in certain categories. I will show you in a moment that in our research we have some 15 categories of purposes for foundation grants. I would suggest that it is important for the country, and this is only partly responsive, I think, Senator Miller to your point, that the country know systematically what the allocation of foundation grants is. We think, therefore, that if the foundation forms reported the purposes of the grants, you could annually get a much clearer picture than you can get now as to the total allocation of those funds.

Third, in the investment activities, I am going to talk later about the investment returns and the investment practices of foundations, I think we have discovered enough in the course of our study to suggest that substantially more detailed reporting is suggested in the area of various kinds of investment transactions. We think the starting place in this effort is a very significant overhaul of the annual reporting form.

There is another concept of disclosure that we would like to talk about. As we have looked at several kinds of activities of foundations, and other charitable organizations that might be in sensitive areas, about which men of reason and good will might debate, it occurs to us that annual disclosure after the fact may be adequate. For example, if money has been used for quasi-political purposes that offer significant opportunity for abuse of the grantmaking activity, it might be argued that an after-the-fact handling of the situation is not adequate.

We would like to propose for your consideration, therefore a concept of not only annual disclosure, but instant disclosure on certain kinds of grants about which there is concern and about which public ventilation in advance could make a significant difference.

Let me illustrate this point. I know that some of you, for example, are sensitive about grants made to Government employees. I will show you in a moment that while that number is very small in terms of dollars, I can report to you in our study that a significant number of distinguished citizens in this country are concerned about grants made to Government employees. As a matter of fact, while in general these distinguished citizens opt for a great deal of freedom on the part of foundations to do a pioneering job, but in the area of grants to Government employees, partly, I think, as a result of some of the unfortunate incidents of recent years, there is some concern about this.

One can envision a process, for example, of instant disclosure of certain categories of grants such as these as being an important process that you might want to consider.

We would like to make a second broad recommendation in the area of grants. If you accept our premise that there are certain kinds of improper grants which should be prevented and stopped rather than simply reported and penalized after the fact, it is clearly important that some governmental unit shall have equity jurisdiction in order to act promptly to enjoin such activities. At the present time our Commission, and I would like to report to you that we have a couple of members who have outstanding legal backgrounds, Prof. Paul Freund, from Harvard, who many people consider one of the greatest authorities on constitutional law, and Edward Levi, current president of the University of Chicago, and dean of the law school prior to that, feel there is a great deal of ambiguity in the current situation with regard to who does have the equity jurisdiction to enjoin activities that are abuses of this sort.

One of our recommendations, therefore, is that you consider thoughtfully whether that equity jurisdiction should not be assigned to the Federal level. Dr. Freund tells us that he believes that there is adequate precedent here to allow such jurisdiction for specified purposes and still be completely constitutional. At the present time we think there is some considerable ambiguity about this legal authority. Taking this into combination with the fact that the only penalty now is to remove exemption we can clearly see why rarely does anyone move into these kinds of grants.

So, we are proposing disclosure in two senses. First, full public disclosure, not only statistically, but in annual public reports that are made readily available across the country, of the activities of foundations. For example, we think those reports should be indexed and abstracted, so, for example, anywhere in America where a given researcher or given institution wants to know who supports his kind of of activity, he can very quickly find out.

We also suggest for your consideration the concept, and we can go into more detail later on this if you would like, instant disclosure on certain kinds of grants about which there is concern; instant public disclosure, that is, and instant disclosure to people who are specifically involved and have jurisdiction.

On the question of penalties, this Commission agrees that the current situation is not defensible, since the only penalty currently is removal of the tax exemption of the institution. This is indeed a fatal remedy and is not likely to be imposed in any event without intensive audits. While it is true that in a few cases the tax exemption has been removed, it is also true that in many cases that is a remedy that seems far too severe. So, we would approve of a number of different kinds of sanctions and penalties because we think that is the way to make the whole system more responsive.

We have a few very brief principles we would like to articulate. First, we think if you approve a system of penalties the purpose should be to make charity whole, not to collect taxes for the Government. We think, therefore, that if a person has been enriched by virtue of his foundation activity, he should make the foundation whole to the degree of that enrichment so that charity has not been hurt by this particular abuse.

Second, we would urge that you be careful in applying fines in areas that by definition are ambiguous. I say this with some feeling because I think one of the great aspects of these private institutions is getting the leaders of our private sector to serve on the boards of these institutions. I think they provide a great deal of leadership and judgment to these activities. If one has an onerous system of fines, particularly in areas that are ambiguous, I think it could have a very chilling effect on getting the best citizens of this country to serve on foundation board of trustees.

Finally, we think the sanctions should be geared to the seriousness of the violation and whether it is willful or inadvertent. We do not think these distinctions are properly made in the current bill.

Now, could I move to the grant making activities of foundations because this is clearly a second abuse area that I know you are considering.

Let us look now at where foundations grant their money, and this is for the year 1968. As I reported earlier, you will see that 93 percent of the money goes to qualified charitable organizations of one type or another. You will see that this number is high in virtually all categories. I apologize for an error in community foundations. It is going to take us a week or two to straighten this out. Some of the recipients here have considered their bequests as a grant and we are sure that is what they mean. For the moment please exclude this group, you will see that most of the foundations give a very substantial amount of their money to qualified charitable organizations. Foreign organizations get about 1 percent of the total.

I want to discriminate here now between grants for international purposes and grants made to foreign organizations. I will cover in a moment how how much of the money goes for international purposes. What I'm showing you now are grants made directly to foreign organizations. Five percent of the money of foundations in our preliminary study goes to individuals. You will see that it is a larger number in the over $100 million class and in a moment I will show you what the distribution of those grants is.

But I think the fundamental point that we are trying to make here is that the substantial majority of grants are made to qualified charitable organizations and I might say now that the very substantial distribution of grants to individuals is made for scholarship programs of various types.

Now, let us talk about——

Senator MILLER. May I ask a question? In this analysis did you draw any distinction between grants and payouts which some people might regard as grants but which are treated as expenses?

Mr. PETERSON. As what?

Senator MILLER. As expenses?

Mr. PETERSON. Our handling of that problem, Senator, would be as follows:

We think one of the important functions that a foundation can do is to make a systematic professional evaluation of areas to spend money and of alternative grantees and programs. We would handle the problem, I think you are referring to, in the following way. You will recall we proposed a reasonable and necessary provision be put on the administrative expense of foundations and it not be allowed if it is unreasonable. We think any highly precise legislation is not an appropirate way of handling this. If it is reasonable, then it is part of the pay out.

Here we are talking about the grants of the foundations, the actual grants made.

Now, the purposes are shown in the written testimony. I am just going to show you here the broad categories.

First, education gets 36 percent of the total foundation grants in America. This is denfined as educational research, elementary, secondary, higher, et cetera. Health and medicine gets 25. General welfare—here what we are talking about is the community chest, the united fund, et cetera, 7 percent. Community action or services gets 7 percent. These are described as groups planning for community improvements of various kinds. Cultural organizations—here we mean museums, symphonies, activities of that sort. Religion—once again, you will see that only a small percentage of the foundation dollar goes into that area compared with private giving and you can see there listed all of the other categories.

I think it is of interest to see that one area that I know there is a great deal of interest in is the area of projects related to the political process. Obviously, this is a question of definition, but we asked the foundations to include voter registration, voter education of any kind, schools for political candidates, et cetera. I will elaborate on this a little later. Less than one-half of 1 percent of all grants goes for that particular purpose.

Senator ANDERSON. May I interrupt for just a second here. You talked about auditing.

Mr. PETERSON. What?

Senator ANDERSON. You talked about auditing a while ago. What do you propose for that?

Mr. PETERSON. One hundred percent auditing, over a 3-year period. That is, every foundation would be audited over a 3-year period, is our recommendation.

Senator FANNIN. And a continuing program?

Mr. PETERSON. What we are proposing is a 3-year intensive program with earmarked funds. We think at the end of that period you can be a great deal more informed than anybody possibly can be at the moment and at that point, I think you will be in a better position to decide what the ongoing program should be.

You might be interested in looking at the purpose of the grants by kind of activity. In general, what this makes clear is that educational grants are significantly more important in some of the larger foundations than in the smallest ones where education gets about 10 percent of the total. Health and medicine, on the other hand, you will notice is considerably more important for the smaller foundations than it is for the larger ones.

Also, general welfare is much more important for the smaller foundations. The reason for this, gentlemen, we think is that in the case of the smaller foundations in particular, the foundation is simply a way that these people channel grants that they would have probably largely made as an individual anyway. You know that community funds and united funds are a very important part of most local giving. Since most of these operations have a local character to them, you can see why they get a large percentage of the money.

You can go through our findings and study them as you will. I think it is interesting that even in the largest foundations, a very significant amount of the money is going to education, health, medicine, general welfare, and so forth, and a very small percentage for some of these other purposes.

We cannot help but be aware in the course of our studies that there is a great deal of interest in the amount of foundation money that is going for certain purposes about which there is concern, certain purposes that might have either a political or a so-called social change aspect to them. We thought you would be interested, therefore, in knowing what our best estimate is of how much money goes to these purposes. I list them here. Voter registration and education that I know has caused a good deal of interest and concern in some parts account for about two-tenths of one percent as best we can estimate it of the total foundation giving in this country.

The Ford Foundation, which I know has been identified with some of this activity, has given me permission to release to you what their total grants are in this area over a 3-year period. The total grants that they report to us during the past 3 years for voter registration, and we believe they are the, if not the largest, certainly a very significant part of the total, is $440,000 over a 3-year period. This is out of total annual grants of foundations of about a billion and a half.

Schools for political candidates, you can see, a very, very tiny number. We have only found one or two examples of that.

Grants to student organizations are minimal. Public policy studies account for about 1.9 percent. You can read those categories from the chart.

Grants to Government employees, I know, is a subject of interest. Here in the case of the Ford Foundation, grants to individuals employed by the Government or persons acting as assistants to the Government employees accounted for $123,000 over that entire 3-year period.

What we are trying to say, gentlemen, is that the grants for these purposes turn out to be substantially smaller than I would have to say some of us expected them to be.

Senator WILLIAMS. Therefore, if it is eliminated it will not bother anybody.

Mr. PETERSON. Well, that involves a judgment as to the value of some of these innovative activities which we believe should be performed somewhere in the society. We think it is an important function of this Commission to ventilate the incidence and importance of some of these activities.

In our earlier research we found many people feeling that a great deal of the money the foundations were spending was not going to charitable organizations, was going for other purposes, and all we are trying to establish here is that it is a very small number.

There has been a great deal of interest in the amount of money foundations spend for international purposes. I mean, for purposes that involve international activity. 90 percent of the dollars of foundations spent go to domestic projects and 10 percent go to foreign programs or projects and a very large percentage of this money has gone to Americans, we find, who engage in various foreign policy studies, scientific studies, research studies of various kinds, but they do these studies about another country.

The area of grantmaking to individuals which we have shown you accounts for about 5 percent of the total. You might be interested in knowing what those grants are. We asked them to specify in detail the purpose of grants to individuals. You will see here that 87 percent of the individual grants, which account for about 5 percent of total foundation grants, go for scholarships and fellowships, 5 percent for research, et cetera.

There is a category called travel and study grants that you are well aware of, and in this case about 2 percent of their grants to individuals go for that purpose.

What we are trying to suggest here is that the very substantial part of the individual grants goes to scholarship programs of various types.

Some of the current legislation that you are considering deals with this whole question of the legislative process and public issues. And our Commission has a fairly strong view about these two areas.

In the first place, there is this whole question of public policy studies which you probably know in the current legislation are pretty substantially limited, by using such words as foundation grants only for nonpartisan analysis and research, nor influencing legislation, etc. I think will have the effect of significantly chilling studies in the public policy area and it may even have some larger effect than that which I do not think are intended.

I would like to use our own Commission, if I may, as an example of this and ask you how you would interpret some of the current legislation. For example, such words as nonpartisan analysis and research that does not lead to the influencing of legislation.

I would submit to you, gentlemen, that I do not know how you can get a group of top people, hopefully well motivated people, to spend a lot of time studying an issue and not end up with specific recommendations. I certainly could not have attracted this group of talent with the limitation that their work would be analysis and research but that they would not be involved in the question of public policy recommendations. So, we think that——

Senator MILLER. May I ask a question here?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator MILLER. I used to go through that in connection with some activities I had and we drew the line between drawing conclusions and making recommendations. Now, I can see where you could make some conclusions based upon research and findings, draw some conclusions and then leave it to somebody else to make the recommendations and those conclusions and the findings and research could be invaluable. But I am wondering if you have given any consideration to cutting it off at conclusions and excluding recommendations.

Mr. PETERSON. We have, Senator, and if I may say so, I think I will stand on my earlier position. I think the higher quality the group is, particularly if they are private citizens, the less likely it is that they will not want to be restricted from participating in making recommendations.

I use this Commission as an example. I do not think this group of people could possibly have spent a large segment of their weekends for the last 7 months on any basis that restricts it in that way. And, as a matter of fact, I think the country wants and needs various kinds of public policy studies made by outside groups. In our view, this is a very important contribution that foundations can make and it is very hard to get money from other sources for this purpose.

In the cases where there is the potential for lobbyings which we would certainly understand, we think there, Senator Miller, instant disclosure and activities of that kind will take care of that but we are afraid that the current legislation would have a chilling effect on a very important aspect of foundation activity.

Senator HANSEN. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt a moment? There are some of us who have 12:30 luncheon engagements. I am very interested in the presentation that is being made by Mr. Peterson this morning. What are your thoughts as to——

The CHAIRMAN. I thought we would quit at 12:30 and come back at 2 o'clock, if that is all right with you.

That means you will be on your feet for 4 more minutes, Mr. Peterson. You will get a well deserved rest.

Mr. PETERSON. On the question of elective politics, we fully endorse the prohibition of foundation involvement in elective politics. There can be no question about that. We think some of the definitions that you find in the current bill are a bit restrictive. And we have some specific recommendations to make about that.

Senator, our next recommendation really in some ways is one of our most important ones which has to do with the suggestion that you consider a high payout requirement from foundations and I think that is such an important recommendation I would rather not split it in the middle, if that is agreeable with you.

The CHAIRMAN. Fine. You have been on your feet now for 2½ hours, Mr. Peterson, so we will give you a rest and be back here at 2:30.

Thank you very much.

(Whereupon, at 12:30 p.m., the hearing was recessed, to reconvene at 2:30 p.m., this day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Peterson, I would suggest you go ahead with your presentation to us. I hope we will have other Senators in as we go along, but we are voting and they are required to be in two places right now.

Mr. PETERSON. Thank you, Senator.

You will recall I started out by saying that there were really two problems that had to be thought about before you got to the problem of payout. The first problem was the prolem of financial abuses, self-dealing and so forth. We have told you what we would do with that problem.

The second problem is grants that are made for purposes that are not charitable. We have discussed ways of handling that. If in fact, as I think we have demonstrated, a great deal of the money does in fact go to charitable organizations, and if in fact we can handle the grant making abuses, then I think we can now come to the third problem, which is the question of how much does society and charity get out of the foundation, once the money has been put in.

Our position in short, gentlemen, is that we think foundations are valuable and an important American institution and we should be concerned about two things. First, putting more money into foundations, because there are important sources of money that will be put into a foundation that probably will not be given in other ways, and second being awfully sure you pull this money out of foundations into our society. So how do we achieve that?

Well, one way of looking at this is to assume for the moment that instead of $20 billion there are $25 billion or more of assets in foundations. Let us assume further that every percentage point that you get higher return on the investments in these foundations means $250 million a year more that is available to be given to charity. Two percent is a half billion dollars, 4 percent would be $1 billion more being available at a time when, as I hope we have demonstrated, many of these charitable organizations have got a real financial crisis.

Now the question is what is a reasonable return for someone to get on an investment. What can society reasonably expect? It is the view of this Commission that there are many many outside measures of what a reasonable return is, and we have shown several here.

You probably know, gentlemen, that there are a large number of balanced funds in America. These are funds that are made up of equity stocks as well as debt instruments and debentures of various kinds. In short, they are balanced to give you a fair amount of growth in the future, a fair amount of income and growth consistent with safety and security. These are the so-called balanced funds and it is the direction in which some of the more progressive pension plans and university endowment funds are moving.

For example, our company has a profit-sharing plan. It is the entire retirement plan for the employees. We have followed such a practice of balanced investment. The plan has been in effect for approximately 15 years and we have enjoyed about a 10-percent compounded return over the 15 years.

Senator MILLER. Is that based upon the fair market value of the assets?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator MILLER. Adjusted annually?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes, sir. Now, let us talk a little bit about return and what we mean by total return. It is the position of this Commission that there is only one way really to measure return in a really objective way, and that is to look at return from all sources. First, interest or dividends, in other words, income, capital gains that are realized, as well as capital gains that are not realized, and we would like to indicate why.

In the first place, if you deal only with realized capital gains, as the basis for determining income, you are going to obviously bias decisions in the direction of not selling a market security when perhaps it should be sold. In other words, if only after it is sold it is included in some payout requirement then there might be some incentives toward not selling and in some cases doing something that is not in the best interests of the foundation's portfolio.

To make a distinction between income and capital gains does not really make a good deal of sense to those of us on the Commission, simply because it is a tax exempt institution. It does not pay taxes on any kind of income, whether capital gains or interest, and therefore we think the total return is the way to look at this.

Incidentally, I think if you were to talk to most of the banks and pension plan people around the country, you would find that this new notion of total return is the way they look at the return on their investments.

What I am going to show you therefore, is total return which as I have said is about the only way it is measured by the people who measure this kind of thing. The balanced funds hit 9.2 percent on the last 10 years, and the 10 large general growth funds, these are largely equities rather than debt, have hit 15 percent compounded growth.

The reason, gentlemen, that we present this information to you is to make the point that we believe one needs an objective standard—and there are objective standards available that you gentlemen can look at of what people do independently invest their money, without any other considerations, are getting as a return on their money.

Let's take the year 1968. The reason 1968 is important for me to mention to you is that we computed the return as best we could from quite a number of 990 foundation returns, so that you gentlemen could compare the return in general with the return from foundations as such.

I would want to say at the outset that these data are not as good as we would like, because in some cases we are sure that they are not using market value. It may cause some inaccuracies. We would hope to have had more time to check into some of these, and better raw data, but again we used an outside accounting firm to look into it as best we could.

This is what this information tells us. This is how the total return to foundations in 1968 on their investments, by various sizes of foundations: this is the median return, 6 percent, 7 percent, 8 percent, 6 percent, 6 percent, depending upon the size of foundation you are talking about.

Senator MILLER. May I ask you a question?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator MILLER. Did I understand you to say that this rate of return was not based on fair market value or was based on fair market value?

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, what I meant to say was the following. There is some percentage of the 990 forms, I am not at all suggesting it is the majority, it is some percentage, is probably a rather small percentage, which are based on cost. By taking a median calculation, we think we have washed out a good deal of that effect. It is supposed to be recorded on market value on the 990 form, but in some cases it may not be.

Senator MILLER. You can see what a tremendous difference it would make if even a small percentage of those were based upon cost or book value compared to what the current market value might be.

Mr. PETERSON. And incidentally, in our detailed distribution of cases, Senator, you will see those cases way out at the extremes where it is clear that it was probably caused by their using a cost basis where they got a tremendous return. That is why we did not use an average return. We picked a median number that would be less susceptible to that effect.

Clearly then if these numbers are anywhere near right, and this is 1968, the rate of return is significantly lower than is true for investments in general * * * in other words, about half of what a typical balanced fund earned in 1968 (about 15%).

Now, we did another thing. We were able to get data that we think is quite reliable on 14 of the largest foundations, where we are quite sure the data are reported on a market basis, and Senator, we do not have the problems that you refer to.

In the case of those, the median return was about 8 percent, so once again we see a number that is significantly lower than it is for investments in general in 1938.

We have discussed this problem with a number of people who, unlike myself, spend their lives in this particular world of investments. I would say we get substantial confirmation that there is concern about whether the foundation investments are yielding the return that they could yield. I quoted here from an article in Institutional Investor, by a man that I am told is quite respected in the field.

He refers to the foundation's investment situation as "Foundations the Quiet $20 Billion." The point he makes is the following. He says:

> Is there a place as yet untouched by the revolution in money management, where the winds of performance are not felt, where the opportuning cries of ambitious brokers are not heard? A last redoubt so quiet that the clocks can be heard ticking? There is such a place and it is called foundation land. Their tax exempt is $20 billion, one of the bigger pools of capital in capitalism and it is still run the way that money used to be, the way it used to be that is for widows and orphans before currency began to depreciate.
> In foundation land the verities are preservation of capital and yield. The managers do not often buy their stocks because they already have them. They were given them many years ago, and now they sit quietly watching.

This article also refers to a study by the SEC which I have not seen, but which apparently indicates that the turnover of stocks in a group of foundations they looked at is in the range of only 1 to 2 percent. We have interviewed some investment experts who operate balanced funds as well as other kinds of funds. They report to us that a more typical stock turnover for funds who are engaged in optimizing their total return would be a number significantly larger than that. I have heard numbers that range from a minimum of 10 percent and many tell me 20 percent stock turnover and even above.

Now, one can only speculate as to what the reasons are for this low turnover. Certainly one of the reasons is that a good deal of the stock in foundations is often in controlled stock and perhaps it has not been considered appropriate by these foundation managers to trade these securities.

Others point out that getting a high return has not been considered a top priority of some foundations, and they simply have not spent a good deal of time on this problem. In some cases the legal instruments that drew up the foundations prohibit the sale of certain securities.

In short, the Commission has received expert advice on this point from many many people. We would certainly be the first to say that the investment performance deserves very detailed additional study by people who indeed can go in and can get the actual data on investment practices of the foundations. However, from any standpoint we have been able to look at foundation investment performance, we have to conclude that the investment performance is sub-par, and that the cost to society of this sub-par performance could amount into the hundreds of millions and perhaps billions of dollars as I have indicated earlier, annually.

We would welcome and we would encourage not only the new public reporting techniques that we mentioned earlier, but also additional information on trading of stocks which would enable you gentlemen in the future to look at this investment problem much more systematically than we have been able to do it so far.

Now, let us talk about the second part of this equation, which is the payout to charity from these investments, which is more of a short-term question. How much is society getting now out of this investment? Over the long term, society has a deep interest in the total return on investment. Over the shorter term we have an interest in how much is coming out now?

This is something that we are in a position to measure a little more accurately. Once again we took a very substantial variety of foundations from the 990 A forms, and I will show you now the payouts to charity from the foundation.

Now, here, Senator Miller, is where we have the opposite effect, to the extent that cost is used as a basis for determining value, the payout factor is obviously less than this number we are reporting, not higher than this.

What we show here, gentlemen, is in each size category of foundation what the payout is: 4.8 percent, 4.9 percent, 5.7 percent, 5.2 percent, and 22½ percent in the case of company foundations. The reason for this high figure for company foundations is that they are much more likely to be conduits to which the company puts in money quite frequently. Also it comes out much sooner than it does in many other kinds of foundations, based on earnings, for example, in a given year.

I would like to emphasize, therefore, that to the extent that the cost basis is the one that has been used for the assets, this payout number if anything is high rather than low. In any event, it is quite clear that it is a number substantially below what a decent return by an independent third party would probably have settled for during this period.

Now, we have done one other thing that may be of interest to you. We have determined what the payout percentage is for foundations in our sample and this payout goes all the way from zero to much higher numbers. We found that about a third of the foundations pay out less than 4 percent on the assets that they report.

The very substantial majority of the Commission believes two things. First, that society should receive a significant current benefit to charity, particularly at a time when, as I have demonstrated earlier, the charitable organizations of this country are facing very important financial problems.

Secondly, we believe foundations should be encouraged to make reasonable and productive investments of their funds, so that over the long term amounts can be earned in foundations that are comparable to what could be earned in our society generally by people that invest money independently.

How would one go about assuring himself that society does get a payout currently to charity? We have approached it, gentlemen, in the following way.

We have said that over the last 40 years or so the rate of inflation has been about 1.6 percent, and over the last 10 years or so it has been higher than that, about 2 percent. Now, if the objective were one of saying that with reasonable investments one were to maintain the purchasing power of the assets that remain in the foundation, one way of thinking about this problem is to say; First, this is the total return that a reasonable man could get. Here is the amount that represents inflation. Subtract the inflation adjustment from the total payout and come out with an annual payout figure.

Now, if in this kind of a situation you were to accept the notion that a balanced fund did represent a prudent and yet progressive way of looking at investments, and you will recall that that number is in the range of 10 percent compounded growth. You can do a good deal better than that, but I think that is a fairly balanced number. We would arrive therefore at a payout number that would take some number like 10 percent subtract out of the inflation effect, perhaps a little bit due to the fact that you have to keep some money liquid in most foundations, and come up with a payout factor in the range of 6 percent to 8 percent under current conditions.

Now, we would strongly advise against your legislating a specific number because clearly this is something that requires looking at every few years. If the returns were to go up significantly, it could be changed upward. If they went down it could be changed downward over a several year period. We think the Secretary of the Treasury is perhaps the appropriate place to lodge such a rulemaking procedure.

Senator WILLIAMS. Based on today's analysis what would you suggest that be?

Mr. PETERSON. The return over the last 10 years is about 10 percent, Senator, from balanced funds. Our Commission, the very substantial majority of us came out between 6 and 8 percent, which allows something for inflation. Frankly, which end of the scale you pick depends a little bit on how important you think current problems of charity are in society compared to long-range problems.

I indicate in the testimony that my view is the following.

Having looked at these Chicago charitable organizations, having looked at the budget problems they have, having looked at the tough future that they face, and believing as I do in the enormous importance of private funding, I would tend to opt toward the higher end of that particular range, because I believe that it is important that society does receive a current payout.

Senator WILLIAMS. That is a payout of 8 to 10 percent?

Mr. PETERSON. No, my payout would be toward the high end of 6 to 8, because I do think that you can allow for inflation, which is a couple of percent, so my number might be in the 7 to 8 percent range.

Others on the Commission might be in the 6 to 7 percent range, but the point is that most of us are certainly agreed that a high payout principle does make sense.

Senator WILLIAMS. The 5 percent rate you think should be raised even?

Mr. PETERSON. That is right. We think it should be higher, Senator.

Senator FANNIN. Mr. Peterson, didn't you say that you would not recommend legislation in this regard? Would you recommend legislation where you would have flexibility?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator FANNIN. With the limits?

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, what I would do is the following. I would recommend that you legislate that the Secretary of the Treasury be given the authority every few years to call in relevant experts in the field of investments, endowment funds, pension funds, balanced funds et cetera, determine what in his view is what a prudent and reasonable man would do if it were his job to invest this money. If you would accept my formulation that a balanced fund is a pretty prudent thing to do, it is not too conservative and it is not too aggressive, he could reassess that number every few years and set it and you would define the principles, but not the specific number.

Our purpose in picking a number now is to simply say from what we have seen, it would be a number in that range.

Senator MILLER. Suppose the Secretary set 7 percent, and a year later a foundation finds that because of maybe some antitrust activities directed against the corporation in which it owns the stock, that the corporaion has lost money, so it does not have any money to pay out dividends to the foundation. There certainly would have to be some discretion given to the Secretary so that he would not be stuck with that percentage from year to year until he revised it, shouldn't there?

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, I will discuss very shortly some flexibility that we would suggest you put into it, but first if you do not mind, I would like to lay out the reasons we think a high payout approach is in the best interests of society, and quite frankly, though some may not agree, in the best interests of foundations as well.

In the first place, it results in a substantial benefit to charity at a time when everything we know tells us that more money is desperately needed in the charitable sector.

Secondly, I do not know how you can legislate to tell a foundation to improve its investment practices, but I think it would be a very interesting and indirect incentive to such investment practices if, over a period of time, the payout were substantially larger than the return, and it was necessary as it obviously would be to divest of some of the assets that they have. I think this might be quite an effective incentive to improving their investment return.

Third, the disposition of controlled stock is an extraordinarily important question as our review of the data have established.

The House bill, as you gentlemen know, takes the view that the disposition of this stock in 5 years and in some cases 10 is required. Now, as we step back and look at the fact that a great deal of the important money in this country is necessarily earned through the increase in value of company stocks, we think anything that is that harsh will have the effect of proving to be a disincentive to charity, because these men will not be inclined to put control stock into foundations.

Now, we believe, therefore, that the public interest is not best served when one spends perhaps too much time questioning precisely what the motives of the man were in putting the stock into the foundation. Frankly, gentlemen, if one is going to spend too much time questioning motives in all kinds of activity in life, and certainly in philanthropic giving, it is clear there are many motives, many reasons why people give money to all kinds of charitable institutions. Except for Saints, I doubt there is much of a pure motive. It usually involves a mixture of motives.

What we are saying is the following. That if you are satisfied that the abuses have been taken care of, and we think you can be satisfied, if you are satisfied that the noncharitable grants have been stopped, then I think it is in the best interests of the society to encourage the formulation of foundations, but to set up a performance factor of foundation payout to society rather than any speculation about what the motives are.

It is for this same reason that we strongly oppose the restrictions on appreciated property to foundations. We think they are punitive. We think they are potentially disastrous to the birth rate of new foundations. In short, gentlemen, if you pull out money from the foundation and if you do not give encouragement to setting up new ones, then you will only have assured a heavy death rate of a valuable institution. The substantial majority of the assets put into foundations are appreciated property.

We asked the large donors who set up foundations what would be the effect of several of these provisions on their setting up a foundation. Now, what we found here is the following.

Sixty-three percent of the large donors who are the kind of people that I demonstrated earlier set up foundations indicated that this appreciated property provision "would lead me not to want to set up a foundation at all." Twenty-five percent said it would lead to give less and 12 percent say "have no effect."

You can see that the appreciated property restrictions have critical effect upon the setting up, and putting of more money into, foundations.

The tax on income of foundations obviously has some effect in setting up new foundations but not as serious an effect as the appreciated property restrictions. The effect of the distribution equivalent of 5 percent of the assets is as follows:

Sixty-three percent said it would have "no effect on my giving" at all, 24 percent indicated it would lead them not to want to set up a foundation, and 13 percent said "lead me to give less."

So I think one of the key points I want to make is the appreciated property provision as well as the control stock restriction in the House bill would have a very serious damaging effect on the setting up of new foundations and more important would reduce charitable giving.

Now, what is the relevance of payout requirement to this perpetuity problem that we have heard a deal about? There are people in the society who take the position that they are concerned about the perpetual existence of foundations. You have heard some of the concern. There are those who have suggested that we put a life on foundations of a fixed limit. We have heard many suggestions that one has a 20-year fixed life on foundations, or a 25-year life.

We question whether that is a good idea; putting a fixed life on the foundation. In the first place, this does not discriminate between foundations that perform well and those that do not perform well.

Secondly, we are convinced it will have the effect of seriously discouraging the setting up of new foundations.

Third, I think as this testimony and as others have established, trying to define the difference between various kinds of charitable organizations is indeed a serious problem, and putting fixed life on foundations we think has the effect of being antiphilanthropic in its total impact of setting a precedent for legislating the life of charitable organizations.

On the other hand, I do think we understand the concern of people who wonder whether a foundation having a perpetual life is justified, if in fact its performance and its contribution to society is not by some objective standard a substantial one.

Let us look now at the high payout requirement and see how perhaps that might, in a more natural way, take care of this particular problem. In the first place, it is clear that if a foundation keeps its assets in very low return situations, and that you gentlemen agree to put a significant payout factor on the foundation, this will in effect mean, because they will have to divest themselves of their assets in order to meet the payout requirement, that over a period of years there will be a certain number of foundations who will go out of existence.

One, then, has to ask the question why is the return low? Why isn't the return at a level where this is not necessary to do, inasmuch as we would set a flexible standard where it would be set at a level that a reasonable man could earn that kind of money.

Clearly one of the reasons that the return would be low would be a reason that might have to do with the nature of the holding that the foundation has, and perhaps the unwillingness of the donors, for reasons that appear I am sure reasonable and good to them, not to invest in other kinds of investments.

Now I think in those cases, if one is going to ask the question what is in the benefit of charity, what is in the benefit of society, we probably have a pretty interesting example of mixed effects, where there is some of this insisting on having your cake and eating it, too.

There is no question that a payout requirement of this sort will have an effect on these foundations, where there is close control with company stock, and where the donors do not wish to invest the stock in reasonable return situations.

I think the judgment of this Commission is the following. If one does not put an objective test of payout on foundations, he then is left with arbitrary rules of the type I think you see in the current House bill, that says in effect get rid of the stock in 5 years, get rid of it in 10 years, and in my opinion that will have a very serious negative effect on the putting in of stock into charitable purposes such as foundations.

The reason for such a payout rule is twofold. First, we believe the problem has a legitimate concern about the payout to society and charity, secondly, and quite important, I think there are important policy considerations here of to what extent considerations such as controlling companies should play in an institution that has already gotten a deduction for charity.

Our approach we think, while it may seem harsh to some at least puts an objective measurement of performance and payment to charity into this equation.

We certainly would not want to seem unfriendly to foundations where company stock is important because many have made great contributions. We would want to be awfully sure that the Treasury tried to be quite flexible in how it dealt with this payout requirement. We would like to suggest two or three things here for your consideration.

It may well be that provision should be put into the bill that makes it possible for the foundation to sell back the stock that it may have to dispose of in order to make its payout contribution to charity at a fair market price to the donor's family. So that there cannot be any destructive self-dealing aspect, we think this could be easily handled by a special provision in the law, so that you can be sure that that price is an independently-arrived-at price.

Another thing that could obviously happen to the companies that desire not to distribute their stock, for a variety of reasons, is to recapitalize those companies in a way in which the equity that was placed in the foundation had a high yield.

For example, one might put into the foundation a debenture of some sort, or a preferred stock or something of that sort that had considerably higher payout than the common stocks have. I am not saying this is easy. I am saying it is another possibility.

Another possibility still is to have the Internal Revenue Department be given administrative authority where in situations of unusual difficulty, they might be given more time in order to handle this divestment.

But we think the principle that we should stick to is that foundations should be treated alike with regard to what the payout is to society, and if, for example, there is no way of divesting of the stock in less than 5 years, that at that time the requirement should be that you make up the previous 5-year payout to charity so that all of them are treated alike.

Senator WILLIAMS. To make these payments would you give consideration to the fact that they may be able to give their stock as a charitable contribution?

Mr. PETERSON. That is another possibility, Senator. The problem, of course, is if a person does not want to distribute his stock, for reasons of control, he of course will not be attracted by any of these proposals, but that is clearly another possibility, that he does distribute the stock.

Still another possibility is that the foundation, for example, might merge itself into another foundation. You have heard of the community foundations that I mentioned earlier. In many ways these are collections of a number of trusts and smaller foundations, that have been put together. One, I believe, could visualize that kind of a situation in which this stock might not be sold but the foundation could meet the payout from other funds.

I am not saying, gentlemen, that this problem is easy in any sense of the word. I am simply saying that as we have looked at this as private citizens, and as we have tried to imagine that every person got the same deduction when he put the stock into the foundation, we think there is something to be said for an operational objective test for payout to society.

The effect of this provision on additional amounts to charity incidentally cannot be guessed at quite as precisely as I would like, but if you will go through my assumptions, I can give you a rough idea.

Let us assume there indeed are $25 billion worth of market value of foundation, and let us assume as our studies indicate that a significant number are paying out in the range of 3, 4, 4½ percent. A payout at this particular level would probably add at least a half billion dollars and perhaps a billion dollars annually to charity at a time when I think most of us feel the needs are quite serious and important.

The CHAIRMAN. It might add how much to charity did you say?

Mr. PETERSON. Well, what you have to do, Senator, to answer that question accurately——

The CHAIRMAN. I just want you to repeat what you said, Mr. Peterson.

Mr. PETERSON. I think our people would say a half billion dollars to $1 billion a year.

The CHAIRMAN. So if we follow the recommendation that you are making here for a higher payout, and you think that is practical, you do not think that is an undue burden on them, although some may find it a burden, you think that we would increase the amount of money that charity would receive by more than a half billion dollars a year?

Mr. PETERSON. I think it is quite possible, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, if we do that should it not allay the fears of some of those who came here speaking for the charities and speaking for the universities saying that they needed more money, not less?

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, the needs of the charitable organizations as I see it are growing at an extremely high rate. The estimates we have on 1975 needs, I am almost hesitant to name the size of the dollar gap, but it turned out to be a number in the $35 to $45 billion deficit arena, that is $35 to $45 billion more money that is going to be needed for these charitable organizations. One of the reasons I recommended a whole new look at tax incentives is that the amount of money that charitable and education needs are such that I think our discussion should not be on whether this half billion dollars makes up for some other half billion dollars but can we come up with a way where we can pump several billion dollars of new private money into this sector. Long term, Senator, I am convinced that it is going to take Government money anyway, and that the private sector route is a more efficient way of doing it.

The CHAIRMAN. But you just came up with an estimate and that if these foundations were required to make a high payout, charity, and I am sure you included education—

Mr. PETERSON. Oh, my, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Charities, including education, would receive somewhere between $500 million and some higher figure you named.

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the higher figure that you named?

Mr. PETERSON. I said a half billion dollars to $1 billion.

The CHAIRMAN. So if we do what you think we ought to do, and raise the required payout, then it is your judgment that education and charity would receive somewhere between $500 million and $1 billion more, not less?

Mr. PETERSON. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the kind of thing that some of us have been interested in hearing. You are saying that as one who is sympathetic to the foundations I take it?

Mr. PETERSON. I am very sympathetic to foundations.

The CHAIRMAN. And you do want more foundations, not less?

Mr. PETERSON. But I would also say, Senator, that I think the needs of charitable organizations are moving at such a rate that half a billion dollars more or less is not the kind of problem we are talking about. What I am saying is that I think new incentives are needed for this segment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right, but as I understand it though, you are not trying to get people to go out of the foundation business. You want more people in it. But you also think if they were run the way they should be run and you have made a study now of several thousand of them, that charity and education would receive somewhere between $500 million and $1 billion more than they are presently receiving.

Mr. PETERSON. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. And frankly that is in line with what I have been thinking about this subject. If we pursue a wise policy, we are not going to hurt education and charity, we will help them. I do not want to hurt education or charity. I do not think anybody does. I do not think anybody on this committee does.

Mr. PETERSON. You might wonder why I say I think it is in the best interests of the foundations, because I am sure you will find many who disagree with that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you this: Is it not true that you were urged to make this study by quite a few people who are connected with some of the better regarded foundations in America?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes, sir, it is true. The reason, I think that this is in the best interests of the foundations, though it may not be a popular move in the short term, is the following. In the first place I think these hearings have made very clear that there is not much understanding, not much of a public constituency for foundations, they are not a very well understood phenomenon in our lives.

I think anything that gets them helping society more and putting more money into charity will increase the acceptance of foundations.

Secondly, I think the high payout factor will encourage them a great deal to earn a higher yield on the assets they have. As I have indicated to you, $25 billion is a great deal of money. An extra 2, 3 or 4 percent yield will not only pay out more money now, Senator, but long term will add a great deal of money to charity, and I think that the high payout route is an interesting way of giving them that incentive.

Third, I think the payout rate has this virtue of avoiding dealing with problems of motives, of control stocks and so forth, in an arbitrary way where you have an arbitrary rule and say get rid of the stock in 5 years, which I think will be very antiphilanthropic. It at least says "We are not going to worry about your motives. We are going to be concerned with your performance and your contributions to society," and it puts everybody on an equal basis.

In that sense I think it is a desirable thing for foundations as compared to the other approaches I have seen. It is certainly a more desirable alternative than telling a foundation that it has got to go out of existence in 20 years, which is another way that people have decided to get at this perpetuity problem that I mentioned.

Senator WILLIAMS. As I understand it, the higher payout that you are suggesting is on private foundations and not related to the operating foundations?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes, this is on so-called private grantmaking foundations. Incidentally, one of the small suggestions we make, and perhaps you might be willing to accept this suggestion, is I think the words "private foundation" is an extraordinarily unfortunate word.

Senator WILLIAMS. I agree with you.

Mr. PETERSON. Because the word "private" implies that it is still this person's money. I think we would suggest a word like "philanthropic foundations" to put the emphasis where we think it belongs, that the purpose of these institutions was to help philanthropy, and that there is too much of this feeling that it is "my" money to handle. I think the more emphasis you put on charity and philanthropy the better off this entire movement is going to be.

Senator WILLIAMS. What I was thinking about is there are operating foundations like Williamsburg and you would not want to liquidate an operating charitable organization such as that?

Mr. PETERSON. You have to come up with definitions. Our definition, Senator, of a foundation is essentially a grantmaking institution, not an operting institution.

Senator WILLIAMS. That was my understanding.

Mr. PETERSON. That is right.

We have one final recommendation, Senator.

Senator MILLER. Before you get to that may I ask a question?

I understand that you think that the 5-year or 10-year divestiture rule would be harsh, but if you are going to permit these foundations to hang on to this low payout stock for 5 or 10 years, then how long are we going to have to wait before a charity can get this extra half million dollars that you are talking about?

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, I guess I was not understood. I would not permit foundations to hold on to this stock. I would simply say that you set a requirement for what you think the amount is that has to be paid out, and every foundation meets that requirement. If the stocks cannot be converted to stocks that earn a higher yield, then a high payout requirement does require some divestment, and the amount of the divestment, sir, is computed in the following way:

If, for example, somebody has got a yield of 4 percent or something of that sort, he will have to divest a certain amount of the stock in order to hit the total yield of say 7%.

Senator MILLER. I understand that, but I had the impression that you would not be proposing to put this into effect overnight, that there was going to be a transition period, and I am just wondering how long that transition period is going to be. I am sure you will not say starting in 1970 you have got to meet this payout requirement, and I am wondering how long you are going to permit the transition, and how many years it will be before that half billion dollars would be achieved?

Mr. PETERSON. Well, even for the moment if you were to make exceptions for company control situations, clearly you would get an immediate impact from the 50 percent of the foundations so that they have got nothing to do with that phenomenon obviously.

Secondly, I think one could argue that this is an important enough concept that you might decide that it will take some time for these foundations to readjust their portfolios, to go back to their indenture agreements and make changes and so forth.

If you are asking a personal opinion, I would wonder whether this should be any extended period of time. I think a period of 6 months or a year or perhaps the beginning of 1971 or something of that sort, which gives them an opportunity to make one of these new arrangements we talked about, might be appropriate. I would worry, I think, Senator, about waiting as long as 5 to 10 years in order to make that determination.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Mr. PETERSON. Thank you.

I would like now to move on to our final recommendation. We think it is an important one. This experience, gentlemen, has told us that very little is known about many of our charitable organizations, that very little is known about their problems and their needs, very little is known about incentives to giving, and why people give, how they might be induced to give more at lowest cost and so forth.

We would like to suggest that you consider that a quasi-government board be set up, one of whose very important purposes would be to represent the philanthropic sector of our society.

We have considered whether you should have a new agency that regulates philanthropy in the government. We have decided against a new agency for philanthropy, for two reasons.

In the first place, we think the much more rigorous auditing that we have recommended can be done within the existing structure, namely the Internal Revenue Service.

In the second place, our experience with government agencies suggests that in general they do have a tendency, I believe, to create new problems, to perpetuate their own existence. If there is one aspect of our lives where I would like to suggest that privacy and freedom should be preserved, it is in the private charitable sector, because this is probably the most free and private sector we have. Therefore we do not feel there should be a government agency.

On the other hand, we propose the notion of something we call the Philanthropic Policy Board, this would be made up largely of very top private citizens, the substantial majority. They would be approved perhaps by the Senate, perhaps appointed by the President, but this group would have a quasi-public status in the following way:

They would have full access to the information that can only be gotten at the present time from the Federal Government and from the revenue sources. They would be able to answer some of the questions that I cannot answer today, because I do not have access to that kind of information. They would also do the following:

They would report to Congress, to the President and to the country once a year on the state of philanthropy in America. They would provide public reports, in which all the statistical information, much of which is not available today would be made available to the public, so that we would not, in the future, find ourselves in the kind of information vacuum that I think exists today about charitable organizations.

It would make sure that information was available across the country about foundations, about other kinds of charitable organizations, and I should amend something I said earlier, Mr. Chairman.

The Foundation Center should be commended for the fact that they are making available in a few cities, New York, Washington, and elsewhere, 990 forms and other kinds of information, but it should be made much more widely available than it has been made, and this Philanthropic Policy Board could see to that.

This group could look at some of the really difficult problems that we have not had a chance to look at. I would like to enumerate these. I mentioned that I think not enough attention has been given to a new kind of tax incentive that would meet all of our requirements for philanthropy, that was equitable, that was not tax avoidance, that did produce more money, that did spread the giving among more people. This is the kind of a group that could be involved in reviewing that kind of policy.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you suggest what that should be, Mr. Peterson?

Mr. PETERSON. What?

The CHAIRMAN. What that tax incentive should be?

Mr. PETERSON. What I did say, Senator, was that every tax expert we have talked to agrees this problem has not received a great deal of attention. Everybody agrees it needs Treasury data, and everybody that I have talked to would be delighted to work on such a project, and some of the people in Treasury have told me that they would love to have an assignment of that sort. I recommend you to ask somebody to do it.

Senator MILLER. Mr. Peterson, on that point could you give us a comment on what Senator Curtis was getting at this morning? Some people from the charitable groups here have at least privately suggested that instead of increasing the optional standard deduction from $1,000 to $1,200 or $1,400, that we keep it at $1,000 but in addition to that then allow them to add on their charitable contributions.

Mr. PETERSON. That is one of the ideas that we have discussed. I am obviously not a tax technican but I will tell another idea that has been proposed to us that we have simply not had the time to look at seriously.

The theory of the idea is the following, Senator Miller. There is some feeling that there is some level of giving that will take place in the country without a great deal of incentive. The feeling is, for example, that much of the money you and I and others give, to churches in particular, for example, and various kinds of Boy Scouts and activities of that sort, we would give without the benefit of significant incentive.

If one of our objectives is to get the highest level of giving at the lowest cost to government, one of the tax experts we talked to thought that one approach that might be thought of might be actually to set a low level deduction, much in the way that we set medical deductions, but to set that at a very low number. Above that number, in order to give more and more people an incentive to give, you get quite generous in the kind of an incentive you could give. The feeling is that you would get into society a substantial amount of the money you are already getting, but that you would increase the level of giving, which we as a group think is important.

There are some other questions, Senator, that we think such a group should look at. I have said very little about the role of States in charitable organizations. We find there is quite a quagmire of confusion about this. I have already pointed out to you that there is little regulation of charitable organizations in general and in particular of foundations at State levels.

I am not a lawyer, but I am told by the best lawyers we have that there is an enormous variation between one State and the next with regard to laws dealing with charitable institutions. This presents great problems in regulation and suggests uniform codes.

I mentioned earlier that we recommended that you should consider giving the Federal courts equity jurisdiction to be able to move into some of these cases where there are abuses and enjoin them in certain kinds of grants. This is a kind of problem that I think a group like this could look at because it would require a national cooperative kind of effort.

We would like to see a group like this look at basic tax law definitions, which define the areas that are entitled to tax deduction. One of the things, for example, that such a group might do is annually look at the Internal Revenue rulings which, after all, are the place where decisions are made as to whether some activity or organization is charitable or whether it is not charitable for tax purposes.

We think a group like this, much like our group, but which is devoted to this over a period of time, might be able to make a real contribution to you in the whole arena of philanthropy and charitable organizations.

Another problem that we have discovered as we have looked at charitable institutions, is the great confusion about what the role and responsibility of the trustees is. One of the things that worries us a bit about some of these penalties that are being talked about is we have not yet really defined very well for many of our charitable organizations what the responsibilities of trustees are.

I think you will agree with me that in the case of business institutions there is a clearer understanding of what the responsibilities are. We find a fair amount of cloudiness in charitable institutions in this regard.

What I think is really important is for this philanthropic policy board to nurture the private philanthropic sector, which is one of the things that makes this country what it is. This whole philanthropic sector has, in our view, been inadequately represented, and I think this whole tax and legislative situation that we are now experiencing makes this clear. And we would urge you to consider setting up a group, largely of private citizens, but with total access to Government information, to advise perhaps on an annual basis their recommendations on many of the problems that we are now talking about today.

Let me just summarize very briefly if I may, Senator, and we can move on. The first thing I have tried to say I think is that everywhere we look, the needs of charitable organizations are going up dramatically, and we would like to urge you to reaffirm to the country and reaffirm through your tax policy that what you really want is to encourage people to give more of their money and themselves.

We would urge you to look at the current House bill and ask yourselves what the effect of this bill is on charitable giving. I have verified that very few estimates now exist on that effect. I think it is terribly important that you determine as best you can what the effects are, because I do not think there are many people who really want to see these terrific charitable organizations have even more serious problems a year from now than they do now.

On the question of tax equity, with regard to charitable giving, I would like to urge you gentlemen to consider the possibility of defining very specifically those cases where people make money off of charity, and specifically preclude those from happening; over-evaluation of property, giving farm products such as wheat and all of the various other things that you are aware of. I think you can do that without discouraging charity in general, which I think most people would not want to do.

As far as foundations are concerned, I think this experience has taught us a great deal. I think it has said to us that there are a lot of misconceptions that exist about foundations, and that by and large most of what they do, most of the money that they give, is to purposes that the vast majority of the country thinks are desirable.

We think the abuses that have been talked about can be easily handled through a much more intensified auditing program. We think it is possible to identify the grantmaking abuses, and if you will agree with us on the setting up of equity jurisdiction in the courts, I think, Senator, you may have been out when I suggested that for certain kinds of abuses, for example, grants that are in certain sensitive areas, it is not enough to penalize somebody for that. We would like to see it instantly disclosed and prevented, and the only way you can prevent it is to have equity jurisdiction in the courts so that it can be enjoined. These questions are so delicate, they require a judicial appraisal of the circumstances, not just one of two circumstances. You and I know trying to define what is meant by educational and what is means by political, for example, is not something that you can do easily. This is something that requires, in my view, a judicial process in order to make a balanced judgment.

If you will get very tough and specific on abuses, if you will clarify the kinds of grantmaking abuses in this noncharitable area that you are concerned about, then we would like to see you adopt a policy, if you do those things, of encouraging the setting up of foundations.

Now, the current House bill provisions I think will have a highly destructive effect on new foundations. First, the practical elimination of appreciated property as a contribution, the provisions on control stock will in my opinion have an enormously damaging effect.

You might wonder why you have not heard a lot of testimony about that. I think there is an understandable reason. I think the testimony you have heard tends to come from existing foundations. The kind of concerns that a Commission like ours has is the total and the longer term picture, the new ones as well as the old ones and we are convinced those effects could be very serious indeed.

Now, with regard to foundations, once you have adequate disclosure, and I cannot overemphasize how public reports, and in some cases instant disclosure will have quite a positive effect, then we would like to focus your attention to the very important question of how much money gets paid out to charities. I think, gentlemen, if you could be satisfied that a good deal of money was coming out, and that it was being spent on purposes that most Americans thought were desirable purposes, that you would probably want to encourage the setting up of foundations, and that all of these things have to be looked at in our opinion as an overall package.

Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for all the hard work you have done on this thing, Mr. Peterson. I know you have worked diligently to bring us information, needed information. I did want to ask you several questions to the extent that you might have the information.

It occurred to me that to the extent that a foundation deposits money in a bank and that bank in turn loans money to people, it is not likely you would come across that in the study you are making. Did you try to get at that?

Mr. PETERSON. We did. Senator, at the present time foundations are required to report certain kinds of transactions. I reported earlier on the level of those various kinds of transactions.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us say if a foundation keeps its money in the First National Bank, and the First National Bank in turn, not as a condition of the loan but they just find it good business, seeing that this man has the power to withdraw that money from that bank if he wants to, he would like to have them make a loan to his son-in-law, is that something that you would be likely to come across in the study you made?

Mr. PETERSON. We did find this much. Under the current regulations, you are to report whether you did or did not borrow money directly from the foundation. That happened in about 1 and a half percent of the cases where there was some kind of transaction of that sort. The indirect thing you are talking about we would not have uncovered.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I was thinking. If his son or Aunt Sue or somebody borrowed the money, it would seem to me you would not come across that?

Mr. PETERSON. That is true though, isn't it, Senator, of a lot of situations other than foundations? For example, I suppose it could be argued that banks would consider some of these other relationships in many of the loans they make.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes, I understand that. Now, in a similar vein, did you attempt to uncover the situations where a person on behalf of a foundation makes a large grant to a university and the university gives a scholarship to his son or one of his relatives?

Mr. PETERSON. Yes, we mentioned that Arthur Andersen & Co. reporting to us possible abuses; that one of them that was reported by several of the tax accountants anonymously, did cover the situation where in particular religious institutions, I do not mean to pick on a religious institution, which also has a school, there can be occasions where a grant to the religious institution is really to some extent at least for the educating of some individual. That is true incidentally of private gifts as well as foundation gifts obviously.

What we would suggest to you, and that is one of the abuses we mentioned, is full disclosure of any kind of gift where there are any specific individuals who are to receive any kind of benefits from that gift to that organization. It happens infrequently I am sure, but it has happened, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sure this is an infrequent thing, but someone told me of a situation where two men had a foundation, and Mr. X gives Mr. Y's son a scholarship to go to college and Mr. Y gives Mr. X's son a scholarship. I would think that you would be unlikely to come across that unless you had the whole thing computerized by tax number?

Mr. PETERSON. There is, Senator, a provision in the House bill that I think most of us would be sympathetic to, and that is the notion that where there are grants to individuals of the type you are describing, there should be some kind of systematic selection system that is used for the picking of the scholarship grantees, and that is the case you are talking about.

The CHAIRMAN. You are recommending that. In a like vein, when you are asking these CPA's what their reaction is to the foundation situation, would it not be true that these certified public accountants would owe a duty to their clients, to more or less protect their clients interests and speak favorably of them and their activities, insofar as they could speak a good word for them? Wouldn't those be the kind of people who would like to say something nice about their client rather than wanting to criticize them?

Mr. PETERSON. The way we tried to minimize that, though it obviously can happen, is the following. No one signed these questionnaires. There is no way of knowing who they came from, and they were never identified with an individual of any kind. The questionnaires went back not to us but to Arthur Andersen, and it is as good a job as we thought we could do.

Frankly, one of the reasons we recommended 100 percent auditing and I think you would agree with me there is only one way to get at the bottom of that kind of concern and that is people really having power to go in and look at the records. No private group in the world has that power.

The CHAIRMAN. You are recommending that?

Mr. PETERSON. We are recommending 100 percent auditing over a 3-year period, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Anderson?

Senator ANDERSON. I have heard of the Welter Foundation of Texas where the Welter family was given some land. Of course, there is very large amounts of crude oil in Texas and the result was that they had to have a charitable use for the money they made.

Mr. PETERSON. Senator, one way I think of handling problems of that sort is we would recommend that any significant contribution of appreciated property to a foundation be appraised independently and promptly, and to the satisfaction of the IRS, of value received for that contribution. I would think that this might be a way of getting around some of these problems where assets are put into foundations for which a deduction is given, but which are not the real value of that contribution. Thus, we would specifically suggest that all such appreciated property contributions over some, you know, de minimis amount, be appraised independently. Otherwise when you have got the same person on both ends of the transaction, there is always a question as to whether that is really a fair value of the thing that was contributed. The IRS, I am told, has done this very successfully in the case of significant pieces of art, and I would think that people as able as they are could figure out a way of evaluating property that is contributed to a foundation and I would urge them to do it.

Senator MILLER. First, Mr. Peterson, let me commend you and your colleagues for the tremendous job you have done. I am sure that everyone that has an opportunity to look at this report will derive a great amount of benefit from it.

I am troubled by some aspects of the report, some of the conclusions. I agree that we ought to delegate responsibility to the Treasury for a great amount of this, but let me ask you a couple of questions.

The thrust of your remarks certainly in response to some questions, was that we want to encourage more foundations to be formed. Well, now, suppose there is an individual who is all ready to form a foundation, and he is going to form it by donating to it a good chunk of stock in his private corporation, and he checks with his tax adviser and his tax adviser and his financial advisers tell him that this stock has been earning at a rate of 4 percent a year for the last 4 or 5 years?

Mr. PETERSON. Are you referring to the dividend, Senator?

Senator MILLER. Yes, and that it is a prudent dividend policy, in view of the needs to plow back in a certain amount of the earnings for updating plant and equipment. Now he is all of a sudden faced with the proposition that if he donates that stock to the foundation, the foundation is stuck with let's say a 7-percent payout rule, that the next thing they are going to have to do within 6 months or a year is sell the stock. I assure you, and you know that that foundation will not be founded. And I think to that extent we are going to be discouraging the formation of foundations.

Another thing that bothers me is that I am not sure that the Commission gave a statement on this as to whether they would make these new rules apply prospectively or retroactively, and if they go retroactive, then what about the foundation which was set up many years ago, which has been paying out dividends. The company which it may control has had only a prudent policy. It sounds pretty harsh to me to turn around and say well, we are sorry, you have been doing a good job with what you have got, but you are going to have to get rid of this stock, sell it to some conglomerate organization, and the next thing you know put it into a mutual fund of some kind.

Do you have any thoughts on whether this should be prospective or retroactive?

Mr. PETERSON. Well, of course, any payout requirement, and I think the technical people on the staff would agree with me that any payout requirement including the one in the House bill will require some changes in the original agreements, where certain kinds of disposition was prohibited, and I think you would agree if the number were 6, 4, or 2 percent, or whatever it was it might require that kind of a retroactive charge.

I think, Senator, to be fair to my fellow Commissioners, it isn't that we weren't aware of the fact that this may have the effect of some divestiture on company control situations. I am very much aware of that. On the other hand, it seems to us that if you don't set an objective payout, and treat people equally, who after all did receive originally the same deduction for that contribution, you then find yourself, faced with other kinds of alternatives, such as arbitrary divestments, arbitrary rules, which are not based on performance at all, and which in my view would have a devastating effect. So the balance that we have to go through here, Senator, was the balance of trying to be fair and set an objective standard, not being arbitrary, trying to encourage the Treasury Department and the IRS to have some flexibility in, for example, giving periods of time to divest themselves of the stock, coming up with certain agreements as to how the stock could be divested, giving them time originally to recapitalize it. We would be for all kinds of flexibility, I think, of that kind.

Senator MILLER. Maybe you and I are hung up on this one. I agree with much of what you have said. As I understand it you want to have the Secretary of the Treasury promulgate a single rate, but what I would like to have him do is to promulgate several rates, based upon an average, for example, within specialized types of industries or investments, but they would be arbitrary.

If for example, you are a foundation with your investments in an electronic company, and the average for the electronics industry is an 8-percent payout, but you are only paying out 5, you are going to have to live with that. But to mix all of these things into one ball of wax and come up with one percentage rate bothers me very much.

I would like to just make this point. You are valid in your proposition that the donors of these various foundations were treated alike in their tax exemption.

Mr. PETERSON. Tax deduction, yes.

Senator MILLER. In their tax deductions, but I don't think it follows that the foundations are being treated alike, because they are all exempt from income, because this foundation, which has $1 million tied up in a low pay is getting exemption on a relatively small amount of income, whereas this foundation which is tied up in high pay is getting a high exemption.

I think that is what we have to look at too and that gets you back to the payout but I agree with you we need some kind of a standard, preferably set by Treasury, and I would like to have the flexibility built in in the form of several rates rather than just one.

Mr. PETERSON. But you see, Senator, we have taken a lot of testimony from a wide variety of people on our Commission. You remember I started my discussion by saying one of the things that does trouble people about the foundation setup is that there is some of this having their "cake," as it were, and eating it, and there is an important aspect of that.

Now, if you don't use an objective standard of some sort, what I guess concerns this Commission is that you then are saying, I think, that these funds are not being invested in what is on the best interests of the foundation. They are being invested or not invested as the case may be for a variety of other reasons that are not really in the long-term interest of that foundation.

Put it this way. If that foundation were independent, if it were concerned with its own interests as it were, I am sure we would agree that it would invest the money wherever it thought the money should be invested.

Senator MILLER. Then you would exempt these community foundations.

Mr. PETERSON. What?

Senator MILLER. You would exempt these community foundations, then.

Mr. PETERSON. Why is that, sir?

Senator MILLER. I understood when you were discussing the payout or statistics regarding some of the community foundations this morning I understood they are in the nature of the independent public type.

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator MILLER. So you would probably exempt them from the payout requirement.

Mr. PETERSON. No, we would include everyone in the payout requirement. We are trying to come up with something we think treats everyone alike. No, we would include everyone, Senator. I simply said that one alternative to the divestiture situation, the very understandable situation that you describe, where a company has a low-yield situation is to put that money or that foundation into a community foundation, maintaining its identity, which is possible in these community foundations; and the community foundation in turn could make its payouts from other funds that they have, and they have, you know, lots of funds.

Senator MILLER. Some of them do, some of them don't but I see harshness. I am thinking now in terms of a foundation out in Colorado that owns the Broadmoor. As I understand it, if they were going to realize, if they had to liquidate, let us say, let's say it has a low payout, if they are going to realize the money that they probably ought to be able to realize, I can see it taking 5 years very easily and maybe 10.

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator MILLER. To sell off the golf course, the hotel, the railroad and other parcels out there, and yet I understand from you, you thought maybe 6 months or possibly a year.

Mr. PETERSON. No. What I would be quite happy to do, Senator, in a case like that, and that was the first alternative I presented, if there were a case where there was great hardship, where you couldn't sell something off in pieces. I can appreciate some good reasons why this might be. I think it would be quite simple and I would be for it, to state the general principles that the Treasury Department should have the flexibility to make what you might call long-term arrangements with somebody, where for example there would be a very low payout accepted for 10 years or something of that sort. At that time there would be an agreement that within that period the asset would be sold, 8 years or whatever the number is, and at that point charity would get paid a compounded payout. I think there should be that kind of flexibility.

Senator MILLER. I think you have a good point there. My problem is to what extent can we delegate all of that discretion to Treasury without setting up some guidelines that are specific enough so that we are not caught on an unconstitutional delegation of power.

Mr. Peterson. Right, and we think the principle, at least our lawyers felt the principle that you could delegate would be to say the principle that all foundations are treated alike with regard to what the payout requirement is, and if there are special circumstances that make it extremely destructive to pay it out immediately, that the principle is that on a compounded basis at the time when the dissolution does take place, charity is made whole for that period of time that there was a lower payout.

Senator Miller. Let me ask you one last question. Your approach when it is finally all jelled out, with certain exemptions and flexibilities, is to arrive at 1 percent, maybe adjusted over 2 or 3 years, but you start out say with 7 percent.

The approach I suggest is that Treasury would set up several percentages based upon the type of investment that would be in certain, let's say, stocks, certain categories, railroads, utilities and the like, and if the foundation had its portfolio tied up in that particular type of stock, it would have to meet the average for that stock, and if it was below average, too bad, it is going to have to meet it.

Now to that extent, we would get more money in, wouldn't we?

Mr. Peterson. Yes.

Senator Miller. Probably wouldn't get in as much as you are advocating, but I think that that is how close you and I are on this, and I suggest to you that before we go the full route, I can see tremendous problems. I can see a problem, for example, where all the foundations may ultimately have to end up with two or three categories of investment. I am not so sure that that investment is available for all of our foundations. I don't know whether we have enough study in depth to know that it is. They may have to be content to get into Blue Chip stocks or something else instead of into some of these pools or funds that you are talking about.

Mr. Peterson. Quite frankly, I would assume that the Secretary of the Treasury in having rule-making proceedings here would look at the available securities in America, and I would be surprised if he would come out with a recommendation which said that there must be an investment in a certain kind of security. My guess is that that would be a serious error if he did that.

Senator Miller. No, he wouldn't say that, but because of the percentage that he puts there, he might—suppose he made it nine instead of seven, you might find that your fund managers are looking around and they only have a very limited area.

Mr. Peterson. I would hope he would not set it at a level that a reasonable man wouldn't say is what an independent fund manager who does have to consider not just growth, obviously, but he has got to consider the security of what he has. I would be inclined toward a kind of a standard that might be something like a balanced fund situation where there is, as I am sure you know, a fair amount of debt in those 20, 30, 40 percent. He could look at what bank trusts are doing, who have this very same problem of how do you balance security with the long-term growth. If he were to set that number on something that was let's say total equity or something of that sort, it is certainly not the kind of number we have in mind. If it were that kind of number our payout requirement you see has been 15 percent compounded for the last 10 years, if you simply took the general growth funds that I mentioned. We don't choose a number anything like that.

Incidentally, the other reason for not choosing that, of course, is what goes up can come down, and I don't think a prudent man who has that kind of long-term responsibility would put all his money in one or the other.

We happen to have had an era in which equity stocks have been performing extremely well. There is nothing which says this is going to go on forever, and I would assume he would come up with a very balanced notion of a guideline. I would hope he would.

Senator MILLER. I don't suppose you have talked with any of the Treasury people about this, have you, as to whether or not they could implement this; how much of a financial advisory profit-sharing funds. They tell me that in the past 10 years there has been a revolution with regard to the definition of what a prudent man would do, and that these days a prudent man would most emphatically not put all his money into low yield debt instruments.

In fact, the evidence is overwhelming that if he had, he would have been earning much, much less money than if he had some investments in equity, and I think you are absolutely right. There has been a very significant change, and that is why we recommend to the total return concept, not just income yield in our formula.

Senator MILLER. Thank you again. I appreciate your responses, and especially the great amount of time, patience and very thorough explanation you gave the committee.

Mr. PETERSON. Thank you very much.

Senator FANNIN. Mr. Peterson, I too want to commend you for your performance. When we talk about the performance factor, we would certainly give you a high grade in your performance here today and for the work that you and your Commission has been doing preparing this information.

In your testimony you referred to distinctive characteristics of foundations. Well, we have heard from a great number of foundations and I am thinking back concerning some of the testimony that has been given to us, and in trying to apply this to the total picture that you have very capably given to us, and I just wonder when you answered the question from Senator Miller staff they would have to have in order to implement this?

Mr. PETERSON. I can tell you what the opinions are of the few people that we have talked to. The opinions are that there are probably eight or 10 people in the United States, a fair number of whom we have talked to, incidentally, in the course of deciding what a reasonable return is, who the Secretary of the Treasury I am sure could call on. The University of Chicago, for example, my alma mater has something called the Institute for Research in Security Prices, headed by Dr. James Lorrie. They have put every return of every stock in the last 40 years on a computer, with a big grant they got from Merrill Lynch. They can tell you what the return has been on almost any kind of an equity you can think of. I think reasonable men could sit around a table and say what is the balance now of investments that you as a prudent independent, and the word "independent" is important here, man would invest those moneys in. And I doubt that it would be all equity, but I think you would agree with me I also doubt that it would be all debt, because the world has changed a great deal since the days of high yield and no capital return.

Senator MILLER. So we have now gone almost from a change of the prudent-man rule to the computer-man rule.

Mr. PETERSON. I would say this, Senator Miller. I have talked to the heads of the trust departments of many large banks in this country. I have talked to the heads of pension and about community foundations, I am a little confused, because you are not talking about the conduit foundations, in that respect, are you?

I will be quite honest with you, Senator. I am not sure I am an expert on foundations now, but I know I wasn't 6 months ago. I knew very little about community foundations. We have one in Chicago called the Community Trust. There is a very important one in Cleveland.

This is the following kind of situation. There are apparently many people who want to give money. They want to give it through the foundation route, but they do not feel they have the expertise, the staff and so forth to be able to evaluate it, where to put this money.

What the community foundation does, and why one of our recommendations might be to suggest that some who feel this way might merge themselves into community foundations, that it gives these donors a certain amount of expertise and staff and so forth which they don't have themselves, so it is kind of like a community fund. It is a group of foundations that are under one overall umbrella.

Senator FANNIN. We have so many, as you have referred to in your testimony, the operational foundation. I think Williamsburg was used as an example.

Mr. PETERSON. Right.

Senator FANNIN. You are not classifying those in the category which the information that you have given to us today would refer to.

Mr. PETERSON. No. There is an additional reason why I haven't, incidentally. I am trying assiduously to be as independent and objective and credible as I can be. After I took this job I found I was a trustee of two operating foundations, Brookings and National Educational Television, and under the circumstances I thought it might be best that I not talk about the problem least my appearance here be misinterpreted.

Senator FANNIN. I agree, too, with your premise that you were thinking of recipients, too, I mean grant making, but also you referred continuously to the essential part of your overall testimony being in connection with the recipients.

Mr. PETERSON. That is right.

Senator FANNIN. Because of the necessity of continuity of contributions, if we are going to maintain the level of our educational institutions to continue on with what we have been doing over the years.

We also have other types of foundations. We have a problem, I have also considered when you refer to self-dealing matters, that is personna non grata. And then we had testimony given to us where some of the large or at least I know of one large corporation, one large manufacturing concern under study, that is owned by a foundation, and it is a self-dealing program, and the information given was that this would require them to practically dissolve this complete organization to accomplish what is in the House bill as far as the 20-percent requirement is concerned.

Now, I am not sure that I understand your exact recommendation on the divestiture.

Mr. PETERSON. My recommendation, Senator, is the following: I think a 5-year provision or a 10-year provision is extremely harsh, and will have the effect of greatly reducing the contributions to charity through foundations which we strongly believe is a fine institution.

On the other hand, I hope you would also agree that it is a mistake if one doesn't put some kind of a payout performance requirement on those foundations. Let me be a little extreme to illustrate my point; if you don't put a performance requirement on them to pay out to charity what is a reasonable amount, then I think we could easily see the situation, couldn't we, where a foundation could be set up, assets could be locked up into this founadtion, and 100 years from now we would still be having a discussion about the extent to which charity benefited. We might still be hearing testimony to the effect that just wait a while longer and charity is going to benefit.

Our thinking has been, rather than put a harsh and fixed period of time on divestment, put a reasonable performance test on it, that is the amount that is paid out. We think that will make the divestment effect far more gradual than what is in the House bill at the present time.

Senator FANNIN. I agree performance is a factor and is important and we must think about it if we are going to have these funds available for contributions. At the same time, we do have other things to think about, where a complete community is dependent upon that company continuing their operations in that particular area. We have one in particular where the officials have stated that if they must divest down to 20 percent, that their company will be picked up by one of the large companies of the Nation, and that they will soon be moved away from that community, and this is a consideration in some respects.

Now they may be isolated but I am trying to rather take the overall total picture, to also consider some of the detrimental effects that might happen if we are not careful in properly writing this legislation.

Mr. PETERSON. I wonder if we could talk about the general problem you are describing, because it is one that not only affects companies that have foundations, that have control stock, but many companies that don't, and that is really kind of a widespread concern in the country about raids of various types on the company, by conglomerates and so forth.

I think I have two kinds of answers to the very good question I think you are asking. One of them is that if as a matter of national policy there is general concern about the use of certain kinds of procedures and tactics to take over other companies, then it might be that that problem should be attacked directly, so that all companies who might be entitled to be protected from raiding tactics of various kinds would be protected.

For example, I know very few people that are running companies like I am, who want to be raided, and one of the interesting policy questions you have here is inasmuch as the deduction has been given to such company controlled foundations and, in a sense, the public, and the government has given the deduction, what is its basis for the difference in treatment, and how do you avoid the kind of abuse I am talking about of very low payouts to charity.

Senator FANNIN. Yes, I realize that we do have problems here that would affect general operations, and I also know that we can't pass legislation just for the exceptions, but I don't know how many companies are involved or how many foundations are involved in what I am talking about, but I do know that we have had testimony and I am concerned about the effect it would have on those companies, although I realize that that can't be the controlling factor.

I certainly express my appreciation to you, Mr. Peterson, for the way that you have handled the questions and also for this very all-inclusive report.

Mr. PETERSON. Thank you.

Senator MILLER. Could I come back, Mr. Peterson, to this matter of private foundations? Earlier today I had the impression that we were talking about the grant-type foundation.

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator MILLER. As distinguished from the——

Mr. PETERSON. Operating.

Senator MILLER. The operating type like Williamsburg.

Mr. PETERSON. That is correct.

Senator MILLER. Then I started thinking about the United Givers fund. That is a grant fund, is it not? I don't know that the UGF in Sioux Ciy, Iowa, where I come from is an operating foundation.

Mr. PETERSON. One of the criteria you used for defining what a private foundation is the source of its support. There is the notion that if the sources of support are public in nature, that is they come from a wide variety of sources, that in itself gives you a good deal of protection. I believe, am I not right on this, I am not an expert on this point, that it is that the Givers fund in effect treated as a public charity?

Senator MILLER. That was my understanding, but then what caused me concern is when you started analyzing the community foundations which I gathered were of that nature, and yet you stated that you wanted to cover them all the same.

To make it clear on this point, are you suggesting that the payout requirement be uniform for all of these, or are you suggesting that it only be for the privately supported grant type foundation excluding the publicly supported foundation?

Mr. PETERSON. The situation, Senator, is the following: I don't know of any exceptions to this. There may be one. The vast majority, the kind of United Givers situation that you are describing has a high element of a conduit operation in it, where a lot of the money flows and the payout would be probably much higher, much like many company foundations, probably 30, 40 or 50 percent payout and it is really not even a factor to them.

Frankly, I am not an expert on United Givers. I really haven't thought about it as much as I should.

Senator MILLER. I do see a problem beyond that though, that where you may have a foundation that received 80 percent of its donations from the general public, with pretty much the general public having to do with who is going to be the foundation's trustees and all of that.

Mr. PETERSON. Yes.

Senator MILLER. Like the community type foundations, I can get much less concerned about their being an adequate payout in that situation that I can where one person sets up a private foundation, and I am wondering if we could simplify our problem by concentrating on the purely privately supported or nearly privately supported grant type foundation.

Mr. PETERSON. I have been thinking since you brought up the example, I am sorry I didn't know about the example in advance, of a situation where a local community, for example, one could demonstrate as a reasonable man that there might be very serious effects. You will remember one of the possibilities I talked about is merging such an institution with another kind of foundation. If, for example, the broader institution had a lot of public support from a wide variety of sources then it seems to me that in that case it could either be considered a publicly supported activity and not affected, or the payout could easily come from its conduit aspect that is vastly in excess of the kind of payout we are talking about.

Senator MILLER. In any event, your whole Commission's thrust is concentrated on the privately supported private grant type foundation.

Mr. PETERSON. Yes, on the grantmaking foundation. Frankly, the number of publicly supported, of course, I don't know what we precisely mean by "public," but most of the community foundations that I mentioned are really a collection as I understand it of private trusts and bequests and so forth, who kind of want the feeling of public involvement in the giving. It is the kind of thing, for example, Senator, where if a person wants to be sure that a local community is taken care of, the case you are talking about, he can set up a charter that says "This is what I want my money to be used for, this is what I don't want it to be used for," and he can be reasonably assured because of its public nature, where the mayor picks one man or the bar association or somebody like that, that the local interests of the community are adequately represented. And if he, for example, is devoted to the city of Des Moines or Chicago, and I think the Chicago Community Trust has a good deal of very local charitable giving, I can get that information for you, but I think most community trusts are almost entirely oriented to local problems, almost entirely to community problems.

Senator MILLER. If they are, then why should we get to worrying about them? Why not leave them alone, at least for the time being, and concentrate on the big problems that you have been covering during most of your testimony?

Mr. PETERSON. I think if one can be satisfied there is a lot of public support going into them and so forth, one might easily consider such a possibility.

Senator MILLER. Thank you again.

The committee will be adjourned.

(Mr. Peterson's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF PETER G. PETERSON, CHAIRMAN, COMMISSION ON FOUNDATIONS AND PRIVATE PHILANTHROPY

SECTION I. BACKGROUND OF COMMISSION

My name is Peter G. Peterson. I am chairman and president of Bell & Howell Company, Chicago. I am here today in my capacity as chairman of the Commission on Foundations and Private Philanthropy. This is a group of private citizens who are making what we hope and trust is an objective study of foundations, of these important, these complex, these poorly understood, and—in many ways—uniquely American institutions.

Permit me to outline briefly the origin of this group. I was invited to head this commission in the spring of this year, by John D. Rockefeller 3rd, representing several major foundations, which in turn were stimulated by a proposal for such a citizens commission by Alan Pifer, president of the Carnegie Corporation, and, I am told, by the chairman of this Senate Committee among others. The reasons for these foundations' choice of a chairman have mystified me to this day, and perhaps at this point mystifies some of the foundations as well.

I, in turn, accepted this assignment on the following conditions:

1. That leaders in the legislative and executive branches would be consulted as to the potential value of such a commission. The matter was discussed with the Chairman of this committee and the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. Both were gracious enough to say such an inquiry might be useful. They of course bear no responsibility for our results. I should also say that Messrs. Tom Vail and Joseph Ingolia of the Senate Finance Committee staff and Dr. Larry Woodworth of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue have been very helpful in posing relevant questions.

I should mention appreciatively the Under Secretary of the Treasury, the Assistant Secretary of Treasury for Taxation, and the Director of Internal Revenue and their staffs, all of whom gave our various studies the benefit of their cooperation and obvious resources.

2. I also agreed to accept this assignment only if I could assure myself and others of the objectivity of such a commission and its staff, by selecting it myself with careful attention to the background of each person.

For example, I felt it necessary to withdraw invitations in a number of cases where I found that certain persons, however outstanding, had affiliations with foundations that might make the objectivity of their judgments about foundations subject to question.

In my own case, I have no foundation of my own, though Bell & Howell does have a company foundation. I am not on the board of any foundation, as I understood the term at the time I accepted this assignment. Upon reading the new definitions in the House Bill, I found that—as a trustee of the Brookings Institution and the National Educational Television—I am considered a foundation trustee and I leave it to you to decide how much prejudice to allow for. I do not propose in my testimony to go into any of the particular problems of those organizations with repect to the pending legislation.

I felt that this need for independence extended to the financing of our effort as well. We are raising our own money from companies, labor unions, and individuals and have not accepted funds from foundations. I think it is possible that some of our recommendations will not be popular with foundations and I would not have wanted foundation contributors to feel we were ungrateful or unfriendly recipients of their support.

I have attached a list of Commission members and staff to this statement. I believe you will agree that they represent a variety of backgrounds.

I know you will also agree that foundations do not lack for critics and this Commission has wanted to be sure it noted these criticisms—all of which you have probably heard before. Some of these allegations as they have been reported to us are:

"Many, or most foundations are nothing more than tax dodges for millionaires."

"Foundations are heavily involved in politics and not charity. Why should these activities be fostered at public expense?"

"Foundations often use their money to further extreme ideologies—left and right."

"Many foudations represent great concentration of in-perpetuity power and money controlled by an 'Ivy League' self-appointed establishment."

"Foundations spend a great deal of money internationally and ignore the needs of our own society."

"Foundations squander money, that would otherwise go to charity, on high salaries and fancy overhead expenses."

"Foundations hoard money as though it were their own when it belongs to the public and should be spent on charity."

We quickly found that many of these observations, however hostile or entertaining, depending upon one's point of view, had one thing in common . . . very little evidence by which they could be supported or refuted. Early in the life of this Commission on April 14, 1969, we developed a work outline of the Commission's study, and I quote: "It is anticipated that the primary function of the Commission will be to formulate judgments on the principal policy questions which are raised by the role of foundations in our society . . . the Commission does not expect to engage in any extensive fact-gathering activities. Very extensive data about foundations and their activities are available from both public and private sources."

No commission ever started its inquiries upon a more erroneous assumption.

For example, when we asked how frequently each kind of foundation abuse occurred, we were told either that there were no such studies, or treated to an anecdote or two with no clear notion of whether the anecdote was an exception or expresses a persistent pattern.

Faced with a vacuum of information, we launched several studies of foundation abuses. For example, Arthur Anderson, a leading accounting firm, surveyed 200 tax accountants across America anonymously in an attempt to estimate the frequency and nature of tax abuse by foundations. The National Opinion Research Center is serving as an outside research consultant, and Market Facts, Inc. is conducting a survey among foundations of all sizes and types, randomly selected from the Internal Revenue Service files with their complete cooperation. The so-called 990A forms which foundations must file annually were analyzed for evidence of various kinds of self-dealing transactions. May I say, parenthetically, that while the 990A form can, in our view, be substantially improved, it does contain valuable information. We find it distinctly ironic that, in view of widespread allegations about foundations and the equally widespread ignorance, the 990A form apparently remains one of the less utilized sources of information in the government storehouse.

Out of these studies of abuses have also come recommendations for your consideration that deal with 1) additional, potential abuses that we believe should be covered in legislation; 2) much more intensive IRS auditing of foundations, and 3) concrete suggestions for some different concepts of public disclosure and public reporting that should keep you and the public much better informed on the level of any such abuses in the future.

On the question of how much foundation money goes to quasi-political purposes, and how much to generally acceptable charitable purposes, we could find either no estimates at all or what were frankly self-serving guesses. I will show you today our preliminary findings on the numbers of foundations making, and the amounts of money spent for, various kinds of sensitive grants. I believe we would all agree that the kind of legislative action that is appropriate depends at least partly on the incidence of various kinds of grants—if you knew that questionable grants account for 1% of the total, you might feel quite differently than if you found they were 30%, 40%, or more of the grants, as some have apparently assumed.

Once again, I will offer today some practical recommendations on what we believe to be appropriate new kinds of legislative action for the handling of sensitive grants that stand on the borderline between charity and politics.

On the allegation of foundation hoarding of money and low payout of funds to charity, we will show you some data on the rate of return in 1968 on foundation assets as well as the payout to charity. You will see how this and other evidence has led us to recommend that you consider legislating a higher payout requirement for foundations.

Reliable data of the most fundamental nature is not obtainable. For example, you have heard testimony that there are approximately 22,000 foundations in the United States, with assets of 20.5 billion dollars. Confusion abounds as to the definition of a foundation which at least partially explains why others say there are 45,000 foundations. I must also remind you that the assets reported on the 990A form may often be carried at cost rather than market value. A prime example is the Irvine Foundation which recently testified before this Committee.

Its assets have been listed at 6 million dollars. Yet, testimony before this Committee clearly establishes that the value of the assets at a minimum is substantially in excess of 100 million dollars and our Commission has seen estimates that approach one billion dollars.

The loss, or perhaps the absence, of confidence in foundations may be a reaction to fear of the unknown—in terms of assets, or activities, or both.

To move on, I would not be so fatuous as to suggest that our Commission, with its limited resources of time and staff, has answers to all these allegations or questions, or even all the answers to any one of them.

Perhaps you will agree, however, that we do have evidence that might make some of our recommendations, and perhaps some of your ultimate decisions, more firmly based on fact than the hearsay and anecdotal approach that seems to characterize the situation today.

What I will present to you is in the nature of a preview of a final report which is and always has been scheduled for completion prior to year-end. Some of our studies are only partly completed and where that is true I will present only preliminary findings. Also, all my fellow Commission members were not able to attend our most recent meeting, and what I say today must be considered as my view of the consensus of our deliberations, and not as a final report.

Before presenting you with our findings and recommendations on foundations, I feel we must look at private philanthropy a good deal more broadly.

Unless we assess the present and future needs of charitable organizations in our society—which are the recipients, after all, of most foundation grants—we cannot intelligently assess the roles of foundations, and indeed private philanthropy as a whole.

Foundation funds are the river that has irrigated many important crops. Prudence dictates that before we change the course of this stream, we calculate the effect on our resources.

SECTION II. THE FINANCIAL NEEDS OF AMERICA'S CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

We are undertaking the hazardous and admittedly conjectural task of projecting the national needs in 1975 for each of the major charitable and social sectors of our society . . . health and medicine, education, religion, welfare, the arts, and so forth.

Then, we propose to estimate the amounts of support that might be expected from various sources if current trends continue.

From this, we expect to come up with a kind of "giving-gap"—the projected deficit in our social accounts.

You, I understand, have seen similar projections in the area of Medicare and Medicaid and have undoubtedly been as sobered as we have been by the projections of the experts. Quite frankly, we have been so taken aback by the dollar needs, and by deficits projected in tens of billions of dollars, that we are rechecking our own assessment of these needs . . . though we are quite prepared now to believe the melancholy extrapolation that this society is going to need to find tens of billions of dollars more by 1975. And if by then, our economy reaches its current cosmic projection of over 1.3 trillion dollars, I think it is not too hopeful to say that our society will somehow energize itself to find the money it really needs to attain our minimum standards of social health—or at least to cope realistically with our major social illnesses.

How else might we assess the needs of charitable organizations in 1975? We have approached this question in two other ways, less quantitative perhaps, but nevertheless essential to a balanced understanding.

First, more than 750 distinguished citizens across the country have answered an extensive questionnaire.

Who are these distinguished citizens? They are persons whom we expected to be knowledgeable about charitable endeavors in our society. They are citizens who, we expect, are going to continue to assume heavy responsibility for the various private sectors of our society.

They are, for example, scientists—both Nobel Prize Laureates and operating heads of scientific institutions. There are medical people . . . both leaders of medical organizations and medical educational institutions. There are businessmen—chosen from the ranks of chairmen and presidents of America's leading companies. There are labor leaders—both at national and local levels. There are religious leaders and scholars. There are representatives from the arts. This group, then is a kind of "Who's Who" of the knowledgeable citizens who also take a good deal of the responsibility for the operation of our private charitable organizations.

First, we asked them to tell us about which of the charitable sectors of our society they felt most knowledgeable. Then we asked for their best estimate of the trend of financial needs of their special field of philanthropy.

DISTINGUISHED CITIZENS STUDY
PRELIMINARY DATA
OCTOBER, 1969

OVER THE NEXT 5 to 10 YEARS, WHAT WOULD YOU EXPECT TO BE THE TREND IN FINANCIAL NEEDS OF CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS IN THE PARTICULAR FIELD OR AREA OF SOCIETY IN WHICH YOU FEEL MOST KNOWLEDGEABLE ABOUT PHILANTHROPY?

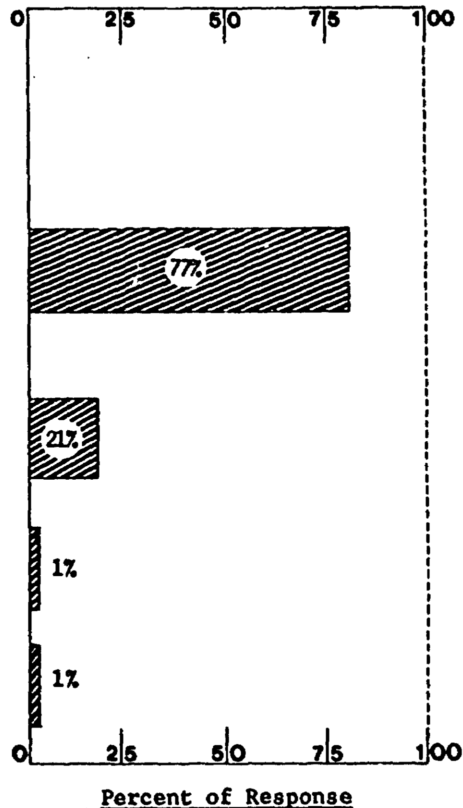
Predicted Trend of Financial Needs in Next 5-10 Years

"to go up rapidly over this period, significantly more rapidly than gross national product, for example."

"to go up but at a relatively modest rate - about like the gross national product."

"to stay the same as they are now."

"to go down over this period."



You will notice in the following table that the substantial majority in every field felt that needs would go up rapidly over this period, significantly more than the gross national product. However, there are some differences: a striking 86% of those distinguished citizens involved in education saw the future needs this way, whereas significantly fewer, or 63%, of those in science felt this way . . . perhaps chastened by some of the recent cutbacks in grants to science.

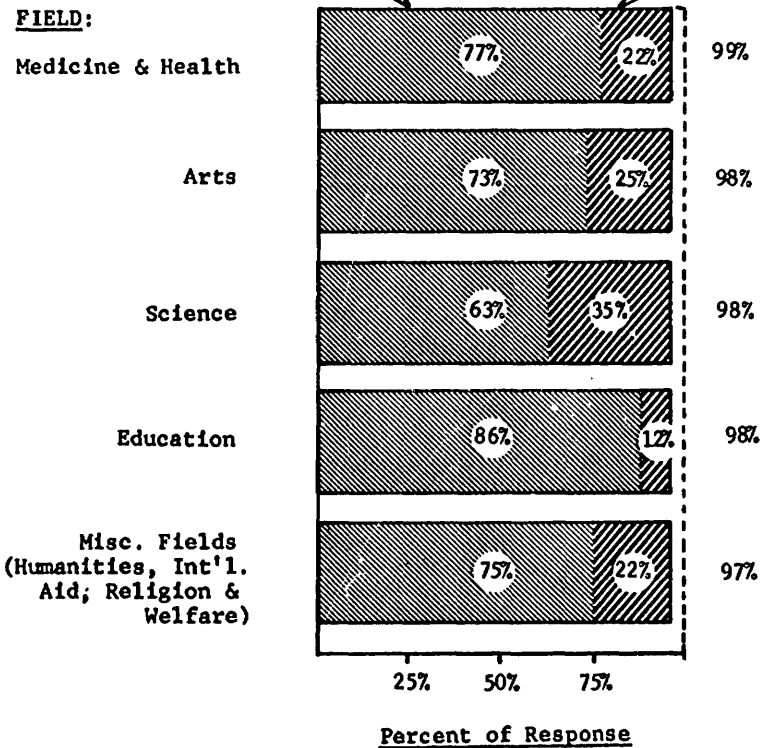
PRELIMINARY DATA
OCTOBER, 1969

IN THE FIELD IN WHICH YOU FEEL MOST KNOWLEDGEABLE, WHAT DO YOU EXPECT THE TRENDS OF FINANCIAL NEEDS WILL BE DURING THE NEXT 5-10 YEARS



Another approach, of course, is to go to the charitable organizations themselves and get their projections. By now, over fifty Chicago charitable organizations of all types—hospitals, universities, symphonies, museums, welfare agencies—have submitted themselves generously and charitably, to very intensive 2 to 3 hour interviews plus an in-depth look at their financial and cost records.

It will not surprise you to know we found none of these organizations who expected charitable needs to go down or even stay flat, and it may not surprise you that they thought they would have financial problems in the future . . . after all, we all have money problems and perhaps the fund raising instinct of charitable organizations is so well developed that it is hard to pass by an opportunity to say so.

Even allowing for this all too human tendency, our Commission is impressed by the degree to which these organizations feel they are facing urgent problems. For example, when asked:

"Looking ahead to your 1975 financial situation, which of the following statements reflects your feelings about the situation:

"To be sure, costs are rising and charitable needs are growing, but I'm also confident that outside revenues and contributions will also go up fast enough to meet our needs	17%
"I'm quite concerned about rising costs and increasing charitable needs. I'm not at all sure that outside funds will be adequate to meet these needs and some cutbacks will probably be necessary to make ends meet	26%
"I believe that by 1975 our organization will be facing a real budget crisis unless some major new sources of funds are developed."	57%

Because we, and particularly you, are aware of the rapidly growing government investment in these charitable sectors, we wanted to determine what impact a drop of 25% in private giving would make. Over 82% of these Chicago charitable organizations reported that they would either "cease to exist" or "face a very serious budget problem."

How can this be, one might ask, in view of the rapidly increasing government expenditures in these same areas?

We are now in the process of putting together the answer to this question, but already some things are clear.

First, as a businessman, I am struck by how much this business of charity is a personal service, a people business. Even without considering the substantial value of the volunteer inputs, notice both the level and the relative increase in the importance of this people expense. Obviously, the budgets of charitable organizations show a much higher percentage of people-related expenses—two to three times higher than many manufacturing companies where the people expense in the last census of manufacturing firms was about 24%.

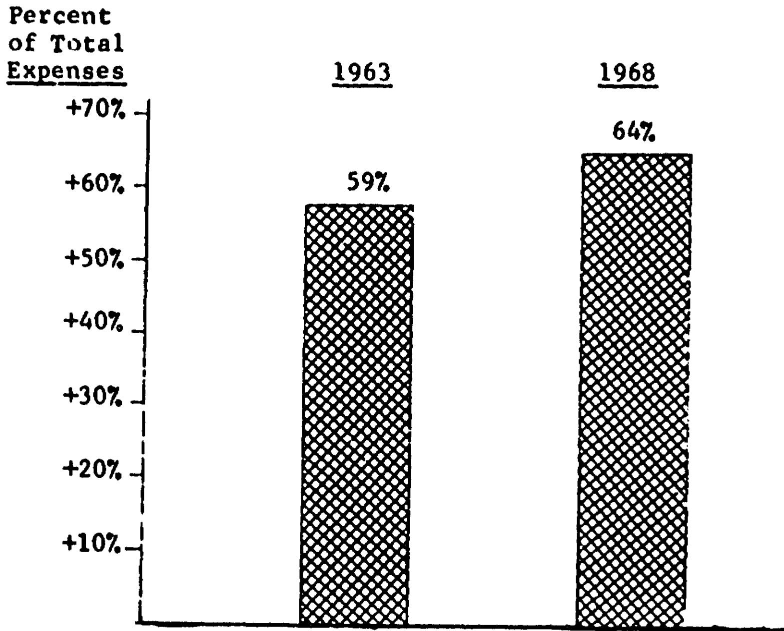
CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS: 1963 - 1968



*Does not put any value on volunteer labor.

Why then, we asked, can one item increase so much not only in absolute terms but also increase 5 percentage points of the budget in only five years?

As we searched for the answers, one stands out above all others. The salaries being paid many employees of charitable organizations are apparently rising much faster than for the manufacturing segment of our labor force.

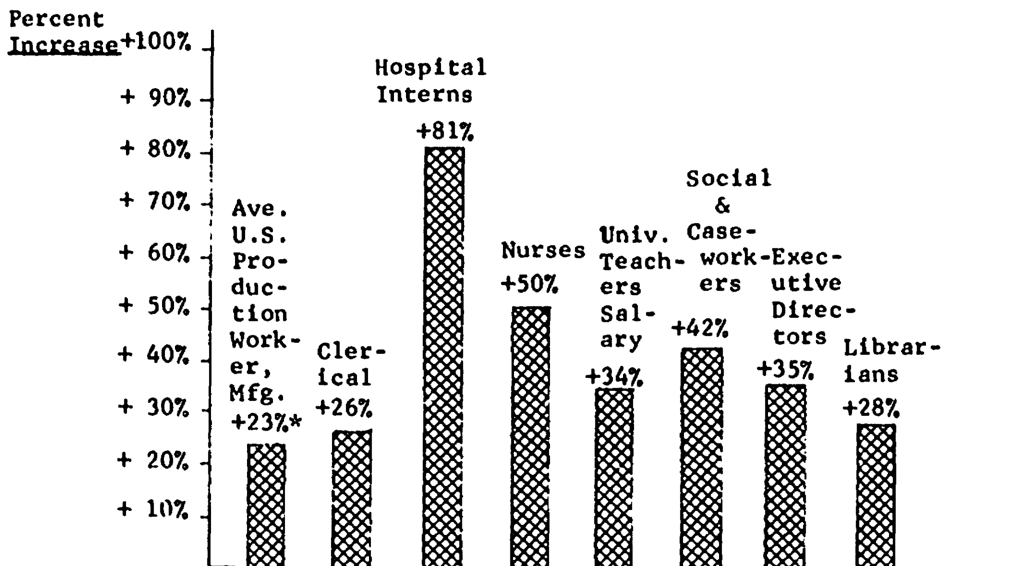
(As Reported by Chicago Charitable Organizations)



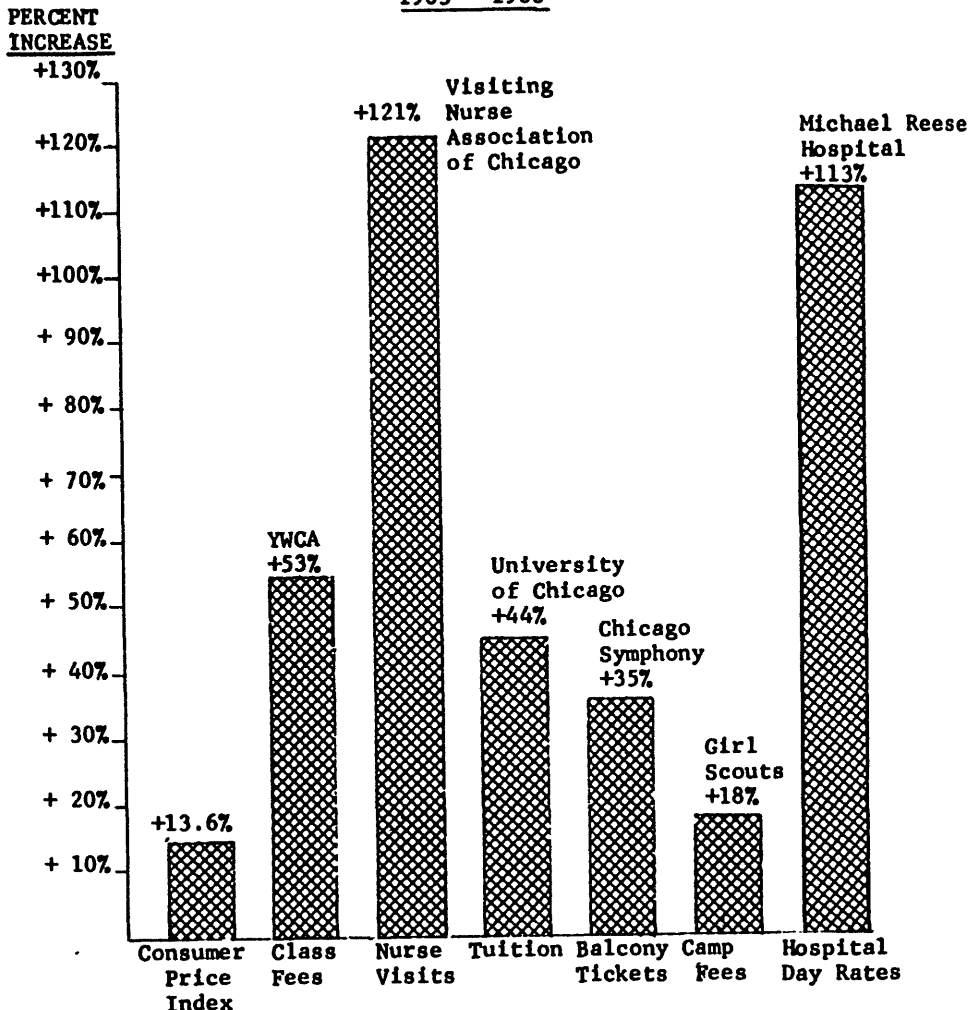
*Source: U.S. Dept. of Commerce and Commission Survey of Chicago Philanthropic Organizations

The reason for these increases is, as in all things of this sort, a question of supply and demand. Lest anyone conclude from this last chart that these classes of charitable employees are being paid bountiful salaries, let me hasten to say that for the most part they are catching up from what most fair people would call unreasonably, or perhaps unconscionably, low levels. It is strong evidence of the need to train more skilled people to serve these charitable organizations.

You might ask, as we did, why don't some of these charitable organizations simply charge the public more for their services? Why should the government and private philanthropy foot the bill?

An answer that emerges clearly from our Chicago study is that many of these organizations who can charge the public more have been doing just that . . . with what we might have considered a good deal of boldness, certainly in comparison with rise of prices in general.

CHICAGO PHILANTHROPIC STUDY
PRELIMINARY--OCTOBER 1969



And in spite of what appear to us to be sincere efforts to alleviate their financial problems, we were distressed to see some of Chicago's most honored charitable organizations suffering with operating deficits—the YMCA, Art Institute, Salvation Army, the Chicago Symphony (like most major symphonies in this country, which is now in what might well be called a desperate fund-raising drive to save the orchestra), and the University of Chicago which after an exhaustive and, as a Trustee, I must say depressing study a few years ago, predicted an annual operating deficit of some twenty-five million dollars in 1975.

The skeptic might take this a step further. Granted, he might say, they aren't paying higher salaries than they need to pay. Granted that real efforts are being made to raise money from the public, why don't these charitable organizations improve their productivity?

Even the question of productivity raises the blood pressure of professionals in the field who quickly point out that you can measure the output of a steel plant or a photographic firm, but you will have a great deal of trouble even defining what you mean by the output of a hospital, or a welfare worker.

But even if we ignore these formidable problems that are far too deep to be either discussed or solved here, our Chicago evidence suggests that in many cases it is simply taking more people in charitable organizations to serve a typical recipient—whether he be a hospital patient "enjoying" the benefits of rapidly advancing technology and skills, a graduate student being exposed to a rapidly proliferating curriculum, or a welfare case, previously ignored as intractable and unemployable, now being given intensive training and individualized help.

The changes in the quality and nature of the work being done by charitable organizations have in a significant number of cases raised unit cost to provide a person with charitable services from 50% to 100% during the last five year period when the consumer price index sent up less than 14%.

There are inefficiencies, to be sure, and in the past I think it is fair to say that these expenses have not received systematic, intensive attention in many charitable organizations. There can be no question now that the pressure is increasingly on the charitable organizations to increase the efficiencies of the clerical, the paper work, and all the indirect expenses that seem to plague all organizations.

But having said this, I believe any fair person who is trying to project the honest facts about the present and future needs of charitable organizations in America will come to the conclusion that the public policy of this country must take into account the unpleasant but important reality that the needs of America's vital charitable organizations are rising rapidly and, without important new sources of funds measured in many billions of dollars, will face what can be fairly called the charitable crisis of the 70s.

Choice of a public policy aimed at meeting the needs of America's charitable organizations

This country, collectively and individually, can meet the growing budget crisis of charitable organizations in a number of ways. To simplify greatly the policy alternatives—we have said there are three very broad policies the country adopt:

Policy alternative No. 1: Permit a significant number of charitable organizations to decline or die by not providing major new funds through either private or government sources.

We see no evidence that any responsible segment of our society, and certainly not this commission or the Senate Finance Committee, I'm sure, has any such goal. There is no desire to see these charitable organizations, one of our country's most humane and enduring trademarks, do anything but flourish at a time when any sensitive and decent citizen cannot help but be apprehensive about the future of our society.

Policy alternative No. 2: Decide that these problems are truly public problems and decide on a national policy to take them over at the government level through tax dollars and give reduced incentives to private philanthropy.

To a degree that has surprised many on our commission, a number of European societies have already moved significantly in the direction of this State supporting all major segments of education including higher education and even the arts.

Policy alternative No. 3: Encourage the private sector to give to a greater extent and take as large a role in the solution of these problems as is possible or practical.

All of us know that the government has played a much more important role in supporting charitable sectors of our society with each passing year . . . whether it be education at all levels, science, medicine, welfare, and indeed to some extent, the arts.

As a Commission with diverse backgrounds—some with government experience, some with none. Some with business, private enterprise backgrounds, other with government or academic histories. Some with Republican orientations, others with extensive traditions as Democrats. It is surprising and in some ways very reassuring that such remarkable unanimity emerges.

1. First, we recognize that the world has changed profoundly and the scale of our problems has changed with it. The federal government should play a major role in the support of these charitable organizations.

No one on the Commission seemed to suffer any fantasies that the private sector could by itself muster up the multi-billions that will be needed to meet the social problems of the 70s.

2. With equal unanimity, this Commission urges that the top national policy be the strongest kind of reaffirmation of the independent and complementary role that is to be played by the individuals and by the private sector; that this reaffirmation should be expressed in the kind of tax bill that passes.

I hope to be able to demonstrate that the House-passed tax bill is interpreted by this Commission and the distinguished citizen and leadership segments of this society as distinctly anti-philanthropic—and that this is expressed in what is said and not said, about the importance of private philanthropy in this society and very important, in what has been done, and not done, to the tax incentives to private giving.

First, before we review the tax reform bill with respect to philanthropy, let us see what the Distinguished Citizen Study told us about what they felt the national tax policy should be.

We put it to the distinguished citizens in several ways. First, how would they feel if the government's support of private organizations increased to the point where the government would predominate at the expense of diminishing private involvement and support.

Even though many who participated in our study have worked in fields such as science and medicine that have been and are the grateful beneficiaries of impressive government generosity, their desire to preserve and encourage the private sector is striking. As against this view, we think it is even more striking to see how these same citizens view the House Bill in its anti-philanthropic effects.

It is then quite consistent for the leaders in our survey to tell us that they believe additional private incentives are one appropriate route to meet the growing financial crisis of charitable organizations.

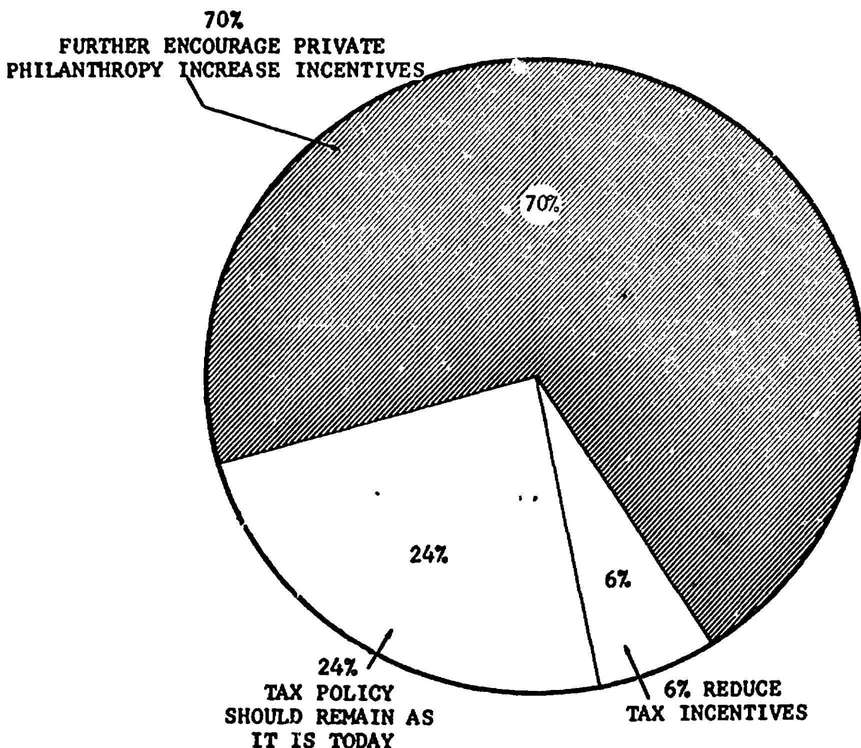
"ASSUMING GROWING NEEDS OF CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS AND GROWING GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES, WHAT SHOULD BE THE PUBLIC POLICY TOWARD PRIVATE PHILANTHROPY? SHOULD GOVERNMENTAL INCENTIVES BE DESIGNED TO STIMULATE MORE PRIVATE GIVING ABOVE AND BEYOND ITS CURRENT LEVEL: SHOULD CURRENT TAX INCENTIVES BE LEFT AS THEY ARE: SHOULD SOME DIS-INCENTIVES TO PRIVATE GIVING BE INSTITUTED?"



The Commission agrees emphatically that a basic tax policy of further private incentives is the best one for this country—confronted as we are by limited dollar resources and rapidly accelerating demands on many fronts. The Commission would add that the productivity of the multi-billion dollar resources of the existing foundations should also be re-appraised to determine whether society might not get a larger return to charity on this very large investment. I will have more to say about this later.

The human and social values of the private sector's deep involvement and support of charitable organizations do not need restatement here. Your more specific interest now is how to get the highest social return per dollar spent—whether in direct government support, or through tax incentives.

We hope to develop a clearer notion of the dollar-multiplier effect of the private charitable dollar as opposed to a government dollar for the same purposes.

First, the "cost" to the government of a charity dollar is obviously less than the cost at a dollar of direct government expenditure. Where the private donor is in the 70% tax bracket the government saves 30%. When the donor is in a lower tax bracket the saving to the government is proportionately greater.

Second, there is the question of cost and efficiency—whether the private sector does the job more efficiently with less administrative expense to the government.

We are gathering evidence on one aspect of this cost-efficiency factor—the value of the volunteer labor. For three-fourths of the Chicago charitable organizations studied so far, the number of volunteer workers exceeded the paid employees. And if we place a $3 per hour value on the volunteer labor, we find an impressive list of charitable organizations where the dollar value of the volunteer labor exceeds the total dollar payroll. For example, this is true of the Chicago YWCA, Red Cross, United Cerebral Palsy and Girl Scouts.

This expeirence is confirmed by available national statistics that project some 55 to 60 million Americans engaged in full-time or part-time volunteer activity for nonprofit institutions during the year. From the business sector alone, Fortune Magazine recently estimated the value of volunteer services at five billion dollars annually.

We do not yet have an answer to the other aspect of the question—what happens to this level of volunteer activity when the charitable institution becomes either state-supported or operated? In Chicago, we are trying to find out by comparing volunteer activity in Illinois or Cook County operated hospitals versus private hospitals, in Illinois operated welfare organizations as compared with private welfare agencies.

If this energetic and involved segment of the American public should sense that national policy is shifting away from strong encouragement of private philanthropy, I would hazard a guess that some, perhaps many, may conclude that they are not genuinely wanted, and reduce their personal efforts.

Thus, both for deeply philosophical reasons that have to do with the kind of society we really want, and for equally impressive pragmatic, dollar-and-cents reasons that have to do with getting this vital social work done at lowest cost, this Commission would urge you to reaffirm in attitude and action the strongest reassurance to the public that you share the view that however big and complex our social needs are, you want the private sector to contribute more of itself and of its money to a compassionate and effective solution of the massive and growing problems of the seventies.

III. THE HOUSE BILL AND ITS IMPACT ON PHILANTHROPY

The attitude of many dealing with these issues is something to this effect: "There is no intention to hurt charitable organizations. All that is being done is to close loopholes, to broaden the tax base and to eliminate special preference so that the very rich cannot get away with paying a pittance in taxes."

In short, this justification says that whatever is being done is in the name of tax equity—and certainly the vast majority of us think it both sensible and decent that we try to preserve the integrity of the tax system so that all who can share in the cost of governmental activity do so. The question, of course, is: What are the specific inequities we should correct? And what are the costs to society of the proposed corrections?

I was describing some of the negative effects on philanthropy to a physician friend recently, who said: "That sounds like what we call an iatrogenic disease." He explained that the word "iatrogenic" derives from the Greek word "iatro," meaning doctor—and it refers to unintended diseases or side effects that are caused by the medical treatment itself. We appear to have a similar problem here. Those of you who have the responsibility to decide tax policy must look at our entire body politic and balance the effects of treating afflictions of a part of the body with the effect upon the system as a whole.

The current tax bill represents a very understandable attempt to treat some defects in the equity of our tax structure. The effort is supported by the mood of the country to have every taxpayer pull his full weight.

I would raise the question of whether sufficient attention has been given to the encouragement of private charity. Were careful assessments made of the side effects of the bill?

Even today, our Commission has been deplorably unable to obtain a detailed assessment, provision by provision, of the probable effects of the House bill on charitable giving. Please do not misinterpret my statement. We have had splendid coöperation in every sense from the staffs of legislative committees and from the Treasury Department.

With the frightful press of time during this last six hectic months of tax reform, I believe these estimates have not yet been made. The public interest would be richly served by a full analysis of the likely dollar effects of each provision affecting charitable giving, and upon the overall consequences of the Bill as a whole.

If these estimates are to be reliable, they require full access to data on revenue and charitable giving that are available only in the Treasury Department.

Our Commission has conducted its own research among large charitable donors whose names we obtained from charitable institutions throughout the country. In total, 85 such philanthropists cooperated with the Commission in estimating the effects of the House bill on their future attitudes and actions.

Development directors of major charitable institutions tell us that these kinds of donors are not only enormously important for the gifts they make, but for the leadership role these gifts play in providing the initial impetus to fund raising efforts.

You will see in the attached chart that it is no overstatement to call them large donors—their median annual giving over the last five years in $375,000.

Descriptive characteristics, 85 large donors in Commission study

Average median annual donation to charity—in last 5 years	$375,000
Donors having foundations	74%
Donors who in recent years have reached 30% ceiling on charitable gifts	82%
Donors qualifying for, or who have qualified for, the unlimited deduction	13%

Planning further contributions to a foundation, or setting up a new foundation	63%
Owns over 20% of the stock of a company	54%
Donor or his family has a foundation that owns over 20% of the stock of a company	16%

The form of the gifts that large donors make is obviously of prime importance in view of the treatment of gifts of appreciated property in the House bill.

Many have wondered precisely what effect tax incentives have on charitable giving. Members of the staff of this Committee expressed an interest in the extent to which charitable giving would be reduced with no incentives at all.

Here is what the big donors tell us in answer to the following question:

"For the moment, let us assume that there were no tax benefits at all for charitable giving—in other words, let us assume you had to make all your charitable contributions out of your after-tax income.

"What effect would this have on your charitable contributions?"

Only 4% affirmed it would have no effect on their giving. The remaining 96% indicated it would reduce their giving—and the median reduction was 75%.

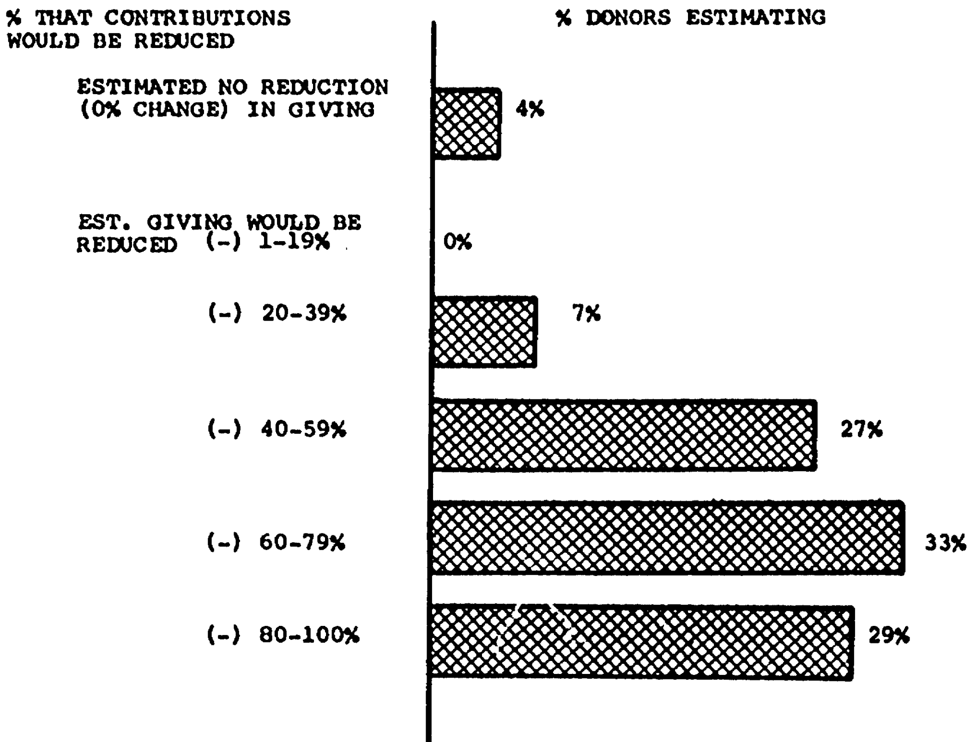
ESTIMATED EFFECT ON CHARITABLE GIVING IF NO TAX INCENTIVE



PRELIMINARY - OCTOBER 1969
STUDY OF LARGE PRIVATE DONORS

My own hunch is that this response may be something of an overreaction to the proposed changes in the tax bill. It is apparent that the amount of charitable giving depends on a mixture of at least two elements besides tax incentives: philanthropic interests and social pressures. While some moral purists might decry this mixture of motives—a point to which I will come back later—it is enough to observe first, that the recognition of mixed motives has been inherent in our tax laws for over fifty years; and, second, that tax incentives are a highly significant factor.

Any conclusion about motivations for giving is clearly conjecture. We went on to a more objective question—the actual determination of the effect of the House Bill on the big donors' taxes (which quite a number apparently had their tax accountants recompute).

Estimated effect of House bill on 1968 taxes of large private donors

"First, we want to know what would have happened to the taxes you would have paid if your level of charitable contributions were the same type and at the same level as in 1968, but the new tax reform provisions were in effect."

Plus 25 percent the estimated average (median) increase in 1968 taxes.

Comment: Over 90% of the donors responding stated that their taxes would have increased.

We moved from here to a question of principal interest to us—the effect of this tax bill on charitable giving. This is necessarily a hypothetical question but the attitude expressed in the following numbers if indeed a disturbing one for anyone concerned with the need for substantially increased giving.

Estimated effect of House bill on charitable giving by large donors

"Second, having some feel of the effect of this on your taxes paid, we would like your opinion on what effect these tax reforms, in turn, would have on your level of charitable giving."

Minus 50 percent estimated average (median) reduction in charitable gifts by large private donors, had House bill been in effect.

Given any effect of this magnitude, it becomes essential to determine which provisions of the Bill play the largest role. Therefore, we asked those same donors to indicate the comparative effect of the various provisions upon their charitable contributions. While the complexity of the computations makes it difficult to assign precise effects to each provision, it seems clear that the provision having the largest negative effect on contributions was the allocation of deductions feature whereby deductions, including charitable contributions, will be allocated between taxable and non-taxable income. Next in negative impact on charitable giving is the limit on tax preference provision, with gifts of appreciated property being included as a tax preference.

Opinions of large donors studied concerning which one (of several) House bill provisions would cause the greatest reduction in their charitable giving

Percent of donors who thought provision(s) would have greatest negative impact on giving:

Allocation of deductions provision	58
Limit on tax preference provision	24
Total	[1] 82
Charitable trust restrictions	8
"Bargain sale" provision	2
Specific foundation provisions	8
Removal of deductability of tangible personal property	0
Total of large donors studied	100

[1] Since many donors expected that these two provisions would have to be evaluated simultaneously, it was difficult for them to say precisely which of them would have the greatest single effect. However, most estimated the "Allocation of Deductions" provision would have the greatest negative effect on contributions.

The House bill would increase to 50% the present 30% limitation on charitable giving. It is perhaps the one provision of the House bill designed to strengthen the incentive effect of charitable deduction for the taxpayers generally.

I am sorry to report that not one large donor in our study believed that this new 50% provision provides an incentive to increase his total contributions, when taking the total reform bill into account. The allocation of deductions and limited tax preference provisions apparently minimize the benefit of this provision.

Perhaps an additional word on the complexity of the House tax bill is in order. A number of the large donors emphasized this point by referring to the "necessity of solving simultaneous equations" and "requiring your own computer." Complexity is troublesome because of its effect on decision-making in charitable giving. The vast majority of charitable gifts cost the donor something, and it is usually a bid traumatic for him to make the final decision to give. Thus, people who raise money for charity worry about additional barriers to the already difficult decision to give.

Fund-raising experts say that simplicity is an important stimulant to giving. . . . so that the donor clearly understands the specific effect upon him. Under the House bill, the donor will often not know until late in the year what the amount and distribution of various kinds of his income will be. Therefore, he is likely to delay giving; to "think about it a little more," to say "let's see how things turn out later in the year." Those who raise money for charity decry any additions to the already formidable store of excuses for not giving. They know from experience that a gift delayed is often a gift denied.

While we believe the times most emphatically do not call for disincentives to charitable giving, this Commission is certainly anxious to remedy tax inequities that relate to charitable giving. Particularly we find ourselves concerned about the situation in which the donor ends up better off by giving something to charity rather than selling it. The concept of "making money off charity" is not an attractive one.

Tax experts point out a number of ways in which this can happen and we would suggest specific legislative treatment to deal with each of the following:

1. It is clear that inflated valuation of property can have such an effect. We believe that the requirement of objective appraisal procedures, and prompt verification of the value of contributions of appreciated property, would significantly reduce this inequity.

2. I am told that contributions of property which the donor has already fully depreciated or where the sale would produce ordinary income rather than capital gains, can improve the after-tax position of the donor. Such effects can and should be dealt with in legislation.

3. We can see this "money-making effect" where the gift is in the form of high-markup products whose direct cost as a percentage of market value is less than the income tax rate—such as drugs, certain kinds of machinery, etc.

We would not want to encourage philanthropic giving at the expense of the basic integrity of the tax system and at an excessive cost to federal revenues. We would urge you to take action to control the above inequities.

Up to now, I have covered our deep concern over 1) the effects of the House bill on charitable giving, and have suggested that you get data on the effect of specific provisions on charitable giving. 2) Also, I have suggested that you limit those kinds of charitable gifts that result in the inequity of a high tax cost to the government and a net dollar benefit to the donor.

We have one longer term, and we believe important, tax policy recommendation dealing with private philanthropy. Let me be presumptuous and assume you accept our basic premise that the charitable crisis of the seventies requires significantly more funds, and that the private sector should be encouraged to give more.

What kind of new tax incentives for charitable giving would achieve this objective?

We would like to suggest the criteria for such a new tax incentive. It would:

1. Produce significantly more money for charity . . . in the range of several billion dollars.

2. Be compatible with tax equity, and prevention of tax avoidance.

3. Spread the giving among more people; democratize philanthropy more, and be less "elitist." It is obvious that only the very wealthy can make the really large gifts and if we are to increase the total flow of funds, they too must be further encouraged. However, we believe a better tax incentive system would give more people an incentive to participate in philanthropic giving, and therefore to participate in the decisions on how to allocate these funds.

4. So at relatively low cost to federal revenues, consistent with the above guidelines.

Our Commission has reviewed this objective with perhaps a dozen of America's foremost tax economists and tax lawyers, both in and out of government. Their views can be briefly summarized:

1. The area of really new and effective tax-incentive approaches to private giving has received remarkably little attention over recent years. It is certain that the need for such incentives was not a serious concern in the development of the current legislation.

2. The little publicly available data on charitable giving and the effects of various incentives is either primitive or out of date. The development of new incentives requires detailed revenue cost and charitable giving data that only the Treasury Department has.

3. Every expert the Commission has talked to agrees that current incentives have serious defects, and that the assignment to define new approaches that meet the criteria I mentioned earlier is indeed a worthy one that would challenge the best economists and tax experts in the country. They also agree that this is a highly complex and difficult task. There are no "quick and easy" solutions.

It is the recommendation of this Commission that a group of the best informed experts in the country be assembled and charged with the responsibility to recommend to Congress and the Administration new incentive approaches to philanthropic giving. Their recommendation should, if possible, be ready for your consideration in 1970.

IV. FOUNDATIONS—THEIR NATURE AND THEIR ROLE

The principal focus of our Commission's work has been on foundations. We have, of course, looked beyond foundations into the much broader field of philanthropy because foundations are an integral part of philanthropy and because many proposals affecting foundations have an impact on philanthropy generally. To place foundations into perspective within the philanthropic field, it may be noted that annual foundation giving is approximately one-tenth of total private giving.

As you well know, there is no accepted definition of foundations. For the purpose of our study we have defined foundations as organizations whose principal activity is grant-making, thus excluding operating organizations. We have also excluded from our definition organizations whose funds come from public subscriptions, and so-called "feeder" organizations whose grants go solely to a single organization.

Foundations are found in every state of the Union although a disproportionate number appear to be located in the Eastern part of the country.

PRELIMINARY - OCTOBER 1969
STUDY OF LARGE PRIVATE DONORS

In arriving at this geographical distribution we have used the 1968 listing of foundations which was compiled by the Internal Revenue Service. This list contains 30,262 foundations.

We have undertaken a survey of a sample of grant-making foundations, to determine where their grants go, the form of their contributions, their method of operation and other basic information about the operation of a cross-section of foundations. In many respects this survey represents one of the first systematic attempts to gather comprehensive data on foundations. Because so little is known, there are few guidelines for designing a sample of these institutions. It is difficult, for example, to achieve a precise sample when there is no adequate data on numbers, assets, or amount of grants.

The final report of the Commission will include data for some 350 foundations distributed across the various categories of foundations. At this time we have completed information from 163, about half of the total sample. For example, we plan to get completed interviews from as many of the top 26 foundations as possible. We have now completed 14 of those interviews.

Nevertheless, even these preliminary findings show some strong trends.

In our study we have divided foundations into four categories by assets size: over 100 million; 10–100 million; 1–10 million and under 1 million. We have treated company foundations and community foundations separately. It is significant to note that the 26 largest foundations hold over 10 billion dollars in assets and account for roughly 479 million dollars in grants per year. These large foundations, of which Ford, Rockefeller and Carnegie are familiar examples, usually operate on a national or even international scale although some, such as Duke and Mott, operate on a regional basis. Most of the small foundations, which are generally closely identified with the donor, operate on a regional or local basis:

Source: Preliminary Oct. 20, 1969, foundation survey.

Community foundations, of which the Cleveland Foundation, the Permanent Charities Fund of Boston and the Chicago Community Trust are examples, differ from other foundations in several significant respects. Their endowment assets represent the pooling of gifts and bequests from a number of donors within the community and their trustees are usually appointed by various community leaders. For example, there may be one trustee nominated by the Mayor, one by the head of the local bar association, a third by the president of a university, and so forth. Their grants are devoted, almost entirely, to one metropolitan area.

A final category is the company foundation. These are usually closely tied to the corporation which sets them up, with company officers serving as trustees of the foundation. Such foundations often are simply a convenient alternative method for channeling corporate giving or a means of evening out corporate earnings by contributing more in good years and reducing contributions when earnings fall off. Some company foundations are so-called conduits, where annual grants are roughly equal to the annual contributions received from the corporation. These conduit type foundations have little or no endowment. There are, however, a number of company foundations which have substantial endowments.

While classification of foundations by size is helpful in obtaining a picture of the foundation field, we have concluded that there is no practical basis for classifying foundations for purposes of governmental regulation. Neither distinctions in size, purpose, or such factors as the presence or absence of a professional staff or of independent trustees provides a sound basis for differences in legal treatment. Contributions to all types of foundations receive the same tax benefits from the government. We can see no reasons why all foundations should be subject to such regulations as pay-out requirements, prohibitions on self-dealing, and prohibitions against involvement in elective politics. Public disclosure obligations should apply to all.

A. Reasons for establishing foundations

The reasons why a donor establishes a foundation—instead of giving directly to operating charities—are highly varied. There undoubtedly is a mixture of "pure" philanthropic motivations and of personal motives, including tax advantages. The existence of mixed motives is, of course, inherent in the use of tax incentives to encourage philanthropy. While no quantitative assessment is possible, it is clear that more funds have gone to charity in general, and to foundations in particular, than would have been the case without the tax inducements which have been granted to foundations and foundation donors.

First, the use of a foundation makes possible certain types of grants which would not be tax deductible when made by an individual donor. A foundation may make grants to individuals and it can also make foreign grants while an individual can obtain a tax deduction only for his contributions to tax-exempt organizations in the United States. However, a study of the grant making activity of foundations does not suggest that grants to individuals or to international organizations are of major importance.

Most grants are to tax-exempt organizations in the United States—74 percent to 30 percent charitable organizations. Only about 7 percent of all foundation grants go to recipients for which an individual would not receive a tax deduction for the same grant.

Second, foundations may also provide various elements of administrative convenience. Thus, it may be simpler for an individual with appreciated property to transfer that property to a foundation, and then make a number of donations from the foundation. This is likely to be simpler than to transfer such assets directly to a large number of recipient organizations.

Third, use of a foundation may also serve to insulate the donor from direct appeals from contributors. This point may well be one of the reasons why corporations organize foundations. It enables the top management of the corporation to some extent to avoid personal solicitation by channeling requests to the company foundations.

Fourth, foundations are also useful as a means of "evening out" gifts between different years. Thus a company or an individual may put more money into a foundation in a good year than in a poor year and still maintain the same level of support to various charitable organizations. Foundations can also be used for the opposite reasons: accumulating several years' contributions in order to make a large grant at a later date.

Fifth, an individual may, with tax-deductible dollars, hire a professional staff in order to systematize and develop expertise in giving. However, it appears that professional staffing is largely limited to the largest foundations, and even there the staffs are often surprisingly small. We are now estimating our total full-time personnel count of all foundations for our final report, but it would now appear to number in the very low thousands.

[2] These figures are not additive to 100 percent because some foundations have both part- and full-time employees.

Sixth, very personal considerations are also sometimes mentioned as a reason for setting up foundations. The foundation provides an opportunity for perpetuating the owner's name and his charitable interests after his death, and perhaps giving him a certain status and distinction while alive.

In all likelihood the most attractive feature of the use of a foundation is that it enables the donor, at least in some measure, "to have his cake and eat it too." He obtains a tax deduction at the time he makes a donation to the foundation; yet he can still exercise a substantial measure of control over the assets which he has donated to the foundation. This point is, of course, of particular importance when the asset contributed to the foundation is stock in family-controlled or otherwise closely-held business. Placing such stock in a foundation allows the donor to maintain his control over the business in a manner which probably could not be achieved if the stock was given to a charitable institution not under the control of the donor.

A related factor is that a grant to the foundation leaves the donor with continuing control over the charitable distributions which the foundation will make. If the funds were given to a university, the donor can specify at the time of his gift the purpose for which the money can be used. Thereafter, however, the money passes beyond his control.

In sum, it is clear that a wide variety of reasons may motivate the establishment of foundations. We believe, however, that the ability to obtain a tax deduction and still maintain an element of control over the asset which is contributed, is likely to be the most important factor. This is suggested by the way in which foundations get their money.

As the attached chart shows, more than three-fourths of the assets of foundations were contributed in the form of appreciated intangible property. And more than half was stock of a company in which the donor and his family had an interest in excess of 20%.

Most foundations in terms of numbers have not received control stock in a corporation. Our data show that only 8% of foundations have ever owned more than 20% of the stock of a company, and only 4% now do. But over half of the large foundations in our study with assets over 10 million dollars have owned such control stock, and this, of course, explains why such a large portion of total contributions is in these forms.

OWNERSHIP OF CONTROL STOCK

Foundation type	Percent of foundations—
	Ever owning 20 percent of stock in a company	Now owning 20 percent of the stock in a company
Under $1,000,000 in assets	7	4
$1,000,000 to $10,000,000	11	6

Over $100,000,000	57	36

All foundations	8	4

It is apparent that the privilege of contributing control stock and other appreciated property is of paramount importance in the creation of new foundations of significant size. And both of these forms of contribution to foundations are severely limited in the House bill.

B. Distinctive characteristics of foundations

Recognizing that great variety exists within the foundation field, what characteristics make foundations distinctive? We believe that there are two factors which most clearly distinguish foundations from other institutions from other institutions in our society.

First, and most important is the fact that foundations have funds which are not committed to their own on-going activities. Practically every other organization in our society, whether it be a government agency, a corporation of a university, is likely to have its future activities dictated in part by the momentum of its on-going programs. The budget pressures of existing programs generally make it very difficult to find funds for different kinds of programs. The most distinctive thing about foundations is that they have substantial amounts of "free" money which their trustees can spend next year for purposes quite different from those pursued in the present year. This gives foundations a degree of flexibility, unmatched by any other institution in our society. This potential for doing new things is of very great importance to a society confronted by an era of great change.

Second, foundations with endowments are not required to raise new funds. This frees them from an element of external control which most other institutions must face. Government agencies must satisfy Congressional authorization and appropriations committees, as well as the Budget Bureau. Corporations must satisfy both their customers and their investors. Universities must satisfy a variety of existing and potential sources of funds. The absence of such external controls is also of great importance in giving foundations a potential for flexibility far greater than that possessed by other institutions.

Both the freedom from internal compulsions and from external financial controls are, of course, of great value to foundations. However, they also represent a real risk. Foundations are not subject to the discipline which institutions with budgetary pressures inevitably have. This manifests itself in a variety of ways. First, foundations have not been under pressure to maximize the return on their investments. Second, they have been free, within relatively broad legal limits, to decide whether to spend money currently or to let their assets appreciate for future years. Third, they have not been under the same pressure to control costs and expenses as are other organizations, particularly those which must compete in the market place.

In sum, the distinctive characteristics of foundations give them a great potential for doing important work. However, they also create a considerable potential for abuse or for inadequate performance.

O. Assessment of foundations

On balance, do the advantages of foundations outweigh the dangers? In approaching this question we have attempted to review both the accomplishments and shortcomings of foundations. Any evaluation of foundations accomplishments is, of course, enormously difficult. No "cost-benefit" analysis, comparing the loss of tax income with the social benefits produced by foundations, is possible. There are no meaningful yardsticks to "measure" foundation performance. Would similar results have occurred if funds went directly from Donor to recipient or if the project had been funded by government? Even the significance of a particular grant is invariably difficult to assess. This is inherent in the fact that foundations are grant-making institutions: How can one accurately apportion the relative degree of credit (or of blame) for a foundation-financed program between the foundation which provided the money and the recipient who did the work? For example, the fact that a foundation has assisted a long list of Nobel Prize winners may mean that the foundation has made some very productive grants. It could also mean that the foundations has been quite unimaginative and limited its grants to big names who could readily have received help from other sources.

In our survey of distinguished citizens we sought their opinion on whether society is better off with foundations:

An overwhelming 95 percent responded that they believed that we were better off.

Recognizing that no present assessment of the "value" of foundations can be made, we are nonetheless convinced that a favorable judgment on their role in American life is justified. This conclusion is based on the fact that foundations have been closely associated with a large number of highly-significant projects, many of which might not have been performed without foundation support. We believe this judgment is shared by leading authorities in all of the principal areas of activity in which foundations have worked, including education, medicine, science and technology, the humanities and the arts, civil rights, welfare and others.

Next we asked these individuals if they were aware of significant developments, achievements or innovations in their field in which foundations made a contribution. A total of eighty-one percent were able to indicate contributions.

OVERALL IMPACT:

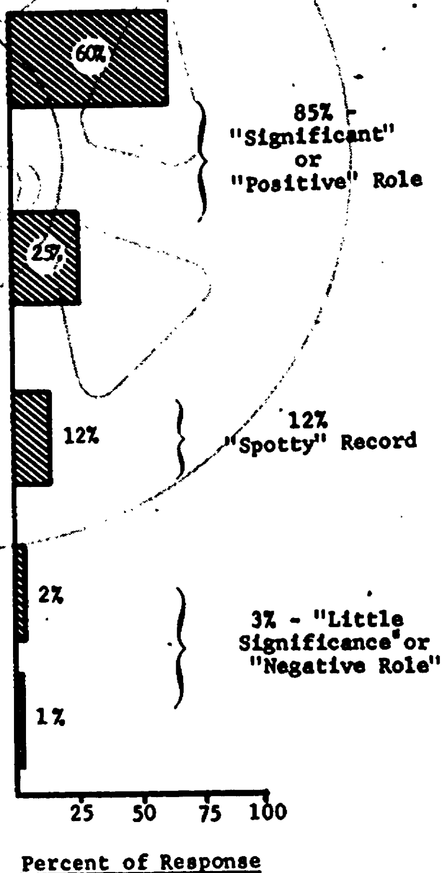
Foundations have played a very significant role in this field - without them, some of the significant developments perhaps would not have taken place at all, or at least would ~~not~~ have been delayed.

On balance, foundations have played a positive role - they have tended to support worthwhile projects - but on the whole they have been worthwhile.

My overall reaction to the contribution of foundations is a mixed one - the record is a "spotty" one, good some of the time, but insignificant, non-existent and even negative at other times.

Foundations have contributed very little of significance in this field.

Foundations have played a negative role in this field - I believe the field would have been better off without them.



In our final report we will examine some of the achievements of foundations, drawing on the expertise of members of our Commission and on various studies which we have sponsored. I do not think it would be helpful at this time to attempt to elaborate at length on examples of particular foundation achievements, especially since your Committee has already heard from foundation representatives and recipients on this subject.

It is our overall judgment that foundations have demonstrated some unique capability to support useful work which other organizations, individual donors, and government were unable to or unlikely to sponsor. And we believe foundations have the potential to make more important contributions in the future.

It is apparent to us that the record of foundations includes significant abuses and shortcomings, as well as great accomplishments. We believe that both the defenders and the detractors of foundations are mistaken when they endeavor to draw up some kind of equation between accomplishments and abuses. Visualize trying to apply such a test to government or to a particular administration. Such a task is both impossible and irrelevant.

Foundation accomplishments do not excuse the abuses; nor do the abuses justify the hamstringing of foundations. As our specific recommendations will indicate, the abuses can be dealt with effectively without reducing the potential for accomplishments.

Foundations and government

One justification for the grant of a tax incentive is that it encourages work of great public interest which government institutions either are not performing or cannot perform. This has traditionally been true in the field of education, in scientific research, and in many other areas of foundation activity. Over the last 30 years the vast expansion in the role of government has radically changed the basic relationship between foundations and government. In all of the traditional areas of foundation activity, including health, education, welfare and scientific research, government expenditures—federal, state and local—are now far higher than foundation spending. This is true even in newer areas such as civil rights, the population problem, and environmental protection. Perhaps only in the religious field and in the arts are the foundations spending larger sums than government agencies.

The rationale for foundations can no longer be that they are working in fields in which the government is not active. The basic question which must be answered is whether, notwithstanding governmental responsibilities, foundations are capable of making a useful contribution. This is a question to which our Commission has devoted very substantial time and on which we have obtained the thoughts of many knowledgeable people.

We believe that foundations have significant advantages over government agencies in several important respects:

1. It is much easier for a foundation to carry on a controversial experiment than it is for a government agency. The system of checks and balances under which government programs are conceived and executed makes it extremely difficult to tolerate failures. It also makes it very difficult to operate on a small scale. Political administrations are often not around long enough to wait for the five or more years it make take to know whether a given approach works. This introduces a two-fold bias. An experimental program which looks as though it may produce negative results may well be killed too early. A program which looks promising may well be given broad application prematurely.

Many knowledgeable observers suggest, for example, that one of the major problems with such anti-poverty programs as Community Action has been that experimental approaches were proliferated too widely too early, with inadequate evaluation of results. Similar criticism has been leveled at the Model Cities Program.

Foundations are considerably freer than government to experiment. It is possible for a foundation to sponsor a project in one community without being exposed to pressure to duplicate the experiment in every other Congressional District. Similarly, the flexibility of a foundation as a grant-making institution makes it possible to write off an unsuccessful experiment without the dangers this would involve in a government program.

2. Government programs are difficult to launch in sensitive areas which are likely to arouse controversy. The objections of a vocal minority can often stop a government program. The fact that foundations are relatively freer from public pressure allows them to be considerably more venturesome.

Foundation work in the birth control field provides an excellent example. A growing national acceptance fostered by work supported by foundation funds made it much easier for government to enter this field.

The national assessment program in education provides another example. The hostility to federal intervention in the operation of local schools made it impossible for the federal government to undertake a program which would involve the measurement of the levels of achievement in different schools systems throughout the country. It was, however, possible to launch such a program with foundations. Once under way it has become possible for the government to get aboard.

3. The need for government action to meet requirements for a broad consensus makes it much harder for the government to proceed in areas where only a minority has a significant interest. Government support of the arts, of the humanities, provide early examples. Perhaps the growth of educational television illustrates this pattern. In the early days of educational television it is unlikely that much enthusiasm could have been generated for government support. Nurtured by Ford Foundation support almost exclusively, then studied by the Carnegie Commission under the leadership of James Killian; we saw the concept of public educational television born in the form of the Public Broadcasting Corporation. In each of these areas the foundations have filled a need which was not being met by government.

4. Government programs rarely cover a field uniformly. Thus foundations can generally pick niches where special needs or opportunities exist. Thus, for example, while much government money is available for manpower training, foundation funds were able to recognize the need for programs designed to up-grade existing employees at a time when government funding was directed primarily to low-level entry jobs.

5. The greater flexibility of foundation procedures makes it possible to respond much more quickly to unusual situations than government agencies can. This has been proven time and again in areas such as the safeguarding of recreational lands for National Parks.

6. Foundation-financed programs may often be acceptable where government-financed programs would be unwelcome. For example, studies of student unrest in the colleges can be more readily conducted with foundation funds than with government money. Similarly, international programs in some non-aligned countries may well have an acceptance which government programs do not have.

7. Studies of public policy issues in which the government has a direct interest are much more difficult to carry on with government funds. It is far easier to assure the objectivity of such studies when the funding comes from a foundation. Currently, for example, until the Brooking Institution launched its pioneering efforts to appraise defense policy, there was not a single, independent institution reviewing military policy and premises—at a time when much of the public probably welcomes another view. We believe that this is a point of very substantial importance. With the increasing complexity of governmental programs, objective studies of governmental programs at a federal, state and local level are essential.

All in all, we are persuaded that a complex society like ours benefits when an independent and sophisticated private sector institution can pioneer, espond, complement, fill the niches, and even criticize and evaluate government programs.

V. REGULATIONS OF FOUNDATIONS

While we conclude that foundations are institutions that have vital and in some ways unique roles to play in our society, we also conclude that certain abuses and dangers exist that deserve serious attention.

Precisely because foundations are private sector organizations, it is important they be given a great deal of freedom to make their distinctive contribtuion in their own way. On the other hand, precisely because foundations have been granted substantial tax deductions, the public has a distinct interest in knowing that charity receives a proper return on the investment society has made. Like any capital investment—and a foundation is ultimately a form of capitalized philanthropy—it is essential to look at both the short term—what are foundations doing for charity currently—and long term—what are foundations going to do for charity in the years ahead.

What kind of actions are needed to assure that foundations provide society with an adequate social return on the capital invested in them?

First, of course, we need to be concerned about various kinds of financial abuses that benefit the donor at the expense of the foundation and therefore of charity. This may be attributable, in some measure, to the donor's misconception that it is "his" foundation and therefore "his" money.

As an aside, let me note that the use of the term "private foundation" in the House bill is unfortunate. We believe the emphasis should be on the public, rather than on the private, character of foundations. Substituting the term "philanthropic foundation" might help to emphasize that foundations are there to benefit charity, not private individuals.

Second, there are what we might call grant-making abuses that result from spending foundation money for purposes that are not properly charitable.

Third, and perhaps most serious, are problems which adversely affect the amounts paid out to charity. This may be due either to poor investment management or to decisions to save foundation earnings for future uses.

Self-dealing problems

Let us start with the financial abuses—the so-called self-dealing problems that give rise to a good deal of the "tax dodge" criticism.

What is the incidence of these abuses? Are they so frequent as to cause one to doubt whether the institution of foundations is worth saving, or are financial abuses at a level which represents an irritant which must be cured but not a cause for severely restricting foundations?

The problem this question presents to a non-governmental commission such as ours is an obvious one. We have no subpoena powers, nor the authority to audit. Thus, we had to try some indirect approaches. I use the word indirect to suggest that it obviously isn't as simple as asking the given foundation whether it engages in financial abuses.

Our first approach was to estimate the extent of transactions between the donor and the foundation that give rise to the possibility for abuse. Foundations are required on their tax return (Form 990-A) to answer certain questions relating to self-dealing transactions. We decided to tabulate some 500 of these forms. The answers are shown below and suggest that a relatively small fraction of the foundations seem to have transactions between the donor and the foundation.

All this indicates of course is the potential for abuse and we searched for ways of getting at least an indication of the extent to which this potential was realized.

It occurred to our staff that tax accountants are perhaps better informed than anyone else and might be a source of information.

* It must be emphasized that the current law does not prohibit self-dealing transactions but rather imposes an arms-length or reasonable standard. Thus, while these transactions are potential self-dealing abuses, it should not be assumed they are violations.

Arthur Andersen, a leading accounting firm, promised complete anonymity to some two hundred accountants across the country (they did not sign the questionnaires) if they would indicate their own experience with foundation abuses.

The answers of the accountants speak for themselves. They indicate that a very substantial majority feel that self-dealing abuses are rare. At the same time 5% to 10% believe these abuses to be quite common.

Clearly any tax abuse is bothersome, but when it reaches a level above the extreme exception—then something drastic should be done. Our reading of these findings is that while it is quite unwarranted to suggest "foundations are nothing but tax dodges" there is enough potential for abuse to warrant vigorous action. We strongly support legislation that prohibits self-dealing.

A study of abuses would be superficial if it assumed that the currently acknowledged abuses are the only ones to be concerned about. Through a wide variety of sources we have identified some additional abuses that we believe are worth your specific attention. Permit me to illustrate some of these.

1. Company foundations have been largely ignored in much of the anxiety over foundation abuses. They should not be. We believe these are situations in which company foundations seem to be making grants that are more appropriately business expenses. The privilege of tax exemption on income is, of course, extended to foundation income but not company income. It is thus improper to use foundation funds for what are properly business expenses.

Two illustrations will suffice. First, grants of a foundation for research in the industry in which the company operates has significant potential for special benefits to the company. How should the public be made aware of and benefit from such research? How do competitors gain access to this research? Second, company foundation grants to customers or suppliers of the company present some complex issues which deserve careful scrutiny.

2. Serious abuses may result from the over-valuation of property contributed by a donor to his foundation. Although over-valuation problems can also arise in connection with contributions to other charitable organizations, the potential for abuse may be somewhat more acute in the case of foundations, where the donor is in effect on both sides of the transaction. The risk of self-dealing abuse is aggravated by the infrequent level of government auditing; the passage of time after a transaction has taken place complicates the problem of determining a fair valuation.

We would recommend that significant contributions of property to foundations be validated by independent appraisals at the time of the contribution.

3. Substantial overlap in stock ownership between donors and foundations appears to be fairly common. This raises some rather interesting questions of how one can be sure that the foundations' interest in maximizing the return from portfolio protected. One need not be unduly imaginative to visualize a case in which the donor has the foundation buy stock in a company in which he also owns stock, in order to inflate the price artificially so that he can profit; or, alternatively, sell his stock in a market downturn before the foundation stock is sold.

Disclosure requirements specifically directed to such transactions would probably help reduce their incidence.

4. We have also heard about cases in which the foundation conditions a grant to a charitable organization by specifying that an individual related to the donor should receive benefits, such as free tuition in a religious school. Once again, improved disclosure on all grants where individuals are specified, could be helpful in discouraging such practices.

5. We have seen a few cases where excessive administrative expenses resulted in a diversion of funds from charity.

The Commission favors a legislative prohibition on payment of excessive or unnecessary expenditures. Such expenditures should be limited to the same kind of "ordinary and necessary" rule of reason that is used in the deductibility of business expenses.

Increased IRS auditing

Once the abuses to be corrected have been identified, it is obviously necessary to make sure that the legislative intent is carried out. We believe that the most effective weapon both for determining the level of abuses and minimizing them in the future is an intensive auditing program. That the audit program has not been adequate, at either the federal or the state level, is obvious from the following chart from our foundation survey.

GOVERNMENT AUDITING OF FOUNDATIONS

"To the best of your knowledge, has the foundation been audited in the past ten years by state officials or the Federal Internal Revenue Service?"

Percent of foundations reporting

Yes, had been audited	34
State audits	8
IRS audits	29

We understand the serious budgetary pressures of the Internal Revenue Service and the fact that high priority is placed on audits that increase tax revenues. Thus it is not surprising to discover such a low level of audits. How law is perhaps best illustrated by reminding you that the Ford Foundation, largest of all foundations by a 4-fold margin, is only now undergoing the second IRS audit in its history.

The crisis in confidence confronting foundations merits intensive action. It is not only irrational but it is unfair both to foundations and to the public interest to permit allegations of tax dodging to persist without using the available regulatory tool to correct abuses.

Our Commission recommends that all foundations be audited at least once in the next three years. We recognize that this will involve a substantial step-up in IRS auditing activity. However, we believe that only an effort on such a scale will be adequate to assure the public that the privilege of setting up a foundation is not being abused. The results of such a three-year program should also provide sufficient data to enable Congress to make informed decisions regarding the proper level of future surveillance.

We recognize that the cost of an increased audit program is substantial and we propose that this cost be paid by a special user charge payable by the foundations. Such a charge should reasonably reflect the actual cost increase of this special regulatory effort, and would be limited to the three-year period. The Commission believes the user fees should be paid into an earmarked fund in which the costs of this auditing program are carefully cost-justified at least annually. This cost is likely to be substantially less than the 7½% tax on investment income proposed by the House and perhaps even the 2% tax recommended by the Treasury.

As a matter of principle, we question the desirability of charging philanthropic institutions for the cost of IRS supervision when the cost of supervising corporations as well as charitable institutions is borne by the regular administrative budget and is not made a special charge. We would suggest, therefore, that the precedent of the user charge be limited to the special three-year audit program we are recommending.

State regulation

Some students of the problem of regulation have urged that the states be given a larger role in policing foundation activities. They contend that the states have an incentive to supervise foundations because of their interest in the collection of estate, income and other taxes.

This contention seems refuted by the evidence that in the last ten years only 8 percent of the foundations in our survey have been audited by state agencies. New York State has shown a deep interest in foundations and their activities, but most states have neglected the problem, a condition reflecting their lack of staff and resources for the task.

Another defect in proposals to refer the regulatory problem to the states is the lack of uniform state laws in a field where uniformity is clearly desirable. We shall discuss this need at greater length in our final report, but for the time being it seems conclusive that until the states agree on standards of auditing and related subjects, and work out a complementary system of regulation, it would be imprudent to rely on state agencies to do the job. The public concern is too urgent to be dismissed by a shift of responsibility that in most states would be tantamount to no regulation at all.

Self-regulation

Self-regulation by the foundations themselves has also been advanced as a solution to the abuses which have been exposed. Over the long term, an organization from the foundation field may indeed play such a role. But we are concerned with the large number of foundations unaffiliated with existing foundation organizations and among whom may well be some of the most likely offenders.

Responsible foundation groups are now beginning a commendable effort to police the field, but the lack of sanctions limits the effectiveness of their efforts to meet the current urgency. Perhaps in the future, when government measures have curbed the less scrupulous and there is fuller membership in a central organization, self-regulation can play a larger role.

There is, of course, an important distinction between formal disclosure and adequate public communication. Events of the past year have demonstrated the existence of a communications gap between foundations and a number of their constituencies.

There is no reason why policy makers, such as your committee, should not have answers to the many questions that today remain unanswered. What are the assets of the foundations? How are these assets being managed? What return do they bring? For what purpose are grants being made? What is the degree of foundation involvement in various areas of our society?

Our Commission believes the best interests of foundations and the public would be served if some new approaches to disclosure were adopted.

Perhaps the first step of such a program is to modify the annual reporting form in fundamental ways so as to provide some of the following kinds of information and benefits:

1. Uniform Accounting Standards.—There are enormous variations in the meaning and interpretation of such terms as value of assets (cost or market), grants (amounts actually paid or amounts authorized for payment), administrative expenses (with or without investment management fees), etc.

2. Purposes of Grants.—The 990–A form does not include adequate information about the purposes of the grants. Both for purposes of statistical analysis and for prospective recipients more information would be useful.

3. Investment Activities.—In this area, too, the 990–A form is inadequate. More detailed information will be helpful as a means of preventing and policing abuses, and measuring investment return.

In addition to annual disclosure we believe there are occasions for special reports, on a more immediate basis, in connection with potentially controversial activities. In particular, we urge that prompt disclosure to government agencies be made in connection with any foundation program which involves payments to government employees. We also believe that any policy studies which involve more than occasional contacts with members of Congress and their staffs should require registration under the Federal Lobbying Act.

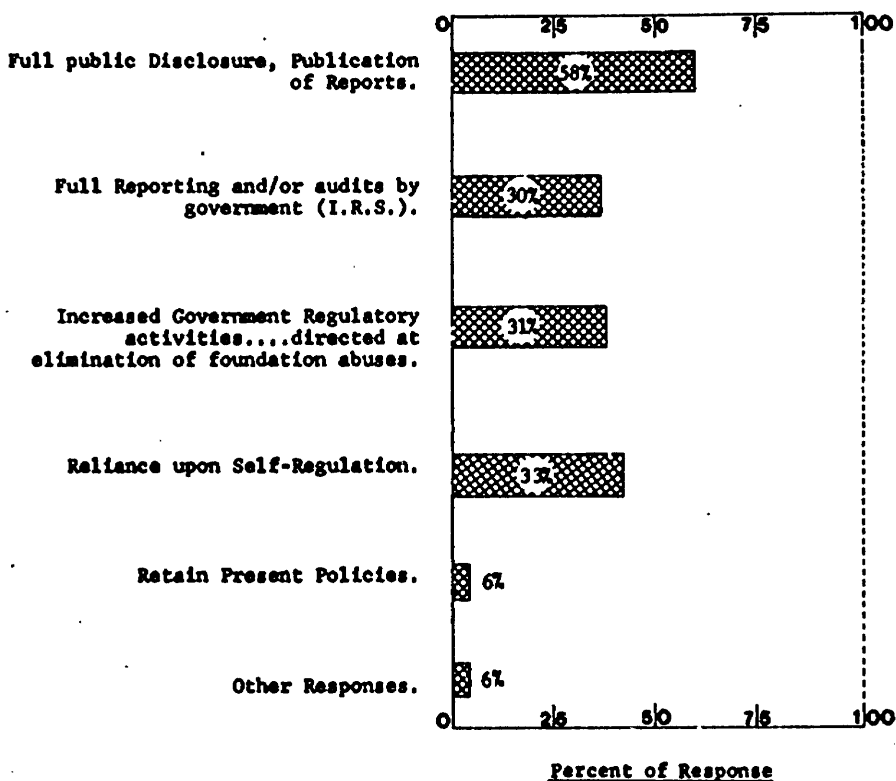
Public Disclosure

It is interesting to note that our distinguished citizen group when asked what methods of regulating foundations were desirable, frequently mentioned more extensive public disclosure. That view is endorsed by our Commission.

DISTINGUISHED CITIZENS STUDY
PRELIMINARY DATA
OCTOBER, 1969



Requiring individual foundations to furnish more detailed reports is not by itself sufficient to overcome the information gap. We recommend two other steps: First, there should be an annual statistical report to Congress and the public on the activities of foundations. This country has too large a financial stake—at this point unknown billions—not to be better informed on the return from this investment. Second, we recommend that the accessibility of reports about foundations be improved. We commend the program of the Foundation Center in New York to provide access to such information. Similar efforts should be encouraged in other parts of the country.

The public disclosure procedures we are urging would serve five purposes:

1. They would help to re-establish public confidence in foundations.
2. They would provide information to help Congress and the Executive Branch to reach wise policy decisions about foundations.

3. They would make it easier for prospective recipients of grants to determine which foundations are interested in particular fields or work.

4. They should significantly reduce questionable practices. We need only to look to the field of securities regulations to see what a profound difference public disclosure can have.

5. Greater disclosure, if coupled with equity jurisdiction in the Federal courts, may make it possible to enjoin improper activities at an early stage.

Sanctions of violations

There are serious shortcomings both in the existing penalties for violations of the legal rules applicable to foundations, and in the new sanctions proposed in the House bill. The principal existing sanction—loss of tax exemption—is so drastic as to be useless except in the most extreme cases. The provision of the House bill for a graduated system of "taxes" for various forms of violation has other shortcomings. We recognize that this is a highly technical subject and I am not in a position to make detailed recommendations. Let me outline, however, the general principles which we believe a satisfactory system of sanctions should embody:

First, the objective of the system of sanctions should be to make charity whole, not to increase the collection of taxes. As a general rule, penalties should not be levied against the assets of the foundations, but rather against the persons responsible for the violation. An individual who has enriched himself at the expense of the foundation, should be required to make the foundation whole.

Second, fines should only be levied where the prohibited conduct can be defined in an unambiguous manner. In particular, fines should not be imposed in areas where there are difficult questions of judgment, as may arise in connection with certain investment-policy and grant-making decisions.

Third, provision should be made for promptly enjoining improper activities rather than penalizing them after they have occurred. We are attracted by the possibility of providing equity jurisdiction in the Federal courts. This can be readily provided by Congressional action; we see no constitutional problem. This is a subject which our Commission has under study.

We believe that Federal equity jurisdiction would provide a very useful additional tool for the regulation of foundations. Action in the Federal courts could be initiated by the U.S. Attorney General. Such actions could be brought at the request of the Internal Revenue Service. An action for an injunction would be particularly appropriate in preventing questionable activities in the political or legislative area where legal remedies such as fines could be too little or too late.

The successful development of equitable remedies might well be a much more effective way to deal with controversial and difficult cases than would be possible through present administrative procedures. Particularly where sensitive issues are raised such as drawing the line between proper educational activities and improper political activities, we believe that the courts are uniquely qualified to provide prompt and effective relief.

Fourth, sanctions should be geared to the seriousness of the violation, and whether it is willful or inadvertent. For minor or technical violations, a warning with an opportunity to make corrections may be sufficient. In other cases monetary penalites will be necessary. Such penalties should not be automatically measured by the amount involved in the improper transaction.

Penalties should increase in the event of repeated violations. The level of fines should not be so severe as to discourage individuals from becoming trustees and officers of foundations. We believe that the penalties contained in the House bill, particularly in connection with grant-making and investment activities would have a chilling effect. The difficulties which corporations have been encountering in obtaining the services of outside directors, notwithstanding the availability of directors' liability insurance, makes it clear that this can be a very real problem.

Grant-making activities of foundations

It is commonly assumed by many persons, in view of recent publicity, that foundations devote a large percentage of their funds to political, controversial or quasi-charitable activities. When we sought to investigate these assumptions we found that very little was actually known about how foundations spent their money.

As I noted previously, 93 percent of the grants of all foundations are made to qualified charitable organizations—74 percent to 80 percent organizations. This distribution percentage remains relatively constant for each type of foundation.

We also sought detailed information on the purpose of foundation grants in the year 1968. We asked foundations to distribute their grants among the following purposes:

Educational (Educational research, elementary, secondary, higher, and adult education programs [except manpower or vocational training]).

Health and medicine (medical research, treatment, and education [includes hospitals, clinics, public health education and services, such as birth control clinics, etc.]).

General welfare (support of Community Chest, United Fund, Welfare Council and similar general welfare agencies).

Community action or services (organizing or supporting designated groups [including, for example youth groups, such as "gangs"], neighborhoods, or regions, planning for community improvement, and provision of community facilities not elsewhere classified).

Cultural organizations and facilities (libraries, art galleries, museums, symphonies, theater, educational television).

Religion (support of a church, synagogue, or other religious organization primarily for religious instruction, practice or other predominantly religious purpose).

Science and technology (all non-medical research and development in the physical and natural sciences and technological applications of scientific knowledge).

Arts and humanities (support of artistic endeavors—writing, fine arts, music, and research and publication in the humanities).

Social sciences (all social science research and publication not elsewhere classified).

Manpower training and employment (research on manpower problems, vocational and job training and related programs).

Community, ethnic or inter-racial relations (improvement of inter-group understanding and relations).

Individual and family services and support (provision of food, clothing, and other necessities, and services [except medical or educational services] for the needy).

Recreational and conservation (provision of recreation facilities and programs, parks, conservation of natural resources, wildlife preservation).

Housing (design, construction, or provision of housing, and improvement of housing conditions or access to housing for designated groups).

Projects directly related to the political process (Voter registration, voter education, schools for political candidates, etc.).

I should tell you that the Ford Foundation has generously agreed to permit us to present some of its grant-making activities separately in view of their importance.

The data show that more than 50 percent of all grants were for education, health, and medicine.

We have also calculated the percentage of foundations by type which make grants only to qualified charitable organizations. As shown on this chart 81 percent of all foundations limit their grants to this type of recipient.

We had heard that foundations are mainly interested in making innovative grants and thus we asked each foundation in our survey "Has the foundation made any grants or gifts in the past three years which you consider innovative, experimental or out-of-the ordinary?" Only 12 percent answered "yes" to this question.

We also asked "Have any of the projects supported by your foundation's grants or gifts in the past three years been considered controversial or particularly unpopular?" Less than 1 percent answered "yes".

We sought to test these answers by asking whether or not each foundation had made grants in the past three years for various specific activities which could be considered controversial. The minuscule percentage of foundation grant dollars devoted to each is reflected by the following chart:

Percentage of foundation grants in the last 3 years for specified sensitive or controversial activities

Finally, we specifically investigated the reported grants to individuals (5% of total foundation grants) to determine the purpose for which each grant was made. Over 90 percent of these grants were either scholarships, fellowships or research grants.

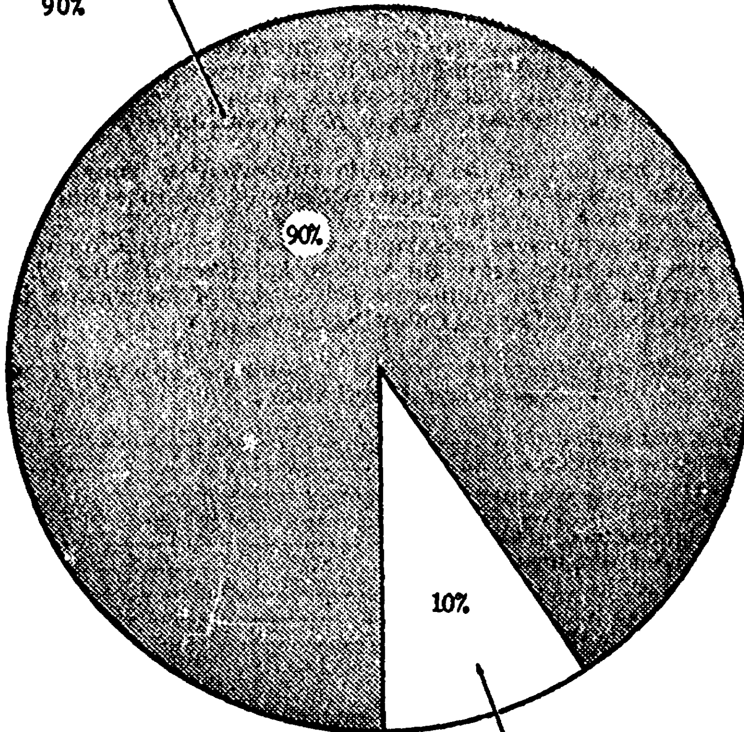
Preliminary October, 1969

FOUNDATION GRANTS



* These grant amounts appear to have gone primarily to recipients in the United States.

Since their grant-making activities are the basic reason for the existence of foundations, it is appropriate that this subject should have occupied more time than any other in our Commission's deliberations. We have listened to presentations by representatives of foundations and by distinguished citizens with governmental and other experience relevant to foundation grant-making.

Unquestionably, the most sensitive area of grants is that in which the purpose may involve contact with government at some point through interaction with welfare programs, through possible influence on voters, or on possible legislative or administrative action. The subject presents complex problems, requiring a balancing of conflicting considerations.

Studies of Public Issues and the Legislative Process.—We reached the basic premise that it is impossible to draw any line of demarcation between the foundations' fields of interest and those of government. Federal, state and local governments are active in practically every significant area of foundation interest, and usually on a much larger scale. This is true both of the conventional fields of philanthropy—health, education, welfare, science and technology—but also in newer areas such as urban problems, civil rights and population studies.

Far from deploring this intertwining and interaction of private and governmental programs, we consider this a healthy feature of American society. Interchanges between the private and public sector in the formulation of policy is an essential part of the democratic system. In the infinitely complex problems facing government today it becomes at once more important to have private participation in decision-making, and more difficult to make significant private contributions.

The work of our own Commission will serve as an illustration of the difficulties I describe. We have, up to this point, operated without foundation financing. I can testify from personal experience how difficult it is to raise funds from other sources. We quickly discovered that private individuals cannot deal adequately with even a relatively limited subject except after extensive study and far-ranging fact-gathering. This is not only time consuming, but can be very costly, even though the members of the Commission serve without compensation. Our experience is far from unique, and leads us inexorably to the conclusion that foundation funds are much the best source for financing private efforts to study significant policy issues. Any legal restriction on the use of such funds for studies of public issues must inevitably impair private contributions to decisions on public policy.

In view of the desirability of such contributions, we do not think distinctions should be made between legislative decision-making and executive decision-making. One of the members of our Commission, who has had extensive Congressional experience, feels strongly that the massive scale of the executive branch contributions to the legislative process makes it particularly useful that there be well-conceived private contributions to Congressional deliberations. Furthermore, we think there is no practical or logical basis for distinguishing between public issues which may become the subject of legislative or administrative action and those which will not. Almost any significant public issue may become the subject of legislative attention. The purest research on cancer may eventually bring restrictions on tobacco advertising, or a study of highway safety result in automotive design regulations.

The higher the quality of the research, the more likely the results are to influence governmental action, as witness Professor Einstein's famous equation. For this reason we consider it unwise and undesirable to attempt to shield legislators and their staffs from contact with private groups engaged in studies which are of legislative interest, as the House bill seeks to do. If the only pressures on legislators came from the foundations, perhaps you could elect to lead a trouble-free life, but as a practical matter an informed voice ought to be more welcome than a merely self-seeking one.

Let me add, and here again I am speaking from personal experience, the exchange of ideas between private individuals and members of Congress and their staffs is mutually beneficial. On most major matters of public interest, members of Congress and their staff are among the foremost experts. The work of our Commission has benefited greatly from our communications with the members and the staffs of this Committee and those of the House Ways and Means Committee.

The provision in the House bill permitting foundations to make available the results of "non-partisan analysis and research" is, in our opinion, far too limited an exception to the restriction on communication affecting legislation. The word "non-partisan" is highly ambiguous. If it means free from any possible impact on party politics, the exemption would be practically meaningless, for any significant public issue can become a matter of partisan controversy. If "non-partisan" means that no conclusion may be drawn it would cancel the purpose for which most studies are undertaken. Could we have interested the 15 members of our Commission, for example, to spend much of their valuable time in earnest study of an urgent public problem if they could not come to any conclusions?

While we feel strongly that there should be no impediment on foundation-financed studies, even though they may have an impact on the formulation of legislation, we recognize that this is an area of genuine sensitivity. The solution, we believe, lies in prompt and full disclosure rather than in prohibitions. We believe there should be advance disclosure of any foundation-financed study if such study involves any substantial number of contracts with members of Congress or their staffs. In addition, any foundation grant which involves compensation to government employees should be disclosed before such payments are made. With respect to executive branch employees, prior notice should be given to the head of the department employing the particular individual. Where legislative employees are involved, notice might go to the Clerk of the Senate or of the House.

Lest there be any misunderstanding, let me emphasize that foundation involvement should be limited to legitimate studies of public issues. The privilege to engage in educational activities which may have an impact on legislation must not be abused. It clearly does not provide a license to carry on pure and lobbying activities.

Elective Politics.—Our Commission fully endorses the prohibitions on foundation involvement in elective politcs. Tax-exempt funds should not be used in election campaigns, whether to support the election of candidates or to influence the vote on measures in referendums. The policy considerations in this area are well settled and do not need further elaboration.

"Grass Roots" Campaigns.—We agree that foundation funds should not be used for "grass roots" campaigns designed to bring pressure on legislators. The only proper role of foundations in the political process is an educational one. Where the objective is political pressure rather than dissemination of ideas, foundation involvement becomes improper. We recognize, of course, that this principle is more easily stated than applied in practice. However, the fact that there may be some difficult borderline case is no reason for ignoring the underlying principle. We would encourage foundations to seek advance rulings before venturing into questionable areas. This should not be a legislative requirement.

Definition of Propaganda.—Starting from the premise that the legitimate functions of foundations in the political process is an educational one, we agree that the use of foundation funds for propaganda purposes should be barred. However, we would urge a redefinition of what constitutes propaganda. Truth may be used as propaganda as in the public exhortations to send your child to the dentist. The test should not be whether "both sides" are presented in an impartial manner, or whether conclusions are drawn, but whether the material being distributed is educational in character. We recommend that this test be applied in a conservative manner. The line between "propaganda" and "education" should not provide a basis for censorship of ideas. Only in very clear-cut cases, such as hate material, which no reasonable man could consider as eductional, should the restriction on propaganda be invoked.

Payout requirement

We start out with the simple proposition that every institution should be judged according to how well it achieves its basic purpose. Thus, a business corporation is measured by its growth in sales and profits; a foundation, by what it contributes to charity.

Foundations represent a huge capital investment in philanthropy—unknown billions, but probably somewhere between 20 and 30 billion dollars.

This capitalized philanthropy has been jointly funded by the donor and by society at large through a tax deduction. Thus, the public has every reason to be interested in a satisfactory return on this capital investment. If indeed the value of foundations is, say, 25 billion dollars—every percentage point improvement in return represents 250 million dollars more annually to charity. As one watches the tortuous process you must be going through to add 250 million dollars of additional tax revenues, this is not a moot point. And when you consider that the current evidence suggests that foundation rates of return might reasonably be expected to increase not one but several percentage points—it becomes worth serious scrutiny.

What is the total rate of return on foundations—total return being the virtually universal measuring stick used by mutual funds, profit sharing funds, pension funds, and endowment funds? It includes the interest, dividends, the realized and unrealized capital gains and does not differentiate between various kinds of income on the very rational thesis that for tax-exempt organizations (of all institutions) it makes no difference because no tax is paid on any income—whether dividends, capital gains, interest, etc.

What is a reasonable total return? As you might expect, funds that have higher percentages of equity stock have done better over the last 40 years whereas balanced funds with more debt instruments have not generally done as well.

Over the last ten years, here is the total return as presented in a study entitled "Managing Educational Endowments"—

1959–69 annual average, in percent

21 balanced funds	9.2
10 large general growth funds	14.6

In 1968 we are told that an average performance of mutual funds was 15.3% return for a so-called common stock mutual fund, and 14.9% return for a balanced fund.

How has the total return been on the foundation assets?

To estimate this, however imperfectly, we asked the Arthur Anderson Company to compute the total return on a sample of 990A forms for various sizes of foundations.

We say imperfect estimates because we were not able to verify in all cases whether the market value was shown, but it is at least as good an estimate as we can make. Shown below is the median return (to help offset any major swings caused by any disproportionate effect of those not showing market values).

990A foundation forms 1968 total investment return (median), in percent

Asset size:
1 to 10 million	6.1
10 to 100 million	7.7
100 million and over	8.0
Community foundations	5.9
Company foundations	6.0

It might be said that one year is not an adequate period (though it does seem significant that in every category the return is substantially lower than balanced funds' performance of nearly 15% in 1968).

It might be said that our data are not as accurate as they could be because of possible confusions in reporting. (Here we would agree, but we were hopeful the median calculation would help minimize any such effects.)

In the case of 14 selected large foundations, we were able to confirm the accuracy of the total return data and here again for this one year, 1968, see a return of 8% for this foundation group vs. the 15% figure for balanced funds.

The Commission discussed this question of investment returns with a number of investment experts and found a good deal of confirmation—or perhaps suspicion would be a more accurate word—that returns on foundation investments were significantly lower.

For example, I quote from an article in the Institutional Investor of November, 1968, entitled "Foundations: The Quiet $20 Billion"—

"Is there a place as yet untouched by the revolution in money management? Where the winds of performance are not felt, where the opportuning cries of ambitious brokers are not heard, a last redoubt so quiet the clocks can be heard ticking?

"There is such a place, and it is called foundationland. There, tax-exempt, is twenty billion dollars, one of the bigger pools of capital in capitalism and it is still run the way money used to be. The way it used to be, that is for Widows and Orphans, before currency began to depreciate. In foundationland the verities are Preservation of Capital and Yield, verities the current generation shies from. In foundationland, the managers do not often buy their stocks, because they already have them—they were given them many years ago, and now they sit, quietly watching."

This article refers to stock turnover rate for foundations from an SEC study—in the range of 1% to 2% a year—which investment experts tell us is extraordinarily low (by a factor of 10 or more) compared to a variety of other funds.

What this means, of course, is that foundations are apparently much more likely, as the article says, to "sit, quietly watching."

One can only speculate as to the reasons for this low turnover. Among reasons we have given are that a good deal of the stock is often control stock in a company and it has not been considered appropriate to trade these securities. Others point out that the effective investment of funds has not been considered a high priority objective.

In some cases the legal instruments setting up the foundation prohibit the sale of the securities donated to the foundation.

This Commission has received expert advice from some nationally recognized experts, but we would certainly not claim we have the resources or the authority to review the investment performance of foundations in greater detail over longer periods.

Approaching this from several different standpoints, we arrive at the same point; namely, that the investment performance of foundations is sub-par, perhaps significantly, and the cost of this to society could easily amount to hundreds of millions and perhaps over a billion dollars annually.

We would welcome additional studies of foundation investment returns and indeed would hope that new foundation annual reporting forms would put a good deal more stress both on computing this return and providing the opportunity for more detailed analysis of the investment patterns.

Payout to charity

We now look at another measure of society's return on this capitalized investment in philanthropy . . the payout to charity in 1968 expressed as a percent of the reported assets . . .

Median payout as a percent of assets (grants, administrative expenses, etc.)

Reported assets:
Foundations, 1 to 10 million	4.8
Foundations, 10 to 100 million	4.9
Foundations—100 million and over	5.7
Community foundations	5.2
Company foundations (significant number of conduit foundations)	22.5

What this tells, of course, is that on the average, about half the foundations studied paid out less than 5% and further analysis shows that about one-third paid out less than 4% of assets. I should remind you that, to the extent we have foundations reporting their assets to us on a basis of cost rather than market value, even this payout figure is overstated.

The very substantial majority of the Commission believes that (1) our society should receive significant current benefit to charity, and (2) the foundation in turn should be encouraged to make reasonable and productive investments so as to earn over the long term amounts that are comparable to what a veriety of professionally managed portfolios earn over this period of time.

Over the last 40 years the average rate of inflation has been 1.6% and closer to 2% over the last 10 years or so. Thus, if the objective were that one should permit a reasonable investor to earn enough to maintain the purchasing power of his assets—then one could require an annual payout to charity of from 6% to 8%.

The precise number should depend on reasonable total investment return which we would leave to the determination of the Secretary of the Treasury to re-set every few years after appropriate consultation and review of the performance of relevant types of investment portfolios, balanced funds, pensions, etc. The Secretary's determination would be made in a formal "rule-making" procedure in which all affected parties would have an opportunity to comment.

The payout number also depends on how one balances the priorities between the future and the present. Those who view the problems facing charitable organizations as especially urgent would lean in the direction of a higher annual payout. Those who lean toward the longer range future would pick a lower figure in the range.

I would think, however, that virtually all of the Commission agrees that foundation investment returns deserve a great deal of improvement and emphasis

Speaking only for myself, I would probably opt for a figure in the upper end of the 6% to 8% range because I believe the needs over the near term foreseeable future are demonstrably accelerating.

We see a high payout requirement having a number of advantages to society and, we believe, to foundations as well:

1. It results in substantial benefits to charity at a time in our lives when every reasonable projection says more and more money will be desperately needed to maintain the viability and thrust of the private sector's role.

2. Such a payout will provide an incentive to foundations to improve their rate of return and this in itself could mean benefits to charity compounded at hundreds of millions of dollars a year or more.

3. The disposition of control stock is an extraordinarily important question—as our review of the sources of major contributions of existing foundations have made very clear.

The House Bill takes the view that the disposition of this control stock over 5 years, and in some cases 10, is required. Considering the motives of large donors in giving in the first place, this will not only present some serious problems to them but could well discourage philanthropic giving unduly, and perhaps decisively.

We believe the public interest is best served when we concern ourselves with the consequences and performance of foundation activity rather than to assess the motives of those who establish or operate these organizations.

Men's motives are always mixed; charity is not without its variety; generosity is not without its own kind of pride, and except for saints, we all perform our best and worst actions for a mixture of reasons.

If the foundation provides an adequate return to charity, if abuses have been adequately controlled, if non-charitable grants are stopped, then it seems to us a bit fruitless to speculate upon the mixed motivations of foundation donors.

4. For this same reason, we strongly oppose the restrictions on appreciated property gifts to foundations as unnecessarily punitive, self-defeating and potentially disastrous to the all important birth rate of new foundations to meet the charitable crisis of the seventies and beyond.

Our survey of large donors indicates that 63% would not want to or wanted to set up a foundation at all if the restrictions on the contribution of appreciated property were in effect. Another 25% would contribute less to a foundation. The large donors view this as the provision with the greatest negative effect on their contribution to foundations.

We would like to know what the impact of each of these provisions would be on you:

ESTIMATED EFFECT ON FOUNDATIONS

[In percent]

	Lead me not to want or have wanted to set up a foundation at all	Lead me to give or to have given less to a foundation	Have no effect on my giving to a foundation
Provisions:
Tax on appreciated property given to a foundation	63	25	12
7.5 percent tax on foundation income	28	23	49
Distribute at least 5 percent of assets	24	13	63

These severe House Bill restrictions on required divestment of control stock and on appreciated property contributions appear to us to be largely punitive in their effects and may achieve a pound of harm for every ounce of good they do.

A high payout requirement will present some problems to which flexible answers should be provided, as long as the fundamental requirement is met of a high payout to charity.

Relevance to Perpetuity Problem—We also believe that a high payout requirement provides a partial, and we think sufficient, answer to the concerns which have been expressed about perpetual existence of foundations. A high payout requirement means that foundations will have perpetual life only as long as they continue to make substantial contributions to charity. If a foundation's endowment is not sufficiently productive to meet the payout requirement, the foundation will gradually be phased out of existence. Thus perpetual life becomes a justified reward for continuing productvity, and not an automatic privilege which is granted without being earned.

If the foundation will not invest its funds productively for the long term benefit of charity and if continued donor contributions or outside support are not forthcoming, then it may well be the case that the foundation has not earned the privilege of perpetuity.

The Commission has considered proposals that the life of foundations should be limited to a fixed term. These proposals reflect concern about self-perpetuating dynasties and the distrust of institutions without a clearly defined constituency or public accountability.

It is our tentative conclusion that the arguments for limited life are not sufficiently persuasive to make such a drastic step appropriate. A fixed term provides a bad precedent for other charitable organizations and does not discriminate between organizations which deserve to continue and those who do not. As noted in our discussion of the payout requirement the right to perpetual life should be earned, and should not be an automatic privilege. Only foundations which continue to make satisfactory contributions to charity should be entitled to perpetual existence.

We suspect that limited life may well have a discouraging effect on the birth rate of new foundations. The ability to create an institution bearing the donor's name and having perpetual life may be a very significant psychological incentive for the creation of foundations.

The evidence with respect to the bad effect of continued existence of foundations is largely conjectural. Particularly with the larger foundations, there appears to be some evidence to support the view that the institutions may improve with age. A number of foundations which started out under close control of an individual donor or his family have over time become completely independent of such control. There is also some question abou the effectiveness of a limited life organization during its final years.

In sum, we believe that a very high burden of proof should be met before a mandatory death sentence should be decreed. The arguments against perpetual existence do not meet this burden of proof.

Specific Suggestions.—Our studies of the payout requirement have suggested a number of specific improvements in the provision contained in the House bill:

(a) The payout requirement should be expressed solely as a percentage of assets and should not be measured by earned "income." In measuring a foundation's investment performance, it is inappropriate to distinguish between ordinary income and capital gains, or between realized and unrealized gains. Introducing distinctions between different types of income may result in distortions of foundation investment management in order to maximize one type of income at the expense of another.

(b) The required payout should be based on a two- or three-year moving average of asset values. This would avoid fluctuations reflecting short-term changes in asset values. A longer averaging period might be appropriate for new foundations and for those receiving substantial new contributions.

(c) Foundations should be exempted from the payout requirement to permit accumulation of several years' income for specific large scale projects. Such accumulation should not be made without prior notice to the Internal Revenue Service. We believe that prior notice to IRS and an opportunity to disapprove is more appropriate than advance approval.

(d) All proper foundation expenditures should be included in determining whether the payout requirement has been met. For this purpose both grants and direct expenditures, including the costs of investment management taxes or user fees and other reasonable and necessary administration expenses, should be included.

Establishment and Revision of Payout Percentage.—We question the desirability of including a specific payout percentage in the law. We recommend instead that the law define the criteria by which the percentage should be determined and give the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to establish the percentage, and to make revisions from time to time.

Problems of Diversification.—A high payout requirement will encourage foundations to dispose of unproductive assets and to make new investments. It may be desirable to provide a reasonable transition period to afford foundations adequate time to diversify their portfolios.

More difficult problems are raised where a foundation's assets are in the form of closely held stock or are not readily marketable for other reasons. Such problems are not insuperable. Without going into technical detail, we might suggest some steps which should be considered:

(a) Provision for sales by the foundation back to the donor of assets which are not readily marketable. Such sales should be made at an independently appraised price, and should be exempt from the self-dealing prohibitions.

(b) Recapitalization of a closely-held business to provide the foundation with a higher yield security in order to enable it to meet the payout requirements.

(c) Internal Revenue Service administrative authority to provide additional time in situations of unusual difficulty. The granting of additional time would be coupled with a requirement to make up the deficiency, after the appropriate reinvestments have been made.

Philanthropic Policy Board

We recommend the formation of a Philanthropic Policy Board to provide at the highest possible level informed and balanced policy judgments on major issues affecting philanthropy. The Board should be quasi-governmental in character, with full access to governmental data and with power to obtain data from private sources.

The Board should be composed of ten to fifteen top level private citizens and government officials. We suggest that the majority of the members be from the private sector. The Board might include individuals from the Senate and the House of Representatives, from the Executive Branch, from state regulatory agencies concerned with philanthropy, and from a variety of philanthropic organizations. Both the chairman and several other members should come from the public at large.

It may be appropriate to provide the Board with a federal charter and to provide for Presidential appointment and Senate confirmation of its members. The members should be appointed for fixed terms, perhaps for four years. The Board would meet on a periodic basis, perhaps four to ten times per year. It should have a small full-time staff and should also be authorized to arrange for studies by individual consultants and organizations. Its funding might come from both private and public sources.

Among the functions to be performed by the Board are:

1. Annual report to the Congress and to the President on the state of philanthropy. The purpose of such a report would be to provide a basis for proper formulation of laws and public policies.
2. Compilation of adequate statistical and other information about the entire field of philanthropy.
3. Establishment at several locations around the country of repositories of information about foundations and other philanthropic institutions. For example, the information about foundations should be organized in a manner to enable prospective grantees to determine which foundations may be active in his field of interest. A second purpose would be to provide for an interchange of information between foundations in order to reduce useless over-lapping of programs among foundations.
4. Policy studies of various problem areas affecting philanthropy. Such studies might be undertaken on the Board's own initiative or at the request of congressional committees or governmental agencies. It should make such public recommendations as it may deem appropriate.
5. Periodic assessments of government supervision of foundations and of other governmental programs which have an impact on philanthropy.

The recommendation for the establishment of the Board stems from the experience of our Commission. In particular it reflects our concern about the lack of adequate information regarding the philanthropic sector and its needs and the great difficulty of making accurate assessments of the effects of government policies on philanthropy.

The work of our Commission has also uncovered a number of very difficult issues on which the Commission will not be able to make any firm recommendations. These might well be useful subjects for studies by the Board:

First, the Board might encourage and review the development of a new tax incentive structure which will provide adequate incentives for increased contributions to philanthropy, without unreasonable costs to the Treasury and consistent with considerations of tax equity. I have already commented on the importance of such a study. This is a highly complex subject requiring the talents of tax specialists, economists and statisticians among others.

Second, a number of complex questions are raised by the role of the government in supervising foundations and philanthropy, including the proper method of meshing the responsibilities of the federal government with those of the states; the encouragement of uniform state laws dealing with charitable organizations and foundations; the proper balance between administrative regulations and judicial remedies; the reconciliation of the government's interest in encouraging philanthropy and in regulating possible abuses.

Third, the Board might undertake a basic policy review of the tax law definitions which define the areas of activity entitled to tax deductions and exemptions. Such a review might deal both with the adequacy of the existing statutory definitions and with the policy principles which should guide the Internal Revenue Service administrative rulings defining the borderline between charitable and non-charitable activities. Such a study should deal with the activities of all charitable organizations and not merely with foundations.

Fourth, an examination of the role and responsibilities of trustees of charitable organizations would be useful. There is much confusion now in the minds of trustees of many charitable institutions as to their appropriate responsibilities.

We believe that the foregoing examples illustrate the many important tasks which the Philanthropic Policy Board will be able to perform.

More important than its task is its mission . . . to preserve, to nurture and to relate the role of the philanthropic sector to the society as a whole.

VI. SUMMARY OF COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Our recommendations are directed to three basic objectives:

First, we want to stimulate a significant increase in the funds actively devoted to philanthropy. We have spelled out why we believe charitable needs will continue to rise rapidly in the seventies, and why we strongly reaffirm the further encouragement of private philanthropy.

Second, we want to assure that foundation funds are devoted to legitimate charitable purposes, without diversion either for private gain or for activities which are not properly charitable. This is essential not only because of the pressing needs of charity, but also to assure public confidence in foundations.

Third, we want to increase diversity in the private sector and to encourage foundations to be active in areas where increased private sector involvement is important and where foundations can make distinctive contributions.

Based on these objectives we have arrived at the following recommendations:

1. High Payout Requirement

Foundations should be required to make substantial annual distributions to charity to help meet rapidly accelerating charitable needs. Our data on the performance of university endowments, mutual funds and other professionally-managed investments suggests that a payout in the 6% to 8% range is fair and reasonable under present conditions. Any payout percentages should, of course, be reviewed periodically to take account of changes in economic conditions.

Perhaps more important than the particular percentage are the assumptions on which it should be based. We believe that the payout requirement for foundations should be high enough to encourage them to invest their funds productively. The percentage should not be so high as to amount to a delayed death sentence. A foundation with a well-managed investment portfolio should be able to maintain its size and to stay abreast of changes in the value of the dollar. However, the current needs of our society for philanthropic funds are so great that we consider it inappropriate to permit foundations to grow in size, without making an adequate current contribution to philanthropy. A payout percentage which will permit a well-managed foundation portfolio to maintain its size, while making a productive contribution to charity, represents an equitable balance between the pressure of society's current needs and the interests of future generations.

While accurate forecasts are impossible to make, a payout requirement in the 6% to 8% range might increase foundation grants significantly, perhaps in excess of $500 million per year. That, however, is not the only reason why we recommend a high payout. Another important reason is the peculiar nature of foundations as grant-making institutions. Foundations are unique in our society in having assets which are not fully committed to on-going activities. This is one of their great strengths, and makes them capable of doing things which other institutions cannot do. However, it also means that foundations are not under the same budgetary pressures as other organizations. From the limited data available to us we feel that foundation investment performance has in the past been quite unimpressive and that very substantial improvements are possible.

Another reason why we favor a high payout requirement is that the donor to a foundation receives a tax deduction at the time of his donation. Considering the pressing needs for charitable funds, we believe that funds for which a charitable deduction has been received should be devoted to charity on a prompt and productive basis.

Relevance to Perpetuity Problem.—We also believe that a high payout requirement provides a partial, and we think sufficient, answer to the concerns which have been expressed about perpetual existence of foundations. A high payout requirement means that foundations can have perpetual life only as long as they continue to make substantial contributions to charity. If a foundation's endowment is not sufficiently productive to meet the payout requirement, the foundation will gradually be phased out of existence. Thus, perpetual life becomes a justified reward for continuing productivity, and not an automatic privilege which is granted without being earned.

Relevance to Corporate Control Problem.—A high payout requirement will also serve to answer at least some of the concerns which have been expressed with respect to foundation ownership of sizable blocks of stock in business corporations. One concern is that such blocks may be given to foundations for reasons, such as protecting the donor's control of the corporation, which have nothing to do with their desirability from an investment standpoint. We believe that the concerns about foundation holdings of large blocks would be substantially reduced when such holdings make a productive contribution to charity. A high payout requirement coupled with prohibitions on self-dealing, greater disclosure and improved government supervision, provides a better solution than an arbitrary limit on percentage of ownership.

Specific Suggestions.—Our studies of the payout requirement have suggested a number of specific improvements in the provision contained in the House bill:

(a) The payout requirement should be expressed solely as a percentage of assets and should not be measured by earned "income." In measuring a foundation's investment performance, it is inappropriate to distinguish between ordinary income and capital gains, or between realized and unrealized gains. Introducing distinctions between different types of income may result in distortions of foundation investment management in order to maximize one type of income at the expense of another.

(b) The required payout should be based on a two- or three-year moving average of asset values. This would avoid fluctuations reflecting short-term changes in asset values. A longer averaging period might be appropriate for new foundations and for those receiving substantial new contributions.

(c) Foundations should be exempted from the payout requirement to permit accumulation of several years' income for specific large scale projects. Such accumulation should not be made without prior notice to the Internal Revenue Service. We believe that prior notice and an opportunity to disapprove is more appropriate than requiring advance approval by IRS.

(d) All proper foundation expenditures should be included in determining whether the payout requirement has been met. For this purpose both grants and direct expenditures, including the costs of investment management, taxes or user fees, and other reasonable and necessary administrative expenses, should be included.

Establishment and Revision of Payout Percentage.—We question the desirability of including a specific payout percentage in the law. We recommend instead that the law define the criteria by which the percentage should be determined and give the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to establish the percentage, and to make revisions from time to time. The Secretary's determination should be made in a formal "rule-making" procedure, in which the foundations and other affected parties would have an opportunity to comment.

Problems of Diversification.—A high payout requirement may make it necessary for some foundations to dispose of unproductive assets and to make new investments. It may be desirable to provide a reasonable transition period to afford foundations adequate time to diversify their portfolios.

Where a foundation's unproductive assets are in the form of closely held stock or are not readily marketable for other reasons, diversification will present some problems. However, such problems are not insuperable. Without going into technical detail, we might suggest some steps which should be considered:

(a) Sales back to the donor of assets which are not readily marketable. Such sales should be made at an independently appraised price, and should be exempt from the self-dealing prohibitions.

(b) Recapitalization of a closely-held business to provide the foundation with a higher yield security in order to enable it to meet the payout requirement.

(c) Internal Revenue Service administrative authority to provide additional time in situations of unusual difficulty. The granting of additional time should be coupled with a requirement to make up the deficiency, after the appropriate reinvestments have meen made.

33-865 O—69—pt. 6——70

2. Increased Foundation Reporting and Disclosure

Foundations should be required to increase substantially the amount of information which they make public. This recommendation reflects one of the major problems which our own Commission encountered in its work: the lack of adequate information about foundations. Fewer than 200 out of perhaps 30,000 foundations distribute annual reports. The tax return required by the Internal Revenue Service, while technically a public document, is difficult and expensive to obtain. It is in many respects inadequate and unsatisfactory as a public accounting of foundation activities.

We believe that increased disclosure is important for a number of reasons.

First, it should help to re-establish public confidence in foundations. We believe that one element underlying the public concern is a feeling of unease about activities behind the scenes, a suspicion nourished by the fact that relatively little is known about foundations. Greater availability of information should serve to alleviate such concerns.

Second, additional information will help both Congress and the Executive Branch to reach proper policy decisions about foundation activities. One of the most difficult, and most costly, efforts of this commission has been to obtain more information in order to reach conclusions based on facts, rather than conjectures.

Third, increased disclosure is likely to have a desirable prophylactic effect on questionable practices. Those of us with experience in the corporate world are well aware that the public disclosure requirements of the securities laws have had a favorable effect on the standards of the business community.

Fourth, increased disclosure, coupled with equity jurisdiction in the federal courts, might make it possible to enjoin improper foundation activities at an early stage.

Fifth, more adequate foundation reporting should make it easier for prospective recipients to determine which foundations are interested in particular fields of work.

The Commission has had a task force at work on foundation reporting practices. Based on the work of this task force, we believe that we will be able to recommend major revisions in foundation reporting practices. They will deal with the need for uniform accounting standards, for more meaningful description of grant-making activities, and will provide a better basis for policing of abuses.

We expect that our report will also cover methods of making the information disclosed more accessible, and for summarizing and otherwise organizing information about foundations in a manner which will facilitate the formulation of public policy.

3. Prohibitions Against Self-Dealing

We endorse the prohibitions against self-dealing contained in the House bill. In our view, strict self-dealing prohibitions are essential both in order to restore public confidence in foundations and to assure that funds which have been dedicated to philanthropy will not be diverted to non-philanthropic purposes. A fundamental premise which cannot be over-emphasized is that a foundation's assets are irrevocably committed to charity and that the diversion of a foundation's assets for the private financial benefit of the donor, or of the managers of the foundation. cannot be tolerated. Our studies of the prevalence of self-dealing practices suggest that there is sufficient justification for the enactment of the strict self-dealing prohibitions contained in the House bill.

The use of the term "private foundation" in the House bill is unfortunate. We believe the emphasis should be on the public, rather than on the private, character of foundations. Substituting the term "philanthropic foundation" might help to emphasize that foundations are there to benefit charity, not private individuals.

4. Increased Internal Revenue Service Audits

Again with the objective of restoring public confidence in foundations, we urge that there be a substantial increase in Internal Revenue Service audits of foundations. We recommend that all foundations be audited at least once within the next three years. We recognize that this will involve a substantial step-up in IRS auditing activity. However, we believe that only an effort on this scale will be adequate to assure the public that the privilege of setting up a foundation is not being abused. The result of such a three-year program should also provide sufficient data to enable Congress to make realistic decisions regarding the proper level of future surveillance.

We recognize that the cost of an increased audit program is substantial and we propose that this cost be paid by a special user charge payable by the foundations. Such a charge should reasonably reflect the actual cost increase of this special regulatory effort, and should be limited to the three-year period. This cost is likely to be substantially less than the 7½% tax on investment income proposed by the House or the 2% tax recommended by the Treasury.

As a matter of principle, we question the desirability of charging philanthropic institutions for the cost of IRS supervision when the cost of supervising corporations and other institutions is borne by the regular administrative budget, and is not made a special charge. We would suggest, therefore, that the precedent of the user charge be limited to the special three-year audit program we are recommending. We do not believe that either state regulation or self-regulation by the foundations provides an adequate alternative to increased IRS supervision under current conditions.

5. Sanctions for Violations

There are serious shortcomings both in the existing sanctions for violations of the legal rules applicable to foundations, and in the new sanctions proposed in the House bill. The principal existing penalty—loss of tax exemption—is so drastic as to be useless except in the most extreme cases. The provision of the House bill for a graduated system of "taxes" for various forms of violation has other shortcomings. We recognize that this is a technical subject and I am not in a position to make detailed recommendations. Let me outline, however, the general principles which we believe a satisfactory system of sanctions should embody:

First, the objectives of the system of sanctions should be made to make charity whole, not to increase the collection of taxes. As a general rule, penalties should not be levied against the assets of the foundations, but rather against the individuals responsible for the violation. An individual who has enriched himself at the expense of the foundation, should be required to make the foundation whole.

Second, fines should only be levied where the prohibited conduct can be defined in an unambiguous manner. In particular, fines should not be imposed in areas where there are difficult questions of judgment, as may arise in connection with certain investment policy and grant-making decisions.

Third, provision should be made for promptly enjoining improper activities rather than penalizing them after they have occurred. We are attracted by the possibility of providing equity jurisdiction in the federal courts. This can be provided by Congressional action; we see no constitutional problem. This is a subject which our Commission has under study.

Fourth, sanctions should be geared to the seriousness of the violation, and whether it is willful or inadvertent. For minor or technical violations, a warning with an opportunity to make corrections may be sufficient. In other cases monetary penalty will be necessary. Such penalties should be imposed in the form of fines, not as excise taxes and they should not be automatically measured by the amount involved in the improper transaction. Penalties should increase in the event of repeated violations. In setting the level of fines, one should not discourage individuals from becoming trustees and officers of foundations.

6. Tax Incentives

We are concerned about the widening gap between charitable needs and charitable resources. This problem is so serious that we strongly urge that there be a careful examination of the effect on philanthropy of the House bill. In particular, we believe that the bill has major, if unintended, anti-philantropic effects. The most serious effects result from the allocation of deductions provisions and the limit on tax preferences. What is needed is a full analysis of the likely dollar effects of each provision affecting charitable giving and an assessment of the effect of the bill as a whole. In such an assessment it is important to keep in mind that complexity itself operates as a disincentive for philanthropic giving.

Specific attention sould be given to those provisions of present law which allow a donor to make money by contributing to charity. Of special importance is the need to insure that charitable contributions are not overvalued.

In view of the need for greatly increased private contributions to meet ever expanding needs, we believe that a panel of experts should be immediately assembled to recommend new and equitable tax incentives to increase philanthropic giving.

7. Grant-Making Activities—Foundations and Government

Our Commission has devoted much of its time to the grant-making activities of foundations. We have listened to presentations by representatives of foundations and by distinguished citizens with governmental and other experience relevant to foundation grant-making activities. In the Commission's own deliberations, this subject has occupied more time than any other. Unquestionably, the most sensitive area of grants are those involving interaction with government programs. This is a complex subject to requiring a balancing of conflicting considerations.

Studies of Public Issues and the Legislative Process.—We reached the basic premise that it is impossible to draw any line of demarcation between the foundations' fields of interest and those of governments. Practically every area of significant foundation activity is one in which federal, state and local governments are also active, generally on a much larger scale. This is true both of the conventional fields of philanthropy—health, education, welfare, science and technology, and such newer areas as urban problems, civil rights, the environment and population control. The interests of foundations and of government agencies are so intertwined that it is unrealistic to expect that foundation programs should not have direct impact on government programs.

Far from deploring intertwining of the private and the public sector, we consider this one of the healthy features of American society. Interchanges between the private sector and the public sector in the development and formulation of public policy is an essential part of the democratic process. The larger and more complex that government becomes, the greater the need for private inputs into the decision-making process. The complexity of the problems, however, makes it much more difficult for the private sector to make meaningful contributions. As the work of our own Commission illustrates, private individuals cannot deal adequately with even a relatively limited subject, except after extensive study and analysis, including substantial fact gathering. This is not only time consuming but can be quite costly even where the members of the Commission serve without compensation.

Our Commission has, up to this point, operated without foundation funds. I can testify from personal experience how difficult it is to raise funds for a study from other sources. Our experience is far from unique, and it is fair to say that foundations are much the best source for funding private efforts to study significant policy issues. Any legal restriction on the availability of foundation funds for studies of public issues cannot help but impair private contributions to the decision-making process.

In considering the desirability for private contributions to the decision-making process, we do not think that distinctions should be made between legislative decision-making and executive decision-making. One of the members of our Commission, who has had extensive Congressional experience feels strongly that the huge scale of the executive branch input into the legislative process makes it particularly useful that there be well-conceived and well-organized private contributions to Congressional deliberations. Furthermore, we think there is no practical or logical basis for distinguishing between public issues which may become the subject of legislative action and those which will not. Almost any significant public interest is likely to become the subject of legislative attention, a point I need hardly dwell upon before this audience.

For these reasons we strongly question the provisions in the House bill which seek to curb foundation contacts with members of legislative bodies or other persons who may participate in the formulation of legislation. We consider it both unnecessary and undesirable to shield legislators or their staff from contacts with private groups which are engaged in studies of issues which are of legislative interest.

Let me add, and here I am once again speaking from personal experience, the exchanges of ideas between private individuals and members of Congress and their staff is, of course, a mutually beneficial two-way street. On most major issues of public interest, members of Congress and their staff are among the foremost experts who should be consulted by anyone engaged in a serious study.

We believe that the provision in the House bill permitting foundations to make available the results of "non-partisan analysis and research" is far too limited an exception from the prohibition on legislation communications. In particular the word "non-partisan" is highly ambiguous. If it means free from any impact on partisan politics, the exemption would be practically meaningless, because any significant public question can become a partisan issue. If "non-partisan" means that no final conclusion can be drawn, it would remove the underlying purpose for which most studies are undertaken.

While we feel strongly that there should be no impediment on foundation-financed studies, even though they may have an impact on legislation, and may involve contacts with legislators and other persons who may participate in the formulation of legislation, we recognize that this is an area of genuine sensitivity. The solution, we believe, lies in prompt and full disclosure rather than in prohibitions. We believe there should be advance disclosure of any foundation-financed study if such study involves any substantial number of contacts with members of Congress or their staffs. In addition, any foundation grant which involves compensation to government employees should be disclosed before such payments are made. With respect to executive branch employees, prior notice should be given to the head of the department employing the particular individual. Where legislative employees are involved, notice might go to the Clerk of the Senate or of the House.

Lest there be any misunderstanding let me emphasize that foundation involvement should be limited to legitimate studies of public issues. The privilege to engage in educational activities which may have an impact on legislation must not be abused. It clearly does not provide a license to carry on pure and simple lobbying activities.

Elective Politics.—Our Commission fully endorses the prohibitions on foundation involvement in elective politics. Tax-exempt funds should not be used in election campaigns, whether to support the election of candidates or the passage of measures voted on in referendums. The policy considerations in this area are well settled and do not need further elaboration.

Grass Roots Campaigns.—We also agree that foundation funds should not be used for grass roots campaigns designed to bring pressure on legislators. We believe that the only proper role of foundations in the political process is an educational one. Where the objective is political pressure rather than dissemination of ideas, foundation involvement becomes improper. We recognize, of course, that this principle is more easily stated than it is applied in practice. However, the fact that there may be some difficult borderline case is no reason for ignoring the underlying principle. We would encourage foundations to seek advance rulings before venturing into questionable areas. This should not be a legislative requirement.

Definition of Propaganda.—Starting from the premise that the legitimate functions of foundations in the political process is an educational one, we agree that the use of foundation funds for propaganda purposes should be barred. However, we would urge a redefinition of what constitutes propaganda. The test should not be whether "both sides" are presented in an impartial manner, or whether conclusions are drawn, but whether the material being distributed is educational in character. We recommend that this test be applied in a conservative manner. The line between "propaganda" and "education" should not provide a basis for a censorship of ideas. Only in very clear-cut cases, such as hate material, which no reasonable man could consider as educational, should the restriction on propaganda be invoked.

8. The Birth Rate of Foundations: Appreciated Property and Control Stock

It is important that there be adequate incentives for the formation of new foundations. This will not only increase total philanthropic assets, but should improve the degree of diversity within the foundation field. In particular, it should result in a better national distribution of foundations. While the popular conception of foundations as part of an "Eastern establishment" is exaggerated, it is true that there is a substantial concentration of foundations in the Northeast. This undoubtedly reflects the time lag between the creation of great fortunes and the time when they find their way into foundations. Thus the prevalence of foundations in the Northeast reflects the economic predominance of the Northeast in the latter part of the 19th and the early part of the 20th century. The much wider national distribution of centers of wealth in the last three decades is only gradually being reflected in the creation of foundations in other parts of the country.

We believe that the formation of new foundations would be significantly reduced by two changes in tax incentives contained in the House bill. I am referring to the provision limiting the deductibility of gifts to foundations of appreciated property, and the provision limiting the percentage of stock in any corporation held by a foundation. Our studies indicate that the full deductibility of gifts of appreciated property has been a very important incentive for gifts to philanthropy. Of all the changes proposed in the House bill, this would have the most significant adverse effect on large givers, the people most likely to set up new foundations.

The concern about the effects of the prohibition on foundation ownership of controlling blocks of stock ties in closely with the concern regarding the appreciated property deduction. The history of foundations, particularly of the larger foundations, indicates that they were generally started with gifts of stock, usually controlling blocks, of a business which the donor had developed during his life time. Such blocks obviously will have a very high appreciation in value over the original cost to the donor. Thus, from the standpoint of incentives for the formation of new foundations, the appreciated property deduction and the right to donate controlling blocks are likely to go together. Both are important to the formation of new foundations.

As indicated above, we believe that the concerns which have been expressed about the dangers of foundation ownership of controlling blocks can largely be met by a combination of a high pay-out requirement, strict limitations on self-dealing, and increased disclosure. With these protective features in place, and considering the effect on the birth rate of new foundations, we believe that the balance favors permitting foundation ownership of controlling blocks.

9. Perpetual Existence

The Commission has considered proposals that the life of foundations should be limited to a fixed term. These proposals reflect concern about self-perpetuating dynasties and distrust of institutions without clearly defined constituencies or public accountability.

It is our tentative conclusion that the arguments for limited life are not sufficiently persuasive to make such a drastic step appropriate. A fixed term provides a bad precedent for other charitable organizations and does not discriminate between organizations which deserve to continue and those who do not.

As noted in our discussion of the pay-out requirement, the right to perpetual life should be earned, and should not be an automatic privilege. Only foundations which continue to make satisfactory contributions to charity should be entitled to perpetual existence.

We suspect that limited life may well have a discouraging effect on the birth rate of new foundations. The ability to create an institution bearing the donor's name and having perpetual life may be a very significant psychological incentive for the creation of foundations.

The evidence with respect to the bad effect of continued existence of foundations is largely conjectural. Particularly with the larger foundations, there appears to be some evidence to support the view that the institutions may improve with age. A number of foundations which started out under close control of an individual donor or his family have over time become completely independent of such control. There is also some question about the effectiveness of a limited life organization during its final years.

In sum, we believe that a very high burden of proof should be met before a mandatory death sentence should be decreed. The arguments against perpetual existence do not meet this burden of proof.

10. Philanthropic Policy Board

We recommend the formation of a Philanthropic Policy Board to provide at the highest possible level informed and balanced policy judgments on major issues affecting philanthropy. The Board should be quasi-governmental in character, with full access to governmental data and with power to obtain data from private sources.

The Board should be composed of ten to fifteen top level private citizens and government officials. We suggest that the majority of the members be from the private sector. The Board might include individuals from the Senate and the House of Representatives, from the Executive Branch, from state regulatory agencies concerned with philanthropy, and from a variety of philanthropic organizations. Both the chairman and several other members should come from the public at large.

It may be appropriate to provide the Board with a federal charter and to provide for Presidential appointment and Senate confirmation of its members. The members should be appointed for fixed terms, perhaps for four years. The Board would meet on a periodic basis, perhaps four to ten times per year. It should have a small full-time staff and should also be authorized to arrange for studies by individual consultants and organizations. Its funding might come from both private and public sources.

Among the functions to be performed by the Board are:

1. Annual report to the Congress and to the President on the state of philanthropy. The purpose of such a report would be to provide a basis for proper formulation of laws and public policies.
2. Compilation of adequate statistical and other information about the entire field of philanthropy.
3. Establishment at several locations around the country of repositories of information about foundations and other philanthropic institutions. For example, the information about foundations should be organized in a manner to enable prospective grantees to determine which foundations may be active in his field of interest. A second purpose would be to provide for an interchange of information between foundations in order to reduce useless over-lapping of programs among foundations.
4. Policy studies of various problem areas affecting philanthropy. Such studies might be undertaken on the Board's own initiative or at the request of congressional committees or governmental agencies. It should make such public recommendations as it may deem appropriate.
5. Periodic assessments of government supervision of foundations and of other governmental programs which have an impact on philanthropy.

The recommendation for the establishment of the Board stems from the experience of our Commission. In particular it reflects our concern about the lack of adequate information regarding the philanthropic sector and its needs and the great difficulty of making accurate assessments of the effects of government policies on philanthropy.

The work of our Commission has also uncovered a number of very difficult issues on which the Commission will not be able to make any firm recommendations. These might well be useful subjects for studies by the Board:

First, the Board might encourage and review the development of a new tax incentive structure which will provide adequate incentives for increased contributions to philanthropy, without unreasonable costs to the Treasury and consistent with considerations of tax equity. I have already commented on the importance of such a study. This is a highly complex subject requiring the talents of tax specialists, economists and statisticians among others.

Second, a number of complex questions are raised by the role of the government in supervising foundations and philanthropy, including the proper method of meshing the responsibilities of the federal government with those of the states; the encouragement of uniform state laws dealing with charitable organizations and foundations; the proper balance between administrative regulations and judicial remedies; the reconciliation of the government's interest in encouraging philanthropy and in regulating possible abuses.

Third, the Board might undertake a basic policy review of the tax law definitions which define the areas of activity entitled to tax deductions and exemptions. Such a review might deal both with the adequacy of the existing statutory definitions and with the policy principles which should guide the Internal Revenue Service administrative rulings defining the borderline between charitable and non-charitable activities. Such a study should deal with the activities of all charitable organizations and not merely with foundations.

Fourth, an examination of the role and responsibilities of trustees of charitable organizations would be useful. There is much confusion now in the minds of trustees of many charitable institutions as to their appropriate responsibilities.

We believe that the foregoing examples illustrate the many important tasks which the Philanthropic Policy Board will be able to perform.

More important than its task is its mission . . . to preserve, to nurture and to relate the role of the philanthropic sector to the society as a whole.
