TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1969

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to recess, at 9:30 a.m. in room 2221, New Senate Office Building, Senator Russell B. Long (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Long, Talmadge, Byrd of Virginia, Williams of Delaware, Curtis, Miller, Jordan of Idaho, and Hansen.

The CHAIRMAN. The hearing will come to order.

Is the Honorable Joseph Tydings in the room at this time?

I understand that Senators Ted Stevens and Charles E. Goodell will be here shortly as will Congressman Wright Patman.

Is Mr. Scott P. Crampton, chairman, American Bar Association, here? Mr. Walker Winter? Mr. Harold Ketelhut? Mr. J. M. Ford?

Is Miss Edna Anish here? Mr. Max Lupkin? Mr. Francis DeLone? Mr. Paul Seghers?

STATEMENT OF PAUL D. SEGHERS, PRESIDENT, INSTITUTE ON U.S. TAXATION OF FOREIGN INCOME, INC., NEW YORK, N.Y.

Mr. SEGHERS. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I would like to explain that our statement is not in the printed record because of a fraud on the part of the U.S. Post Office. They accept postage special delivery airmail, and take 3 days to deliver here.

I understand I am not the only one defrauded in that manner. I am very disappointed it is not in there.

For the record by name is Paul D. Seghers. I am appearing today as president of the Institute on U.S. Taxation of Foreign Income.

This institute recommends only two changes in the tax reform bill. We offer only two recommendations for changes in the bill because there are only two in there that strike particularly in our field.

What we are principally concerned with is what is not in the bill.

During the past 7 years, the administration and others have frequently publicized the vital need of increased exports and urged U.S. manufacturers to export. During the same 7 years, we have seen many added U.S. tax burdens imposed on the export of U.S. products, but no tax incentives to encourage exports. What is needed is action, not words.

This has been emphasized by many others. We think that it is time to do something to help the commerce and industry of this United States and not just talk about it and offer to spend money to help.

We do not need the Government to spend money. We just say, "Take off the burdens."

There is no need to remind this committee of the importance of U.S. exports and dividends from U.S. foreign sales subsidiaries as the principal means of combating this country's alarming annual international balance-of-payments deficits.

A business that is badly run shows deficits. What conclusion are we to draw? The figures on our deficits have been presented by more than one of those who have appeared before you. Dr. Danielian has a statement which I believe you will find enlightening on that.

Removal of some of the burdens on exports is essential to induce U.S. manufacturers to enter the export field or to expand their activities in that field.

To repeat: What is needed is action, not words. Therefore, what will be stressed first of all is the need to modify the proivsions of the Internal Revenue Code so that no penalty will be imposed on income earned abroad from the sale of U.S. products. It is hard to believe that anyone in this committee or in Congress could oppose removal of a tax penalty on the export of U.S. products.

Please believe me, there is now or are now numerous penalties on the export, U.S. tax penalties on the export of U.S. products. It is not spelled that way in the Internal Revenue Code. It is put in there with devilish cleverness, but that is the effect. It is spelled out pretty clearly in section 954 (d) and (e), but you will not see a word about exports.

We urge that you adopt the amendments proposed in our written statement.

Some of the larger multinational corporations can escape the penalties of those subsections by incorporating a separate selling subsidiary in each country where their goods are merchandised. However, this involves difficulties and expenses which are out of the question for the smaller U.S. manufacturer. Prior to 1963 a U.S. manufacturer could use a single foreign subsidiary to distribute its products in a number of foreign countries without being taxed on the income earned abroad until it was brought home.

The members of this committee fully realize that U.S. manufacturers do not wickedly accumulate their profits in numbered Swiss bank accounts to escape U.S. tax. That is a ridiculous assumption back of a very cleverly contrived scheme which does impose the U.S. tax penalty on exports, and I defy anyone to show me that it does not. They are happy to bring home dividends from their foreign operations just as quickly as is consistent with the sound business practice of using a part of the profits to expand the capacity to earn.

The record shows that U.S. coporations have brought home to the United States billions of dollars through export sales and dividend income that would not have been earned had subpart F been enacted in 1950 instead of 1962. This is fact. The record shows it.

We urge you not to place the added burdens on exports which would result from enactment of the provisions of sections 431 and 452 of the reform bill in its present form.

We do not oppose those two measures in toto, but we say that they should not impose a penalty on exports.

Section 431 probably aims especially at but not limited to oil producers would amend section 704(a) in such a way as to penalize some U.S. manufacturers using the "per country" method of computing the limitation on the foreign tax credit. This is no question of giving anything more, but of taking away less.

This penalty would apply only where the U.S. manufacturer has sustained losses in a foreign country.

Here I would like to stress that since 1962 there has been the most complicated and the most capricious system of taxation of foreign source income that the world has ever seen. You always must qualify every statement that is made by saying some are affected and some are not, and there is no particular reason to penalize those that are affected, no particular reason to exempt the others, but in making these tricky complicated provisions, that is the result.

Under existing law, such a loss sustained in a foreign country is never deductible twice. Neither can the U.S. manufacturer get credit more than once for the foreign tax it pays on income earned in that country. These are facts no one can deny. We ask that section 431 of the bill be amended so as not to impose any added penalty (by way of reduction of the foreign tax credit) on income earned abroad from the sale of U.S. products.

Section 452 of the bill would amend Internal Revenue Code section 312 in such a way that it probably would create substantial and apparently unintended hardship and penalty by reducing the allowable amount of the foreign tax credit. This has been amply explained in the statement heretofore presented to your committee on behalf of the Manufacturing Chemists Association. We recommend elimination or revision of that provision so as to eliminate this unintentional penalty.

We will not say more in defense of the foreign tax credit against unjustified attacks than again to quote the statement of former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Stanley Surrey—quoted on page 6 of our written statement—that:

> American investment would not proceed at all without the foreign tax credit because then, as the chairman pointed out, two taxes would be imposed and the overall burden of the taxes would be so great that international investment would practically cease.

That is the answer to the outrageous proposal to eliminate completely the foreign tax credit.

The removal of a number of the penalties imposed on U.S. exports since 1962 is urgently needed and your committee is urged to give them careful consideration. The need to amend section 954 to eliminate the tax penalty on income earned abroad from the sale of U.S. products has already been urged. The tricky method of computing the 10 percent surcharge on income earned abroad and taxed in the United States likewise should be corrected.

This method of computation imposes a 40 percent higher surcharge on the tax payable by a Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation than on a U.S. corporation deriving no income from a foreign source.

A similar inequitable, discriminatory penalty is imposed by the method of computing the surcharge in the case of other income earned abroad and received in the United States.

Another reform deserving of consideration is the need for change in the only provision of the Internal Revenue Code which denies taxpayers the opportunity to appeal to the courts against any adverse action by the Treasury. This is the sole provision in the Internal Revenue Code whereunder the Commission is superior to the U.S. Supreme Court.

No one can question the action of the Commissioner under section 267. This needs to be reformed or eliminated. It prevents many transactions in the course of normal overseas business activities of U.S. corporations.

For reasons that have been set forth fully in statements filed with your committee and with the Ways and Means Committee, section 367 should be repealed—or at least amended—to allow the same rights of appeal as are allowed under all other provisions of the Internal Revenue Code.

That is all that is asked. We suggest that this committee give serious consideration to the adoption of a "ton on value added"—TVA—as a substitute for all or a substantial portion of the corporate income tax.

We are suggesting that the committee give the study, because to present it here even if I took an hour I could not deal adequately with the whole subject, and yet it has great merit and deserves study.

Such a TVA could be used to raise more tax revenue than the present corporate income tax. It could be used as a "border tax," to increase exports and equalize the tax burden on imports. France and other countries in Europe are successfully using this as a means of encouraging exports and protecting domestic producers against unfair competition of foreign manufacturers. Germany likewise used this form of tax for that purpose until it recently changed its policy to one of discouraging exports—something which, unfortunately, is not needed in this country.

Finally, this institute urges your committee to give more attention to the problem of increasing exports and the inflow of foreign funds and less consideration to Treasury efforts to squeeze additional pennies of tax from U.S. manufacturers, and to remember that dollars of export sales, dollars of dividends from foreign selling branches, are worth more than pennies of additional tax which prevent the smaller U.S. manufacturer from embarking on exports. I know, because I got some of the smaller companies to start in the export field, and you could not talk to them after the 1962 act was adopted.

They feel that despite all the hot air the Treasury definitely intends to penalize exports, penalize overseas business, and talk does not mean anything. We want to see some action. We hope that the Senators who are not present will read the record of this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, and we will print your entire statement in the record too.

I am sorry the post office did not deliver it.

Thank you very much, sir.

(Paul D. Seghers' prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF THE INSTITUTE ON U.S. TAXATION OF FOREIGN INCOME, INC., PRESENTED BY PAUL D. SEGHERS

SUMMARY

Eliminate provisions of H.R. 13270 Sec. 431 which would penalize U.S. manufacturers using the "per country" method to compute the limitation on the amount of the foreign tax credit.

Eliminate provisions of H.R. 13270 Sec. 452 which (unintentionally) would reduce the amount of the foreign tax credit.

Amend I.R.C. Secs. 954 to eliminate the tax penalty on income earned abroad from the sale of U.S. products.

Correct the method of computing the 10% surcharge so that it will not increase the amount of U.S. tax payable on foreign income more than 10%.

Recognize foreign "added value" and similar "indirect" taxes as income taxes for the purpose of the foreign tax credit.

Eliminate I.R.C. Sec. 367 or at least amend it to allow the same rights of appeal as under all other provisions of the Internal Revenue Code.

Adopt a "Tax on Value Added" ("TVA") and use it as a "border tax" as does France to encourage exports.

STATEMENT

It will be too late, after the prices if gasoline and fuel oil have gone way up, to explain to automobile owners and home owners why they must pay for the tax penalties imposed on oil producers. However, that is for others to worry about—this INSTITUTE is concerned primarily with U.S. exports and overseas selling activities. Hence, aside from the proposed penalties on those taxpayers, who, in good faith, elected the "per country" method of computing the limitation on the amount of the foreign tax credit, and one other, unintended, reduction in the credit, we are concerned primarily about what is NOT in the "Reform" bill.

The noble purposes of this bill bring back memories of the "noble experiment" of Prohibition—and also, in connection with its provisions which would affect foreign source income, the Congressional and Administration exhortations to U.S. manufacturers to export more goods, accompanied by seven years of added tax penalties on the export of U.S. products. These are not empty words—this is a statement of fact, supported by the record.

This statement does not merely protest against the injustice of a further penalty on exports proposed in this "Reform" bill and the really unbearable penalty being proposed by a member of this Committee and an "Old Guard" group in the Treasury. What is even more strongly urged is the pressing need to remove some of the U.S. tax penalties imposed during the past seven years on exports and on the repatriation of foreign earnings.

It is obvious that any legislative act that would increase exports (by eliminating U.S. tax penalties or affording incentives), would improve our fast sinking international trade balance and reduce our horrifying balance of payments deficit.

First—as to the proposal to penalize those taxpayers now using and compelled by law to continue using the "per country" method of computing the limitation on the foreign tax credit. This provision is aimed at the oil producers, but could penalize some U.S. manufacturers exporting their products, while leaving others untouched. The "Old Guard" proposes to cure this by devising a way also to penalize those using the "overall" method of computing the limitation.

These are the facts regarding the present method of computing the "per country" limitation where a U.S. corporation sells some of its products abroad and pays foreign income taxes on the resulting profits:

1. If the U.S. manufacturer sustains an operating loss in any country, that loss will enter into the computation of its net income for that year. Such loss will never be deductible twice.
2. If in a later year it earns a profit in the same country, it will be subject to both U.S. tax and foreign tax on that profit.
3. In such case it will be allowed credit against its U.S. tax for all or a portion of that foreign tax, subject to the limitation (that is, not more than the U.S. tax payable on that income.) There can be no double credit for the same foreign tax.

No amount of double talk can change these simple facts. Neither can any specious reasoning justify penalizing the use of the "per country" method of computing the limitation. Its only advantage to the U.S. taxpayer is that in the year of loss in one country, credit (subject to the limitation) may be taken for foreign tax paid on income earned in another country and subjected to U.S. tax. All income earned in the U.S. or abroad is subject to U.S. tax. Any allowable operating losses are deductible once and only once. Any foreign income taxes paid on the income earned in any country may be deducted only once and only from the U.S. tax on that income.

The net effect is the same where credit is allowed for foreign income taxes on income earned abroad by and received from a foreign subsidiary in the form of a dividend. The principal difference is that in such cases the U.S. taxpayer obtains no benefit of a loss sustained by a foreign subsidiary as long as it remains in existence. Obviously, in computing U.S. tax on dividends received from such a subsidiary, there is no allowance for a loss of the subsidiary—such loss merely operates to reduce the amount of accumulated earnings and profits of the subsidiary available for distribution. The related foreign tax credit is allowable only to the extent of foreign tax paid on the income distributed or the U.S. tax computed on such income, whichever is the less.

Another proposed amendment (of I.R.C. Sec. 312) would require every corporation to use the straight line method of computing depreciation for the purpose of computing its earnings and profits, regardless of the fact that it may have been allowed to use an accelerated method of computing its depreciation deduction and its taxable income. This would create substantial and apparently unintended hardship by reducing the allowable amount of the foreign tax credit. as fully explained in the statement presented to this Committee on behalf of the Manufacturing Chemists Association. This provision should be eliminated or revised so as to eliminate this unintended penalty.

The unbearable proposal referred to above is to abolish the foreign tax credit entirely. Even after taking into consideration foreign income tax as a deduction from income subject to U.S. tax, the aggregate foreign and domestic tax on income earned abroad would, in many instances, amount to more than 75%. This would, as a practical matter, make it impossible for U.S. manufacturers to sell their products abroad. This obviously would destroy any hopes of building up U.S. exports and force U.S. manufacturers into the [illegible]ition of "If you want it, come and get it." This would reduce our exports to a mere trickle, as we no longer enjoy a superiority in the quality of our products or in the efficiency of our manufacturing processes sufficient to enable U.S. manufacturers to compete, under such a handicap, against Japanese, German, Italian and other manufacturers that aggressively sell in foreign countries and are given incentives rather than burdened by penalties for exporting.

The significance of the foreign tax credit was recognized by former Secretary of the Treasury, Stanley S. Surrey, in his testimony at hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee with respect to the proposed United States-Brazil income tax treaty, where he stated:

"American investment would not proceed at all without the foreign tax credit because then, as the Chairman pointed out, two taxes would be imposed and the overall burden of two taxes would be so great that international investment would practically cease."

The United States has recognized that foreign investment is a necessity and that the granting of a credit for foreign taxes is a prerequisite in preventing the taxation of foreign source income at confiscatory rates.

EXISTING U.S. TAX—BURDENS ON EXPORTS

Following is a brief list of present U.S. tax burdens on the export of U.S. products and their sale abroad:

1. I.R.C. Sec. 954(d), which specifically penalizes the sale abroad of U.S. products. This sub-section and I.R.C Sec 954(e) should be amended so as not to apply to income resulting from the sale of US. products abroad.

2. The "gross-up" provisions which, in many cases, reduce the benefit of the foreign tax credit (Secs. 902, 960 and 78).

3. The tricky methods of computing the 10% surcharge tax which impose a surcharge of 14% on Western Hemisphere Trade Corporations (Sec. 51-d) and, in many cases, much more than 10% surcharge on other foreign source income. (Sec. 51-b)

4. The provisions which could tax some foreign corporations directly on certain income from sales of U.S. products abroad. (Sec. 864(c) (4) (B))

5. Denial of credit for foreign taxes paid on the income of subsidiaries below the second tier when received as a dividend.

SUGGESTED EXPORT INCENTIVES

In addition to removing these burdens, discussed further below, we suggest adoption of the following positive incentives for U.S. exports and the sale of U.S. products abroad:

1. Recognize foreign "value added" and similar "indirect" taxes as income taxes for the purpose of the foreign tax credit.

2. Allow "tax sparing" credit for foreign income taxes waived ("forgiven") by a foreign government as an incentive for foreign investment. (Failure to do so means that the U.S. Treasury grabs the tax waived by the foreign government—as expressed by one foreign government official, "foreign aid in reverse.")
3. Eliminate, or at least amend I.R.C. Sec. 367 to allow taxpayers the same rights of appeal as in the case of adjustments proposed under all other provisions of the Internal Revenue Code.
4. Restore the 7% investment credit to enable U.S. manufacturers to meet the competition, at home and abroad, of products made in Japan, Germany, Italy and other countries.
5. The "Conglomerate" provisions should be limited to acquisitions by domestic (U.S.) corporations.

Because of the limitations on the scope of these Hearings, the foregoing recommendations will not be discussed further in this statement. However, we believe that every one of these recommendations are desirable and for the benefit of our domestic economy, but the mood for reform has taken such a trend that it seems fruitless to urge these desirable reforms at this time. (See this INSTITUTE's statement presented at March 14, 1969 House Ways & Means Committee Tax Reform Hearings, Part 7, p. 2559, at 2565.)

AMEND I.R.C. SEC. 954 TO REMOVE ITS BURDENS ON U.S. EXPORTS

I.R.C. Secs. 954(d) and (e) penalize a U.S. manufacturer by taxing it on imaginary dividends measured by the income of a foreign subsidiary it uses to distribute and sell its products abroad, if that subsidiary sells such products to buyers in any country other than the country in which it was incorporated. Prior to 1963 there was no such burden on the export of U.S. manufactured products, and this encouraged many smaller U.S. manufacturers to begin to export their products.

To remove the penalties thus imposed on the export and sale abroad of U.S. products, Sec. 954 should be amended by adding the following subsections:

"(g) Foreign base company income shall not include income earned outside the United States from the sale of personal property produced in the United States for use, consumption or disposition outside the United States or from services rendered outside the United States in connection with such sale of such property.

"(h) Foreign base company income shall not include dividends or other income of the kind described in subsection (c) received by one controlled foreign corporation from another foreign corporation or from the disposition of stock or securities of such a foreign corporation to the extent that the amount of income received is out of or attributable to earnings and profits of such other foreign corporation derived from its receipt or accrual of income from the sale outside tho United States of property produced in the United States."

This proposed amendment of Sec. 954 would increase exports by encouraging U.S. manufacturers once again to export their products by using foreign selling subsidiaries. This would again permit using the profits earned abroad to build up their selling facilities abroad and the sales of their products abroad, free of U.S. tax on the income earned abroad by such subsidiaries until, but only until, brought home to the United States.

Proposed I.R.C. Sec. 954(g) would exclude from taxable income only income earned outside the United States by a foreign subsidiary from its activities abroad in selling U.S. products to foreign customers. It would only postpone U.S. taxation of such income until received by a U.S. taxpayer.

Proposed I.R.C. Sec. 954(h) is complex but is essential to correct the complex provisions of Subpart F which now impose U.S. tax on income earned and retained abroad by a foreign corporation, before receipt of such income by any U.S. taxpayer.

In its present form, I.R.C. Sec. 954(b)(1) excludes from the penalty classification of "foreign base company income" certain dividends and income, but only to an extent so limited as to afford no relief from the tax penalty under I.R.C. Sec. 954 in the case of most dividends and other income received by (and retained) by one controlled foreign corporation from another controlled foreign corporation.

Well established multinational corporations escape from the penalties imposed by I.R.C. Sec. 954 by electing the benefits of the "minimum distribution" provisions of I.R.C. Sec. 963. However, the latter provision is of no value to the smaller manufacturer that, in the absence of I.R.C. Secs. 954(d) and (e), might commence to market its products abroad through the use of a foreign selling subsidiary.

Another approach to the whole problem of removal of tax penalties and the allowance of desirable tax incentives for the export of U.S. products would be to adopt a "tax on value added" ("TVA") such as is used in France and was used in Germany until quite recently to encourage exports. Such a TVA (at, say, 15%) could be used as a substitute for a large portion of the tax now being levied on corporations. This tax would be rebated on exports of U.S. products and be imposed on the import of products. France has insisted that such a "border tax" is not contrary to the letter or spirit of GATT. Hence, such a tax should be free of attack on the ground that has frequently been raised against other proposals, to allow some form of deduction or tax credit for income from the export of U.S. products.

CONCLUSION

Remove U.S. tax penalties on exports

1. Eliminate provisions of Sec. 431 of H.R. 13270 which would penalize U.S. manufacturers that have elected in good faith to use the "per country" method of computing the limitation on the amount of allowable foreign tax credit. The present method of computation does not result in any double deduction or any double credit for foreign tax.

2. Eliminate or correct the provisions of Sec. 452 of H.R. 13270 which would have the effect of reducing the amount of the allowable foreign tax credit. This provision is intended to prevent abuse of the "double declining balance" method of computing the allowable depreciation deduction. Whatever the merits of this proposed "reform" provision, it should not have the undoubtedly unintended effect of reducing the foreign tax credit because of an adjustment which would increase the amount of "earnings and profits" over the amount which would result if computed in the same manner as the depreciation deduction.

3. Amend I.R.C. Sec. 954(d) and (e) to eliminate the penalty on income earned abroad from the sale abroad of U.S. products. It is generally stated, and the Treasury has not denied, that very little tax is being collected under "Subpart F", of which these subsections are a part. On the other hand, it is asserted, without the possibility of contradiction, that provisions of Subpart F prevent many smaller U.S. manufacturers from entering the export field.

4. The tricky methods of computing the 10% surcharge tax should be eliminated so that the amount of the surtax would not be more than 10% of the amount of U.S. tax which the taxpayer would have paid on the same income in the absence of the surtax. As stated by the Chairman of this Committee:

> "If it is a 10-percent surcharge, it ought to be a 10-percent surcharge. If you are paying 14-percent, I think you have a right to complain." (Senate Finance Committee, July 9, 1969, Hearings on H.R. 12290—Proposed Extension of the Surcharge and Repeal of the Investment Tax Credit.)

5. Eliminate the "gross-up" provisions enacted in 1962 which, in many cases, reduce the benefit of the foreign tax credit. (I.R.C. Secs. 902, 960 and 78)

SUGGESTED EXPORT INCENTIVES

In addition to removing the above-mentional U.S. tax burdens on exports, we suggest the following positive incentives for U.S. exports and the sale of U.S. products abroad:

1. Recognize foreign "added value" and similar "indirect" taxes as income taxes for the purpose of the foreign tax credit.

2. Allow credit for foreign taxes paid on the income of subsidiaries below the second tier when received as a dividend by a U.S. taxpayer having an interest of 10% or more in such subsidiary.

3. Allow "tax sparing" credit for foreign income taxes waived ("forgiven") by a foreign government as an incentive for foreign investment.

4. Eliminate or at least amend I.R.C. Sec. 367 to allow taxpayers the same rights of appeal as under all other provisions of the Internal Revenue Code.

5. Restore the 7% investment credit to enable U.S. manufacturers to meet foreign competition.

6. Limit application of the "Conglomerate" provisions to acquisitions by domestic (U.S.) corporations—or, in the alternative, for some or all of the above provisions—

7. Adopt a substantial TVA to replace in whole or in part the corporate income tax and use such TVA as a "border tax" to afford an incentive to exports of U.S. manufactured products and equalize the tax burden on imports of foreign products.

FINAL WORD

The most desirable move to promote the export of U.S. products would be to amend I.R.C. Secs. 954(d) and (e), as set forth above.

The CHAIRMAN. We had called witnesses in the order they were to be here. I see the Honorable Joseph Tydings has arrived while the previous witness was testifying. I will call Senator Tydings.

Senator, I hope you were successful in reporting out the name of your distinguished constituent to the Maritime Administration yesterday. I left my proxy with you and I hope you got the job done.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOSEPH D. TYDINGS, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MARYLAND

Senator TYDINGS. We got "aye" votes from all present, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask that you insert my statement in the record in its entirety. I cover about seven points.

Let me just briefly go over them with you, because I know how pressed the committee is.

First of all, let me congratulate you and the whole committee on the very thorough way in which you are handling this frightfully difficult matter. I think that the Senate is certainly living up to its responsibility.

Let me ask you to turn if I might to page 10 of my statement.

The tax reform bill as it passed by the House possesses an imbalance that will produce a long-term revenue loss approximately of $2.4 billion a year. I think that is an unfortunate situation. Restoring fiscal balance to the tax reform bill will require the raising of additional revenue by closing some of the loopholes in our tax system that have remained undisturbed, or else the removal of some of the provisions which the House inserted.

Approximately $20 billion in capital gains annually escapes taxation, because the present law permits a tax-free stepup on the basis of death. To begin with, this costs the Treasury $2.5 to $3 billion a year in potential revenue, and that is more than enough to offset the revenue loss built into the House-passed version of the tax bill.

Economists have long opposed the tax-free stepup in basis on the grounds it inhibits capital mobility and distorts the allocation of resources in this country. This is because people are holding on to appreciated property that they would ordinarily sell in anticipation of being able to avoid paying taxes on the capital gains if the property is held until death.

Finally the loophole has constituted a serious inequity in our tax system, because it greatly favors those who have large amounts of accumulated wealth to pass on to the next generation. Thus for reasons of economy and equity, I urge the committee to amend H.R.

13270 to include a provision that would pass on the original basis of appreciated properties to those who inherit them.

In this way, when I sell the Seagrams stock which I inherited from my grandfather's estate I would be paying a capital gains tax based on the original basis of the cost of that stock or the IBM stock or any of the other stock I inherited as of the date that he acquired it. That way no capital gains would escape taxation and I think you would be able to balance your bill.

Now I might ask you gentlemen to turn back to page 1. In Maryland we have a unique system of investment which enables homebuilders to build houses or home buyers to purchase houses more economically. This is known as the "ground rent system." The person who owns the ground or the builder does not sell the ground at the time the person buys a house. He sells the house to the individual. The ground is kept at its cost by the builder. The person who purchases the house pays an annual ground rent. He can purchase it under Maryland law at any time he wishes capitalized at 6 percent, but it means basically that a young couple can buy a $20,000 house at perhaps $2,000 less than it might otherwise cost them.

This is a long-term situation in Maryland. Ground rents are investments which often have been held by banks, pension funds for many years.

The House by inadvertence left out ground rents as one of the enumerated type of investments which mutual savings banks may include in their investment portfolio. It is my understanding that the Ways and Means Committee realizes that this was an unintentional oversight, and that they would welcome an amendment to correct the omission. I would be grateful for your consideration on that.

In pages 4 through 6, gentlemen, I talk about the farm losses provision which the House included, with specific reference to parimutuel racing and the breeding of horses for racing. This is an extremely important industry in Maryland as it is in many other States.

I would urge you that three provisions of the farm loss section of the House bill be deleted. These are the provisions which relate to the gain from disposition of property used in farming where farm lossses offset nonfarm income, depreciation recapture, and hobby losses with respect to the racing and breeding of horses. I will offer an amendment for your consideration, but let me just briefly summarize it.

Parimutuel racing, which is held in 30 States, produced $426 million of State revenue in 1968. The revenue that the States will derive from this source in 1969 is roughly $500 million. In Maryland alone the State tax revenue is $14 million.

Treasury claims it is losing in revenue under the present farm losses provisions covering horses for racing and breeding is roughly $100 million, only a quarter of what the States realize from parimutuel racing. I would hope you would give strong consideration, gentlemen, to deleting these provisions. For each year racehorses in the Nation compete for purses amounting to only one-half of the operating costs for maintaining them; thus it is very difficult for all of the stables to operate at a profit. And to take $4 away from the States in tax revenue to give $1 to the Federal Government does not make a great deal of sense to me.

The question of the tax treatment of private foundations to the tax treatment in the House bill of private foundations. I am a strong believer that in a democratic capitalistic system you must encourage private giving. I think if the Government seeks to undertake the solution of all societal problems in this country, we are going to have to spend a great deal more money than we have ever contemplated before.

There is evidence that some private foundations have abused the tax exemption privileges. Such breaches of public trust simply cannot be condoned.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think it is incumbent upon your committee to take care not to undermine the spirit of voluntary giving in the United States in our efforts to insure that both the spirit and the letter of the law governing such giving are properly observed. I would like briefly to call to the committee's attention three such overkill provisions of the section on the tax treatment of private foundations.

First of all, gentlemen, there is the proposed levy of a 7½ percent tax upon a private foundation's investment income. There is no way you can avoid that tax taking away from those who would be the object of a foundation's giving.

Furthermore, once the Federal Government institutes a tax on foundations, then State and local communities are going to institute a tax on foundations, and the entire system of private foundations is going to be threatened.

I do not favor the administration's 2 percent proposal. What I do favor in this respect would be a registration fee, which would cover the actual cost of the administrative machinery needed to insure the private foundations are not abusing their privileges; a user fee rather than a tax.

Secondly, regarding the distribution of income by private foundations, I would respectfully request that you consider lowering the amount from 5 percent to a more reasonable rate of 2 percent. I do not think that there is any responsible investment trust today which is not willing to lower the caliber of its assets that can pay out 5 percent a year. I think 2 percent is a reasonable amount.

Next, there is the question of stock ownership limitations on private foundations. In principle the objective of the proposal to limit to 20 percent the combined ownership of a corporation's stock which may be held by a foundation is commendable. The use of foundations to maintain control of businesses can result in a diversion of a foundation's managers from the charitable duties they ought to be following to the affairs of the business.

However, in actual practice, Mr. Chairman, the 20 percent limit presents some real practical problems. Despite the divestiture provisions of the House proposal, the proposed limit is likely to result in the eventual sale of divested assets at considerably less than the real value. This is particularly true if the assets consist of securities of a closely-held company to meet the 20 percent limit, because then it really remains the sale of the company, if a fair price for the stock is to be obtained.

I am sure that this is not an outcome which the House envisioned or desired when it enacted the 2 percent limit.

Therefore, I would urge the committee to consider dropping this limit from the tax reform bill at least as it applies to existing foundations.

There is no justification for provision that would work a hardship almost exclusively on family-held businesses.

There is the matter of the charitable contributions of appreciated property. While I agree that people should not be able to come out net ahead by contributing to charity, I cannot support the change in the taxing of contributions of appreciated property contained in H.R. 13270; for as it is presently written, the proposal discriminates against small private special-purpose foundations in favor of big, well-known foundations.

A donor could continue to deduct the fair market value of contributed property where the donee was a large public charity or a large operating foundation, but not where it was a small private foundation. Thus you could deduct the fair market value of an appreciated security if you gave it to the PTA, for example, but not if the recipient were the Brookings Institute here in Washington.

I think the result of the discrimination would be to shift donations away from private foundations, many of which serve a very important role in the community in which they reside, and towards those foundations not covered by the proposal.

Finally, gentlemen, I would like to address myself to the tax treatment of State and municipal bonds.

I am sure you have much testimony on this. There is great concern with all of the local officials in my State, from the Governor right through the county commissioner of the smallest county in Maryland, that as a result of the proposal which passed the House, there is a great deal of uncertainty in the bond market. It is widely held that the adoption of the House provision might jeopardize the entire security market which relates to municipal and State bonds.

In July the State of Maryland postponed the issuance of $60 million in bonds. If States like Maryland are to meet their responsibilities, the bond market has got to be strengthened in every way. I realize that the House did not intend to jeopardize the ability of the States and localities to raise funds, but nevertheless that would be a result of the passage of the House proposal.

Even the possibility of change has thrown the bond market in this country into a state of chaos and confusion, and I think there is almost unanimous agreement among State and local officials across the country that the adoption of this particular provision would cast a psychological shadow over the entire bond market.

I think the risks inherent in any change in the status of State and municipal bonds outweigh the possible benefits. If we are to truly revitalize our Federal system and provide State and local governments with access to the resources they require to be responsive to the needs of their citizens, the Congress must preserve the present stability and the present status of State and municipal bonds, and I strongly urge the committee to adopt such a position in the legislation it reports to the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your courtesy. There is much more detail in my statement than I presented to you, but I tried to make it as brief as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Senator. I am impressed to see that you did not agree with everything in the bill just because the House proposed it.

Senator CURTIS. I want to commend the distinguished Senator on his statement on foundations and as I understand his position on the interest on State and local bonds.

I have one question. In your proposal to tax appreciated property at death, that is whether it is sold or not?

Senator TYDINGS. No, I am sorry, I did not make that clear. My purpose there would merely be to carry over the original basis through the estate. I think it would work perhaps an undue hardship on the widow of the estate to require her to pay a tax at the date of death or through the estate. My proposal would merely carry the original basis through the estate out to the beneficiaries of the estate, and when the beneficiary decided to sell the security, he would have to pay a capital gains tax based on the original cost of the property, and not the stepped-up basis as of the date of death.

Senator CURTIS. And you refer to all kinds of property and all sizes of estates?

Senator TYDINGS. Yes, all types of property in real estate, in stocks, bonds, anything which appreciates.

Senator WILLIAMS. When you refer to carryover of the old base, would you add to that old base the amount of the estate tax that had been paid each time?

Senator TYDINGS. That is a possibility which had not occurred to me, and that might be something which the committee would want to consider. You see the Treasury estimates that there is roughly about $2.5 billion a year of taxes which are not paid because of the stepped-up basis of property as of the date of death; and that constitutes a major loophole.

As I see it, it would not work a great hardship on a widow or a family, provided you did not make them pay it as of the date of death. If they just kept the security and perhaps at some later time wanted to sell it, then they would pay the capital gains tax on the original basis.

I think it might well be that you could work out some formula for the estate tax and put it on there. You would still have a major sum of mony that would inure to the Treasury.

Senator WILLIAMS. You would still achieve the same objective which you are seeking?

Senator TYDINGS. That is correct.

Senator CURTIS. It has been my observation that over the years there have been a few people in the Treasury who regarded all of the taxpayers' money that did not flow into the Treasury as loopholes, so I would not take their estimates too seriously.

Senator TYDINGS. You are in a better position to determine that than I am, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator TYDINGS. I have a chart on parimutuel and taxes paid to the States which I will ask be incorporated in the record.

(The tables referred to by Senator Tydings, and the Senator's prepared statement follow:)

STATEMENT OF HON. JOSEPH D. TYDINGS, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MARYLAND

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee. Permit me to open on a congratulatory note. The thoroughness and care with which the Committee has conducted these hearings offer eloquent public testimony of Congress' concern that the many inequities in our tax laws be eliminated. I am confident these proceedings will result in comprehensive reform legislation this year of the kind the people have rightly demanded.

The bill before the Committee is quite extensive in its coverage, and by the time these hearings are completed, expert testimony will have been presented on virtually every provision of the proposed legislation. Therefore, I shall limit my remarks to several aspects of the bill that have proven of particular importance to the people of Maryland.

MUTUAL SAVINGS BANKS, SAVINGS & LOAN ASSOCIATIONS, ETC.

In order to qualify for the full bad debt deduction under the legislation enacted by the House, a mutual savings bank must have 72 percent of its assets invested in certain qualifying categories specified in the bill. For the most part, these specified asset categories consist of residential mortgage loans and other investments acquired by banks for liquidity purposes.

The bill enumerates a wide variety of loans that would qualify as residential mortgages. Included are home loans, church loans, mobile home loans and school loans, just to mention a few. However, ground rents are not specifically included, though they have been treated as mortgage loans in all previous Federal income tax legislation.

The ground rent, which permits an individual to rent the land on which he owns a home, is an institution peculiar to Maryland. The mutual savings banks of Maryland have substantial investments in these ground rents. Therefore, the omission of ground rents from the definition of residential mortgage loans would make it extremely difficult for the majority of Maryland mutual savings banks to qualify for the full bad debt deduction in H.R. 13270.

The staff of the Ways & Means Committee has informed me that the failure to specifically include ground rents in Section 442 of the House bill was an unintentional oversight, and that they would welcome an amendment to correct this omission.

I would urge the Committee to include ground rents specifically in the Senate version of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 to insure that Maryland mutual savings banks are not unfairly discriminated against in this matter of bad debt deductions.

FARM LOSSES

Pari-mutuel racing and the breeding of horses for racing are important industries in Maryland which produce desperately needed revenue for the support of State services. Three provisions of the Farm Losses section of the House bill—the Gain From Disposition of Property Used In Farming Where Farm Losses Offset Nonfarm Income, Depreciation Recapture, and Hobby Losses—pose serious threats to the survival of these industries.

There are a number of reasons why the raising and breeding of horses ought to be protected by exclusion from these new Farm Loss provisions in the House bill. However, the most compelling relates to the aggregate revenue effects of the proposed changes.

Pari-mutuel racing provides the states with a form of voluntary taxation which yielded them $426 million in 1968 and which will yield approximately $500 million in 1969 (see attached Exhibit A). Maryland alone received $14 million in 1968. Since the Farm Losses proposals in the House bill will ultimately destroy pari-mutuel racing in this country because the vast majority of breeders and owners of race horses will be forced out of business, this sorely needed revenue will be lost.

This will simply be a case of the government cutting off its nose to spite its face. Very little of the $200 to $400 million in potential tax revenue the Treasury estimates it loses each year as a result of present provisions in the Farm Losses tax laws is attributable to horses. At the same time, including horses for breeding and racing in the proposed legislation will mean the loss of $500 million in tax revenues to the states. This $500 million is not deductible against federal income taxes. If lost, this revenue will have to be replaced by other taxes—applicable to the public at large and deductible for federal income tax purposes. Such a trade-off makes no sense. The real losers will be the American taxpayers.

Furthermore, the Federal government probably realizes net tax benefits from pari-mutuel racing at the present time under existing Farm Losses tax law. Substantial Federal taxes are currently paid by tracks, their stockholders, employees and concessionaires; by the employees of breeding farms and racing stables; by owners on the ordinary income produced by the sale of yearlings by breeding farms; and by owners on capital gains on the sale of racing and breeding stock and on the sale of breeding farms.

In short, including horses for breeding and racing under the new Farm Losses provisions will have the effect of closing an imaginary loophole through which virtually no revenue escapes, at a cost of half-a-billion dollars to our State governments. This is neither good pubic finance nor good government.

To understand why the Farm Losses provisions in the House bill will kill pari-mutuel racing, it is essential to keep in mind the fact that horse breeding and racing are terribly hazardous businesses. An estimated 9 out of 10 race-horse owners lose money.

Each year the race horses of the nation compete for purses amounting to only one-half of the operating expenses of maintaining them (i.e., exclusive of depreciation). Lameness, sickness and accidents incapacitate or degenerate a majority of race horses. And they are insurable only for mortality. If a horse is incapacitated in any way or simply cannot run fast, it is of absolutely no worth to its owner.

Changing the hobby law to require "reasonable expectation of making profit" means that the test is no longer the owner's purpose or motive, but his objective prospect of making money. On such a basis, the prognosis can readily be shown to be very dim. This will force owners out. Virtually all horse racing losses will likely prove nondeductible.

The Depreciation Recapture proposal will also work to force owners out of business. For only by the occasional sale of a valuable, fully depreciated horse can an owner replenish his stable without recourse to his savings. In addition, depletion is a more appropriate principle to apply to race horses than recapture of depreciation. A race horse is a wasting natural asset. It cannot be restored by depreciation funds.

Finally, the proposed restriction of deductibility of horse-racing expenses against non-farm income will likewise force most owners out of business. Because of the hazards of horse racing referred to above, very few owners can depend on it for a living. If they must absorb horse losses, they will be forced to do so at the expense of the outside income with which they support themselves and their families.

Without the market provided by racing stables, all breeding farms will eventually be closed down and the net result will be the end of pari-mutuel racing.

The argument for excluding horses for racing and breeding from the proposed changes in the Farm Losses provisions is overwhelming. Therefore, I have introduced an amendment to H.R. 13270 which would exempt horses from the bill, a copy of which is attached. I strongly urge the committee to give careful consideration to this amendment in its deliberation. For I am convinced it is consistent not only with the well-being of the horse industry in this county, but with the best interests of the taxpayers as a whole.

TAX TREATMENT OF PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

I am certain none of us would disagree over the importance of private giving to a democratic, capitalistic society. Government in the solution of societal problems in this country by means of laws supporting the establishment and operation of foundations.

At the same time, there is evidence that some private foundations have abused the tax exemption privileges extended to them. Such breaches of the public trust simply cannot be condoned. However, we must take care not to undermine the spirit of voluntary giving in our efforts to insure that both the spirit and the letter of laws governing such giving are properly observed.

I would like to briefly take up with the committee three such "overkill" provisions of the section on the tax treatment of private foundations.

The levy of a general 7½% tax upon a private foundation's net investment income would constitute a contradiction of our traditional commitment to encourage private giving and a dangerous precedent. Furthermore, the tax would fall on those who were intended to receive foundation benefits, not on the foundations themselves.

An approach more consistent with our time-tested policy of encouraging "voluntary charity" would be that of a user charge or a registration fee to provide enough money to finance the administrative machining to ensure that private foundations are not abusing their privileges. Personally, I would favor an annual foundation registration fee which would vary with the amount of a foundation's assets and income flow-through rather than the 2 percent tax proposed by the administration. I am very much opposed to the creation of a tax of any sort on the investment income of private foundations.

2) Distribution of Income by Private Foundations.

I fully concur with the requirement that private foundations distribute all their income currently. However, the additional provision that a private foundation must distribute the greater of all income or 5 percent of investment assets is unreasonable and, in the long run, harmful.

The 5 percent minimum distribution requirement will cause the managers of private foundations to invest in "high yield fixed income" securities of the type that are subject to substantial depreciation in value during a sustained period of inflation. Thus, while the required yield or the market value of foundation assets will be achieved, such fixed income, in real terms, will be eroded by inflation over the years. Not only will the purchasing power of these "fixed" dollars be reduced, but upon maturity or sale of the securities by foundations, losses in the value of such assets are bound to occur. Therefore, the recipients of foundation distributions will, in the long run, receive less funds to meet their growing needs.

To avoid this situation, I would urge the committee to consider replacing the 5 percent provision with the requirement that a private foundation distribute all income currently but not less than 2 percent of investment assets. For a 2 percent figure is more in line with prevailing economic conditions.

3) Stock Ownership Limitations on Private Foundations

In principle, the objective of the proposal to limit to 20 percent the combined ownership of a corporation's stock which may be held by a foundation is commendable. The use of foundations to maintain control of businesses can result in the diversion of the foundation's managers from their charitable duties and to the affairs of the business. However, in practice, the 20 percent limit presents serious problems.

Despite the liberal divesture provisions, the proposed limit is likely to result in the eventual sale of divested assets at considerably less than their true value. This is particularly true if the assets consist of securities of a closely-held company to meet the 20 percent limit really means the sale of the company if a fair price for the stock is to be obtained. I am sure this is not an outcome the House envisioned or desired when it enacted the 20 percent limit.

Therefore, I would urge the committee to consider dropping this limit from the tax reform bill at least as it applies to existing foundations. There is no justification for a provision that would work a hardship almost exclusively on closely-held family businesses.

CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS OF APPRECIATED PROPERTY

While I agree that people should not be able to come out net ahead by contributing to charity, I cannot support the change in the taxing of contributions of appreciated property contained in H.R. 13270. For as it is presently written, this proposal discriminates against small private special purpose foundations.

A donor could continue to deduct the fair market value of contributed property where the donee was a public charity or large operating foundation, but not where it was a small private foundation. You could deduct fair market value of a contribution to the local PTA, for example, but not if the recipient were the Brookings Institute.

The result of this discrimination would be to shift donations away from private foundations and towards those foundations not covered by the proposal.

This is tantamount to putting the government on record as stating that large public foundations are somehow better than small private foundations. There is no precedent nor any basis in fact for drawing such a conclusion.

In my opinion and that of a vast number of experts in the field of philanthropy, this is a crippling proposal that must be struck from the bill. Nothing less than the survival of many of our great private charitable institutions is at stake.

TAX TREATMENT OF STATE AND MUNICIPAL BONDS

As the members of the committee well know, State and local governments have come under enormous pressure to provide more and better services and facilities. In 1950, total State and local bonds outstanding amounted to less than $50 billion. However, today, as a result of rapidly increasing capital requirements, that total has reached $140 billion.

In July, the State of Maryland postponed the issuance of $60 million in bonds to finance needed facilities because of unfavorable conditions in the State and municipal bond market. If States like Maryland are to meet their burgeoning responsibilities, ways must be found to strengthen the bond market. However, it appears that the proposals in H.R. 13270 regarding the tax treatment of municipal and state bonds will have just the opposite effect; the bond market will be critically weakened.

Even the possibility of change has thrown the bond market into this county into a state of chaos and confusion. State, county and local officials in Maryland have informed me with virtual unanimity that the prospect of a revision of the present tax laws regarding State and municipal bonds has cast a psychological shadow over the entire bond market which is frightening off prospective buyers in droves. They are convinced that enactment of the proposed changes in H.R. 13270 will cause the situation to deteriorate even further.

Clearly, the risks inherent in any change in the status of State and municipal bonds outweigh the possible benefits. If we are to truly revitalize our federal system and provide State and local governments with access to the resources they require to be responsive to the needs of their citizens, the Congress must preserve the present status of State and municipal bonds. I strongly urge the Committee to adopt such a position in the legislation it reports to the Senate.

PASSING ON THE ORIGINAL CAPITAL GAINS BASIS AT DEATH

The Tax Reform Bill of 1969 as passed by the House possesses an "imbalance" that will produce a long-term revenue loss of approximately $2.4 billion a year. This means less money in coming years to support needed public services such as education, health, pollution abatement and housing, to name a few.

Restoring fiscal balance to the Tax Reform Bill will require the raising of additional revenue through the closing of some of the loopholes in our tax system that have remained undisturbed.

As you know, more than $20 billion in capital gains annually escape taxation because the present law permits a tax-free step-up in basis at death. To begin with, this costs the Treasury $2.5–$3 billion a year in potential revenue, more than enough to offset the long-term revenue loss built into the House-passed version of the reform bill.

Economists have long opposed the tax-free step-up in basis on the grounds that it inhibits capital mobility and distorts the allocation of resources in this country. This is because people are holding on to appreciated property they would ordinarily sell in anticipation of being able to avoid paying taxes on the capital gains if the property is held until death.

Finally, this loophole has constituted a serious inequity in our tax system because it greatly favors those who have large amounts of accumulated wealth to pass on to the next generation. Thus, for reasons of economics and equity, I urge the committee to amend H.R. 13270 to include a provision that would pass on the original basis of appreciated properties to those who inherit them. In this way, when an heir sells the appreciated property, he would pay capital gains taxes on appreciation realized while he held the property as well as on the appreciation realized while the individual he inherited it from held it. And no capital gains would escape taxation.

Language to accomplish this is contained in Section 201 of S. 2211, a tax bill I introduced earlier this year.

(5) Florida: Charity and Scholarship days not included in revenue figures above. Thoroughbred—20 days; attendance, 115,57[illegible]; pari-mutuel turnover, $13,199,224. Harness—3 days; attendance, 4,737; pari-mutuel turnover, $250,165.
(6) Idaho: Thoroughbred, Quarter Horse, Appaloosa, and mixed races at most race meets.
(7) Louisiana: Quarter Horse, 277 races. Evangeline Downs, mixed racing.
(8) Louisiana: Donations to American Red Cross and Retarded Children's Funds not included in revenue figures above.
(9) Maine, New Hampshire: Fairs—All Harness racing.
(10) Maryland, Massachusetts: Fairs—All Thoroughbred racing.
(11) Maryland: Two-day Steeplechase meeting included in Thoroughbred figures. Estimated attendance, 28,000; pari-mutuel turnover, $309,908; revenue to state, $15,958.50.
(12) Montana: Thoroughbred, Quarter Horse and Appaloosa racing at same track, same meet. Some mixed races for Thoroughbred and Quarter Horse.
(13) Montana: State derives no revenue from racing. However, 1 per cent of 20% take-out is paid to Commission by licensee and deposited in State Treasury in Commission's account for expenses. Commission also receives toward expenses underpayments and license fee.
(14) Nevada: One per cent of total take-out is paid to Commission for administrative work.
(15) New Mexico: Mixed program each day of Thoroughbred and Quarter Horse racing.
(16) Ohio: Fairs—All Harness racing, except one day Quarter Horse.
(17) Oregon: There were 925 races programmed of which 792 were Thoroughbred, and 133 for Quarter Horse and Appaloosa.
(18) South Dakota: One race per day Quarter Horse.
(19) Washington: Fairs—Both Thoroughbred and Quarter Horse racing.
(20) Washington: Attendance estimated. Approximately 1,000 working passes issued—owners, trainers, jockeys issued two free passes, tax exempted passes issued to state, city and county officials.

Note on Attendance: At some meetings, principally Fairs, attendance records not always reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness will be the Honorable Charles E. Goodell, Senator of the State of New York. I would like to say this for the benefit of all members as well as the audience. We hope to hear 15 additional witnesses in this morning's session. In order to do that we will have to ask the Senators to ask no more questions than absolutely necessary.

Thank you very much.

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GOODELL, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Senator GOODELL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate this opportunity to present my views. If I may, I will offer a full statemnt for the record to be included in the record and I shall be very brief in summation.

First of all, I oppose the blanket tax rate reductions in the House bill because of their inflationary effects. I think whatever tax bill Congress passes should match revenue raising measures and tax cuts, so that it comes out equal.

I oppose the repeal of the 7-percent tax credit. I think this is a mistake to keep turning this on and off. I believe that the long-range impact of this, the main impact will come somewhere between 6 months and 2 years, and at that time we may well be wishing we had more incentives to industry to create jobs, to modernize our plants, to compete with foreign imports and a variety of other things.

I oppose the changes in the treatment of capital gains in the House bill. I do not believe there has been sufficient study of their impact on the investment market.

I oppose the changes in the tax exemption for municipal bonds that are proposed in the House bill. It is very clear that if the House provisions were adopted, it would seriously interfere with the ability of States and localities to finance needed capital improvements. As a matter of fact, there already is a very serious crisis in the municipal bond market because of the House-passed provisions.

I oppose the 7½-percent tax on foundation income. I think it is an unwarranted departure from the principle that non-profit institutions organized for charitable purposes should be free from taxation. I think it would restrict significantly the ability of our foundations to perform the great contribution that they have been making in our society.

There is also a provision in the bill prohibiting foundations formulating positions on social issues. This much too sweeping, and prevents the foundation from really contributing to the solution of this Nation's social ills.

I recommend that be dropped.

I think we could have more effective enforcement of existing law prohibiting foundations from substantially carrying on lobbying activities, and that should be adequate protection for the public and the foundations.

There are also excessive penalties, tax penalties on foundations and foundation managers.

I oppose the new definition of private foundations as excessively broad. The House bill's definition combined with the qualifying distribution requirement will bar many organizations from receiving essential foundation support.

I do believe that foundations should be required to exercise reasonable responsibility over the use of their grants by recipients, but the provisions in the House bill are too severe. I also think it is important that the requirement for a concrete result from grants to individuals be revised. It implies a requirement of Government approval of foundation programs, and encourages the undesirable public or perish syndrome in the academic community.

I oppose the limits upon production of gifts of appreciated property to colleges, universities, hospitals, museums and schools.

I have two proposals that I urge upon the committee. I would like to have attached to my testimony the provisions of the bill which would implement these two provisions.

Senator GOODELL. Number one, a new approach to tax credits for medical expenses, permitting a taxpayer to take a 25-percent credit for medical expenses, with a maximum limit of $500 to $800, depending on the number of dependents in the taxpayer's family, and a reduction in the amount of the credit in the higher tax brackets.

The taxpayer would be permitted the option of taking the medical deduction if this turned out to be more favorable to him than the credit. But the advantage of the credit is that it would particularly help those taxpayers who now cannot benefit from the medical deduction.

The medical deduction is not available to those who elect the standard deduction. It is not available for taxpayers whose medical expenses are below 3 percent of their adjusted gross income. And the value of the deduction goes down as the taxpayer's income goes down. So the credit has none of these defects and would provide real benefits to low-income taxpayers for their medical problems.

The estimated cost of this credit is $5 billion per year.

The credit for expenses of higher education is my second proposal.

This I have made for many years and a number of others have. I propose a credit for a portion of expenses incurred for undergraduate and postgraduate education, with a maximum amount of $325 per student. It would go into effect in 1972.

If the student himself took the credit he would have a 10-year period in which he could carry forward the credit. The estimated cost of this provision is $2 billion per year. By eliminating the general tax increase in the House bill, my recommended provisions would come out with revenue increases and revenue decreased relatively matched.

A BILL To amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That this Act may be cited as the "Tax Relief Act of 1969."

SEC. 2. Subpart A of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits allowable) is amended by renumbering section 40 as 42, and by inserting after section 39 the following new sections 40 and 41:

"SEC. 40. MEDICAL EXPENSES.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—There shall be allowed to an individual, as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year, 25 percent of the amount of expenses paid by him during such taxable year for medical care of the taxpayer, his spouse and dependents (as defined in section 152) and not compensated for by insurance or otherwise.

"(b) LIMITATIONS.—

"(1) DOLLAR LIMIT.—The credit under subsection (a) shall not exceed $500 for any taxable year. Such $500 limit shall, however, be increased (to an amount not above $800) by $100 for each dependent of the taxpayer other than his spouse during such year.

"(2) SCHEDULE OF MAXIMUM CREDITABLE CHARGES: REGULATIONS.—The Secretary or his delegate shall prescribe regulations setting forth a schedule of maximum charges eligible for credit under subsection (a) in such defined categories of expenses for medical care as may be necessary to assure credit only of reasonable expenses pursuant to this section. The secretary or his delegate shall also prescribe such additional regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(3) REDUCTION OF CREDIT.—The credit under subsection (a) as limited by paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection shall be reduced by an amount equal to 1 percent of the amount by which the adjusted gross income of the taxpayer for the taxable year exceeds $25,000.

"(c) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) The term "expenses" for "medical care" means amounts paid—

"(A) for the diagnosis, cure, mitigation, treatment, or prevention of disease, or for the purpose of affecting any structure or function of the body,

"(B) for transportation primarily for and essential to medical care referred to in subparagraph (A), or

"(C) for insurance (including amounts paid as premiums under part B of title XVIII of the Social Security Act, relating to supplementary medical insurance for the aged) covering medical care referred to in subparagraphs (A) and (B).

"(2) In the case of an insurance contract under which amounts are payable for other than medical care referred to in subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (1)—

"(A) no amount shall be treated as paid for insurance to which paragraph (1)(C) applies unless the charge for such insurance is either separately stated in the contract, or furnished to the policyholder by the insurance company in a separate statement,

"(B) the amount taken into account as the amount paid for such insurance shall not exceed such charge, and

"(C) no amount shall be treated as paid for such insurance if the amount specified in the contract (or furnished to the policyholder by the insurance company in a separate statement) as the charge for such insurance is unreasonably large in relation to the total charges under the contract.

"(3) Subject to the limitations of paragraph (2), premiums paid during the taxable year by a taxpayer before he attains the age of 65 for insurance covering medical care (within the meaning of subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (1)) for the taxpayer, his spouse, or a dependent after the taxpayer attains the age of 65 shall be treated as expenses paid during the taxable year for insurance which constitutes medical care if premiums for such insurance are payable (on a level payment basis) under the contract for a period of 10 years or more or until the year in which the taxpayer attains the age of 65 (but in no case for a period of less than 5 years).

"(4) The determination of whether an individual is married at any time during the taxable year shall be made in accordance with the provisions of section 6013(d) (relating to determination of status as husband and wife).

"(d) SPECIAL RULES.—

"(1) TREATMENT OF EXPENSES PAID AFTER DEATH.—For purposes of subsection (a), expenses for the medical care of the taxpayer which are paid out of his estate during the 1-year period beginning with the day after the date of his death shall be treated as paid by the taxpayer at the time incurred. The preceding sentence shall not apply if the amount paid is allowable under section 2053 as a deduction in computing the taxable estate of the decedent, but this paragraph shall not apply if (within the time and in the manner and form prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate) there is filed—

"(A) a statement that such amount has not been allowed as a deduction under section 2053, and

"(B) a waiver of the right to have such amount allowed at any time as a deduction under section 2053.

"(2) APPLICATION WITH OTHER CREDITS.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) to the taxpayer shall not exceed the amount of the tax imposed on the taxpayer for the taxable year by this chapter, reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under this subpart (other than under this section and sections 37, 39 and 41).

"(e) DISALLOWANCE OF EXPENSES AS DEDUCTION.—No deduction shall be allowed under section 213 (relating to medical, dental, etc., expenses) or section 214 (relating to expenses for care of certain dependents) for any expense of medical care which (after the application of subsection (b)) is taken into account in determining the amount of any credit allowed under subsection (a). The preceding sentence shall not apply to expenses of medical care paid by any taxpayer who, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate, elects not to apply the provisions of this section with respect to such expenses for the taxable year.

"SEC. 41. EXPENSE OF HIGHER EDUCATION.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—There shall be allowed to an individual, as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year, an amount, determined under subsection (b), of the expenses of higher education paid by him during the taxable year to one or more institutions of higher education in providing an education above the twelfth grade for any family member.

"(b) LIMITATIONS.—

"(1) AMOUNT PER FAMILY MEMBER.—The credit under subsection (a) for expenses of higher education of any family member paid during the taxable year shall be an amount equal to the sum of—

"(A) 75 percent of so much of such expenses as does not exceed $200.

"(B) 25 percent of so much of such expenses as exceeds $200 but does not exceed $500, and

"(C) 10 percent of so much of such expenses as exceeds $500 but does not exceed $1,500.

"(2) REDUCTION OF CREDIT.—The credit under subsection (a) for expenses of higher education of any family member paid during the taxable year, as determined under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be reduced by an amount equal to 1 percent of the amount by which the adjusted gross income of the taxpayer for the taxable year exceeds $25,000.

"(c) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) EXPENSES OF HIGHER EDUCATION.—The term 'expenses of higher education' means—

"(A) tuition and fees required for the enrollment or attendance of a student at a level above the twelfth grade at an institution of higher education, and

"(B) fees, books, supplies, and equipment required for courses of instruction above the twelfth grade at an institution of higher education.

Such term does not include any amount paid, directly or indirectly, for meals, lodging, or similar personal, living, or family expenses. In the event an amount paid for tuition or fees includes an amount for meals, lodging, or similar expenses which is not separately stated, the portion of such amount which is attributable to meals, lodging, or similar expenses shall be determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of his delegate.

"(2) INSTITUTE OF HIGHER EDUCATION.—The term 'institution of higher education' means—

"(A) an educational institution (as defined in section 151(e)(4))—

"(i) which regularly offers education at a level above the twelfth grade; and

"(ii) contributions to or for the use of which constitute charitable contributions within the meaning of section 170(c); or

"(B) a business or trade school, or technical institution or other technical or vocational school in any State, which (i) is legally authorized to provide, and provides within that State, a program of postsecondary vocational or technical education designed to fit individuals for useful employment in recognized occupations; and (ii) is accredited by a nationally recognized accrediting agency or association listed by the United States Commissioner of Education; and (iii) has been in existence for two years or has been specially accredited by the Commissioner as an institution meeting the other requirements of this subparagraph.

"(3) STATE.—The term 'State' includes, in addition to the several States of the Union, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

"(4) FAMILY MEMBER.—The term 'family member' means the taxpayer, his spouse or any of his dependents (as defined in section 152).

"(d) SPECIAL RULES.—

"(1) ADJUSTMENT FOR CERTAIN SCHOLARSHIPS AND VETERANS' BENEFITS.—The amounts otherwise taken into account under subsection (a) as expenses of higher education of any individual during any period shall be reduced (before the application of subsection (b)) by any amounts received by such individual during such period as—

"(A) a scholarship or fellowship grant (within the meaning of section 117(a)(1)) which under section 117 is not includible in gross income, and

"(B) educational assistance allowance under chapter 34 or 35 of title 38 of the United States Code.

"(2) NONCREDIT AND RECREATIONAL, ETC., COURSES.—Amounts paid for expenses of higher education of any individual shall be taken into account under subsection (a)—

"(A) in the case of an individual who is a candidate for a baccalaureate or higher degree, only to the extent such expenses are attributable to courses of instruction for which credit is allowed toward a baccalaureate or higher degree, and

"(B) in the case of an individual who is not a candidate for a baccalaureate or higher degree, only to the extent such expenses are attributable to courses of instruction necessary to fulfill requirements for the attainment of a predetermined and identified education, professional, or vocational objective.

"(3) APPLICATION WITH OTHER CREDITS.—The credit allowed by subsection (a) to the taxpayer shall not exceed the amount of the tax imposed on the taxpayer for the taxable year by this chapter reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under this subpart (other than under this section and sections 37 and 39).

"(e) DISALLOWANCE OF EXPENSES AS DEDUCTION.—No deduction shall be allowed under section 162 (relating to trade or business expenses) for any expense of higher education which (after the application of subsection (b)) is taken into account in determining the amount of any credit allowed under subsection (a). The preceding sentence shall not apply to the expenses of higher education of any taxpayer who, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate, elects not to apply the provisions of this section with respect to sdch expenses for the taxable year.

"(f) CARRYOVER OF EXCESS CREDIT.—Any amount by which the credit otherwise allowable under this section for the expenses of higher education of the taxpayer paid during the taxable year exceeds the tax which would be imposed on the taxpayer for such taxable year by this chapter in the absence of this section reduced by the amount of credit allowed for expenses of higher education of any other family member paid during such taxable year shall be allowed as a credit for expenses of higher education of the taxpayer deemed to be paid during the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, or tenth succeeding taxable years, in that order and to the extent such expenses were not deemed paid in a prior taxable year, in the amount by which the tax which would be imposed on the taxpayer for such succeeding taxable year by this chapter in the absence of this section reduced by the amount of credit allowed for expenses of higher education of any other family member paid during such succeeding taxable year exceeds the amount of credit allowable under this section for the expenses of higher education of the taxpayer paid during such succeeding taxable year plus the amount of credit allowable under this section for such expenses paid during any taxable year earlier than the current taxable year but deemed to have been paid during such succeeding taxable year, subject, however, to all limitations imposed by this section on the amount of credit allowable for such succeeding taxable year.

"(g) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary or his delegate shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

SEC. 3. The table of sections for subpart A of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by striking out the last item and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 40. Medical Expenses.
"Sec. 41. Expenses of Higher Education.
"Sec. 42. Overpayments of Tax."

SEC. 4. The amendments made by section 2 and 3 of this act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1971.

Senator WILLIAMS. What increased taxes do you recommend as revenue producing in this bill?

Senator GOODELL. I would eliminate the blanket tax rate reduction in the House bill entirely.

Senator WILLIAMS. Those are the only two features of the bill that you approve?

Senator GOODELL. Oh, no.

Senator WILLIAMS. As revenue-producing?

Senator GOODELL. It sounds like a great opposition statement. I went down to point out the features of the House bill that I disapprove. The ones that I do not mention I generally approve.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator GOODELL. Thank you, sir.

(Senator Charles E. Goodell's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GOODELL, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

BLANKET RATE REDUCTION

Opposes the blanket tax rate reductions because of their inflationary effects. Supports the Administration proposals on low-income allowance, on the standard deduction and on rates for single taxpayers.

Proposes selective tax relief in lieu of blanket rate reductions.

CREDIT FOR MEDICAL EXPENSES

Proposes a 25% credit for medical expenses. This credit would be subject to a maximum annual limitation of $500 to $800 (depending on the number of the taxpayer's dependents) and subject to gradual reduction in the higher brackets. Taxpayers would be permitted the option of taking the existing medical deduction in lieu of the credit. The credit would take effect in 1972.

The existing medical deduction is of limited significance to low- and middle-income taxpayers because (1) it is not available for taxpayers who elect the standard deduction, (2) it is not available for taxpayers whose medical expenses are below 3% of their adjusted gross income, and (3) the value of the deduction goes down as the taxpayer's income goes down. The proposed credit has none of these defects, would provide real benefits to low-income taxpayers, and would encourage taxpayers to undertake the preventive medicine of regular medical check-ups and early professional consultation.

The estimated cost of the credit is $3 billion per year.

CREDIT FOR EXPENSES OF HIGHER EDUCATION

Proposes a credit for a portion of expenses incurred for undergraduate and post-graduate education. The costs of expenses such as tuition, books and supplies would be covered, subject to a maximum annual limitation of $325 per student and a gradual reduction of the available credit in higher tax brackets. For students working their way through college, the credit could be carried forward over a 10-year period. The credit would take effect in 1972.

The credit will constitute a major impetus to (1) improving our educational system at both public and private institutions, and (2) broadening the opportunities available to the public for higher educational training.
The estimated cost of the credit is $2 billion per year.

INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

Questions the wisdom of repealing the 7% investment tax credit.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Opposes the changes in the treatment of capital gains proposed in the House bill, because insufficient study has been given to the effect of these changes upon investment and long-term national growth.

MUNICIPAL BONDS

Opposes the changes in the tax exemption for municipal bonds proposed in the House bill, because they would interfere with the ability of states and municipalities to finance capital construction.

TAXATION OF FOUNDATIONS

Opposes 7½% tax on foundation income because it is an unwarranted departure from established principles; is discriminatory; would adversely affect the educational, scientific, medical, cultural and social activities of foundations; and would create a dangerous precedent. Sees no advantages in this tax either as a revenue raising device or as a measure to reform abuses.
Recommends substituting an annual filing fee to cover the costs of increased auditing and supervision by the IRS. This fee should be charged either as an amount proportional to the assets of each foundation or a specified percentage—with an upper limit clearly set—of income.

FOUNDATION PROGRAM ACTIVITIES

Regards provision in bill prohibiting foundations from formulating of issues as too sweeping, ambiguous, and self-defeating.
Recommends this provision be dropped.
Maintains that more effective enforcement of existing law—which prohibits foundations from substantially carrying on lobbying activities—should be adequate protection for the public and the foundations.

EXCESSIVE SANCTIONS

Opposes House bill's tax penalties on foundations and foundation managers. Considers these proposals excessive and a threat to support for innovative programs. Recommends proposed penalties be scaled down to reasonable levels, and recommends a period for correction of violations before penalty is imposed.

DEFINITIONS OF FOUNDATIONS AND RESTRICTIONS ON GRANTS MADE ELIGIBLE AS "QUALIFYING DISTRIBUTIONS"

Opposes new definition of private foundation as excessively broad. Notes that the House bill's definition, combined with the qualifying distributions requirement, will bar many organizations from receiving essential foundation support. Recommends that definition be redrafted to reflect the public's traditional view of foundations as funded non-profit, private, grant-making organizations.

FOUNDATIONS' RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE EXPENDITURES OF GRANTEES

Recommends that foundations be required to exercise "reasonable" responsibility over the use of their grants by recipients.

GRANTS TO INDIVIDUALS

Maintains that requirement for a concrete result fom grants to individuals implies government approval and encourages undesirable "publish or perish" syndrome.

DONATIONS OF APPRECIATED PROPERTY

Opposes limits upon deduction of gifts of appreciated property to colleges, universities, hospitals, churches and schools.

STATEMENT

Last month, the House of Representatives passed a tax reform measure of comprehensive scope. That fact alone has provoked widespread interest in Congress and throughout the nation. Comprehensive tax reform is so long overdue that we are all grateful for a measure which does, in fact, address itself to correction of many of the inequities in our tax laws—inequities that over the years have transformed the democratic ideal of our graduated system of income taxation into a haven for special privilege.

Like a child who has taken his first few steps, we're a little awed by our own courage but delighted to discover that we do have, after all, the ability to go where we want to go. In our enthusiasm, however, let us not lose sight of where it is we want to go.

REVENUE-PRODUCING REFORMS

The House bill does represent a first step—some see it as a somewhat shaky and uncertain step—toward elimination of special tax privileges which do not serve the national interest. The Treasury estimated that this loop-hole plugging function of the bill will eventually bring in $4 billion per year in additional revenue collections. A feature of the bill designed primarily to fight inflation—repeal of the investment credit—is expected to bring in an additional $3.3 billion per year.

These revenue-producing provisions make possible for the first time in many years a responsible and creative reexamination of the ways in which the taxpayer's burden may be lightened—not just to serve the individual's narrow interest in decreasing his own taxes but to serve the national interest.

I do not think the across-the-board reduction in tax rates included in the House bill are in the national interest.

The tax reform and anti-inflationary provisions in the House bill will in the long-term raise an additional $8.1 billion per year. The blanket rate reductions and other relief measures in the bill would cost $10.5 billion per year. This leaves a net loss of $2.4 billion per year.

This loss—unless it is offset by reductions in Federal spending—will simply add to inflationary pressures. The inflationary effect will be particularly strong because blanket rate reductions directly feed consumer spending.

If we really are concerned with fighting inflation—as I think we have to be—we simply cannot afford the fiscal luxury of this sort of wholesale rate reduction.

It is surely apparent that the last general reduction in tax rates which took effect in 1964 and 1965 has contributed materially to our present overheated economy. It may be appropriate in the future to consider another general reduction of the magnitude proposed in the House bill. This is not the time, however. Let us first give our unpleasant fiscal and monetary medicine a chance to bring the present bout of inflation under control before risking renewed infection.

It is, moreover, difficult enough to solve the pressing social problems facing the country in the present stringent budgetary situation. Passing a tax bill in which tax cuts exceed revenue-raising measures will only aggravate the situation.

For these reasons, and for other reasons detailed in the testimony of Secretary Kennedy before the Senate Finance Committee, I prefer the Administration proposals on the low income allowance, on the standard deduction and on the rates for single taxpayers to the analogous provisions of the House bill. I also prefer the Administration's proposal to eliminate the gasoline tax deduction.

I would, however, go further—and oppose the blanket rate reductions contained in the House bill.

SELECTIVE TAX RELIEF

It makes much more sense, in lieu of blanket rate reductions, to adopt a rational choice among our high-priority goals which may most effectively be served by tax relief. Let me suggest two national assets which are fundamental to the quality of American life and which may be served effectively by carefully directed tax-relief innovations: the health of the body and the development of the mind.

I propose the use of income tax credits to lighten the burden of the lower- and middle-income citizens who incur expenses for medical care or for higher education. These tax relief provisions will inevitably extend the scope and improve the quality of modern techniques devoted to health care and higher education.

A recent Harris survey has shown that 33% of American families consider medical and educational costs as the major financial problems they are facing. The tax relief measures I am proposing will help reduce the impact of these costs on family budgets.

These two tax relief proposals—the credit for medical expenses and the credit for higher education expenses—are set forth in a bill which I am introducing today and which I would like to submit to this Committee with my statement. I respectfully suggest the Chairman consider the substance of this bill as an amendment to the Tax Reform Act this Committee is now considering.

I propose a 25% credit against income tax for all reasonable, uninsured medical expenses—including hospitalization, professional fees, medicine, and related insurance premiums. This credit would be subject to a maximum annual limitation of from $500 to $800 (depending on the number of the taxpayer's dependents) and subject to gradual reduction in higher tax brackets.

Under existing law, a deduction is available for that portion of general medical expenses which exceed 3% of the taxpayer's adjusted gross income. And only that portion of the cost of medicine which exceeds 1% of adjusted gross income may be taken into account for purposes of calculating the deduction.

EFFECT OF STANDARD DEDUCTION

These existing provisions are of limited significance. One reason for this is that no relief is available to the broad category of taxpayers who elect the standard deduction. And more often than not it is these taxpayers who are most in need of relief. The enlargement of the standard deduction proposed in the House bill serves to underline this objection.

Under these provisions I propose, relief would be available by way of direct credit against the tax due, whether or not the taxpayer uses the standard deduction.

NEED FOR RELIEF

In the cases when the existing deduction does become available, another defect is apparent: the amount of tax relief increases with the taxpayer's bracket. A medical expense deduction is worth roughly twice as much to the taxpayer in the 50% bracket as it is to the taxpayer in the 25% bracket.

The tax credit provisions I am proposing would provide direct tax relief (up to the $500 to $800 limit), rather than a percentage relief based on the tax bracket. It thus provides real benefits to low- and middle-income taxpayers.

Furthermore, the credit would be decreased on a percentage scale as the taxpayer's income rises over $25,000. No credit at all would be available for the very wealthy—those taxpayers with incomes over $65,000.

OPTIONAL MEDICAL EXPENSE DEDUCTION

Because the credit is limted to a maximum of $500 to $800, taxpayers with unusually high medical expenses should continue to have the option to utilize the existing medical expense deduction. Accordingly, my proposal will retain this option.

PREVENTIVE MEDICINE

An undesirable feature of the present law is, in my opinion, its reinforcement of the economic barrier to periodic medical check-ups and to early professional consultation when the first symptoms of illness appear. The barrier is reinforced because the initial medical expenses in any year up to the threshold of 3% of adjusted gross income are not deductible. If the taxpayer's annual income is $10,000, that threshold is $300.

It is my hope that the full credit I propose for these initial expenses will encourage periodic physical examinations and early professional consultation. The key to good health lies in recognizing and overcoming the incipient threat of disease before it develops. The cost to us of failing to encourage the practice of preventive medicine, in terms both of human and monetary loss, is beyond measure. The tax credit I propose will fulfill this essential function.

LIMITATION TO REASONABLE EXPENSES

There must, of course, be safeguards to assure that the medical expenses incurred and sought to be credited are reasonable. The Secretary of the Treasury should be given authority to establish and adjust by regulation a schedule of maximum creditable charges for such items as hospitalization expenditures and consultation fees.

CREDIT FOR EXPENSES OF HIGHER EDUCATION

I propose a credit against income tax for a portion of expenses incurred for undergraduate and post-graduate education. The costs of expenses such as tuition, books and supplies would be covered, subject to a maximum annual limitation of $325 per student and a gradual reduction of the available credit in higher tax brackets.

Like the credit for medical expenses, the credit for expenses of higher education would be available whether or not the taxpayer uses the standard deduction. And reduction of the credit in higher brackets would assure that lower- and middle-income taxpayers receive the primary benefits.

SLIDING SCALE

The amount of the credit would be reduced on a sliding scale as the expense increases. This would equalize benefits betwen low-tuition and high-tuition institutions. Proportionately greater tax relief would be available for payment of low tuitions.

The sliding scale would operate in the following way. Of the first $200 in expenses for any one student, 75% would be creditable; of the next $300, 25% would be creditable; of the next $1,000, 10% would be creditable. Expenses for any one student in excess of $1,500 would be ineligible for credit in any year, and the maximum annual credit would be limited to $325.

PREVIOUS PROPOSALS

A sliding-scale credit for expenses of higher education is not a new idea. I sponsored legislation providing for such a credit while serving in the House of Representatives. In 1967 the Senate approved legislation similar to that which I now propose, but the credit, vigorously opposed by the Johnson administration, was eliminated in conference.

In two respects, however, my proposal differs from the measure approved by the Senate in 1967.

LIMITATION ON BENEFICIARIES

Under my proposal, relief would be limited to expenses for education of the taxpayer himself, of his spouse or of his dependents. The 1967 measure would have provided multiple credits for the education of anyone whose expenses the taxpayer chose to pay.

THE STUDENT PAYING HIS OWN WAY

One shortcoming of the 1967 measure was the likelihood that little or no assistance would become available to the student working his way through college. For at the time his expenses were incurred, his income would normally be so low that little or no tax would be payable against which his credit may be taken. This likelihood would be increased by provisions of the present House bill which enlarge the standard deduction and low-income allowances.

I propose, therefore, that to the extent any credit for the taxpayer's own educational expenses may not currently be used due to low tax liability, it be carried forward for use in any of the next ten years. This is appropriate since the training and skills acquired in the educational process contribute materially to the production of income in later years, and I believe this to be true not just of specialized vocational training but of general curricula at both under-graduate and graduate levels.

IMPROVING AND BROADENING EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES

The general arguments for and against a tax credit for educational expenses are well known and have been developed at length in recent years.

What most impresses me is the impetus such a measure will inevitably give to (1) improving our educational system at both public and private institutions and (2) broadening the opportunities available to the public for higher educational training.

The legislation I propose will encourage the widest possible attendance at colleges and universities and help spread the benefits of higher educational training throughout our population.

In some ways, carefully directed use of tax relief is the most effective form of government assistance to higher education. It does not require the creation of cumbersome and costly bureaucratic machinery. And it avoids controversy over government determinations as to the institutional beneficiaries of federal support.

There can be no charge that, by government fiat, church-sponsored institutions are being favored, that secular institutions are being favored, that public institutions are being favored, or that private institutions are being favored. Institutions will benefit from the indirect support of the proposed tax credit solely to the extent they attract students. And the attraction for students will increase as educational opportunities improve.

FISCAL EFFECT OF TAX CREDIT PROPOSALS

The Treasury estimates that the annual cost of the credit for medical expenses I have proposed would be about $3 billion; and that the annual cost of the credit for educational expenses would be less than $2 billion. I would propose that both credits become effective for the 1972 fiscal year.

The total annual cost of both tax relief measures would be approximately equal to the annual increase in revenue expected to result by 1970 from the reform and anti-inflationary provisions of the House bill (other than the reform provisions which I oppose for reasons set forth elsewhere in this statement.

The enactment of these two tax credits would not have the same inflationary effects as the across-the-board cuts in the House bill. This is because their inclusion in the House bill—in lieu of the across-the-board reductions—would create a situation where the revenue-reducing measures in the bill would not exceed the revenue-producing measures in it by a large amount. In addition, these tax credits would not directly feed consumer spending to the same extent as blanket rate cuts.

THE INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

I have serious reservations about the advisability of repealing the investment tax credit.

Vigorous fiscal measures are clearly needed to combat the inflation that now threatens our economy. We must accept the fact that these measures, to be effective, cannot be painless.

We must be equally aware, however, of the risks of putting all the fiscal and monetary brakes on at once. The anti-inflationary measures we are invoking now may take a substantial period of time before they are fully felt—and then may "grab" all at once.

This problem of a long "lead" time is particularly serious in the case of the investment tax credit. The credit does not primarily affect consumer spending now; it affects capital expenditures 6 months to 2 years from now. Removing the credit now may "take hold" at a future time when we are no longer so much concerned with inflation as with recession.

The experience of a few years ago—when Congress repealed the credit only to restore it—suggests the inadvisability of trying to turn the credit on and off to offset swings in the economy. Congress repealed the credit to halt the inflation—only to find that this action took affect in the economy when inflation was no longer the problem, and then hurried to restore it. I opposed repeal at that time.

I think it is essential to have a pemanent tax incentive for long-run economic growth. The investment tax credit serves this function.

I am aware, however, that repeal of the credit has broad support in both Houses of Congress and the Administration, and thus is almost certain to pass. Accordingly, in the calculations upon which my other proposals are based, I assume the credit would be repealed.

TAXATION OF CAPITAL GAINS

The Tax Reform Act proposes sweeping changes in the treatment of capital gains—including an increase in the rates and extension of the holding period necessary to qualify for long-term gains status.

In my opinion, inadequate study has been given to these changes.

These are some of the hard questions which will have to be fully explored in deciding whether to alter the existing system of capital gains taxation:

How will elimination of the 25% alternative tax on gains and application of a "minimum tax" to gains affect the availability of high-risk capital to finance new ideas, new technology, new businesses, new industries?

How will the expansion of the holding period to one year affect the essential liquidity of our securities markets?

How will the opportunity of lower- and middle-income families to build private capital for their future be affected?

The special treatment now accorded to capital gains is not just a loophole. It is a way of stimulating investment. Any change in this treatment must be considered, therefore, not in the loophole—plugging spirit merited by special privilege provisions of the tax code, but in the spirit of inquiry into all factors affecting capital formation and economic growth in this nation.

It may well be that changes of the present rules are desirable. But the effect of those changes on the economy, on markets, and on individuals must first be thoroughly understood. The haste with which action was taken on these changes in the House of Representatives did not permit adequate investigation of the consequences.

TAX TREATMENT OF INTEREST ON MUNICIPAL BONDS

I feel this is not the time to promote radical changes in the form of support extended by the Federal Government for the financing undertaken by state and local governments.

This support now takes the form of a Federal tax exemption for municipal bonds.

The Tax Reform Act now before this Committee would partially nullify this exemption by subjecting interest from tax exempt municipal bonds to a "minimum tax" and to a rule of allocation of deductions.

I do not think these measures are well advised. The limited revenues these changes would bring to the Treasury would be more than offset by increased costs and difficulties which states and municipalities would encounter in marketing their bonds.

Our Federal system of government now faces a crisis of fiscal imbalance. The revenue-raising capacity of the Federal government is simply not matched by that of state and local governments.

President Nixon has been the first president to recognize fully the gravity of their crisis and to propose a bold "New Federalism" to help rectify it. Among the President's proposed reforms is one I have long supported—Federal revenue sharing with state and local governments. With this important initiative, the President for the first time has created a realistic hope that revenue sharing will become a reality in the near future.

If revitalizing our Federal system is, indeed, our aim, we certainly cannot afford to take any action that hinders state and localities in marketing their obligations to finance their capital requirements.

One of the most significant aspects of the House bill is its proposed changes in the tax treatment of private foundations.

Private philanthropic institutions have made incalculable contributions to the development of this nation. These contributions resulted from foundation innovation, creativity and support for new ideas. The possibility for innovation must be protected and nurtured if we are to continue to reap benefits in the future. Therefore, any far-reaching changes made in the tax treatment of foundations must be considered with great care.

No one can argue that there have not been abuses by foundations in the past which require correction. Self-dealing between a foundation and its donors must be prohibited. The misuse of tax exemption for private influence or gain should be curtailed. Greater public disclosure of foundation activities is in the public interest.

Nonetheless, curtailing existing abuses should not be a vehicle for a punitive attack upon the very essence of private philanthropic activities in this country. It is for this reason that I recommend that the Committee consider the following changes in the bill as it passed the House.

THE 7.5 PERCENT TAX ON PRIVATE FOUNDATION INCOME

I am strongly opposed to the imposition of the proposed tax on foundation income.

In my judgment, this tax is an unwarranted departure from the principle that non-profit organizations organized for charitable purposes should be free from taxation.

It is discriminatory in that it would only be levied against foundations and not against other nonprofit charities such as schools, universities, churches, and hospitals.

It would hit not the donors or officers of foundations, but the whole range of educational, scientific, medical, cultural and social activities they finance. Any tax on foundations means an automatic corresponding loss of funds for these activities. To the extent that foundations aid the public, the public is hurt by a tax on their investment income.

Foundations have a commendable record of success in developing institutions overseas. Many foundations which operate in foreign countries receive the benefits of tax free status in those countries because of their exemption in the United States. Should a tax of any kind be imposed, this could result in a loss of their foreign exemption as well.

Finally, the tax creates a dangerous precedent. If it is appropriate to tax foundation income now at the rate of 7½ percent, then why not at 10 percent, or 25 percent next year or the year after? If the Federal government can tax foundations, why should State and local governments not do so? Should a tax be imposed, the road ahead is only too clear: government will take a larger and larger bite from foundation income, and a smaller and smaller portion will be left over to fulfill charitable and social purposes.

In my opinion, there are no advantages to be derived from imposing this 7½ percent tax. It would not be a revenue raising device of any significance, as it will bring in only about $65 million in the first year and $100 million by the tenth year. It would not aid in reforming known abuses, for these are dealt with in other sections of the bill.

In my opinion, the only rationale for collecting any revenue from foundations should be to encourage more effective supervision of their activities. For this reason, I would strongly recommend that the Committee substitute the requirement of an annual filing fee in place of the 7½ percent tax. This fee should be collected only to cover the costs of an increased program of supervision and audit by the Internal Revenue Service. This could be accomplished by charging each foundation either an amount proportional to its assets or a specified percentage—with an upper limit clearly set—of its income.

The bill would bar foundations from attempting to influence legislation through (1) attempting to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof or (2) privately communicating with any member or employee of a legislative body or with any person who may participate in the formulation of legislation other than through making available the results of non-partisan analysis and research.

Foundations are engaged in studies or projects on almost every topic of public concern, be it drug abuse, air pollution, or international satellite communications.

33-865 O—69—pt. 6——4

We as legislators have benefited from this expertise. The public interest has been served by these activities. Does it make any sense to prohibit foundations from taking a public stand on vital issues or from discussing them with legislators? Does it make any sense to limit their treatment of such issues to a vaguely defined term, "nonpartisan research" and to prohibit them from making definitive recommendations or taking definitive action?

Surely, this is self-defeating.

Existing law prohibits foundations from substantially carrying on propaganda or otherwise attempting to influence legislation or supporting political parties and individual candidates. It is generally agreed that more effective enforcement procedures would substantially reduce violations of the existing statutory standard. Allowing the existing law to remain as it now is, with increased enforcement and supervision, should be adequate protection both for the public and the foundations themselves.

EXCESSIVE SANCTIONS

The bill now imposes heavy tax liabilities on foundations and foundation managers for violations of the programmatic and financial provisions of the bill. In my view, these penalties are excessive and should be scaled down.

I submit to the Committee that the present sanctions far exceed the reasonable limits of enforcing these violations. With this club hanging over the head of foundations and their officers, the result will not doubt be to inhibit their support for innovative and creative projects.

Consider, for example, the penalties for violating the provision regarding an attempt to influence legislation discussed above. The foundation would be taxed at the rate of 100% of the amount of the program expenditure paid for the improper purpose. In addition, foundation officials who knowingly made this expenditure would be taxed at the rate of 50% of the amount spent.

Many medium-sized foundations make grants of $50,000 and more—and the large foundations often make multi-million dollar grants. The imposition upon a foundation officer of a fine of 50% of these large amounts could ruin him financially. I submit to the Committee that this is neither rational nor justified. I fear that this will be an effective bar to people seeking jobs in foundations.

Any penalties for violations of the bill must be reasonable. Moreover, there should be a period in which violations can be corrected before the penalty is imposed.

THE DEFINITION OF FOUNDATIONS AND RESTRICTIONS ON GRANTS APPROVED AS "QUALIFIYING DISTRIBUTIONS"

The bill creates a broad definition of private foundations which describes them from a totally new vantage point. The public has traditionally viewed foundations as private, nonprofit organizations with a principal fund of their own, established primarily to make grants in support of charitable, educational, scientific and civil purposes serving the public welfare.

The provisions of the bill would expand this traditional definition to such an extent that a wide range of other institutions would not be classified as "private foundations."

Some of these institutions are primarily engaged in research or conduct studies on education, medical, scientific and social issues. They have never been considered foundations in the past. Others are public service organizations working with the community on health, welfare and other programs. Many of them are heavily dependent upon foundation grants for their very existence. Newly classified as foundations under the bill, they would be subject to the supervisory tax or filing fee—thereby having less money available to conduct their activities. They would also be subject to the House bill's program limitations upon foundations.

In addition, the bill requires that foundations annually allocate at least 5% of their investment assets in order to insure prompt charitable distribution of annual foundation income. Grants from one foundation to another foundation would not qualify as approved distributions under this provision, except in the case of those organizations classified as "private operating foundations".

It is reasonable to expect that because of this provision, foundations would make grants with an eye toward meeting their qualifying distribution requirements. This could have an extremely damaging effect upon a large number of institutions—those not classifiable as "operating" foundations—which currently depend upon foundation grants for their very existence. Overseas organizations established under U.S. foundation grants would also be affected.

I would recommend to the Committee that it redraft the present definition of a foundation now in the bill to reflect the traditional public view of foundations as funded nonprofit, private, grant-making organizations.

FOUNDATION RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE EXPENDITURES OF GRANTEES

I would agree that foundations should exercise responsibility for the grants which they make. However, this standard of responsibility should be one of reasonable care and diligence. It should not be absolute liability.

The bill—unrealistically, in my view—imposes a standard of absolute liability. Foundations are required to exercise "full" expenditure responsibility over the grants they make to all beneficiaries except for grants to publicly supported or other "$30 percent" charities. Foundations would have to make absolutely sure that the funds are spent for the purposes for which the grant was made.

In order to comply with this requirement, foundations would probably have to increase greatly their auditing and monitoring staff. It can be argued that an unintended result of the bill would be domination by the parent foundation over the program of its grantee: This is neither necessary nor desirable.

The requirement could have other effects. Foundations might tend to limit their grants to those charities exempted from it. New organizations, in the process of building a program, might suffer from lack of support. Once again, we would be discouraging innovation and pioneering.

Therefore, I would recommend that the Committee replace the standard of "full" responsibility with a standard of "reasonable care and diligence".

Under the provisions of the bill, grants by foundations directly to individuals must be made according to "objective" standards. The Ways and Means Committee report states that the grants must be "directed toward the production of a tangible product (a book, paper, or other study, or a scientific development or useful process), the achievement of a specific objective, or the improvement or enhancement of a literary, artistic, musical, scientific, or other similar capacity talent, or skill."

These requirements would have the undesirable affect of barring the continuation of certain respected grant programs which are conducted simply to recognize excellence in a profession. There is also an implication here that the federal government would in some way have to approve the standards by which foundations make grants. The dangers of this need no further discussion.

I personally feel that we have already suffered too much from the effects of the "publish or perish" syndrome affecting our universities. Why encourage this further?

DONATIONS OF APPRECIATED PROPERTY

I do not favor the proposals in the House bill concerning the tax treatment of gifts of appreciated property for charitable purposes. Colleges, universities, hospitals, and churches now receive gifts of appreciated property in heavy volume, and depend upon such gifts for nearly one-half of their philanthropic support. The House bill imposes new limits upon the degree to which such gifts can be deducted from taxable income, and exempted from a capital gains tax. The quantitative impact of these provisions is very damaging.

As James Reston pointed out in an article in the New York Times on August 31, 1969, "In the opinion of university administrators and fund-raisers, it is precisely this tax incentive of deducting the full market value of appreciated securities that is responsible for the immense flow of private giving in recent years. For example, in the years 1965–68. the market value of securities donated by individuals to Yale University amounted to $33,007,690 or 65 percent of the total gifts from individuals during this period. In 1968–69, Harvard received $15,900,000 or 68 percent, and M.I.T. in 1968–69, $2,170,000 or 70 percent. Columbia University, which is now in the midst of a major fund-raising drive to deal with its serious financial problems, received $2,658,000 in security donations in 1966, $3,178,000 in 1967, and $6,038,000 in 1968 and it is still in deep trouble."

Of great concern to me is the provision in the bill which would prohibit the deduction of the value of works of art unless the appreciation is included in ordinary income. Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Tax Policy Edwin Cohen pointed out that "Our finest museums and art galleries are dependent on such gifts, and their contribution to the good of our society is universally acknowledged. We see no sufficient reason to distinguish such gifts from gifts of appreciated securities to other charities."

REALIZING THE FULL POTENTIAL OF TAX REFORM

In most other respects, the reform features of the House bill deserve support, even those which fall short of expectations. Taken together, these reforms represent a creditable first step toward elimination of inequity in the tax system.

Even more important, these reforms now permit selective tax relief innovations which will serve fundamental national interests, such as the two I have singled out: the preservation of health and the development of intellect.

Lower taxes for all may appeal to the voter today. The higher prices which result tomorrow will not.

Higher standards of national health and education could constitute a lasting heritage which this Congress now has power to dedicate to future generations.

Another opportunity may not come, if history is a guide, for another decade. Let us, therefore, make the most of today's reforms so that our children can make the most of theirs. They will need all the health and education we can give them to solve the other problems we will leave them.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness will be the Honorable Wright Patman, chairman of one of our very fine House committees and one of the great statesmen of this country.

STATEMENT OF HON. WRIGHT PATMAN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE FIRST CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF TEXAS

Representative PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I know the pressures that you and the members of the committee are under, and I will make my oral statement very brief. I have carefully prepared a written statement and have furnished the 50 copies necessary for distribution. I will just cover part of it.

I greatly appreciate your invitation to testify before this committee on H.R. 13270, the House-passed tax reform bill. I shall direct my remarks principally to the important subject of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations.

It has been puzzling to me for some time why the majority of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations were established in the first place. The religious, charitable and educational contributions which are made by foundations can just as well be made by an individual. The fact that the foundation route is taken, immediately gives rise to a question as to the actual purpose for establishing the foundation.

A great many huge family fortunes have been continued in perpetuity through the private foundation route. Controlling interests in closely held corporations have been transferred to foundations with no apparent change in the continuity of direction and control through this technique.

I do not believe we really know the vast amount of tax dollars lost to this Nation by tax avoidance through the vehicle of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations.

It appears to me that the time has come to look very closely at this problem, and to develop sufficient information so that the Congress can make a decision on the desirability of continuing the present concept of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations. Later on in my testimony, I shall speak further to this point.

May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the House bill does not go as far as I personally or the Subcommittee on Foundations in the House would like to see. At the same time I realize that it makes many steps forward, and they are good steps I think, every one of them. I personally would regret very much to see the House bill weakened in any respect on the foundation provisions even though it is not as strong as it could be in some areas.

I believe though that H.R. 13270 is a good step in the right direction, and we must do something about this situation. There is great resentment over the Nation toward these privately controlled tax-exempt foundations, especially those that have been abusing their trust.

We discovered in our investigation that they even had schools teaching people for a fee on how to organize their own foundations, family-type foundations. They would have notices go out, to affluent people naturally, usually professional men in the high-income brackets asking them to come to a meeting. At this meeting they would state they had a foundation of their own, and that anyone who wanted to join the parade, if he would pay $10,500, then the foundation would help them organize a foundation of their own. If the one organizing the foundation would act according to the instructions of the parent organization they would not have to pay any income tax during their lifetime, and no inheritance tax would be paid after their death. It is rather an appealing proposition, and it would be surprising to you to know how many people actually paid the $10,500. It went up into, I believe, several million dollars.

Of course we gave our information to the Department of Justice and suits were brought, but the suits are still pending. The name of this concern is the ABC, American Building Constitutionally. They had several areas in the country where they were active.

Now, I do not know how many. They took the fifth amendment before my subcommittee.

I do not know how many people actually joined. But I believe that there were hundreds of them. It would not surprise me, Mr. Chairman, if there were over 100,000 foundations privately controlled that no one connected with the Government knows anything about. It is possible it could go even to a quarter of a million or even more. No one knows how many there are. No one is trying to find out, and no one has tried to find out in the past. They just don't make any reports and they just do not pay taxes. Of course the Internal Revenue does not have any complete list of them, and the foundations just go on without making any reports that they should make under the regulations.

Now, the foundations make the point that they have complied with what the law says, but they are not complying with what the regulations say. Therefore they stay away from the IRS, the Treasury Department, and keep their information to themselves. There are a lot of areas in this country where family foundations are organized. They even send their children to school and to college, and all the transactions are made through the foundation and they pay no taxes.

That has been going on some time. It hasn't been stopped.

We are trying to get legislation through for a separate agency for this reason. The IRS, when it comes before the House and the Senate for appropriations is usually, almost invariably reduced. They spend that money where they want to spend it the most, on revenue producing programs. They do not pursue the foundations because they claim that field is rather lean and they do not get as much money returned to the Government.

Therefore, this new agency should be independent of the Treasury Department. It should be away from IRS, and it should be sustained by the foundations themselves.

The 2 percent that has been talked about should go for that purpose. The 7½ percent tax is pretty small compared to a lot of the income, low-income people in this country who pay that much tax. It certainly would not be burdensome to these very rich privately controlled tax-exempt foundations.

The CHAIRMAN. A lot of those foundations are for educational purposes.

Representative PATMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And it would not be a bad idea to raise some money from the foundations and devote it to providing scholarships to a lot of young people who are worthy of going to college. Are you aware of the fact, Mr. Patman, that there will be some instances in which a Mr. Jones who has his private foundation and Mr. Smith who has his foundation, put their sons through college without any personal cost to themselves. For example, assume these two men know each other very well, and Mr. Jones uses his foundation to put Mr. Smith's son through college and Mr. Smith then uses his foundation to put Mr. Jones's son through college. Theoretically there is no self-dealing involved there.

Representative PATMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. It is just a nice little mutual arrangement.

Representative PATMAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Where each puts the other fellow's son through college and in that way it does not appear that he is benefiting himself when in fact he is benefiting himself.

Representative PATMAN. And then a foundation makes contributions to another foundation, and some families in this country have as many as 13 foundations. Every member of the family has a foundation, and they can make contributions to the other's foundation and get credit for it. There is no way of checking up on it under present law, restrictions and limitations, so Mr. Chairman, I just want to express the hope that you let the House bill go through insofar as privately controlled foundations are concerned, although it does not go as far as I think it should go. It is certainly an important step in the right direction.

We are getting something done, and I think that will be pleasing to most of the people of this Nation who have given serious thought and study to this problem.

The CHAIRMAN. Maybe we can improve on it some. You are not opposed to us trying to do that?

Representative PATMAN. I wish you would.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Some Senators have some ideas on how we might improve on the House bill.

Representative PATMAN. Good, I hope you do. I would be in favor of it.

Senator TALMADGE. Congressman Patman, you have done a great deal of work in this area and I compliment you for it. Do you have any idea of the total wealth that may be tied up in foundations?

Representative PATMAN. I would guess from $20 to $30 or $50 billion. There is no way of telling.

Senator TALMADGE. Is that increasing annually or decreasing?

Representative PATMAN. It has been increasing. Now over the last 7-year period, their assets rose from $10 billion to over $17 billion in 7 years, it increased about 75 percent. The trend has been to accumulate, not give away, to accumulate, and they do that in competition with the small businessman, and business generally.

It is certainly not fair. They are in business just like any other businessman, and they pay no taxes, and that is not very good.

Senator TALMADGE. Do you think a foundation should continue in life, in perpetuity?

Representative PATMAN. No, that is one thing I am strongly opposed to. It does not fit into our concept of government the way I see it in the West. Of course, the old countries have gotten away from these trusts in perpetuity, but now we are establishing them.

Senator TALMADGE. Is the United States the only country that permits them in perpetuity?

Representative PATMAN. It is the only one I know of although I am not in a position to give an expert answer on that.

Senator TALMADGE. From time to time we read in the press about some contributions that some foundations have made to some of these extremist groups that go around the country preaching the overthrow of the Government, revolution, and things of that nature. Are any records being kept as to how these funds are being spent?

Representative PATMAN. None whatsoever, and no supervision.

Senator TALMADGE. Do you think a foundation should keep adequate records?

Representative PATMAN. Why certainly. They should be subject to public inspection.

Senator TALMADGE. I have read from time to time that some of the foundations have been spending a great deal more money overseas at a time when we are suffering a serious balance-of-payments problem than they are spending in this country. What has your committee discovered on that problem?

Representative PATMAN. I am familiar with what has been done and sometimes it runs into hundreds of millions of dollars at the very time when it is damaging to our balance of payments and there is no record made of that and no supervision over it. And our country, my dear sir, is the only country in the world that does not have some control over the export of its capital. We have no control. Now, that, of course, is very damaging.

I think in goods and services over the years we have been in very fine condition, just on the balance of payments on goods and services, but it is just exporting of capital and credit that has upset us.

Senator TALMADGE. Why should the taxpayers of this country subsidize the export of capital through private foundations overseas? We have pending on the Senate Calendar right now an interest equalization tax to try to prohibit that same thing.

Representative PATMAN. Well, that is something that is worthy of great consideration and real action, because it is really upsetting the way these private foundations are sending this money overseas. In fact, I doubt that they should be allowed to send any money overseas.

Our country is the one giving the exemption, and they should certainly spend the money here.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you very much, Congressman Patman.

Representative PATMAN. Yes, sir.

The Chairman. Thank you so much. We are proud to have you over here at any time, Congressman Patman.

Representative PATMAN. Thank you, sir.

(Representative Patman's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

PRINCIPAL POINTS

1. H. R. 13270 endorsed strongly. Requests that provisions affecting such organizations not be weakened.
2. Question raised why many privately controlled tax-exempt foundations are established.
3. 27 recommendations listed to deal with abuses uncovered by study of Subcommittee on Foundations.
4. Statistics cited indicating growth in economic power of foundations studied. Concern expressed for small business taxpayers who must compete with tax-exempt business.
5. Demonstrates that from 1951–1967 about 50 percent of foundation receipts were distributed for contributions, gifts and grants. Shows that expenses during this period ran $25 for every $100 in contributions, gifts and grants made; for 1967, $33 for every $100. Discounts statements that 7½ percent tax on net investment income will impair philanthropic activity.
6. Suggests more prudent business-like approach by foundations in their operations—reduce non-essential expenses, carefully review yield on stocks in portfolios and policies on contributions, gifts and grants.

7. Emphasizes there are many problems other than tax matters which require scrutiny—SEC, anti-trust, conflict of interest, etc.
8. Numerous deficiencies of Internal Revenue Service listed in administering and enforcing laws and regulations applicable to foundations.
9. Lack of public knowledge of foundation operations emphasized. Only 140 out of 30,000 publish annual reports.
10. Discusses H. R. 13725, Bill to establish independent Government Agency to control and supervise privately controlled tax-exempt foundations.
11. Efforts not directed to eliminating all foundations but to clearing up the bad apples in the barrel.
12. Declares that taxes in a democratic society should be shared equitably by all. Passage requested of H. R. 13270 as passed by the House and H. R. 13725.

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman, I greatly appreciate your invitation to testify before this Committee on H. R. 13270, the House-passed tax reform bill. I shall direct my remarks principally to the important subject of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations.

It has been puzzling to me for some time why the majority of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations were established in the first place. The religious, charitable and educational contributions which are made by foundations can just as well be made by an individual. The fact that the foundation route is taken, immediately gives rise to a question as to the actual purpose for establishing the foundation.

A great many huge family fortunes have been continued in perpetuity through the private foundation route. Controlling interests in closely held corporations have been transferred to foundations with no apparent change in the continuity of direction and control through this technique. I don't believe we really know the vast amount of tax dollars lost to this nation by tax avoidance through the vehicle of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations.

It appears to me that the time has come to look very closely at this problem, and to develop sufficient information so that the Congress can make a decision on the desirability of continuing the present concept of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations. Later on in my testimony, I shall speak further to this point.

At the outset, I would like to strongly endorse the provisions of H. R. 13270 dealing with privately controlled tax-exempt foundations. I hope this Committee takes no action to weaken the provisions affecting these organizations. This Bill is a step in the right direction and contains only the minimum reforms needed as shown by the experience of the Subcommittee on Foundations in dealing with this problem.

The Subcommittee on Foundations has been conducting a continuous and in depth review of the activities of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations for a number of years. During this period, seven reports were issued and two hearings were held. As a result of our study, a number of abuses of the tax-exempt privilege were uncovered and recommendations were made to deal with them. Although these recommendations have heretofore been made public, I believe it important that they again be made a part of the record.

1. In my view, consideration should be given to a limitation of 25 years on the life of foundations instead of permitting them to exist in perpetuity.
2. Tax-exempt foundations should be prohibited from engaging in business directly or indirectly.

Foundations controlling corporations engaged in business, through the extent of stockownership in those corporations, should themselves be deemed to be engaged in that business.

3. Commercial money lending and borrowing by foundations should be banned.
4. Self-dealing transactions should be prohibited. A foundation should not be permitted to use its funds to grant benefits to a controlled company's employees. This is quite a competitive advantage.
5. Foundation or donor solicitation or acceptance of contributions from suppliers or users of goods or services should be prohibited.
6. A foundation should not be in the position of exercising control over any corporation, directly or indirectly. In my view, all foundations should be limited to ownership of no more than three percent of the stock of a corporation and should not be allowed to vote such stock.

7. Standards should be established with respect to foundation behavior in a proxy fight.

8. Another area that needs consideration is that of investments. There is a sharp difference between investing in securities and speculating or trading in securities. In other words, there is a difference between being a passive investor and an active securities merchant or gambler.

9. Is the tax law sound in permitting a deduction for charity to a person who merely transfers funds to a foundation that he himself controls, where the money has not as yet reached actual operating charities?

In my view, a contributor should not be allowed a deduction for payments to a foundation that he controls until the foundation actually uses the money for charity. The foundation should be recognized as being the alter ego of the controlling contributor. Income earned by the foundation should be taxable to the controlling contributor until put to charitable use.

10. Exemption should be denied if a foundation has been formed or availed of for tax avoidance purposes or to get financial benefits for the contributor. Conversely, a controlled corporation should not be allowed a contribution to a foundation, but instead the payment should be considered as a dividend to the controlling stockholder where the amount is significant and the foundation is unrelated to the business purpose of the corporation.

The tax law says that a foundation's earnings may not inure to the benefit of any private individual. It should be made clear that "individual" includes corporations and trusts.

11. Isn't there something out of gear with the tax law that, under the guise of charity, permits a taxpayer to actually enrich himself at the cost of all other taxpayers? One answer may be to treat gifts to foundations in the same way as private gifts, and figure them at the cost of the property given or their value, whichever is lower.

12. In the case of corporations that are treated like partnerships (Subchapter S, Chapter 1, Internal Revenue Code) contributions to foundations should "pass through" to the stockholders and be included pro rata as contributions by the stockholders personally. In that way, the 20 percent and 30 percent limitations on contributions will be maintained. At present, through the mechanics of Subchapter S (Chapter 1, Internal Revenue Code), an extra 5 percent of the corporation's income becomes deductible by the stockholders.

13. For the purpose of figuring the accumulation of income, contributions to a foundation and all capital gains of the foundation should be considered as income, and not capital. Both the original contribution and the income from it are ordinarily available to the foundation without distinction.

This would eliminate a device for avoiding unreasonable accumulation of income: contributions from one donor-controlled foundation to other foundations controlled by the same donor.

14. For the purpose of computing the accumulation of income, amounts unreasonably accumulated in corporations controlled by a foundation should be added to the foundation's direct accumulation as if the two were one.

15. Corporations controlled by foundations should be subject to the unreasonable accumulation earnings tax in section 531 of the Code. At present, that tax is imposed where dividends are held back to save the existence of unreasonable accumulations for foundations otherwise exempt from tax.

16. Re gift and estate taxes,

(a) Exclude from the base for the marital deduction amounts left to foundations that are hence untaxed.

(b) While amounts given to foundations are not subject to gift and estate taxes, the rate brackets to be applied to amounts that are taxable should be the same as if the foundation amounts were part of the taxable gifts or estate.

17. Consideration should be given to a regulatory agency for the supervision of tax-exempt foundations.

18. A penetrating review of every application for tax exemption is needed.

19. All matters relating to the granting or denial of tax exemption, as well as revocations and penalties, should be made public.

20. The full content of foundation tax returns should be open to public inspection.

21. A national registry of all foundations should be published annually.

22. The tax returns of foundations should require disclosure of amounts spent for instigating or promoting legislation, or political activities, or amounts paid to other organizations for the purpose.

23. The returns should likewise require disclosure of amounts spent for TV, radio, and newspaper advertising.

24. The returns should call for a description of all activities, directly or indirectly engaged in by the foundation, in which commercial organizations are also engaged.

25. The program of field auditing returns of foundation should be greatly expanded.

26. Stiff penalties and revocation of tax exemption for improper or insufficient reporting would help curb abuses.

27. A reasonable tax on income of foundations should be assessed.

These and other reforms are vitally necessary.

H.R. 13270 contains provisions dealing with some of these recommendations; others still remain.

A glance at these recommendations indicates quite clearly that while tax reform is extremely important, there are many other facets of the activities of these organizations which bear close scrutiny. Further, although H.R. 13270 is less restrictive than H.R. 7053, which I introduced in the House on February 18, 1969, I support the provisions of H.R. 13270 since I believe they are a step in the right direction.

For instance, H.R. 7053 recommended a 20 percent tax on gross income, but H.R. 13270 establishes a tax at 7½ percent on net investment income. Further, my bill recommended restricting stock ownership by foundations in corporations to three percent. The bill under consideration by your Committee allows 20 to 35 percent.

To place this entire matter in perspective, I would like to give some over-all statistics on those foundations under study by the Subcommittee on Foundations.

In the ten-year period ending 1960, 534 foundations had total receipts from all sources of $6.9 billion. In the succeeding seven-year period (575 to 647 foundations were studied), their receipts totalled $8.6 billion, or, $1.7 billion (25 percent) more in a three-year shorter period. These same foundations more than doubled their accumulated (unspent) income from $1 billion at the end of 1960 to over $2 billion at the end of 1967 and their net worth increased from $6.8 billion to $10.1 billion, or about 50 percent.

During the period from 1951 to 1967, these foundations had $15.7 billion in total receipts. Of this amount, $7.3 billion or somewhat less than half came from such sources as business income, interest, dividends, rents and royalties. Of the balance, $4.1 billion came from capital gains on the sale of assets and the remainder, $4.3 billion from contributions, gifts and grants.

At the end of 1967, the 647 foundations under study had total assets at market value of $17.8 billion, as compared to some $10.2 billion at the end of 1960; an increase of almost 75 percent. The $17.8 billion valuation is 50 percent greater than the $11.8 billion of the capital stock, surplus undivided profits and contingency reserves of the 50 largest banks in the United States. When one considers that these figures are for only 647 of the 30,000 foundations, even though most of the larger ones are included, the size of the problem strikes one in full force.

One of my greatest concerns is the impact of such organizations on the small businessmen of this country. Foundations, because of their tax-exempt status can unfairly compete with a business which does not enjoy the benefits of such privileges. Holdings by foundations in enterprises constitute a powerful influence in corporate control, in the market place and in proxy solicitations. Our last report shows that almost 25 percent, or 154 of the 647 foundations studied, held sizeable amounts of stock, from 5 to 100 percent in 313 corporations. The carrying value of these shares was $2.7 billion, with an estimated market value of $6.2 billion. The market value of all corporation stock holdings by these foundations amounted to the staggering sum of $13.1 billion, or, almost 80 percent higher than the holdings at the end of 1960.

As Fortune magazine of June 1969 states, "Philanthropy does get shortchanged however, when the corporate stock that a foundation holds for control purposes produces meager income." It cites the Lilly Endowment and the James Irvine Foundations as examples of disbursements representing only about one percent of its assets.

It would be interesting to take a look at what the foundations have done with their tax-free dollars. In the years 1951 through 1967, of the receipts of $15.7

billion, disbursements were $9.9 billion, of which $1.9 billion was paid out for expenses and $8 billion was distributed for contributions, gifts and grants. In other words, the foundations had distributed as contributions, gifts and grants only about 50 percent of what they had received; it cost them $25 in expenses for every $100 of contributions, gifts and grants made. However, this is an over-all average. When we look at 1967, we see that it cost the foundations $33 in expenses ($253 million) for every $100 in contributions, gifts and grants made ($754 million).

I am therefore constrained to view rather cynically the statements made by foundations' representatives that a 7½ percent tax on net investment income will seriously impair the ability of foundations to continue their philanthropic activities. This view is further supported when the record shows that the Rockefeller Foundation spent half as much just running its New York office—$5.4 million—as it spent throughout the entire nation in 1966. It spent more just running its New York offices—in salaries and the like—than it spent in "benevolence" in New York and California combined.

In fiscal years 1966 and 1967, the tax-exempt Ford Foundation lost $92,500 and $100,200 respectively in the operation of its cafeterias and dining room, and, of course, the taxpaying restaurant owners in New York City lost over several hundred potential customers.

In 1966 and 1967, the tax-exempt Rockefeller Foundation lost $44,500 and $47,200 respectively in the operation of its lunch rooms and taxpaying restaurant owners in New York City also lost several hundred potential customers.

Mr. Benson Ford received $15,000 for attending three meetings of the Ford Foundation.

I could go on and on giving examples of loose administrative practices, unconscionably high expenses, and free spending on the part of foundations. The reports issued by the Subcommittee on Foundations are replete with examples of complete disregard of the public interest in the operation of foundations.

If the foundation managers adopted a more prudent businesslike approach to the cost aspect of their operations, exercised a more careful review of contributions, gifts and grants policies, and paid more attention to the kinds of income producing stocks in their portfolios, the 7½ percent tax, contemplated in H.R. 13270, would not be the burden they protest it would be. In fact, I would hazard a guess that tightening their belts would make more funds available for charitable purposes.

The provisions of H.R. 13270 were reviewed in depth by me. While much more remains to be done, the provisions relating to privately controlled tax-exempt foundations will have a salutary effect on the operations of such organizations. I strongly support its provisions.

As I have indicated, much remains to be done with respect to the control and supervision of the activities of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations. The foundation problems are far more numerous and serious than Treasury officials have been willing to admit publicly. During our Subcommittee's 1964 hearings, I made the following statement, in part:

"The Secretary of the Treasury has testified that it is the Treasury's duty to be alert to all possible violations of law. The Secretary also says (1) he does not consider it proper for a foundation to engage in insider's stock deals, stock price manipulations, short sales, margin trading, speculation in commodity futures, or to act as an unregulated source of stock market credit, and (2) the SEC should be alerted to the possibility of a foundation's involvement in insider deals and stock price manipulations.

"Yet, testimony before this Subcommittee indicates the following:

"The IRS does not examine foundations to determine whether they are violating any Federal securities laws—including those relating to insider's stock deals, stock price manipulations, and unregulated sources of stock market credit.

"The IRS has not collected any information, as to the extent that foundations are involved in speculation and trading on margin.

"The IRS has not collected any data on the involvement of foundations in corporate proxy fights.

"The IRS does not examine foundations to determine whether their foreign operations may be in conflict with Government policies.

"The IRS does not examine foundations to determine whether the foundations are channeling income and corpus in a direction that may hurt competitors and investors.

"The IRS does not examine foundations to determine whether they are being used as a device for engaging in various trade practices which might be in violation of certain statutes administered by the Federal Trade Commission or the Antitrust Division.

"Few of the persons in the IRS who examine foundation tax returns would be sufficiently familiar with the antitrust law to know whether the practices as cited may violate Section 5 of the FTC Act or the Sherman Act.

"The IRS does not examine foundations to determine whether there is a conflict of interest between the duties of a foundation's directors or trustees and their interests as officers, stockholders and employees of business corporations whose stock is controlled by the foundation.

"The Acting Commissioner does not know of any cases where compensation of officers, directors or trustees among the large foundations has been unreasonable or unjustified. Yet, Mr. Benson Ford received $15,000 for attending three meetings of the Ford Foundation.

"The IRS does not review a foundation's individual charitable donations.

"The IRS has no rule of thumb regarding the percentage of income that a foundation must spend for the purpose for which it was granted tax exemption.

"The IRS does not examine foundations to determine whether contributions are being made to the foundations by persons or organizations that supply goods or services to companies interlocked with the foundations.

"The IRS does not know how much money was spent overseas by U.S. foundations in 1963.

"The IRS does not examine foundations to determine whether they are making loans overseas that may be contributing to our balance of payments problem.

"This is the most impressive record of do-nothing that I have seen in my 36 years in Congress."

I regret to say that those observations are just as pertinent today as they were in 1964.

The fact that foundations are exempt from taxation does not mean that they are exempt from other Federal laws. Hence, antitrust law, FTC law, SEC law, etc. are applicable to foundations.

It is, of course, possible for a foundation to be used as a device for engaging in various trade practices which may be a violation of certain statutes administered by the Federal Trade Commission or the Antitrust Division. For example, contributions may be made to a foundation by (1) persons or organizations that supply goods or services to companies interlocked with the foundations, or (2) from persons or organizations that buy goods or services from companies interlocked with the foundation. The point is that if the company that is interlocked with a foundation is doing business with and by a contribution to the parent foundation they get the business because of that interlock, they are obviously getting an advantage.

In other words, a contribution can be made to a foundation for a business purpose rather than an eleemosynary purpose. For example, under the Robinson-Patman Act, business concerns are prohibited from making disproportionate discriminatory discounts to particular buyers if the effect might be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. Hence, contributions to a foundation can be a method of getting around this provision of law.

Also, there is the business practice known as reciprocity, which may violate the antitrust laws. It involves tacit or actual agreement to do business with a firm if it reciprocates and gives business in return. Foundations may be parties to reciprocity arrangements. For example, a business affiliated with a foundation may say to one of its suppliers, "I will buy from you if you will contribute to such and such a foundation" or, "if you buy from me, such and such foundation will make you a business loan at favorable terms".

Our study indicates that many business suppliers and buyers have made sizable contributions to foundations controlled by customers. For example, we know that a number of suppliers of the Hilton Hotel chain are contributors to the Conrad N. Hilton Foundation, of Los Angeles. Mr. C. N. Hilton, Jr., Secretary of the Conrad N. Hilton Foundation, has acknowledged that, during the fiscal years ending February 28, 1952 through February 28, 1963, 29 donors—who were suppliers of goods or services to Hilton Hotels Corporation or its subsidiaries—made contributions to the Conrad N. Hilton Foundation in the amount of $61,695.18.

Does not this kind of situation appear to raise the specter of business reciprocity—We will buy from you if you contribute to our foundation?

If so, does it not raise a number of serious antitrust problems? Specifically, may it not involve a possible violation of the Robinson-Patman Act because it involves the inducement of discriminatory prices?

Or may it not involve a violation of Section 5 of the FTC Act as have other instances of business reciprocity because they involve "unfair methods of competition?"

Here is another case that we discussed in our hearings. The Rogosin Foundation, of New York City, is controlled by the Rogosin family. The Rogosin family has also dominated Beaunit Corporation (formerly Beaunit Mills, Inc.), Rogosin Industries, Limited, and Skenandoa Rayon Corporation.

At December 31, 1952, the Foundation held 33⅓ percent of the nonvoting preferred stock of Beaunit Mills, Inc. (carrying value $2.7 million) as well as 5 percent of the common voting stock of the same corporation (carrying value $1.0 million).

Beaunit Mills, Inc., manufactures synthetic yarn, knits and weaves fabrics, and manufactures intimate apparel. The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company of Akron, Ohio, has been a buyer of tire-cord yarn from Beaunit Corporation.

In March 1952, Goodyear made a cash donation of $150,000 to the Rogosin Foundation. Additionally, on March 10, 1952, Goodyear loaned $2.5 million to the Rogosin Foundation at 4 percent interest. The loan was to be paid off in installments due January 3–August 15, 1953, January 3–August 15, 1954, and January 3–August 15, 1955. According to the Foundation, payments on the loan were made on August 15, 1953, August 15, 1954, and August 15, 1955.

The Foundation states that it used the $2.5 million loan to purchase from Beaunit Mills, Inc., 30,000 shares of the latter's preferred stock. An identical number of shares of Beaunit Mills, Inc., preferred stock was pledged by the Foundation as collateral for the loan.

So, here we have the question as to whether this arrangement involves a price discount from Rogosin to Goodyear, for which Goodyear, the buyer, compensated Rogosin by making a contribution to the Rogosin Foundation. If this were the case, would it not seem to raise both tax and antitrust problems. First, it is a method whereby the buyer compensates the seller by making a tax deductible contribution to the Rogosin Foundation? Second, would not this practice, at best, be a distortion of the pricing and exchange process in a free enterprise economy? Third, might not this practice actually involve, (a) a violation of the Robinson-Patman Act because it involved discriminatory pricing, or (b) a violation of section 8 of the Federal Trade Commission Act because it is an unfair method of competition? Additionally, of course, Goodyear was acting as a source of unregulated credit.

Then there are the possible antitrust problems—actual or potential conflict of interest situations—that may stem from situations where board members of foundaions also sit on the boards of business firms that compete with each other. As we all know, Section 8 of the Clayton Act provides that no person shall be a director of two or more competing corporations. Now, that Act does not apply to indirect interlocks, such as when a foundation has two board members, one of whom is also a board member of corporation A and the other member is on the board of corporation B (a competitor of A). While there is nothing illegal about such an arrangement under Section 8, there could be a special public interest problem when a foundation establishd for eleemosynary purposes becomes a vehicle for such indirect interlocks which might affect competition.

Here is another area that this panel should explore. Does a businessman in government pose a greater potential conflict of interest than the officials of foundations in government—such as, for example, McGeorge Bundy, President of the Ford Foundation, whose overlords, the Ford family, have immense commercial interests throughout the world, including the Middle East? It seems to me a bit inconsistent for the Congress to require a businessman to completely eliminate potential conflict of interest when, at the same time, it permits Mr. Bundy to wander in and out of the Government while retaining his $65,000 annual salary from the Ford Foundation. This was the case in June 1967 when Mr. Bundy became Executive Secretary to the National Security Council Committee on the Middle East.

Now, to turn to the stock market—there is ample evidence that many foundations are actively trading in the market with substantial portions of their funds. Judging from the content of their portfolios and the frequency of turnover, many foundations are concerned less with equity yields and inflationary trends than they are with the lure of capital gains to swell their principal funds. I might add that former Secretary Dillon testified that he shares my view that speculative gains for charity are not worth the risk of speculative losses, and that he knew of no case where directors or trustees of a foundation have reimbursed the foundation for losses incurred in speculation.

One of the operations that should be subjected to the close scrutiny of this Committee is that of the private pooling of investments by some foundations—in other words, the pooling of capital to trade in the stock market. For example, some of the Rockefeller foundations have informed us that they have a joint investment staff of 16 persons, not including secretarial, headed by Mr. J. Richardson Dilworth, which provides investment services with the cost shared by the various Rockefeller participants.

Does this not raise some potential problems—the possibility of speculative tactics, the possibility of a conflict of interest, the possibility of huge buying power that will have a strong impact on the prices of stock they deal in?

Secretary Dillon also testified that a foundation can be a source of unfair competition arising from active use of foundation assets by donors or trustees for private business ends, and that there are an infinite number of ways in which foundation assets or income can be used for the preferment of one set of private persons over another. The Secretary agreed that (1) foundations' moneylending activities put them into unfair competition with private lenders and also give the foundations an element of influence over a wide range of business ventures, and (2) such activities may present problems, such as preferential rates of interest. All this is made possible by the fact that, at present, the only restraint on a foundation's moneylending appears to be that loans must carry a "reasonable" rate of interest and adequate security, and that nothing prevents the foundation from making loans to its founder or his family, the businesses under his control, or a donor.

I conclude with this thought: There is something fundamentally wrong in conditions which make such acquisition of economic power possible, and which tolerate its continuation. And it is the responsibility of Congress to correct those conditions.

The Internal Revenue Service has proven itself over the years unable to administer and enforce effectively the laws and regulations governing such organizations. For many years the Subcommittee on Foundations attempted to obtain a list of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations. Finally, in December 1968, after many delays and much prodding, such a list was submitted to the Subcommittee. This list contained the names and addresses of 20,262 foundations. Shortly, thereafter, almost 300 corrections were made to the list.

In attempting to broaden our study of such organizations, and after unsuccessful attempts to obtain the kinds of information we needed from the Internal Revenue Service, we undertook to obtain the information by communicating directly with the foundations. We are presently in the first stages of such a project. Of the first several thousand mailings made, about 1,000 have been returned with the notations, "Moved, not forwardable," "Addressee Unknown," "Addressee moved and left no forwarding address," "Insufficient Address." In some cases we were advised that some foundations had been out of existence for years, one as long as ten years ago. The list furnished us by the Internal Revenue Service is replete with duplications and incomplete addresses and names.

If the Internal Revenue Service cannot even come up with the current addresses of the organizations for which they have responsibility, I shudder to think of the kind of audit and review that is being undertaken by them. Several years ago in on of our studies, we indicated that some of the larger foundations had not been audited for many years. In fact, as a result of prodding by the Subcommittee, some $28 million in assessment have been levied against a number of foundations.

The public is entitled to complete disclosure of information concerning these organizations which have been granted tax-exempt status. It is estimated that only 140 such organizations publish annual reports. The only other data is in the Form 990–A which is required to be filed with the IRS annually, which is admittedly limited in depth.

Recently, as a result of Congressional interest, there has been a great deal of scurrying around by the foundations to establish some kind of a self-policing organization. In view of the record, allowing such self-policing would be akin to having the fox guard the hen house or letting the goose watch over the shelled corn. Stronger Government action is urgently needed.

The proliferation in the number (2,000 new ones in the past year) of such organizations and in their increasing economic and other powers makes it necessary that their activities be given the closest scrutiny.

Accordingly, I introduced legislation in the House on September 9, 1969, (H.R. 13725) to establish an independent Government Agency to control and supervise the activities of privately controlled tax-exempt foundations. Because of its relevance to the deliberations of this Committee, I would like to request that the text of this bill be included in the record of these hearings.

The new Agency, "The Private Foundation Control Commission," would be headed by three Commissioners appointed by and reporting to the President. Commissioners will serve five-year staggered terms with a Chairman whose term as Chairman would be co-terminus with the President's term.

As stated in the bill . . . "The establishment of a Private Foundation Control Commission is necessary in the public interest to:

(1) Provide general leadership in the identification and solution of problems relating to private foundations;

(2) Facilitate the enforcement of internal revenue laws and regulations relating to private foundations and aid in the development of a more equitable tax structure with respect to such foundations;

(3) Develop and recommend to the President and the Congress policies and programs designed to ameliorate the problems relating to Federal taxation and regulation of private foundations; and

(4) Establish and administer a comprehensive registration and reporting system for private foundations and to determine and centrally record the financial and other operations of such foundations in order to assist in the accomplishment of the foregoing objectives.

Under the legislation, no private foundation will be eligible for tax exemption unless it is registered with the Commission. The Commission would be authorized to revoke such registration under appropriate circumstances.

The Commission will be self-sustaining through assessing the foundations a registration fee and an annual maintenance fee. Such fees are not a substitute for the tax on net investment income of foundations included in H.R. 13270, the tax reform legislation recently passed by the House and under consideration by this Committee. The legislation is restricted to private foundations, which are defined in the legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the time and courtesy afforded me in presenting this rather lengthy statement to the Committee. I would like to make it clear that my efforts are not directed to the elimination of all foundations as a constructive part of our democratic society. Rather, it is my hope that the corrective actions being considered by the Congress will clean up the bad apples in the barrel and allow those privately controlled tax-exempt foundations which are operating in the highest and best public interest to continue their worthy efforts.

In a democratic society, the burdens of taxation should be shared equitably by all. Privileges granted to any particular group for any special purpose must be accompanied by the acceptance of the responsibilities that such privileges carry with them. With the passage of this tax reform bill as passed by the House, and my bill (H. R. 13725) which I consider to be a companion bill, it is hoped that these objectives may be attained.

The CHAIRMAN. It is with great pleasure that I welcome before the committee the Hon. Ted Stevens. Senator, you proceed as you wish.

STATEMENT OF HON. TED STEVENS, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF ALASKA

Senator STEVENS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and thank you for giving me this opportunity to testify before this committee on behalf of this important tax legislation.

There has been a great outcry from the American people for tax reform. If there is any one common element of tax reform which is a consistent part of this cry, it is for greater equality in the distribution of the tax burden. The House bill, while containing several excellent provisions toward this goal, leaves several important inequities untouched. I have introduced several bills which would help to correct these deficiencies.

The first bill I would like to call to this committee's attention is S. 1908. This bill has two main purposes. The first would raise the personal exemption from its present $600 level to $1,000. Personal exemptions benefit, primarily, the poor and middle income tax paying families, and these families are, in my opinion, the most heavily burdened by our present income tax. In 1913, when the income tax became a permanent part of our economic fabric, the dollar was worth far more than it is today, but the personal exemption was $3,000 and was never less than $1,000 until 1940. It was then gradually reduced during the years of World War II to $500. It was last increased in 1948—when a dollar was worth more than twice what it is today—to its present $600 level. In other words, in terms of today's dollars, the personal exemption of 1948 was worth over $1,200. Thus, the first purpose of S. 1908 would help to restore the balance of our graduated tax system that inflation has destroyed.

The second purpose was to help to correct a long-standing inequity in the income tax. This provides for an increase in the personal exemption in those areas of the country where the cost of living exceeds the national index. In some regions of our country the cost of living is 10, 20, even 50 percent higher than the national index. It is 8 percent higher in San Francisco, 11 percent in New York City, 22 percent in Honolulu, and 43 percent in Fairbanks. Obviously, if the graduated income tax is to affect persons of equal standards of living equally, the differences in the cost of maintaining that standard of living must be taken into account. S. 1908 would help to correct this inequity.

I would now like to draw this committee's attention to three bills, S. 1047, S. 2739, and S. 2760, which would allow certain expenses of taxpayers to be deductible. The first of these bills would allow for the deduction of funeral and burial expenses, in the same way medical expenses in excess of 3 percent of adjusted gross income are presently handled. The costs of medical care are spiraling upward, and the costs of major illnesses are truly devastating. These excessive medical costs are deductible, and rightly so. But, should the illness prove to be terminal, the costs of final disposition of the deceased are not deductible. I believe these expenses should be viewed as terminal medical expenses. My bill would correct this deficiency. To assure that this deduction does not promote more expensive funerals, it specifically excludes cemetary plots and memorials from the category of deductible expenses and limits the deduction to $2,500.

The second bill, S. 2937, would enlarge the class of expenses that may be deducted as legitimate moving expenses to include reasonable expenses for traveling to search for a new residence, for meals and lodging while in temporary quarters waiting to move into a new permanent residence, and expenses incident to the sale of the taxpayer's former residence or resolution of his lease and incident to the purchase of a new residence. The total deduction for moving expenses would be limited to $2,500. In those situations in which a taxpayer is not reimbursed by his employer for moving expenses, the costs described above represent a real hardship to the transferred employee.

And, if his employer does choose to reimburse him for such expenses, he must report such reimbursement as ordinary income even though he was required to make such expenditure in order to retain his job. This is obviously an unjust situation and S. 2739 would correct it.

The third bill, S. 2760, would remove the restriction which presently limits deductions for care of dependents of working mothers to taxpayers whose combined husband-and-wife earnings are less than $6,500. The present limit was designed to assure that the benefit would be available only to those families in which the mother was required to work in order to support the family. Unfortunately, a flat limit cannot accomplish this end fairly, for it clearly gravitates against larger families or families living in areas having excessive costs of living. I, therefore, favor removal of the limit so that all working mothers may enjoy this benefit equally. S. 2760 would accomplish this.

I would now like to discuss another inequity in the present tax law which S. 2736 is designed to correct. Employees under qualifying plans and self-employed persons may have part of their salary placed in a fund and not have to pay tax on this money, nor on the earnings of such a fund, until the money is distributed. But the employee whose employer does not offer a qualified plan cannot take advantage of this tax benefit. S. 2736 would allow such an employee to be treated as a self-employed person, and thus eliminate this inequity.

H.R. 13270 also dealt with the tax treatment of lump sum distributions of these retirement funds. The presumed purpose of denying capital gains treatment to these distributions was to prevent the receipt of substantial amounts of deferred income at capital gains rates. But I would like to point out to this committee that, under H.R. 13270 as passed by the House, a person who has had his employer contribute $25 a month for the past 20 years will be affected to a far greater extent than a person who has had $1,000 per month set aside for the previous 5 years. Assuming our first employee was living only on social security at the time of the distribution, he would pay a tax of $500 under present rules and $885 under the provisions of H.R. 13270. This is more than a 75 percent increase in taxes. The second hypothetical employee would pay $11,150 under the present system and $14,150 under the House bill. This is less than a 30 percent increase in taxes. A person receiving a very large distribution, say $1 million, would indeed be required to pay nearly 150 percent increase in taxes.

I suggest we allow every taxpayer to receive a limited amount of money as a lump sum distribution tax free and require everything over that amount to be taxed as ordinary income. This would continue the incentive to create retirement benefit and profit sharing programs. The average lump sum distribution made in 1968 by Sears, Roebuck & Co., which has one of the Nation's oldest profit-sharing plans, was reported to the House Ways and Means Committee as being slightly over $100,000. I suggest that an exemption of $50,000 would be appropriate, since this would leave the average distribution in precisely the same position it is in today. I urge this committee to consider this proposal. If the incentive for private retirement plans is to continue to perform the function for which it was designed, it should not be eroded in the way H.R. 13270 proposes.

I have also offered several amendments to H.R. 12290, which, taken in the aggregate, will do the following: They will continue the benefits of the 7-percent tax credit for investments in depressed areas, for small business property and for intrastate pipeline property. A depressed area, under my amendment No. 102, is defined as a State or political subdivision with an unemployment rate of 6 percent or more for the calendar year. During the last 12 years, my State has experienced chronic unemployment ranging from a low of 8 percent to a high of 10.3 percent and, in fact, experiences unemployment in excess of 80 percent in certain remote villages. By retaining the credit for investment in depressed areas, the employment balance in America could be dramatically improved and chronic unemployment in certain areas of this country could be ended by stimulating private enterprise. If we are to deal directly with unemployment, the costs will be staggering. I prefer to continue the incentive to provide new jobs. The provisions involving small business and intrastate pipelines would also be of assistance in helping to end this unemployment problem.

Finally, I would like to point out an inequity in procedures that presently exists in IRS practices. When the IRS files a lien on real property for nonpayment of income taxes, that lien is duly recorded. When the taxes are paid, the IRS notifies the property owner that his slate is clean, but it is not required, nor does it in practice notify the county or borough recorder to remove the lien. When the taxpayer sells his property, the purchaser will discover the lien and will usually end up bearing the cost of removing the lien in order to obtain title insurance. Any other person placing a lien on property would be required to remove it, but the IRS is not. There is no reason why the IRS should enjoy this special advantage nor, according to its own policies, should it enjoy this privilege. My bill, S. 2879, would require the IRS to notify the place at which the lien was originally recorded that it has been satisfied.

I would now like to draw the attentions of this committee to the provisions of H.R. 13270 that would reduce the depletion allowance for oil and gas from 27½ percent to 20 percent and would require the intangible drilling expenses for these industries to be capitalized rather than expensed.

Mr. Chairman, as everyone is now well aware, large oil discoveries have been made in the forbidding Arctic regions of my State. The discovery is of such a magnitude that it is expected to increase the proved oil reserves of this country significantly. But the costs of exploration that led to this great discovery were far greater than any previous exploration. The costs of developing these reserves will be far greater than the costs of developing previous discoveries, and the cost of transporting this oil to domestic markets is significant. If it had not been for the incentives—and that is what the existing tax provisions are: incentives, not loopholes—exploration in the Arctic regions probably would not have taken place, and our great reserves might be unknown today. These reserves are now ready to be developed, but the costs of this development are staggering. The pipeline which will carry the oil from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez on the Gulf of Alaska will cost an estimated $900 million; each well will cost an estimated $1.2 million compared with an average of $50,000 for previously drilled wells. This is a tremendous capital investment. Where will the money for such investments come from?

For the most part, it will come from the recovery of capital invested in earlier oil fields. How is this money recovered? It is recovered, previously, through the depletion allowance. That allowance assures that the oil industry will retain enough capital to continue exploration and development programs. If this allowance is reduced, it will have significant effects on the future growth of the oil industry.

The investment made so far in exploring for oil in Alaska is estimated at $1.3 billion. That investment was made on the assumption that the incentives contained in the depletion allowance and the expensing of intangibles, which originally encouraged the oil industry to attempt the development of Alaska's petroleum, would be continued. Now this committee is considering a bill which would, in effect, tell these companies who have committed themselves to investing a great amount of money in Alaska that these incentives, which would have provided the capital for the continued development of Alaska's oil reserves, are to be significantly reduced and that these companies will have to look elsewhere for needed capital. Where else, today, can they look?

But this bill goes further than that. It tells the people of Alaska that the incentives which helped to develop the oil reserves in Pennsylvania, Wyoming, Texas, California, Oklahoma, and the other oil producing States are to be denied Alaska. If these incentives are reduced, Alaska must face the fact that she will be denied the benefits that spurred the development of other States; that Alaska's hopes for the future, which have risen so high with the September 10 lease sale, are now to be dashed on the rocks below.

The Alaska Department of Natural Resources has studied the effects the proposed reduction in the depletion allowance and the elimination of the provision allowing the expensing of intangible drilling costs on my State. The annual loss of income to the State of Alaska—from such sources as leases, royalties, and taxes on the oil and related support industries—that would result from the passage of H.R. 13270 would be approximately $100 million—more than half the entire State budget for fiscal 1969. And this takes into account only the loss on proven oilfields. It does not even contemplate the effects of discontinuance of exploration in several other promising areas that will probably result if these incentives are reduced.

Aside from the gross unfairness to one State that will result if H.R. 13270 is passed, this committee should consider the effects on the economy and particularly on the consumer that result from this legislation. Already the oil industry is preparing to build the $900 million Trans-Alaska Pipeline; it has authorized the construction of three new tankers larger than any ship yet built in American shipyards and is considering building a fleet of tankers twice that size to sail the Northwest Passage; it is planning to build airfields, refineries, and dozens of other support facilities. The effects on the construction industry, the shipbuilding industry, the steel industry, and dozens of other industries involved in this development will be drastic if the capital for these projects is severely curtailed, as it most certainly will be if H.R. 13270 is passed. The oil industry is hardly the exclusive beneficiary of these incentives; they benefit all of America.

And what of the consumer I mentioned earlier. In the end, he will bear the burden of the reduction of these incentives, as he does all tax increases. The discovery of oil in Alaska has been made just at a time when rising consumption was exceeding discoveries of new reserves. As those reserves were gradually exhausted, the price of a gallon of gasoline would have risen significantly. Gasoline is one of those rare items which, taking inflation into account, costs less today than it did 20 years ago. In 1949 the average cost of a gallon of gasoline was 41.5 cents in terms of 1969 dollars, while today it is only 33.7 cents. The development of Alaskan oil can continue this price stability, but, if the capital to develop these new fields is not available, Alaskan oil will not reach the marketplace in sufficient quantity to prevent the impending price rise.

Many critics of the depletion allowance are quick to point out that the allowance would only be reduced, not eliminated, by H.R. 13270. I must point out that the economic feasibility of the Alaskan oil fields, with the high cost of development in the harsh Arctic environment, is dependent on the savings of large scale production made possible by the magnitude of the Prudhoe Bay discovery. The scale of development must be enormous if our oil is to be competitive. You cannot decide to build a $500 million pipeline instead of a $900 million one if it will be 300 miles short of the oilfields. You cannot settle for fewer tankers if the tankers cannot handle the full capacity of the pipeline. The point is, the industry needs all the capital the existing incentives will provide if any of the development in the Arctic is to make economic sense.

We are thus at a time, and I hope I have made this point clear, when the reduction of these incentives could do irreparable harm not only to Alaska, which will most certainly suffer severely if this legislation is passed, but also to the entire Nation. I see no reason to deny the consumer of America the benefits of Alaskan oil in the name of tax reform. The oil industry is not even one of those industries escaping taxation. It pays a larger percentage of its gross revenues in taxes than does the average American business enterprise. And that does not take into consideration excise and sales taxes, which are 3 times greater for the oil industry than they are for the average American business. It pays less in Federal corporate income taxes, it is true, but it pays much more in State and local taxes. At a time when the Federal Government is urging revenue sharing, this committee has before it legislation that would cause a greater share of the oil industry's tax dollar to flow into the Federal Treasury. And, if you think the Federal treasury will gain by reducing those incentives, I would like to point out that the tax revenue from oil lying undeveloped in the ground 8,000 feet below the frozen Arctic is precisely nothing. Where is the tax saving in that?

The reduction of these incentives will have nothing but deleterious effects on the economy, the consumer, and the Treasury, and contributes nothing to the goal of tax reform. I urge this committee to delete those provisions from H.R. 13270 and allow the oil industry to continue to utilize the incentives that brought them to Alaska so that it can stay there and benefit all Alaskans and all Americans.

I would like, at this point, to request the committee's permission to offer at a later date testimony regarding those provisions of H.R. 13270 that affect the interest paid on municipal bonds.

Thank you for this opportunity to present my views to this committee on this important piece of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you for a fine statement, Senator Stevens.

Senator Smathers, we are honored to have you with us again. Would you please proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. GEORGE A. SMATHERS, FORMER SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF FLORIDA, ON BEHALF OF MANUFACTURERS HANOVER TRUST CO. AND MORGAN GUARANTY TRUST CO. OF NEW YORK

Senator SMATHERS. Thank you Mr. Chairman. I represent Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co. and Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. of New York. My remarks are limited to three sections of the bill: Section 443 relating to gains realized by banks on the sale of bonds and other debt securities; section 441 relating to bad debt reserves; and section 515 relating to lump distributions from profit-sharing plans.

As explained in more detail under separate headings, we believe the proposed changes embodied in these sections of the House bill are inappropriate. In connection with section 441 (bonds transactions) and section 443 (bad debt reserves), the bill contains inequities which in any event should be corrected.

Under present law, commercial banks are allowed to treat as ordinary losses any excess of capital losses over capital gains resulting from their transactions in bonds and other corporate and governmental evidences of indebtedness. At the same time, they are permitted to treat any net gains from such transactions as capital gains. Under section 443 of the House bill, this would be changed. Commercial banks would be obliged to treat net gains from these transactions as ordinary income instead of as capital gains. Net losses would continue to be fully deductible as ordinary losses.

It is not believed that this change is desirable. The present law is not the result of an unintended omission. The present treatment of losses on the sale of debt securities by banks dates back to World War II and was deliberately adopted to encourage financial institutions to support large new issues of bonds. It is not believed that it is in the public interest at this time to discourage financial institutions from acquiring bonds. The pendency of the House bill already has had an adverse impact on the demand for long-term issues and has had the effect of reducing the already low liquidity of the banking system.

The modification of the present treatment of gains realized by banks on debt securities will increase the difficulty of the Treasury and State and local governments in issuing securities and consequently will tend to increase the cost of such financing. The impact on the present liquidity of the banking system arises from the fact that termination of the present treatment of gains will reduce the effective yield of issues now outstanding and selling below face value. In short, we feel that there continue to be valid public policy objectives for maintaining the present nonparallel treatment of gains and losses.

If, despite the above considerations, the Congress sees fit to adopt the proposal embodied in the House bill, it is submitted that such change should be made effective only with respect to bonds or debt securities purchased after the effective date. As indicated above, the present treatment was designed to encourage banks to perform the important functions of providing a market for governmental and corporate securities. It is therefore obviously inequitable that the current holdings of debt securities of banks which were purchased in the light of this favored tax treatment should not continue to enjoy such favored treatment.

For many years for Federal income tax purposes, commercial banks have been permitted to establish bad debt reserves. The present regulation which was adopted in 1965 permits transfers to such reserves to be made until the total equals 2.4 percent of eligible loans. Transfers in any single year are limited by certain provisions designed to prevent unduly rapid or large transfers.

The present treatment is the result of regulations which have been modified from time to time after considerable deliberation. It cannot be regarded as an inadvertent loophole, but rather reflects broad public policy with respect to the structure and functioning of the commercial banking system.

Unlike many other nations, the United States has followed the policy of encouraging a high degree of decentralization in our banking system. As a result, there are more than 13,000 commerical banks in the United States, the great majority of which are small enterprises. It is of the utmost importance that the stability and solvency of this system be assured. Bad debt reserves have contributed to such solvency and stability.

Subject to a transition rule designed to prevent hardship, section 441 of the House bill would eliminate the present rule which permits a bad debt reserve of 2.4 percent of outstanding uninsured loans and would substitute therefor a reserve based upon each bank's own experience as indicated by losses for the current year and the 5 preceding years.

While in a period of economic stability the present rule permitting a reserve of 2.4 percent of eligible loans may result in a reserve that is more than adequate for many banks, it is submitted that it is important that banks be permitted to have a cushion against the possibility of an economic downturn. In the absence of such a cushion, many banks throughout the country could, in the event of a recession, suffer such an impairment of capital as to force liquidation or reorganization. The undesirability of this from the standpoint of the entire economy is obvious.

If, despite the above considerations, the Congress should determine to adopt the proposed change to a 6-year moving average, there is one inequity in the bill which should, in any event, be corrected. This inequity arises in connection with the transition rule which is designed to prevent hardship where a bank has a bad debt reserve in excess of the amount that would be allowable on the basis of its own experience. The transition rule, as embodied in the House bill, would permit the bank to maintain its present dollar reserve and to deduct actual bad debt losses where no addition to the reserve would be justified under the 6-year moving average. The inequity stems from the different levels and circumstances in which individual banks find themselves with respect to their reserve balances as of the close of 1969 and in light of an incomplete transitional formula by which they are governed under existing Revenue Ruling 65-92.

By way of background, Revenue Ruling 65-92, issued by the Internal Revenue Service in 1965, was designed to provide a uniform percentage for computing annual additions to reserves for bad debts by banks. Under the ruling a bank was allowed deductions for additions to its reserve for bad debts until the reserve equals 2.4 percent of loans outstanding at the close of the taxable year. However, in order to minimize the revenue impact and still put banks on a parity, a bank whose reserve was less than 2.4 percent of outstanding loans at the close of its 1964 taxable year (the year of change) was permitted to make up the difference over a period of not less than 10 years. This catchup period runs at least through 1974. As a result, many banks' so-called base year balance in their reserves are at the 2.4-percent limit but other banks are still in the process of increasing their reserves to that limit under the Internal Revenue Service formula.

In moving from the existing uniform percentage formula for bad debt reserves to be proposed new experience formula, it seems inequitable to freeze the base year allowances in the case of banks who have not yet reached the 2.4-percent limit and are in midstream in the catchup formula under existing law.

As part of the transition to the proposed new formula, banks whose base year balances have not yet reached the 2.4 percent limit should be able annually to increase such balance by at least the amount of their experience under the new formula until such balance reaches the 2.4 percent ceiling for the base year. The effect would be to reach a greater degree of equivalency among competing banks (which was the purpose of Revenue Ruling 65-92) over a period of time but by a formula tied to actual experience as proposed in the bill. Stated differently, our proposed change would permit a gradual equalization in the point of departure of change from existing to newly proposed bad debt reserve rules. Had the Internal Revenue Service catchup formula run its course for all banks prior to the pending legislation, such a change would not have been necessary.

Section 515 of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 pertains to the taxation of distributions from profit-sharing plans. That section, as contained in the act passed by the House of Representatives, would tax as ordinary income that portion of a lump-sum distribution from a profit sharing plan which consists of amounts contributed by the employer after 1969. Under present law, such amounts would be taxed at long-term capital gains rates. This change appears undesirable.

At the outset, it may be helpful to describe in general terms the provisions of the profit sharing plan of Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., which are believed to be typical of those of many other banks. Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co. has adopted this plan in addition to a fixed benefit retirement plan. The employee looks primarily to the fixed benefit retirement plan to provide him with security in retirement. The profit-sharing plan serves the purpose of permitting the employee to share in the bank's profits and of encouraging him to be thrifty. It makes it possible for him to accumulate a sum which will enable him following retirement to travel, to purchase a home in a vacation area or to invest in a small business. The imposition of confiscatory taxes is inconsistent with the achievement of these purposes.

Under the plan, all regular employees become eligible to participate after the completion of 1 year of continuous service. Each year, the bank sets aside for profit sharing under the plan 10 percent of net operating earnings after taxes. The sum so set aside is allocated among the employees in the proportion that each employee's base compensation bears to the total base compensation of all employees participating in the plan. The employee is not obliged to make any contribution to the plan.

The employee is given the right to elect to have his share in the profit sharing fund invested in whole or in part in one of four different investment funds. One of these funds is invested in stock of the employer bank. The other three funds consist of miscellaneous securities, the most conservative consisting solely of U.S. Government obligations, another of relatively conservative securities (including, however, common and preferred stocks), and the third of a less conservative type of securities.

Three methods of payment are provided: (a) a lump-sum payment, (b) annual installments of not more than 10 in number and (c) purchase of an annuity contract. While the method of payment to each employee is decided by a retirement committee, the employee's desires are taken into account. If the share of the employee has been invested in securities of the employer bank, the payment will be made in this medium if requested by the employee.

It is believed that in the light of this description of the profit sharing plan of Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co. it is possible better to understand the tax treatment of profit sharing distributions. The present law which has been in effect for approximately 25 years provides for capital gains taxation of lump-sum distributions if they are made in 1 taxable year as a result of separation from service; and where the distribution includes securities of the employer corporation, such securities are valued at the original cost thereof to the plan, any appreciation up to the time of the distribution being ignored. As a result the unrealized appreciation is not taxed until the employee later sells the securities.

Under the House bill, the existing rules would be changed to impose ordinary income tax, rather than long-term capital gains treatment, on that portion of a profit sharing distribution which consists of employer contributions attributable to years beginning with 1970. The bill provides a special averaging device to minimize somewhat the effect of the bunching of income in the year of retirement. Under this device, one-fifth of the employer's contributions would be added to the other income of the employee and a computation would be made to determine the tax on such one-fifth. The tax so arrived at would then be multiplied by 5 to determine the total tax to be paid by the employee on the contributions of the employer. The bill contains a further novel provision which permits the employee to recompute his tax for the taxable year of retirement and each of the four following taxable years (on the assumption that the lump-sum distribution has been paid to him in five equal annual installments), and if such computation produces a lower tax than that in fact paid by him, permits him to file a claim for refund.

Except for this change in the method of taxing the portion of the lump-sum distribution representing employer contributions, the House bill makes no change in the present law with respect to the tax treatment of profit sharing distributions. To the extent that a lump-sum distribution is attributable to earnings realized by the fund over the years in which the employee has been participating in the plan, the distribution would be taxed as long-term capital gain. Likewise no change would be made in the rule which, in the case of distribution of employer securities, disregards the unrealized appreciation on such securities. Accordingly, the tax on such unrealized appreciation would be deferred until the employee realized the same through a sale of the securities.

At this point, it is well to note another change proposed by the House bill which, although not specifically related to profit sharing, does have an effect on the taxation of profit sharing distributions. This is the proposed removal of the 25 percent maximum tax on long-term capital gains. We are not expressing any view on the wisdom of this proposed change, but are referring to it merely for the purpose of pointing out that even if the provisions of section 515 of the House bill are eliminated as herein recommended, the tax payable on lump-sum distributions from profit sharing plans will not as under existing law, be limited to a maximum rate of 25 percent.

It is our position that irrespective of the tax rate, the capital gains method of taxing lump-sum distributions from profit sharing funds is preferable to that proposed in the House bill both from the standpoint of fairness as well from the standpoint of practical administration.

The capital-gains treatment which under present law is applicable to lump-sum distributions from profit-sharing plans is not a method of taxation peculiarly reserved to the taxation of gain on securities and other capital assets. Rather it is a method which was devised for the taxation of income accumulated over a number of years which under the "annual accounting" concept followed by our tax law is bunched into 1 year. Lump-sum distributions from profit-sharing plans represent an accumulation over many years of service, sometimes as many as 30 or 40 years, which is received by the employee in one taxable year. No better illustration could be found of the type of situation for which the capital gains method was devised. Capital gains treatment further is appropriate to these distributions because an employee's profit-sharing account represents an investment which he has had at risk throughout his employment. During this entire period he was the true owner of his share in the fund even though such share may stem from contributions made by the employer. While the moneys are in the profit-sharing fund, the employee is subject to the risk of the fluctuations of the securities markets. If the investment experience is good, the employee stands to gain; but if it is bad, it is the employee who will bear the loss. It thus appears entirely appropriate to apply the capital-gains treatment to these distributions without any fragmentation such as is proposed by the House bill.

If it be suggested that ordinary income treatment is appropriate to the extent of the employer's contribution because such contribution is attributable to the employee's own labor, it is submitted that this argument proves too much. If it were sound, ordinary income taxation would be appropriate to the proprietor of a small business who sells the business after a long period of time over which he has built up the goodwill of the business. Such a proprietor is of course given capital-gains treatment on the sale of his business even though what he is selling obviously stems largely from his own personal efforts. In this connection, it is to be noted that the philosophy underlying the proposed change in the tax treatment of lump-sum distributions appears inconsistent with the philosophy underlying the provisions of section 802 of the House bill which propose a maximum tax rate of 50 percent on earned income. Implicit in the latter provision is a recognition that our tax laws in the past have unfairly discriminated against earned income such as salaries and other forms of compensation, and that the imposition of confiscatory taxation may result in discouraging further effort on the part of both low- and high-paid employees who recognize that as their compensation increases, the percentage thereof that goes to the Government likewise increases. Since distributions from profit-sharing funds are a means of encouraging employees to greater effort, it seems that the proposed elimination of capital-gains treatment is a movement in the wrong direction.

The House bill recognizes that it would be inequitable to tax a substantial portion of a lump-sum distribution as ordinary income in one taxable year. Accordingly, it adopts the above-mentioned averaging device as well as the cumbersome refund procedure. This necessary averaging is, it is submitted, better accomplished, with less administrative burden to both the taxpayer and the Internal Revenue Service, by leaving the present capital-gains treatment undisturbed. The present law achieves an equitable result in a way that is easily understood by taxpayers and is capable of easy administration by the authorities. The proposed treatment including particularly the refund provision would be very difficult of comprehension by unsophisticated taxpayers. In many instances, the refund provisions would have to be utilized by the estates of deceased employees under circumstances where the necessary records would be difficult to locate.

The proposed averaging device, while it avoids the extreme pyramiding of income which would result in the absence of an averaging device, fails fully to take into account that much of the distribution may represent earnings of the employee when he was being paid a very modest salary and, consequently, was in a low tax bracket. Many of the employees of a bank start at the very bottom of the ladder and after many years reach a level where their top income is subject to tax at high surtax rates. The 5-year averaging device will in those cases fail to level out the rate of taxation in a manner that properly reflects the rates which would have been applicable had the employee received the payments in the years in which he rendered the services. Capital-gains taxation, it is submitted, more closely approximates the tax which would have been paid if the moneys had been distributed currently. This will be particularly true if, as provided in the House bill, the 25 percent maximum tax rate on long-term capital gains is eliminated.

The refund provision of the House bill, which would entitle the employee to a refund at the end of 5 years if he has relatively small income during the 5-year period following termination of service, in addition to being subject to the criticism that it is administratively cumbersome, is unfair in that it will deprive the employee for a period of 5 years of the use of the money which is ultimately refunded to him.

In conclusion, it is submitted that the present provisions of the code properly apply capital-gains treatment to lump-sum distributions in recognition of the fact that the employee has an investment in the profit-sharing plan which is at risk over a long period of time. These provisions are equitable, understandable, and result in a fair approximation of the tax which would have been paid over the period of years in which the average employee participates in a profit-sharing plan. A tax provision which governs payments to many low-salaried employees should in all events be simple and easily understood. The provision in the House bill fails completely to meet this test.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator SMATHERS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Our next witness will be Mr. Scott P. Crampton, chairman of the American Bar Association, section of taxation, Washington, D.C.

Mr. Crampton, you have a very full statement here and we will have to ask you to abbreviate it and try to stay within 10 minutes. We will print the entire statement and try to make it available to everyone.

STATEMENT OF SCOTT F. CRAMPTON, CHAIRMAN, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, SECTION OF TAXATION, WASHINGTON, D.C.; ACCOMPANIED BY SHERWIN T. McDOWELL, CHAIRMAN-ELECT, AND DONALD McDONALD, VICE CHAIRMAN

Mr. CRAMPTON. My name is Scott P. Crampton. I am appearing here before you this morning as chairman of the section of taxation of the American Bar Association. With me is our chairman-elect, Mr. Sherwin T. McDowell, and our vice chairman in charge of committee operations, Mr. Donald McDonald.

The officers of the section of taxation appreciate very much this opportunity to appear before your committee and to bring you the views of our organization.

As I am sure many of you already know, the membership of the American Bar Association is now in excess of 140,000 attorneys of whom about 12,000 are members of the section of taxation.

When the Tax Reform Act of 1969 was being considered by the House of Representatives, the section of taxation was concerned that under its then limited authority, it might not be authorized to act in a number of areas where we thought our membership could be helpful. As a general rule, no member of the American Bar Association is authorized to speak for that Association with regard to pending legislation, unless the position to be urged has first been approved by its House of Delegates.

In view of the technical nature of the proposals for tax reform that are now pending, and the need for early action, Mr. Charles C. MacLean, my predecessor, appeared before the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association to request for the section of taxation additional authority so that our assistance to this Committee may hopefully be more meaningful.

Mr. MacLean was successful in this regard and the section of taxation has been authorized by the American Bar Association to comment on the pending proposals subject to several provisos, the most important of which is as follows:

With the chairman's permission I would like to read this one paragraph:

> That the section shall neither support nor oppose any proposal of a controversial nature affecting the distribution of a substantial part of the tax burden to a particular class or classes of taxpayers, but shall confine its action with respect to any such proposal to explaining the effect thereof and commenting on problems of statutory draftsmanship, undue complexity in the structure of the tax law, and alternative methods of accomplishing the same general objectives.

It may seem to you that I have labored this position a bit, but we feel that it is important to establish at the outset the scope of our authority. There are certain areas regarding the pending tax reform proposal in which the American Bar Association, through its House of Delegates, has taken a position, and in those instances we have endeavored to make it clear to the committee that we are speaking for the American Bar Association. In all other instances, however, we ask that the committee be mindful of the fact that we are today speaking for the section of taxation and pursuant to this limited authority to which I have referred.

We have submitted to the committee a printed report setting forth in considerable detail our views, suggestions and questions with respect to the pending bill. In a number of instances we have pointed out problems without suggesting what the solution should be. The omission of a proposed solution frequently resulted from our effort to avoid questions of policy which might go beyond our limited authority.

One other preliminary point should be mentioned. Many of our section members, as individuals and acting on their own responsibility, have made or are making technical comments with respect to specific sections of H.R. 13270.

I believe there are several hundred of these comments that have been collected by the section of taxation, and then forwarded to the staff of your committee, to the Joint Committee staff, and to the Treasury Department for consideration.

In this short oral testimony, we desire to discuss only two subjects. One is retroactivity or effective dates as they are set forth in the bill, and the second is the extensive delegation of authority to supplement the statute by regulations.

On the question of effective dates, I believe one of the tax services set forth the various effective dates and that it took seven pages of their printed document to cover them. There are numerous situations in the bill where statutory provisions are made effective as of some months ago—frequently when the subject was discussed in a press release. One count of these I believe reached 45.

It is realized that the suggestion of a change in tax legislation may encourage some people to act in order to take advantage of the existing provisions. There is another side of the coin, however, and that is the belief that taxpayers are entitled to act in reliance on existing law, and particularly when there is no actual notice of the proposed change.

This problem was considered some time ago by the section of taxation, which approved a resolution on the subject. A part of this resolution is printed in the introduction to our report. The conclusion in short was as follows:

> That the foreclosure of such last-minute tax avoidance is considered less important than the preservation of the principle that a taxpayer may rely upon an existing statute in planning his affairs.

We realize that this general subject may have more or less significance in various areas of the bill, but we do urge this committee in fixing effective dates to endeavor to do so with a minimum of retroactivity.

On the subject of regulations, or the delegation of authority to supplement the statute by regulations, we find over 70 instances where the bill provides for details to be supplied by regulations to be issued by the Secretary or his delegate.

Since the public is still awaiting some regulations to be issued under the 1950 act, that is 19 years ago, it is not surprising that the section of taxation has touched on this subject in the introduction to its report. The substance of our view in this regard is that the legislative program should be scheduled so that there is sufficient time to incorporate all major policy decisions within the statute.

In closing I was going to request that our printed report be made a part of the record, but I understand you have already done that.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, we have a very lengthy statement by you. Thank you very much, sir.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask one thing. I would commend you for everything you have said, but particularly on the matter of delegating authority to the Secretary or his delegate rather than the Congress writing the tax law. I think this is most important, and particularly out in the interior country where I come from, where they do not have access to committee reports and so on.

I am inclined to believe that insofar as possible, taxpayers' lawyers should be able to turn to the statute and find out what the tax law is. I understand that is what you are driving at.

Mr. CRAMPTON. I believe you have probably expressed it better than we did.

Senator CURTIS. Now you said there were 70 instances where instead of deciding something by the Congress, the Secretary is delegated to do it. I wish that you would submit to this committee the list of those 70 instances and in a separate column the proposed language that you would use in lieu thereof.

Mr. CRAMPTON. Mr. Senator, I think we can——

Senator CURTIS. Now that is a job you have asked us to do, Mr. Crampton.

Mr. CRAMPTON. I think that we can give you a list rather readily of the 70 places where there has been a delegation of authority, but in view of the limited authority which the section of taxation has from the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association, there are a number of these areas in which I feel without going through our formal procedures——

Senator CURTIS. I will modify my request in this regard, not suggesting that you make the policy decisions but give us some alternatives, after we decide what policies should be.

Mr. CRAMPTON. I believe we could.

Senator CURTIS. Insofar as possible.

Mr. CRAMPTON. I believe we could make a real effort on that.

Senator CURTIS. Maybe not on all but if you could help with some of them it would be very helpful.

Mr. CRAMPTON. We will be glad to do so.

Senator CURTIS. Thank you, sir.

(The committee subsequently received the following additional information:)

COMMENTS OF THE SECTION OF TAXATION OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, ON THE DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY TO THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY OR HIS DELEGATE TO PROMULGATE REGULATIONS UNDER H.R. 13270, THE TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

1. Page 8, Line 23, Sec. 101, § 507(b) (3) of the Code

2. Page 11, Line 13, Sec. 101, § 508(a) of the Code

The provision as to time operates as an effective date provision during the transitional period after enactment of the bill. It should be changed to provide that notification may not be required prior to a stated date after adoption of the regulations. Other sections relating to classification of organizations as private foundations and deductible contributions are dependent on this provision, and therefore the transitional effective date provision is important.

Unnecessary. Should refer to § 508(a).

4. Page 11, Line 24, Sec. 101, § 508(c) of the Code

This would appear to be an acceptable delegation.

5. Page 12, Line 18, Sec. 101, § 508(d) of the Code

6. Page 25, Line 17, Sec. 101, § 4941(e) (4) (B) of the Code

The standards by which the Secretary determines an appropriate period under this subsection should be stated. Perhaps a fixed period, say one year, following termination of litigation should also be provided.

7. Page 27, Line 18, Sec. 101, § 4942(e) (2) of the Code

The last sentence should be deleted. The required valuation should be determined under general principles of law.

8. Page 28, Lines 1 & 4, Sec. 101, § 4942(e) (3) of the Code

The objections of the Section of Taxation to this delegation of authority are set forth on page 8 of the Report of the Section of Taxation dated October 1, 1969. It is submitted that the applicable percentage for years subsequent to 1970 should be determined under some statistical index that may be published by the Federal Reserve Board or the Department of Commerce.

9. Page 30, Line 20, and Page 31, Line 9, Sec. 101, § 4942(g) (2) of the Code

While this subsection does not use the word "regulations", it appears to require the equivalent rule making action and does not set forth any standards to be followed by the Secretary or his delegate. It is suggested that the section be amended to delete the discretionary grant to the Secretary or his delegate and permit a taxpayer to make a set-aside for a stated term, say five years, for the purposes described in the section.

10. Page 32, Line 10, Sec. 101, § 4942(h) (2) of the Code

11. Page 33, Line 17, Sec. 101, § 4942(j) (2) (B) of the Code

The standards by which the Secretary determines an appropriate period under this subsection should be stated. Perhaps a fixed period, say one year, following termination of litigation should also be provided.

This delegation would appear to be unnecessary because the applicable principles are adequately set forth in the bill, provided proposed Code Section 4943 (c)(3)(A) is amended as suggested in pp. 12–13 of the Report of the Section of Taxation dated October 1, 1969.

13. Page 42, Line 7, Sec. 101, § 4943(d)(3)(B) of the Code

The standards by which the Secretary determines an appropriate period under this subsection should be stated. Perhaps a fixed period, say one year, following termination of litigation should also be provided.

14. Page 46, Line 23, Sec. 101, § 4945(e) of the Code

We would suggest deleting the requirement for advance approval by the Secretary or his delegate. The proposed statute would appear to set forth the standards to be met.

15. Page 56, Line 7, Sec. 101, § 4947(d) of the Code

16. Page 57, Lines 14 & 17, Sec. 101, § 6033(a)(1) of the Code

May be deleted. Covered by § 6001 and § 7805(a).

This would appear to be an acceptable delegation.

This delegation should be deleted as surplusage. As to the merits, see Report of the Section of Taxation, October 1, 1969, beginning at p. 15.

19. Page 74, Line 20, Sec. 101, § 6034(a) of the Code

May be deleted. Covered by §§ 6001 and 7805(a).

We suggest that the delegation of authority to supplement the statute by regulations should be deleted. If some method of averaging other than arithmetical is intended, the statute should be clarified in this regard.

We suggest that the delegation of authority to supplement the statute by regulations should be deleted. If some method of averaging other than arithmetical is intended, the statute should be clarified in this regard.

27. Page 125, Line 2, Sec. 201, § 170(e)(4) of the Code

Lines 2 and 3 on p. 125 should be deleted as covered under § 7805(a). If the first portion of the sentence is not sufficient, perhaps the section should specify that allocation be made in direct proportion to the value of the interest retained and the interest given.

28. Page 128, Line 23, Sec. 201, § 642(c) of the Code

30. Page 141, Line 13, Sec. 211, § 1251(b) (3) (A) of the Code

We suggest that the delegation of authority for regulations in this section should be deleted. The Committee may desire to consider a revision of the statute reading as follows:

(1) An amount equal to the farm net income for such year, and

(2) The amount of those deductions of the taxpayer which did not reduce his tax under this substitle for the taxable year or any preceding taxable year.

31. Page 142, Line 24, Sec. 211, § 1251 (b) (4) (B) of the Code

32. Page 144, Line 18, Sec. 211, § 1251 (b) (6) of the Code

It is believed that this delegation is undesirable. The statute might be revised to provide that the excess deductions account follows the "farm recapture property" when joint returns are no longer filed.

33. Page 146, Line 2, Sec. 211, § 1251 (c) (2) (B) of the Code

This delegation is objectionable because of the lack of legislative standards. One method of allocation might be in proportion to the amount of farm income on each separate return.

34. Page 164, Line 3, Sec. 231, § 217 (f) of the Code

35. Page 168, Line 13, Sec. 301, § 84(c) (4) of the Code

Since there are standards set forth in the section, by the reference to § 1374(c) (1), a specific delegation is unnecessary.

36. Page 184, Line 14, Sec. 311, § 1304(e) (2) of the Code

This section repeats § 1304(f) (3) of existing law. In view of the principle that reenactment of a statute frequently constitutes an approval of existing Treasury Regulations, the Committee should consider Treas. Regs. § 1.1304-5 to see whether it approves the principles set forth. If so, it is submitted that these principles should be outlined in the statute.

38. Page 192, Line 2, Sec. 331, § 1354(b) of the Code

This is another example of delegation of legislative authority without any standards by which such authority can be tested. One alternative would be to count the period of service subsequent to the execution of the general plan, if shorter than the employee's entire period of service with the employer. A second alternative might be for the statute to prescribe a fixed period of time over which deferred compensation payments be deemed earned. Another, the entire period of employment, whether shorter or longer than the existence of the general plan, might be considered.

If compliance with such regulations would be a condition to utilization of the benefits of section 1354(a) (1), the inability to comply for one year out of many might bar a taxpayer, even though he were willing to have the income attributable to such year taxed at the maximum possible rate for such year.

Consideration should be given to providing statutory criteria of proof which would permit a taxpayer to meet his burden of establishing the increased tax which he would have incurred in prior years.

Provision could be made permitting a taxpayer to rely conclusively on the facts shown on his return filed for any prior year with respect to which the statute of limitations has expired.

This provision appears in the present law so that the amendment would not change the existing delegation. It should be noted, however, that in the current Regulations issued under this Section, the authority has been exercised by merely stating that such a trust is to be treated as a trust to which Subpart C applies, "in all respects." It would, therefore, appear that the provision for regulations prescribed by the Secretary or his delegate could be deleted and the words "in all respects" substituted.

41. Page 200, Line 18, and Page 201, Line 2, Sec. 341, § 668(b)(5) of the Code

If compliance with such regulations would be a condition to utilization of the limitation under Section 668(b)(1)(A), the inability to comply for one year out of many might bar a taxpayer, even though he were willing to have the income attributable to such year taxed at the maximum possible rate for such year.

Consideration should be given to providing statutory criteria of proof which would permit a taxpayer to meet his burden of establishing the increased tax which he would have incurred in prior years or the facts concerning the operation and accounts of the trust.

Provision could be made permitting a taxpayer to rely conclusively on the facts shown on his return filed for any prior year with respect to which the statute of limitations has expired.

43. Page 205, Line 9, Sec. 401, § 1561(a) of the Code

This delegation would appear unnecessary. As an alternative, it is suggested that the items covered in §§ 1561(a)(1), (2), and (3) should be divided equally among all members of the group unless such members agree to an unequal apportionment.

The statute should be clarified to indicate whether an annual election is permitted.

45. Page 211, Line 4, Sec. 401(b)(2).

46. Page 215, Line 6; Page 216, Line 24; Page 217, Line 17; and Page 218, Line 5, Sec. 401, §§ 46(a)(5), 179(d)(6), 821(f), and 823(c)(3) of the Code

These delegations would appear to be unnecessary. As an alternative, it is suggested that the items covered in §§ 1561(a)(1), (2), and (3) should be divided equally among all members of the group unless such members agree to an unequal apportionment.

47. Page 223, Lines 1 and 2, Sec. 411, § 279(c)(3) of the Code

We suggest that the delegation of authority to supplement the statute by regulations be deleted. If a method of averaging other than arithmetical is intended, the statute should be clarified in this regard.

48. Page 225, Line 16, Sec. 411, § 279(g) of the Code

May be deleted, Covered by § 7805(a).

49. Page 228, Line 3, Sec. 412, § 453(b)(3) of the Code

We suggest that this delegation be deleted since the statute appears to be specific. If something more is intended, Congress should so provide.

50. Page 236, Line 13, Sec. 413, § 6049(a) of the Code

May be deleted. Covered by §§ 6001 and 7805(a).

51. Page 241 Lines 3 and 10, Sec. 421, § 305(b)(3) and (c) of the Code

This has been discussed at length in the Report of the Section of Taxation, October 1, 1969, at pp. 62–63.

52. Page 244, Line 13, Sec. 431, § 904(a)(4) of the Code

We suggest that the portion of the sentence following the word "subsection" in line 12 be deleted. If Congress intended something else, then the statute should say so.

We suggest deleting the reference to regulations and starting the sentence with "If" (line 24).

54. Page 248, Line 13, Sec. 431, § 904(g) (3) of the Code
This delegation appears to lack the requisite standards.

May be deleted. Covered by § 7805(a).

56. Page 264, Line 1, Sec. 442, § 7701(a) (19) of the Code

57. Page 272, Line 23, Sec. 461(c)
If the effective date of this section is continued, the transitional problems should be covered by express statutory provisions. The statute might provide that net losses occurring on or before the July 31, 1969 effective date should either (i) offset pro tanto net gains realized during the same taxable year after such date, or (ii) offset only such amount of such gains as is in proportion to the comparative tax rates before and after such dates (i.e., such gains might be offset only to the extent of 25/30ths, or 83⅓%, of such losses).

We believe that § 7805(a) adequately covers this situation; but, if not, then Congress should spell out its intention more specifically in the statute.

59. Page 282, Line 7, Sec. 511(c)
The delegation of authority should be deleted, and the statute should specify the policy to be applied during the transition period. This would include (1) whether or the extent to which net gains or losses realized before the effective date of the Act should offset net gains or losses realized after such date; and (2) whether net gains realized before the effective date will be subject to the alternative tax rate.

60. Page 291, Line 3, Sec. 515, § 402(a) (5) of the Code

64. Page 305, Line 2, Sec. 521, § 167(k) of the Code
We suggest deletion of the words "pursuant to regulations prescribed under this subsection" (Line 2). Covered by § 7805(a).

65. Page 308, Line 6, Sec. 521, § 167(c) (3) of the Code

66. Page 318, Line 10, Sec. 601, § 103(b) (2) of the Code
Reference to time and manner should be deleted since these are covered by § 7805(a), but if the election is to be subject to any conditions, they should be specified in the statute.

67. Page 318, Line 18, Sec. 601, § 103(c) of the Code
The delegation should be deleted and the statute should define an "arbitrage obligation."

68. Page 340, Line 24, Sec. 704, § 168(b) of the Code

69. Page 345, Line 3, Sec. 704, § 168(f) of the Code
This is a delegation lacking specific standards. A possible standard might be that portion resulting from direct (or possibly indirect) expenditures for the construction (or the acquisition) of a certified pollution control facility.

70. Page 348, Line 9, Sec. 705, § 451(m) of the Code

Senator TALMADGE. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Crampton, I want to commend you and those of the section on taxation of the American Bar Association for a thorough and comprehensive report that you have made on the bill. I am sure that it will be of material help to the committee.

Assistant Secretary Cohen has referred to this bill as a bill for the relief of tax lawyers and accountants. Do you think that is an accurate appraisal of the bill?

Mr. CRAMPTON. Well, perhaps to a certain extent we are endeavoring to deprive ourselves of some business, because we are asking that efforts be made to clarify this bill. We believe that it is exceedingly complex, and in 87 pages we have pointed out any number of areas where we suggest that improvement should be made.

Senator TALMADGE. I understand that you think it was rather hastily and imprecisely drawn, and needs correcting in a lot of places.

Mr. CRAMPTON. We do think there are a number of areas where it should be improved and the details should be spelled out; yes, sir.

Senator TALMADGE. Do you think the bill could be improved if more time were devoted to those sections of the bill that are obviously complex, argumentative, unclear, and in some instances inadequate to achieve the purpose for which they were written?

Mr. CRAMPTON. We feel the bill can be improved. We do not want to be—you asked about more time—we do not want to be in the position of urging any delay or being against tax reform in general, but we do think that if it takes more time to come up with clear answers on some of these questions, here again I am speaking in sort of a representative capacity, but if I estimate the tenor of our council right, I believe they would urge you to take the time to do a thorough job. I might ask my associates if any of them feel differently.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

(Scott F. Crampton's prepared statement follows. Oral testimony of the next witness commences at p. 5208.)

SECTION OF TAXATION

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

REPORT ON H.R. 13270 91ST CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION

INTRODUCTORY

This report of the Section of Taxation of the American Bar Association on H.R. 13270, 91st Congress, 1st Session, The Tax Reform Act of 1969, has been prepared for submission to the Senate Committee on Finance in connection with its hearings on the bill. The report represents only the opinions, views, or action of the Section of Taxation, and nothing herein is to be construed as representing the opinions, views, or action of the American Bar Association, its House of Delegates, or Board of Governors, unless expressly so stated herein.

The Section believes that the bill makes many desirable reforms in the Internal Revenue Code. However, to conserve time we have largely limited our report to comments on problems of statutory draftsmanship, undue complexity in the structure of the tax law, and alternative methods of accomplishing the same general objectives.

There are two recurring problems that merit preliminary comment. The first is the retroactive effective dates and the second is the delegation of legislative powers.

The Section of Taxation has heretofore adopted the following policy on retroactivity:

Retroactivity is determined with reference to the date upon which the amendment becomes law. It is recognized that in some cases publicity attendant upon a proposed amendment may induce taxpayers to take advantage of an existing "loophole." Nevertheless, the foreclosure of such last-minute tax avoidance is considered less important than the preservation of the principle that a taxpayer may rely upon an existing statute in planning his affairs.

We urge that the principles be applied to the fullest extent possible in this bill.

There are many instances where the bill provides for supplemental details to be provided by Treasury Regulations. In some sections the bill provides standards to be followed by the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate. However, in many sections no standards are provided.

The Section of Taxation after prolonged consideration adopted the following suggested statement of policy in this regard:

Since the Treasury has the general statutory power to issue reasonable regulations, an express delegation of the legislative function to the Treasury in a particular statute serves no useful purpose. The legislative program should be scheduled so that there is sufficient time to incorporate all major policy decisions within the statute. It may be appropriate, however, for the statute to indicate that specified procedures and administrative detail are to be prescribed by regulation.

We urge the Committee to give serious consideration to these principles when reviewing the many delegations of rulemaking power.

TITLE I—TAX EXEMPT ORGANIZATIONS

Subtitle A—Private Foundations

SEC. 101. PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

Bill pp. 5–6, § 101(a) [IRC new § 506]

Tax on Investment Income

1. This provision appears to be designed primarily to raise funds to pay the increased expenses of the Internal Revenue Service in administering the audit program for private foundations under the Tax Reform Act of 1969. The rate of tax, therefore, should be only that which is reasonably necessary to raise the required funds. We recommend that, in lieu of a tax on income, an excise tax be imposed on all receipts from all sources of private foundations. Such a change would simplify the statute as well as simplify the computation of the tax. We believe that a tax on receipts would be as accurate a measure of audit costs as a tax on net investment income.

2. If the section is enacted, the following changes are recommended. Section 506(b)(3) of the bill provides that the deductions from gross investment income allowable in determining net investment income of a private foundation are in substance those now available to individual taxpayers under the first two paragraphs of section 212 of the Internal Revenue Code. Presumably, therefore, such deductions would not include those allowed under the third paragraph of present section 212 (expenses incurred in connection with the determination, collection, or refund of any tax) even though such expenses might be incurred in connection with the determination of the taxes imposed by sections 506, 507, and chapter 42 of the bill. We recommend the allowance of a deduction for such expenses.

Similarly, the bill does not provide for a deduction for interest, taxes, losses, bad debts, amortizable bond premium, depletion, or depreciation with respect to investment assets. We believe that such deductions should be allowed in determining net investment income subject to the tax. Note that the Report of the Ways and Means Committee (H. Rep. No. 91-413, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., Parts 1 and 2, hereinafter referred to as "House report, par —") specifically states that a deduction for depreciation will be allowed. (House report, part 2, p. 2).

Section 506(b)(4)(B) provides that in determining net capital gain or loss of private foundations "there shall be taken into account only the sale or other disposition of property" used to produce gross investment income or unrelated business income except to the extent accounted for under section 511. It is not clear whether the capital gain income intended to be taxed is only that which otherwise would be taxable under applicable provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. The use of the word "disposition" would appear to include gains that are not otherwise recognized as, for example, those arising from involuntary conversion or in connection with tax free reorganization exchanges.

Tax on Termination of Private Foundation Status

1. This section is highly complex and contains serious procedural deficiencies. Consideration should be given to an alternative provision which would permit a private foundation desiring to terminate its status to do so free of penalty by transferring its assets to a charity qualifying as public under section 170(b)(1)(B) as amended by the bill. If the Secretary or his delegate gives a private foundation notice of termination of its status pursuant to section 508(e), no tax would be assessed for a reasonable period, pending action by the appropriate State authority to transfer the assets of the foundation to another charity under the applicable State law relating to the doctrine of cy pres. If the State does not act within this period, a tax equal to 100 percent of the assets would be imposed.

2. If section 507 is enacted in its present form, a transition period should be provided to permit existing section 501(c)(3) organizations to determine through rulings whether they are private foundations and, if so, what they may be required to do to convert themselves into public organizations meeting the qualifications of section 170(b)(1)(B).

Section 507(e) provides that the Secretary or his delegate may abate the unpaid portion of any tax imposed under section 507(a) if the private foundation satisfies the requirements of section 507(e). The abatement should be mandatory not discretionary.

Section 507(f) provides that in the case of a substantial contributor (anyone who contributes more than $5,000 in any year) the disallowance of the deduction will relate back to the date of the first act of the foundation culminating in the loss of its exemption. This unrealistically assumes that a substantial contributor will have knowledge of such act and be in a position to prevent it. Furthermore, subsection (f) applies to estate tax deductions and hence, the disqualifying act may occur after the date of death.

Special Rules with Respect to Section 501(c)(3) Organizations

Section 508(b) provides that any organization described in section 501(c)(3) which does not notify the Secretary or his delegate that it is not a private foundation shall be presumed to be a private foundation. A further provision should be added to subsection (b) to provide that late filing of such notification, if not delinquent after specific notice to the foundation, will prevent the automatic classification of the foundation as a private foundation.

In section 508(c) there is no need to state expressly that churches and schools may be exempted from these procedures, since the general authority given to exempt any class of organization would cover such organizations.

In section 508(e), the termination of status tax under section 507 can be invoked by the Secretary or his delegate if the organization so acts as to give "rise to liability for tax under chapter 42," i.e., the taxes on self dealing, failure to distribute income, etc. The following points are not clear:

a. Must the liability for tax under chapter 42 be finally determined before the termination of status tax under section 507 can be invoked? Or is it enough that a notice of deficiency for tax under chapter 42 be issued? Or is it enough that the Internal Revenue Service merely assert, as on field audit, that there is such a deficiency?

b. Will a final determination that there is no liability under chapter 42 necessarily preclude the tax under section 507?

c. No statute of limitations has been provided for the assessment of the tax under section 507 (see page 64, line 3, of the bill). Some reasonable limitation period should be provided.

d. A drafting problem arises on page 12, line 21, and page 13, lines 9 and 14, in referring to subsection (e) as a section with which the organization "has complied" because subsection (e) of section 507 involves a discretionary abatement of tax by the Secretary. "Compliance" is up to the Secretary, not the organization.

The requirement of section 508(g) that the governing instrument of the private foundation contain certain provisions is unnecessary. The statutory requirements for exemption are clearly set forth in section 501(c)(3). The addition required by section 508(g) merely restates the operational tests for continued exemption elsewhere required by the bill. To require the change in governing instruments to include the stated provisions would impose undue hardships on many thousands of tax exempt organizations. To receive and file the amended instruments would also be an unnecessary burden upon the Internal Revenue Service. State agencies and courts would likewise be burdened in making or authorizing the making of the unnecessary changes.

Private Foundation Defined

1. Section 509(a)(2) sets forth the test for determining whether an organization receives adequate public support to avoid the definition of private foundation. It is not evident why subparagraph (B) states that no more than one-third of the foundation's support can come from investment income. For aught that appears, the investment income could have been generated from an endowment that was received from public contributions. It should be sufficient that one-third of the total support comes from gifts and the specified related sources.

2. Clarification is needed for the meaning of the term "grants," particularly whether grants are in the nature of gifts (as referred to in new section 509(a)(2)(A)(i) and in section 102) or income (as referred to in new section 509(a)(2)(A)(ii) and in section 61). If, for example, a research grant is received that contemplates the preparation of a report, it might be treated either as a grant under clause (i) or a fee for performance of services under clause (ii). If such a grant is treated as a grant under clause (i), the 1 percent test of clause (ii) would not apply.

3. Section 509(a)(3) excludes from the definition of a private foundation an organization which is organized, and at all times is thereafter operated, exclusively for the benefit of, to perform the functions of, or to carry out the purposes of, one or more organizations described in paragraph (1) or (2). The Congressional intent should be clearly expressed whether private foundation status exists in the following cases: (1) a trust which was originally established for private and public purposes (i.e., for the benefit of private annuitants and charity), but which later becomes operated solely for public purposes (i.e., upon the death of the private annuitants); and (2) an organization with a defective charter which could be amended ultimately to satisfy the "organized" test.

4. There appears to be no reason why an exempt charitable organization which is operated "in connection with" two or more qualified institutions should not be protected as well as one which serves only one qualified institution. Section 509(a)(3)(B), on page 16, appears, however, to apply only to the one institution situation.

5. Some attempt should be made to define the term "support" since the present use of that term under Regulations section 1.170-2(b)(5)(ii) may not be entirely consistent with the scope intended of section 509(a)(2). For example, under the section 170 regulations, support excludes amounts received in furtherance of an exempt function and includes unrelated business income. Section 509 (a)(2) suggests that support includes amounts received in furtherance of an exempt function and excludes amounts received from an unrelated trade or business.

6. On page 16 of the bill, line 21, the word "and" should be changed to "or." Otherwise all paragraphs of section 509(a) would have to apply in order for an organization to escape classification as a private foundation. The intent clearly is that any one of the four paragraphs defines an organization which will escape classification as a private foundation.

Bill pp. 17–25, § 101(b) [IRC new § 4941]

Tax on Self-dealing

1. In section 4941(e)(3) the phrase "dealing under the highest fiduciary standard" is used. It is not known what this means or to what standards the provision refers unless the self-dealer in effect becomes an insurer.

2. The definition of "correction period" in section 4941 uses different language than the definition of "correction period" in sections 4942 and 4943. In those sections the "correction period" may be extended for a period determined to be "reasonable and necessary" to make the correction, whereas in this section the "correction period" may be extended for a period which is "conducive to bringing about correction." The reason for this difference is not clear.

3. Subsection (c) is ambiguous as to the liability of a foundation manager where it provides under subsection (c)(1) that the liability shall be joint and several and in subsection (c)(2) that the liability shall not exceed $10,000 as to a foundation manager. If the liability is joint and several under subsection (c)(1), it might exceed $10,000 regardless of subsection (c)(2).

4. Reference is made to the definition of a government official in section 4946(c). It would seem that a government official could be defined in something less than a page and a half of a statute—e.g., "an employee who receives an annual salary of $15,000 or more, and his personal or executive assistant or secretary."

5. In subsection (d)(2)(E) the word "reasonable" should be substituted for the words "not excessive."

6. One of the effective date provisions (Bill p. 81) exempts the sale to a disqualified person of property owned by the foundation on May 26, 1969 if such sale is necessary to comply with the rules on excess business holdings (section 4943). This provision should be cross-referenced in section 4941 to section 101(k)(2)(B) of the bill.

Tax on Failure to Distribute Income

1. The House report, part 1, pp. 26–27, states that the tax is imposed for each year until the private foundation is notified of its obligation to make distributions or until the foundation itself corrects its earlier failure by making the necessary payouts. The fact that there is an annual tax is by no means clear from reading section 4942(a). The purpose of the parenthetical clause beginning on line 25 of page 25 is not clear.

Neither is it clear when and how the tax liability is to be determined. Presumably the private foundation will not be confronted with an assertion of liability until the Secretary or his delegate sends a notice of deficiency. This could be some years after the asserted failure to distribute income.

2. On page 26, lines 15 and 16 and on lines 19 and 20, reference is made to "any time" in determining when income of a private foundation is undistributed. There is no apparent reason why the determination of the amount of undistributed income cannot be made as of the end of an annual accounting period or taxable year. It seems plain, however, that it was not intended to do so, because the provision just mentioned, taken in connection with new section 4942(h) on page 31, indicates that tracing will be needed in order to determine, during any taxable year, whether a distribution is from income of the immediately preceding taxable year or from income of the taxable year. Such tracing will entail complications of accounting. It would seem preferable to use the concept employed in personal holding companies, i.e., treat a distribution within a limited period after the close of a year as having been made from the preceding year's earnings.

3. Section 4942(e) refers to the minimum investment return "for any taxable year." This is computed by applying the applicable percentage to the fair market value of the foundation's assets. Paragraph (2) describes the valuation to be used. The value of securities for which quotations are readily available is to be determined on a monthly basis. Other assets are to be valued at such times and in such manner as the Secretary or his delegate shall by regulations prescribe.

In the House report, part 1 at page 25, it is said that the base upon which the applicable percentage rate is to apply is the average value of the non-charitable assets during the taxable year. Paragraph (2) of the bill on page 27 should state that the value should be an average one. Preferably, however, the computation of the base upon which to compute the minimum investment return should be the lowest fair market value during the foundation's taxable year.

Use of an annual instead of a monthly valuation procedure is consistent with other provisions of the bill. See, for example, bill page 115 at line 7 and page 137 at line 6.

4. In section 4942(e) (3) the applicable percentage for taxable years beginning in 1970 is 5 percent. Presumably this is deemed to be an appropriate yield for 1970 on income producing property. If it is, the use of the 5 percent figure leaves out of account the previously imposed burden of the tax on investment income imposed by section 506, and the 5 percent figure should be reduced accordingly. Alternatively, the section 506 tax should be included as a qualifying distribution under section 4952(g).

There is a fundamental question whether 5 percent is the correct percentage to use for 1970. Based upon many economic studies and surveys, and the Dow Jones industrial average, 3½ percent figure would appear to be more reasonable. The use of 5 percent may require continuing corpus distributions from foundations which are funded substantially with equities instead of fixed obligations.

5. Section 4942(f)(3)(A) allows as deductions in computing adjusted net income only the deductions that are ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred for producing or collecting gross income or for the management, conservation or maintenance of property held for the production of such income. These are the deductions allowed by section 212 except for the deduction provided in section 212(3) for ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred in the taxable year in connection with the determination, collection, or refund of any tax. Thus, no deduction would be allowed for expense of contesting the tax incurred under chapter 42, for example, on the failure to distribute income. This does not seem equitable.

Deduction is not, but should be, allowed for interest, taxes, losses, bad debts, amortizable bond premium, depletion, and depreciation with respect to investment assets.

6. As noted above, a payment of the tax under section 506 should be treated as a qualifying distribution unless the applicable percentage is changed to accommodate the impact of the section 506 tax in determining the minimum investment return under section 4942(e).

In defining a qualifying distribution there is no provision in subparagraph (A) to treat as a qualifying distribution amounts required to be disbursed in defraying costs of administering the charitable program and costs incurred in earning investment income. These amounts should be deducted before a tax is asserted for failure to distribute either the minimum investment return or the adjusted net income.

7. Section 4942(g)(1)(A) excludes from classification as a qualifying distribution an amount paid to an organization "controlled (directly or indirectly)" by one or more disqualified persons. A definition of the quoted phrase should be included or provided by cross-reference. Does control mean ownership of stock having 51 percent or 80 percent of the voting power? Do the attribution rules apply in determining control?

Section 4942(g)(1)(B) treats as a qualifying distribution any amount paid to acquire an asset used (or held for use) directly in carrying out one or more purposes described in section 170(c)(2)(B). If a distribution is made in the acquisition of an asset which the Internal Revenue Service claims is not used directly in carrying out one of the stated purposes, the fact is that the distribution will nevertheless have been made and no income will remain after the expenditure from which to pay a tax which would result from not having the benefit of the qualifying distribution. Moreover, the shortage of qualifying distributions thus occasioned would be a permanent condition which would continue indefinitely with the result that the income so used would each year during the continued existence of the foundation be subject to the 15 percent tax imposed by section 4942. If that is the intention of Congress, it should be clearly stated.

Section 4942(g)(2) should be worded so as to permit a foundation to set aside income where controversy has developed over potential liability for taxes, legitimacy of the charitable trust or proper application of income or corpus in suits by heirs, and similar circumstances dictating needs to accumulate earnings which are not strictly charitable.

8. Section 4942(h)(1) provides that distributions made during a taxable year shall be treated as made, first out of undistributed income of the immediately preceding taxable year, second out of undistributed income for the taxable year, and finally out of corpus. The extent to which annual accounting periods will be ignored for purposes of determining the source of distributions is not clear.

The distribution is treated as first out of undistributed income of the immediately preceding taxable year "(if the private foundation was subject to the tax imposed by this section for such preceding taxable year)." A question arises when the allocation of the distribution to the undistributed income of the immediately preceding taxable year can occur. Is it (a) after there has been a final determination of tax liability under section 4942, (b) after a notice of deficiency is sent, (c) after the assertion of such liability upon field audit, or (d) merely because a private foundation is subject to the provisions of section 4942 whether or not a tax is in fact due under that section? Perhaps the phrase "subject to the tax" should be changed to "liable for tax."

It is not clear what purpose is served by the sentence appearing in section 4942(h)(2) in lines 23 and 24 on page 31 stating that "for purposes of this paragraph, distributions shall be taken into account in the order of time in which made." This raises the same questions noted earlier about the making of determinations otherwise than on an annual accounting basis.

Section 4942(h)(2) provides that in the case of any qualifying distribution which is not treated as made out of the undistributed income of the immediately preceding taxable year, the taxpayer may elect to treat any portion of such distribution as made out of the undistributed income of a designated prior taxable year or out of corpus. The only distribution that would not have been first charged to income of the immediately preceding taxable year will be undistributed income of the current taxable year. Thus, the foundation's election is only as to which of its items of undistributed income will remain subject to tax, namely, the undistributed income of a designated prior taxable year or of the current taxable year. It is not evident why this election has any significance since in any case the undistributed portion will continue to bear the 15 percent tax imposed by section 4942.

9. Section 4942(j)(3) defines an operating foundation. To be such, with the attendant advantages, it is provided in subparagraph (B)(i) that substantially more than half of the assets must be devoted directly to the exempt functions. There is a question as to the meaning of "substantially more than half." In some tax areas, even half is a substantial amount. What, then, is the meaning of substantially more than half? A more precise definition is needed. If two-thirds is intended, it should be stated.

10. Instead of describing assets "devoted directly" to the exempt activities, it would seem preferable to describe them as they are elsewhere in the bill, i.e., as "used (or held for use) directly" in carrying out the activities. See for example, section 4942(e)(1)(A), page 27, line 8.

In section 4942(j)(3)(B)(ii), reference is again made (page 34, line 8) to "support" of the organization. As noted above, a definition of "support" is needed.

In section 4942(j)(3)(B)(ii) (page 34, line 11), reference is made to 5 or more "exempt" organizations. A more precise reference should be made to organizations exempt under some particular section of the Code. It is not adequate to refer merely to 5 or more exempt organizations which are not described in 4946(a)(1)(H). Is the phrase "exempt organizations" intended to mean any organization exempt under any of the provisions of section 501(c)?

11. In numerous places in the bill the Secretary or his delegate is directed to determine various matters relevant to the determination of the tax imposed by section 4942.

On page 27, line 19, the Secretary or his delegate is directed to prescribe regulations setting forth the times and manner of determining the fair market value of a foundation's assets other than securities for which market quotations are readily available. Regulations already exist on the subject of valuation for a variety of purposes. A further valuation regulation hardly seems warranted.

On page 28, line 1, the Secretary or his delegate is directed to proclaim an applicable percentage figure to use in determining the minimum investment return and is directed to produce a rate that bears a designated relationship to the 5 percent figure that appears in the statute. The designated relationship involves a determination of money rates and investment yields which the Secretary is being asked to compute.

On page 30, line 21, the Secretary or his delegate is directed to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which the set-asides can be established and on page 31, line 2, the Secretary must be satisfied that the set-aside will be paid out within the specified period. Also, on page 31, line 9, the Secretary or his delegate for good cause shown can extend the payout period.

On page 32, line 10, the Secretary or his delegate is directed to prescribe by regulations the basis upon which the taxpayer may elect to treat a portion of a distribution as being made out of undistributed income of a designated prior taxable year or out of corpus.

On page 33, line 17, the Secretary or his delegate is directed to determine what time is reasonable and necessary in which to permit a distribution of undistributed income to be made.

It is submitted that the administration of section 4942 places an undue administrative burden upon the Secretary or his delegate. Means should be provided to be more specific in the statutory language, to avoid the necessity of involving the Secretary or his delegate in so many policy determinations.

Bill p. 34–42, § 101(b) [IRC new § 4943]

Taxes on Excess Business Holdings

1. Section 4943(c)(4) (B) and (C) provides for 2- and 5-year interim dispositions of excess business holdings. Consideration should be given to the necessity for such provisions. They serve only to evidence the good faith of the foundation in commencing to comply with the 10-year grace period for divestiture of its excess business holdings. Furthermore, in the case of closely held stock it may not be possible to dispose of 10 percent of the excess holdings at a fair price, if at all.

The 2-year 10-percent rule may be avoided upon proof of hardship coupled with proof that control of ten percent of the excess interest will be exercised by persons other than the foundation or a disqualified person. By whom would such control be exercised? To whom can a fiduciary properly transfer the right to control a portion of its investment? What is accomplished by establishing third-party control of such a small portion of the stock?

2. Section 4943(c)(4) provides a 10-year grace period for disposition of excess business holdings held on May 26, 1969. Paragraph (5) provides that in the case of holdings acquired by will, the 10-year grace period will commence to run on "the date of acquisition by will" instead of May 26, 1969, if the will is executed on or before July 28, 1969 and if the terms thereof are in effect on July 28, 1969 and at all times thereafter.

The meaning of the language "under the terms of a will executed on or before July 28, 1969, which are in effect on such date and at all times thereafter" is not clear. It would seem that the terms take effect only upon the death of the testator. If in fact the controlling date is the date of execution of the will, then the 2-, 5- and 10-year periods may be lost because the death of the testator may occur after the expiration of such periods. The effect of the execution of a codicil is not clear. Will it destroy the July 28, 1969, date if the original will was executed on or before that date?

3. Section 4943(c)(3) attempts to equate non-corporate business holdings with corporate holdings. It provides that in case of a partnership or a joint venture, a "profits interest" shall be substituted for "voting stock" and "capital interest" shall be substituted for "non-voting stock." As a catch-all, the bill provides that in any other case "beneficial interest" shall be substituted for "voting stock." Whether a foundation's interest in a partnership is in profits or in capital is not determinative of the nature or extent of its voice in partnership affairs. It would seem more appropriate in this context to equate general partnership interests with voting stock and limited partnership interests with non-voting stock.

Investments Which Jeopardize Charitable Purpose

Section 4944 states that if a private foundation invests any amount in such a manner as to jeopardize the carrying out of its exempt purposes, a tax is imposed on the making of such investment equal to 100 percent of the amount so invested.

The House report, part 1, p. 31, states that the purpose of the new section is to apply the same basic tests to the investment of assets as presently are applied to the investment of income under section 504(a)(3) although the latter section would merely cause loss of exemption instead of the 100 percent tax as currently proposed. Present section 504(a)(3), after which section 4944 is patterned, has not been amplified by regulations since its enactment 19 years ago.

The tax may be unduly harsh. For example, if the foundation invests $1,000 of its funds in a way which is deemed to jeopardize the carrying out of its exempt purpose and if the investment declines in value to $500, the proposed new tax would require payment of $500 from the foundation's other assets. By hypothesis, only $500 remains from the imprudent investment but there will be a tax of 100 percent of the original $1,000 investment.

The House report, part 1, p. 31, states that "it is expected" that the 100 percent tax could be avoided where a State attorney general exercises his power to preserve the foundation's assets for charity by appointing new trustees, by requiring the distribution of the offending foundation's assets to a public charity, "or by taking other appropriate action." It is not apparent, however, where that relief is provided.

Definitions and Special Rules

1. In the case of excess business holdings, section 4943, consideration should be given to excluding from the term "substantial contributor" members of the substantial contributor's family (and corporations, etc. controlled by them) if the substantial contributor made his contribution more than 10 years prior to the questioned transaction or activity. Likewise, for the purposes of section 4941, perhaps a substantial contributor should cease to be such after 10 years. It is questionable whether members of the family of an individual donor, dead perhaps 30 years, should be treated as per se disqualified persons where the family's own involvement in recent years would not make them in their own right disqualified persons.

2. The term "substantial contributor" is defined in section 507(b)(2) and section 4946(a)(2). It is used not only in connection with the excise tax provisions but also in connection with the requirement of filing public information returns (§ 6033(b)(5)), making the names of such persons part of the return. It is not known whether a separate standard is to apply or whether failure to cross-reference the definition was intended to allow the use of a higher or lower figure (other than $5,000) which may be prescribed by regulations.

3. With respect to the attribution rules contained in section 4946, attention is invited to the position of the American Bar Association as to the desirability of uniformity and simplicity in the attribution rules throughout the Internal Revenue Code. (Tax Lawyer, Vol. XXI, No. 4, pp. 921–930; Tax Lawyer, Vol. 22, No. 3, pp. 449–450; ABA Reports, 1969, Vol. 94, p. —). The rules set forth in section 4946 are not consistent with this position.

4. In the definition of a disqualified person for purposes of section 4943 (§ 4946(a)(1)(H)(i)) reference is made to a private foundation "which is effectively controlled (directly or indirectly)." Contrast this with section 4942(g)(1)(A) which refers to an "organization controlled (directly or indirectly)." Is there a difference between "controlled" and "effectively controlled"?

Bill pp. 56–57, § 101(c) [IRS new § 6684]

Assessable Penalties for Repeated, or Willful and Flagrant, Acts Under Chapter 42

1. The taxes imposed under chapter 42 are, in reality, penalty taxes, in most cases, particularly in the case of taxes imposed after the expiration of the correction period. In such instances this additional penalty seems too onerous both in circumstances of application and amount. It seems incongrouous for this penalty to be twice the civil fraud penalty, and to be imposed in addition thereto. Section 101(f) of the bill and section 101(j)(50) of the bill make the civil fraud penalty applicable to chapter 42 taxes. It would seem that the 50 percent civil fraud provision is adequate for chapter 42 taxes.

2. The 100 percent penalty provision has several defects. The penalty is imposed whenever a person has "theretofore been liable for tax" under chapter 42. Under chapter 42, a tax is imposed on self-dealing; another tax is imposed on failure to distribute income; another tax is imposed on excess business holdings; another tax is imposed on investments which jeopardize charitable purposes; and other taxes are imposed on certain expenditures which are considered improper for a private foundation. The effect of this penalty, as now written, is to impose a penalty for a tax on one activity by reason of one having previously been liable for a tax on another activity. At the very least, the words "such section" should be inserted in line 22 on page 56 of the bill in place of the words "such chapter." The penalty is also imposed if the act or failure to act is both willful and flagrant. The word "flagrant," which is unknown in the tax law, has many connotations. Its use would undoubtedly result in much litigation to interpret its meaning in this context.

Information Returns of Exempt Organizations

1. The "efficiency" standard of section 6033(a)(2) undoubtedly contemplates excusing small organizations from filing an annual return. It would be preferable if a statutory exception were provided for organizations with less than $5,000 in gross receipts or assets excusing them altogether. Such a provision is appropriate because the potential for abuse in small organizations is minimal; the organizations probably rely on volunteer assistance (not necessarily trained in accounting procedures); and the information would probably be of interest to few, if any, members of the public.

2. The amendment to section 6033(b)(5) would appear to be an unnecessary invasion of the privacy of charitably inclined individuals. It might serve to curtail donations. It appears to serve no substantial tax purpose. It might be well to provide that contribution information would be required only for use by the Internal Revenue Service in its enforcement program for cross checking individual and corporate tax returns with exempt organization information returns. (Cf. Treas. Reg. § 1.170–1(a)(3)(iii) and § 1.6033–1(a)(4)(i), and instruction 17, Form 990–A.)

It may be desirable to require an information return to be filed upon the termination or liquidation of an exempt organization similar to that now required for non-exempt corporations under section 6043.

Bill pp. 60–61, § 101(e) [IRC new § 6104(c)]

Publicity of Information Required by Certain Exempt Organizations

Section 6104(c)(1)(C) provides for furnishing any information relevant to "any determination under State law." This provision seems unduly broad, as it would permit the Internal Revenue Service to furnish information relevant not only to the organization, but also apparently to its donors, officers, donees, etc. To that extent it constitutes an extension of present rules applicable to publication of information by the Internal Revenue Service. It would seem appropriate that the statute itself provide that the disclosure of information be relevant only to determinations under State law that relate to the satisfaction of its charitable purpose by the organization or its liability under State tax laws.

Petition to Tax Court; Deficiency Procedures Made Applicable

Sections 6211(b)(2), 6212(a), 6212(b)(1), and 6213(a), and the title of subchapter B of chapter 63, subtitle F of the Code should be amended so as to reflect the inclusion of chapter 42 taxes.

A provision should also be added to give the Tax Court jurisdiction in the case of penalties imposed under section 6652(d) (penalties in connection with failure to file an exempt organization information return).

Bill pp. 63–64, § 101(g)(2) [IRC new § 6501(c)(7)]

Termination of Private Foundation Status

Section 101(g)(2) provides that "In the case of a tax on termination of private foundation status under section 507, such tax may be assessed, or a proceeding in court for the collection of such tax may be begun without assessment, at any time."

This appears to be a provision relieving the Commissioner of the necessity of assessing a tax prior to its collection, which would have ramifications throughout the Internal Revenue Code. It would also seem to prohibit the application of any statute of limitations to such collection. The only similar provisions are contained in sections 6501(c)(1) (relating to false returns); 6501(c)(2) (relating to willful attempt to evade tax); and 6501(c)(3) (relating to failure to file a return). The American Bar Association has recommended an eight-year limitation in the case of fraudulent returns and the non-fraudulent failure to file returns. (ABA Reports, 1956, Vol. 81, p. 397; ABA Reports, 1961, Vol. 86, pp. 123, 125, 329–30).

Section 507 is a confiscatory tax equal to prior net tax benefits to the foundation and its substantial contributors or, in the case of lack of records, the net value of the foundation assets. The tax under section 507 can be imposed only upon (1) voluntary termination by the foundation of its status by notification to the Secretary of the foundation's intent to terminate (section 508(d)), or (2) termination of foundation status by the Secretary for "willful repeated acts (or failures to act)" or "a willful and flagrant act (or failure to act)." (Section 508(e)).

In either case the Secretary would have actual notice of the termination and could assess the tax within the normal three-year limitation period.

In the event that a limitation period is placed upon the assessment of tax under section 507, an appropriate amendment should be made in proposed section 6501(c)(7) to provide that in the event a tax is imposed under section 507(a), by virtue of termination of status under section 508(d) or (e), the tax may be assessed or action for collection without assessment may be begun within the three years after the date of notification to the Secretary of voluntary termination of status under section 508(d), or notification by the Secretary of termination of status under section 508(e).

It would also be necessary to amend section 6511 relating to limitations on credit or refund, to provide that a claim for credit or refund of a tax imposed under section 507 must be filed within the period prescribed by section 6501(c)(7) for the assessment of a tax.

Also, amendment of other chapters of the Code would be essential if chapter 42 is enacted. Chapters requiring special attention in this connection are chapter 64 (Collection), chapter 65 (Abatements, Credits and Refunds), chapter 70 (Jeopardy, Bankruptcy and Receiverships), and chapter 71 (Transferees and Fiduciaries).

Bill p. 64, § 101(g)(3) [IRC new § 6503(h)]

Suspension Pending Correction

Although it would seem proper to allow an extension to be made to encourage the correction of improper action, either by the foundation or by action of a State, the proposed section would allow the Secretary to extend the period for any time without limit, without the consent of the taxpayer. This would seem to be unduly broad. It is suggested that any extension under this section, without the consent of the taxpayers, should be limited to a specified period of time, such as one year.

Bill pp. 65–66, § 101(i) [IRC new § 7422(g)]

Civil Action for Refund

Contrary to present excise tax refund requirements, proposed section 7422(g)(1) requires that chapter 42 excise taxes must be paid in full (as to the initial or additional tax) before commencing a suit for refund. There should be no requirement that both the tax on the disqualified person (§ 4941(a)(1)) and any participating foundation manager (§ 4941(a)(2)) be paid in full to test the correctness of the assessment.[1] It is unclear whether, in joint assessments, both must join in the refund suit. It should be clear that a satisfactory partial payment by one or the other should suffice. Since the standard of liability as to each participant is distinct (though the transaction is bilateral), the foundation manager should not be required to join in the suit.

Since some of the taxes may be assessed for transactions continuing over a period of years in the taxable period, the taxpayer should be given the right to pay tax for only one year in the taxable period in order to contest the tax. Steele v. United States, 280 F.2d. 89, 91 (8th Cir. 1960). The Government would protect its interests by filing a counterclaim as to the remaining tax in dispute.

[1] To the extent that Flora v. United States, 357 U.S. 63 (1959), on rehearing, 362 U.S. 145 (1960), which involved income tax, suggests a contrary rule, it is the position of the American Bar Association that this decision should be overruled by legislation. (ABA Reports, 1961, Vol. 86, pp. 123, 333–334).

Technical, Conforming, and Clerical Amendments

Paragraph (43), page 76 of the bill adds a new subsection (c) to section 6214. This new subsection may create an ambiguity. It appears that the intent of this amendment is to extend the present income and gift tax jurisdictional provision in present section 6214(b) to chapter 42 taxes. The basic problem appears to be due to the use of the phrase "any other tax has been overpaid or underpaid" at the end of new section 6214(c) in lieu of the phrase "the tax for any other year has been overpaid or underpaid." It would seem that consistency of draftmanship and intent would require requires that lines 4 and 5 of paragraph (43) at page 77 of the bill be amended to read "jurisdiction to determine whether or not the taxes under chapter 42 for any other period, act, or failure to act have been overpaid or underpaid."

In subsection 101(j)(50) of the bill the word "overpayment" should be changed to "underpayment."

Subtitle B—Other Tax Exempt Organizations

SEC. 121. TAX ON UNRELATED BUSINESS INCOME

Bill pp. 85–86, § 121(a) [IRC amended § 511(a)(2)(A) and § 511(b)(2)]

Organizations Subject to Tax

It is suggested that there be a parity between exempt corporations and exempt trusts with respect to the rate of tax imposed upon unrelated business income. It is recommended that the rate of tax applicable to section 501(c) trusts should be the rate imposed on corporations under section 11, rather than the individual rates presently imposed upon such trusts.

Bill pp. 87–89, § 121(b)(1) [IRC amended § 512(a)(3)]

Special Rules Applicable to Organizations Described in Section 501(c)(7), (8), (9), or (10)

Under section 512(a)(3)(A), as amended, deductions directly connected with "exempt function income" will not be deductible. This may be inconsistent with the allowance under present Treasury regulations and under the proposed section on "advertising," of a deduction for the editorial costs to arrive at the "net" revenues from advertising. If this is an ambiguity, it should be corrected.

Gains from the sale or exchange of property (used to carry out exempt functions) should not be taxed as they apparently would be under this proposal. See Mill Lane Club, Inc., 23 T.C. 433 (1954); Cf. Rev. Rul. 66–149, 1966–1 C.B. 146.

To the extent that charitable and educational expenditures are made from the investment income of social clubs or of organizations exempt under section 501(c)(8), it might be desirable to make such distributions deductible in determining net investment income.

Bill pp. 90–93, § 121(b)(2) [IRC amended § 512(b)(4), (12), (15), and (16)]

Modifications

With respect to the taxability of certain income from controlled corporations, it may be desirable not to define the control requirements as the statute now does by reference to section 368(c) of the Code. Section 368(c) refers to "ownership of stock." A membership organization, organized under a non-profit statute, may not be treated on an equal basis even though it pays rent to its exempt parent.

It may be appropriate to consider a transition rule postponing the effective date of the statute with respect to so-called controlled corporations.

Bill pp. 93–94, § 121(c) [IRC amended § 513(c)]

Advertising, Etc., Activities

If this provision is intended to codify present Treasury regulations relating to advertising profits derived from publications of exempt organizations, it should be appropriately limited. As drafted, the statute would tax any activity of affected organizations without regard to regularity, profit motive, or continuity.

The proper allocation of expenses (direct and indirect) between taxable advertising and non-taxable activities of an affected exempt organization may be difficult. House report, part 1, p. 50, states that the Secretary or his delegate will prescribe regulations with respect to such allocation. It is recommended that guidelines for such allocation be set forth in the statute.

Bill pp. 94–107, § 121(d) [IRC amended § 514]

Unrelated Debt-Financed Income

This provision subjects debt-financed income of an exempt organization to tax. The purpose of this provision is to overrule the Clay Brown case[1] and eliminate the ability of an exempt organization to purchase a business on a "bootstrap" basis by paying for it out of earnings which are not subject to tax. This provision is similar to a recommendation heretofore made by the American Bar Association except that it applies the unrelated business tax to debt-financed dividends, interest, and capital gains. (Bulletin of Sec. of Taxation, Vol. XX, No. 4, p. 69; Tax Lawyer, Vol. XXI, No. 3, p. 457; ABA Reports, 1968, Vol. 93, p. —). It is believed that the extension of the debt-financed tax to these sources of income is unnecessary to correct the basic abuses involved in bootstrap transactions. There are also over provisions in the bill relating to neighborhood land and churches which are outside the scope of the recommendation of the American Bar Association.

Restrictions on Examination of Churches

This provision restricts the right of the Internal Revenue Service to conduct an audit of a church unless the Secretary or his delegate, who may be no lower than the principal Internal Revenue regional officer, notifies the church that he believes it may be engaged in an unrelated trade or business. This difference in audit procedure with respect to churches appears to introduce an unnecessary complication.

TITLE II—INDIVIDUAL DEDUCTIONS

Subtitle A—Charitable Contributions

SEC. 201. CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS

Bill pp. 112–114, § 201(a)(1) [IRC new § 170(b)(1) (D), (E), (F) and (G)]

Unlimited Charitable Contribution Deduction

This provision repeals the unlimited charitable deduction. Transitional rules provide for a five-year phaseout. The "transitional income percentage" of adjusted gross income is the amount below which charitable contributions cannot reduce taxable income. The "transitional deduction percentage" is the percentage of taxable income which must consist of charitable contributions and taxes in order for an individual to be eligible for the "unlimited deduction." As the deduction percentage decreases, the income percentage increases, and by January 1, 1975, both percentages will be 50 percent.

The provisions for limiting tax preferences (LTP) and allocation of deductions (AOD) would appear to be applicable to taxpayers who qualify for the unlimited charitable deduction during the phase-out. If this is so, and if the phase-out provisions also apply, then the interaction of the two should be considered.

Present section 170(g) precludes section 170(b)(5) carryovers by taxpayers claiming the unlimited charitable deduction. While appropriate under existing law, interaction of transitional rules of new section 170(b)(1) (E), (F) and (G) may make such carryovers desirable; i.e., during the 5-year transitional period a taxpayer who has qualified for the unlimited deduction under section 170(b)(1)(D) may have that deduction partially reduced if his taxable income is less than the transitional income percentage of his adjusted gross income.

Bill pp. 114–116, § 201(a)(1) [IRC new § 170(b)(1) (H) and (I)]

Denial of Deductions

This section changes present law by disallowing a deduction for a gift of an income interest to charity. Where a donor transfers his entire interest in property irrevocably and retains no reversionary interest, there is no sound reason for disallowing a deduction for a gift of an income interest to charity. The "double tax benefit" argument, House report, part 1, p. 61, proves to much. It applies with equal force to an outright gift to charity. Here, too, the donor will receive a tax benefit from excluding the income from his return (for the rest of his life) but will nevertheless receive the benefit of a tax deduction for the full value of the property given to charity. Furthermore, there is no basis for differentiating between a gift to charity of an income interest and a remainder interest. Indeed, the charity receives the benefit of an income interest immediately but must wait to receive the benefit of the remainder interest. In short, there is no basis to distinguish between an outright gift, a gift of an income interest or a gift of a remainder interest.

Bill pp. 116–118, § 201(a)(1) [IRC new § 170(b)(1)(J)]

Special Limitations on Contributions of Appreciated Property

Section 201(a)(1) adds a limitation of 30 percent of the contribution base in the case of gifts of appreciated property not covered by section 201(c) of the bill (IRC amended § 170(e)).

1. This provision would appear to conflict with the stated purpose of the increase from 30 percent to 50 percent in the percentage limitations on individual deductions. The House report, part 1, p. 52, states that the increase to 50 percent was desirable to counterbalance the financial effect on charities of the repeal of the unlimited charitable deduction. Denying gifts of appreciated property eligibility for the 50 percent limitation significantly undercuts the effect of the increase to 50 percent.

In any event, the proposal in its present form could have an unintended harsh result in some cases. The limitation applies to the full value of the contributed property and not just to the appreciation element. Thus, the deduction of a gift of stock worth $100,000 would be limited to 30 percent whether the donor's basis was $1.00 or $99,999; however, if his basis were $100,000 the 50 percent limit would apply. If there is a special 30 percent limitation for such property, logically the limitation should apply only to the appreciation, with the basis of the property being eligible for the additional 20 percent allowance as provided by section 170(b)(1)(B).

2. It should be pointed out that the House report, part 1, p. 52, incorrectly describes the new limitation. Specifically, the suggestion that the 30 percent limitation would apply to all contributions of appreciated property is incorrect. Such limitation is actually only a maximum; in the case of gifts to private foundations the 20 percent limitation of section 170(b)(1)(C) would control.

3. The new section also creates a separate carryover category of excess contributions of appreciated property which is not explained in the general explanation of the bill, and appears to be incorrectly explained in the technical explanation of the bill on page 33. The example there given states that where there is an excess of contribution of appreciated property and also an excess of cash contributions by reason of the 50 percent limitation, all of the excess must be carried over "to any contributions of appreciated property in the following years." There is no reason why excess cash contributions should have to beadded to excess appreciated property contributions in determining subsequent years limitations on contribution appreciated property.

Contribution Base Defined

If LTP and AOD are to be applied to charitable contributions of individuals. the allowable tax preferences should be included in the contribution base as section 201(a)(3) proposes. However, as presently drafted, it appears that computation of the base may produce in some instances circular computations. For example, the contribution base equals adjusted gross income plus allowable tax preferences as determined under section 277(c)(2) (p. 120, line 5). Allowable tax preferences equal tax preferences as determined under section 84(c) minus those that are included in gross income under section 84 minus $10,000 (§ 277(c)(2), p. 175, lines 12-20). Tax preferences include deductions under section 170 which are attributable to the appreciation and which are allowable for the taxable year (§ 84(c), p. 166, line 8). Therefore, if appreciated LTP property is given to public charities, there can be instances where in order to determine the amount deductible under section 170 one must know the amount of tax preferences, and in order to determine the amount of tax preferences one must know how much is deductible under section 170.

Bill pp. 120-121, § 201(a)(3) [IRC new §170(b)(7)]

Disallowance of Deduction in Certain Cases

During the transition period, this provision creates unintended hardships on existing section 501(c)(3) organizations. To preclude disallowances for charitable contributions paid in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969, section 170(b)(7)(A) requires the donee section 501(c)(3) organization to be exempted from or to have complied with the provisions of section 508(a), (b), or (g). Subsection (b) of section 508 applies to existing charitable organizations and requires, unless exempted, notification of the Secretary pursuant to his regulations that it is not a private foundation. The effect is to preclude a charitable contributions deduction to certain existing section 501(c) (3) organizations until the Treasury issues regulations. To avoid these unfortunate results, references should be deleted to section 508(b) in the following places: lines 14 and 18, p. 120; lines 21 and 23, p. 130; line 24, p. 132; line 1, p. 133.

Bill p. 121, § 201(a)(3) [IRC new § 170(b)(8)]

Denial of Deduction in Case of Contribution of Partial Interest in Property

This section disallows a charitable deduction for contributions of partial interests in property. It would seem to be broader than the House Committee's general explanation of the reasons for this change. Deductions for non-trust charitable contributions of less than entire interests in property are denied unless otherwise permitted under section 170 for gifts in trust (i.e., under the annuity or unitrust provisions in section 170(b)(1)(H) (line 17, p. 114) or section 170(h) (line 15, p. 127). The effect may be to deny contribution deductions for outright gifts of undivided interests in property as well as of legal life estates or remainders unless all other interests in the property also are contributed.

The provision is effective for contributions made after April 22, 1969. This is unwarranted, particularly since the Treasury's proposals issued on April 22 gave no indication of the breadth of disallowances caused by the proposal.

Bill pp. 122–125, § 201(c)(1) [IRC new § 170(e) and § 83]

Charitable Contributions of Appreciated Property

1. If the abuse sought to be corrected by this section occurs primarily in connection with charitable contributions of ordinary income property, such as inventory, it should be noted that section 83 requires recognition of gain in a number of situations not falling within the area of such abuse. For example, the recognition requirement would apply to gifts of works of art, even to public museums. Further, application of the proposed general rule to future interests of all types of property produces an effect that goes far beyond eliminating the most flagrant means of avoiding taxes. It is suggested that section 170(e) apply solely to gifts of ordinary income property.

2. We have the following comments regarding the proposed statutory language of these sections.

It is noted that section 170(e)(3)(B) (p. 124, line 15), requires distribution of all gifts of appreciated property. This will mean, as a practical matter, that a private foundation subject to this requirement will have to make corpus distributions in an amount equal to 100 percent of all contributions of property received. Neither the bill nor the House report indicates how the 100 percent is to be determined vis-a-vis increases or decreases in value of the contributed property between the dates of contribution and distribution.

The intent of section 83(b) (p. 126, lines 2 and 3) is unclear. We suggest that the reference to "section 170(e)(1)" in line 2 should be to "section 170(e)(3)." In proposed section 170(e)(3)(B) (p. 124, line 10), "first year" should read "first taxable year."

Bargain Sales to Charitable Organizations

There seems to be no valid reason to differentiate between bargain sales to charities and bargain sales to other donees. Where the donor is willing to make a gift to charity of the difference between the fair market value and the purchase price, he should receive the full tax benefit. For example, taxpayer A gives securities worth $50 with a basis of zero. He receives a deduction for the entire $50 and has no recognizable gain, assuming new section 170(e) does not apply, and he would not be required to include any amount as income. On the other hand, if taxpayer B sells property to a charity at his cost of $50 at a time when it is worth $100 he would have a $50 charitable deduction and would also be required to report $25 of gain. We believe such a distinction in tax treatment is not justified.

In any event, it should be made clear to what extent, if any, the portion of the bargain sale treated as a gift falls within the ambit of section 170(b)(1)(J) (applying a 30 percent limitation on contributions of appreciated property) and section 170(e) (p. 122, line 25) (relating to contributions of appreciated property). It would appear that the rules of those sections would be applicable to the gift portion of the sale.

Bill pp. 127–128, 135–137, § 201(e) and § 201(i) [IRC new § 170(h) and § 664]

Charitable Remainder Trusts

The basis for these provisions, the argument that the value of the remainder can be wiped out, is questionable because: (i) trustees are bound by state law to protect the remainderman's interest, (ii) State attorneys-general increasingly exercise supervision, (iii) the remainder man itself can protect its interest, and (iv) even with a unitrust or annuity the remainder could be destroyed by bad investment.[1]

1. The provisions of this section are applicable to transfers in trust made after April 22, 1969, but the provisions of section 664 defining "charitable remainder annuity trusts" and "charitable remainder unitrusts" are not effective except with respect to transfers in trust made after date of enactment of the bill. This would appear to create a hiatus between April 22, 1969, and the date of enactment of the bill. The difference in effective dates also creates a severe problem for draftsmen during this interim period since even if the effective date provisions were to be modified so as to permit a deduction for the gift of a remainder interest to a trust which would otherwise qualify under section 664, if made after April 22, 1969, and prior to date of enactment, such a trust would probably not qualify for unlimited deduction of amounts set aside permanently for charitable purposes under section 642(c) of the existing law.

2. The retroactive date of April 22, 1969, is inequitable. The bill goes beyond the proposals submitted by the Treasury to the House Ways and Means Committee on that date. Donors, on April 22, 1969, were not put on notice of the requirements for obtaining a charitable deduction with respect to contributions of remainder interests. It is quite likely that many charitable remainder trusts have been established after April 22, 1969, in ignorance of the proposed new rules.

Charitable Contributions by Estates and Trusts

The proposed amendment to section 642(c) is consistent with the other proposals contained in section 201. However, we suggest that transitional rules be added to cover existing trusts and estates, the governing instruments of which were presumably drafted without reference to the unitrust or annuity trust concept. We also suggest that consideration be given to adding a provision for reformation of instruments if possible, as well a provision to have cases where the executor or trustee would make a current payment to charity, but for circumstances beyond his control, such as uncertainty as to the identity of the charity and charitable beneficiary or as to amounts available for payment because of obligations chargeable to gross income.

It is also suggested that the words "trustee" and "administrator" used in line 21, page 28 of the bill be changed to "fiduciary." The latter term is defined in section 7701(a)(6) as including "executor" as well as administrator and trustee.

Bill pp. 130–135, § 201(h) [IRC amended § 2055 and § 2522]

Estate and Gift Tax Deductions for Income Interests, Charitable Remainders or Other Partial Interests in Property

We see no reason why either a charitable income interest or a chariatble remainder after a normal life estate should not continue to be allowed as an estate or gift tax deduction. Aside from an outright transfer, such a remainder is the most common form of charitable bequest or gift. This garden variety of trust is customarily used by testators or creators of lifetime trusts who desire to leave all or a substantial portion of their estates to charity after making provision through life estates for one or more relatives (such as a surviving wife, sister, or unmarried daughter). This form of bequest predates the tax laws and, in our experience, has not been the subject of tax abuse.

The House report, part 1, pp. 58–59, describes two situations in which contributions deductions have been allowed for income tax purposes for gifts of trust remainder interests even though it was not probable that the gift would ultimately be received by the charity.[1] However, the report concedes that the contributions deductions "would not have been allowed in these situations if the probability of the charity receiving the specified interest were determined under the rules presently applied in the case of the estate tax." Therefore, the two examples cited in the report furnish no reason for changing the estate or gift tax law in this area.

The Internal Revenue Service and the courts have, in fact, carefully policed the estate and gift tax charitable deductions for income remainder or other partial interests in property. The value of the charitable interest is deductible only insofar as that interest is ascertainable at the time of death, and, hence, severable from the noncharitable interest by actuarial or other recognized techniques. Treas. Reg. § 20.2055–2(a). No deduction is allowable for a charitable transfer which is dependent on the performance of some act or the happening of some event unless the possibility that the charitable transfer will not become effective is so remote as to be negligible. Treas. Reg. § 20.2055–2(b). The taxpayer has the burden of proving that, under these tests, the charitable interest is severable and not subject to defeat.

The proposed legislation makes no allowance for the often legitimate desire of the testator or settlor to make principal available to his wife or other income beneficiary in the event of future need or emergency. Powers to invade for emergency needs are extra precautions for the security of the income beneficiary, and are neither intended nor administered as devices to defeat the interest of the charitable beneficiary or remainderman. Under present law the charitable remainder is deductible if the executor can show that the power of invasion is subject to an ascertainable standard and that, by application of that standard, the possibility of invasion is sufficiently remote to be disregarded. The rules in this area have been developed in a solid body of decisional law. They are not the subject of abuse, and there is no good reason for discarding them.

The House report, part 1, pp. 58–59, questions the accuracy of the tables prescribed by the estate and gift tax regulations for valuation of remainders and other actuarial interests. These tables, adopted in 1952,[2] are based upon a mortality table derived from the 1940 census[3] and interest at the rate of 3½ percent a year, compounded annually. Valuation of actuarial interests is, of course, an exercise in prediction, as to both mortality and interest yield. Nevertheless, it is a generally accepted—indeed, indispensable—valuation technique. We note that the House report contemplates the continued use of the present tables in valuing charitable remainders of annuity trusts and unitrusts.

Life abounds in contingencies. The estate and gift taxes are founded on the principle that tax collection—like much other human activity—cannot await their resolution. These taxes are based upon valuations existing at the time of death or of gift. The actuarial art is an accepted element of this valuation process. It is used to separate complete from incomplete gifts, to value interests in property owned by the decedent, to measure reversionary interests in transfers made during life, to determine the marital deduction for remainder interests, and to measure the charitable deduction for remainders and other limited interests. Similar tables used by insurance companies in connection with the sale of commercial annuities and life insurance policies also govern the valuation of such properties for gift and estate tax purposes. There does not appear to be any indication that the use of actuarial methods of valuation in the charitable deduction area has been the subject of manipulation or that it has produced results that justify the radical legislative change proposed in the bill.

[3] Table 38, United States Life Tables and Actuarial Tables 1939–1941, U.S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of Census.

Even if we assume arguendo that allowance of estate and gift tax deductions determined by actuarial means should be circumscribed because charity may receive less than the actuarial forecast, we still find the proposed legislative classification unsatisfactory. One of the two types of trusts the bill would permit to qualify for the deduction, the annuity trust, is more of a "gambler's device" than the bulk of the trusts that the bill would disqualify. In the traditional trust to pay the income to an individual for life with remainder to charity, the charitable remainderman is assured of the trust principal, subject only to the prospect of its appreciation or depreciation in value and the prospect that the life beneficiary may outlive or predecease the predicted year of mortality for a person of his age. In contrast, an annuitant may exhaust the trust, so that charity would receive nothing although the bill would grant a substantial charitable deduction.[1] In our judgment the proposed statutory classification is not a sound one.

Congress should not arbitrarily restrict the estate and gift tax charitable deductions to two limited and novel forms of charitable remainder trusts. It would be unreasonable to force testators and settlors into the defined annuity or unitrust arrangements. To require the use of such arrangements would be unwise because of their lack of flexibility. The proposed legislation is overly rigid and unduly restrictive and should not be enacted.

If sections 2055(e)(2) and 2522(c)(2) are enacted, consideration should be given to the following matters as they would affect charitable remainders:

a. The proposed definitions of a charitable remainder annuity trust and of a charitable remainder unitrust (Bill p. 136, line 16 through p. 137, line 15) would not permit a charitable deduction for the transfer to charity of an undivided fraction of a trust remainder, of a remainder in specific trust assets, of a charitable cash legacy out of a remainder, or of a charitable remainder subject to a private cash legacy. The definitions qualify a charitable remainder for deduction only if the entire remainder interest in the trust passes to charity. It is not unusual for a testator to divide a trust remainder into fractions for charitable and private remaindermen, or to charge small specific private legacies against an otherwise charitable remainder. There is no reason to deny deduction of whatever interest charity has in the remainder.

b. The definition of a charitable remainder annuity trust or unitrust would also eliminate any deduction for the charitable remainder of a trust, the income of which may, in the trustee's discretion, be distributed to a private individual, applied to his support, or accumulated. This type of trust may serve useful and important purposes where the income beneficiary is a minor, an incompetent, a person who is under a physical or mental disability, a spendthrift, or a person whose needs are so variable that predetermined fixed distributions would be unsatisfactory. We see no justification for penalizing the granting of such discretion to the trustee.

c. The proposed legislation would deny any estate tax charitable deduction for a charitable remainder following a legal life estate. Bequests of this variety are commonly used in some States, particularly for real estate or tangible personal property. It is also not unusual to designate a charity as the last taker under a life insurance setlement option or a commercial annuity contract. These charitable future interests do not lend themselves to the proposed annuity trust or unitrust treatment. They involve no element of tax avoidance and should remain eligible for the charitable deduction.

d. A trust my give a charity and a private beneficiary fixed shares of both the trust income and principal, the purpose generally being to avoid the extra expense and inconvenience of creating and administering separate trusts. An undivided interest in property may also be bequeathed or devised outright to charity. The proposed legislation would, for no good reason, disallow any deduction for charity's undivided interest in such a trust, bequest or devise.

e. The definitions of a charitable remainder annuity trust and of a charitable remainder unitrust are too rigid in requiring that the payments to the private beneficiary be either for a term of years or for life. Charitable trust remainders may vest upon other events. For example, alimony trusts sometimes provide that the trust shall terminate in favor of charity upon the wife's death or remarriage. A deduction is now allowable for the charitable remainder (computed as though the wife's interest were a full life estate). The bill would deny that deduction.

[1] Under present law the courts have disagreed over the allowability of an estate tax charitable deduction for the charitable remainder of a trust following a private annuity where there is a significant possibility of exhaustion of the trust principal. Cases disallowing the deduction: Moffett's Estate v. Comm'r., 269 F.2d 738 (4th Cir. 1959); Florida Nat'l Bank v. United States, 1962-2 U.S.T.C. ¶ 12,082 (S.D. Fla. 1962). Cases allowing the deduction: Schildkraut's Estate v. Comm'r., 368 F.2d 40 (2d Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 386 U.S. 959; Estate of Helen Stow Duker, 18 T.C. 887 (1952).

f. The application of the definitions of a charitable remainder annuity trust and of a charitable remainder unitrust to the following three situations seem uncertain or unsatisfactory: (a) A testator (or the creator of an inter vivos trust) creates a trust for the joint lives of two individual beneficiaries with remainder to charity. (b) The creator of an inter vivos trust reserves the initial beneficial interest for life, gives his wife a second beneficial interest for life, and leaves the remainder to charity. (c) The creator of an inter vivos trust reserves a beneficial interest for life with remainder to charity. Situation (a) could not apparently qualify under the definition (which apparently permits only one life tenant); situation (b) could apparently qualify for estate tax purposes upon the creator's death but not for gift tax purposes initially; situation (c) would apparently not be subjected to annuity trust or unitrust treatment for gift tax purposes (since no interest passed from the decedent to a private person, as required at Bill p. 131, line 16, et seq.). Further thought should be given to the classification of these situations.

g. The proposed legislation would severely limit the types of assets that could be bequeathed or devised to, or invested in by, trusts with charitable remainders. Residences, jewelry, assets with low or fluctuating income and poor liquidity or marketability, and assets not having readily ascertainable fair market values would, for one reason or another, not easily be adaptable to annuity trust or unitrust treatment. This is another example of the undue rigidity of the legislative approach.

h. The proposed section 2055(e)(2) is in conflict with existing section 2055(b)(2), which specifically qualifies for the charitable deduction one type of trust having a private income beneficiary and a charitable remainderman. It is not clear which of these two conflicting statutory provisions is intended to override the other.

i. As is noted in the footnote on page 28, the courts have disagreed over the allowability of a charitable deduction under present law for the remainder of an annuity trust where there is a significant possibility that the annuitant may consume the trust principal. It is not clear whether the court decisions disallowing such deductions are intended to be overridden by the proposed legislation. Is the legislation intended to qualify for the charitable deduction remainders of annuity trusts that may not qualify under existing court decisions, or does it simply add a new limitation to thost now in effect?

j. The proposed definitions of a charitable remainder annuity trust and of a charitable remainder unitrust provide that the trust remainder must go to or for an organization or use described in section 170(c). (Bill p. 137, lines 1 and 14.) Section 170(c) describes the organizations to or for the use of which contributions deductible for income tax purposes can be made. There is an additional category of organizations to or for the use of which transfers deductible for estate and gift tax purposes can be made. These are religious, charitable, scientific, literary or educational corporations, trusts, etc., created or organized outside of the United States. (Compare sections 2055(a)(2) and 2522(a)(2) with section 170(c)(2).) Since outright gifts and bequests to or for the use of such organizations are deductible, there is no reason to circumscribe deduction or remainders more narrowly.

The estate tax amendments under discussion would apply to all decedents dying after the date of enactment of the bill and the gift tax amendments to all gifts made after April 22, 1969. These effective dates will cause a great deal of hardship and confusion. All existing wills and trusts of living persons will have to be reviewed and, if found to contain charitable remainder or income trusts or legal estates, will have to be changed, if possible. This will be a time-consuming task. Irrevocable or unamendable trusts cannot be changed, nor can the wills of testators who have lost their testamentary capacity or who die before the review of their wills can be completed. If these provisions are to be enacted, a substantial period of grace should be provided, as well as relief for existing irrevocable or unamendable trusts and existing wills of testators under disability.

Gain from Disposition of Property Used in Farming Where Farm Losses Offset Nonfarm Income

Under present law, a taxpayer engaged in farming is allowed to deduct in the year expended many of the costs of farming which in other trades or businesses would be treated as capital items recoverable only through depreciation or as a return of capital upon the sale of the property. This tax advantage increases, of course, with the tax bracket of the taxpayer.

1. The new section would modify the potential tax advantage under present law by requiring the taxpayer engaged in farming operations (with certain limitations) to maintain a bookkeeping record of his farming operations known as the excess deductions account, the purpose of which is to recapture farm losses on the sale or other disposition of farm property, gain from which under present law is taxable as long-term capital gain. In applicable cases, this would remove, or reduce, the tax advantage under present law of deducting costs against ordinary income and taxing the gain at capital gain rates.

We are not convinced that the problem which the section seeks to correct is sufficiently great to justify such complex legislation; but, if it is, then the approach reflected by the section is more acceptable than attempts to deal with it by other means, such as tampering with the timing of losses and gains as proposed in earlier legislative drafts in this area.

2. There are several technical features of the section which deserve comment. Since as to farm land there is a 5-year recapture rule, there should also be a limit on the recapture period for other farm property. A ten-year period would seem adequate.

An unintended effect of the section in the case of a taxpayer who uses an inventory method of accounting for his livestock, but elects to expense the costs incurred in clearing land or for water and land conservation, is to subject such taxpayer to the provisions of section 1251(b)(4)(A) with respect to his livestock dispositions. After five years such land expenses are not included in computing the amount of recapture on the sale of land under section 1251(e)(5).

Section 1251(e)(4)(B) provides for the aggregating of all farm businesses into one business, apparently to determine whether a taxpayer comes within the exceptions of sections 1251(b)(2) and 1251(b)(4). However, as written, it applies to all of section 1251 and, for example, in the case of a taxpayer who first engaged in ranching and lost money and then engaged in the orchard business and made money, would prevent him from offsetting the loss against the gain. There is no apparent reason for this result, and the section should be modified accordingly.

With respect to the excess deduction account, it is clear in section 1251(b) that farm income in the second year will offset a farm loss in the first year, but it is not apparent that the reverse is true. This point should be clarified.

Section 1251(d)(6), relating to transfers to controlled corporations, appears to have an inadvertent omission in not including "securities" as well as "stock" as "farm recapture property." As written, it might permit a taxpayer to transfer farm recapture property to a controlled corporation for stock and securities and then dispose of the securities and realize capital gain.

Gain realized by a taxpayer on farm recapture property which would be taxed as ordinary income under section 1245(a), as amended by section 212, should be applied to reduce the excess deduction account. Apparently this would not be the case under section 1251(e)(2). As long as ordinary income equals ordinary losses, section 1251 should have no application.

Bill pp. 152–153, § 212 [IRC amended §§ 1245(a)(2), 1245(a)(3), and 1231(b)(3)]

Livestock

This section would subject livestock acquired by purchase to the same recapture provisions now applicable to other tangible depreciable personal property. Technically, the section presents one problem of importance to farmers.

At present, section 1231(b)(3) provides that livestock held for draft, breeding, or dairy purposes and held by the taxpayer for 12 months qualifies as section 1231 property, the net annual gain from which is capital gain, while the net annual losses are ordinary losses.

Section 212(b) of the bill would delay the start of the holding period until the time at which the animal would normally be used for one of the specified purposes. The stated purpose is more readily to distinguish between animals held for one of the specified purposes and those held for sale. As to hogs (and possibly some other animals), this requirement would result in an inadvertent inequity. An older sow will become so fat and expensive to feed that at the end of the delayed holding period she would have little economic or market value.

This difficulty may be solved by adopting an "actual use" test rather than a mere holding period requirement. Thus, the first sentence of section 1231(b)(3) might be amended to read:

> "Such term includes livestock which has been held by the taxpayer for 12 months and which during such period has been actually used for a period of six months by the taxpayer for draft, breeding, sporting, or dairy purposes."

SEC. 213. HOBBY LOSSES

Bill pp. 153–154, § 213 [IRC, amended § 270]

Hobby Losses

The proposed amendment to section 270 appears to contain so many technical deficiencies that we suggest that consideration be given to a complete redraft.

a. Although labeled as dealing with "hobby losses," section 213 of the bill is much broader. Under the proposal, section 270 would be amended to apply not only to the traditional "hobby" but also to the normal profit seeking business and investment activities, including real estate operations, equipment leasing and oil and gas development and exploration.

b. The amendment to section 270 is not confined to losses incurred by individuals. The change in the caption of the section from "Limitation on Deductions Allowable to Individuals in Certain Cases" to "Limitation on Deductions in Certain Cases" confirms this despite the fact that the proposal is contained in Title III (Other Adjustments Primarily Affecting Individuals) of the bill.

The House report, part 1, p. 71 on the other hand, contains repeated references to activities carried on by an individual. This suggests that the section may have inadvertently been drafted more broadly than was intended.

c. In its present form, the proposal would extend to any business which incurred deductions in excess of gross income more than $25,000 for any three of five consecutive years. If such losses occurred, the taxpayer would be required to rebut the statutory presumption that the business was not carried on with a "reasonable expectation of realizing a profit." Difficulties abound in determining what is a "reasonable expectation of profit." Would this rule preclude the losses of a high risk venture where the potential profit is substantial? Obviously, a slight chance of success might be reasonable where the potential profit is great.

d. The proposed new rules relate to the allowance of "Items attributable to an activity." "Items" is not a defined term. If it is not synonymous with deductions, it should be defined. If it is, "deductions" should be substituted for "items."

Furthermore, the term "activity" is not defined. Clearly, an "activity" would include an entire trade or business. Would it possibly include part of a trade or business? Would it include investment activities as well as personal transactions (for example, nonbusiness loans).

e. The proposal fails to indicate what "deductions" are attributable to an "activity." This deficiency could create problems.

f. The proposed section also fails to indicate whether it will be applied retroactively to the three years in which the excess losses occur or whether it applies only prospectively.

g. The proposal could result in a denial of business losses against future income from the same business. At least, in such a case, the taxpayer could be faced with the necessity of proving that the business was being carried on with a reasonable expectation of profit.

Subtitle C—Interest

SEC. 221. INTEREST

Bill pp. 154–158, § 221 [IRC new § 163(d)]

Limitations of Interest and Investment Indebtedness

1. The statutory provisions do not make clear the order in which the three limitations ($25,000; net investment income; and long-term capital gains) are applied against the investment interest. The technical explanation indicates that the order is: first, $25,000, second, net investment income, and, finally, capital gains. The order of application is important since it affects the amount of the deduction and the consequent amount of the tax. This is especially significant if the ordinary income generated by sections 1245 and 1250 is also added to the list. Because of its importance, the order of application should be spelled out in the statute. Section 221(b) provides that the deduction for capital gains shall not exceed the sum of the net short-term capital loss and the amount of the investment interest allowable as a deduction under section 163(d)(1)(C). It should be made clear that the application of investment interest against long-term capital gains is applicable only after first applying the available investment interest deduction against the $25,000 allowance and the amount of the net investment income. The phrase "succeeding taxable year" in section 163(d)(2) should be changed to "succeeding taxable years."

2. The special rule in new section 162(d)(4)(C) provides that expenses allowable under section 162 must exceed 15 percent of rental income, or such income will be considered as investment income and not income from the conduct of a trade or business. There are undoubtedly many real estate investment situations which would constitute the actual conduct of a trade or business but which have deductions allowable under section 162 of less than 15 percent of gross rental income. In computing such expenses the reasonable compensation of a proprietor for his services should be allowed as part of the expenses for purposes of computing the 15 percent.

3. In the definition of rents (section 163(d)(4)(C)) the references to a guarantee of a specified return or a guarantee in whole or in part against loss of income should be made more specific. Every lease pursuant to which a tenant is personally liable is a guarantee of the rent and indirectly a specified return of income. Where the lease contains escalation provisions it is arguable that there is a guarantee against loss of income or a guarantee of a specified return.

4. It should be made clear that a trade or business exists during the period of the construction of a building, which when completed will be operated as a trade or business, so that the interest expense prior to the receipt of rental income will be deductible.

Bill pp. 158–165, § 231 [IRC amended § 217(a) and new § 82]

Deduction for Moving Expenses

1. Consideration might be given to the substitution of a "reasonable expenses" limitation for subparagraphs (C) and (D), such as that presently imposed (and to be continued) in the case of the expenses described in subparagraphs (A) and (B) of section 217(b)(1). There is no reason to assume that taxpayers would incur unwarranted expenses under subparagraphs (C) and (D) to any greater extent than under subparagraphs (A) and (B). In all four cases only actual out-of-pocket expenses will qualify for the deduction, and, in the case of taxpayers receiving reimbursements from their employers, the additional element of employer review provides a safeguard against abuse of this deduction.

2. Both present law and the proposal limit the available deduction to employees and do not provide for a deduction in the case of self-employed taxpayers. It would seem that need for relief for self-employed taxpayers is equally meritorious.

3. Subsection (b) of section 231 of the bill adds a new section 82 providing for the inclusion of moving expenses in income. This may be considered necessary because of the allowance of the deduction for the offsetting expenses. However, the Ways and Means Committee, at page 77 of its general explanation (House report, part 1, p. 77), states that the reimbursement would be subject to the withholding provision of section 3401(a). This conclusion would seem to be erroneous since section 3401(a)(15) provides that remuneration paid on behalf of an employee is not subject to withholding if at the time of the payment it is reasonable to believe that a corresponding deduction is allowable under section 217. It should be made clear that there should be no withholding on the reimbursement as to which it is expected there will be an offsetting deduction by the employee.

Title III—Other Adjustments Primarily Affecting Individuals

Subtitle A—Limit on Tax Preferences and Allocation of Deductions

SEC. 301. LIMIT ON TAX PREFERENCES FOR INDIVIDUALS, ESTATES, AND TRUSTS

Bill p. 166, § 301(a) (1) [IRC new § 84(c) (1) (A)]

Charitable Contribution of Appreciated Property

This subparagraph uses a new and undefined statutory term "appreciation in the value of property." It is assumed that the amount of such "appreciation" would be measured in the usual manner for determining gain. Therefore, it is suggested that the term, "excess of fair market value over basis," be used. It is more precise and would avoid introducing a new and undefined term into the Code. Compare the manner in which the terms are used at bill p. 123, section 170(e) (1) and (2).

Bill p. 166 § 301(a) (1) [IRC new § 84(c) (1) (B)]

Accelerated Depreciation

1. In view of the revisions made in accelerated depreciation recapture in section 521 of the bill, there is considerable question whether this item continues to constitute a tax preference.

If accelerated depreciation is retained as an item of tax preference, the recapture rule under section 521 of the bill should be changed to provide for a correlative reduction of the amount recaptured as ordinary income on disposition. No language in new section 218 (providing for a mere increase in basis) has the effect of first reducing capital gains before reducing the amount taxed as ordinary income on disposition. A similar problem exists in a new section 84(c) (1) (D) but appears to have been covered by new section 1251 (b) (3) (A) at bill p. 141. Needless to say, the treatment of these items as tax preferences will extensively complicate both the preparation and the audit of tax returns.

2. The reference to "amortization" in excess of the "depreciation deduction" under section 167(b) (1) (relating to the straight line method of depreciation) could possibly be construed as making the amortization of leasehold improvements a tax preference where the lease is for a term less than the useful life of the improvement. If this result was not intended, the language should be clarified.

3. In three separate provisions, section 301, new section 84(c) (1) (B), relating to tax preferences, section 452, new section 312(m), relating to earnings and profits, and section 521, new section 1250(b) (4), relating to rehabilitation expenditures, the bill establishes requirements, in addition to present section 1250 (b) (1), that straight line depreciation be computed in respect of property on which depreciation for income tax liability purposes is computed by another method or a different life. In no two of the four provisions is the requirement exactly the same.

The concept of "straight line equivalent depreciation" presently finds use in the computation of class life required by the guideline test procedures set out in Revenue Procedure 62–21, where class life is determined by dividing the straight line depreciation into the total basis (see Rev. Proc. 62–21, Secs. 4.03 and 4.04, 1962–2 C.B. 434). The mehods for computing the required straight line equivalent depreciation are set out in Question 58 of Appendix II of the Revenue Procedure (1962–2 C.B. 480–485).

The variation in the requirements will place an undue burden on an affected taxpayer. Thus an individual who owns existing section 1250 property being depreciated in a group account under the double declining balance (DDB) or sum-of-the-years digits (SYD) method must make one computation for existing section 1250 purposes and another on an item basis for section 84 purposes. In addition, if he has elected to be tested by guideline procedures and uses the SYD method, he will be grouping assets by years of acquisition and will have to maintain a separate set of item records in order to make the necessary computations for section 84. This would appear to be true even though presumably he will be permitted to use a single group account for the section 1250 straight line computation. Furthermore, the average life used for the group computation may not be used for item computations unless the group consists of homogenous property.

It is suggested that the statement of and the rules for computation of straight line equivalent depreciation and the collateral consequences of the use thereof be uniformly stated to whatever extent is possible and that a consistent computation be indicated.

4. Section 84(c)(1)(B) is inequitable to the extent that it ignores the fact that over the greater part of the useful life of the individual property, straight line depreciation inevitably exceeds SYD or DDB depreciation in any given year. It seems only fair that such excess be treated as a negative tax preference which would reduce (but not below zero) the amount of disallowed tax preferences.

Adjustments for Disallowed Tax Preferences

Because of the progressive tax rates, it will be possible for a taxpayer to realize a greater tax reduction in one or more of the five carryover years than the increase in tax attributable to inclusion of disallowed tax preferences in gross income in the earlier taxable year. Conversely, a taxpayer having an amount of other taxable income in the later year less than the disallowed tax preference carried forward would receive a tax reduction in the later year significantly lower than the effective tax cost of the disallowed tax preference. In some cases the income averaging provisions of the Code would reduce the effective rate of the tax reduction attributable to the carryover adjustment below the effective tax cost of the disallowed tax preference in the earlier taxable year, but this would not be true in all situations.

This problem could be avoided in large part by providing that the carryover, instead of giving rise to a deduction, would give rise to a credit for taxes paid in the later year equivalent to the amount by which the preference year's tax was increased by reason of the amount for which the bill now would allow a deduction. The suggested procedure would be similar to that now provided in section 1341(a)(5).

Allocation of Deductions

The enactment of section 302 would adversely affect thousands of taxpayers, since the time-consuming adjustments called for by section 302 would apply, or figures would have to be assembled to determine whether they would apply, every year. Almost none of the figures necessary to make the adjustments required by section 302 are items already required to be shown on a tax return. They are largely items which, apart from section 302, would never have to be computed by the taxpayer (except in instances covered by section 301 of the bill, and some of the "preferences" described in section 302 are not included under section 301). In view of the universal desire for simplification of the tax laws, the desirability of a provision which will substantially complicate the return and recordkeeping requirements of a large number of taxpayers appears to be open to question.

For example, all taxpayers who may become subject to section 302 will have to keep records of all their income from tax-exempt municipal bonds. The additional computations and recordkeeping required under section 302 with respect to intangible drilling expenses, straight line depreciation, cost depletion, and the keeping of a separate set of farm books using the inventory method of accounting (including the taking of a beginning and ending inventory each year) introduce further complexities. As an example, in order to calculate for any year the amount of accelerated depreciation in excess of straight line depreciation (or, in the case of oil and gas wells, the amount of straight line depreciation which would have been allowed if the taxpayer had elected to capitalize intangible drilling expenses), the taxpayer will have to make a separate determination of the salvage value of each item (a determination which is not necessary under the 200 percent declining balance method) and if there has at any time been a change in useful life, he will have to recalculate straight line depreciation on a year-by-year basis from the time of his original acquisition of the property in question. Similarly, to determine the excess of percentage depletion over cost depletion, the taxpayer will have to determine the units of the natural resource extracted and sold during the year as well as the reserves at the beginning of the year. Reserves must be determined by an engineering report which must be updated to reflect changes affecting the estimate of reserves.

It is evident, therefore, that section 302 would require a number of exceedingly complicated computations and tax return entries (never heretofore required) to be made by a large number of taxpayers, and would entail additional work by the Service in auditing, checking, and reviewing such additional computations and the evidence necessary to verify them. It would be a step in the opposite direction from the objective of tax and reporting simplification which much of the bill (particularly the proposed increase in the standard deduction) was designed to accomplish.

Allocation of Deductions—Application to Estates and Trusts

The heading of section 277 would indicate that it applies only to individuals, although the language of the section makes it applicable to any taxpayer other than a corporation, and the House report, part 1, p. 81, indicates that it was also intended to apply to estates and trusts. It is suggested that the heading be revised so that it is not misleading.

The application of the allocation provisions to estates and trusts is not clear. For example, assume that a simple trust has income and expenses as follows:

Dividends	$10,000
Tax-exempt interest	5,000
Capital gains	25,000
State income taxes	1,000
Actual distribution ($15,000—$1,000)	14,000

The Section 277 fraction would seem to be computed as follows:

Numerator:
Tax-exempt interest	$5,000
Capital gains deduction	12,500
Total	17,500
Less: excluded	10,000
"Allowable tax preferences"	7,500
Denominator:
Dividends	10,000
Taxable half of capital gain	12,500
Total	22,500
Less state income taxes	1,000
Distribution deduction	9,000
Total	10,000
Taxable income (without regard to § 277)	12,500
Add back State taxes	1,000
"Modified adjusted gross income"	13,500
Add "Allowable tax preferences"	7,500
Total	21,000
Section 277 fraction ($7,500÷$21,000) (percent)	35.7
Disallowed deduction for tax (35.7 percent×$1,000)	$357

The effect on the taxable income of the trust and the beneficiary would seem to be as follows:

Recomputed taxable income of trust:
Dividends	$10,000
Taxable half of capital gain	12,500
Total	22,500
Less allowable State income taxes	643
Total	21,857
Less: Distribution deduction
Ordinary income	10,000
Allowable deduction	643
Total	9,357
Taxable income of trust	12,500
Taxable income of beneficiary	9,357
Nontaxable income of beneficiary	4,643
Total distribution	$14,000

However, further clarification of the impact of section 277 on present sections 651 and 661 would appear to be desirable. The computations are even more confusing in the case of a complex trust or an estate.

Bill p. 173, § 302(a) [IRC new § 277(c) (1) (A) (i)]

Allocable Expenses—Interest

It seems improper to disallow deduction of interest payments under section 265 of the Code because they are related to tax-exempt interest received and at the same time to allocate some of the taxpayer's other interest payments in part to the same tax-exempt interest. If section 277 is enacted, section 265 should be repealed or the numerator of the "Section 277 Fraction" (section 277(b)) should exclude the tax-exempt interest which results in a section 265 adjustment at least to the extent of the section 265 disallowance. Furthermore, interest that is specifically attributable to carrying income-producing property should be excluded from the numerator of the "Section 277 Fraction" just as interest paid or incurred in the conduct of a trade or business is excluded under proposed section 277(c) (1) (B).

Bill p. 174, § 302(a) [IRC new § 277(c) (1) (A) (ii) and § 277(c) (1) (B)]

Allocable Expenses—Taxes

These provisions define allocable expenses to include taxes except taxes paid or incurred in the conduct of a trade or business. We believe it is improper to allocate any taxes which are incurred on taxable income, such as compensation or taxable investment income, or which are imposed on income-producing property, between taxable and tax-exempt income. These are deductions which in fact are economically attributable entirely to taxable income and are a cost of realizing the taxable form of income, as is already recognized in the exception proposed in section 277(a) (1) (B) relating to taxes incurred in the conduct of a trade or business. It is submitted that section 277(c) (1) (B) should be expanded to except from the definition of allocable expenses taxes paid or incurred on taxable income or on income-producing property.

Bill p. 174, § 302(a) [IRC new § 277(c) (1) (A) (iv)]

Allocable Expenses—Charitable Contributions

The inclusion of charitable contributions in the list of allocable expenses presents a serious policy question. Under this provision an individual who has tax-exempt income would receive a lesser tax benefit from an identical charitable contribution than an individual who has no tax-exempt income.

The classes of organizations most seriously affected by this provision would be those charitable and educational institutions dependent primarily for their support on medium and large-sized gifts from individuals who measure their gifts by their "after-tax" cost. Thus while other types of "allocable expenses" are for the most part involuntary payments and their amount should not be appreciably affected by enactment of section 302, charitable contributions are by their very nature voluntary. The amount of charitable giving above the $1,000 level depends largely on the tax effect of such giving. Recognition of the impact of this on private colleges, hospitals, etc. resulted in a narrowing of the scope of section 201(c) and (d) of the bill (taxing charitable contributions of appreciated property) to the point where it will apply to only a small percentage of such contributions. However, section 302 is not similarly restricted and partially disallows the charitable deductions in question in all cases where such unrealized appreciation (plus other forms of exempt income and preferences described in section 302) exceeds $10,000. The inclusion of charitable deductions in "allocable expenses" under section 302 will undoubtedly cause many individuals who have previously made substantial charitable gifts of appreciated property to stop making such gifts.

Allowable Tax Preferences—Charitable Contributions

The possibility of a circular computation under this section has already been noted in our discussion of pages 119–120 of the bill.

Bill pp. 175–176, § 302(a) [IRC new § 277(c)(2)(B)]

Interest on Certain Governmental Obligations

Exempt interest for purposes of section 302 of the bill is to be taken into account only with respect to obligations issued after July 12, 1969. However, as stated in the introduction to this Report, the Section of Taxation is opposed to the retroactive application of tax legislation, and, therefore, if this provision is accepted on policy grounds, it is submitted that the change should apply only to obligations issued after the date of enactment.

Bill p. 176, § 302(a) [IRC new § 277(c)(2)(C)]

Depletion and Intangible Drilling and Development Costs

Computation of cost depletion requires an estimate of recoverable reserves. It is believed that many of the larger operators and practically all of the smaller operators claim percentage depletion. This section will require all such individual taxpayers also to compute cost depletion with the attendant engineering expenses.

It is suggested that this burden be removed by giving the taxpayer an option to compute cost depletion or amortize his costs over a 10-year period. This would achieve the objective of the bill while relieving the taxpayer of an expensive cost depletion computation.

Substitute B—Income Averaging

SEC. 311. INCOME AVERAGING

Bill pp. 180–181, § 311 [IRC amended §§ 1301, 1302, 1303 and 6511]

Income Averaging

This provision appreciably extends the benefit of the income averaging provisions and simplifies their operation. Perhaps more should be done to reduce the inequities between taxpayers with level and taxpayers with fluctuating incomes. Consideration might be given to permitting averaging the excess over 100 percent of average base period taxable income, provided the $3,000 test is met.

In the interest of clarity the reference "(relating to penalties applicable to certain amounts received by owner employees)," should be inserted after "section 72(m)(5)" in line 24, bill p. 180.

Subtitle—C Restricted Property

SEC. 321 RESTRICTED PROPERTY

Bill pp. 185–188, § 321(a) [IRC new § 85]

Restricted Property

Under this provision a person receiving restricted property for services becomes taxable when his beneficial interest is transferable even though still subject to forfeiture. Furthermore, he is taxed at full market value determined without giving effect to the forfeiture provision or any other provision which will lapse. Thus a person could be taxed at full value on property which he has not yet earned and may have to forfeit, even though he could dispose of it only at a substantial discount. It is suggested that an employee be made taxable prior to termination of forfeitability only if he transfers the property to an unrelated third party and then only to the extent of the consideration received. This inequity in the proposed provision can be avoided by drawing the contract so as to restrict transferability until the rights become nonforfeitable. Hence the provision serves only as a trap for the unwary.

The key reference in the proposed new section is to the "transfer" of stock. Presumably "transfer" is intended to refer to the point at which a taxpayer obtains equitable title to shares, not when legal title passes (i.e., issuance of the certificates). This is the current rule for determining the holding period for purposes of calculating long-term gain. The legislative intent would be more clearly expressed by substituting "acquired by" for "transferred to" in line 11, bill p. 185, and the word "acquired" for "transferred" in lines 6 and 7, bill p. 188.

Even with these changes the proposed amendment raises serious problems for a closely held corporation. Such a corporation must often offer one or more key employees a greater equity interest than can be made available through a qualified stock option plan, but because of the practical problems involved in the disposition of stock by minority stockholders can do so only with substantial restrictions on transferability of the stock. The bill will expose such employees to the receipt of substantial amounts of ordinary income in one year.

The application of the proposed rules would appear to be unfair where the restrictions have a business purpose and the parties have in good faith fixed the fair market value at which the stock was sold to the employee. It is suggested that a provision be included similar to that appearing in section 422(c)(1).

Bill p. 188, § 321(a) [IRC new § 85(f)]

Transition Rules

There is a conflict between the effective date in section 321(d), "the date of enactment of this Act," and the June 30, 1969 date in the transition rules of proposed section 85(f). We submit that sound legislative policy would not make the new provisions applicable to transfers prior to the date of enactment.

Section 85(f)(3) establishes an effective date applicable to property transferred after February 1, 1970, if pursuant to a plan adopted and approved before July 1, 1969. This is apparently to enable taxpayers to make a distribution of restricted stock for the calendar year 1969 under the old rules. This intention could easily be frustrated because of administrative or clerical inability to make the transfers within one month after the close of calendar year 1969. It is suggested, therefore, that this date be extended to April 1, 1970.

Further, section 85(f) operates in an unfairly retroactive manner. Prior to the proposal of the bill, the Internal Revenue Service had announced its intention to change the tax treatment of restricted stock. Amended regulations were to go into effect in November 1968. The Service changed the effective date of the regulations to July 1, 1969, thereby permitting taxpayers who were "granted" options for restricted stock on or before June 30, 1969, to treat their income in the manner provided by the old rules. The new legislation has turned back the clock and has made April 22, 1969, the cutoff date, unless an option is both "granted" before July 1, 1969 and exercised before February 1, 1970.

Furthermore, relying on provisions of the existing regulations for statutory stock options taxpayers have assumed that they could, by analogy to the provisions of section 425(i) or Treasury regulations § 1.421-7(c), treat options as "granted" when action was completed by the Board of Directors and were not required to wait until shareholder approval to treat the options as "granted."

The House report, part 1, p. 89, indicates that, if shareholder approval is required by state law to make the options effective, such shareholder approval must also have occurred before July 1, 1969, in order for the option to be treated as "granted" before that date. Such a requirement will unduly penalize taxpayers who obtained options before July 1, 1969, subject to shareholder approval, relying upon the Service assurance of the continuation of the old treatment without realizing that they would need immediate shareholder approval.

Non-exempt Trusts and Nonqualified Annuities

Under present rules relating to nonexempt trusts, the amounts payable to an employee are treated as ordinary income. This is so whether they are taxed to him at the time of contribution to the trust (if then nonforfeitable) or when distributed to him. Accordingly, there is no reason to change the rules of nonexempt trusts to preclude the possibility of converting ordinary income into capital gain. Thus the basic purpose of the restricted stock proposals is not applicable to nonexempt trusts.

Treating interests in nonexempt trusts in the same manner as restricted stock would tend to put smaller and less financially sound employers at a disadvantage. Many employers award annual bonuses which require an "earn-out" period of several additional years. Where the employer is a financially sound company and can utilize a plain contractual obligation, the employee will not receive taxable income until distributions are made. But, in the case of an employer whose financial status is not as sound and who must make contributions to a nonqualified trust in order to give his employees comparable protection, the employee would be forced, under proposed section 402(b), to pay a tax when the earn-out period ends. Thus, in the latter case, the employee is at a substantial disadvantage, unless he has other available and noncommitted funds to pay a tax prior to actual distribution from the nonexempt trust. This economic disparity would tend to help large companies obtain and retain quality management, to the corresponding disadvantage of the smaller or less financially secure companies.

The "economic benefit" theory of taxation should be sparingly used, since it demands the exaction of a tax from an employee before he has received the dollars with which to pay it. It seems proper to apply the economic benefit theory to the area of restricted stock since the employee is already the registered owner, can vote the stock, and can receive dividends on the stock. This is not the case with respect to funds held in a nonexempt trust. Why, then, apply the harsh effects of the economic benefit theory in this situation?

The corresponding question of the deduction to the employer in these situations should also be dealt with in the statute. This would require an amendment to section 404(a)(5) of the Code. The rule of Russell Manufacturing Company v. United States, 146 Ct. Cl. 833, 175 F.Supp. 159 (1959), should be adopted by statute, permitting the employer a deduction when the employee becomes taxable, even though the employee's rights were forfeitable when the contribution to the nonexempt trust was made. It would seem, however, that the employer's deduction should be limited to the amount which the employer contributed to the trust.

Subtitle D—Other Deferred Compensation

SEC. 331. DEFERRED COMPENSATION

Bill pp. 190–193, § 331(a) [IRC new § 1354]

Deferred Compensation

1. This section, which would penalize deferred compensation by taxing it, not at the rates for the year it is received, but at the higher of the rates applicable to the taxpayer in the year earned or the year received, introduces complexity into the law which is out of proportion to any "tax perference" involved.

The provision contains technical deficiencies. Read literally, the words "deferred compensation payment" could be deemed to cover any payment which is "properly attributable" to services rendered in a period prior to that in which payment is received. It could thus apply to a bonus or current profit-sharing payment, measured by profits of the year the services were rendered, but paid only after the financial results have been determined. It might also cover a retroactive pay increase. Since non-employees are embraced in the provision, it could cover the unbilled or uncollected fees of a doctor, lawyer, engineer or architect, whether or not the amount was determinable or collectible in the year the services were rendered.

In such cases, it would ordinarily be fortuitous that the income fell in a different bracket than was applicable in the year the services were rendered. To apply the section to such cases would for those who find themselves regularly in the situations mentioned, require complex calculations and adjustments every year of their active careers, and would result in always imposing the greater, never the lesser, of the taxes applicable in the two years involved each time.

There are what may be deemed borderline cases involving an element of tax planning. A professional man, anticipating a lower income year or a tax cut, may refrain from billing until after the end of a year. But that is not the classic "deferred compensation" arrangement to which the provision seems to be addressed—one that obtains for the employee or independent contractor some of the benefits of a qualified retirement plan without having to meet the requirements of section 401. House report, part 1, p. 90.

It is suggested that the bill adopt the language found in section 404(a) ("a plan deferring the receipt of such compensation") to make it clear that the foregoing cases are not embraced in the provision. Under section 404(a)(5) and its predecessor (section 23(p) of the 1939 Code), it was established that bonuses paid after the end of the year, when profits were ascertainable, were "current payments for current services rendered" and were, therefore, not "deferred compensation." Rev. Rul. 55-446, 1955-2 C.B. 531, 532; Rev. Rul. 57-88, 1957-1 C.B. 88, 89.

2. The first formula for computing the minimum tax requires substantial recordkeeping which may be an undue burden to place on a taxpayer, who may remain an employee for a considerable period of time prior to receiving deferred compensation payments.

To avoid the recordkeeping problems of the first formula, the employee is forced to use the second formula which is arbitrary and does not make allowance for non-compensatory income, such as that derived from the sale of a capital asset, in selecting the three highest years. Thus, using "taxable income" as a base for computation purposes could result in a substantially distorted application of tax bearing no relation to an employee's earned compensation.

In addition, the two formulas fail to cover the situation of the transitory employee who may not remain at a job for more than a couple of years, but yet leaves one or more of the jobs with a deferred compensation arrangement payable at age 65. The second formula will not operate in this case and if he has not kept records to apply the first formula, he will be unable to compute the "minimum" tax under section 1354. There is a further problem if the employee works for an employer for one year, receives a deferred compensation arrangement payable at age 65, terminates his employment and then, years later, again works for the same employer. Would the measuring period under the second formula include years in between with other employers?

3. The problem of income in respect of a decedent as related to deferred compensation is unresolved, as is the problem of deferred compensation paid to a widow and that of the joint tax return vs. the individual tax return.

No consideration is given to the situation where a bookkeeping investment account is used in conjunction with deferred compensation and the employee grosses a much larger payout than that originally deferred for him. The account may continue to grow when the employee is no longer employed by the employer but payout is deferred. Treatment of the excess is unclear.

Finally, section 1354(b) would seem improperly to leave to regulations the problem of determining the years of an employee's service to which his deferred compensation is attributable.

Subtitle E—Accumulation Trusts, Multiple Trusts, Etc.

SEC. 341. TREATMENT OF EXCESS DISTRIBUTIONS BY TRUSTS

Bill p. 194, § 341 [IRC amended §§ 665–668]

Accumulation Distribution from Trusts

The evil which the section seeks to remedy is the tax avoidance that results from multiple trusts created by the same grantor for substantially the same beneficiaries. Undoubtedly, other accumulation trusts have been used for tax avoidance purposes, but most of them are used for legitimate purposes, such as accumulation to avoid the necessity of court appointed guardians or conservators. In any event the revenue involved in the single accumulation trusts used for tax avoidance purposes would appear to be insignificant.

There are a number of other suggested solutions to the evil of multiple accumulation trusts that are much less complex than the proposal in the bill. These solutions do not impose unwarranted complexity on single trusts which have accumulated income over a long period of years and which involve little revenue.

The enactment of section 341 will greatly increase the complexity of taxing provisions already excessively complex. The present rule involves a five-year throwback. The complications involved in applying a statute which reaches back over a longer period of years would be much greater. The application of the throwback rule involves recomputing the tax of the beneficiary for each of the preceding years in which trust income was accumulated, taking into consideration various classes of income as well as deductions and credits and amounts which have been distributed in prior years. The proposed provisions for limited tax preferences and for allocation of deductions will not simplify these recalculations. A glance at the present Schedule J to be filed with the fiduciary income tax return on form 1041, calling for information in reference to "allocation of accumulation distributions," and the instructions on the back of the form, is sufficient to show that the present rules are exceedingly complex.

Most trusts providing for accumulation are not created because of tax considerations and have sound social purposes. The most frequent accumulation provision relates to income received during the minority of a beneficiary or during the existence of some other disability of the beneficiary. In many instances the operation of this provision will result in refunds. Certainly where a minor beneficiary has no substantial amount of other income, the trust will pay a higher tax because it has only a $100 exemption whereas the beneficiary has a $600 exemption plus at least the standard deduction. It is doubtful that the difference in tax would justify the burdensome task of attempting to recompute the tax over a long period of years.

It would be necessary for trustees, as well as individuals who are potential beneficiaries of accumuated income, to preserve their income tax returns and other records for the duration of a trust which accumulates income. In order to examine such returns properly, the Internal Revenue Service should preserve the returns of trusts and individuals for an indefinite period. If an unlimited throwback rule is enacted, it will probably be necessary for the Internal Revenue Service to train a large number of revenue agents to examine returns involving accumulation distributions. In view of the comparatively small amount of revenue involved, it is likely that the time of such agents could be spent more profitably in other fields.

1. The administration of a statute which requires the examination of income tax returns and records extending back over a large number of years would be a constant source of irritation and expense to taxpayers and the Internal Revenue Service alike. The "short cut method" provides for computing the beneficiary's tax by including the average annual amount of accumulated income in his return for the current and two preceding years. However, in order to do that, it would be necessary to know the exact amount of accumulated trust income in each of the preceding years, the amount of each class of income, the amount of each partial distribution, and the amount of tax paid by the trust. In order to determine whether the "short cut method" or the "exact method" would produce a lower tax, it would be necessary to make both sets of computations.

2. The application of the unlimited throwback is not clear where there is a "pour-over" trust, i.e., on termination of one trust, the assets are transferred to a second trust (either newly created or already in existence). Logically, the accumulation and tax payments of the first trust should carry over to the second without imposition of a second tax until distribution is made to an individual. Similarly, where on the death of an income beneficiary a trust is split into two or more separate trusts for successor income beneficiaries, provision should be made for splitting the accumulations. Presumably this problem can be readily avoided by drafting the old trust in such a way as to keep it in existence. However, many existing trusts were drafted by reference to existing rules and provide for "pour-overs" on termination, as, for example, the distribution of assets in the marital trust to the residuary trust following the death of the widow.

3. The retention of old trusts may be undesirable from the standpoint of trust administration. For example, assume separate trusts for the benefit of each of three children with provision that if one should die without descendants, the corpus is to be divided between the other two trusts. Such an arrangement may be superior to a provision that the first trust continues for the benefit of the other two children in equal shares.

The complexity of the provisions introduced by the bill may lead to distortion of normal trust management. For example, the operation of the "shortcut" method makes it desirable for the trustee to accumulate at least some small amount of income each year of the trust so as to reduce the average annual income.

Conversely, the effect of the bill may be to cause trustees to distribute income currently to minors (or other beneficiaries), if they have discretion to do so. Such action is frequently unwise from a property management standpoint and will in many cases (especially with minors) reduce, rather than increase, the tax collected on the income.

Bill p. 194, § 341(a)(1) [IRC amended § 665(b)]

Elimination of Minority, Emergency, and De Minimis Exceptions

The retention of a de minimis provision (which could well be increased from $2,000) would greatly alleviate administrative problems. In order to avoid the multiple trust problem, the de minimis provision could be allowed only for years in which distributions are made from one trust to the same beneficiary.

Trusts to accumulate income during minority are usually not used to avoid taxes, but for legitimate, non-tax reasons. For example, it is common to accumulate income during the minority of a beneficiary, since he is not capable of, or legally qualified to, manage his property. Since the minor usually has little or no other income, no tax avoidance results. The existing statute recognizes this fact and excludes from the throwback any income acumulated before the beneficiary attains the age of 21.

There are other situations as well where a beneficiary is under a legal disability or is not capable of managing property, so that the trustee is required to manage the property and distribute income as and when needed. Since these needs may vary from year to year, and bear no direct relation to the amount of trust income, there may well be accumulations in some years, followed by distributions of more than current income in other years. The present law recognizes certain situations of this type by exempting distributions for "emergency needs" of a beneficiary from the throwback.

Effective Dates and Transitional Rules

The effective date of section 341 should be changed. To be fair to taxpayers who have created trusts in reliance on the present statute, the new provisions should apply only to trusts created after the date of enactment. Many existing trusts would have been drawn differently if the new rules had then applied. For example, many trusts now require accumulations during minority, whereas with the new law it may be desirable to give the trustee discretion to accumulate or distribute income.

If the new rules are not limited to new trusts, the section should apply only to income accumulated after the date of enactment. The new rules are now made applicable to income accumulated during the last five years (i.e., years ending after April 23, 1964), apparently on the basis that distributions of income from those years may be subject to the throwback of the present law. This fact, however, does not justify making the new rules retroactive. Beneficiaries, as well as trustees in some instances, may not have retained all of the records which they must have in order to use the exact method for these years. As a general rule records are required to be kept for tax purposes only for three years after the tax return is filed. There was, therefore, no reason to retain them longer in situations where the present throwback rule is not applicable. The most obvious examples are minors who have not had to file tax returns. Under the bill, such beneficiaries who have not had any occasion to keep records could not use the exact method and they would have available only the shortcut method which can cause great distortions, depending on the amount of income from unrelated sources. It should also be pointed out that many trusts have been established either through inter vivos instruments or through testamentary provisions which cannot be changed. These might have contained different provisions if the rules of the proposed bill had been known when the instruments were originally prepared. This is especially true in the case of trusts for the benefit of minors.

Bill pp. 198–199, § 341(d) [IRC new § 668(b)]

Alternative Methods of Computing Tax on Amounts Deemed Distributed in Preceding Years

The shortcut method has a built-in inequity in that in the year of termination of a trust the beneficiary will normally have at least one year's income from the property of the trust includable in his current income so that the income representing average prior accumulations is placed in a higher bracket for that year. An option should be granted in computing under the shortcut method to disregard the year of termination of a trust and spread over the three prior years.

There would appear to be no justification for prohibiting a beneficiary who was not alive for each year of the accumulation from using the exact method with respect to those years following his birth where he can establish the necessary facts. In such a situation the beneficiary should be allowed to use the shortcut method with respect to the balance of the distribution. Such splitting would appear to be possible if the trustee can make a distribution in two taxable years with the first being in such amount that no portion would be allocated to a year before the beneficiary's birth. This further complicates trust administration. Such proposed prohibition discriminates against after-born beneficiaries of trusts.

Multiple Distributions in the Same Taxable Year

The bill provides that where accumulation distributions are made from more than one trust to a beneficiary in the same taxable year, the beneficiary may determine which distribution is made first. The reason for this provision is puzzling as the order of distribution would not appear to affect the computation of tax.

Sec. 342. Trust Income for Benefit of a Spouse

Bill p. 203, § 342(a)(1) [IRC amended § 677(a)(1) and (2)]

Income for Benefit of Grantor's Spouse

The provision of the bill which will tax the grantor on income actually distributed to the spouse may be open to question. Where a joint return is filed, no problem is presented. However, in case of divorce, inequities may result in the year of divorce and problems in negotiating property settlements may be created. Such problems could be eliminated by providing for taxation of the spouse in all cases where the income is actually distributed to her in the current year. Such a provision would not appear to present any serious tax avoidance problem.

Payment of Insurance Premiums

There would also appear to be equitable grounds for providing that income which which may be used to pay premiums on insurance on the spouse's life should not be taxed to the grantor unless the income is actually so used. There appears to be no greater tax avoidance possibility here than in the case of income usable for support obligations. In most instances such insurance will be payable for the benefit of children and not the grantor or his spouse. Such possibilities may well creep into trusts for the benefit of children where the children own policies of insurance on the life of the spouse. The proposed rule creates one more pitfall to be watched in situations where no tax avoidance is involved. In addition, the suggested change in the proposed bill would make it easier to administer since the existence of insurance policies on the life of the spouse may be unknown to the trustee. The possibility of use of trust income to pay such premiums may well be doubtful, raising complex legal issues. Of course, where income of the trust is actually used to pay premiums that fact is known to the trustee and is easy to examine. In fact, it might be desirable to extend the same rule to insurance on the grantor's life.

Bill p. 203, § 342(b)

Effective Date

The amendments should be made applicable only to trusts created after the enactment of the amendment. Last minute tax avoidance is considered less important that the principle that a taxpayer may rely upon an existing statute in planning his affairs.

Title IV—Adjustments Primarily Affecting Corporations

Subtitle A—Multiple Corporations

SEC. 401. MULTIPLE CORPORATIONS

Bill pp. 204–206, § 401 [IRC new §1561]

Multiple Corporations

The provision is section 1561(a), with respect to the apportionment of the limitation on the life insurance company small business deduction, confers power upon the Secretary rather than the taxpayer to determine whether there shall be any but an equal division of the aggregate limitation among the component members of the group. This is at variance with the treatment in the same subsection of the surtax exemption allowed to a controlled group.

The cross-reference to be added to section 804 should be to section 1561 as well as to section 1564.

The bill would have no effect upon mutual companies other than life subject to tax under section 821. Since such a company has no stockholders, it can be a member of a controlled group of corporations within the meaning of section 1563(a) only as the common parent of such group. In other words, only one mutual company can ever be a member of a controlled group as long as the existence of such a group is determined by reference to stock ownership. For this reason, the proposed amendments in bill section 401(g) to sections 821, 832(c) and 501 (c)(15) designed to apportion or limit the dollar amounts otherwise provided in those sections among all the corporations taxable under section 821 that are members of a controlled group are of doubtful effectiveness.

No part of the limitations on surtax exemptions, the $100,000 amount under section 535(c)(2), the investment credit or first year depreciation provided for in bill section 401(a) through (f) would apply to any company taxable under section 821. All such provisions are made only in respect of the component members of controlled groups. A section 821 company is an excluded member by reason of section 1563(b)(2)(D).

Subtitle B—Debt-Financed Corporate Acquisitions and Related Problems

SEC. 411. INTEREST ON INDEBTEDNESS INCURRED BY CORPORATIONS TO ACQUIRE STOCK OR ASSETS OF ANOTHER CORPORATION

Bill pp. 219–227, § 411 [IRC new § 279]

Interest on Indebtedness Incurred by Corporations to Acquire Stock or Assets of Another Corporation

This provision is intended to discourage acquisitions by large corporations through the use of debt instruments having characteristics making them akin to equity. Although section 297 might produce a proper tax result in the relatively few situations to which it would apply, it is believed that it would represent an unwise addition to the tax law. The section's limited coverage, the likelihood that it would contribute little toward accomplishment of its major purpose, its lack of coordination with other provisions of the Code, the possible implications which might arise from the provision with respect to situations not covered, and its bewildering complexity, appear to outweigh the limited benefits likely to result from it in correcting a few cases of abuse.

1. A major stated purpose is to discourage concentration of economic power through corporate acquisitions which may fall outside the scope of the antitrust laws because of their conglomerate nature. In relation to this purpose, the provision seems questionable.

Even if it is conceded that it may sometimes be proper to use tax measures to attain objectives other than raising revenue, the goal might be better achieved by legislation in the antitrust field where the solution can be more complete and more precisely tailored to the nature and scope of the problem.

The provision is too narrow in scope materially to advance this objective. It would not apply to nontaxable acquisitions. Moreover, even the use of debentures in taxable acquistions will probably not be significantly curtailed. Whereas its antecedent, H.R. 7489, the so-called "Mills Bill," disallowed interest on all debentures providing major consideration for acquisitions, section 279 confines the disallowance to debentures meeting certain conjunctive statutory tests for resemblance to equity. Although this limitation is appropriate as a matter of tax theory and equity, it limits the likely effectiveness of the provilson in that:

(a) Its application only to indebtedness subordinated to claims of trade creditors will permit ready avoidance by issuance of indebtedness not so subordinated. In the case of conglomerates and other holding companies operating through subsidiaries, claims of trade creditors are frequently insignificant;

(b) Its application only to convertible debt or debt associated with an option will permit avoidance by issuance of ordinary debentures; and

(c) Its application only where the issuing corporation fails either the 2-to-1 debt-to-equity ratio or the 3-to-1 income-to-interest test will probably make it ineffective with respect to many large corporations; and others may be able to conduct their affairs so as to render it ineffective by intermixing acquisitions in which no debt is issued.

The need for such a provision to discourage debenture acquisitions will be largely eliminated by the enactment of section 412 of the bill, in which receipt of marketable debt securities will ordinarily disqualify the seller's gain for installment treatment. Deferment of the seller's gain until collection or disposition of a debenture received in a sale of stock or assets has been a key element in the popularity of debenture acquisitions. Imposition of tax on the seller's receipt of the debentures should inhibit future recourse to this form of acquisition.

2. Section 411 cannot be justified as an attempt to re-define the distinction between debt and equity for tax purposes because of its failure to deal comprehensively with this subject. Its application is restricted not only by the $5,000,000 allowance but also by its confinement to "corporate acquisition indebtedness"; there is no apparent tax policy justification for distinguishing between such indebtedness and debt issued for other purposes. Moreover, the debt-equity distinction is applied only to the deductibility of interest. There is no attempt to deal with the other situations in which the distinction is relevant, such as the relative consequences of a retirement of debt or equity or receipt of securities or stock in a merger, eligibility of payments for the intercorporate dividend deduction, the individual dividend exclusion, and the like.

In spite of its limited coverage, the provision may have unfortunate and unpredictable collateral effects on the state of the tax law as to the distinction between debt and equity. The principles applied in distinguishing debt and equity for these purposes have been developed and refined over the years in a long series of court decisions. Some of these principles are at variance with the standards established in section 279. While the section itself, as well as the House report, part 1, p. 107, states that no inference is to be drawn from the provision as to the nature of any instrument for the purpose of any other provision of tax law, the possibility that those charged with administration of the tax laws, as well as the courts, may be influenced by these standards cannot be ignored. It is submitted that the tests of section 279 would not afford a suitable statutory definition of indebtedness for all purposes.

3. The definition of corporate acquisition indebtedness in section 279(b)(1) to mean an obligation "issued to provide consideration for" an acquisition is apparently intended to include securities issued to obtain cash to finance cash acquisitions. The purpose of the borrowing appears to control and the determination of this purpose will give rise to numerous problems of application in situations where cash acquisitions are made by corporations concurrently engaged in borrowing for various purposes:

(a) Corporate borrowings are frequently made to raise cash for a number of purposes. The bill leaves it unclear whether the obligation will be acquisition indebtedness only if issued solely to provide consideration for a purchase; whether the principal purpose will determine the status of the entire issue; whether the entire issue will be tainted if any portion is to provide such consideration; or whether the issue will be fragmented and only the portion issued to provide consideration will be acquisition indebtedness.

(b) The exact uses of borrowed funds and the amounts to be required for each use are frequently not known at the time the obligation is issued. In such a case, it is difficult to see how the necessary determination could be made, unless there is authority to make it retrospectively by reference to the actual use of funds.

(c) Funds may be borrowed for one purpose and used for another. Thus, due to a change of plans, funds borrowed for plant expansion or working capital may be used for an acquisition or vice versa. Is the original purpose or the ultimate use controlling?

(d) Obligations whose proceeds are used for other corporate purposes may free internally generated cash for acquisition. Should these be deemed to have provided such consideration and, if so, will the statute permit it?

4. The provisions of section 279(b)(1) apparently would apply regardless of how few shares are acquired. Recognizing that ownership of a relatively small percentage of stock may represent effective control, it may nevertheless be desirable to exempt purchases for investment by adding a minimum percentage ownership test, say 5 to 10 percent.

In section 279(b)(1) (Bill p. 220, line 12) the word "except" should be changed to "provided."

The House report states that, in applying the debt ratio and interest coverage tests to a financial institution, its obligations are to be reduced by amounts owed to it and its interest expense is to be reduced by its interest income. (House report, part 1, p. 106). The bill in section 279(b)(4), (c)(2) and (c)(3), makes no such exception. If one is to be made, it should be set out in the statute.

The use of the adjusted basis of assets in determining the debt-equity ratio as provided in section 279(c)(2) is unsound in theory and would be inequitable in practice. This standard has been uniformly rejected in the cases. Rapid depreciation on the one hand and inflation on the other have made adjusted basis a poor measure of the capacity of tangible assets to support debt; and intangible values would ordinarily be left totally out of account. The desire for ease of administration is understandable but does not justify use of this standard.

In the case of acquisition of less than "control" of a corporation as defined in section 368(c), the acquired corporation's earnings under section 279(c)(3)(A) are not considered in testing interest coverage. The control definition of section 368(c) is unduly restrictive, since the required ownership of 80 percent of each class of nonvoting preferred stock is hardly relevant to the acquiring corporation's access to the acquired corporation's earnings. Substitution of a control test which excludes non-voting preferred stock would be preferable and would be consistent with section 279(g). Moreover, for accounting purposes, corporations customarily consolidate earnings of 50 percent-owned subsidiaries; and development of an allocation formula to permit inclusion of a proper share of earnings and interest in such cases might prevent some unfair results. Since future interest is to be measured against past earnings, the latter should be as inclusive as possible.

In order to prevent distortion and manipulation, it would be desirable in section 279(d)(3)(B) to exclude extraordinary gains and losses from the earnings used in the interest coverage test.

In excluding acquisitions of certain foreign corporations, the requirement in section 279(f) as to income from foreign sources should be stated in terms of a specified percentage, e.g., 80 percent, rather than by means of the imprecise "substantially all" test.

SEC. 412. INSTALLMENT METHOD

Bill pp. 227-229, § 412 (a) and (b) [IRC amended § 453(b)(1) and new § 453(b)(3)]

Installment Method: Periodic Payments Requirement

If these provisions are adopted, the effective date should be changed to exclude sales made prior to the date of enactment of the bill or pursuant to contracts made prior thereto.

The stated purpose of the amendments is "to limit the availability of the installment method of reporting gain to situations where" payments "are spread relatively evenly over the installment period." (House report, part 1, p. 108). Presumably the Secretary's regulations would implement this purpose. Such a drastic restriction of the installment method appears highly undesirable. The installment method was made available, in cases where receipt of a major part of the consideration for a sale is deferred, to permit postponement of tax until receipt of the consideration. Otherwise, the taxpayer might lack funds to pay the tax; or he might pay a tax based on expected payments which are never received. The need for this deferment is at least as great where the deferred payments are irregular or uncertain in time or amount as where they are regular and definite; and where the installments are few in number as where they are numerous. Irregularity of payments results far more often from business considerations than from a desire to reduce or defer tax. Denying use of the installment method in such cases would work considerable hardship on taxpayers required to pay a tax that might largely absorb or even exceed the down payment received.

1. It is doubted that there is any significant abuse of the installment method which the amendments would correct. The House report cites the uncertainty in present law as to the number of installment payments required to qualify for the installment method. (House report, part 1, p. 108). This uncertainty could be removed by requiring at least two payments. The only other reason given in the House report is that it is not "appropriate" to allow use of the installment method where the number of payments is limited, especially in the case of a single installment deferred for a long period of time. (House report, part 1, p. 108). Why this is not "appropriate" is not stated.

Adoption of proposed section 453(b)(4), disqualifying readily marketable corporate securities as installment obligations, would eliminate the only substantial problem which is believed to exist under present law.

2. If the provision is adopted, its effective date should be changed. At present it applies "to sales or other dispositions occurring after May 27, 1969." (Section 412(c)). Sales made pursuant to contracts entered into prior to the effective date should be excluded in order to prevent inequity and hardship.

3. It is not clear whether the percentage payment requirements of proposed section 453(b)(3)(B) apply to the total selling price or to the principal amount of the installment obligation resulting from the transaction. The House report refers to "the principal of the loan"; but the provision itself refers simply to "the principal" which may be intended to mean the principal amount involved in the transaction. (House report, part 1, p. 108). For example, if 20 percent of the purchase price is paid at the time of sale, 10 percent later in the year of sale and the remaining 70 percent in subsequent installments within 4 years of the sale, it is not clear what portion, if any, of the 70 percent must be paid by the first and second anniversary dates. The apparent purpose of the provision is to require regular payments on the total price, which would lead to giving credit for any down payment by making the entire selling price the base for the percentages.

Bill pp. 227–229, § 412(b) [IRC new § 453(b)(4)]

Installment Method: Marketable Securities

The phrase "readily tradable on an established securities market" in section 453(b)(4) will likely leave most taxpayers in considerable uncertainty as to what constitutes "an established securities market" and what conditions must exist before a security can be considered "readily tradable" on it. The House report sheds no light on the question. In view of the time which will doubtless elapse before regulations are promulgated, an explanation of what is meant by the phrase would be helpful

SEC. 413. BONDS AND OTHER EVIDENCES OF INDEBTEDNESS

Bill pp. 229–237, § 413 [IRC amended § 1232(a) and (b) and § 6049(a) and (c)]

Bonds and Other Evidences of Indebtedness

Throughout section 1232(a), the holding period referred to is 6 months, which is inconsistent with other provisions of the bill requiring a 12-months holding period.

Proposed section 1232(a)(3)(B) also raises several technical questions: (i) Is this provision intended to apply to any subsequent holder (as its text would seem to indicate), or only to a "purchaser" (as (C) would indicate)? (ii) It would appear that section 1232(a) would follow the bond into the hands of an heir, which was probably unintended; and that estate tax value, no matter how high, would not reduce his reportable income, which seems even more improbable. The fact that the heir's acquisition is not a purchase would preclude only the relief provided by this provision. (iii) On page 233, line 17, query whether "cost" should not read "adjusted basis." This affects the immediately preceding question, but would have other effects as well wherever there are post-acquisition items affecting basis.

Section 1232(a)(3)(C) should also relate to section 1232(a)(3)(D) to provide a consistent definition of a purchase.

Section 6049(a)(1), relating to the reporting of interest, will presumably product information based upon original issue discount, and cannot reasonably reflect the application of proposed section 1232(a)(3)(B) which provides an adjustment for a subsequent holder related to any gain realized by the seller. In the case of most purcharers, this will in variably produce a discrepancy between the amount reported by the issuing corporation and the holder, and will presumably cause the Service's computers to show "tilt" even when the issuer and holder of a purchased obligation have reported with complete propriety. Discrepancies will presumably also be picked up by the computers where the holder is a fiscal year taxpayer.

Requiring inclusion in taxable income prior to receipt, beyond presenting the bondholder with a liquidity problem, seems substantially inconsistent with the realization concept and with the cash method of accounting. Special treatment of this one item does not seem justifiable.

The revenue considerations involved would not seem to justify the hardships that these proposals would create for bondholders and issuers or the considerable additional complexity introduced into the Code.

SEC. 414. LIMITATION OF DEDUCTION OF BOND PREMIUM ON REPURCHASE

Bill pp. 237–239, § 414 [IRC new § 249]

Limitation on Deduction of Bond Premium on Repurchase

The word "repurchase" at page 238, line 8, would seem to render the provisions inapplicable to a purchase by a successor interest to the issuer or a parent or subsidiary of the issuer.

In instances where the obligation bears an interest rate less than the going rate and is trading at its converted value, allowance as an offset of the "normal call premium" provided for at page 238, line 13, may be unwarranted.

SUBTITLE C—STOCK DIVIDENDS

Sec. 421. Stock Dividends

Bill pp. 239–243, § 421 [IRB amended § 305]

Distributions of Stock and Stock Rights

Many problems in section 421 are dealt with only by creating a broad authority to tax and leaving it to the Secretary or his delegate to develop specific rules. This method of dealing with the problems will likely leave the law in an unfortunate state of uncertainty for years to come. Moreover, the bill would aggravate the present lack of coordination and integration of the treatment of stock dividends with other areas of subchapter C, such as the rules concerning redemptions, liquidation, recapitalizations and section 406 stock. Any regulations issued under proposed section 305 and revised regulations under section 306 are certain to be even more complex than the statute. A further effort should be made to find a simpler solution. An example of another approach is the one taken by the American Law Institute in its February, 1954, draft of Federal Income Tax Statute.

It is recommended that modification of section 305 be deferred and be made a part of and integrated with a more comprehensive technical revision of subchapter C of the Code.

1. While section 421 purports to retain the general rule of non-taxability of stock dividends, the exceptions are so broad that they reinstate the "proportionate interest" test, a test which was rejected by Congress in 1954 because of the difficulties encountered by the courts in applying it. A return to a standard of determining taxability that has already proved difficult to apply does not seem an appropriate solution, at least until other approaches have been more fully explored.

2. The Secretary would be given broad authority under section 305(b)(2) and 305(c) to determine whether various events have the effect of making certain stock distributions taxable. For example, a redemption which is treated as a section 301 distribution may be determined by the Secretary to give rise also to a constructive distribution to any shareholder whose proportionate interest in the earnings and profits or the assets of the corporation is thereby increased. The House report, part 1, p. 114, gives as an example a periodic redemption plan under which each shareholder may annually elect whether to have a small percentage of his stock redeemed. But, the broad language of the statute might permit the Secretary to go much further than an across-the-board election and to determine, for example, that a 40 percent stockholder of a corporation receives a constructive distribution when a 60 percent stockholder causes the corporation to redeem 10 percent of its stock from him. Similarly, under the broad language the Secretary arguably could visit dividend taxation on the continuing shareholders in the case of a non-pro rata spin-off or of an "A" type reorganization wherein some shareholders take stock and others cash. The breadth of his authority and the lack of any standard to guide him or by which to determine the propriety of his action will produce undue uncertainty and risk of administrative over-reaching in an area of wide significance to many taxpayers. Moreover the issuance of regulations under such a complex provision of a major revenue revision is frequently long delayed. During this period, it is usually not possible to obtain rulings on proposed transactions. These considerations make it undesirable to give the Secretary such broad regulatory authority.

3. Section 305(b)(1) continues the provision of present law that a stock dividend is taxable if it is payable at the election of any shareholder in property or stock. Thus, under existing law, a common shareholder who has an election to receive a dividend in either common stock or cash is currently taxable even though he elects to receive the common stock. Where the election is to receive either common stock or preferred stock, however, under present law the shareholder is not currently taxable since "property" does not include stock in the corporation making the distribution. (Section 317(a)). The preferred stock constitutes section 306 stock and has ordinary income potential upon ultimate disposition.

It is probable that the same result is intended under the bill, since actual distributions of section 306 stock on common stock are not generally taxable. However, the status of common stock received pursuant to such an election is unclear. The rule that a shareholder who has an election to receive either stock or property is currently taxable would be retained; but section 306 stock is treated for this purpose as property which is not stock. On the other hand, under section 306(c)(1)(A), stock is section 306 stock only if it is not includible in gross income by reason of section 305(a). Since includibility in income under section 305(a) is the point in issue, a circularity would exist, rendering it impossible to determine whether the preferred stock should be treated as property or stock.

This problem can be eliminated by amending the last sentence of section 305(a) to provide that section 306 stock shall be treated as property which is not stock only for purposes of subsection (b)(2).

In the situation described above, although the distribution would presumably not be taxable by reason of section 305(b)(1), if some of the shareholders elect to receive common stock while others elect to receive preferred stock, those electing to receive common stock would be currently taxable under section 305(b)(2) whereas those electing to receive preferred stock would not be currently taxable, but instead, assuming the problem referred to in paragraph 1 above is resolved as suggested, the preferred stock would constitute section 306 stock. It is unclear whether this is the result intended by the bill.

Under current law as well as under the bill, a stockholder who has an election to receive either cash or common stock would be currently taxable even though he elects to receive common stock. Moreover, under current law if a shareholder has an election to receive cash or preferred stock, he is currently taxable even though he elects to receive the preferred stock. Under the bill, however, it is unclear whether the shareholder would be currently taxable when he takes preferred stock because of the circularity referred to above. If the preferred stock constitutes section 306 stock, it would be treated as property which is not stock for purposes of section 305(b)(1). The shareholder would thus have an election to receive two types of property, neither of which would be treated as stock; and the section 305(b)(1) exception would be inapplicable. The test of taxability would, therefore, be under the general rule of section 305(a). Since section 306 stock is treated as property other than stock only for purposes of sections 305(b)(1) and (2), it would presumably still be stock for purposes of section 305(a) and the distribution would be nontaxable. This would appear to be an unintended result.

4. The lack of coordination which presently exists between section 305 and other provisions of subchapter C would be aggravated by the increased number of stock dividends taxable under section 305. For example, a recapitalization and a stock dividend may be substantive equivalents; but a recapitalization might be tax-free in circumstances where a stock dividend is taxable. Thus, if preferred dividend arrearages were satisfied through a distribution of preferred stock (or common stock) to the preferred shareholders, under the bill the distribution corporation recapitalized and additional preferred stock (or common stock) were issued in exchange for the dividend arrearages, the exchange would ordinarily be tax-free. (See Treas. Reg. § 1.368-2(e)(5).) While this is also the situation under existing law with respect to distributions in lieu of cash dividends for the current and preceding year, the extension of taxable treatment to stock distributions in lieu of preferred dividend arrearages antedating the preceding year will increase the impact of the artificial distinction between such a stock dividend and a recapitalization having the same effect.

5. Under the bill, distributions of stock or stock rights made before January 1, 1991, with respect to stock outstanding on January 10, 1969 (the effective date of the existing regulations), are exempted from the amendments to section 305. Literally, therefore, where cash dividends are paid with respect to stock issued after January 10, 1969 and stock dividends are paid on stock issued prior to such date, the new rules will not apply. The House report, part 1, p. 115, indicates that this situation would be covered; but if this is intended, the bill should be amended to make it clear.

Distributions prior to 1991 are exempted where made with respect to stock issued pursuant to a contract binding on January 10, 1969. This "binding contract" exemption may not be sufficiently broad to protect all issues as to which a substantial commitment existed on January 10, 1969. Corporate acquisitions customarily involve the execution of an agreement, approval by boards of directors and, finally, shareholder approval. The parties may not be legally committed until shareholders' approval is obtained; but, as a practical matter, they are bound when the directors act. It may be appropriate, therefore, to treat transactions in which stock was to be issued by one corporation to the shareholders of another as binding on January 10, 1969, where approved by the boards of directors on or before that date.

Subtitle D—Foreign Tax Credit

SEC. 431. FOREIGN TAX CREDIT REDUCTION IN CASE OF FOREIGN LOSSES

Bill pp. 243–246, § 431 [IRC new § 904(a)(3)]

Foreign Tax Credit

Under the bill, if recapture occurs by reason of the disposition of property, there seems to be no provision which would credit this recapture as an offset in the event that income is subsequently realized by the taxpayer in the same country. Thus, whereas section 904(a)(6)(A) would be applicable only to the extent that the amount of any loss exceeded the amount of recapture under section 904(a)(3), there is no provision under section 904(a)(3) which would make that paragraph inapplicable if the recapture rules of section 904(a)(6) had been applied in an earlier year. This would seem to be an unintended result, which could be remedied by making section 904(a)(3) inapplicable to the extent that section 904(a)(6) had previously applied.

Where a United States taxpayer has sustained a loss in a foreign country and that foreign country does not permit a carryover of the loss to later years for purposes of computing taxes payable in that country, the effect of section 431 will be to subject some taxpayers to double taxation. In subsequent years the loss would reduce the limitation on the allowable foreign tax credit for United States income tax purposes. At the same time, since the loss does not reduce earnings for purposes of computing the foreign tax, full credit will not be available (where the foreign tax rate is high). It would seem questionable whether, in light of the general purpose of the foreign tax credit provisions to relieve the international double taxation on a unilateral basis, it is an appropriate implementation of this intent to limit the foreign tax credit in cases where the foreign loss is not taken into account in computing the foreign tax in later years.

Where the foreign country does permit a carryover of the loss for foreign tax purposes, the operation of the 50 percent rule of proposed section 904(a)(3) would operate to deprive a taxpayer of credit he is intended to have. For example, taxpayer has a loss of $100 in year 1 and profits of $100 in each of the years 2 and 3. The foreign country allows a carryover so foreign taxes are paid only in year 3. If the foreign income (numerator of the fraction) is reduced by 50 in year 2 and 50 in year 3, half the credit will be lost in year 3. Although intended as a relief provision, this 50 percent rule could thus work a hardship. This result could be obviated by giving the taxpayer an election between section 904 (a)(3)(A) and section 904(a)(3)(B), or by providing that the reduction amount shall be reduced by the amount of foreign income which is offset by allowance of the loss carryover or which is subject to a tax holiday.

Consideration should also be given to confining recapture within a limited number of years from the year in which the tax benefit was realized. For example, a taxpayer who engaged in a losing activity in a foreign country during 1951–1955 and then withdrew should not be burdened with recapture if he undertakes another activity in the same country beginning in 1970.

SEC. 432. SEPARATE LIMITATION ON FOREIGN TAX CREDIT WITH RESPECT TO FOREIGN MINERAL INCOME

Bill pp. 246–251, § 432 [IRC new § 904(g)]

Separate Limitation on Foreign Tax Credit with Respect to Foreign Mineral Income

The effect of this amendment to section 904 is to deny application of any portion of the tax imposed by the foreign government on mineral income as a credit against the United States tax on other foreign income, regardless of whether any of such foreign tax on mineral income could be proved to be a royalty. The rule adopted by the bill is that the part of the foreign extraction constituting a tax may not exceed the amount of United States tax on the same income.

The provision will presumably apply to mineral income from sources within a number of countries which are not usually thought of as involving the "royalty versus tax" problem—in that such countries, while requiring the payment of royalties on property owned by the government and also imposing income taxes on mineral income, appear to set both the royalty rates and the income tax rates on the basis of considerations normally applied to such separate determinations. Such countries would include Canada, Israel and Mexico.

It should be noted, also, that overseas mineral operations often include the refining, processing and marketing of mineral products, as well as production, within the same foreign country. Not uncommonly, the foreign rates may vary in different activities and a higher tax on extraction may be acceptable because the tax on the integrated operation is acceptable. Accordingly, it might be more appropriate to consider all of the taxes imposed by a foreign country on the entire integrated operation in that country, and all of the income therefrom, as the basis for the separate tax credit limitation.

In some foreign countries, companies engaged in the production of minerals as their primary activity, and in some cases companies engaged in related activities, are required to pay a higher rate of income tax on all of their income than the rate applicable to companies engaged in other activities. It is not clear whether, under the provisions of section 432 of the bill, such a country would be deemed to impose income taxes "on such income" (that is, "foreign mineral income") at a higher rate than "on other income" (that is, other income derived by the same taxpayer who engages in mineral operations). Further, is "other income" to be income of United States nationals, or mineral income of nationals of the foreign country, or non-mineral income of nationals of the foreign country?

The special provision permitting a United States taxpayer to elect to return to the per country limitation without consent of the Secretary or his delegate seems unduly restrictive in that the election must be made with respect to the first taxable year beginning after the date of enactment of the bill, whether or not the taxpayer in fact has foreign mineral income in that year. Authorization to make such an election without consent, could equitably be extended to the first year, after enactment of the bill, in which the taxpayer receives any "foreign mineral income."

Subtitle F— Depreciation Allowed Regulated Industries; Earnings and Profits Adjustment for Depreciation

SEC. 452. EFFECT ON EARNINGS AND PROFITS

Bill pp. 270–271, § 452 [IRC new § 312(m)]

Effect on Earnings and Profits of Depreciation

1. The depreciation limitation under section 312(m)(1) applies to any corporation "for the purpose of computing its earnings and profits with respect to any taxable year beginning after June 30, 1972." This language presumably means that the limitation applies only in computing the earnings and profits for such year, i.e., realized in such year. However, some persons have understood it to mean that the limitation applies in determining accumulated earnings and profits whenever it becomes relevant in a taxable year beginning after June 30, 1972, and thus might require a redetermination of depreciation for all prior years in which such earnings had accumulated. The House report, part 1, p. 135; part 2, p. 103, indicates that the recomputation is to be made for all years beginning after June 30, 1972, and not for prior years, which we believe to be the intended result. This possible ambiguity should be resolved by either a change in the language of the provision or an appropriate statement in a Committee report.

2. Amendments to section 312(a)(3) and (c)(3) appear to be required in order to coordinate them with section 312(m). Under section 312(a)(3), earnings and profits are decreased by the "adjusted basis" of distributed property, which presumably means its adjusted basis as determined under sections 1011 et seq. However, the use of different depreciation in determining earnings and profits would give rise to a different adjusted basis for earnings and profits purposes; and it is this adjusted basis which should be used in determining the reduction of earnings and profits under section 312(a)(3). Thus a special definition of adjusted basis appears to be required for purposes of such paragraph.

Similarly, the recognition of gain on a distribution under sections 1245(a) and 1250(a) will no longer give rise to an equivalent increase in earnings and profits. Accordingly, the amount of the adjustment of earnings and profits under section 312(c)(3) by reason of gain recognized under section 1245(a) or 1250(a) will often differ from the amount of such gain. If the existing language of section 312(c)(3) is thought to be sufficiently general to permit this, the statute should make clear that this is intended.

The "income tax basis" rather than the "earnings and profits basis" should continue to be used for corporate distributions under section 301(b)(1)(B)(ii) and the other provisions of section 301.

3. Reference solely to "the straight line method" (Bill, p. 270, line 21) will leave problems of whether salvage value must be taken into account. A taxpayer using the declining balance method need not determine salvage value; hence the computation under section 312(m) might require determination of a purely hypothetical salvage value. It is suggested that the purposes of section 312(m) would be adequately accomplished by providing that the straight line depreciation shall be calculated without regard to salvage value.

4. The proposed amendment will, unless modified, make substantial changes in the taxation of income derived by United States taxpayers from foreign sources, although the House report gives no indication that these effects were intended or considered. A United States shareholder may, of course, receive a dividend from a foreign corporation which would now be considered tax-free under section 301 in the same manner as the distributions referred to in the House report. In addition, however, the determination of the earnings and profits of a foreign corporation has significance with respect to several sections of the Code where a change in the computation will not have the same significance which it has under section 301.

Under section 902 a domestic corporation which owns at least 10 percent of the voting stock of a foreign corporation from which it receives dividends is deemed to have paid foreign income, war profits or excess profits taxes paid or deemed to be paid by such foreign corporation to any foreign country or any possession of the United States on or with respect to the accumulated profits out of which such dividend is paid. Consequently, the domestic corporation is entitled to a foreign tax credit for such taxes under section 901. The term "accumulated profits" is defined by Treasury regulations, section 1.902-3(c)(1) and (2), to mean the earnings and profits of the foreign corporation (with adjustment in certain cases). In general, the earnings and profits so referred to are to be determined under United States tax accounting standards. A taxpayer may choose to determine the earnings and profits under the rules provided by Treasury regulations, section 1.964-1 (with certain exceptions), and must so determine the earnings and profits if the foreign tax credit under section 902 is claimed for a year with respect to which the domestic corporation has elected to receive a minimum distribution under section 963.

It would appear that, if a taxpayer computes "accumulated profits" of a foreign corporation, for purposes of section 902, under United States tax according standards, section 452 of the bill would require the earnings and profits of the foreign corporation to be computed on the basis of straight line depreciation. If the taxpayer chose to compute the earnings and profits of the foreign corporation under Treasury regulations, section 1.964–1, subsection (c)(1)(iii) of that regulation would permit depreciation to be computed "in accordance with section 167 and the regulations thereunder." Since, in general, the regulations under section 964 do not require strict adherence in every respect to United States accounting standards, it is not predictable whether such regulations would be amended, following adoption of the proposed amendment to section 312, to require depreciation of the foreign corporation to be computed in the same manner as for a domestic corporation.

If computations of the earnings and profits of a foreign corporation required to be made under section 902 are to be affected by the proposed amendment to section 312, this will effect a dramatic change in the amount of foreign taxes allowed as a credit. In general, foreign countries allow depreciation to be taken into account for tax purposes at accelerated rates. If the foreign corporation's earnings and profits are to be determined by taking depreciation only on a straight line basis, the effect will be to increase markedly the earnings and profits of the foreign corporation and thus increase the denominator of the portion of the foreign taxes available for credit. This would decrease markedly the available foreign tax credit under section 902.

Under section 952(c), the subpart F income of a controlled foreign corporation (which under certain circumstances is taxed to United States shareholders of such corporation, even if not distributed) is limited so that, in general, the amount thereof may not exceed the earnings and profits of the foreign corporation for the year, reduced by net accumulated deficit in earnings and profits from certain prior years. While this rule may be expected to apply only to a limited number of cases, a change for post-1972 years in the computation of earnings and profits may have effects (all of which we have not yet been able to determine) on this limitation.

Under section 960, if a domestic corporation is required to include in gross income an amount of subpart F income of a foreign corporation, it is entitled to a foreign tax credit comparable to the foreign tax credit allowed under section 902 with respect to actual dividend distributions. The same considerations discussed above, with respect to section 902 would apply in the application of proposed section 452 to the determination of this foreign tax credit.

Under section 963, a domestic corporation which elects to receive a "minimum distribution" of the earnings of a controlled foreign corporation is not required to include in gross income any amount with respect to the subpart F income of such corporation for the election year. If proposed section 452 is applied to this provision, it will substantially alter the determination of the required minimum distribution. In general, the amount of the required minimum distribution is computed by reference to the "effective foreign tax rate" paid by the foreign corporation. This in turn is determined by comparing the foreign tax paid to the earnings and profits of the foreign corporation (before foreign taxes). In addition, once the effective foreign tax rate is determined (and if such effective foreign tax rate is less than roughly 90 percent of the applicable United States corporate rate), then the amount of the required minimum distribution is stated as a percentage of the earnings and profits of the foreign corporation. If earnings and profits are to be determined for both of these purposes by taking into account only straight line depreciation, the effect will be both to reduce the effective foreign tax rate (which will increase the percentage of earnings and profits required to be distributed) and also to increase the absolute amount of the required distribution.

5. Consideration should be given to the possible effect of the application of section 452 to other determinations, including the following:

(a) Under section 956, a United States shareholder in a controlled foreign corporation must include in gross income his pro rata share of the increase for any taxable year in the earnings of a controlled foreign corporation invested in United States property. Such amount is included, however, only to the extent that it would have constituted a dividend if it had been distributed. Such amount is necessarily determined by reference to the earnings and profits of the foreign corporation.

(b) Under section 959, actual dividends received by a United States shareholder from a controlled foreign corporation are excluded from gross income to the extent that such distributions are made out of earnings and profits of the foreign corporation previously subjected to tax in the hands of the United States shareholder (or, under certain circumstances, prior shareholders). Under section 959(c), "ordering rules" are established determining the extent to which distributions are deemed to be made out of previously taxed earnings and profits and out of untaxed earnings and profits.

(c) Under section 1246, gain recognized upon the sale or exchange by a United States person of shares in a foreign investment company (as defined) is treated as gain from the sale of a non-capital asset "to the extent of the taxpayer's ratable share of the earnings and profits of such corporation" accumulated in taxable years after 1962. The remainder of the gain is treated under general concepts and normally will constitute a long-term capital gain.

(d) A generally comparable, though more limited, provision is made under section 1248 with respect to the sale or exchange of stock in a controlled foreign corporation (as defined in section 957).

TITLE V—ADJUSTMENTS AFFECTING INDIVIDUALS AND CORPORATIONS

Subtitle A—Natural Resources

SEC. 501. NATURAL RESOURCES

Bill pp. 273–276, § 501(a) [IRC amended § 613(b)]

Percentage Depletion

The Section of Taxation takes no position with respect to percentage depletion rates.

The bill would limit oil and gas percentage depletion to wells located in the United States, Puerto Rico, or the Outer Continental Shelf. Depletion on foreign oil wells would be limited to cost.

1. Under existing law depletion is allowed on foreign oil only if the income is reported for United States taxation. Denial of percentage depletion on foreign oil may cause the operator to form a foreign subsidiary to operate the property, thus giving rise to the possibility of removing the income from United States taxation.

It should be pointed out that under the proposal to eliminate percentage depletion on foreign production, the holder of a royalty interest may, as a practical matter, also lose any right he would have to cost depletion because of the difficulty entailed in obtaining reserve figures on which to base his cost depletion computation. It is common knowledge that such information is carefully guarded, hence the apparent hardship to the royalty holder.

2. The disallowance of all percentage depletion on foreign oil and gas is inconsistent with the treatment proposed for other minerals. Thus percentage depletion is allowable on foreign sulphur and uranium deposits at the same rate as domestic. For metal mines, depletion on foreign deposits is allowed at 11 percent instead of the domestic rate of 15 percent. For a long list of other minerals the rate for foreign deposits is the same as for domestic.

3. The amendment defines the Outer Continental Shelf as being that defined in section 2 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act. Since the enactment of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, the United States has ratified the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf which gives jurisdiction to each country to the depth of 200 meters or such depth as can be exploited. The 200-meter depth has already been passed on the California coast. It may be that between the Convention and the Act some offshore wells might be denied depletion under the bill. This potential problem could be solved by defining the Outer Continental Shelf in line 16, page 273, as any area where the United States exercises jurisdiction.

4. On page 277, line 7, the words "economic interest" are used. This term is not defined anywhere in the Internal Revenue Code. It is suggested that it be defined, using the Supreme Court's definition in Palmerd v. Bender, 287 U.S. 511 (1933), as follows:

"An economic interest in a mineral property is one whereby the taxpayer by investment has acquired an interest in the mineral in place and has secured by any form of legal relationship income derived from the extraction of the mineral solely to which he must look for a return of his capital."

The term "mineral production payment" used in several places on page 277 and on page 279 also is not defined in the Code. It is suggested that the definition given by the Supreme Court in P. G. Lake, Inc. v. Commissioner, 356 U.S. 260 (1958), be used, as follows:

"A mineral production payment is a right to a specified sum of money payable out of a specified percentage of the mineral, or the proceeds receivable from its sale, if, as and when produced."

Bill pp. 279–280, § 501(c) [IRC new § 615(h)]

Exploration Expenditures

Under section 615 of present law, a miner may expend up to $400,000 on exploration for minerals and elect to deduct it. Such amount may be for either domestic or foreign exploration. As to domestic exploration, under section 617 he may elect to deduct an unlimited amount but such amount shall be recouped from depletion or a sale after the mine becomes productive.

It is now proposed to make the $400,000 recoupable also. The exception, on page 280, line 12, provides that any taxpayer who has deducted less than $400,000, under either section 615 or section 617, may deduct the balance after the effective date of the amendment on foreign exploration, subject to recapture.

Thus, for the first time, foreign exploration expenditures may be deducted under section 617. Under these circumstances it would appear that taxpayers who have previously elected under section 615 should be granted a reasonable period for making a new election under section 617, if they choose to do so.

Subtitle B—Gains and Losses

SEC. 511. REPEAL OF ALTERNATE CAPITAL GAINS TAX FOR INDIVIDUALS

SEC. 512. CAPITAL LOSSES OF INDIVIDUALS

SEC. 514. HOLDING PERIOD OF CAPITAL ASSETS

Bill. pp. 281–285, 287–290, §§ 511, 512, and 514

Repeal of Alternative Capital Gains Tax

1. Since the subject matter of these sections invloves everyday activities of many taxpayers throughout the country, the proposed effective date seems particularly unfair. Undoubtedly many taxpayers, unaware of the press releases of the House Ways and Means Committee, consummated many bonafide transactions which they would not have completed had the law been changed as proposed. The result is aggravated in the case of fiscal year taxpayers by the proposed increase in the holding period required for long-term gain treatment. The effect could be to impose a tax of 77 percent instead of the anticipated 27 percent.

2. If the effective date is not changed, it is submitted that the provision should be amended to cover a number of situations that do not appear to have been considered.

Example A—A taxpayer enters into an enforceable contract in June, 1969 and the property is actually conveyed in August, 1969. Do the provisions of the pending bill include or exclude such a transaction? Is there to be a distinction between a contract of sale and a contract to sell, and if so, does this not only raise a question of the validity of the distinction but also of the practical difficulty of distinguishing between the two?

Example B—A corporation in June, 1969 agrees to liquidate under the provisions of section 337 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. The liquidating dividends are actually received by the stockholders in August, 1969 and in subsequent months. Do the provisions of the pending bill include or exclude such a transaction?

Example C—In August, 1969 a taxpayer sells a capital asset which has been held by him for seven months. The new averaging provisions in the pending bill apply to taxable years beginning after 1969. The existing law requires a segregation of capital assets in determining the averaging provisions. Under the pending bill can the transaction in this example be brought under the averaging provisions?

Example D—A taxpayer acquired an asset in April, 1969 which has since then materially decreased in value. Because of his individual carryover situation a short-term loss is of no benefit to him in 1969. Does the new bill permit him to defer his loss to 1970?

3. In section 511(c) the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate is authorized to prescribe regulations with respect to taxpayers having fiscal years. However, no standards are set forth which the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate is required to follow.

SEC. 513. LETTERS, MEMORANDUMS, ETC.

Bill pp. 285–287, § 513 [IRC amended § 1221(3) and § 1231(b)(1)(C)]

Letters, Memorandums, Etc.

Although the House report, part 1, p. 149, states that "letters and memorandums addressed to an individual are considered as prepared for him," section 513 does not so provide. If this result is intended, ambiguity could be eliminated by slight modification of the statutory provision.

SEC. 515. TOTAL DISTRIBUTIONS FROM QUALIFIED PENSION, ETC., PLANS

Bill pp. 290–296, § 515 [IRC new §§ 402(a)(5), 403(a)(2)(C), and 72(n)]

Total Distributions From Qualified Pension, Etc., Plans

Section 402(a)(5) uses the term "benefits accrued" in both subparagraphs (A) and (B). The closing sentence of proposed section 402(a)(5) provides for the delegation to the Secretary of regulatory authority to carry out the purposes of this change.

1. The first question is whether the word "accrued" is to include benefits which have not as yet vested. The word "accrued" is used in several different ways in describing a participant's rights in qualified plans. Accordingly, since it should be the intent of this section to include benefits which have not vested, it is suggested that the following parenthetical phrase "(whether or not vested)"—or words of similar purport—be added after the word "accrued" in the above subparagraphs.

It is not clear whether the proposed statutory language would continue the favorable capital gains treatment of existing law where an amount is paid into a trust by an accrual basis employer on, say, March 15, 1970, with respect to a plan year which ended on December 31, 1969. Presumably, the favorable treatment would include the March payment as an "accrued benefit."

2. With respect to profit sharing, stock bonus or money purchase pension plans and individual retirement income contracts, it is relatively easy to determine, at a given date, the amount of "accrued benefits." This would be the amount actually contributed to the trust be the employer prior to that date, plus the most recent plan year's contribution if the presumption of the above paragraph is correct.

In the area of pension plans, however, it is not certain whether the term "benefits accrued" refers to the actuarial value of the benefit to which the employee is entitled on account of service up to the given date, or whether it means the actual amount contributed on his behalf by the employer up to the applicable date. The House report, part 1, p. 155, is ambiguous. Under (i) on page 155, it states that the limitation "will not apply to employer contributions made on behalf of the employee during the plan years beginning before January 1, 1970" (emphasis added). But, the next sentence states that the bill "will have no effect on benefits previously accrued by employees." It is recognized that the regulations could take a position in this regard. However, because of the importance of the alternatives, it is suggested that a more accurate meaning of the term "benefits accrued" be given in the statute itself.

3. Another substantial problem inherent in the phrase "benefits accrued" is to determine the amount of those benefits, since there are several different appropriate methods. For example, two employees of identical age and salary who enter their respective pension plans at the same time would have different amounts of "benefits accrued" at January 1, 1970, depending on the method of funding their benefits, i.e., entry age normal, attained age normal, etc. If the bill were to levy different tax burdens depending upon the method of determining actuarial liability or contributions, then the result would be inequitable. The power to provide regulations would not necessarily cure this inequity.

It is submitted that what is needed in the statute is an alternative method of computing "benefits accrued" which, although it may be imprecise, will not be inequitable. What is suggested, specifically, is a simple proration of the amount of the employer-provided benefit depending upon the number of years the employee has been a participant in the plan. Section 331 of the bill, dealing with deferred compensation, provides such a "career average" method for the purpose of that section. It is suggested that that approach be applied to proposed section 402(a)(5) as an alternative method, so that either the career prorated amount or the amount computed according to the regulations, whichever is greater, shall be used for this section.

In this manner, the employee would receive a more liberal treatment, since, under several actuarial methods, pension liability and contributions normally increase as the employee's age increases. This "short-cut" method seems appropriate since it would avoid difficult and costly actuarial computations, and, in many instances, different tax consequences for taxpayers whose situations are substantially the same. The use of a proration of benefits over the employment span would also help alleviate the problem of determining "benefits accrued" under pension plans which use the so-called "aggregate" method of funding (i.e., where employer contributions are not allocated to individual employees).

4. It has been pointed out that, by action of section 511 of the bill (which repeals the alternative capital gains tax), an employee who receives a lump-sum distribution from an exempt trust subsequent to July 25, 1969, will be taxed at a higher rate on that lump-sum distribution as compared with a distribution prior to that date. This result would seem to be inconsistent with the carefully drawn effective date provisions of section 515 of the bill, which would leave inviolate employee benefits accrued prior to 1970.

Furthermore, there does not seem to be the usual need here for an early effective date. There are limited avoidance possibilities in the case of distributions under employee benefit plans since the employee does not often have much choice in the timing of lump-sum distributions. Under the circumstances, it is suggested that the July 25, 1969 effective date of section 511 of the bill should not apply to distributions made under section 402(a)(2), as amended, with respect to benefits accrued prior to January 1, 1970.

5. The following comments relate to section 515(b) of the bill (proposed section 72(n)(1)(C)):

a. Subparagraph (C) refers to an employee who has been "a participant in such plan." Language should be inserted at this point to make clear that "such plan" also includes the plan of a predecessor or successor employer, etc., as is now provided in section 331 of the bill—proposed section 1354(b).

b. The same subparagraph refers to "5 or more years." The question is, what is the meaning of the word "years"? Does this refer to a plan year, taxable year of the employee, taxable year of the employer, or calendar year? Or, does it refer to anyone of them as sufficient to meet the 5-year requirement? It is suggested that, in keeping with other provisions of section 515 of the bill, it would be appropriate to use "plan year" in this instance.

c. This same subparagraph also refers to an employee only if he has been a "participant." What is meant by "participant"? Does this mean an employee who is eligible under the plan, eligible but not vested (in whole or in part), or eligible but vested? Many plans have an eligibility waiting period but then, once that has been satisfied, provide credit for all or part of the waiting period as credited service. In this situation, when would the count of years begin for determining when the employee was a participant? In reserving this matter, one approach which should not be taken is that now found in section 72(n)(1)(C)(ii); this approach is too restrictive for the purposes of the new 5-year rule for all employees, since, in many pension plans, actual contributions may not be made on account of an employee for one or more years in situations where there is an actuarial surplus by reason of substantial forfeitures. Under present law, section 401(a)(8), forfeitures must be applied against future contributions. However the problem is ultimately solved, it should be done with the precision of language now found in section 72(n)(1)(C)(ii).

SEC. 516. OTHER CHANGES IN CAPITAL GAINS TREATMENT

Bill pp. 296–300, § 516 [IRC new § 1001(e) and new § 1252]

Other Changes in Capital Gains Treatment

Section 516(a) amends section 1001 to provide that in determining gain or loss on the sale or other disposition of a term interest in property, the adjusted basis of such interest determined under section 1014 or 1015 shall be disregarded.

1. The section as presently drafted covers life and other term interests acquired by gift, bequest or inheritance and, thus, follows the pattern of section 273 which provides the amortization of an interest acquired in the manner described. Neither present Code section 273 nor section 516(a) of the bill covers a term interest created by the taxpayer, initially retained by him and then either amortized or sold.

Assume, for example, that a taxpayer transfers a remainder interest in stock to his son or to a charity and retains the right to the dividends for his life. The question has arisen whether he may amortize the life interest on the theory that it is a wasting asset and is not specifically covered by section 273. Whether a term created by the taxpayer may be amortized appears to have been discussed in only two cases. United States v. Georgia R. & Banking Co., 348 F. 2d 278 (5th Cir. 1965), and Illinois Merchants Trust Co., 14 B.T.A. 890 (1928) (Dis. Opin.).

Perhaps a retained income interest such as the one described above should not be amortizable. Similarly, perhaps the sale of such an interest should not be given preferential treatment over the sale of an identical interest acquired by gift, bequest or inheritance. Yet, as with present Code section 273, section 516(a) of the bill appears not to preclude the offset of gain from the sale or exchange of a retained life estate by a portion of the basis allocable to it. In cases where assignment of income principles do not require ordinary income treatment on the sale of a retained income interest, such an interest should also be covered by section 516(a) of the bill. If section 516(a) is retained, it might be an appropriate time to amend similarly present Code section 273.

2. The reference in proposed section 1001(e)(3) to "a fee interest" (Bill p. 297, line 16) may provide too broad an exception. Although the exception is fundamentally proper where the underlying fee interest is sold as part of the same transaction, two limitations should probably exist: (i) that the fraction of the fee interest sold should be at least as great as the fraction of the term interest sold, and (ii) that the same fraction of estates and interests intervening between the fee interest and the term interest also be sold.

Subtitle C—Real Estate Depreciation

SEC. 521. DEPRECIATION OF REAL ESTATE

Bill pp. 300–310, § 521 [IRC new § 1250(j) and (k), amended §§ 1250(a), (b), 167(e) and 381(c)(6)]

Depreciation of Real Estate

The decision to restrict accelerated depreciation for nonresidential housing and to provide additional accelerated depreciation for rehabilitation of low or moderate income housing appears to be a policy decision based upon national housing goals unrelated to the goals of uniformity and simplification of the Internal Revenue Code.

1. The subsection (k) proposed to be added to section 167 (relating to depreciation) provides for accelerated depreciation of rehabilitation expenditures in connection with "low-cost rental housing." The definition of "low-cost rental housing" contained in section 167(k)(3)(B) refers to dwelling units held for occupancy on a rental basis by families of "low or moderate income as determined by the Secretary or his delegate in a manner consistent with the policies of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968." The Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 and predecessor acts have used the terms "low income," "lower income" and "low or moderate income" for various special programs. The term "low or moderate income" does not appear in the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 but does appear in earlier Housing and Urban Development legislation. For these reasons, it is submitted that the definition of "low-cost rental housing" proposed for purposes of the special depreciation deductions to be allowed in the case of rehabilitation expenditures is inadequate.[1]

2. The inclusion of rules similar to those provided in paragrphs (5), (9), (10) and (13) of section 48(h) for the purpose of new construction begun or contracted for before July 25, 1969 preserves the right of certain transferees to compute depreciation allowances under present law rules. The inclusion of the new rule of section 167(j)(1) in paragraph (6) of section 381(c) without providing for rules just referred to in section 48(h) for used section 1250 property results in a prohibition of the carryover of depreciation methods in the case of used section 1250 property acquired after July 24, 1969. This may be intentional since it conforms to the rule under present law which denies to transferees 200 percent declining balance depreciation even though the transferee's basis is determined by reference to the basis in the hands of the transferor under section 351, 371(a), 374(a), 721 or 731. However, the failure to provide for a carryover of the transferor's 150 percent declining balance depreciation (which is permitted for used property acquired before July 25, 1969) in the case of transfers covered by section 381(a) is apparently unintended since present law provides for the carryover of 200 percent declining balance depreciation in such cases and, under present law, no carryover provision in necessary to permit the transferee to use 150 percent declining balance depreciation. Under the new rules, unless there is a carryover provision, the transferee will be limited to use of the straight line method of depreciation. This could be remedied by changing section 521(f) so that section 381(c)(6) will be amended to read as follows:

"(6) METHOD OF COMPUTING DEPRECIATION ALLOWANCE.—The acquiring corporation shall be treated as the distributor or transferor corporation for purposes of computing the depreciation allowance under paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of section 167(b), or subsetcion (j), (k), or (m) of section 167, on property acquired in a distribution or transfer with respect to so much of the basis in the hands of the acquiring corporation as does not exceed the adjusted basis in the hands of the distributor or transferor corporation."

Alternatively, the same result could be accomplished by including subparagraph (4) of proposed section 167(j) as an exception in subparagraph (1).

3. Section 312(m) is unclear. A literal reading indicates that the straight line computation is to be made as if the previous year had been computed on the double declining balance method or sum-of-the-year digits method. If this is the intent, then the full cost of the property will not have been recouped by the end of its useful life, as would be the case were a continuing straight line schedule to be maintained. It is assumed that for earnings and profits purposes, gain or loss on disposition will be adjusted to reflect the lesser depreciation allowed, although this is nowhere indicated.[1]

Subtitle E—Subchapter S Corporations

SEC. 541. QUALIFIED PENSION, ETC., PLANS OF SMALL BUSINESS CORPORATIONS

Bill pp. 313-317, § 541 [IRC new § 1379]

Qualified Pension, Etc., Plans of Small Business Corporations

The American Bar Association has recommended that the $2,500 limitation under H.R. 10 should be removed. (ABA Reports, 1969, Vol. 94). Th extension of such a limitation to subchapter S corporations is inconsistent with this recommendation.

1. So long as the many differences between partnership taxation and subchapter S taxation continue, it is difficult to justify further tinkering which in no way alleviates the difficulties encountered in the past but merely applies yet another layer of complexity.

The proposed section would add a third category of pension and profit-sharing plans and represent a backward step which would widen the gap between overall equality in tax treatment of pension and profit-sharing plan contributions and benefits. Specifically, these problems would result in:

a. Keeping accounts for purposes of limitations on forfeitures (section 1379(a)) and carryovers (section 1379(c)).

b. Recordkeeping by shareholder-employees to obtain relief proposed under section 72. These persons must keep all returns to prove their contributions to the plan in order to arrive at their percentage of exclusion.

c. Where an annuitant dies soon after retirement, deduction for unrecovered section 1379 income comes normally during a low income tax period, whereas the recognition of income has occurred in a high income tax period (section

[1] Since straight line depreciation exceeds the double declining balance method or sum-of-the-years digits method over the greater part of the useful life of an individual property, a fair approach for purposes of the limit on tax preferences might be to adopt the concept of a negative tax preference to take care of the excess in any year of straight line over "liberal" depreciation. This subject is also discussed above in connection with p. 166 of the bill.

1379(b)(3)). This is at variance with the stated purpose of the overall reform to equalize the burden of taxation over a period of years.

d. Extensive revision of existing plans of subchapter S corporations will be required as well as plans of any corporation hereafter electing subchapter S.

2. Under the H.R. 10 rule only partners with "more than ten per cent" capital or profits interest are treated as owner-employees. A policy restricting the availability of benefit plans for subchapter S shareholders would seem to relate solely to major shareholders. Hence, it would seem that the 10 per cent limitation found in H.R. 10 would be more logical than the 5 percent stockholder rule proposed.

3. Stock bonus plans have been thought not possible for subchapter S corporations. Unless the intention of Congress is to open the way for such plans, in some new provisions dealing with subchapter S, it may be well to delete references to stock bonus plans and make the section applicable only to profit-sharing plans.

4. Section 401(a)(8) provides that in a qualified pension plan, forfeitures must not be applied to "increase" the employees' benefits. In proposed section 1379 (Bill, line 12, p. 314) forfeitures would not be allowed to "inure to the benefit of" a shareholder-employee. If there is a difference in the meaning of these terms, it should be explained. If not, use of the same language would be preferable.

At line 9, page 314, the phrase "forfeitures attributable to contributions" seems incomplete. The phrase "forfeitures of benefits attributable to contributions" would be better.

At line 8, page 316, the bill fails to identify the person entitled to the deduction. It would seem better to delete "then there shall be allowed as a deduction" and insert "then the employer may deduct."

TITLE VII—EXTENSION OF TAX SURCHARGE AND EXCISE TAXES; TERMINATION OF INVESTMENT CREDIT

SEC. 704. AMORTIZATION OF POLLUTION CONTROL FACILITIES

Amortization of Pollution Control Facilities

1. Section 168(a) permits the taxpayer to elect to begin the amortization period either with the month following the month in which the facility was completed or with the succeeding taxable year. Although the section provides that the amortization deduction "with respect to any month shall be in lieu of the depreciation deduction . . . for such month," it does not make it clear whether a taxpayer electing to begin the amortization period with the succeeding taxable year is entitled to depreciation deductions under section 167 during the year in which the facility was completed. This uncertainty should be resolved.

2. The certification process will undoubtedly be time-consuming. There is no indication as to what a taxpayer is to do if certification is not completed by the due date for filing his return. In addition, property may not be certified to the extent it appears that "by reason of profits derived through the recovery of wastes or otherwise in the operation of such property, its costs will be recovered over its actual useful life . . ." Section 168(e)(2). The term "profits" is not defined. Ordinarily, this would mean an excess of receipts over expenses including an allowance for the recovery of costs in the form of depreciation. Under this definition of "profits," costs would have to be recovered twice to prevent certification. Also, it is not clear whether some portion of costs could be certified if there were a partial recovery through "profits." In any case, certification depends upon a projection of "profits" which may not in fact be recognized.

If the certifying agency follows literally the requirements of section 168(d)(1)(B), certification will be very time-consuming and complex, and may involve difficult questions of financial and cost accounting. The cost of adequate presentation may dissipate the proposed benefits in many cases. It is suggested that the opportunity for abuse is not great and does not justify this complexity. The requirements of subsection (d)(1)(B) should be eliminated.

3. The House report's general explanation at page 198 indicates that additional first year depreciation under section 179 could be claimed even though the facility is amortized under section 168. It is doubtful that the proposal accomplishes this result. Section 170 allows an additional deduction only where a deduction is permitted under section 167. The deduction under section 168 is in lieu of a deduction under section 167. If it is intended to permit a deduction under section 170 as stated in the House report, that section should be appropriately amended.

4. Section 704 of the bill classifies pollution control facilities as section 1245 property. Consequently, adjustments to basis reflecting depreciation or amortization will result in ordinary income to the extent of any gain upon disposition. Under section 168(d)(4), a building that is "exclusively a treatment facility" may qualify for the amortization deduction. Such a building would therefore become subject to section 1245 rather than section 1250. There appears to be no reason why a building qualifying as a "treatment facility" should be subject to the provisions of section 1245 rather than those of section 1250.

The stated purpose of section 168 is to provide an incentive for taxpayers to invest in pollution control facilities. It is not clear why this purpose is not equally well served by investment in either new or used facilities. Nevertheless, the proposal grants the incentive only with respect to investment in new facilities. The fact that such a distinction existed under the investment credit—which was designed to achieve a quite different purpose—is not sufficient reason to adopt that distinction in this instance.

Section 704 does not deal wtih the question of salvage value. Presumably, salvage value is not to be taken into account as to the portion of the taxpayer's investment subject to amortization. The section also does not state whether accelerated depreciation is intended to be available after termination of the election. However, these deficiencies are also present in existing section 168, dealing with amortization of defense facilities, and presumably the rules to be developed under that section will apply.

5. Section 168 neither defines "adjust basis" nor specifies the treatment to be accorded to capital additions to qualifying property. These matters should be dealt with in the statute, as was done in the existing section 168 dealing with amortization of defense facilities.

Title VIII—Adjustment of Tax Burden for Individuals

Sec. 802. Fifty-Percent Maximum on Earned Income

Bill p. 354, § 802 [IRC new § 1348]

Fifty-Percent Maximum Rate on Earned Income

Section 802 of the bill adds section 1348 to provide in general that earned income is to be subject to a maximum tax rate of 50 percent.

The rule for calculating the maximum tax as set forth in section 1348(a) appears to have been drafted backwards. The references in the bill to "the lowest amount of taxable income on which the rate of tax under section 1 exceeds 50 percent," should be references to "the highest amount of taxable income on which the rate of tax under section 1 does not exceed 50 percent." See House report, part 2, p. 139.

The definition of "earned income" for purposes of the maximum provision excludes deferred compensation. This would seem to be an unwarranted discrimination against this method of compensation. It would work with particular harshness where the 50 percent limitation would have applied if the income had been paid when earned, and where, therefore, the throwback rule provided in proposed section 1354 is not applicable because it would not result in a higher tax than treatment of deferred compensation as income of the year in which it is received.

The provision has been drafted so that each increase in earned income pushes unearned income into a higher bracket. Thus, the effective rate on an additional amount of earned income will be 50 percent plus the increase it produces in the tax payable on the taxpayer's unearned income.[1] The formula under proposed section 1348(a) might be revised to provide that a taxpayer's unearned income plus his earned income up to the 50 percent tax bracket shall be taxed at normal graduated rates, with the excess of his earned income being taxed at 50 percent. If his unearned taxable income (unearned income less his deductions) standing alone would take the taxpayer past the 50 percent bracket, such income would be taxed at the normal rates and all of his earned income should be taxed at 50 percent.

[1] If the taxpayers in the example at page 140 of the House report, part 2, had $25,000 more earned income, their tax for 1971 would go up $18,826, not $12,500 as it would if the intent is to limit the tax burden on earned income to 50 percent.

SEC. 803. INTERMEDIATE TAX RATES; SURVIVING SPOUSE TREATMENT

Bill pp. 356–358, § 803(a)(2)(E) [IRC amended § 1(b)(3)]

Intermediate Tax Rates; Surviving Spouse Treatment

Section 803(a)(2)(E) provides that for the purpose of determining whether an individual who has been married is entitled to the new "intermediate tax rate," only the last marriage shall be considered. This provision could result in a hardship where a surviving spouse has remarried and the second marriage has been terminated by annulment or divorce.

SEC. 805. COLLECTION OF INCOME TAX AT SOURCE ON WAGES

Collection of Income Tax at Source on Wages

The provisions of this section are intended to bring the withholding tables in line with the new income tax rates prescribed by section 1 and the low income allowance.

1. The proposed amendment to section 3402(a) requires that the tables to be prescribed by the Secretary be the same as the tables contained in this subsection as in effect before August 1, 1969, except that they be computed on the basis of the rates prescribed by section 1. The present statutory framework is too rigid for practical application where payrolls are computerized. This fact has been recognized in Revenue Ruling 66–328, 1966–2 C.B. 454. The necessary flexibility would be achieved if in line 17 of page 366 of the bill the word "substantially" were inserted after the words "shall be" and before the words "the same."

2. The withholding allowance provisions of section 3402(m) are keyed to the value of a withholding exemption and the percentage rate of the standard deduction. The current value of a withholding exemption and rate of the standard deduction are revised by sections 801-805 of the bill. In 1972 the applicable percentage for the standard deduction will be 15 percent of adjusted gross income. Withholding tables will be structured on the basis of an annual value of $600 for each withholding exemption. If section 3402(m) is not amended the following result will occur where an unmarried individual with adjusted gross income of $6,000 is entitled to $1,500 in itemized deductions:

A. Taxable income will equal $6000 less $1500 less one exemption of $600 for a total of $3900.

B. The new withholding tables will compute an amount for withheld tax on the basis of a taxable income of $6000 less $1100 (low income allowance) less $600 for a total of $4300.

C. The taxpayer will be entitled to one withholding allowance $\left(\frac{$1,500-$600}{$700}\right)$ under section 3402(m) and by taking advantage of the allowance (which is treated as if denominated an exemption) will have withheld an amount of tax on the basis of a taxable income of $6000 less $1100 (low income allowance) less $1200 (2 exemptions) for a total of $3700.

This amount is $200 less than his actual taxable income. Thus, by using the present withholding allowance provisions the taxpayer would be able to reduce his withholding below the amount of his tax liability.

The CHAIRMAN. I apologize to Congressman Vanik. It was an inadvertence that his name was not included in the mimeographed list of witnesses. We do apologize for that and we are pleased to have you here.

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES A. VANIK, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE 22D CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF OHIO

Representative VANIK. Mr. Chairman, after 6 months of this tax reform proposal on our side I can fully appreciate the problem which confronts you. While I must say that our work on the House side was not perfect, I think you will agree that most of our deliberations were extensive and exhaustive and they were well intentioned.

Section by section we approved most of the language of the bill that came here by almost unanimous vote, and I think that that is pretty much borne out by the report.

With this in mind, I must tell you that I endorse the principal provisions of our work.

Our decisions were made in response to what we determined was an overwhelming mandate which each of us had received from our constituencies, and I do not believe that that urgency has diminished. But neither the House nor the Ways and Means Committee initiated the drive for tax reform. We were pushed into it by angry taxpayers. We were pushed into it by disclosures of tax abuse, and as these matters came to light I think it added fuel to the fire. I think frankly, Mr. Chairman, that the alternative to tax reform is something like an open tax revolt.

There are those who would desire for one reason or another to keep reform in suspension as a political issue. I would rather see a fair and reasonable proposal written into the law. The reform proposal in my judgment is in many instances only a soft touch on tax privilege. It is not any heavy hand. It is certainly a lot less than I would like to see in certain areas. But it deals with no citizen unfairly, and I think it is a step that we must take toward tax justice.

There are those who criticize our efforts to impose a minimum tax on the wealthy, and this criticism may be proper, but then I think those who criticize it must find some other way to insure that those people who have large income can contribute to the tax burdens of the country. I think the American public demands it. And I think that if such an alternative can be devised, it might be helpful to all of us to take it under consideration.

I would like to direct my attention now to the treatment of the oil depletion allowance. Considering what could have happened, the small reduction in the depletion allowance enacted by the House is what I would believe a minimum, a minimum that could be embodied in a reform bill, and there could be no tax reform bill without some reduction of the oil tax privileges. Nothing was done about the intangible drilling costs, the accounting procedures, and several other devices that spare oil taxation.

It seems to me that the oil industry should be able to assume this taxation without threats to increase consumer prices. I do not believe that blackmail of this type will work on either the Congress or the consumer.

Domestic oil prices are substantially controlled by State commissions working in unison toward price stability through production controls. Foreign oil import controls further prop-up domestic oil prices at a consumer cost of billions of dollars. The authenticity of reports of depleted reserves must be questioned in light of the advantages that are inherent in suppressing reported reserves in an effort to shelter these reserves from taxation.

There was some talk before our committee about the natural gas shortage, and I think we dispelled the myth of the shortage within the record that was made in the House Ways and Means Committee, and I believe that although the administration has finally agreed to accept the House recommendations for a reduction in the depletion allowance to 20 percent, they favor retaining the foreign oil depletion allowance, which was completely eliminated by the House.

There is no rational legislative reason, Mr. Chairman, for extending the privilege of the depletion allowance to foreign produced oil. The combination of the depletion allowance and the foreign tax credit have made most of these profits tax-free. These tax-free profits of American investment in foreign oil have corrupted and they have misdirected American foreign policy in many oil-rich countries.

This has resulted in American policies of costly military assistance and involvement, in support of temporary rulers who will undoubtedly be removed when their people find out what is going on.

There is no reason for the American taxpayer to subsidize these activities. In some of the provisions of the reform bill there may be room for improvement particularly with respect to the language on charitable giving, and I also hope that your committee will consider providing taxpayer relief by increased exemptions instead of reducing the rate to the extent that we have.

From projections of tax receipts which I have seen, it would seem feasible to increase exemptions at the rate of $100 per year per dependent for the next 4 years until the dependency allowance reaches $1,000 per dependent. Every taxpayer relates the dependency exemption to the actual present-day costs of support. To the taxpayer this is far more meaningful than increased standard deductions which disregard family size.

In considering a taxpayer's fair share of taxation, it is important to know how a taxpayer must divide his available income among his dependents, and this is hardly a boon even to the wealthy taxpayer whose expense in supporting dependents escalates with his station in life.

Poverty and large families are synonymous. Increased exemptions are the only method that I know of to relate the need for tax relief to family size.

One major objective of tax reform in the House which was not achieved is the critical need for simplification in tax returns and payment procedures. This is an area in which the chairman has made some very strong and forceful positions. For the individual taxpayer there is a need for a simplified appeal procedure.

As it stands now the tax court procedure is a court for the wealthy. Less than 1 percent of the challenged cases reach the appellate division of the Internal Revenue Service. Some lawyers argue that it is not feasible to take up a tax dispute unless the tax claim is upwards of $10,000. What would be wrong with a system of small tax claim referees who could establish essential facts in small claims and provide a necessary and a human service for the average taxpayer?

And then, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point to one major oversight. In these days of high interest it apears that the Internal Revenue Service is being used as a bank by tax delinquents who pay 6 percent interest on taxes owed the Federal Government, using the tax monies for other purposes. According to the latest Internal Revenue Service figures provided to my office, interest on delinquent taxes owed to the U.S. Treasury by individuals and corporations in fiscal 1969 amounted to over $567 million. This amount of interest would indicate a $9½ billion tax delinquency. At this rate the tax delinquency will increase in fiscal 1970 by 12 percent, or over $11 billion.

There is no joy to the Treasury in collecting interest at 6 percent. Who can get money cheaper than that today? The delinquent taxpayer can invest these funds in Federal bonds at 8 percent and profit by the arbitrage. If a taxpayer, for example, has a tax liability of $12,000, he pays the Government $720 for delinquent, and saves $240 simply by investing what would otherwise be his tax money in 8 percent Federal bonds.

Now, in addition to that, it is incredible but the delinquent taxpayer has another gimmick. He can get a writeoff against his current taxes for the interest he pays the Internal Revenue Service on his delinquent tax bill. The reward for delinquency adds a cruel insult to the average taxpayer who has to pay his tax bill before it is due.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the tax reform proposal should be amended to raise in some way the interest rate for delinquency, and bring it in line with normal charges, and to eliminate deduction for interest paid on delinquent taxes.

Mr. Chairman, I know that your committee is critically pressed for time in your deliberations, but there is a sense of urgency about tax reform which should prompt us to make difficult and responsible decisions this year.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Senator MILLER. First, just an overall comment.

Congressman, the thing that troubles me about the overall tax bill, and I speak only for myself, is that it seems that what the House did was not just to go after this income that is not being taxed or the income that results in very little tax, not to just go after that by the use of the limit on tax preferences, and the allocation of deductions, but then it dumped in on top of that all of these other provisions attacking this kind of income. In other words, it doubles up, as I see it.

Now, if the House had taken one approach or the other that would be one thing, but because they did everything, we have received a great amount of testimony which indicates that we might promote inflation, we could promote a recession, we could aggravate the high interest rates that people are suffering here today, and I just thought I would make that comment to you.

Although I recognize that I do this as a tax lawyer, you can skillfully penetrate some of these areas of tax avoidance by specific approaches. If you use that approach, that is one thing. But when you come along and use the limit on tax preferences or the minimum tax approach and the allocation of deductions on top of that, it seems to me you have gone too far.

Now, just a comment about my reaction to what the House has done on percentage depletion, and when I talk about that I am not just referring to the petroleum industry. I am referring to all these other extractive industries. What the House has done in effect is this. Take two petroleum corporations, A and B. A has $1 million of percentage depletion, B has $1 million of percentage depletion. A takes the million dollars of percentage depletions and plows it back into the drilling and development and exploration for the purpose of expanding the resources for the good and the benefit of the people of this country. B does not do anything with it except perhaps pay it out to shareholders. What you have done is to treat them exactly the same, and that is why I refer to it as a meat ax approach.

I cannot justify treating those two entities the same way, but you have.

And then on the exemption I must tell you that my reaction to increasing the exemptions is this. You advocate increasing the personal exemptions from $600 to $1,000. For taxpayers in the 20-percent bracket, that $400 would give them a tax break of $80, but for taxpayers in the 70-percent bracket, that would give them a tax break of $280, and it seems to me that that approach tends along the lines of making the rich richer and the poor poorer, and is a very regressive way of handling it.

You said you have not found any other way of handling it. I suggest to you most respectfully that another way of handling it is to get off the exemption approach and use the tax credit approach, so that whether you are in the 70-percent tax bracket or 20-percent tax bracket, you get so much tax cut, and it is all the same for each dependent.

Now I know you have not proposed that in the House bill. It may take quite a bit of time to go into it, but I offer that to you as an alternative.

Representative VANIK. Mr. Chairman, we have talked about the tax credit proposal. We did it extensively in committee. What I was suggesting was an alternative to the increased standard deduction because that failed to reach the problem of family size. The tax credit approach would reach that problem.

I might point out in my statement I did indicate that a wealthy person with dependents in proportion to his station in life certainly spends more for his dependents, as many of you know, than a person of lower income level. I would suppose that supporting an exemption in some levels might run into thousands and thousands of dollars.

I do not know how you can work out either proposal, either a tax credit proposal or an exemption proposal without proposing some increased advantage for persons of higher income levels, because even a tax credit proposal would result in a lesser way but would provide some greater reduction for the persons in higher income bracket from those in the lower bracket.

Senator MILLER. May I suggest to you that the higher income individual can afford to do that, and why should he have a higher tax break for his child than the lower income taxpayer? I cannot understand it. Our tax code takes a different approach through the graduated income tax rate.

Representative VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I must just say with respect to the point on oil, we discussed those provisions very extensively. We discussed alternative procedures, and it was our best judgment that while we could not take care of all situations, that we felt that the depletion cut would be the most effective, and it was certainly the simpler way of handling the problem. If you deal with simplicity in returns, and in the calculation of tax, you get into more complications when you try to meet the problems of every situation.

Thank you, gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Congressman Vanik.

Representative VANIK. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Mr. Donald H. Gleason, on behalf of the National Association of Manufacturers, Washington, D.C.

STATEMENT OF DONALD H. GLEASON, REPRESENTING THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. GLEASON. Mr. Chairman and members of the Finance Committee, my name is Donald H. Gleason. I am vice president Finance CPC International, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, N.J. I appear here on behalf of NAM as a member of its taxation committee and chairman of its International Taxation Subcommittee.

Our members produce approximately three-quarters of the manufactured goods in the United States, and employ a commensurate number of workers in our labor force. While the interests of our members are somewhat diverse, our full written statement which we ask be included in your printed record deals with a number of provisions which are all of interest to our members and upon which we have a strong consensus.

I am not going to enumerate these, but I am going to refer generally only to one, and that is the anticapital formation thrust of the bill.

In the press and elsewhere a number of provisions of the code have been referred to as loopholes. These provisions, special provisions if you will, were enacted after long and careful study by the Congress and some have pretty well stood the test of time in their opration. Our economic way of life has been influenced by and has adapted itself to them. And some of the changes which are suggested by the bill in the interest of closing loopholes will certainly create confusion, and indeed will be to the economic detriment of the country as a whole, if they are enacted.

Two provisions in this category come to my mind. These two are not included as subjects of our detailed written statement for these do not directly relate to manufacturing companies, nor were they specifically considered by our committee. The first is the proposal to tax with some limitations gifts of certain types of appreciated property to charities, schools, foundations and so on.

If this provision is enacted, the very tenuous financial stability of many of these institutions will be jeopardized, for a very substantial portion of the giving which now supports them will cease.

The second is the backdoor tinkering with the tax exclusion for State and municipal bond interest. Constitutional questions aside, when one considers the problems which our largest cities and towns now face, inhibiting in any way the ability of these entities to borrow is short-sighted in the extreme.

The resulting thrust of this bill in its endeavor to close loopholes emphasizes its most serious drawback, that is its negative implication for the capital formation and the real growth in the economy.

As George Champion recently stated, the capital shortage in this country and indeed it is worldwide, has been worsening for many years, and unless this shortage can be corrected reasonably soon, it will create a tragedy in human misery and world unrest. Witness right now what has happened to interest rates.

The American worker now enjoys the highest standard of living in the world, because someone has invested $15,000 to $20,000 in the tools that he works with in his job. He is able to do his job because of his education. He has time to think, read and dream because he is prosperous by any reasonable comparison, and he is prosperous because capital has been invested in him.

Population pressures, both here and abroad, are increasing, and the required capital to put additional workers into constructive and creative jobs is becoming enormous. All economists I think will agree that one of the keys to the problem of inflation, which we now face, is the productivity in real goods of the worker. He cannot work efficiently without capital support, and indeed if this is lacking, it can only result in further inflation and indeed ultimate chaos.

Intelligent planning for the efficient use of the tax dollar is certainly a must. As Assistant Secretary Cohen recently advised you, about $5 billion of the estimated $8 billion of revenues raised in the bill would be added to the tax burden of corporate taxpayers. While the direct impact would very according to the type of business, the overall burden is equivalent to approximately a 12-percent increase in corporate tax liability at current levels, and it ladles out substantial tax reductions for lower- and middle-income individuals from whom little or nor risk capital can be expected to be generated.

No rate reduction at all, even prospective, has been provided for the corporate sector, the major generating mechanism for the creation of risk capital and the tools for more efficient production.

We would like to again point out that the proposal to repeal the credit was originally made last spring in response to short-term economic circumstances, but now alas has become a part of the task reform program involving a massive redistribution of tax burdens on a long-term basis.

Whatever the arguments for or against the various provisions on an individual or narrow basis, their cumulative impact is a serious blow at domestic investment, a stunting of our economic growth, and a weakening of our competitive position abroad. This can only lead to further inflation.

The administration has proposed a tax cut of 1 percentage point of the corporate tax rate for 1971, and another percentage point for 1972. This would help in part to redress the imbalance of the bill, but it would still mean a very substantial increase in tax burdens in the corporate sector.

We recommend a cut of at least 5 percentage points to be spread out over a 5-year period, say 1971 to 1976. As pointed out by Secretary Kennedy, we do not know how stable the economy will be in the 1970's, and a large net tax reduction bunched over a 2-year period as provided in H.R. 13270, could have considerable inflationary consequences.

The important thing is our opinion is not only in the specific timing but a legislative commitment to rate reduction to assure adequate capital formation over the long term.

I think I will stop here now, in the interests of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Senator BYRD. Could I make a brief comment.

You mentioned the Nation having the highest standard of living of any in the world for the average citizen. I think that is certainly correct. And you mentioned that in the context of not destroying investment incentive. Your point I believe is that it takes a great deal of investment and there must be incentive for investment in order to provide the jobs at the wages which this country now enjoys. That is the burden of your thought in that regard, I believe?

Mr. GLEASON. Well, with the increase in technology, I think I would add to that that it is getting more and more expensive to appropriately equip a worker for efficient production. The efficiency of the production of the worker is the only ultimate thing that can kill inflation. We are saying the same thing perhaps.

Senator BYRD. I think you make a good point in that regard. Whatever the committee and the Congress does in regard to tax legislation you feel it is important that the Congress does not destroy investment incentive if we are going to maintain this high standard of living?

Mr. GLEASON. I do, sir.

Senator BYRD. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. I have read through your statement and I agree with quite a bit of what you have said.

Mr. GLEASON. Thank you, sir.

(Mr. Gleason's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF DONALD H. GLEASON, REPRESENTING THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS

SUMMARY

The most serious drawback of H.R. 13270 is its negative implications for capital formation and real growth of the economy. This is apparent in the provisions to repeal the 7% investment credit, increase the corporate capital gains tax, repeal the alternative capital gains tax for individuals, drastically restrict the depreciation treatment of commercial and industrial real estate, and change the tax treatment of natural resource industries. The cumulative impact of these provisions could be a serious blow at domestic investment and our competitive stance abroad.

The most obvious means to help assure adequate capital formation for the future is a significant cut in the corporate income tax rate. We recommend a cut of at least five percentage points spread over a five-year period from 1971–1976. A legislative commitment to rate reduction is more important than the specific timing.

The proposal for the tax treatment of deferred compensation would add great complexity to the Code, even though no abuse has been shown and there is slight revenue effect. The NAM also opposes sections of the bill relating to lump-sum distributions and the foreign tax credit. Good, but incomplete, starts are made in the bill with respect to moving expenses, taxation of cooperatives and pollution control.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee on Finance, my name is Donald H. Gleason, and I am vice president-finance of CPC International, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey.

I appear here on behalf of the National Association of Manufacturers as a member of its Taxation Committee and Chairman of its International Taxation

Subcommittee. My statement will deal with a number of provisions of H.R. 13270, "The Tax Reform Act of 1969."

Without any prejudice to the need for tax reform in a number of areas or the hard work put in by the Committee on Ways and Means, we submit that the very haste accompanying adoption of this bill in the House, with major changes being made right up to the last minute, has allowed some serious distortions to mar it. In this testimony we shall outline means to correct what we feel are its principal flaws and make other suggestions for its improvement.

I. Anticapital formation thrust of the bill

By far the most serious drawback of H.R. 13270 is its negative implications for capital formation and real growth of the economy. An estimated $5 billion of the $8 billion of revenues raised by the bill over the long term would be added tax burdens on corporations. While the direct impact would vary according to the type of business, the overall burden would be equivalent to a 12-percent increase in corporate tax liability at current levels. And while the House bill provides substantial tax reductions for lower- and middle-income individuals, no rate reduction at all has been provided for the corporate sector.

It should be emphasized that these estimates, based on "straight-line" projections of revenues without accounting for normal economic growth or inflation, undoubtedly understate the true damage to be done to the corporate sector. In fact, we have serious doubts about the estimates of the bill's revenue shifts throughout, owing to the extreme complexity of so many of its provisions.

Thus, we certainly concur with Secretary Kennedy that the bill is "overweighted in favor of consumption" and "could impede economic growth in the years ahead by curtailing the incentive to make productive investments."

The anti-capital formation thrust of this bill is most obvious in the provision to repeal the 7% investment credit. We already have presented our views on this before your Committee, and in recognition of your instructions, will not dwell on the issue. However, we would like to point out that the proposal to repeal the credit was made originally last spring in response to short-term economic circumstances but is now part of tax reform program involving a massive redistribution of tax burdens on a long-term basis. It is joined by several other provisions of H.R. 13270 which would have a similar effect, including an increase in the corporate capital gains tax and repeal of the alternative capital gains tax for individuals, a drastic restriction of the depreciation treatment for commercial and industrial real estate, and proposed changes in the tax treatment of natural resource industries. Whatever the arguments for and against these provisions on an individual basis, their cumulative impact would be a serious blow to domestic investment, an inducement to send funds abroad, a weakening of our competitive stance abroad, and a stunting of our economic growth.

We recognize that in the particular circumstances of late 1969, capping a long boom in business capital spending, large increases in such investments are not needed. But the boom will not last forever. In fact, there are plenty of signs right now that the boom is petering out—that the long business expansion in general is weakening and that capital spending in particular shortly will be on the wane. Therefore, we should be thinking of the kind of tax system that will be appropriate to the economic conditions that will prevail for the long term after the boom is over.

We feel strongly that this tax system should not penalize domestic capital formation—growth of which is essential to provide adequate jobs in the 1970's for the large number of new entrants into the labor supply. Anyone who has even a casual knowledge of interest rate trends will recognize the worsening, worldwide capital shortage today, and that regardless of the fate of the investment credit, we will be in great need of a favorable climate to assure an adequate capital supply in the 1970's.

The most obvious means to help assure this climate is to provide some general corporate tax relief in the form of a significant cut in the corporate income tax rate. Many studies have indicated the perverse effect of the high corporate income tax on capital formation, efficient allocation of resources and economic growth. It is a tax of uncertain and varying incidence, the only certainty being that the real burden is not borne by corporations at all, but by live human beings who may in varying degrees be investors, workers or consumers.

The economic distortions created by any tax tend to be proportional to the rate of the tax. Lowering the corporate rate in general would reduce the distortions. Therefore we strongly urge your Committee to recommend a significant reduction in the corporate income tax rate to take effect along with the cuts you propose for individual taxpayers.

The Administration has proposed a cut of one percentage point in the corporate tax rate for 1971 and another percentage point for 1972. This would help redress the imbalance of the bill, but still would mean a very substantial increase in tax burdens on the corporate sector. We recommend a cut of at least five percentage points to be spread over a five-year period 1971–1976. When fully effective this would mean a reduction of approximately $4 billion in corporate income taxes, substantially less than the relief proposed for individuals under H.R. 13270. Of course, the extent to which this could be characterized as true "relief" for the corporate sector would depend on how Congress acts with respect to other provisions of the bill. Repeal of the investment credit, for example, would almost completely offset the corporate tax reduction that we propose.

As pointed out by Secretary Kennedy, we don't know how stable the economy will be in the early 1970's, and large net tax reductions bunched over a two-year period, as provided in H.R. 13270, could have considerable inflationary consequences. The important thing in our opinion is not the specific timing but a legislative commitment to rate reduction to assure adequate capital formation over the long-term.

II—Capital Gains

From a revenue standpoint, the most significant provision of H.R. 13270 in the capital gains area would remove the alternative tax rate for individuals. This would result in an estimated $360 million revenue increase on an annual basis.

According to the Report of the Ways and Means Committee, this provision is justified to bring capital gains treatment more in line with the progressive rate structure. In fact, coming on top of the proposal for a minimum income tax (or LTP) and allocation of deductions, the thrust of this bill emphasizes the ability-to-pay principle to the exclusion of everything else, including simplicity and possible basic economic dislocations. No consideration is given to the impact of eliminating the 25% ceiling on the provision of risk capital as an essential ingredient for the growth of many new enterprises, and as a crucial motivator of effort in our society. Certainly before the ability-to-pay principle is extended in this manner, more serious consideration should be given to possible economic and other effects, and indeed, to whether or not capital gains should even be considered part of regular income taxation.

H.R. 13270 also proposes extension of the six-month holding period to one year for qualification for long-term capital gains treatment. Whether or not your Committee adopts this proposal, we urge you to consider lowering the existing capital gains rate schedule for productive investments held over a substantial period, say ten years or more. Appreciation in shares of closely-held firms, for example, where there is a clear-cut case of capital transfer rather than receiving of income, should receive more favorable treatment, and the drift of H.R. 13270, if enacted in a form close to what has been proposed, would greatly increase the need for such treatment.

Alternative corporate capital gains rate

The case for moderate taxation of corporate capital gains is esentially the same as that for individuals' capital gains—to encourage the provision of risk capital for the expansion of new enterprise or re-invigoration of existing businesses. In view of the obvious need for such treatment in a dynamic enterprise economy, it is extremely difficult to follow the rationale for raising the alternative corporate capital gains tax from 25% to 30% on income over $25,000 as provided in H.R. 13270.

As stated in the Ways and Means Committee Report, H.R. 13270 would eliminate the alternative tax for individuals raising the maximum rate to 32.5% (after 1972) and, therefore, "a comparable adjustment should be made to the corporate alternative tax." But even if one accepts the bill's case for extending the ability-to-pay principle to individuals' capital gains, this is hardly grounds for heavier taxation of the corporate sector accounting for well over 90% of all net corporate capital gains.

Since, as the Report acknowledges, corporate incomes are subject to only a one-step graduation of $25,000, while individuals are subject to 25 steps of graduation, the question of ability to pay is involved in corporate capital gains only by the most tortuous reasoning. Certainly, a one-step graduation in corporate income taxation was never intended to serve as a model of progression to penalize larger enterprises.

Adoption of the proposal would raise the corporate capital gains rate to substantially more than half of the regular corporate rate of 48% (exclusive of the surcharge). Not even under H.R. 13270's punitive measures for treatment of individuals' capital gains would any individual pay a capital gains rate more than half his top regular rate.

We see no reason why this proposed provision should be considered a tax "reform" or how the present system of corporate capital gains taxation could be considered an abuse. We are at a loss to understand why it has been included in this general tax reform bill except, of course, to provide additional revenue without regard to the economic consequences. We strongly urge your Committee to reject this short-sighted approach and recommend against increasing the corporate capital gains tax.

Lump-sum distributions

The House-passed bill is defective, we feel, in regard to the proposal to change the rules governing the taxation of lump-sum distributions from qualified employees pension, profit-sharing, stock-bonus, or annuity plans.

Under present law, distributions to an employee from a qualified plan are taxed to the employee when he receives them. Generally speaking, the distributions are taxed at ordinary income rates, based on the employee's total taxable income in the year of receipt. An exception to this rule was enacted by Congress in 1942. It provides that when an employee receives his total distribution within a single taxable year, the amount of the distribution will be taxed as long-term capital gain. This exception was enacted in recognition of the inequity of taxing as ordinary income amounts which are attributable to many taxable years.

The House-passed bill proposes to change the present law regarding lump-sum distributions so that all amounts received by the employee which are represented by the employer's contributions over the years will be taxed as ordinary income. Capital gain treatment would be limited solely to the net taxable portion of the distribution in excess of the employer's contribution. The amount represented by the employee's contribution is, of course, not taxed since it represents his investment in the plan and is thus a return on his investment. Under the House proposal, the portion of the distribution treated as ordinary income would be averageable under a five-year forward averaging provisions.

We do not believe that the House proposal to change the taxation of lump-sum distributions should be enacted. The present law has been in effect for 27 years and has worked well to reflect the long period of time during which employees accumulate benefits under qualified plans. At least five million employees currently are accumulating such benefits. The present law also has the advantage of being easily understood by taxpayers and simple to administer. In addition, there has been no showing that the present law has been abused, and neither the Johnson nor the Nixon Administration advocated changes in the present rules.

Perhaps the primary defect of the House proposal is its extreme complexity. In fact, it is inconceivable that the ordinary taxpayer would be able to compute his tax liability under the proposed rules without assistance of a tax consultant. Several steps will be necessary in each computation and much of the information necessary for the computation will not be readily available to the employee. Thus, it is certain that the cost of compliance and administration will be significantly higher under the proposed rules than under current law.

Another defect of the House proposal is its failure to adequately take into account the fact that many employees accumulate benefits in qualified plans for as long as 30 years or more. The five-year averaging device proposed by the House is clearly defective since its maximum effect would be a five-year spread out and it would not operate until five years after the employee has received the lump-sum distribution and paid tax based on his income in the year of the distribution. In other words, under the House proposal a taxpayer would pay a tax in the year of distribution based on the full taxable amount of the distribution and his other taxable income, and he would be required to wait five years before seeing whether the so-called "averaging" device entitles him to a refund for overpayment of tax. The taxpayer would thus be deprived of the overpayment during the five-year period, and would have to go to the trouble of filing for a refund of taxes which he never in fact owed. The defect of this rule is even clearer when one considers that the taxpayers to which it applies will in many cases be retired employees who may well need the money in order to provide for their retirement.

Certainly, if the Congress does change the rules governing lump-sum distributions, we would advocate that averaging be permitted on a prospective as well as a retroactive basis.

In analyzing the House proposal, it is also necessary, we feel, to consider two other provisions of the House bill. The first of these is the proposal to remove the 25% maximum alternative rate on capital gains of individuals. This proposal will, when coupled with the proposal regarding lump-sum distributions, deal a double blow to employees receiving lump-sum distributions, for this would conceivably result in a higher tax rate being applied to even that portion of the distribution which will continue to be taxed as capital gain. In view of this, we feel that if the Congress does adopt the House proposals that it retain the maximum 25% alternative rate at least in this instance.

The second House proposal which should be considered, we feel, is the provision to place a 50% ceiling on the tax rate on earned income. As presently drafted this provision does not apply to lump-sum distributions, and thus although treated by the House as earned income, such distributions could conceivably be taxed at rates higher than 50%. There does not seem to be any rationale for this discriminatory treatment, and we would hope that if the House's proposal on lump-sum distributions is adopted, such distributions will be made subject to the 50% limit on earned income.

III—Deferred compensation

One of the primary concerns of the NAM regarding the House-passed bill is its proposed change of the rules governing the taxation of deferred compensation not involving restricted stock.

Of all the changes proposed by the bill, this is perhaps the most striking example of the addition of extreme complexity to the Code even though no abuse has been shown and where the effect of the change could well reduce rather than increase federal revenues.

Under present laws, if an employee and an employer contract that the employee's services will be compensated both during and after his tenure with the employer and the amount which the employee is to receive after separation is not at his disposal until that time, the employee is not taxed until he actually receives the income. When he receives the income, the employee is taxed at ordinary income rates based on his total net income in the year of receipt. No income escapes taxation, no capital gains treatment is involved, and the employer is not allowed a deduction until the income is actually paid out. The current method of taxing such income has been upheld in many court cases, and was officially sanctioned by the Treasury Department in 1960 in Revenue Ruling 60–31. Innumerable companies have built their compensation structures in reliance on these authorities.

The House proposes to drastically alter the rules governing the taxation of deferred compensation. Under its proposal, deferred compensation would continue to be taxed in the year of receipt, but the amount of the tax would be computed as if the employee had received the deferred compensation during his service with the employer. This fictional approach would, as far as the amount of the tax is concerned, result in the employee paying tax as if he had the use and benefit of the income during the time that it was being retained by the employer. This fundamental break with traditional tax principles would, we believe, have several negative results.

One of the obvious difficulties with the House's proposal is the problem of compliance and administration. Although some of the details of the proposed rules are to be developed in Treasury Regulations, the basic structure of the proposal is contained in the House bill. This structure is both historic in effect and monumental in complexity. It provides that deferred compensation in excess of $10,000 received during a taxable year will be subject to a so-called minimum tax, which is arrived at by looking back to the employee's taxable years during his service with the employer paying the deferred compensation. The minimum tax is to be the lower of two alternative amounts. The first alternative amount of minimum tax is the aggregate increase in tax resulting from adding to the employee's taxable income for each taxable year in which the excess is deemed to have been earned, the portion of the excess over $10,000 deemed to have been earned in that taxable year. For this purpose, the deferred compensation is deemed to have been earned ratably over the employee's entire period of service with the employer. Under the second alternative, an average increase in tax is computed by adding to the employee's taxable income for the three taxable years for which his taxable income is highest during the last ten years of the earning period, the portion of the excess over $10,000 deemed to have been earned in those three years. This average increase is then multiplied by the number of taxable years in the earning period, to determine the total tax. The mere statement of these rules clearly indicates the problems which would arise in complying with and in administering the House proposal.

An even more basic difficulty with the House proposal is the impact the proposal would have on the entire concept of deferred compensation arrangements.

Deferred compensation arrangements antedate the income tax laws, and are used by thousands of companies, both large and small. A 1969 report of the National Industrial Conference Board, Inc., based on data obtained from a large sampling of firms, indicates that 51% of surveyed manufacturing companies and 65% of surveyed retail companies (most of which, of course, are relatively small firms) have deferred compensation programs.

There are many reasons for the use of deferred compensation plans other than tax reasons. From the employee's point of view, a deferred compensation arrangement offers a means of averaging his compensation and providing for his retirement period. The concern is not primarily to have these earnings taxed at lower rates, but rather to provide a "spread-out" of earnings over the actual rather than economic life of an employee.

From the point of view of the employer, deferred compensation arrangements have basic benefits in that they permit the employing company to retain amounts that would otherwise be paid out as current compensation and, when the amount of the deferred compensation is based on the market price of the company's stock or the amount of dividends paid on the company's stock, there is a continuing incentive to the employee to improve the profitability of the company. The flexibility available to an employer through the use of deferred compensation plans increases the likelihood that he will be able to motivate employees successfully. The variety of interests and needs of employees is virtually as great as the number of employees. To say, as does the Committee Report of the House, that deferred compensation is primarily used by the already highly paid is merely another way of recognizing that it is a useful compensation arrangement.

The benefits available to companies through the use of deferred compensation plans are applicable to small companies as well as large. In some respects they are especially important to small and medium sized companies who cannot afford large fixed salary commitments and who face economic uncertainties and possible future financial difficulties. In fact, a deferred compensation plan is one of the primary ways a small company can attract and retain competent executives and technical personnel who might otherwise prefer a larger current salary from a bigger company.

Enactment of the House proposal, we believe, would result in the termination of the use of deferred compensation plans. If employees are going to be taxed as if they had received income in earlier years, many will naturally wish to receive the income in the form of current compensation. One result of the termination of deferred compensation plans, we believe, would be to encourage the piracy of employees by those companies who are willing and able to pay higher current compensation, thus interfering with stable long term employment relationships. Another result, we believe, would be a reduction in federal revenues. The House Committee Report estimated a slight gain in revenues from the adoption of this proposal. However, this estimate was based on the assumption that deferred compensation arrangements would be continued in their present form, with the only change being that the deferred compensation would be taxed at the presumably higher tax rates of an employee's earning years. As indicated, we do not feel that this is a valid assumption. To the contrary, we feel that the House proposal would result in a shift to current compensation arrangements or to more extensive use of qualified pension and profit-sharing plans. In either case, the corporation would be entitled to a current deduction in the full amount paid out as salary or contributed to a plan. Since the corporate tax rate will undoubtedly be higher than the average of the tax rates of the applicable employees, and since in the case of qualified plans taxation of the employees will be deferred until receipt of the benefits, the result could be a loss in federal revenues.

Another difficulty with the House proposal is its inconsistency with the provision in the House bill which would limit the marginal tax rate on earned income to 50%. As it passed the House, this provision would not apply to deferred compensation. Thus, deferred compensation would in effect be subject to prejudicial tax treatment, since unlike current compensation it could, under the House bill, be taxed at rates higher than 50%. There is no rationale for this prejudicial treatment and it would clearly increase the likelihood that the use of deferred compensation arrangements would be terminated.

In sum, we feel that the House proposal would add a complicated and fictional rule to an already complex tax code, and would change the law in an area where no abuse has been shown. Deferred compensation arrangements are firmly based in the economy, there are many non-tax reasons for their use, and no income escapes taxation. Furthermore, unlike the House proposal, the current method of taxing deferred compensation is soundly based in tax theory. Virtually all employees are cash basis taxpayers, and under the cash method of accounting, income is not taxed until it has been actually or constructively received. Yet, the effect of the House proposal would be to tax employees receiving deferred compensation as if they had received the income during earlier years. For all of these reasons, we agree with the Administration that there should be no hasty legislation in this area.

IV—Real estate depreciation

Section 521(a) of the bill would deny the use of accelerated depreciation methods to new depreciable real property (other than residential) and would require that the straight-line method be used for such used property.

The report of the Ways and Means Committee indicates that its purpose is primarily to eliminate the trading in losses and opportunities for tax avoidance which are primarily of benefit to the real estate operator. However, although the committee's purpose hardly applies, even depreciable real estate constructed or acquired for use as an integral part of manufacturing and other business and industrial operations would be included under these very broad provisions. Nonspeculative properties of this type, whether factories, warehouses, or office buildings, are essential to the modernization of industrial capacity and, therefore make a constructive contribution to increased productivity and real economic growth.

The haste with which this section was conceived is clearly evident in that it follows by only a couple of months the Administration's announced plans to explore liberalization of depreciation allowances for productive facilities. We strongly urge your Committee to revise Section 521(a) to ensure that accelerated depreciation methods continue to apply to real estate used for its intended function by the owner in the active conduct of his trade or business.

V—Depletion

H.R. 13270 would reduce rates of depletion allowance for various minerals, most notably that for petroleum from 27½% to 20%. We believe this would be unwise. The continued existence of a sound extractive natural resources industry requires recognition in the tax laws that this industry is unique in that it exhausts its assets in the course of operations. Currently, exploration for, and discovery and development of, new mineral deposits are becoming even more difficult, more costly, and financially more hazardous. Therefore, we believe that, not only should adequate provision be made for the current deduction of research, prospecting, exploration and development costs, or deferment at the election of the taxpayer, but percentage depletion allowances at not less than existing rates should be continued. We strongly urge the Committee to delete from the bill provisions for reductions in the rates of percentage depletion allowances.

VI—Foreign tax credit

Foreign business activities play an important role in U.S. foreign economic relations and policies. Such activities abroad are exposed to greater risks than are business activities in the United States and must compete with foreign enterprise often subsidized and often subject to lower basic tax rate. Consequently, business income earned abroad by United States enterprises should be afforded tax treatment which gives due consideration to the additional factors involved.

Nevertheless, not a single one of the many suggestions made by industry representatives and others for relief of unnecessary tax burdens and inequities under existing law in this area was picked up in H.R. 13270. Instead its provisions continue to trend, evident since 1962, toward harsher treatment of foreign source income.

Section 431 provides a recapture rule in the event that U.S. taxpayers sustain foreign losses which are taken into account in computing their worldwide taxable income tax for U.S. income tax purposes. In general, the rule as contained in the House passed bill would affect all U.S. taxpayers who use the per-country limitation for foreign tax credit purposes. Under the recapture concept, any reduction in taxable income produced by a foreign source loss in one taxable year would be offset in later taxable years by reducing the amount of the foreign tax credit that would otherwise be allowable under existing law when income is derived from that foreign source by the U.S. taxpayer.

In one manner of speaking, Section 431 seemingly indicates there is no justification for recognizing as a creditable tax an income tax paid to a foreign country which does not allow a net operating loss carryover. Historically, the U.S. has never required that the income tax system of a foreign country exactly parallel the U.S. system in order for the tax credit to be allowable since it recognized that income tax systems of other countries vary, and necessarily will continue to do so, because of the manner in which they were developed and the likelihood of the continued existence of most foreign countries as separate sovereigns. In actuality, there is no need to reduce the allowable foreign tax credits in these types of cases because the net effect of an income taxing system of a foreign country which fails to allow a net operating loss carryover in the computation of their income tax means that the effective rate of tax imposed by such country is higher than it would have been had such a loss been recognized.

If the proposed change were enacted, it would result in discrimination against those taxpayers operating in foreign countries whose tax laws did not parallel in principle the provisions of the U.S. law. Furthermore, the mechanics of the proposed provisions can result in apparently unintended effects over and above the penalty imposed upon those companies operating in countries not allowing loss carryovers. For example, even where a company operates in a foreign country allowing loss carryovers, it is possible that the mechanics of the new provision would result in additional U.S. taxes. Assume, for instance, that a loss in a foreign country having the same rate as the U.S. were offset exactly in the second year and there was no foreign tax paid in the second year. At this point the U.S. has recaptured the so-called tax benefit of the first year in full. In year three a foreign tax is paid but in this year the limitation on allowable foreign tax credits is reduced by 50% of the loss in year one since only 50% of such loss was used as a reduction of the foreign tax credit limitation in year 2. In year 3, therefore, the taxpayer would not be able to recover the full amount of the foreign income taxes paid by him notwithstanding that the U.S. had already recaptured the full amount of the so-called tax benefit of the first year.

In addition, the effect of this proposed change would be to penalize new business activities abroad, in that losses are often incurred for the first several years of such activities. We believe that any venture which would take several years to become profitable should not be made less attractive by discriminatory tax treatment.

Section 432 provides for a separate country-by-country FTC limitation with respect to "foreign mineral income" derived from within any foreign country or possession of the U.S., or any agency or instrumentality thereof, that (a) requires the payment of any bonus or royalty with respect to property which gives rise to "foreign mineral income," (b) holds substantial mineral rights with respect to such property, or (c) imposes any income, war profits, or excess profits taxes on such income at an effective rate higher than on other income.

The stated justification for the addition of this section is that it is difficult to distinguish royalties paid to foreign governments from income taxes paid to the same governments. But the facts do not support this. As in the case of the United States Government, foreign governments which own mineral properties collect royalties for the right to carry on extractive operations and impose income taxes on profits derived from those operations. The same criteria that distinguish the royalties which the U.S. Government collects in its role as owner of mineral rights from the income taxes which it collects from mineral operators carrying on operations on Government-owned lands, are available to make is determination when the operations are carried on in a foreign country. We note that Assistant Secretary Cohen when he appeared before your Committee early in September stated that the Treasury Department did not feel that the characterization of foreign taxes on mineral income in excess of the U.S. rate as royalties was justified.

Section 432 is discriminatory in that it denies the use of the overall limitation in computing the allowable foreign tax credit to a single industry, i.e., the mineral industry. The concept which justified the addition of the overall limitation to the Code was based upon the fact that many U.S. companies treat their entire foreign operations as an integrated operation separate from a U.S. operation and that in such cases it was appropriate to permit such companies to compute the foreign tax credit on the basis of income from all sources outside the U.S. rather than on a country-by-country basis.

To single out one industry and deny it the availability of computing the foreign tax credit on an overall basis is in effect a precedenet for dissecting a single business operation into its various component parts rather than treating it as an economic unit. From a practical point of view, section 432 fails to recognize that production in one foreign country is of little avail if it cannot be processed and marketed in other foreign countries. Thus, the effect of the proposal is to deny the use of the overall foreign tax credit concept in those situations where the overall business operation (producing, processing, transporting and marketing) is taxed at various rates by various foreign countries, which is exactly the type of situation for which the overall limitation was enacted by Congress.

Accordingly, we recommend that your committee reject the addition of sections 431 and 432 to the Code.

Limitations of space prevent us from detailing industry's case for changes in the application of the foreign tax credit. However, at this time we would emphasize two points.

(1) Where the business form of a foreign operation is a foreign corporation owned by a U.S. corporate parent, an indirect credit under Section 902 with respect to dividend income received by the parent is allowed for foreign income taxes paid by the foreign corporation and attributable to the dividend, provided that prescribed percentage of ownership tests are met. Those tests require that the U.S. parent own at least 10% of the voting stock of a first-tier foreign corporation, and that the first-tier foreign corporation own at least 50% of the voting stock of a second-tier foreign corporation. No provision is made for lower tiers.

Since the 10%-50% ownership rules became law in 1951, the great growth of U.S. corporate investments abroad has been accompanied by increasingly complex foreign rules, frequently preventing U.S. investors from owning as much as 50% of the stock of foreign corporations. There are also many cases involving lower tier companies resulting from acquisitions and business requirements.

We recommend that, to relieve the inequity of the present ownership requirements, the indirect credit be allowed with respect to any second or lower tier foreign corporation at least 5% of the voting stock of which is owned indirectly by a U.S. corporation.

(2) The other major point involves the effect of the income tax surcharge on the foreign tax credit. The present 10% tax surcharge, which when proposed was consistently called a temporary tax on a tax, was generally understood to apply equally to all taxpayers, regardless of the nature of their income. This important equity objective is achieved only by imposing the surcharge as the last step in the tax computation.

As it was enacted, however, the surcharge is imposed in an intermediate computation before the foreign tax credit, instead of on the final tax, with the result that corporate taxpayers having foreign source income bear a tax surcharge having a disproportionately high effective rate. This is not only inequitable, but also questionable under the foreign tax conventions. We recommend that the law be amended to limit the tax surcharge to 5% (or whatever rate is determined after 1969) of the tax which would have applied in the absence of the surcharge.

VII—Moving expenses

The House-passed bill recognizes that more equitable tax treatment of moving expenses is necessary. Labor mobility helps both the employer requesting the move and the economy as a whole. But it almost always inconveniences the individual involved and his family. For them—the half million or more families involved in employment-related moves each year—the least that can be done is to insure that the tax effect is neutral.

The recognition of the need to go beyond a "bare-bones" definition of moving expenses to include so-called "indirect" expenses is welcome. The mechanics of the proposals, however, raise some problems. It is reasonable to treat new employees, who may have to relocate to assume their duties, in the same fashion as transferred employees. However, in attempting to achieve uniformity in the tax treatment of reimbursed and non-reimbursed employees, the proposal would have reimbursements included in gross income with an offsetting deduction for specified costs, subject to an over-all limit of $2,500 for the "indirect" expenses.

The dollar limitation would limit the revenue loss to $100 million a year. We question whether that is an appropriate criterion in this situation. The personal income tax is a tax on net income and a reimbrusement of expenditures incurred as a result of the taxpayer's employment is not income in an economic sense if no enrichment has taken place. The taxpayer is merely restored to the same position financially that he would have occupied had the transfer not taken place. They are expenses that the employer has agreed to bear because of the move. As such, the reimbursement is an employer expense—not employee income. Similarly, in the case of new or non-reimbursed employees, the expense of the move should properly be considered as an expense attributable to the earning of income. We are not basically dealing with a revenue problem here, but with a technical defect in the law.

We would also like to point out that inasmuch as the categories of deductible expenses would be stringently limited, it is not necessary to provide additional controls in the form of dollar limitations.

One improvement that we suggest, if categories of deductible expenses are to be specified, is in the proposed time limit for deductible living expenses while occuping temporary quarters in the new location. The legislation now before your Committee would limit such deductible expenses to those incurred during any period of thirty consecutive days. We regard this as unreasonably restrictive. Many moves, for example, are made on short notice. If it is considered necessary to impose some time limitation, it should be not less than ninety days.

Also, the provision to extend the twenty-mile test to fifty miles seems unreasonable. Under this, no deduction would be allowed unless the taxpayer's new principal place of work is at least fifty miles farther from his former residence than was his former principal place of work. In many congested metropolitan areas where most jobs are located, an additional thirty miles of commutation is a real hardship and forces a move of residence. We recommend that the present twenty-mile test be retained.

It is our belief that the most realistic and equitable approach to moving expenses is that all reimbursements and allowances for reasonable expenses and losses actually incurred should not be subject to tax and that such expenses or losses to the extent not reimbursed should be allowed as deductions. If it is necessary to limit the expenses and losses so treated to certain categories, then certainly no further limitation should be imposed.

VIII—Taxation of cooperatives

It has long been NAM's policy that the discriminatory distribution of tax burdens between cooperative and non-cooperative enterprises should be eliminated. The deduction of patronage refunds from income before the calculation of corporate income tax leaves cooperative enterprises in a preferred position with respect to retained earnings. This results in an advantage over their tax-paying competitors and a loss to the Treasury.

Section 531 of H.R. 13270 builds on the reform began in the Revenue Act of 1962 by raising from 20% to 50% the patronage allocations that must be paid out currently. However, this change would take ten years to accomplish. This section also adds the requirement that, to be treated as qualified, patronage allocations and pre-unit retains must be paid out in fifteen years. While this, too, is a step in the right direction, the period of time is much too long. At a minimum, your Committee should consider shortening the pay-out period requirement from fifteen years to five years.

IX—Pollution control

Section 704 of the bill provides for a five year write-off of investments in air and water pollution control equipment. We believe that broad social benefits accrue through the air and water quality control efforts of industry, and that in most instances these efforts do not bring an economic return. We advocate that such investments should be accorded accelerated amortization up to and including the immediate write-off of the facility, at the option of the taxpayer, plus a liberal tax credit as is provided in numerous bill which have been introduced in this and previous sessions of the Congress. Therefore, while the provision in the pending bill is a step in the right direction, it is still not commensurate with what is needed to achieve the benefits and alleviate the burdens involved in obtaining better environmental quality throughout the nation.

In addition, the provision includes two undesirable provisions. The first is a requirement that certification of the equipment must be obtained not only from a state agency but also from a federal agency. This dual certification requirement, with attendance red tape, paper work and delay, will serve to weaken attainment of the objective of the provision. Because the Congress has declared a national policy that the states have primary responsibility in the pollution control field, we strongly urge that certification of the equipment should rest with the state agencies.

A second undesirable feature of this provision is that it would authorize the Secretaries of Interior and Health, Education and Welfare to promulgate minimum performance standards for such equipment. This, likewise, is contrary to the declared Congressional policy of placing primary responsibility upon the states. We believe it would be unwieldly and impractical to put the federal government into the business of establishing specifications for the manufacture of this type of equipment.

X—Corporate mergers

Section 412 of the bill would disallow a deduction for interest on certain bonds issued in connection with the acquisition of a corporation. The only comment we have on this section is to suggest that it not apply to those cases where there is evidence of serious negotiations or a binding commitment prior to May 27, 1969, the effective date of the proposed section of the legislation.

XI—Transfers of franchises

Under Section 516(c) of H.R. 13270, amounts received upon transfer of a franchise would not be treated as proceeds from sale or exchange of a capital asset or of property to which Section 1231 applies if the transferor retains any significant power, right or continuing interest with respect to the subject matter of the franchise. Such provisions, however, would not apply with respect to amounts received in connection with a transfer of a franchise to the extent attributable to the transfer of all substantial rights to a patent, trademark, or tradename, (or an undivided interest therein which includes a part of all such rights), to the extent such amounts are separately identified and are reasonable in amount.

In addition to patents, trademarks and tradenames, the transfer of a franchise could also include the transfer of other property necessary and pertinent to full realization of the benefits of the franchise, such as secret processes which have not been patented. We see no reason why property rights transferred in connection with a franchise which are not patented should be treated in a different manner than property in the form of patents. We recommend, therefore, that the exception contained in subsection (c) of proposed Section 1252 as now worded be amended to include "secret processes" in addition to patents, trademarks and tradenames.

XII—Treble damages in antitrust actions

I would like at this time to state the position of the NAM regarding a tax proposal which although not part of the House bill is now pending before this Committee. The proposal referred to, as contained in S. 2156 and S. 2631, would overturn a 1964 ruling of the Internal Revenue Service (Rev. Rul. 64–224) holding that amounts paid in satisfaction of treble damage claims under Section 4 of the Clayton Act are deductible for federal income tax purposes as ordinary and necessary business expenses.

We are opposed to the enactment of the proposal contained in S. 2156 and S. 2631 for the following reasons: (1) Rev. Rul. 64–224 is a correct interpretation of the applicable tax law; (2) the Tax Code should not be used for "backdoor" regulation of what is essentially a social and economic problem; and (3) the denial of a deduction for treble damages paid by a corporation harms the corporation's shareholders who, especially in publicly-owned companies, will in general have been innocent of any wrongdoing.

The Supreme Court has consistently held that it will countenance the disallowance of otherwise permissible business deductions only where the allowance would "frustrate sharply defined national or state policies . . .". Commissioner v. Tellier, 383 U.S. 687 (1966). The Court has denied business deductions on the ground that they "frustrate sharply defined" public policies in only two categories of cases: (a) Payments of fines and penalties to governmental bodies, and (b) Payments specifically prohibited by longstanding Treasury regulations. Treble damages obviously do not fit the second category, and although there is contrary dictum in the case of Commissioner v. Glenshaw Glass Co., 348 U.S. 426 (1955), it has also been consistently held that treble damages are not meant to punish wrongdoers as is the case of fines and penalties, but instead are remedial and compensatory in nature. Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U.S. 657 (1892); Overnight Motor Transportation Co. Inc. v. Missel, 316 U.S. 572 (1942). Any legislation to deny a deduction for treble damages must be analyzed with the consideration in mind that it would be inconsistent with the principles laid down in the above line of cases.

It has been readily admitted by proponents of the subject proposal that it is intended as a deterrent to violations of the anti-trust laws. We submit that the Internal Revenue Code is the wrong place to deal with this problem. The anti-trust statutes already contain many deterrents to violations, including substantial fines and penalties which, even under present law, are not deductible. The integrity of the tax statute, however, should, we feel, be maintained. As stated by Mr. Justice Stewart in the Court's opinion in the unanimous decision in Tellier, supra:

"We start with the proposition that the federal income tax is a tax on net income, not a sanction against wrongdoing. That principle has been firmly imbedded in the tax statute from the beginning."

The burden of a treble damage payment made by a corporation is ultimately, of course borne by the corporation's shareholders. The subject proposal would increase this burden by denying the corporation a deduction for a payment which most agree is an ordinary and necessary expense of the corporation. This "sanction against wrongdoing" will thus harm persons who by and large, especially in publicly-owned corporations, will have been innocent of any wrongdoing.

For these reasons we urge that the proposal to deny a deduction for treble damage payments in anti-trust cases be rejected.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I would like to quote from an address by George Champion, former Chairman of the Board of The Chase Manhattan Bank, before our Taxation Committee last year. His remarks go right to the heart of the problem with H.R. 13270:

"For far too many people, the words still conjures up a 19th century vision of little old ladies clipping coupons in bank vaults. They think of capital as stagnant, lifeless, having nothing whatever to do with them or the world they live in.

"These people must be reminded that capital is what keeps us all going, rich or poor, young or old. The American worker enjoys the highest standard of living in the world because somebody has invested $15,000 to $20,000 in the tools he works with. He is able to do the job because we are investing 6 percent of our total Gross National Product every year to educate him and millions of others. If he has time to think, to read, to dream, to enjoy life, it is because he is prosperous—and he is prosperous because capital has been invested in him."

Capital is what keeps us going, and I urge your Committee to revise the anticapital formation features of this bill so that it can continue to perform the job we all want it to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Mr. Saul Pearl, president of the Machinery Dealers National Association.

STATEMENT OF SAUL PEARL, PRESIDENT OF THE MACHINERY DEALERS NATIONAL ASSOCIATION (MDNA)

Mr. PEARL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Saul Pearl and I appear here today as a member of the small business community as well as in my capacity as president of the Machinery Dealers National Association (MDNA).

MDNA is a national trade association composed of 300 companies who have joined together to promote the growth of the used machine tool industry in the United States and Canada. The association has asked me to testify primarily on the failure to include tax revisions in H.R. 13270 to assist small businesses.

We believe that tax incentives should be provided for small businesses or H.R. 13270 should be amended to include reforms of the depreciation of tax structure. This vital segment of the American economy is hampered more than ever by the shortage of working capital, compounded by the high-interest rates and spiraling inflation.

We are concerned because our members and most of our customers are small businesses. The products of our industry, reconditioned used machine tools, often present the only economically justifiable means for medium or small business enterprises to modernize their facilities.

Small businesses in the United States have a difficult time competing with large domestic and foreign firms because they have difficulty in securing adequate debt and equity capital. These problems are particularly acute in the metalworking industry where capital outlays are necessarily high. To illustrate, the Subcommittee on Special Investigations of Small Business Problems of the House Select Committee on Small Business held hearings in 1966 on the problems of the tool and die and the machine tool industries and reported to Congress that:

(1) these industries are basic to the economic health of the Nation; and

(2) that additional financing is not available from the private sector of the economy or from special programs of the Small Business Administration.

Due to inflated costs and high interest rates, conditions today are less favorable than in 1966 when those hearings were held.

In Secretary Kennedy's appearance before this committee on September 4 and 5, he indicated that the Treasury Department was considering other tax incentives to replace the investment credit to stimulate the continued modernization and expansion of our Nation's industrial plants. When and if these incentives are considered by the Congress, we would hope that special attention is given to the problems of small businesses. In the interim, we hope that the committee will amend H.R. 13270 to provide special relief for small businesses in the following particulars;

1. The investment credit should be reinstated, limited to the first $100,000 of purchases of both new and used equipment.

The prospect of repeal of the investment credit has already had an inordinate impact on the economy. We note that used machine tool sales in August 1969 declined 19 percent from July and plummeted 39 percent in the last 3 months. New machine tool sales in August declined 16 percent from July and now are 56 percent below levels 4 months ago.

In our judgment the limited reinstatement of the investment credit would be the simplest and most effective means of preserving our Nation's small businesses.

2. The normal corporate tax rate should be reduced on the first $25,000 of taxable income from 22 percent to 20 percent. The 26 percent surtax would remain in effect, thereby making the total corporate rate 46 percent.

Secretary Kennedy recommended a reduction in the corporate rate structure to 46 percent. MDNA's recommendation concerning the normal and surtax rates in consistent with Secretary Kennedy's recommendation except that by reducing the normal rate, rather than the surtax rate, small businesses would benefit more significantly.

3. The depreciation tax structure should be reformed to provide faster write-offs on purchases of new as well as mixed groups of new and used equipment.

Most of the major industrial nations permit industry a rapid write-off of plant and equipment investments which provides a greater cash flow for research and development and additional investments in new plants and equipment.

I have brought with me a reprint on this subject and request that it be included in the record following my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The reprint that you mention will be placed in the record of this hearing.

Mr. PEARL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Treasury Department in 1962 moved in the right direction of the depreciation pattern of other nations, except for the reserve ratio test. Previous witnesses have presented testimony on the shortcomings of the reserve ratio test and I have no intention of taking up the committee's time by repeating those criticisms.

In brief, MDNA believes that it is essential to eliminate the reserve ratio test not only because of its complexity but also to establish more effective depreciation patterns.

For the years 1950 through 1967, fixed investment as a percentage of gross national product was less in the United States than in any major developed country, except the United Kingdom. Unless more internal funds can be generated by American industry, and particularly by small businesses, we will find our competitive position further weakened in the world marketplace.

Internal cash flow could be generated by amending section 167 of the Internal Revenue Code to eliminate the requirement that the taxpayer establish a salvage value for depreciation purposes. Now, the need for a taxpayer to take salvage value into account is obviated by the depreciation recapture provisions of section 1245.

This section works automatically to recover as ordinary income any gain on the sale of equipment which is attributable to depreciation deductions. Accordingly, we recommend that section 167 be amended to do away with the requirement that the taxpayer's annual deduction for depreciation should be limited by the salvage value.

Another way to provide direct assistance to small business would be to increase the additional first year depreciation allowance of section 179 from the present $10,000 ceiling to a more realistic level of at least $25,000. The existing $10,000 ceiling has remained unchanged since this section was added to the code in 1958. During that period, costs have spiraled to such an extent that the $10,000 ceiling is no longer realistic.

Purchases of modern used machinery enables many small firms to upgrade and modernize existing facilities. Depreciation incentives applicable to both new and used machinery will not encourage prospective purchasers of new machine tools to purchase used machinery since these items do not compete in the same market. The average cost of a new domestic machine tool is approximately $22,000, while the average price for a used machine tool is approximately $4,500.

In summary, MDNA recommends that Congress provide specific incentives for small business to modernize existing plant and equipment or, in the alternative, to reform the existing tax depreciation structure by eliminating the reserve ratio test, removing the salvage value as a consideration in determining allowable depreciation, increasing the $10,000 ceiling on the additional first year depreciation to $25,000 and by permitting rapid write-offs for equipment. This latter recommendation should take into consideration the shorter remaining useful life of used equipment.

We appreciate this opportunity to appear before this committee and will do our best to answer any questions which members of the committee may have.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

(There follows, communications received by the committee expressing an interest in the subject of tax treatment of small businesses:)

STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY ELIOT H. SHARP

My name is Eliot Sharp, and I am chairman of the board of IDD, Inc., publisher of the Investment Dealers' Digest, 150 Broadway, New York City 10038. The corporation is a "small business".

Inflation And Tax Reform.—This statement is filed for the sole purpose of urging upon the Committee Members consideration, in connection with Tax Reform, of the substantial inflation that has occurred in recent years since certain maximums were set respecting various taxes; specifically, the law leading to IRS Section 531 relating to accumulation of surplus, which maximum was increased from $60,000, to $100,000 in 1958, since which time there has been such substantial inflation and deterioration of the dollar as to make $100,000 a pitifully small amount, perhaps suitable for a few showers but surely not for a rainy day; and the maximum of $25,000 beyond which a corporation is subjected to a higher tax rate, inflation again having produced drastic deterioration in the intended worth of that benefit to a small business.

If Congress deemed these amounts, when they were established many years ago, as suitable, recognition of the extent of inflation since then strongly indicates that under any Tax Reform measure, they should be appropriately increased.

The Congress, quite properly, seems to be concerned about corporate takeovers and mergers. In a small way, I am a candidate, but ONLY because of Section 531. I am quite aware of the potential abuses 531 is designed to cure; the only question is whether its poison is worse than its cure. As presently constituted, the law encourages—indeed, almost forces—acquiescence on the part of small companies to offers of takeover or merger. If this is a shocking situation, the law has created it.

STATEMENT OF JOSEPH O. EVANS

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, my name is Joseph O. Evans, and I testify before you today as a self-employed business man. I do not represent any organization or firm. I speak only for myself. However, many of my thoughts on Tax Reform have frequently been voiced to me by others with whom I have come in contact as I conduct my business. Since my statement is a short one, I will present it to you in its entirety.

With two exceptions, as will hereinafter be stated, I am most concerned with the individual income tax which I feel needs the greatest reform. While I am concerned about those who live in poverty, and about the ever increasing tax burdens of widows and widowers, it is the plight of the small self-employed business man with whose tax problems I am most familiar, that I am most concerned.

As of March, 1966, there were 6,061,000 self-employed men and women in non-agriculture industries in this country, and an additional 2,125,000 men and women engaged in agriculture. This results in a total of 8,186,000* self-employed people in the United States who have to pay Federal Income Tax each year.

STANDARD DEDUCTIONS

It is my belief that a new classification of tax payers should be adopted for those who wish to take a standard deduction, with new groupings as follows:

(1) For those with very low incomes, I am in agreement with the Treasury recommendation. This increase in the standard deduction for those with very low incomes would reduce the needs of other forms of governmental help to these individuals.

(2) For the self-employed over 35 years of age, who have a gross income of 10,000 dollars a year or less, the standard deduction should be increased to $2,000. Many of the self-employed are forced into business by circumstances beyond their control. Small companies for whom they may formerly have worked for many years may have gone out of business because of the retirement or death of the owner, or because the owner could not meet competition from larger firms. This has caused many qualified employees to be unable to find other employment because of their age at the time of the liquidation of the company for whom they had worked (some firms have now established employment age for new employees as low as 30); because of physical handicaps preventing them from passing physical examinations required for new employment; and because of recently added higher educational requirements which were not in effect at the time of their original employment. Self-employed persons must stay in business no matter how high the cost of their tools; travel for new business; local transportation; cost of help; or income tax, yet they can seldom raise the fees for their services or the prices of their products because of the competition from larger firms.

(3) For the widow or widower whose gross income is $15,000 a year or less, the standard deduction should be $2,000 since these people have financial commitments already incurred during their time of marriage and not normally experienced by the young never married nor the presently young married wage earner, and which commitments must continue at a time when retirement may soon become mandatory and when opportunity for additional employment becomes nil because of age restrictions.

It is to be understood that my above recommendations do not put a ceiling on deductions arrived at by itemization of legitimate expenses which are approved by the Internal Revenue Service for individuals whose added expenses warrant itemization.

OTHER DEDUCTIONS

(1) Self-employed persons should be permitted to deduct cost of education needed to cope with newer knowledges, skills, and technology in new fields to which he must turn in order to operate his business.

(2) Cost of traveling of self-employed persons, with yearly gross income of $12,000 or less, to secure a business contract or the like should be permitted, as denial of this prevents the small business man from obtaining work because he cannot afford cost of travel. Section 162(a) of the Internal Revenue Code states, "There shall be allowed as a deduction all the ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred during the taxable year in carrying on any trade or business." The expenses incurred in traveling to secure a contract, when one's business consists of the performing of duties set forth in a contract given by other business men, is one's business. This travel should be therefore allowed as a business deduction.

For example: A company suggests that you come to their plant or office to show you their product and/or to discuss their services in the light of how you can best serve their interests. This cost of travel should be allowed as a deductible expense.

*_The U.S. Book of Facts Statistics & Information_ for 1967. New York: Washington Square Press, Inc. Distributed by Simon & Schuster, Inc. 1966. p. 230.

Attention is called to need for change in the tax rate of certain individuals. Legitimate heads of households should be permitted to use the same rate as that used by married persons. Widows and widowers with adjusted gross incomes of $16,000 or less should be permitted to use a rate similar to that now used by heads of households. The single persons rate works a great hardship on these people, especially as they near the end of their employable income.

TREATMENT OF THE ELDERLY

Before any consideration is to be given to the tax treatment of the elderly, one must first determine who is elderly. I personally feel that for any purpose relating to ones earnings, the long concluded age of 65 is outmoded and ridiculous. As I have stated elsewhere in this testimony, the age of 30 has, in at least two cases brought to my attention, been considered elderly in so far as employment of new persons is concerned. For tax purposes, the age of 50 would be a more realistic age to be considered elderly. I recommend considerable research be done in this area before a final decision on the tax treatment of the elderly is made.

TAX-EXEMPT FOUNDATIONS

I believe that all foundations, organizations, social clubs and fraternal organizations should pay some amount of Federal Income Tax. Churches that make investments should only be exempted from taxation when the returns from their investments are used for the upkeep of the churches and for the care of the poor and needy in their own parishes. State and city societies, and clubs having a membership of/or relating to people of a foreign country, or clubs whose sole purpose is educational in the American way of life or in the arts or culture should be exempt from taxation.

TREATMENT OF STATE AND MUNICIPAL BONDS

I fully support the belief that Federal Income Tax should be paid on all interest received on state and municipal bonds, the tax being paid by the purchaser and/or holder of the bonds. It is the considered opinion of those who are knowledgeable about such matters that one must have at least $50,000 to invest in tax-free bonds before one derives a usable income from the investment. The average working man, who may really need to derive an income from such an investment, is therefore left completely out of the picture. I believe that anyone who has $50,000 to invest can certainly afford to pay a tax on the earnings of the investment.

In view of the fact that many people have purchased tax free bonds with the belief that they would not have to pay any tax on the same, all present holders of the bonds should be exempt from paying any tax on the bonds for a period of three years. However, all bonds purchased after a predetermined date, which date should not be divulged ahead of time, should be taxed. By not disclosing the date of the beginning of taxation of the bonds far in advance, a rush to purchase bonds would be avoided and an unfavorable bond market would be prevented.

Mr. Chairman, I fully realize that the question that you and the other Committee Members may be asking is where and how is the government going to obtain money to make up for all the increases in the Standard Deductions and Other Deductions which I have advocated. I believe the collection of tax from present tax-free bonds and taxation of the above noted organizations will go a long way to make up this deficit. I also recommend Federally Controlled gambling, legalized in all of the 50 states and a reasonable Federal Tax on the same. We know that people will gamble, therefore, our government should receive some tax benefits from this habit. I believe that my recommendations would, if adopted, greatly relieve some of the more pressing tax burdens on the poor, the self-employed, and the widows and widowers.

When the Standard Deduction was made law, each taxpayer in the low or middle-income bracket paid a tax of approximately 20% of his income. The ever increased cost of living and the static Standard Tax Deduction have resulted in the average taxpayer now paying nearly 50% of his income in taxes. I therefore recommend that a study be made to see if some form of sliding scale for the Standard Deduction be worked out, a scale based on a percentage of the increasing cost of living.

I will be pleased to try to answer any questions which the distinguished members of this body may desire to ask.

SUMMARY

Standard Deductions

I recommend that a new classification for tax payers be adopted for those who wish to take a standard deduction, with new groupings as follows:

(1) For those with low income, I am in agreement with the Treasury recommendations.

(2) For the 8,186,000 self-employed people, many of whom are over 35 years of age, I recommend a standard deduction of $2,000, if their gross income is $10,000 a year or less.

(3) For widows and widowers whose gross income is $15,000 a year or less, I recommend a standard deduction of $2,000. This should not put a ceiling on those who itemize deductions.

Other Deductions

I recommend that self-employed people be permitted to deduct the cost of traveling to obtain new business.

I recommend that self-employed people be permitted to deduct the cost of education needed to cope with newer knowledges, etc.

Treatment of the Elderly

I recommend that studies be made to consider one elderly at 50 year old for tax purposes.

Tax-Exempt Foundations

I believe that most foundations etc. should pay some tax to help support the government.

Treatment of State and Municipal Bonds

I support the belief that Federal Income Tax should be paid on state and municipal bonds.

Change in Tax Rate

I call the attention of the Committee to the need to change the tax rate for certain individuals. For heads of households, change to the present rate for married persons; for widows and widowers, change to the old head of the household rate.

I have stated in my testimony that I believe that by taxing foundations, etc., and by placing a tax on state and municipal bonds, and by legalizing gambling and placing a tax on gambling, the Federal Government will realize enough income to more than make up for the above recommended deductions in personal income tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness will be Mr. Walker Winter, who is vice president and chairman of the tax committee, and Mr. Robert R. Statham, taxation and finance manager, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Washington, D.C.

We are very pleased to have you here. You represent a very fine and distinguished organization.

STATEMENTS OF WALKER WINTER, VICE PRESIDENT AND CHAIRMAN OF THE TAX COMMITTEE, ACCOMPANIED BY ROBERT R. STATHAM, TAXATION AND FINANCE MANAGER, CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. WINTER. My name is Walker Winter, I am a vice president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and chairman of its taxation committee. I am also a partner in the Chicago law firm of Ross, Hardies, O'Keefe, Babcock, McDugald, and Parsons.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe you once served on the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue and Taxation?

33-865—69—pt. 6——11

Mr. WINTER. That is correct, sir, a very pleasant period of my life.

The CHAIRMAN. We are sorry to lose you.

Mr. WINTER. I am accompanied by Robert R. Statham, Taxation and Finance Manager of the Chamber.

Mr. Chairman, the national appreciates this opportunity to present its views on the proposed Tax Reform Act of 1969. The American business community is exceedingly concerned with the burden of taxation and its effect on the economy. We commend your committee for this intensive reappraisal of the taxing system. There should be a continuing and thorough consideration of the entire Federal tax system, with particular emphasis on the rate structure, other revenue sources, and on amendments needed to remove the ambiguities and the unintended hardships and inequities from the code.

This legislation is said to be the most extensive attempt at reforming the tax laws ever undertaken. Assuming its passage, it will play a major role in the course of the Nation's economy, and every segment of the American free enterprise system is certain to be affected by its provisions. It is in the best interests of the country that this legislation be used to provide greater equity in the tax laws and simplify compliance for the taxpayer. It should not be used as an instrument to quash individual initiative to save and invest and provide jobs and a better standard of living for our citizens.

This legislation received hasty consideration in the House at the time of its passage. Legislation of this magnitude and complexity requires that a great amount of time be given to the review of its contents and impact on taxpayers. It is urged that the committee give adequate time to the consideration of the tax proposals in this bill. The goal is not the enactment of just a tax reform bill—but the enactment of a tax reform bill to serve the long-term best interests of the Nation, and the chamber urges the enactment of such tax reform legislation.

A reason given for the enactment of this legislation is to maintain the confidence of taxpayers in our self-assessment system of taxation. It is contended that taxpayer morale is an important factor to be considered. Serious questions have been raised these past months which tend to undermine the confidence of taxpayers, both individual and corporate, in the Federal tax laws. If this confidence is not restored, those administering the tax laws will have problems obtaining the revenue required for necessary government operations.

Many of the proposals in this legislation affect sections of the Code which have been on the books for many years and were adopted by the Congress with good and proper reason at the time. It is important that we guard against constant change in the tax laws lest this in itself have a demoralizing effect. It is realized that time and conditions change, and what may have been equitable in the judgment of Congress at one time may not now be considered equitable. Nevertheless, Congress must avoid including provisions in the tax laws which will require abrupt change after a short period of time. It is exceedingly important that adequate consideration be given to proposed changes to make sure that what is being enacted will provide lasting solutions rather than temporary confusion.

In brief:

The chamber supports:

increasing the standard deduction as providing a degree of simplification for a large number of taxpayers;

reducing tax rates of individuals and corporations as providing a degree of equity for a large number of taxpayers; adopting the 50 percent maximum tax rate on earned income, but requests the concept be applied to all personal income;

broadening the allowable moving expense deductions, but recommends a liberalizing of the dollar limitations;

repealing the unlimited charitable deduction;

enacting the Clay-Brown provision extending the unrelated business income tax; liberalizing and simplifying the income averaging provisions as granting needed relief from the overprogressive income tax rates, and liberalizing depreciation provisions.

The chamber opposes:

extending the capital gains holding period or changing the rate as seriously impairing the flow of needed investment capital; limiting the use of accelerated depreciation on real estate as being harmful to an industry vital to our economy;

allowing an option to State and municipal governments to issue either taxable or tax-exempt bonds as a first step toward dependence on Federal subsidies; changing the present law on deferred compensation, restricted stock, and lump-sum distributions; taxing revenues of exempt organizations unless derived from an unrelated business; creating an excess deductions account as too complicated an approach to the problem of farm losses, and the provision relating to the disallowance of allocated deductions.

Under the provisions of H.R. 13270, during 1971 and 1972 tax rates of individuals will be reduced. When totally effective in 1972, the rate schedule will run from 13 to 65 percent instead of the present 14- to 70-percent range. The national chamber favors tax rate reductions for both individuals and corporations and urges such reductions.

The national chamber has consistently opposed the highly progressive income tax rates and the detrimental effect such rates have on our economy. Taxes should accomplish their purpose of raising revenues with the least harm to a free economy. Whenever tax rates get so high that they deter individual initiative from concentrating on improving business efficiency, they tend to divert that initiative into finding ways of avoiding taxes.

The 50-percent limit on tax rates applicable to earned income provided in the bill is a step in the right direction. However, it is the view of the national chamber that the goal should be to get the maximum tax rate on all personal income below 50 percent.

With lower rates, the need for tax planning will be reduced and some of this Nation's most creative energies will be unleashed to contend with the myriad problems which confront us every day. We must attempt to confine our tax system to its prime purpose of obtaining essential Government revenues without seriously injuring taxpayers and impeding economic growth. If we do not, we will have a revenue system which will be used as a means of forcing social and economic changes which are in vogue at that time. The result will ultimately be a more complex and incomprehensible code than we presently have, and the concept of equity among taxpayers will be subjugated to the pressing demands of the day.

This legislation provides for tax rate reductions for individuals but does not presently provide a rate reduction for corporations. The bill in its present form is out of balance. To provide tax rate reduction for one class of taxpayers and not for another, in effect, shifts the burden of taxation. Corporations under the provisions of this bill will not only be denied tax reduction but will get a tax increase as a result of the repeal of the investment tax credit. The original enactment of the credit was a reason given for not providing corporations the same tax reduction as individuals in the Revenue Act of 1964. The House Committee Report 749 of September 13, 1963, at page 27, stated:

> This tax cut for corporations, when fully effective, will amount to $2.2 billion a year. It should, of course, be viewed in connection with the reduction provided by Congress last year in the form of an investment credit and the reform provided last year in the depreciation guidelines. These taken, together, provide corporations with a tax reduction of approximately $4½ billion.

And this committee in its Report 830 of January 28, 1964, at page 8, stated:

> This bill provide a balanced reduction between individuals and business firms. In this respect, the bill is much the same as the bill that came from the House. When fully effective, the bill will reduce individual income taxes by $9.2 billion and will reduce corporate taxes by about $2.4 billion. These figures must be evaluated along with the effective tax reduction of 1962 through the investment credit and depreciation reform, the largest share of which went to corporations. Taking the 1962 and 1964 programs together, the share of the reduction going to individuals is about two-thirds and to corporations about one-third, which is approximately the present relative shares of individuals and corporations in income tax liabilities.

Thus, to eliminate the investment tax credit results in a discriminatory increase in taxes for corporations. To give a tax reduction to individuals and not to corporations in this legislation compounds this discrimination. There is no reason why the taxpayer who has chosen to incorporate his business should be discriminated against, and the noncorporate taxpayer favored in legislation designed to provide tax rate reduction.

Efforts should be made to simplify the tax laws. In terms of equity, the complexity of the Internal Revenue Code may be the largest loophole in the tax laws. This reverse loophole prevents taxpayers from utilizing provisions beneficial to them and is just as inequitable as the more renowned loophole which provides an unintended benefit. It might well be the information gap that exists between taxpayers on the one hand, and the reasons for the various sections on the other, that is playing a large role in generating the so-called taxpayers' revolt.

We realize simplicity and equity do not always go hand in hand, and that there must be complex provisions in the tax laws to provide fair treatment for many of our modern complex problems. While taxpayers bemoan the many pages added to the Internal Revenue Code each time Congress enacts a tax bill, there is simply no way in which this can be avoided entirely if we are to continue to place the emphasis which we now place upon the income tax as a source for raising necessary revenues. It is hoped, however, that simplification will be an ingredient of consideration for tax reform deliberations.

The National chamber supports an increase in the regular standard deduction as the clearest way to simplify compliance with the tax laws for a large number of taxpayers. The resulting deduction should conform to the deduction profile reflected in current returns in order to retain equity between taxpayers using the standard deduction and those itemizing deductions.

The bill increases the present 10 percent standard deduction with its maximum of $1,000 to a rate of 15 percent and $2,000 by 1972. Nearly 34 million returns will benefit from this increase. This is slightly more than one-half of all taxable returns. This will increase the number of taxpayers using the standard deduction from 58 percent to nearly 70 percent, resulting in a shift of 8.4 million taxpayers, who now itemize, to the use of the standard deduction.

Allowing 8.4 million taxpayers to eliminate the tedious bookkeeping necessary for itemizing deductions would simplify compliance and serve both the individual and government. It would greatly reduce the need for audits. Just as important, it would greatly simplify the tax laws for a large segment of taxpayers.

Our sharply progressive tax rates are clearly one of the prime reasons for having income averaging provisions. Our rate structure results in a significantly greater tax liability when an individual receives a large portion of his income in a single year, than there would be if that income had been received in equal amounts over several years. The income averaging provisions were designed to afford a measure of relief to such an individual.

The national chamber supports the principle of income averaging. We believe that the benefit of the income averaging provisions is greatly increased by the provisions in the House bill. The chamber urged in the House hearings that the 133⅓ percent requirement be lowered to 120 percent or less and that the provisions be simplified. The House bill accomplishes this and also simplifies the provisions by not excluding capital gains, wagering and gifts from averaging.

The present income averaging provisions do not apply where the income of the current year is below the average base period income. The national chamber recommends that averaging be available to those who suffer a reduction in income, on the same basis as those who have an increase in income. This form of averaging could be adopted by allowing a credit against current tax liability for a portion of prior taxes paid.

The national chamber believes that employee moving expense deductions are in the best interest of the Nation and the economy, and will not result in the loss of tax revenue over the long run. A mobile labor force is a necessity. Factors which restrict mobility and cause employee hardship should be eliminated. Many companies have realized this and are reimbursing their employees for moving costs. These reimbursements are not considered compensation by employers or by the employees. This is merely an effort to reduce the personal loss caused by an employee's move from one job location to another.

The provisions of H.R. 13270 reduce the inequities of employee moving expense taxation by allowing deductions for the following:

1. Expenses for premove househunting trips, including cost of transportation, meals, and lodging for the taxpayer and members of his household;

2. Temporary living expenses at the new job location, including costs of meals and lodging for the taxpayer and members of his household at the new job location while waiting to move into permanent quarters, and

3. Certain expenses of selling the old house, buying a new house, or settling an unexpired lease.

Allowing these deductions will lessen the tax burden on employees who are reimbursed for financial losses incurred in moving from one job location to another. These deductions would be allowed whether or not taxpayers are reimbursed by their employers.

In conjunction with the above proposal to broaden the allowance for moving expense deductions, the bill provides for a $2,500 overall limitation on these three new deduction categories. The total of the first two cannot exceed $1,000. The national chamber does not feel that such limitations are appropriate. If the categories of allowable expenses are reasonable, then the actual expenses incurred should be allowable without regard to an arbitrary limit.

Under the terms of the bill, the so-called 20-mile test would be increased. Presently, to qualify for moving expense deductions, the taxpayer's new place of employment must be at least 20 miles farther from his old residence than his old place of employment. The 20 miles has been changed to 50 miles. This proposal is inequitable and would result in unfair treatment. According to the House report this was done to eliminate deductions for intersuburb moves within a metropolitan area. However, to illustrate the inequity of such a proposal, a 50-mile limit could eliminate the deduction for a taxpayer who had a job change from Washington to Baltimore.

It is important to consider that a number of companies are moving out of the cities and into the suburbs. A 50-mile test would be restrictive on many of the lower income employees who live in the city, and discourage them from following their employment. Clearly this is a change which should be given further consideration before being adopted.

The national chamber has long supported a broadening of the moving expense deduction. The chamber would go further and include expenses of improving the salability of the old residence and also include any miscellaneous expenses related to the move.

This legislation is prone to place a much greater tax burden on the investor. This is particularly true in the case of capital gains. The economic consequences of the proposals in this area are certain to be undesirable not only for those taxpayers affected, but also for the Nation as a whole. The administration recognizes this. In his testimony before this committee on September 4, 1969, Secretary of the Treasury David M. Kennedy stated:

"Investment in the years ahead may also be impeded by the proposed changes in tax treatment of capital gains. We believe these changes go too far. Our original proposals were designed to prevent excesses rather than fundamentally alter such tax treatment. Accordingly, we recommend retention of the 6-month holding period, as contrasted with the extension to 1 year in H.R. 13270. In addition, we favor retention of the maximum 25-percent rate on capital gains, except in cases of very large gains relative to ordinary income. In these instances, which would affect a relatively small number of individuals, the rate could rise as high as 32½ percent, or to half the new top bracket rate of 65 percent."

Lengthening the capital gains holding period from 6 to 12 months is not in the national interest. Such a change in the tax laws is certain to reduce the availability of venture capital and inhibit economic growth. Investors who are now willing to place their savings in high risk ventures are going to be more reluctant to make such investments. We do not agree with the House Committee's report that the 6-month holding period does not properly carry out the intent of Congress to provide special tax treatment for investment as distinguished from speculative gains. The 6-month period is ample to eliminate both those who make a living from short-term sales and those engaged in highly speculative short-term ventures. It may be true there is a bunching of transactions at the end of 6 months, but this is to be expected from any length of holding period provided in the law.

It is important that the tax laws not discourage the free flow of capital from one investment to another. Extending the holding period would have the effect of doing just that. Investors would find their capital frozen into investments, and would be deterred from switching to better investment opportunities during the extended holding period. Instead of placing less emphasis on the tax consequences of business transactions, anyone making an investment would have to be fully aware of the tax results of such a lengthy holding period.

Tampering with the holding period could have serious long-term effects on the industrial and technological growth of the country. The financing of new plants and equipment is in large measure dependent on funds provided from the issuance of corporate securities. The effect of this provision would be to discourage investment in such securities and to increase financing costs.

The repeal of the alternative rate for individuals also produces similar problems. While it is true that this primarily affects a relatively small number of taxpayers in the higher income brackets, it is this group that provides much of the risk capital. Again we see an instance in which the tax laws could have the effect of freezing investment capital. The national chamber also opposes increasing the alternative capital gains tax rate for corporations.

The interest on State and local government securities has been exempt from Federal income tax since the tax was adopted in 1913. The exemption does not apply to certain industrial development bonds which were made taxable as a result of the Revenue Expenditure Control Act of 1968. In almost all tax-reform hearings since the adoption of the income tax, elimination of the exemption of interest on State and local government securities has been discussed, but Congress has chosen to retain it.

State and local governments are highly dependent on bond isues to finance schools, colleges, hospitals, highways, and other capital improvements. Any abridgment of this bonding power can result in a greater load being placed on the already overburdened property tax. In addition, many State legislatures are already finding difficulties in locating new sources of revenues to meet increasing costs of State and local government. Neither the states nor the local governments can afford to be saddled with needless additional costs of government.

It is the view of the national chamber that any change from the present tax treatment of interest on State and municipal securities would not be in the best interests of the Nation and of maintaining the independence of the States and municipalities. Granting States and municipalities the option of issuing taxable bonds and having the Federal Government pay the additional interest costs involved by subsidies to the States and municipalities is another step toward greater Federal domination.

Under the proposals of this legislation, the choice of issuing taxable or tax-exempt bonds appears to be left to the State or municipality. However, where a premium is offered to those issuing taxable bonds, it seems that the practicalities are diluted. If most of the new bonds are issued as taxable by "choice," then it will only be a short time before it is concluded that the tax-exempt choice is no longer needed. A new avenue is then opened for more intervention by the Federal Government in the affairs of State and local governments. It offers the opportunity for strings to be placed on the subsidies.

The long-run effect of this legislation is to remove the tax-exempt status of State and municipal securities and to make the States and municipalities more dependent on the Government in Washington. This provision should be removed from the legislation.

The need for housing in the decade ahead presents an acute problem. With the construction industry playing such a vital role in the economy and in the solution of so many of our social problems, it is difficult to rationalize the restrictions being proposed on accelerated depreciation at this time.

Under the bill the 200-percent declining balance and the sum of the years digits methods of real estate depreciation are limited to new residential housing. Other new real estate is to be limited to the 150-percent declining balance method. For used buildings acquired after July 25, 1969, only straight-line depreciation is to be allowed. These provisions are sure to have a devastating effect on the construction industry.

Accelerated depreciation for real estate is often referred to as a tax shelter, and those who use it often are referred to as speculators. Those who make such references often fail to point out how many people are living in new housing because these provisions are in the tax law. They fail to point out how many blighted areas have been changed with the construction of new buildings by those who used these tax provisions. They fail to point out how much new construction has been added to the property tax rolls to share the cost burden of local government.

The House report suggests the prime reason for the changes in this area is to prevent tax avoidance. Certainly the tightening of the recapture provisions of section 1250 is the better method of attacking this problem. Such an approach will not have the effect of discouraging investment that some of the proposed changes in the law in this bill will have.

The national chamber opposes the proposed changes in the current tax treatment of nonqualified deferred compensation plans. Deferred compensation has been used by both large and small companies for a number of years to attract executive talent. This bill would have the effect of discouraging the use of certain types of executive compensation. It would tax compensation at rates applicable to compensation when earned, rather than at rates applicable at the time the compensation is received.

In effect, deferred compensation is a promise by the company to pay a sum of money in the future, under circumstances where there is not constructive receipt. Certainly to tax this income as though it were received is not in keeping with the concept of taxation of income on a cash basis.

Subjecting deferred compensation to a minimum tax on deferred payments over $10,000 in a year will add greater complexity to the code. While such complexity may be necessary for the sake of equity, it appears that this provision is certain to require very complicated computations for a number of taxpayers.

The bill does not consider deferred compensation as earned income for purposes of the 50 percent maximum marginal tax. As a result, future deferred compensation payments that are thrown back to 1970 and thereafter, can be subjected to a tax in excess of 50 percent, but the same income under the terms of the bill would have a maximum rate of 50 percent if it were not deferred. This difference in treatment accorded earned income and nonearned income does not appear to be equitable.

The national chamber is opposed to provisions in the bill which would eliminate the present capital gains treatment accorded lump-sum distributions from qualified employee plans. These changes could have the effect of almost doubling the employee's tax on employer contributions by taxing those contributions at ordinary rather than capital gains rates. This would result in employees having less money available at the termination of employment than they had anticipated. Most of those who would be hurt by what is being proposed are employees with modest incomes. Many of them have built their plans for retirement around profit-sharing plans. The increased tax burden would have depressing effects on their future economic welfare. The burden is not eliminated by the averaging formula proposed.

This proposal to eliminate the capital gains treatment of lump-sum distributions is also certain to have an impact on Federal revenues. The incentives for greater productivity of the employee who participates in a profit-sharing plan will be diminished by the greater tax burden inflicted by this legislation. This reduced economic productivity is certain to have the effect of reducing Federal revenues.

The provisions of H.R. 13270 would tax receipt of restricted stock when the risk of forfeiture is removed. Thus, taxpayers could be taxed immediately on property which they might not be able to sell to pay the tax. This presents the serious problem of requiring taxpayer liquidity upon receipt of a nonliquid asset.

The chamber recommends two limitations to the current restricted stock provisions which would eliminate abuse in this area without destroying their basic usefulness. First, the stock used should be limited to company stock or stock of an affiliated group. This assures that the employee's future is directly tied to his employer's. Second, the issuance of the stock must be tied to employment. In this way it cannot be used for payment to independent contractors.

It is most important to encourage employee stock ownership. This is best achieved through the use of stock options and restricted stock plans. Key employees must be retrained by a company and tend to increase the productivity of that company. Increased productivity is an important factor in fighting inflation, and any disruption of a company's employee compensation practices may reduce that company's output.

With regard to the provisions in the legislation relating to the limit on tax preferences, then national chamber recognizes the problem that exists and that some individuals can avoid paying taxes. But the chamber does not endorse the LTP. This change in the tax laws is exceedingly complex. It places an emphasis on gross income, and could very well become the forerunner of a gross receipts tax on all taxpayers. New taxes often are designed to affect only a few individuals, but as the need for revenues increase the temptation is to enlarge their scope to include everyone.

Other sections of the bill directly affect the same so-called preference areas included in LTP. This treatment is the preferred approach if changes are to be made.

The chamber opposes the provision relating to the disallowance of allocated deductions in H.R. 13270. Again the complexity and administrative problems associated with this proposal are enough to cause second thoughts about its wisdom. If this provision is enacted few, if any, investment decisions will be made by individuals without the guidance of an expert tax advisor. The purpose of this provision is to tax income indirectly which is not taxed directly. Many of the tax problems in existence today are due to attempts to do indirectly what would better be done directly.

The national chamber supports the elimination of the unlimited charitable contribution.

The national chamber believes that the attainment and maintenance of a sound domestic mining industry requires more ample recognition in the tax laws that mining is unique. It is unique in that it exhausts its assets in the course of its operation; that exploration for and discovery and development of new mining deposits continually grow more difficult, more costly and financially more hazardous; and that a recovery of capital and return on investment commensurate with the risks is essential to induce venture capital to enter this hazardous financial field.

To meet the required national needs and to assure adequate continuance of the industry by the replacement of exhausted mineral assets, the tax laws should provide that all nonrenewable natural resource industries be granted adequate depletion allowances. In addition, provision should be made for the current deduction of research prospecting, exploration and development costs or, at the election of the taxpayer, such deferment as the taxpayer deems most appropriate in each case, without the now-existing limitations.

Tax laws must recognize that rising energy demands in this Nation require the constant development and maintenance of a healthy petroleum industry. Exploration and development of petroleum resources grow more difficult, more costly, and financially more hazardous. Venture capital will continue to be attracted in this field only if the reward for success is commensurate with the risks involved. Therefore, to meet National needs and to assure development of oil and natural gas produced for energy use, the chamber believes the tax laws must continue to provide adequate depletion allowances.

It has been recommended at these hearings that nonbusiness State gasoline taxes no longer be deductible. State gasoline taxes paid by an individual are presently deductible for Federal income tax purposes, even though they are not business expenses. The national chamber believes that this is correct and that such deductions should be permitted so long as deductions are allowed generally for State taxes paid.

Presently, amounts paid in satisfaction of treble damage antitrust claims under section 4 of the Clayton Act are fully deductible as business expenses for Federal income tax purposes. There has been some discussion that changes might be made in the tax reform bill to prohibit deduction of two-thirds of such treble damage payments where the taxpayer has been convicted of violation of the antitrust laws or has entered a plea of guilty or nolo contendere in such litigation.

Where the purpose behind the statute compelling the wrongdoer to make payments is remedial in nature and is intended to provide a formula for the reparation of a private injury—such payments properly constitute allowable deductions. Where a law is intended to punish a wrongdoer, punishment would be mitigated by the allowance of an income tax deduction. Actions that are brought under section 4 of the Clayton Act are remedial in nature, since the purpose behind that section of the act is to allow the victim a method of recovering the damages inflicted and not to punish the wrongdoer. To disallow the deduction of treble damages would amount to ignoring the remedial characteristic of that part of the law and inflict punishment by use of tax laws.

The tax laws should be used for the purpose of collection of revenues to meet the necessary costs of Government. Their purpose should not be extended to inflicting punishment for violations of nontax laws.

The antitrust laws are very complex. It is often difficult for those in the agencies of Government who enforce the laws to agree on whether a violation has occurred, and the courts have often experienced difficulty in determining whether the law was violated. This difficulty of interpretation means that there will be businesses subjected to treble damages even though they have made every effort to avoid violating the antitrust laws. In such cases, treble damages provide remedial relief for the injured party, and the tax laws should not inflict a fine in such cases.

As a result of the Supreme Court decision known as the Clay-Brown case, some tax-exempt organizations have become involved in certain business activities completely unrelated to their exempt purpose. Situations have occurred where a tax-exempt foundation acquires the stock of a corporation by agreeing to pay the former owners a percentage of the profits up to a specified total. The corporation is then liquidated and its assets leased to a new company for a rental somewhat less than the installment payment obligations of the foundation. The rental payments create deductions for the new company, thus reducing its tax liability, while the rental receipts are tax free to the recipient exempt organization. The former owners are subject only to capital gains taxation.

The national chamber supported the original tax on unrelated business income of exempt organizations. It so testified in 1950, when this legislation was first before Congress. The chamber supports the provisions in H.R. 13270, which would expand the unrelated business income tax to include the unrelated debt-financed income of exempt organizations where the organization obtains such income from property acquired or improved with borrowed funds.

The bill provides that advertising income of an exempt organization is unrelated business income even though carried on in connection with activities related to the organization's exempt purpose.

The national chamber has consistently supported taxing unrelated businesses of tax-exempt organizations. However, the chamber opposes taxing revenues of tax-exempt organizations unless derived from an unrelated business.

In 1950, Congress enacted the provisions to tax the unrelated business income of certain exempt organizations. The action was taken because some exempt organizations were engaging in businesses totally unrelated to their exempt purposes. Examples cited in congressional hearings in 1950 included some colleges and other institutions engaging in a variety of business undertakings such as the production of automobile parts, chinaware, and food products, and the operation of theaters, oil well, and cotton gins. These businesses were totally unrelated to the exempt purposes of the organizations involved and were rightly made subject to tax. They did nothing to further the exempt purposes of the exempt organization other than to provide a source of funds. Thus, Congress enacted the tax, generally equivalent to the tax on corporations, to apply to the income derived by exempt organizations from an "unrelated trade or business".

After the enactment of the 1950 tax on unrelated business income of tax-exempt organizations, advertising income of tax-exempt organizations continued to be exempt. Interpretation of the law by the Internal Revenue Service, by Treasury, by exempt organizations, and by taxpayers in general was that advertising income of such organizations was exempt by law. Then in 1967, 17 years after the enactment of the unrelated business income tax, the Treasury Department decided that it would adopt new regulations and tax advertising income of exempt organizations. This interpretation of the law by the Treasury regulations was contrary to the legislative history of the 1950 statute and the intent of Congress in its enactment.

Although it was discussed at the hearings of the Internal Revenue Service, the question of competition is not the issue. The law makes no reference to competition, does not use it as a test, and as a matter of fact it would be impractical to do so. An unrelated business of a tax-exempt organization is taxable whether or not it is competing with anyone else. A related business is not taxable under the law—whether or not it is competing.

Practically every tax-exempt organization competes in a business way. The monthly church dinner competes with the restaurants, the annual benefit show of the local boys' club competes with private theaters, the swimming pool of the local civic association competes with commercial swimming pools. No one suggests these activities should be taxed when they are an integral part of the exempt purpose of the tax-exempt organization—they are related businesses. They may be separate businesses and they may compete—but that is not the test.

The test is whether there is a business and whether it is related. Congress knew this in 1950, understood why this had to be the test, and this is what was enacted in the law.

The code applies the unrelated business income tax only to the income from an "unrelated trade or business." If an exempt organization publishes a magazine containing advertising, the trade or business is obviously publishing the magazine. Selling advertising is merely one integral activity in the overall operation of publishing the magazine. What the regulations say is that even though publishing is a business and is related, and therefore exempt, advertising is a separate business and is taxable as an entity, and this is what the proposal in the bill would tax. This runs contrary to the general principles of taxation which treat a trade or business as the integrated sum of its various activities.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized that you cannot fractionate advertising from editorial content. In the case of Grosjean v. American Press Company, Inc., 297 U.S. 233, the Court recognized that taxing advertising is taxing the entire publication.

Practically all of the State and local chambers of commerce and trade and professional organizations affiliated with the Chamber of Commerce of the United States issue some type of regular publication. These publications explain to people in this country and around the world the workings of the free enterprise system, the American way of life, and our form of government and economy. These publications should not be discouraged. Certainly some of these publications including advertising—it makes them attractive and assists in paying the cost of the publications. Everyone agrees the tax revenues to be obtained from taxing their advertising income is small.

The national chamber has consistently fought for the principles of free enterprise. It will not refrain from fighting for the maintenance of the publications of its affiliated organizations which advance the cause of free enterprise.

A further problem exists with the fact that the new code section 513(c) proposed by section 121(c) of the bill, is headed "Advertising, Etc., Activities". If the provisions of this section are to be enacted, it is urged that heading be corrected so there will be no need to litigate the meaning of "Etc., Activities".

The national chamber is aware of the problems which arise from special farm provisions. This is true with respect to receiving capital gains on the sale of items whose cost was an ordinary deduction. However, the chamber believes that the excess deductions account is too complex and should not be used as a method of solving the problem.

In addition, applying the excess deductions account provisions to only those individuals who have nonfarm income in excess of $50,000 discriminates against those farmers who are investing in other areas because farming may not be as profitable as it used to be.

It is unfortunate that this legislation does not contain needed depreciation reform. If the investment tax credit is to be repealed, then this legislation should provide the kind of permanent capital recovery tax system this country must have if its industry is to compete with the products of other industrial nations. The Treasury Department is making studies in this area. We urge that reform in this area be given priority. It is important that efforts be made to write permanent depreciation rates and allowances into the law, instead of requiring a dependence on the depreciation guidelines, which can be changed at any time by administrative action. We also urge that this committee take action to eliminate by law the unfair and highly complex reserve ratio test.

On behalf of the national chamber I wish to again thank you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of the committee for this opportunity to testify on the wide range of provisions in H.R. 13270. Your committee is to be commended for holding these hearings and demonstrating your concern for the vital problems of tax reform. We hope we have been helpful in presenting the views of the business community to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for your statement, Mr. Winter. I am interested to know that you feel there should be a 50-percent limit on personal income tax, and that is based, I take it in considerable degree on the fact that when you get beyond the 50-percent tax rate you pass the point of diminishing returns?

Mr. WINTER. I think we look at it more as a question of equity in this area. As you get to the 50-percent bracket, we think that is the top bracket that there should be on individual income. It has been the position of the chamber for many, many years.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time a person gives you half of what he makes assuming he is paying it virtually on everything he is making, he pays you half of what he is making, you feel that that is enough, that that is fair if he gives you half?

Mr. WINTER. Yes; we do think that after you get beyond the 50–50 split with the Government that is perhaps going a little too far and is not equitable to the taxpayer.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. WINTER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for your statement, Mr. Winter. I am interested to know that you feel there should be a 50-percent limit on personal income tax, and that is based I take it in considerable degree on the fact that when you get beyond the 50-percent tax rate you reach the point of diminishing returns?

Mr. WINTER. I think we look at it more as a question of equity in this area. As you get to the 50-percent bracket, we think that that is the top bracket that there should be on individual income. It has been the position of the chamber for many many years.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time a person gives you half of what he makes assuming he is paying it virtually on everything he is making, you feel that that is enough?

Mr. WINTER. We do think so. It can tie in with your income averaging. I think there is a real appeal for that. We get into bunching of income. We put in the income averaging provision. This is along that same line I think. You get in the areas of the deferred compensation, where you can support that. Yes, we do think that after you get beyond the 50–50 split with the Government that that is perhaps going a little too far and is not equitable to the taxpayer.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. WINTER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Mr. Harold Ketelhut of Freeport, Ill.

STATEMENT OF HAROLD KETELHUT, A MEMBER OF THE UNITED AUTO WORKERS INTERNATIONAL UNION, FREEPORT, ILL.

Mr. KETELHUT. Mr. Chairman and members of the Finance Committee:

My name is Harold Ketelhut, and my home address is 915 South Chippewa Avenue, Freeport, Ill. I am employed by Twin Disc, Inc., of Rockford, Ill., and I am a member of Local 765, United Auto Workers International Union. I have been a continuous union member since 1941, and from 1953 through 1958 I served as a local business representative for the International Association of Machinists on a full-time basis.

In 1958 I helped organize the employees of a company in Monroe, Wis. Contract negotiations with the employer began after the IAM was certified as the legal bargaining representative of the employees. The international union sent one of its representatives to Monroe to assist the new local union's bargaining committee—or so we thought.

In the absence of members of the local bargaining committee, this international representative offered management a deal. He said, in effect, "If you will agree to include a 'union shop' clause in the contract so we can collect dues from all the employees, I will permit you to set the wage rates."

The company's spokesmen accepted this offer. As a result, all employees were compelled to pay dues to the local union, and the local bargaining committee had no voice in determining the wage rates. I have good reasons for believing that some union officials are more concerned about collecting dues than about getting higher wages for the employees they are supposed to represent.

I will not pretend that I have read, or that I understand, every section of this 368-page tax bill. But I have read section 101(b), which proposes taxation of tax-exempt private foundations which engage in political activities. As I understand it, and the language seems quite clear to me a 100-percent tax would be levied on any amount of money spent by a foundation for political purposes.

For example, that tax would be applied to a sum of money used by a foundation to sponsor a voter registration drive.

In my opinion, the political activities of all tax-exempt organizations should be curbed—including the political activities of tax-exempt labor unions.

In order to earn my livelihood as an employee of Twin Disc, Inc., I am paying union dues against my will. I resent the fact that the UAW has used my dues money in efforts to defeat political candidates I support. Last year it opposed the reelection of the late Senator Dirksen, who was a member of your committee.

A few years ago Senator Dirksen wrote an article which was published in the DePaul University Law Review. I quote the following from his article:

> It is well known to everyone that American unions have for the past many years been highly active in politics . . . Large armies of union staff personnel are assigned to work in political campaigns at the precinct level in getting out the vote for union-endorsed candidates; union newspapers and other publications are heavily devoted to promoting favored candidates, and union funds derived from membership dues and fees are liberally distributed to such candidates.

And then Senator Dirksen asked a question which applies to me and millions of other wage-earners:

> Where does this leave the individual worker who is required under a compulsory unionism agreement to pay his dues and fees into the union as a necessary condition to holding his job?

I am one of many UAW members who have been vocal in objecting to partisan politicking by officials of our union. We are not paying these union officials to tell us we should vote for certain candidates for public offices; we are paying them to serve as our collective bargaining agents.

The uproar from rank-and-file members became so loud that the union hierarchy felt something should be done during the international union's last convention to pacify us. With the strong backing of the international's officers, delegates to the convention voted to amend the UAW constitution. In theory, at least, the new amendment permits a member who objects to the union's political program to designate a portion of his dues for a charitable institution of his choice.

By urging this action, UAW officials admitted they have been using some of the dues money for political purposes. Last March I wrote the first of several letters to an official of my local union and to the international union's secretary-treasurer. I requested that the portion of my dues which was used for political purposes be allocated to a crusade on behalf of handicapped children.

I finally received a letter early this month from the crusade director thanking me for a $75 pledge. Obviously, the union does not intend to refund the money which was taken from me in the past and used in support of political candidates and causes I and many other union members oppose.

I suppose the union will earmark a portion of my future dues for the handicapped children's crusade, but I do not know whether the $75 pledge will be fulfilled during the next 12 months or during the next 5 years. The union officials I have written to have not bothered to let me know.

According to the union newspapers I receive, this tax bill is the greatest thing to come down the pike since the Wagner Act. Walter Reuther and George Meany disagree on many subjects, but they apparently agree this is the kind of tax reform the country needs. Well, they are not speaking for me on this issue.

To me, "tax justice" means that all individuals and organizations would be treated justly and equally by the government. Preserving tax loopholes for unions that spend their members' compulsory dues for political action would be a great injustice to the working people of this country. That is my opinion and the opinion of almost very worker I have ever met.

I understand that the bill before you proposes to tax the income received by churches from investments in unrelated businesses. I know that at one time the International Association of Machinists was one of the bigger stockholders in Sears, Roebuck and Company. I know the IAM owns a sizable office building here in Washington.

I do not know whether the unrelated business income of unions is now taxed. But if it is not, it should be—especially if Congress decides to impose a tax on the unrelated business income of the churches.

In my opinion, it is unfair to deny a tax exemption to one organization on the basis of its political activities and wink at the political activities of another tax-exempt organization. What is sauce for the goose is still sauce for the gander. I earnestly hope you will vote to deny tax exemptions to all organizations which use any part of their income for any kind of political activity. This would serve to discourage the misuse of money earned by workers to support the political whims of union officials.

I thank you for your attention and the valuable time you have allocated to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir.

Senator MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend this witness for his courageous testimony. I am concerned about part of his testimony. Now, as I understand it, a great amount of political activities by the AFL–CIO are financed out of the funds of the committee on political education known as COPE. Do I understand correctly that the contributions made by union members to COPE, are voluntary?

Mr. KETELHUT. My experience with COPE is that they will offer you a lottery, a form of lottery ticket or a chance to win a television set and so on. You contribute x dollars by the number of chances you get. That is part of the money that goes into the political action, yes.

Senator MILLER. Of course, that would be a voluntary matter for a union member to buy some chances. He does not have to that, does he?

Mr. KETELHUT. Well, another thing in my experience has been on the IAM staff for 6 years, every staff conference that I attended that was a head of an election, a national election or a big State election coming up, if it happened to be a national election I was asked to donate some dollars, and if I didn't I would not remain on the staff very long. If it was a State election I would attend the State labor convention and be told the same thing. It was voluntary to the extent that if you did not contribute your international office frowned upon you.

Senator MILLER. Well, take the rank and file who are not members of the staff, just somebody who has been in the union for 6 months. He does not have to pay money into COPE if he does not want to, does he?

Mr. KETELHUT. The UAW constitution provides—I did not bring it along but it provides—that if a member—right in our constitution—if a member objects to his money, money from his dues being spent politically, they will——

Senator MILLER. I am not talking about dues, though.

Mr. KETELHUT. About what?

Senator MILLER. I am not talking about dues. I am talking about contributions to COPE.

Mr. KETELHUT. Yes.

Senator MILLER. Because my understanding is that the financing of COPE does not come out of dues. It comes out of contributions or purchasing chances on lotteries and things like that.

Mr. KETELHUT. I would have to go along with you. I cannot question you on that. All I know is that with my experience that is the way I have been approached on it. Whether or not they get additional funds from the general treasury I do not know.

Senator MILLER. Forgetting about the Committee on Political Education funds, and assuming that contributions by individual members are voluntary—as I have long understood to be the case, let us turn our attention to union dues. You have testified that some part of the dues has been used for political purposes by some unions. I assume by political purposes you mean partisan purposes.

Mr. KETELHUT. Yes!

Senator MILLER. Can you tell us how?

Mr. KETELHUT. I will give you some example, since I have a few moments to refresh my memory. I recall that when I served on the IM staff of 1953 through 1958. Senator Douglas was our Senator from Illinois. At election time International would send out a man and he would have his car loaded down with printed campaign material for Mr. Douglas. This material would be distributed to the area Democratic headquarters in my district. This man would inform me that I should keep quiet and not tell everybody that he was doing this on union time as he was a staff member of the IM.

Senator MILLER. The point you make here is that union dues which are used to pay the salaries of staff members of the union were diluted to the extent that the staff member took time away from his staff duties with the union and participated in a partisan political campaign?

Mr. KETELHUT. That is right.

Senator MILLER. Can you tell us how long this particular staff member took off to engage in the partisan political campaign?

Mr. KETELHUT. At different times when this man came through my area on these political excursions, I would ask him to stay over and assist me on local union problems as he was also a capable negotiator. He told me that he could not offer any assistance because he was ordered to spend all his time on seeing that Mr. Douglas was reelected.

Senator MILLER. You have given us an example. Do you know of other examples?

Mr. KETELHUT. Yes I do. The machinist union, as an arm of the organization which they refer to the machinists union partisan political league. They would encourage local lodges to put on parties and dances, and furnish lunch and refreshments, which may cost a local $300, $400, or $500 out of its local treasury. Then a collection would be made amongst the union members at this party who were told that they were contributing to the machinists nonpartisan political league.

Senator MILLER. What you are saying then is that the financing of the so-called nonpartisan political league was handled through parties of this nature with the local union's treasury, which had been funded by union dues, being used to pay for the expense of the parties and the parties being used as a vehicle for raising "voluntary" contributions to the league.

Mr. KETELHUT. That is right.

Senator MILLER. Were the activities of the so-called nonpartisan league genuinely nonpartisan?

Mr. KETELHUT. Let me put it this way, that the nonpartisan slogan was to elect our friends—defeat our enemies.

Senator MILLER. That is an interesting slogan, but the real question is whether those designated as friends represented mostly or entirely the candidates of one political party.

Mr. KETELHUT. I would say that their activities, 98 percent of the time, supported the candidates of one party.

Senator MILLER. And which party?

Mr. KETELHUT. The Democratic Party.

Senator MILLER. Can you give us another example of how union dues were used for partisan political purposes?

Mr. KETELHUT. During the last presidential election when Vice President Humphrey held his parade in Chicago, the Local 765 of the UAW, of which I am a member, took two bus loads of members, paid for the loss of time from their jobs, and paid for the bus fares and meals and lodging to participate in the Humphrey program in Chicago. This was done by the sizable UAW local in Rockville, which had the funds to support it.

Senator MILLER. You are saying that these payments were made from the union treasury into which dues had been paid, and not from a fund which was supported by voluntary contributions.

Mr. KETELHUT. That is absolutely right. UAW locals cannot have funds other than from dues.

Senator MILLER. In other words, the entire union membership through their dues, really paid for the expenses of the bus loads of union members going to and from Chicago, remaining in Chicago over night, and the loss in wages incurred by their absences from their employment.

Mr. KETELHUT. That is right.

Senator MILLER. I have heard that in some cases a local union's treasury, funded by union dues, has been used to reimburse union members for taking time away from their employment to actively work in getting out the vote for candidates endorsed by the union in partisan political elections. Do you know of any such practices in your experience?

Mr. KETELHUT. Yes, I do. In Illinois, approximately I would say 1954 or 1955, somewhere in the State legislature election, we had a man that was endorsed by the international union office in Chicago, to run against the incumbent State legislator.

Senator MILLER. Where?

Mr. KETELHUT. In the Freeport, Ill., district. The international office in Chicago requested that our IAM local in Freeport support and assist this man in every way. The local set up a committee. The members of this committee took time off to check the voting record at the county court house in the district. As many of our members were scattered in two or three counties, it was necessary for the members of this committee to take time off from their employment to encourage members that were not registered to vote to become registered, and this same committee, for a few days before the election, made up car pools to contact members at their homes and to get them to vote. We had many night-shift people who could only be contacted in this way. The members of this committee were reimbursed by the local union for wages lost by their activities.

Senator MILLER. Are you saying that their activities were directed at the support of the partisan candidate endorsed by the international office in Chicago?

Mr. KETELHUT. That is right.

Senator MILLER. Can you tell us how union newspapers are financed?

Mr. KETELHUT. I can tell you this. In my experience with the Machinist Weekly paper, it is not supported by advertisement. In their international audit reports they do list the expense of publishing this paper.

Senator MILLER. When you say they list the expense of publishing the paper, are you referring to a listing in connection with the international union's treasury, which is supported by union dues?

Mr. KETELHUT. That is absolutely right. This audit is conducted by a committee selected from the entire rank-and-file membership, and they audit the funds of the international secretary-treasurer.

Senator MILLER. I want to get this clear. It has been my observation that some union newspapers carry advertising, and I would presume that the paper you referred to, on some occasions at least, did carry some advertising. But the point is that any deficit in operations of the newspaper was paid out of the treasury, which was funded by union dues.

Mr. KETELHUT. That is absolutely right.

Senator MILLER. Was it your observation that the union newspaper endorsed certain candidates in partisan political races?

Mr. KETELHUT. Very much so.

Senator MILLER. Were these outright endorsements indicating that the members should vote for or against certain candidates?

Mr. KETELHUT. Yes it was.

Senator MILLER. Was there any reason furnished the readers of the union newspaper for voting for or against certain candidates?

Mr. KETELHUT. Yes there was.

Senator MILLER. Can you amplify on this?

Mr. KETELHUT. The union paper would list a candidate they endorsed. They would list the candidate they were opposed to. They would list each candidate's voting record on issues they felt vital to labor.

Senator MILLER. When you say "they" to whom do you refer?

Mr. KETELHUT. It would generally carry the endorsement of the international officers—they would list their names.

Senator MILLER. What about the voting records to which you refer. Were these shown in a manner which would indicate that the candidate supported had voted right on the issue, and candidates opposed had voted wrong on the issue?

Mr. KETELHUT. That's the way it was handled.

Senator MILLER. Who determined whether a wrong vote or a right vote had been cast on the issues?

Mr. KETELHUT. It would have been the international officers who endorsed the candidates.

Senator MILLER. Does this mean that the officers, in their evaluation of such votes, were speaking for the individual members of the union? Or only for themselves?

Mr. KETELHUT. They were not speaking for the individual member, they were speaking namely for themselves, using the union paper to promote candidates of their own choice. Because as a union official, I received much criticism from rank and file union members for the international using our paper for partisan political purposes.

Senator MILLER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness will be Mrs. J. M. Ford of Lawrence, Kans. I am pleased to welcome you here, Mrs. Ford.

I am pleased to welcome you here, Mrs. Ford.

We are ready to hear from you.

STATEMENT OF MRS. J. M. FORD, ILU MEMBER, LAWRENCE, KANS.

Mrs. FORD. I want to thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, for allowing me to come to Washington to give you my little tale of woe.

I am Mrs. M. Ford, of 1941 Emerald Drive, Lawrence, Kans. Mr. Ford and I had two sons in college and we are very much interested in tax reform, especially if tax reform will provide us tax relief.

Both my husband and I are employed. Our employer is Hercules Inc., which operates the Sunflower Army Ammunition Plant. I work in the laundry department where all coveralls are washed and folded and all personnel employed in the production of this product must wear these for their protection.

I have been employed by Hercules for the past 4 years.

As I understand it, the tax reform bill approved by the House of Representatives will levy a tax on the income received by churches on their investments in unrelated businesses. I do not object to that feature of the bill. But I do object to the failure of the House bill to propose a tax on the unrelated business income of labor unions.

I also object to the favored treatment unions receive with regard to political activities. The bill will impose a severe tax on tax-exempt foundations if any of their money is used for any kind of political program—including voter registration campaigns. But I cannot find anything in this bill which says labor unions will also be taxed if they spend money for voter registration drives or other political activities.

I want to ask after I read an excerpt out of the Laborer which I get, and then I want this to go in the record; please, sir:

"House group starts to plug tax loophole," and one paragraph down here:

> Severe limitations would be placed on the right of foundations to make direct grants to individuals, to prevent self-dealing between a foundation and its founder and to prevent hoarding of income. One section that is being carefully studied by labor lawyers is that preventing foundations from engaging directly in voter registration drives, although it is unlikely that this section would affect union registration campaigns.

Now, that is in the magazine that I receive.

(The article referred to by Mrs. Ford for inclusion in the record follows:)

[From the Laborer, June 1969]

HOUSE GROUP STARTS TO PLUG TAX LOOPHOLES

The House Ways & Means Committee has approved "tentatively" a series of tax reform measures designed to plug some of the tax loopholes that now exist.

For the most part the proposals are in line with what organized labor has suggested in the less controversial areas of tax reform. They do not, however, touch on major tax reform proposals such as capital gains, oil depletion allowances, tax-exempt bonds and relief for low and middle income brackets. Presumably, these will be touched on in later installments of the Committee proposals in the months ahead.

The Committee's proposed "first installment" of tax reform touches such areas as conglomerate mergers, "hobby" farm losses, charitable contributions, moving expenses and private foundations. Moving expenses have been liberalized—a gain for workers—but tax treatment of the other areas has been tightened to a significant degree.

Conglomerate Mergers: The Committee's proposals would reduce the tax advantages that grow out of mergers of one kind or another which are carried out through the issuance of certain bonds or debentures. In general, corporations would not be allowed to claim deductions for interest paid on these bonds. Labor economists are carefully studying the impact of this proposal.

"Hobby" Farm Losses: The Committee's proposal would reduce sharply claims of "excessive" farm losses which now can be written off against other income. In general "hobby" farmers would be expected to prove that they are in business to make a profit and to be limited in the amount of loss they can claim.

Charitable Contributions: The present tax provisions that allow unlimited deductions for charitable contributions would be repealed gradually through 1975 with especial reference to those contributions which involve property that has increased in value between the time it was acquired and the time it was contributed. This would particularly affect works of art and other types of collections that have a way of increasing immensely in value when they are contributed to museums or universities.

Foundations: Tax treatment proposals for foundations are largely in response to the growing list of abuses that have begun to surround the creation and activities of private foundations. The Committee would impose a 5 percent tax on net investment income of private foundations, would include capital gains and would not permit deductions for dividends received.

Severe limitations would be placed on the right of foundations to make direct grants to individuals, to prevent "self-dealing" between a foundation and its founder and to prevent hoarding of income. One section that is being carefully studied by labor lawyers is that preventing foundations from engaging directly in voter-registration drives, although it is unlikely that the section would affect union registration campaigns.

Mrs. FORD. Why are the labor unions entitled to preferential treatment?

One thing can be said in defense of the political activities of foundations: at least they are using money which has been given voluntarily.

The unions, on the other hand, are financing their politicking with funds taken from workers who are victims of compulsory unionism.

This is an outrage, and I hope you gentlemen on the committee agree it is an outrage.

In Kansas, recently, the Emporia Gazette criticized this bill because it has tax loopholes benefiting labor unions that earn income from business investments and also support politicians who find favor with the union hierarchy. The Gazette said:

It is now time for the public—union members included—to join in the crusade to close all tax loopholes.

I am a union member who says "Amen!" to that.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Gazette editorial be made a part of the record of this hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. We will include that in the record at this point.

(The article referred to follows:)

[From the Emporia, Kansas, Gazette]

BIG ONE GETTING AWAY

Even before the nets can be closed on the slippery fish who have been avoiding federal taxes, the best catch of all has his nose through a big loophole. Unless the public raises a loud cry, the big one will get away.

The prize in this case is Big Labor. (Not the small locals of the working men who produce for American enterprise, not them; this big fish is the labor hierarchy made up of those who get rich and play politics with union dues.)

A tax reform bill—described as the most sweeping in history—has passed the House by a lopsided vote of 394 to 30. Now the bill is before the Senate where it still may be changed before final approval.

Among the reforms in the present bill are: 1. a minimum tax on persons of high income, many of whom now escape all taxes; 2. a reduction in the oil depletion allowance from 27½ to 20 per cent; 3. stiffer capital gains tax rules for people in high brackets; 4. repeal of the 7 per cent investment credit for corporations; 5. restrictions on rapid-depreciation tax writeoffs; 6. curbs on abuses of charitable contributions to escape taxes; 7. restrictions on the use of foundations as tax-evasion devices; 8. a 7½ per cent tax on incomes of foundations from investments; plus several others.

Two of these reforms that ought to affect Big Labor are No. 7 and No. 8—restrictions on the use of foundations, and a 7½ per cent tax on incomes of foundations.

The nation's big labor unions—like some major churches—have millions invested in private businesses. Dividends from these operations are exempt from income taxes. But the Union Hierarchy uses its profits to support political causes and politicians who find favor.

As it is now written, the Reform Bill preserves the favored status of labor unions while imposing taxes on the income from nonrelated businesses of churches and other organizations.

But there is hope. Sen. Paul Fannin of Arizona has promised that "in my position on the Senate Finance Committee, I expect that we shall be looking into the tax-exempt status of these empires built by union moguls with the compulsory dues of the workers." Also, the National Right to Work Committee has started a campaign to stir up an investigation into the matter.

It is now time for the public—union members included—to join in the crusade to close all tax loopholes.—R. C.

Mrs. FORD. Recently I also read in the newspapers that the National AFL-CIO president appeared before this committee to speak for what he called "tax justice." I cannot see any justice in compelling workers like me to pay dues to a tax-exempt union that spends our money to elect political candidates we workers are against.

Earlier this year our State legislature passed a bill favored by every worker I know. But the union officials were fighting it, so Governor Docking vetoed the bill. Later we found out the Governor received a total of $30,000 in contributions from Kansas AFL-CIO officials during his last campaign, it is pretty clear to me that Governor Docking is not going to side with us in the future if the union officials are against the things we workers are for.

Just 1 year ago this month I was approached in the laundry department of the Sunflower Plant by an official of Local 605 of the International Laborers Union. She told me the company had agreed to include a "union shop" clause in its new collective bargaining agreement with local 605. She said I would be fired from my job if I failed or refused to sign a card authorizing the deduction of monthly union dues from my paychecks.

The loss of my income would have hurt, in fact we could only have sent one son to college last year instead of two. We still have one in now. So I reluctantly signed the card, and ever since my employer has been checking off union dues from my wages.

I believe—and most of the Sunflower employees I know believe—that during the contract bargaining sessions last year officials of local 605 eagerly accepted a meager wage increase for the employees in order to induce the company to agree to their demands for a compulsory "union shop" clause.

It should be obvious to everyone that some workers want to join and support labor unions and other workers do not want to join and support labor unions. Why aren't the rights of both groups respected? Why aren't the union officials willing to rely on persuasion to enlist new members? Do they have such a low opinion of the services they offer that they are convinced many employees would not support the unions voluntarily? Or do they think most of us are so dumb that we must be compelled to do what they think is the right thing to do, not what we think is right.

A year ago I did not know I was being lied to when I was told I would have to sign a dues checkoff card in order to keep my job. Since that time I have learned because I was sent a statement by the union, that a worker cannot legally be compelled to authorize the deduction of union dues from his paycheck. We can be compelled to pay dues, but we cannot be required to sign the checkoff authorization form.

Officials of local 605 used other forms of pressure in an effort to get the signatures of sunflower workers on the checkoff form. The union's initiation fee was $38.75, and a lump-sum payment was demanded from employees who balked at signing the form. On the other hand, the union accepted the fee in installments from those workers who signed the checkoff form. Some of the Sunflower employees were dragged into the Teamsters Union, and they were compelled to pay a $75 initiation fee.

I am reasonably certain the income received by the local chamber of commerce in Lawrence, Kans., is tax exempt. Let's suppose its board of directors decided to compel every businessmen to pay dues to the chamber as a condition of operating this business in our community. The directors might say:

> The services of our chamber benefit every business in Lawrence. Some of these businessmen have been taking a "free ride" at our expense, and we are going to put a stop to it. They will either join the chamber and support its program, or we will run them out of town.

I strongly suspect the Lawrence Chamber of Commerce would quickly lose its tax exemption if it attempted to coerce nonmembers in our business community. There is nothing hypothetical about the coercion used by labor unions. Congress will be shirking its duty if it fails to tax unions' unrelated business income and also if it fails to lift tax exemptions of unions using compulsory dues money to support political candidates and causes.

By being here today, I am risking reprisals by vindictive union officials, and I think you all realize this.

I sincerely hope it is not wishful thinking when I assume the members of this committe are willing to run the same risk.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator MILLER. What local are you a part of?

Mrs. FORD. Local 605 of the Laborers' International Union of North America, located at Sun Flower, Kans.

Senator MILLER. Does this union have a union shop contract with the management?

Mrs. FORD. Yes, sir, it does.

Senator MILLER. In other words, you must belong to the union to hold your job?

Mrs. FORD. Yes sir.

Senator MILLER. And, of course, you pay dues to the union.

Mrs. FORD. Yes sir, I do, and it is deducted from my pay check.

Senator MILLER. Do I understand that part of these dues are used by the union for partisan political purposes?

Mrs. FORD. As far as I know. I have in my hand a copy of an article that was in the Johnson County Herald on March 12, 1969, referring to the contributions reported in last fall's gubernatorial campaign in Kansas.

Senator MILLER. I note that the article refers to an F. E. Black as having contributed $10,000 to the "Docking for Governor Club," and that Black is believed to be a leader in the AFL-CIO in Kansas. The article also lists other Docking contributors to include the Amalgamated Meat Cutters, the Communications Workers of America, the International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, and other unions. Is this the basis for your belief that some part of union dues has been used for partisan political purposes?

Mrs. FORD. Yes, sir, this is one of the reasons that I believe this. Another reason is that we were working on a bill to put teeth into the Kansas right-to-work law, and we thought that had accomplished this because we had a good majority—76–40 in the legislature. Then Governor Docking vetoed it.

Senator MILLER. Is the main thrust of your criticism your understanding that a part of your union dues, which you must pay in order to hold your job, is used for partisan political purposes?

Mrs. FORD. Only partially because there are millions of people in my shoes in the United States who are forced to support candidates whom they oppose just as I.

Senator MILLER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

We will next call Mrs. Edna Anish, of Pittsburgh, Pa.

I think it might be well to include at this point a very thoughtful statement of Senator Inouye. It is certainly relevant to the testimony we will be receiving from some of the following witnesses.

(The statement referred to follows:)

Statement of Hon. Daniel K. Inouye, a U.S. Senator From the State of Hawaii

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank this committee for the opportunity to speak about what I consider a serious deficiency in H.R. 13270. I urge that the present bill be amended to include a provision for special tax exemptions for the disabled.

Currently, there is legislation before the Senate, S. 1069, and the House, H.R. 424, which would accomplish this objective. S. 1069, introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from New York, would provide the handicapped an income tax deduction of up to $600 to cover transportation to and from work, as well as allowing the disabled the same $600 deduction now provided the blind.

I have more than a passing interest in this legislation. I am a member of that group called the handicapped. In my own case, the loss of my arm is a relatively minor inconvenience. I receive compensation from the government and can drive to work without any difficulty. No special prosthetics are required by me nor do I need special shoes or other clothing. My musical talents have not flowered, but otherwise I have led a full life that has left me with a sense of deep personal satisfaction. Hundreds of thousands of individuals have not been so fortunate, and it is because my concern for their plight that I serve as an honorary member of The Joint Handicapped Council.

Severely disabled individuals often find it impossible to utilize cheap public transportation, such as buses and subways, because they must use braces, crutches, wheelchairs and prosthetic devices. Daily expenses are further increased by special or extra clothing. Orthopedic shoes, for example, can cost as much as between $250 to $400 per pair, and in these inflationary times, the price of some special shoes has doubled in a year. There are many other expenses that must be borne in many cases: help to perform simple tasks the non-handicapped find easy to do; special furniture and fixtures; medical and insurance expenses; and other expenses that drain a limited budget.

H.R. 424 and S. 1069 are important not only because of the direct monetary benefit to the handicapped but also because it will serve as a psychological and financial incentive to the disabled. It is good business to hire the handicapped. Aware of their limitations and stirred by pride of accomplishment, the disabled make conscientious workers. They are more anxious than the average worker to prove themselves productive members of society.

All too often, however, their good intentions are dashed soon after they enter the job market. They face not only doubt but also the hard economic reality of the expenses I mentioned earlier. Frequently they find that the total cost exceeds their income, and they are compelled to withdraw into an empty existence by becoming welfare wards of society and their relatives. Every year our country wastes millions of dollars in rehabilitation costs to train men and women who are later disappointed by the denial of job opportunities by the uneven hand of the tax collector. More millions are spent for welfare for the disabled who would prefer to work to earn a living. The handicapped want opportunity—not charity.

The total cost to the Federal Treasury will be minimal. It has been estimated that some 300,000 individuals would qualify at a maximum cost of $40 million. Stringent controls are built into S. 1069–H.R. 424 by the requirement that only those suffering from a loss of one or more extremities or 40% or more loss of ability as defined under the Schedule for Rating Disabilities of the Veterans Administration would qualify for the $600 exemption. Further, the disabled would obtain the additional exemption for which only the blind now qualify.

I believe that an amendment to H.R. 13270 in the form of S. 1069—H.R. 424 would be economically enlightened in addition to being a humanitarian concept. By encouraging these individuals to work, we shall make better use of welfare and rehabilitation expenses. I hope that my colleagues in the Congress will give their favorable consideration to this deserving amendment when it is offered.

STATEMENT OF EDNA ANISH, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, PITTSBURGH, PA.; ACCOMPANIED BY MRS. MARGARET LEE WALGREN, LEGISLATIVE ADVISOR, OPEN DOORS FOR THE HANDICAPPED

Miss ANISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am Edna Anish, executive secretary of Open Doors for the Handicapped, 1013 South Third Street, Pittsburgh, Pa. Accompanying me today is Mrs. Margaret Walgren, our legislative adviser.

Over the past 14 years upwards of 490 bills—15 in the 89th Congress alone—have been referred to Congress seeking tax relief for the physically handicapped. Not one has been enacted. A cynical explanation might be that all these bills, being so uncontroversial, were merely for home consumption.

Of course, countering this interpretation is the fact that the visually handicapped—the blind—were granted a $600 tax exemption in 1950. You believed then that the low income of this group should be subsidized because of difficulties in finding and qualifying for employment.

But problems of working and the expenses of living for the orthopedically handicapped are as burdensome, if not more so, than those of the visually handicapped. The same rationale for tax relief should therefore be applied to both categories. Elimination of this obvious inequity in the present tax structure is long overdue.

So that you may better understand why we seek tax relief such as the $600 exemption now given to the blind, we bring to your attention the expenses incidental to a disabled person's way of life. Unquestionably, the normal day-to-day activities that the able-bodies take for granted are far more costly in time, energy, and money for us.

Our organization, Open Doors for the Handicapped promotes the independence of the disabled. This independence costs money. For example:

Transportation: Public transportation is largely inaccessible to the disabled. The average income of a rehabilitated orthopedically handicapped person is $3,400 a year. A clerk typist who goes out to work will spend about one-half of his annual earnings on taxicabs. The breakdown of the earnings of a single full-time employee in Pittsburgh is as follows:

Annual Earnings	$3,400.00
Less taxes:
Internal Revenue	402.00
Surtax	30.00
Social Security	163.20
Local City Tax	68.00
	663.20
Total	2,736.80
Taxicabs (annually)	1,560.00
Net Income	1,176.80

This, gentlemen, is what our Government calls poverty. The "Tax Reform Act of 1969" uses $1,100 as the poverty level. We agree! We are paying our Government for the privilege of going to work. If this same person did not have the drive and determination to go out to work, he would vegetate at home and collect $1,296 Social Security Disability. Then, the total loss to the Government is three times what it would gain in taxes if the disabled were to remain employed.

Under our present tax structure you are only losing tax revenue, the country is losing our talents, but we are losing our independence, dignity, and emotional stability.

Employment. Unemployment among the disabled is doube that of the able-bodies. The disabled earn less because of the following conditions:

(1) The kind of work they are limited to;

(2) The period aspect of that work;

(3) The need to work in sheltered workshops where minimum wage scales do not apply;

(4) They are—or are thought to be—bad risks;

(5) They are unable to enter the competitive labor market and are often exploited by do-gooders; and

(6) Discrimination still exists.

The Federal Government spends more than a billion dollars a year for vocational rehabilitation. It is said to recover, in direct taxes, $10 to every $1 it spends. Yet it ignores our need for income tax relief. We are being rehabilitated for jobs we cannot afford to keep. The disabled do not want charity or welfare doles; they want to be self-sustaining, self-sufficient citizens. But the disabled person seeking employment faces many problems—primarily financial. With the cost of living rising at a rate of 6 percent a year, our plight borders on desperation.

Education: Your next question might well be: Could the disabled get better jobs if he had higher education? Yes! But often he is neither financially nor physically able to attend a college of his choice. Only 14 or more than 2,500 colleges and universities in this country meet most of the minimum requirements for accommodating disabled students.

Housing: Another area which drains our pocketbooks is housing. We cannot live in old housing because of the number of steps. We must live in new apartment buildings or specially designed houses. We therefore have higher rental and housing costs. If a disabled person is lucky—yes, lucky—and earns less than an annual income of $3,400 then he is eligible for Federal Housing. But, in reality, he is only eligible for a waiting list because the senior citizens receive priority in these facilites.

Domestc Help: What of the severely disabled? Not all are fortunate to be able to live at home where family members can lend a helping hand. Very often only slight assistance is necessary, but it is crucial; for example, help in getting from bed to wheelchair in the morning and back at night. Yet, this type of help is not tax deductible for the disabled.

Recreation: The disabled, especially, needs recreation. But what enjoyment is possible on a low, heavily-taxed income? Those seats at concert halls reserved especially for the disabled are the most expensive. Also, the disabled must buy first floor theater seats because they cannot get to the less expensive balcony seats.

Other: Other nondeductible expenses incurred by the disabled are hand-controls for specially equipped cars for disabled drivers, custom-made clothing, and heavier tipping so often needed for a helping hand.

Without further documentation, we think you will agree that we have made a case for extending a tax subsidy of a $600 exemption to the orthopedically handicapped. The precedent for this subsidy was set 20 years ago on behalf of the blind.

It has been argued that the technical difficulty of defining and limiting the population who would be eligible for tax relief was so difficult that the problem was better off deferred and ignored. We feel we have come here with an adequate definition of the disabled individual which will be an answer to your dilemma.

Paraphrasing a foremost authority in rehabilitation, Dr. Howard A. Rusk, who quotes from a National Health Survey, we submit the following:

An orthopedic impairment is defined as a permanent disability of some portion of the skeletal system which has been lost, crippled, paralyzed, or deformed, severely affecting mobility. Lobbying obviously is a real hardship for us—both physically and financially—so you have not seen us often!

We are speaking here for those persons in wheelchairs, persons using braces, crutches, and prostheses; the palsied and the arthritic. We are not asking for a gift: we are simply asking for reasonable and equitable tax relief for orthopedically handicapped Americans; we want to become taxpayers not taxeaters.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. I will instruct the staff to take a good look at this problem and see if we can help.

Miss ANISH. May I ask permission to have Mrs. Walgren make a statement?

Mrs. WALGREN. I am too smart a woman to realize you do not keep hungry men from lunch. I would like to mention, however, that one of the primary considerations that we were told that you would be taking account of is the cost to the Federal Government, and we think that the cost is extremely minimal. We have figured out for Pennsylvania, for instance, that there might be 3,000 people falling under this category of being rehabilitated a year. If you figure the Federal returns would be 10 to 1 on the money that you are spending on rehabilitation in Pennsylvania, in Pennsylvania alone the Treasury Department would be getting $50 million in return. I would like to say this: That this is such a minor problem of yours that it certainly could easily be overlooked. I understand we are asking very little of Washington for this. But on the other hand the tax bill itself says on the first page that what you are aiming to do is provide a fair and equitable system so that you can continue the self-assessment aspect of taxation in America, and we feel that here we have a specific example of a small but very prominent unfair aspect to the system, and we hope you will take it into consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator WILLIAMS. There are amendments introduced to this bill pending which deal with this subject and I can assure you they will be considered.

Mrs. WALGREN. I certainly hope so.

(The committee subsequently received the following statements for the record, relative to the preceding testimony:)

Statement of Helena Carey, Chairman, Consultant, for the Handicapped

SUMMARY

Transportation*	Travel
Maintenance of orthopedic equipment	Purchase of orthopedic equipment
Maintenance of equipment for self-employment	High cost housing
General Services	Personal services for health
Recreation	Increase in tax deductions

Mr. Chairman, my remarks today concern an exceptional group of people. They are the handicapped of this Nation. A minority, it has always known exclusion.

Note the contents of Bill H.R. 13270—and we beg, we humble beg to be included in the liberalized tax reform bill.

Reason No. 1. Transportation deductions,* $1,000 ($3 times five days a week equals $750). (Please note that Saturday and Sunday are not included, that would be another $280).

Reason No. 2. Wheel-chair-crutches-braces, etc., $1,000.

Reason No. 3. Maintenance for wheel chairs, crutches, braces, etc., $1,000.

Reason No. 4. Minimum assistance—inclement weather, emergency situations, etc.

Total deductions in tax reform bill H.R. 13270, $4,000.

Statement of Katherine S. Fossett, Co-Legislative Chairman, Nation's Capital Chapter, National Association of the Physically Handicapped, Inc.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as a member of Nation's Capital Chapter, National Association of the Physically Handicapped Inc., I wish to affirm that my chapter will heartily support federal legislation making provision for an additional exemption of $600 at least for the disabled taxpayer and his wife, if she has a physical disability, and also federal legislation providing for income tax deduction up to $600 on transportation to and from work of physically handicapped persons, preferably the severely handicapped. The former exemption is now applicable to the blind and elderly. Hence, an amendment of the 1954 Internal Revenue code (section 151), and part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the same code, is recommended. These deductions would provide us with more money to meet the increased expenses incurred because of our handicapping condition.

There are many persons in our chapter with varying degrees of disability. I am of the opinion that the failure to provide additional exemption for the physically disabled results in inequity. In general we announce our full support of legislation which offers more liberal tax deductions for the many handicapped of our nation. Tax "breaks" are urgently needed for physically handicapped persons. Therefore, we urge favorable consideration for the enactment of such enabling legislation.

Since no specific provisions for additional exemptions or tax deductions have been made so far in the 1969 Tax Reform Bill H.R. 13270 for this group of taxpayers, we should like these considerations incorporated into the above bill.

May I add that I am of the opinion that we as handicapped citizens are entitled to more liberal tax deductions entirely on the basis of our disability.

Even after his rehabilitation, a severely physically handicapped person looking for employment discovers that his salary is not adequate to meet the costs of transportation, his living expenses, and his payroll deductions.

Because of the excessive transportation expenses, and the inability of the more severely physically disabled to use such public facilities as the bus, subway train ,etc., they must depend on taxicabs or other expensive means of private transportation.

It is true that severe disability creates extraordinary expenses that are not deductible, as are medical expenses. The cost of transportation to and from the place of employment or generally elsewhere, constitutes one of the major expenses. The transportation expenses in the Washington Metropolitan area are much higher for some severely handicapped persons than for the able-bodied. Transportation poses many problems for the more severely physically disabled in that they sometimes earn less and when expensive transportation problems are incurred, they often lose the incentive to look for employment.

*Please note that transportation and expense for personal reasons are not included.

The following are some of the so called extraordinary expenses incurred by the severely disabled by virtue of their disability, other than transportation costs, which should be included in H.R. 13270, as tax deductible items, when enacted.

1. Deductions for the purchase, upkeep or wear and tear and maintenance of orthopedic appliances, such as wheelchairs, crutches, walkers, specially built orthopedic shoes, braces, etc., and prosthetic devices, artificial arms and limbs, automobile hand controls, and correction surgery also the cane and seeing eye dog for the blind.
2. Wear and tear on special clothing because of rubbing against an orthopedic appliance such as a wheelchair.
3. Special parking facilities near our respective homes and businesses.
4. Certain aspects of housing. It is sometimes necessary to pay higher apartment rentals because it is necessary for some who are physically handicapped to rent apartments on the ground floor level or rent apartments close to the elevator. In general, housing costs are often higher since the physically disabled cannot live in the less expensive buildings without elevators because of the stair climbing problem. The latter is especially true of coronary cases. In the case of paraplegics, ramps and wider doorways must be built to facilitate entrance to and exit from apartments or housing units. We should also consider additional costs for special equipment in the kitchen and bathrooms.
5. Special office equipment to facilitate greater mobility.
6. Special services. Often some handicapped persons have to hire people to do simple tasks which the able-bodied can do without incurring extra expenses. For example, hiring someone to clean house and do job repairing etc., soliciting the services of a taxi driver in delivering a package etc., somewhere, and other services.
7. Higher insurance costs, especially for automobiles.

In conclusion, the need for the previously-mentioned deductions is very urgent, since more liberal deductions would keep more people off tax rolls, and hence, we are of the opinion that the above additional tax exemptions will help the physically handicapped and their families to have more economic independence.

Finally, the Nation's Capital Chapter NAPH Inc., sincerely hopes that H.R. 13270 will be enacted during this Ninety-First session of Congress, and contain some, if not all, of the exemptions and deductions requested.

Senator WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, before we adjourn I think there is one witness, Dr. John A. Perkins, president of the Wilmington Medical Center. I might say Dr. Perkins is also the former president of our State University in Delaware. I am pleased to welcome him before the committee.

STATEMENT OF JOHN A. PERKINS, PRESIDENT, WILMINGTON MEDICAL CENTER, WILMINGTON, DEL.

Mr. PERKINS. Thank you, Senator Williams.

Wilmington Medical Center, Wilmington, Del., is a nonprofit, charitable corporation which operates three short-term acute hospital facilities and one long-term rehabilitation hospital. These facilities provide approximately 80 percent of the total hospital service for New Castle County, Del., and approximately 60 percent of the total hospital services for the State of Delaware.

As can be seen from an article appearing on page 1 of the Wilmington Morning News of September 24, 1969 (exhibit "A" attached hereto) any public or private action which might inhibit or otherwise reduce contributions to the Wilmington Medical Center will directly affect the quality and quantity of hospital services which Wilmington Medical Center can render to the community it serves. Further, since the Wilmington Medical Center, within the next 10 years, must obtain and expend $80 million to $90 million in capital expenditures ($35 million of which is needed by 1972 for new construction) in order to continue to provide the present quantity and quality of hospital services for the community it serves (which presently is 500,000 and by 1980 should be 700,000), its trustees feel that it must express opposition to those provisions of H.R. 13270, tax reform bill of 1969, which might tend to prevent the Wilmington Medical Center from meeting the demands for hospital services thrust upon it by the community.

Section 101(a) of H.R. 13270 provides that the net investment income of a "Private Foundation" shall be subject annually to a tax of 7½ percent thereof.

In H.R. Report No. 91-413 (pt. 1), 91st Congress, first session, (1969), the general reason stated for proposing such tax is that the benefits of government are available to all and, thus, "the costs thereof should be borne at least to some extent by all of those able to pay." Then said report goes on to state that this is true for "Private Foundations."

Certainly, the Wilmington Medical Center would not argue that there have not been any abuses in the private foundation area which clearly need to be corrected by sanctions prohibiting such abuses in the future. However, Wilmington Medical Center does feel that a tax on investment income goes beyond what is a justified sanction for the abuses engaged in by a limited number of private foundations.

It is Wilmington Medical Center's understanding that, in part, the philosophy behind the adoption of a law permitting a deduction for Federal income tax purposes of contributions to "charitable organizations" (including in such favored treatment "private foundations") was to reduce the costs of government by providing an incentive for that portion of the general public with resources to do so to fund activities which would otherwise have to be undertaken by governmental bodies. It was assumed that if the government were to undertake these activities, the cost would be greater than the revenue dollars lost by granting such a deduction. To tax the investment income earned by private foundations does nothing more than take away in part the ability to reduce costs of government.

Wilmington Medical Center's primary concern with respect to the proposal to tax net investment income of private foundations is that such a tax is an indirect tax on certain portions of the income of eleemosynary institutions, such as hospitals, universities and other community service organizations now not subject to income tax under the provisions of section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended. Current and accumulated income of private foundations is ultimately distributed to tax-exempt organizations, most of which are exempt under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended (hereinafter referred to as code).

In its own case the Wilmington Medical Center is dependent heavily on contributions from private foundations. For example, in the 7 years ending with 1968, hospitals comprising part of the Wilmington Medical Center conducted two major building fund campaigns. One of these resulted in receipt of approximately 6.6 million, 26 percent of which ($1,700,000) came from private foundations located in the Wilmington metropolitan area. In the second campaign, $3.25 million was received, 16 percent of which ($508,000) came from private foundations located in the Wilmington metropolitan area.

In addition to soliciting for capital funds, the Wilmington Medical Center conducts annual fund-raising campaigns to provide continuing support to the operations of the center. In the past few years, the annual fund raising has raised approximately $1,350,000, 40 percent, or $540,000, of which has been donated by private foundations. As can be seen from exhibit A, projecting an operating deficit of $3.5 million before application of approximately the $1.7 million of endowment income for fiscal year 1970, the Wilmington Medical Center must, in the future, rely heavily upon donations from all sources to continue to provide for present operating needs.

Thus, Wilmington Medical Center's concern with the proposed tax on private foundation's investment income is obvious. If an income tax of 7½ percent is levied on the income of private foundations, it is equivalent to levying a tax of 7½ percent on the donations of private foundations to the Wilmington Medical Center. Frankly, in a period of time of rising operating and building costs, eleemosynary institutions, such as Wilmington Medical Center, cannot afford any reduction in sources of funds. In this regard, it should be noted that operating costs at Wilmington Medical Center have risen approximately 10 percent per year for the past 3 years (typical of similar hospitals throughout the country). Also, it should be noted that hospital construction costs are presently rising at the rate of 1 percent per month.

The significant support provided by private foundations is not a situation unique to the Wilmington Medical Center. Personnel at the center polled all the hospitals in the State of Delaware, as well as hospitals in Pennsylvania and Maryland adjacent to the Wilmington Medical Center service area. These hospitals echoed our experience with respect to raising funds and the support received from private foundations in their campaigns.

The response of these hospitals was as follows (all of which were approximations):

(1) Chester County Hospital, West Chester, Pa.—This hospital reported that it had had two building fund drives. One in 1960 dealing with a building, the cost of which was $400,000. Private foundations contributed 90 percent of the cost of $360,000. The second building fund drive was in 1965 to support a building program costing $1,200,000. Private foundations contributed $471,000, or 39 percent of the cost.

(2) Milford Memorial Hospital, Milford, Del.—This hospital reported that it is presently undertaking a building program of $3.5 million. At the time of the report, the only contributions which had been received were $275,000 from two private foundations. We understand that $1.7 million will be borrowed, $500,000 will be raised from a community fund-raising campaign and the balance hopefully financed from an accumulation of operating income derived by including prospective funding in patient's charges.

(3) Kent General Hospital, Dover, Del.—This hospital reported total contributions of $1.1 million in connection with its building program of which $211,000, or 19 percent was received from private foundations.

(4) Nanticoke Memorial Hospital, Seaford, Del.—This hospital reported total contributions from 1965 through 1969 of $482,000, all of which came from private foundations.

(5) Kent and Queen Anne Hospital, Chestertown, Md.—This hospital reported a building program of $1.4 million, $900,000 of which was contributed, including $100,000 from one private foundation.

(6) Beebe Hospital, Lewes, Del.—This hospital reported two foundation grants of $55,000 toward the total cost of $1,474,000. Hill-Burton funds were secured in the amount of $425,000. An additional $500,000 was borrowed with the balance coming from contributions.

In addition to providing current direct financial support to eleemosynary institutions, such as the Wilmington Medical Center, private foundations perform an additional task which under the laws of the State of Delaware, such institutions cannot perform for themselves. Delaware laws do not grant such institutions the right of eminennt domain to acquire land for either current or anticipated future needs.

Fortunately, the Wilmington Medical Center recently received from a local private foundation approximately 200 acres of land to use for building expansion necessary to keep the center's facilities current with the growing population. The land was purchased with great foresight at an earlier date by the foundation and held for the purpose of donating it to an eleemosynary institution as the need arose. An additional 390 acres adjacent to the tract is still held by the foundation in reserve for use by other eleemosynary and public institutions as the community needs develop for further expansion of such organizations. In effect, the acres still held by the private foundation are a land bank for community purposes. By its action, this foundation performed a unique and important contribution in a small territory such as Delaware. In our State which is growing rapidly open land in the metropolitan areas is becoming nonexistent.

It should be pointed out that up to the present, taxes in the State of Delaware and its political subdivisions have not been inordinately heavy. In a large part this is owing to the existence of local private foundations and generous individuals. The proposal to tax investment income of private foundations will reduce their ability to continue to support community programs (such as hospital services) in the amounts they had in the past. It is folly to reduce these sources of funds at a time when rising costs and increased indigent patient loads necessitate our turning to governmental sources for additional funds for both operational expenses and capital outlays.

Any provision which may tend to discourage contributions to eleemosynary institutions, such as the Wilmington Medical Center, should not be given favorable consideration by the Senate Finance Committee. The provision dealing with taxes on failure to distribute private foundation income falls in this category.

This provision requires the annual payout of all the net income of a private foundation but not less than 5 percent of its investment assets.

While this provision permits accumulation for specific projects with prior approval by the Internal Revenue Service, it appears to leave private foundations at the mercy of a subjective determination by an Internal Revenue agent rather than with individuals responsible for and knowledgeable of the intents and purposes for which the foundation was created.

Further, as can be seen from the illustrations already given in II above, at least in Delaware, private foundations acquiring acreage as a land bank has proven extremely beneficial to the entire community. To discourage such functions by either forcing untimely distributions or taxing retention of property does nothing more than force eleemosynary institutions, such as the Wilmington Medical Center, to look to the Federal and State Governments to provide the resources formerly provided by the private foundation sector.

Consistent with the position taken by the Wilmington Medical Center in opposition of legislation discouraging charitable contributions as set forth in II and III above, the Wilmington Medical Center opposes section 201(a) of H.R. 13270 to the extent that it does not permit deduction of contributions of appreciated property up to the increased limitation of 50 percent of adjusted gross income. If the intent of the provision is to increase the incentive to make charitable contributions, the nature of the asset to be given to charity should not inhibit the donors' incentive to give to charity. In our experience, a large percentage of the contributions received by the center have been in kind rather than in cash.

The provision of section 201(c) of the bill dealing with the donor of certain types of appreciated property to private foundations tends to do nothing more than inhibit charitable contributions and thus reduce the source of funds for such eleemosynary institutions as the Wilmington Medical Center.

For the reasons stated heretofore, Wilmington Medical Center also wishes to go on record opposing those other provisions of H.R. 13270 which would inhibit rather than encourage charitable contributions. The provisions to which reference is made are:

(1) Section 201(a). Disallowance of charitable deduction for gift of use of property.

(2) Section 201(f). Elimination of the set-aside deduction presently allowed estates and trusts.

(3) Section 201(g). Repeal of the 2-year charitable trust rule.

(4) Section 201 (e), (f), (h), and (i). Requiring that charitable remainder trusts be either an annuity trust or a unitrust.

(5) Section 201 (a) and (h). Requiring that charitable income trusts provide an annuity to charity or a fixed percentage of annual fair market value and requiring that the grantor is taxable on the income unless all the interests in the trust are given to charity.

(6) Sections 301 and 302 to the extent that such sections have the effect of reducing the benefit received by a donor from a charitable contribution of appreciated property and require the donor to allocate a portion of the charitable contribution to nontaxable income thus reducing the amount of the deduction.

In a period of time when operating and construction costs of eleemosynary institutions are escalating at a rapid pace, Federal and State Governments should adopt legislation which encourages rather than discourages charitable contributions to such institutions. Otherwise governmental bodies will need to provide the services themselves. We believe that this would be at a cost much greater than the revenue dollars lost by granting incentives to give to charity.

I would like to include in the record this article.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, sir.

(The article follows:)

ENDOWMENT TURNS INTO DEFICIT—CHARITY-CARE COST DRAINS MEDICAL CENTER

Charity care will bring an operating loss of more than $2.25 million to the Wilmington Medical Center for the fiscal year that will end Tuesday.

Dr. John A. Perkins, president, told the center's executive committee yesterday that the loss lends new urgency to the suggestion made by Ralph K. Gottshall, board chairman, that the center re-examine its policy of providing free care.

The direct result of the loss, Perkins said, is that the center is confronted with a deficit of $500,000 after endowment income of $1.7 million has been applied to reduce the loss.

"Our operating deficit is solely due to the fact that we are being asked to provide upwards of $3 million a year in free care to persons who cannot afford to pay for themselves," Perkins said.

Projections indicate that next year the operating deficit will be $3.5 million on a conservative estimate. Gottshall projected a figure $200,000 less than the $2.25 million total in a report to the center's trustees a week ago. He spoke before a final accounting had been made for the month of August; August showed a sharp rise in the operating deficit.

"It is not right that charity cost should more than eat up the Wilmington Medical Center's endowment income," Perkins said. "In most other respects, the government, federal, state or local, pays basic welfare costs. Private charity became a supplemental source of welfare support as long ago as the mid-30's. Yet nonprofit hospitals are asked to continue this ever heavier burden that has exceeded the ability of private resources to shoulder.

"The medical center's modest endowment income is badly needed for other purposes. As long as it must be diverted to cover the cost of nonpaying patients, the medical center will be unable to make all the advances in general patient care, education and research, and the renovation of existing structures and the building of new ones that are necessary to achieve the stated purposes of merger set forth in 1965."

At this point Perkins told the executive committee of the urgency given Gottshall's suggestion, made to the trustees a week ago. At that time Gottshall said:

"New Castle County has withdrawn its limited support to the charity programs of hospitals and the state has undertaken to assume the county's obligation to the extent of $510,000 per year. The fact that the money comes from a different source does not affect the fact of this inadequacy of income in relation to the problem as it exists in the medical center.

"The question has to be raised as to what other steps might be taken if state, county and city support in realistic amounts is not forthcoming.

"As matters stand, to a considerable extent, some of this problem of financing charity and education is passed on to the paying patient, but 65 per cent of our patients are covered by third-party contract agreements which limit or prohibit allocating to them the full amount of these charity costs.

"I am sure that none of us agrees with the concept that the paying patient should carry the community burden of the indigent patient, which in a sense is a form of hidden taxation, but the money must come from somewhere * * * How we resolve this problem will be a large measure affecting the role of the medical center and the program it has tentatively outlined for itself."

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, sir. We will have to recess now until 3 o'clock this afternoon. If someone else wishes to submit his statement and make perhaps a 1-minute statement at this time I will receive it for the record.

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. We will continue with our list of witnesses when we return this afternoon at 3 p.m. in this room.

Thank you, gentlemen.

(Whereupon, at 12 noon the committee recessed, to reconvene at 3 p.m. on the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator TALMADGE. The committee will please come to order.

Mr. Max Lupkin, executive secretary, Joint Handicapped Council, New York, N.Y.

Let me tell you, as you probably already know, Mr. Lupkin, that your full statement is already printed in the hearings of today, and if you would summarize it and make it as brief as possible.

STATEMENT OF MAX LUPKIN, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, JOINT HANDICAPPED COUNCIL, NEW YORK CITY

Mr. LUPKIN. I will give you oral testimony which will take less than 10 minutes.

Senator TALMADGE. The Senate is in session and you will understand if I have to dash away to vote.

Mr. LUPKIN. I understand.

Chairman Long and distinguished members of the Senate Finance Committee, my name is Max Lupkin, I am a volunteer, the executive secretary and public relations consultant for the Joint Handicapped Council, and I am here today to represent this organization at this hearing, a nationwide legislative, service, and educational organization, a federation of 40,000 members and organizations. Our headquarters are located at 720 West 181st Street, New York, N.Y. 10033. I live at 40 First Avenue, Suite 5A, New York, N.Y. 10009.

Here are the reasons why H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits) must be enacted into law now.

Precedent has already been established, on the need for an additional exemption (Internal Revenue Code of 1954; also see U.S. Senate Committee on Finance, hearings on the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, pp. 276–277, on the need for additional exemption for the handicapped).

In order to become productive taxpayers, and produce an income, the enactment of H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits) will enable hundreds of thousands of the rehabilitated employable severely handicapped to go to work, and pay taxes, instead of remaining on the welfare rolls to vegetate.

The enactment of H.R. 424 (Mills), and S. 1069 (Javits) will create a work incentive to these handicapped—many of whom are now on public assistance—by giving them more take-home pay because of lowered taxes, and helping them to overcome their high cost living, due to many special and extraordinary expenses not encountered by the nondisabled—the severely handicapped taxpayers expend as much as $50 weekly for transportation to and from work, as against the nondisabled handicapped taxpayer for transportation to and from work at $4 a week using buses and subways.

The severely handicapped taxpayer expends vast sums of money regularly, year in and year out for braces, prosthetic appliances, wheelchairs, wear and tear of the same and replacement of parts, plus the cost of a new pair of custombuilt-orthopedic shoes at the cost from $250 to $400 and plus for the repair of these shoes, in order to locomote to and from work.

Our motives are both humanitarian and economical. And in the case of Vietnam disabled veterans—amputees—who also desire the opportunity for employment, and become taxpayers, will be included in these bills.

Our present system of taxation of the handicapped is unfair, unjust, and inconsistent with our tax treatment of the blind and the aged. We are not asking for any special treatment for the handicapped and/or the disabled amputee veterans, only a fair chance for them to make their contribution to our society, without being penalized by unfair and unjust income tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code.

In 1964, the full U.S. Senate passed an amendment, introduced by Senator Sparkman of Alabama (S. 201), to H.R. 8363, encompassing all the features of H.R. 424, but did not become law due to certain technicalities, namely, cost of bill, have overcome in the bills H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits) of 1969: namely, the definition of "disabled" is clear, specific, and meets with the approval of the Treasury Department.

The handicapped taxpayer must have a 40-percent disability under the schedule for rating or disabilities of the Veterans' Administration, Federal Register, volume 29, No. 1, part 2.

Cost is only $40 million maximum. The rehabilitated employed and employable severely handicapped and the Vietnam amputee disabled veterans would be paying taxes to the Treasury Department, and become an asset to the Nation instead of a vegetable.

It was pointed out, by Senator Carlson, in the Senate-House committee discussions on Senator Sparkman's amendment, encompassing all the features of H.R. 424, that "in the committee there was no disposition to be opposed to the amendment in regard to the expenses of transportation of the disabled * * *" (Congressional Record, February 1964, p. 3402).

Further, Senator Long, now chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, stated on page 3402, pertaining to Senate amendment S. 201 (Sparkman): "* * * I am in sympathy with the amendment."

In order to live above the poverty level in today's high inflationary costs, the severely handicapped and the Vietnam amputee disabled veterans must earn an income of over $10,500 in the New York City area, only because of their many everyday living expenses, which are far and above those of the nondisabled.

I must repeat, "We are concerned with removing hundreds of thousands of severely handicapped and Vietnam amputee disabled veterans from public and private welfare rolls by getting them employment and granting them the dignity and self-respect that comes from gainful employment—which is the principal aim of H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits)."

I must repeat: "We are not asking for any special tax treatment for the severely handicapped and the Vietnam amputee disabled veterans, only a fair chance for them to make their contribution to society, without being economically penalized by unfair and unjust tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code."

I must repeat: "In 1954, a precedent was established for H.R. 424, granting the blind and those over 65 an additional exemption for income tax purposes."

Prominent nationwide organizations with a membership of over 60 million people endorsed H.R. 424 including 30 Governors, 13 members of the Ways and Means Committee, National Council of Churches of Christ (40 million), Methodist Church, U.S.A. (10 million members), the Tax Committee of the Chamber of Commerce, National Grange, National Farmers Union, et cetera.

Thank you.

Senator TALMADGE. You make out a very good case and I think the committee will be sympathetic with your position. It is my understanding that Chairman Long has already directed the staff to look into the matter and see if we can include it in the bill pending before the Senate.

Thank you, sir.

Mr. LUPKIN. The handicapped of the Nation would be most appreciative for everything that the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee have been trying to do.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you very much.

Mr. LUPKIN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

(Mr. Lupkin's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF MAX LUPKIN, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, JOINT HANDICAPPED COUNCIL

The Joint Handicapped Council strongly urges that H.R. 424 (MILLS) and S. 1069 (JAVITS) be enacted into law at this session of Congress. In 1964, a companion bill passed in the U.S. Senate but failed to pass in the Joint Committee of both Houses. This legislation is long overdue.

As a group those employed and employable(s) handicapped with severe orthopedic disabilities are in a sub-marginal income bracket requiring federal assistance.

This group is one in which dire poverty is an everyday feature, and total despair and hopelessness their bleak future.

In the past twelve (12) years over four hundred and eighty (480) bills seeking tax equity for the severely orthopedically employed and employable(s) handicapped taxpayers have been introduced in Congress.

H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits), introduced these bills in Congress because for the pressing need for this legislation. It will provide a $600 tax exemption for income tax purposes in the case of a severely orthopedically handicapped taxpayer suffering from a 40% or more loss or loss of use of one or more extremities under the "Schedule For Rating Disabilities of the Veterans' Administration" (Federal Register, Volume 29, #101, Part II). Deductions of up to $600 for special transportation expenses in going to and from work are also included in this bill. H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits) will grant tax assistance to those physically handicapped individuals most in need of it.

It can root out some of the inequities for the disabled currently existing in our Internal Revenue Code.

The problems of the disabled can be better visualized if we examine some known facts. According to the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, 173,594 disabled persons were rehabilitated during the year of 1967. 47% of those rehabilitated in 1965 had one or more dependents while 34% needed surgery and treatment.

Each year there is a backlog of 70% of referrals for vocational rehabilitation in 1967, and these 173,594 individuals mentioned above were accepted, while 396,313 were not rehabilitated, under our rehabilitation laws.

Some of the expenses the handicapped are subjected to are as follows:

The average nation-wide cost of prosthetic devices in 1963 was $172 per rehabilitant, according to the U.S. Vocational Rehabilitation Administration. In 1964, The Joint Handicapped Council, 720 West 181st Street New York, New York, claimed that the average person does not obtain prosthetic devices at such modest prices. In the New York City area at that time the going rate was $500 for the cost of a full artificial leg, $450 for an artificial leg below the knee, etc. Other typical costs for the rehabilitant include bilateral brace $350 (for brace extended to trunk add $50) ; brace above the knee $250–$350; brace below the knee $100; standard wheelchair $200; special custom-made-orthopedic shoes averaged $120–$175 for the first pair and $85–$100 for the second pair.

Out of their meager earnings, the orthopedically handicapped, by reason of their disabilities, are forced to expend large sums of money they can ill afford to maintain their rehabilitated status.

According to The Joint Handicapped Council, the most frequently recurring expenses the handicapped are subjected to are:

1. Those expenses made for the purchase, repair and replacement of orthopedic and prosthetic devices which are entirely deductible under the medical deduction provision of the income tax law. Special-custom-built-orthopedic shoes fall in this category.

2. Unusual wear and tear of clothing caused by constant friction of orthopedic and prosthetic devices, crutches and by falling.

3. Additional expenses often include higher cost of apartment rentals due to need for ground floor quarters or elevator apartment accommodations.

4. Many disabled persons find it necessary to take taxicabs daily going to and from work. In the New York City area, the average cost for this type of transportation is about $50 weekly.

5. In approximately 10% of the cases, the disabled, as defined in H.R. 424 (Mills), and S. 1069 (Javits) find it necessary to purchase automobiles to give them mobility in going to and from work, etc. These automobiles, of necessity, must be kept in top condition (entailing more expenses) to avoid mechanical failure. Hand controls have to be installed in a majority of instances.

A business man is permitted to deduct the cost of his motor vehicle as well as vehicular expenses for the production of income, while his physically handicapped employee who needs his car for production of income cannot, despite the fact that he might be in a wheelchair, wear heavy braces, use crutches, be an amputee, for some other extenuating reason.

6. Paraplegics often find it necessary to purchase homes which are specially equipped with fixtures installed at lower levels. Ramps and wider doorways must be built to allow for ingress and egress to and from their homes.

7. The physically handicapped are frequently compelled to hire someone to do the household cleaning and repairing.

8. Due to discrimination in hiring practices the disabled are frequently forced to accept lower wages and salaries. This is a hidden expense not apparent to the eye.

9. Those handicapped individuals who can afford life insurance to protect their loved ones are considered sub-standard risks and as such are required to pay higher life insurance premiums.

The handicapped are also frequently rejected for health and accident insurance, and as a result have to pay higher medical and hospital expenses than the average taxpayer. These insurance policies do not as a rule cover chronic conditions existing prior to the issuance of such policies, and as a result, corrective operations for physical improvements are not covered.

When one considers the aforementioned problems confronting the physically handicapped and then ties them in with the current high cost of living, one is amazed at the obstacles which they must surmount. Despite heavier expenses, the handicapped are forced to pay the same tax, with the same deductions as the able bodied.

Often, after rehabilitation, the handicapped, confronted by a combination of low wages, high cost of living, high cost of going to and from work, soon become disillusioned with the high cost of maintaining their rehabilitated status. Many are thus driven into staying at home, since their low income, less the above mentioned expenses, gives them lower net income than if they stayed at home as a welfare recipient.

According to the United States Statistical Abstract, issued in September 1968, job placements through public employment offices of handicapped workers during 1967, amounted to 1.9% of the total number of placements made in the United States in the last 20 years. However, 1.9% is apparently too high a figure when one considers that the handicapped are rarely placed through private employment agencies, and since, percentage wise, public employment offices place a much higher percentage of handicapped workers.

By taking 1.9% of the 77,847 total civilian labor force for the year of 1967 we get a theoretical total of physically handicapped working population of 1,469,593 including every type of disability. However, in 1967, out of 173,594 rehabilitants, approximately 37% included muscular, skeletal, and amputees. If we multiply 1,469,593 by .37 we get 543,375, of the 543,375 approximately 14.4% of the 37% includes severe cases, and approximately 22.6% of the 37% includes less severe cases, so that a further breakdown reveals that of the 543,375 muscular, skeletal and amputee cases, 211,392 represent severe cases and 331,768 represent less severe cases. Allowing for a possible 100,000 borderline cases between severe and less severe to possibly qualify under H.R. 424 and S. 1069, we can assume that approximately 311,392 handicapped individuals would qualify under this legislation.

Even if all 311,392 disabled taxpayers claimed the $600 exemptions with a savings of $120 each, the total savings in income taxes, for the disabled taxpayers would be $37,366,040. If as many as 15% of the 311,392 disabled taxpayers took advantage of the transportation deductions allowable under H.R. 424, it would save them a total of $5,604,960. The grand total for both types of income tax savings would be a maximum of $42,971,000. The $42,971,000 total will be further reduced by tax reforms affecting the low income bracket.

This bill is intended to include severely disabled employable veterans of present and past wars as well as those employed and employables who have been severely handicapped by disease, amputation and other causes.

In 1963, it cost the government an average of from $479 to $544 to rehabilitate an orthopedically handicapped person. For the balance of his or her life, the rehabilitated individual will have to purchase, place and repair all sorts of prosthetic devices specially custom-built-orthopedic shoes, specially built braces, crutches, wheelchairs, hand controlled automobiles, to say nothing of additional corrective surgery. Granting tax aid under H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits) would lighten somewhat the heavy burden borne by the employed handicapped taxpayer.

Some years ago, the U.S. Tax Court denied handicapped taxpayers deductions for transportation expenses to and from work, holding that these are merely commuter expenses. The orthopedically handicapped person who must use his car for going to and from work, is using it for the production of income. He cannot produce income without using his car for mobility. H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits) would aid him by allowing deductions of up to $600 where they are presently disallowed.

And, to sum up, enactment of H.R. 424 (Mills) and S. 1069 (Javits) in this legislative session, is both necessary and crucial for the severely handicapped.

TAXING THE HANDICAPPED—PRESENT SYSTEM IS CALLED UNFAIR TO THE DISABLED WHO ARE EMPLOYED

(By Howard A. Rusk, M.D.)

Tomorrow's deadline for Federal, State and local income tax payments for 1966 again highlights the inequities of our present tax system, which discriminates against the severely handicapped.

Currently our nation spends more than $1-billion a year for rehabilitation services for our handicapped fellow citizens.

Our motives are both humanitarian and economic.

We are concerned with removing these people from public and private welfare rolls and giving them the dignity and self-respect that comes from gainful employment.

These efforts have become increasingly effective. In the last fiscal year the state-Federal vocational rehabilitation program rehabilitated a record total of 154,000 disabled men and women into employment. The goal for this fiscal year is 190,000.

About three-quarters of those rehabilitated were unemployed when accepted for service and most were dependent upon welfare or the largesse of their families and friends.

10-TO-1 PROFIT RATIO

Based on previous experience, it is estimated that for every Federal dollar invested on their rehabilitation the Federal Government will receive from direct taxes approximately $10.

Certainly this is an economically enlightened as well as humanitarian concept.

But our tax treatment of these disabled workers is far from enlightened. They are not permitted to deduct the extraordinary expenses they have as a result of disability.

There is no doubt that severe disability creates extraordinary expenses over and above those that are now deductible as medical expenses.

Major among these is the cost of transportation to and from employment. Since they cannot use public transportation, many disabled persons must rely on taxicabs or chartered car services.

It is not unusual to find a severely handicapped worker paying out half of his weekly salary for transportation.

Those who own cars with such special equipment as hand controls are not even permitted to deduct the cost of such equipment.

To permit deduction of extraordinary transportation expenses by the handicapped would be consistent with basic tax principles. These permit other categories of wage earners or the self-employed to deduct certain expenses they incur as essential to their income-producing activities.

Clothing of the disabled is subjected to unusual wear and stress. Many disabled persons require custom-made clothing or special alterations on ready-to-wear clothing.

Housing costs are frequently higher as disabled persons cannot live in the less expensive, nonelevator buildings. They often live in ground floor apartments at higher rents. There may also be added costs for ramps or special household equipment, particularly in the kitchen and bathroom.

Amusement costs are frequently higher as the disabled person must use the more expensive orchestra seats in theaters and concert halls and usually must have an escort or attendant.

Many medical, labor, health, welfare, veteran and other groups have supported legislation to create the parity and equality which the disabled seek on taxes.

In the last 12 years there have been 480 bills seeking such equity introduced in the Congress.

In introducing such legislation in the Senate last month, Senator Jacob K. Javits estimated that some 300,000 disabled persons would qualify under the legislation at a maximum cost to the Government of $40-million.

Under the New York Republican's proposal the disabled taxpayer, in order to qualify for an additional $600 exemption, must suffer from the loss of one or more extremities or 50 per cent or more loss of ability as defined by the Veterans Administration.

In addition, both the blind and disabled would qualify for an additional tax deduction of up to $600 for expenses of going to and from work.

In 1964, Senator John Sparkman, Democrat of Alabama introduced such an amendment to a general tax revision amendment. It was passed by the Senate but died in the Senate-House conference

Among one of a number of groups actively lobbying for such legislation is the Joint Handicapped Council, 720 West 181 Street, New York, N.Y. 10033.

MILLS CALLED SYMPATHETIC

The council reports a delegation of its members met last year with Representative Wilbur D. Mills, Democrat of Arkansas, and he seemed sympathetic to their views. Mr. Mills is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Later this month—at the annual meeting of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, April 27–28—the group will return to Washington to attempt to stimulate support for the legislation.

When a severely disabled person completes his rehabilitation, he enters the job market with high expectations.

Frequently, he finds his hopes dashed in that his salary is not sufficient to meet his costs of transportation, his payroll deductions and his living expenses.

He has no other alternative but to go back on public assistance

The result is that the several thousands of dollars and frequently innumerable hours of professional and volunteer services have been wasted.

Even more important is that added to his physical problems are the frustrations and disappointments of being able and wanting to work and be self-sufficient, but being denied that opportunity because of discriminatory taxation.

(The statement referred to follows:)

MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., October 6, 1969.

Hon. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Finance,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Manufacturing Chemists Association wishes to present its views regarding the provisions of S. 2631, a bill "Relating to the income tax treatment of treble damage payments under the antitrust laws and certain other payments." This bill would disallow as a deduction two-thirds of any amount paid or incurred on any judgment entered against a taxpayer or in settelment of any action brought against him under Section 4 of the Clayton Act.

The Manufacturing Chemists Association is a nonprofit trade association of 174 United States company members representing more than 90 percent of the production capacity of basic industrial chemicals in this country.

Under existing law, the Internal Revenue Service has ruled that amounts paid or incurred in satisfaction of treble damage claims are fully deductible as trade or business expenses under Section 162 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (Revenue Ruling 64-224, 1964-2 C.B. 52). The Service cited four Supreme Court cases in support of its view that actions brought under Section 4 of the Clayton Act are remedial in nature since the purpose of the statute is to provide the victim with a means of recovering damages inflicted, and not to punish the wrongdoer.* The ruling recognized circumstances where the allowance of a deduction for payments of penalties would frustrate sharply defined public policy. However, this question was not at issue inasmuch as the treble damage payments were held to be remedial and not to be penalties.

The Supreme Court in Commissioner v. Tellier, (383 U.S. 687 (1966)), clarified the violation of the public policy test as grounds for disallowance by holding that "policies frustrated must be national or state policies evidenced by some governmental declaration of them." It seems clear that the reasoning of the Tellier Case supports the rationale of Revenue Ruling 64-224 in recognizing the deductibility of antitrust treble damage payments.

In 1965 a staff study of "Income Tax Treatment of Treble Damage Payments Under the Antitrust Laws" was prepared for the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. This study concluded that the Supreme Court probably would not hold that any part of treble damage payments are nondeductible penalties and while recognizing uncertainties surrounding the public policy doctrine (this study antedated the Tellier decision), it found nothing improper in Revenue Ruling 64-224 under the public policy doctrine. From this study and other evidence there is no indication under existing law that treble damage payments were ever disallowed as deductions by the Internal Revenue Service.

We endorse the position of the American Bar Association disapproving any proposed legislation which would make nondeductible for Federal income tax purposes any part of payments made in satisfaction of treble damage judgments or claims. The Joint Report of the American Bar Association Section of Antitrust Law and Section of Taxation submitted in January, 1969, warrants serious consideration in connection with any proposed legislative action on this matter.

It is the opinion of this Association that the concepts and philosophies developed over the years as set forth above should be adhered to and that the presently established Federal Income Tax treatment of treble damage payments should not be changed. The following points are presented in support of this position:

I. FEDERAL INCOME TAX IS A TAX ON NET INCOME, NOT A SANCTION AGAINST WRONGDOING

By limiting the deductibility of treble damage payments S. 2631 is objectionable as a matter of basic tax policy. It is generally agreed that tax policy should not encourage the use of tax provisions to achieve social goals. Any exception to this policy should be rare, should be clearly vital to the best interest of the United States and should be explored thoroughly with full consideration of the proposal through public hearings at which the views of the Executive Branch and of affected taxpayers are presented.

Huntington* v. Still, (146 U.S. 657, 677 (1892)). Chattanooga Foundry & Pipeworks v. City of Atlanta (203 U.S. 390 (1906)). United States v. Cooper Corporation (312 U.S. 600 (1941)). Overnight Motor Transportation Co. v. Missel (316 U.S. 572 (1942)).

The Supreme Court adverted to tax policy principles in the Tellier case with the following language:

> "We start with the proposition that the Federal income tax is a tax on net income, not a sanction against wrongdoing. That principle has been firmly imbedded in the tax statute from the beginning . . . During the Senate debate in 1913 on the bill that became the first modern income tax law, amendments were rejected that would have limited deductions for losses to those incurred in a 'legitimate' or 'lawful' trade or business. Senator Williams, who was in charge of the bill, stated on the floor of the Senate that
> > 'The object of this bill is to tax a man's net income; that is to say, what he has at the end of the year after deducting from his receipts his expenditures or losses. It is not to reform men's moral characters; that is not the object of the bill at all' . . ."

If it is considered that the amount of damage payments for antitrust violations should be increased, then the appropriate procedure is to amend the antitrust laws and not the income tax laws. If quadruple or quintuple damages are sought instead of treble damages, this should not be accomplished by indirection through tax legislation such as S. 2631.

Consistent with this concept, other payments related to infractions of the law have been held to be deductible.* As a matter of equity and uniformity, it does not seem proper to single out treble damage payments for more onerous treatment and thereby penalize business taxpayers more severely where antitrust laws are involved than other taxpayers making somewhat similar payments where there have been more clearly defined infractions of the law. Moreover, interpretations of the antitrust laws are still being developed by administrative action and court decisions and considerable uncertainty in application continues to exist.

II. INEQUITABLE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES

Provisions for recovery of treble damages were included in the Sherman Act when first enacted in 1890, many years before the enactment of the federal income tax laws as presently known. Thus, in concept, the treble damage payment consists of compensatory damages and an additional 200 percent thereof as further damages. In the original concept, the payor had a net cash cost and an economic loss equal to 200 percent of the net benefits originally derived from transactions considered to be violations. For example, before income taxes were a factor, if the defendant profited to the extent of $100.00, a treble damage payment would have required repayment of $100.00 plus an additional $200.00, and his net economic loss would have been 200 percent of the original benefit.

After income taxes became a significant factor (with the corporation tax presently at approximately 50 percent) an antitrust violation such as over-pricing in the amount of $100.00 would give the taxpayer a net after tax benefit of $50.00. Compensatory damages are recognized as deductible and payment of $100.00 would, after taxes, exactly offset the original net benefit of $50.00. Additional damages of $200.00 would, under current law, also be deductible so that the economic detriment to the taxpayer is $100.00 net, or again, 200 percent of the original improper benefit, just as occurred in years before income taxes were so significant.

The present legislative proposal (S. 2631) would allow a deduction for the compensatory payment but the additional two-thirds would be nondeductible. Applying this concept to the preceding illustration, the taxpayer who improperly benefited to the extent of $100.00, or $50.00 net after taxes, would repay the same amount plus $200.00 which would be nondeductible. Thus the full impact on the payor would be 400 percent of the original benefit ($200.00/$50.00). An analysis of the cash loss or economic detriment to the payor shows that he would be out $250.00 in the year of payment more than offsetting his original benefit in an earlier year of $50.00 for which damages are sought. This is clearly a quintuple damage payment and not a treble damage payment. Surely, this burdensome substantive change in the treatment of antitrust treble damage payments should be examined for its antitrust policy implications and not be adopted hastily and by indirection as an amendment to the income tax laws.

*Kickback payments by opticians to doctors, Lilly v. Commissioner, 343 U.S. 90 (1952); treble damage payments for price ceiling violations, Jerry Rossman Corporation v. Commissioner, 75 F. 2d 711 (1949); rent and wages paid by operators of a gambling enterprise, Commissioner v. Sullivan, 356 U.S. 27 (1958); fees and expenses paid in unsuccessful defense against an administration fraud order, Commissioner v. Heininger, 320 U.S. 467 (1943).

Additionally, little has been said about the private party receiving the damage payments. S. 2631 would continue to tax the entire treble damage payment — completely inconsistent with the proposed tax treatment of the payor. Other legislative proposals disallowing deductions for two-thirds of treble damage payments (S. 2156 and H.R. 2170 introduced in this Congress) would tax one-third of the damage payment to the recipient but would propose to exempt the other two-thirds payment in the hands of the recipient. Thus, the recipient's net receipt is five times the net damage he suffered and he would benefit by 400 percent. While this has the virtue of consistency in treatment with the proposal, with respect to the payor of treble damages, no justification has been made or is conceivable which would support this new treatment providing the damaged party with a windfall equal to five times the damages originally sustained.

III. POSSIBLE ADVERSE EFFECT FROM STANDPOINT OF ANTITRUST POLICY

In submitting views of the Department of Justice to the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation (staff study, page 60), Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, Acting Attorney General, expressed concern that the income tax laws not impose an obstacle to the speedy redress of damages suffered by victims of antitrust violations. Thus, from the antitrust policy standpoint the Antitrust Division seemingly favored tax deductibility for treble damage payments in the case of settlements to encourage prompt and full redress of wrongs and minimize court congestion and legal fees which might otherwise ensue.

Recognizing the economic effect summarized in the previous section, Mr. Katzenbach stated (staff study, page 62) that under present circumstances "in view of the potential disruption and expense of complex legal proceedings, it is unlikely that the allowance of deductions will make potential antitrust violators feel that a treble damage suit is a business risk to be assumed lightly."

The staff study made a further point on this matter (page 10), as follows:

> "From the standpoint of antitrust policy, it is not clear, however, that in all cases it is desirable to deny the deduction of treble damage payments. Representations were made to the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation both by some members of the electrical industry and also by representatives of some utilities that the failure to allow a deduction for the treble damage payments in the case of some of the companies might either drive them out of business entirely or substantially weaken them as a competitive factor in the industry."

We believe that the risk of paying treble damages for a violation when added to the potential fine and possible imprisonment which may be imposed in criminal proceeding for antitrust violations, acts as a significant and sufficient deterrent to violation of these laws, notwithstanding the fact that the right to a tax deduction does mitigate somewhat the burden of paying the treble damages. If, however, he Congress believes that the deterrent should be increased, the simple and direct method to deal with the matter would be for Congress to increase the fines imposed for violation of the Sherman Act, as it did in 1955 when the fine for each violation was increased from $4,000 to $50,000.

IV. RETROACTIVITY OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

The amendments proposed by S. 2631 would be applicable with respect to amounts paid or incurred after December 31, 1967. Other bills (S. 2156 and H.R. 2170) would be applicable with respect to amounts "paid or incurred, or received" after the date of enactment of such act.

Since the effect of legislation which would make any part of treble damage payments nondeductible is to exact a penalty from violators, and to intend the penalty as punishment and as a deterrent to antitrust violations, it is retroactive if applied to any violations occurring prior to enactment. Such legislation is not consistent with its avowed purpose as a deterrent, and is patently unfair. Furthermore, during July, 1966, Assistant Attorney General Turner suggested that there may be constitutional problems by retroactively increasing sanctions (hearings before the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary).

The Joint Committee Staff Study (page 13) proposes that any bill to disallow treble damage payments not be made retroactive and apply only with respect to antitrust violations occurring after the date of enactment.

The Manufacturing Chemists Association believes that the public interest is properly and adequately served by the tax rules presently applicable to treble damage payments and urges that no change in these rules be made by Congress. If hearings are held and it is determined that as a matter of antitrust policy additional penalties are required, any legislation to this effect would have no deterrent effect on prior violations and should be effective prospectively only. Therefore, any legislation which would make treble damage payments nondeductible should apply only to treble damage payments made with respect to antitrust violations which occur after the date of enactment of the legislation.

Sincerely,

G. H. DECKER.

Senator TALMADGE. Please proceed.

STATEMENT OF H. FRANCES DeLONE, CHAIRMAN, CLAYTON ACT COMMITTEE, SECTION OF ANTITRUST LAW, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, PHILADELPHIA, PA.; ACCOMPANIED BY SCOTT P. CRAMPTON, CHAIRMAN, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, SECTION OF TAXATION, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. DELONE. Thank you.

I am chairman of the Clayton Act Committee, antitrust section of the American Bar Association. With me is Mr. Scott Crampton who testified this morning and who is chairman of the tax section.

We appreciate this opportunity to testify. We are here pursuant to resolution of the house of delegates of the American Bar Association to voice its opposition to two proposed bills, S. 2631 and S. 2156, which have been referred to this committee, and to any similar bill which may be considered by this committee, whether in connection with the tax reform bill or otherwise.

The two proposed bills would overturn the current income tax deductible status of payments made in settlement or satisfaction of private treble-damage antitrust claims or judgments. In general such payments are currently deductible to the payor, and taxable to the recipient.

In 1964 the Internal Revenue Service gave full consideration to the status of such payments, and ruled that they are deductible. In 1966 the house of delegates of the ABA considered the subject and, on the recommendation of the antitrust and taxation sections, indicated its support of the Internal Revenue Service position by expressing its disapproval of legislation designed to overturn the revenue ruling.

In 1968 the ABA again studied the subject through its antitrust and taxation sections and, on their recommendation, adopted the resolutions which are set forth on the first page of the statement which I have filed with the committee.

In essence, the resolution opposes legislation designed to deny deductibility to treble-damaged payments.

The statement which I have filed and which I understand is made part of the record is, with minor technical revisions, the joint report of the antitrust and the taxation sections of the ABA to the ABA House of Delegates.

Both the bills which have been referred to this committee would make two-thirds of treble-damage payments nondeductible to the payor. Senate 2631 would apply only with respect to payments related to violations as to which the taxpayer had been convicted or pleaded nolo contendere.

Senate 2156 would apply to all treble-damage payments, and would also make two-thirds of the payment nontaxable to the recipient.

In considering the proposed legislation, it is important to keep in mind the nature of the antitrust remedy. It is a remedy provided to persons injured by violations who are entitled, in a private suit, to receive three times the damage they have suffered. This private recovery must be distinguished from fines in criminal antitrust proceedings or from recovery by the Government under section 4(a) of the Clayton Act, both which are currently nondeductible.

The antitrust laws are necessarily quite general and imprecise, so that their interpretation has changed and developed over the years. Changing concepts and changing economic analysis have often made it difficult to predict with any reasonable certainty what conduct will ultimately be held to be violative of the antitrust laws. Nor are treble-damage claims under these laws by any means limited to claims in connection with alleged price-fixing violations.

The point is illustrated by the recent Supreme Court case of Simpson v. Union Oil. There the Supreme Court recently invalidated consignment contracts which established resale prices, even though such contracts had been held valid 32 years earlier and many business enterprises had utilized them in reliance on the earlier Court ruling.

Simpson's treble-damage claim is still being litigated today and, under one of the proposed bills, if she should recover a judgment, then the payment that would be made would not be tax deductible to the payor, even though it had relied on a 32-year-old precedent, established by earlier Supreme Court cases.

I think perhaps the problem of this legislation, as the ABA sees it, can be illustrated by an actual case, or at least drawn from facts in an actual case with which I am familiar. There was an investigation by a Federal grand jury for 3 years, two successive grand juries in fact, into uniform pricing of fungible products sold by a number of major companies.

After 3 years of investigation the staff of the Antitrust Division, which was conducting the investigation, recommended that indictments be handed down. The Antitrust Division ended up recommending and filing only a civil suit. Some of the defendants in that case, rather than contest the charges, elected to agree to a consent decree which in effect said they would not in the future do what the civil suit charged.

If the Government had elected, instead, to proceed by the criminal proceedings route, those same defendants, rather than litigate, might well have sought leave to file nolo contendere pleas.

After the consent decrees were entered there was a flood of treble-damage private litigation. Many of those cases have since been settled, not on a basis that is related to the merit of the claim, but on what is truly a nuisance value settlement.

Now, under the proposed legislation, the defendants in those cases would not have been in a position to plead nolo contendere because some of the legislation, at least bill S. 2631, makes the tax consequences depend on whether there has been a criminal case and whether there has been a nolo contendere plea. Moreover, they would not have been able to make nuisance-value settlements without adverse tax results.

Senator TALMADGE. Let me see if I understand you correctly. If it is a criminal case and a criminal fine, the payment of the fine would not be a deductible expense?

Mr. DELONE. That is correct. That is the law as it is today.

Senator TALMADGE. But if it is a plaintiff and a defendant under the civil remedies and the defendant loses his case and pays the damages, then it is deductible?

Mr. DELONE. It is deductible today, that is correct.

Senator TALMADGE. And you support the continuation of that policy?

Mr. DELONE. We do support it.

Senator TALMADGE. In other words, if he has committed a crime and paid a penalty for a crime it would not be deductible?

Mr. DELONE. The penalty for the crime is not deductible, that is correct, but the private recovery, the treble-damage recovery to recompense the person allegedly injured by the violation of a law, that we contend should be deductible to the person that has paid it and taxable to the one who receives it.

Senator TALMADGE. Because it penalizes the taxpayer twice, once on his fine and again on the recovery procedure?

Mr. DELONE. Well, it would penalize him twice. The theory basically is that once the taxpayer has parted with whatever profit he derived from the alleged conspiracy by way of a settlement or by way of paying a judgment, either one, the profit has been put into the hands of the person who would otherwise have made it, and it is taxed to him, as matters stand today. That seems to us right.

Senator TALMADGE. I think I understand your point.

Mr. DELONE. And there are many other instances in the law which are comparable. where deduction is allowed: kickback payments, treble-damages for price ceiling violations, multiple damages for Fair Labor Standards Act violations, payments in connection with fraud cases and security laws violations, even expenses of illegal gambling establishments. Deductions are allowed for all those items, and we do not understand why the treble-damage area should be singled out as a peculiar exception to the general concept of the tax laws which is to tax net income.

These payments we are talking about are clearly business-connected payments, and if we are going to have a tax on net income, it does not seem to the ABA to make sense to say that treble-damage payments shall not be deductible.

I think I should comment on one feature of both bills that are before this committee, and that is the retroactive feature. Both bills contemplate that if payments are made—in the case of 2631, payments made any time after December 31, 1967, in the case of 2156—payments made after December 31, 1968—they contemplate that those payments will be nondeductible, even though the payments may be made because of violations which occurred years before, so that if you look on this proposed legislation as a deterrent, if you will, you cannot justify making it have really a retroactive effect insofar as the past violations are concerned.

Our view basically is that if there are deficiencies in the antitrust laws, if the penalties are not severe enough today, then the remedy is to modify the antitrust laws themselves, and not try to approach the problem through tax legislation.

I should mention that just last week Mr. McLaren, the current head of the Antitrust Division, testified in support of raising the fines in antitrust cases tenfold, the maximum fine from $50,000 to $500,000. I am not authorized to take any position specifically on such legislation, but we do think the approach is sound: If there is something wrong with the antitrust laws then it ought to be remedied by dealing with the fines under the antitrust laws rather than through the back door so to speak through manipulation of tax legislation.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you for a very fine statement, Mr. DeLone.

(Mr. DeLone's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF H. FRANCIS DELONE, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

SUMMARY

The American Bar Association opposes legislation to make non-deductible payments in satisfaction of private antitrust treble-damage claims or actions because:

1. Such claims or actions are remedial, not punitive. Payments to satisfy them are "ordinary and necessary expenses" deduction for which should be allowed since such deduction does not "frustrate sharply defined national" policy.
2. The tax laws should not be manipulated to achieve, indirectly, antitrust goals which can and should be achieved directly through the antitrust laws and amendments to them.
3. Similar payments are deductible.
4. The antitrust laws are necessarily imprecise; their interpretation depends on complex and difficult economic analysis, allowing a wide range of culpability, so that inequities will result from any blanket rule of non-deductibility of such payments.
5. The proposed legislation creates possibilities of double taxation and, perhaps, windfall tax treatment, and would contribute to further court congestion.
6. The proposed legislation raises problems of retroactivity and ex post facto application which cannot be justified on the basis of any claimed deterrent effect.

STATEMENT

In January of 1969, the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, that the ABA disapproves any proposed legislation having the purpose to make non-deductible for federal income tax purposes all or any portion of payments made in satisfaction of anti-trust treble-damage judgments or claims; and further

Resolved, that the Section of Antitrust Law and the Section of Taxation are authorized to urge the views of the American Bar Association in this regard upon the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation and other appropriate committees of Congress.

These resolutions were adopted on the basis of a report submitted to the House of Delegates by the Sections of Antitrust Law and of Taxation of the American Bar Association. The balance of this statement consists of that report, with certain technical revisions made necessary by events which have occurred since the report was originally prepared.

REPORT

The starting point for a discussion of this matter is Revenue Ruling 64-224, issued July 24, 1964.[1] That ruling allows income tax deductions for amounts paid or incurred to satisfy claims for damages as well as for amounts paid or incurred for legal fees and directly related expenses in connection with private treble-damage suits under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. Additionally, the Ruling disallows deductions for amounts paid or incurred in satisfaction of damage claims by the United States under Clayton Act Section 4A. This had continued to be the announced position of the Revenue Service, consistent with Tank Truck Rentals, Inc. v. Commissioner, 356 U.S. 30 (1958).[3] Also, the Ruling disallowed deductions for legal expenses incurred in unsuccessfully defending actions under Section 4A—a position implicitly overruled by Commissioner v. Tellier, 383 U.S. 687 (1966), and subsequently modified by Revenue Ruling 66-330, 1966-2 C.B. 44.

Revenue Ruling 64-224 was issued as a result of the so-called Philadelphia Electrical Cases,[3] which resulted in hundreds of millions of dollars in treble-damage recoveries by private plaintiffs. Prior to this time, the Internal Revenue Service had evidently never denied a taxpayer a tax deduction for such treble-damage payments;[4] and the closest published precedent, regarding treble-damage payments under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, allowed a deduction.[5] In 1961 the Service considered opposing such an allowance for antitrust treble-damage defendants. However, the Service conducted conferences and extensive further studies extending into 1963. Based on the findings of this extensive study, the indications that Section 4 of the Clayton Act was intended to be remedial rather than to punish defendants,[6] and the Supreme Court's unwillingness, except in rare instances, to disallow business expense deductions on "public policy" grounds,[7] the Service ruled that treble-damage payments in antitrust cases are deductible.[8]

The American Bar Association recommends that any legislation designed to make antitrust treble-damage payments in whole or in part non-deductible for federal income tax purposes be disapproved for the following reasons: (1) enactment of such legislation would fail to reflect the remedial rather than punitive nature of treble-damage actions; (2) basic tax principles delineating federal taxation as a tax on net income and not a sanction would be disregarded; (3) payments similar to treble-damages are fully deductible; (4) the economic analysis of antitrust questions frequently makes interpretation of the statutes difficult, allowing for a wide range of culpability, to which such legislation is not responsive; (5) inequitable tax effects would be created; and (6) any possible retroactive effect would be unfair.

1. Treble-damage actions as remedial or punitive: Public policy considerations

To the extent that Revenue Ruling 64-224, in allowing deduction of treble-damage payments, was founded on the determination that Clayton Act Section 4 actions are "remedial" rather than criminally punitive, both its rationale and its conclusion appear to have been supported and confirmed by the Supreme Court's reasoning in Commissioner v. Tellier, supra, decided March 24, 1966. In fact, this case, by strictly delineating "violation of public policy" as the test for disallowance of deductions, would seem to diminish the importance of the "remedial-penal" dichotomy.[9] In all events, that Section 4 of the Clayton Act is remedial and not penal is apparent both as a matter of statutory construction and legislative history. Recoveries inure wholly to benefit the injured party; other Sherman Act sections specifically punish by fines and prison terms; and the legislative history emphasizes a purpose of encouragement of private actions rather than punishment of antitrust offenders. Moreover, the Supreme Court has described Section 4 as a "remedial provision for redress of injuries," Eastman Kodak Co. v. Southern Photo Materials Co., 273 U.S. 359, 373 (1927), and as a "right of action granted to redress private injury," United States v. Cooper Corp., 312 U.S. 600, 608 (1941). The weight of judicial authority likewise affirms the compensatory nature of treble-damage provisions. E.g., Bruce's Juices, Inc. v. American Can Co., 330 U.S. 743 (1947).

Tellier holds that legal fees and related expenses incurred by a taxpayer in the unsuccessful defense of a business-related criminal prosecution (action for fraud against a securities dealer) are deductible as ordinary and necessary business expenses under § 162 of the Internal Revenue Code. A subsequent Revenue Ruling based on Tellier reversed that portion of Revenue Ruling 64–224 which had disallowed such fees and expenses in antitrust damage actions by the Government.[10]

The Court in Tellier primarily addresses itself to the "public policy" issue. In the present context that issue is specifically whether the deduction of treble-damage payments would frustrate any sharply defined policy that Congress had in mind in allowing antitrust plaintiffs to recover treble instead of actual damages; whether the "sting" of Section 4 of the Clayton Act is thereby lessened.[11] The Supreme Court has always been reluctant to deny business expense deductions on grounds that their allowance would frustrate national or state policies proscribing particular forms of conduct, and in a number of cases has found this "public policy" argument inapplicable. See Commissioner v. Sullivan, 356 U.S. 27 (1958) (deduction for rent and wages paid by operators of a gambling enterprise sustained, although both the business and the specific payments were illegal); Lilly v. Commissioner, 343 U.S. 90 (1952) (deduction for amounts kicked-back by opticians to doctors to obtain prescription business allowed, although in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act); and Commissioner v. Heininger, 320 U.S. 467 (1943) (deductions allowed for attorney's fees in the unsuccessful defense of an administrative mail fraud order).

Contrariwise, the Court has denied business deductions on the ground they frustrated "sharply defined public policies" in only two categories of cases: payments of fines and penalties to governmental bodies, Tank Truck Rentals, Inc. v. Commissioner, supra, and Hoover Motor Express Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 38 (1958); and payments, such as lobbying expenses, specifically prohibited by longstanding Treasury Regulations, Textile Mills Sec. Corp. v. Commissioner, 314 U.S. 326 (1941), and Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959).

The Court in Tellier has enunciated a "sharply limited and carefully defined category" for the role of "public policy" in determination of proper business expense deductions, in the following terms:

> Deduction of expenses falling within the general definition of § 162(a) may, to be sure, be disallowed by specific legislation, since deductions "are a matter of grace and Congress can, of course, disallow them as it chooses." . . . The Court has also given effect to a precise and longstanding Treasury Regulation prohibiting the deduction of a specified category of expenditures; . . . But where Congress has been wholly silent, it is only in extremely limited circumstances that the Court has countenanced exceptions to the general principle reflected in the Sullivan, Lilly and Heininger decisions. Only where the allowance of a deduction would "frustrate sharply defined national or state policies proscribing particular types of conduct" have we upheld its disallowance . . . Further, the "policies frustrated must be national or state policies evidenced by some governmental declaration of them." . . . Finally, the "test of nondeductibility always is the severity and immediacy of the frustration resulting from allowance of the deduction." 383 U.S. at 393–94.

It seems clear, therefore, that the rationale of Revenue Ruling 64–224 on the deductibility of antitrust treble-damage payments has been confirmed by the reasoning enunciated in the Tellier case. We feel that a statutory amendment to preclude such deductions, either in whole or in part, is not warranted by any possible effects on antitrust policy. Rather, it would be unwise as a matter of both tax and antitrust considerations.

2. Basic tax policy considerations

Any proposed legislation designed to limit or deny the deductibility of treble-damage payments is objectionable as a matter of basic tax policy on the ground that manipulation of tax provisions should not be used to achieve social goals in other areas. There is virtually no disagreement that any departure from this position should be made only if it is otherwise necessary and meritorious; only for clearly valid and carefully considered reasons.[12]

The Supreme Court in the Tellier case case has reiterated this position, stating: "We start with the proposition that the federal income tax is a tax on net income, not a sanction against wrongdoing. That principle has been firmly imbedded in the tax statute from the beginning." 383 U.S. at 691. The Court cites statements of the late Randolph Paul, as well as the original 1913 floor-debate statements of Senator Williams, to the same effect. 383 U.S. at 691–92 and n. 11, p. 695.

Tax legislation to accomplish a non-tax societal purpose deemed meritorious should be utilized only when it is not "possible to achieve that goal more efficiently, directly, and fairly through other measures which lie outside the realm of the tax system."[13] We do not think that the tax collector need be made the antitrust enforcer, or that the tax laws need be changed in order to achieve further and greater dollar punishment. Certainly here there is another way to solve any enforcement deficiencies within the legal context of the substantive area of concern. The antitrust laws themselves present the direct and manageable opportunity for increasing penalties, if such is deemed necessary. Simply quadruple or quintuple damages, if the deterrent is not currently enough, before abrogating basic policies by interfering with the tax deductibility of damage payments.[14]

3. Payments similar to treble-damages are deductible

We have noted that the Supreme Court in Tellier has reemphasized its reluctance to find that the allowance of an otherwise tax-proper business expense deduction would "frustrate sharply defined national or state policies proscribing particular forms of conduct," citing many of its own previous decisions wherein the deductibility of payments similar to antitrust treble-damages have been upheld. The enactment of legislation on this subject would be particularly inadvisable to the extent that it singles out antitrust treble-damage payments for interference with their tax deductibility. Both the courts and the Internal Revenue Service have long held similar, if not identical, payments deductible. These include "kickback payments" clearly in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act: payments made in settlement of treble-damage actions for price ceiling violations under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942; multiple damages paid to an employee for violations under the Fair Labor Standards Act; payments made in connection with violations of the law in the sale of securities; various fraud case payments; and the rent and wage expenses of an illegal gambling operator where these expenses were themselves a separate violation of a state law.[15]

Tellier, of course, has clearly settled any issue regarding the deductibility of legal and related expenses in defense of any such actions, criminal or otherwise.[16]

To reverse the basic tax policy noted above and as reaffirmed in Tellier, that federal income taxes should be on net income and not contorted to implement various regulatory statutes or to punish wrongdoing, is the prerogative of Congress. But one situation should not be singled out for such special treatment. Only after a thorough consideration of a broad range of items affecting enforcement of public laws and policies should legislation of this type come before the Congress.

4. Interpretation of the antitrust statutes is frequently and generally difficult, allowing for a wide range of culpability, and resultant inequities under the proposed legislation

The antitrust laws are dynamic in nature and their boundaries are often imprecise. Our antitrust laws are as equally economic, social and political as they are legal. Antitrust is involved in the sensitive area of what is good for the economy. Certainly businesses and governmental agencies have made unforeseeable mistakes, and the courts themselves have experienced great difficulty with the economic analysis necessary to determine whether a violation has occurred.[17]

Businesses are going to become subject to treble-damage actions in spite of every effort to avoid antitrust violations. In Simpson v. Union Oil Co., 377 U.S. 13 (1964), the Supreme Court held that a consignment agreement providing a resale price limitation violated the Sherman Act, although the Court approved a similar consignment agreement 38 years earlier; thus, its decision raises "the distinct possibility that an untold number of sellers of goods will be subjected to liability of treble damage suits because they thought they could rely on the validity of this Court's decisions." 377 U.S. at 30 (Justice Stewart dissenting). In 1967, the Court, in United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365 (1967), again indicated that consignment agreements and agency arrangements may properly be used by a manufacturer, within certain limits, to control the distribution of his product. In FTC v. Fred Meyer, Inc., 390 U.S. 341 (1968), decided on March 18, 1968, the Court held "for the first time, 32 years after the passage of the Act," that Section 2(d) of the Robinson-Patman Act, which requires equal promotional allowances by suppliers to all customers, uses the word "customers" to include persons who did not purchase directly from the supplier but bought through intermediate wholesalers. In so defining "customers" to include "noncustomers whom the Court thinks need protection," (see dissenting opinion, 341 U.S. at 361), the Court adopted a theory neither party proposed.

The very governmental agencies enforcing the anti-trust laws experience difficulty in determining whether a violation has occurred. In 1963, the Justice Department found itself in disagreement with the Federal Trade Commission as to whether price-quoting cooperative advertising by independent retail druggists constituted illegal price-fixing under the Sherman Act.[18] In Purolator Products, Inc. v. FTC, 352 F. 2d 874 (7th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1045 (1968), the Solicitor General filed an amicus brief opposing the Federal Trade Commission position.

Finally, the courts themselves have had admitted difficulty with the economic impact of business arrangements in reaching a conclusion regarding their classification under the antitrust laws. See White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253 (1963).

Within the above context, denying deduction for treble-damage payments, either in whole or in part, would arbitrarily impose "a burden in a measure dependent not on the seriousness of the offense," Tellier, supra, at 695. It has traditionally been the province of the courts to fit the punishment to the crime in the imposition of sentences. This can be particularly important when offenses can be inadvertent or less than deliberate. As noted by the chief counsel for the Senate Subcommitee on Antitrust and Monopoly, in all of the price ceiling treble-damage cases the courts had discretion regarding damages.[19]

Obviously, the tax collector is and should be blind to whether and to whom social good comes or doesn't come from the collection of taxes. The Antitrust Division, of course, properly exercises certain discretion in how it enforces the laws it is charged to uphold. But just as certainly, it should not be within the province of the Antitrust Division to further determine against whom the tax laws should be made available to inflict an additional penalty, as would be true under the provision of legislation which would limit the denial of a deduction to cases where there has been a criminal indictment resulting in a judgment of guilt or a nolo contendere plea. This allows the tax effect to the violator to be too much the result of prosecutor discretion[20] in light of the fact that civil injunctions of per se antitrust violations require much the same showing by the government as do criminal proceedings, and that criminal convictions can be obtained without direct evidence of intentional wrongdoing. Making the deductibility of subsequent treble-damage payments dependent on the government's choice of a civil or criminal enforcement route seems illogical when that choice is not necessarily reflective of the relative "hard-coreness" of the violation.[21]

5. Inequitable tax effects

Legislation in this area creates possibilities of double taxation and perhaps even windfall tax treatment on the other side—unjust but inevitable when alterations are imposed on the basic policy of taxing net income.

We have noted the defficulty of equating "wrongdoing" with treble-damage awards or settlements. Certainly it is at best arguable whether the profits made by a treble-damage defendant bear any necessary relation to damages he may be required to pay as a result of suits brought against him. However, to the extent he has so profited from his alleged wrongdoing, the treble-damage defendant has paid tax on this additional income. To the extent damages represent a repayment of such profits, it would seem that denial of a deduction to defendants would result in double taxation.

Additionally, we note that the actual increase in deterrent value of any such legislation is subject to question. The then Acting Attorney General Katzenbach noted in 1965 that with the present corporate tax rate of almost 50 percent, an adjudicated treble-damage violator, even with deductions, will be out-of-pocket approximately 150 percent of actual damages in a situation where it has already paid income tax on any income derived from the violation. That figure, in addition to the expense and business disruption occasioned by the legal proceedings, he suggested, means that even with deductions a potential violator will not likely risk a treble-damage action.[32]

Moreover, if nondeductibility is limited to cases with respect to which there was a criminal judgment or nolo plea, defendants clearly would be discouraged from entering nolo pleas which would then make them vulnerable to tax sanctions in subsequent treble-damage litigation. The effect would be especially onerous to smaller companies upon whome the high cost of litigation would often be seriously burdensome, if not fatal, to their ability to compete.[33] And to so discourage nolo pleas would add to the burden of already congested court calendars.

Under present procedures the character of a treble-damage recovery determines its tax treatment.[34] Amounts received above actual damages are taxable as ordinary income. Recoveries representing single or actual damages are not taxable if they can be shown to represent a return of capital, but are taxable to the extent that they represent lost income or profits. If this rule is changed by legislation to provide, for example, that the two-thirds portion of treble-damages which is nondeductible by defendants is non-taxable to the plaintiffs, a tax windfall for treble-damage payments is created to the extent such damages represent lost income or profits. In addition, these consquences would be undesirable since they would, to some extent, remove an incentive for treble-damage plaintiffs to settle for single damages.

6. Retroactivity of any proposed legislation

We also disapprove of the retroactive effect of any proposed legislation in this area. It was the recommendation of both the Joint Committee[35] and the Department of Justice[36] that such provisions should only apply respecting violations occurring after the date of enactment. At minimum, this retroactive feature would result in unfairness without serving the asserted basic purpose of such legislation as a deterrent to antitrust violations. Although it may be settled that retroactive tax legislation is generally constitutional, Assisant Attorney General Turner clearly suggested at the 1967 Hearings that constitutional problems would here be raised where you are dealing with "criminal law and sort of the criminal type sanctions."[37] Certainly a bill which would impose additional sanctions only on taxpayers who have been convicted or pleaded nolo on criminal antitrust violations would seem to have such a relation to criminality and would in effect be exacting additional punishment against a person or class of persons so as to create ex post facto problems.

CONCLUSION

For all of the above reasons, the American Bar Association opposes any amendment of the Internal Revenue Code which would disallow in whole or in

STATEMENT OF DR. N. R. DANIELIAN, PRESIDENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC POLICY ASSOCIATION, ACCOMPANIED BY CHARLES J. KERESTER, TAX COUNSEL

Mr. DANIELIAN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity.

Senator TALMADGE. The Chair notes with much pleasure that you have with you as a witness a former employee of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, Mr. Charles Kerester.

Mr. DANIELIAN. I was going to mention that, Mr. Chairman. I am pleased to have him with us. He has helped to prepare the statement and he is here to help answer questions.

In the current controversy over tax reform we have lost sight of the fact that it all started with the proposal to extend the 10-percent surcharge, and one of the primary purposes of the surcharge enacted in 1968 was to reestablish confidence abroad in the U.S. dollar, the standing of which in international markets had been weakened because of persistent balance of payments deficits.

It is pertinent, therefore, to address oneself to this original purpose of the surcharge and to suggest ways in which the balance of payments of the United States may be improved by means of appropriate tax treatment of foreign trade and investment income.

I have just returned from a month's survey of European opinion concerning the international flow of short-term capital, long-term investments, the U.S. balance of payments, and the standing of the dollar in the opinion of finance ministries and bankers. On more than one occasion the suggestion was made to me by officials, as well as private bankers, that the United States could help itself in encouraging the reflow of earnings from abroad by a more lenient tax treatment of foreign source income.

We have now tried on two occasions a punitive approach; first, in the Revenue Act of 1962, and now in the direct foreign investment controls of the Department of Commerce. There is no evidence that these approaches have been very successful. In the accompanying paper which, with your permission, I would like to submit for the record, we make typical suggestions of ways by which this can be accomplished.

Senator TALMADGE. Without objection it will be inserted in full in the record.

Mr. DANIELIAN. Another area in which tax reforms are long overdue is in the treatment of exports. Ever since 1960 it has been Government policy to solve our balance-of-payments deficits by encouraging exports. In all these years, almost a decade, not one single constructive proposal has come up to Congress from the executive department to use tax incentives to this end, in spite of numerous studies and reports recommending such action. In the meantime, we have allowed other countries, particularly the European Economic Communities and Japan to use tax incentives in promoting their exports in our markets.

I shall not here recite, for it is well known to you, the evolution of the Common Market's turnover taxes. It is a fact that as late as 1962 we allowed a clarification of the GATT regulations to permit the rebate of turnover taxes and prohibit similar treatment for income taxes. Ever since, we have had our hands tied.

Mr. Chairman, we must find a way of liberating ourselves from this self-imposed restraint and give our exporters at least the same effective percentage of tax concessions as our trading partners. We make recommendations in the accompanying paper to achieve this purpose.

There are other means whereby our earnings from exports and from investments can be enhanced and the repatriation of earnings encouraged.

A country with the responsibilities that the United States has assumed in maintaining stability in world conditions will continue to have substantial expenses abroad. Trade policies of other countries being what they are, we may not achieve the necessary surpluses in foreign earnings solely in the area of sales of goods. A large portion, an essential part, in fact, must come from investment and services income. It behooves us, therefore, to encourage rather than discourage profitable investments abroad, because the United States will ultimately become the beneficiary of the earnings from such investments. This part of our international accounts has been the most encouraging—in fact, the only—element in our external accounts that has been making a net contribution to our balance of payments. Therefore, we must eliminate unnecessary hindrances to the expansion of this most important source of income.

We make a number of specific suggestions in the accompanying memorandum on ways to achieve this objective.

A third objective of the U.S. Government has been to encourage investments in less developed countries, and we make a number of suggestions also to accomplish this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, this concludes the summary statement. We have made specific suggestions with reference to the Internal Revenue Code, the revisions that we suggest in the accompanying memorandum.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you very much, Mr. Danielian, for a very fine statement and we will look into the suggestions which you have made.

I share your views that our Government ought to do everything possible to encourage investments abroad and earnings wherever possible, and particularly on trade with balance of payments involved.

Thank you very much.

Mr. DANIELIAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF DR. N. R. DANIELIAN, PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC POLICY ASSOCIATION

SUMMARY

Mr. Chairman, in the current controversy over tax reform we have lost sight of the fact that it all started with the proposal to extend the 10 percent surcharge, and one of the primary purposes of the surcharge enacted in 1968 was to re-establish confidence abroad in the U.S. dollar, the standing of which in international markets had been weakened because of persistent balance of payments deficits. It is pertinent, therefore, to address oneself to this original purpose of the surcharge and to suggest ways in which the balance of payments of the United States may be improved by means of appropriate tax treatment of foreign trade and investment income.

I have just returned from a month's survey of European opinion concerning the international flow of short-term capital, long-term investments, the U.S. balance of payments, and the standing of the dollar in the opinion of finance ministries and bankers. On more than one occasion the suggestion was made to me by officials, as well as private bankers, that the United States could help itself in encouraging the reflow of earnings from abroad by a more lenient tax treatment of foreign source income. We have now tried on two occasions a punitive approach; first, in the Revenue Act of 1962, and now in the direct foreign investment controls of the Department of Commerce. There is no evidence that these approaches have been very successful. In the accompanying paper which, with your permission, I would like to submit for the record, we make typical suggestions of ways by which this can be accomplished.

Another area in which tax reforms are long overdue is in the treatment of exports. Ever since 1960 it has been government policy to solve our balance of payments deficits by encouraging exports. In all these years, almost a decade, not one single constructive proposal has come up to Congress from the Executive Department to use tax incentives to this end, in spite of numerous studies and reports recommending such action. In the meantime, we have allowed other countries, particularly the European Economic Communities and Japan, to use tax incentives in promoting their exports in our markets.

I shall not here recite, for it is well known to you, the evolution of the Common Market's turnover taxes. It is a fact that as late as 1962 we allowed a clarification of the GATT regulations to permit the rebate of turnover taxes and prohibit similar treatment for income taxes. Ever since, we have had our hands tied. Mr. Chairman, we must find a way of liberating ourselves from this self-imposed restraint and give our exporters at least the same effective percentage of tax concessions as our trading partners. We make recommendations in the accompanying paper to achieve this purpose.

There are other means whereby our earnings from exports and from investments can be enhanced and the repatriation of earnings encouraged.

A country with the responsibilities that the United States has assumed in maintaining stability in world conditions will continue to have substantial expenses abroad. Trade policies of other countries being what they are, we may not achieve the necessary surpluses in foreign earnings solely in the area of sales of goods. A large portion, an essential part, in fact, must come from investment and services income. It behooves us, therefore, to encourage rather than discourage profitable investments abroad, because the United States will ultimately become the beneficiary of the earnings from such investments. This part of our international accounts has been the most encouraging—in fact, the only—element in our external accounts that has been making a net contribution to our balance of payments. Therefore, we must eliminate unnecessary hindrances to the expansion of this most important source of income.

We make a number of specific suggestions in the accompanying memorandum on ways to achieve this objective.

I am pleased to state for the record that I am accompanied here today by Mr. Charles J. Kerester, Tax Counsel, of the law firm of Jones, Day, Cockley & Reavis, of Cleveland, who is prepared to answer technical questions.

STATEMENT

Introduction

The International Economic Policy Association, consisting of a number of U.S. corporations engaged in worldwide trade and investment operations, has been concerned with the continuing deterioration of the U.S. balance of payments.

Because of the seriousness of the U.S. deficit in the balance of payments, it has been assumed that the private sector must bear the greater part of the brunt for offsetting the huge government expenditures abroad which have placed us in deficit. American companies engaged in foreign operations, however, have been subject to restrictions, regulations and increased taxes which seem designed to discourage rather than to help in the responsibilities which have been imposed upon them. Mandatory controls have been placed on investments overseas, the returns from which have been one of the chief sources of U.S. income from abroad. American companies have been compelled to return liquid assets from abroad, without regard to the needs of their operations or the tax consequences. In spite of the burdens which have been imposed on private industry, there have been no effective measures to encourage U.S. exports or foreign investments which are the principle sources of income in achieving a favorable balance of payments.

The Association recommends that the Committee consider the following proposals to encourage U.S. exports and U.S. overseas operations:

A. REPATRIATION OF FOREIGN EARNINGS

1. Impact of OFDI controls

The current program of controls on direct investments compels U.S. companies to limit their investments abroad and to repatriate funds to help our balance of payments position. In addition to the serious problems confronting U.S. companies in complying with the controls, the program has caused them to be subject to taxation on amounts repatriated under compulsion.

Transfers of funds to a U.S. company from an affiliated foreign corporation in compliance with the direct investment controls are treated as taxable dividends. There is no provision in the Internal Revenue Code which would allow an exemption from tax even if these amounts are segregated into special accounts.

It seems highly unfair that U.S. companies with investments abroad, because of their efforts to comply with the onerous requirements imposed by the OFDI regulations, should be subject to taxation on the funds which they repatriate under the program. Reasonable means should be established whereby they could repatriate funds to improve our balance of payment account without incurring tax liability.

2. Removal of deterrents to investment in the United States by a foreign affiliate

Section 956 of the Internal Revenue Code provides that loans to a U.S. parent company and most investments in U.S. property by a U.S.-controlled foreign corporation, with limited exceptions, are subject to a tax on the U.S. shareholder of the foreign corporation as though a dividend had been distributed.

Section 956 effectively militates against bona fide transactions that could improve our balance of payments. Under the mandatory program for the control of foreign investments, the results impose special difficulties on American companies operating abroad.

Our balance of payments problems have been with us for a long time and it does not seem likely that they will disappear very soon. We believe that this disincentive to investment in U.S. securities by foreign affiliates should be removed. The Association recommends that the Committee seriously consider repealing section 956, or at least revising the section to take into account the realities of our present difficulties resulting from mandatory regulations under the Foreign Direct Investment Controls, by amending the section in such a fashion that bona fide loans to or a bona fide investment in a U.S. direct investor by its foreign affiliate would not be considered constructive dividends and subject to U.S. taxes.

Also, U.S. direct investors may find it necessary to transfer funds from one foreign affiliate to another to meet investment and working capital needs, thereby obviating the need for transfer of funds from the United States. The law should make clear that such transfers from one foreign affiliate to another, under terms and conditions similar to those prevailing between independent third parties, should not be considered as failing to meet the test of an arm's length transaction, resulting in a constructive dividend to the U.S. direct investor, merely because the transfer is between related parties.

3. Adoption of incentives for repatriation of foreign earnings

Some concept similar to the Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation's special tax deduction should be applied to dividends paid by controlled foreign corporations doing business in less developed countries. Such a deduction for earnings from less developed countries would provide an incentive to U.S. companies to establish and expand business operations in those areas, thereby providing the means for improving local economies. We suggest that this approach may be more preferable than outright financial grants now being made by the U.S. Government.

B. EXPORT TAX INCENTIVES

It is recommended that the Committee consider a permanent export incentives proposal. To encourage the export of U.S. manufactured products, it is suggested that a lower rate of corporate taxes be imposed on the export business of U.S. corporations. The Internal Revenue Code should be revised so that a taxpayer would pay a lower tax on income derived from the sale of exported goods. This may be done either by the creation of an export corporation restricted solely to export business which would qualify for the lower tax rate, and/or by extending the lower rates to the export business of domestic corporations.

We are aware of problems involved in tax incentives and of our obligations under the GATT agreement. Under GATT rules, direct taxes, such as sales taxes or the value added taxes which all members of the Common Market are adopting, can be exempted on exports and added onto the price of imports, but indirect taxes such as our heavy corporate taxes cannot be so computed. This means that under existing GATT rules U.S. manufacturers bear the full weight of U.S. taxes on their exports, and on the other hand, must compete with imports from the Common Market that have been exempted from a large portion of their domestic tax burden. Along these lines, H.R. 13713 introduced by Chairman Mills of the House Ways and Means Committee on September 10, 1969 is a recognition of this problem.

The present interpretation under the GATT rules relating to direct and indirect taxes should be renegotiated with our GATT partners so that the tax burdens on exports and imports should be computed in the same way. Whether or not our partners will agree to a renegotiation of GATT arrangements is uncertain, probably unlikely. We feel that some U.S. program for export incentives is the most effective means of improving our export trade performance and placing us in a position to compete on an equal basis with the numerous devices used by foreign countries in the trade field. An increase in U.S. exports to a position that will yield a substantial export surplus is imperative if the United States is to maintain freedom of international movement of people, goods and security forces.

C. ALLOCATION OF EXPENSES

Sections 861, 862 and 863 of the Internal Revenue Code define income from sources within the United States, income from sources without the United States and income partly from within and partly from without the United States. These sections require that there be deducted from a class of gross income a ratable part of any expenses which cannot definitely be allocated to some class of gross income.

Sections 861, 862 and 863 of the Code and Treasury Department regulations promulgated thereunder permit the Internal Revenue Service to require the allocation of a share of corporate general and administrative expenses to foreign source income. This allocation is made even though the expense may have only a remote connection with the production of the foreign source income. The result is, of course, to reduce the foreign source net income and thereby increase the effective foreign tax rate. This, in turn, increases the likelihood that the foreign tax credit may be reduced.

If an item of expense is incurred in order to produce foreign source income, it is reasonable to allocate it to that source. But to allocate merely because it has some vague relationship to foreign source income seems quite unreasonable. We suggest that sections 861, 862 and 863 be amended to make it clear that allocations of expenses to foreign source income are to be made only when the expense was incurred in the production of such income.

D. EXTENSION OF DEEMED-PAID FOREIGN TAX CREDIT (SECTION 902)

Under the present law, credit for foreign taxes paid by a foreign corporation can be had by a U.S. corporation only if at least 10 percent of the stock of the first-tier foreign corporation is owned by a U.S. taxpayer, and in the case of a second-tier foreign corporation, if at least 50 percent of the stock of the foreign subsidiary is owned by the first-tier foreign corporation. Under present law, the credit is not available for foreign taxes paid by third-tier or subsequent tier foreign affiliates.

Many foreign countries are insisting that alien ownership be limited to a minority interest. A revision of the section would encourage U.S. minority participation in additional ventures, attract local participation in joint ventures and stimulate the development of private enterprise in many less developed countries. Joint ownership is often required by local law or foreign government policy, and U.S. corporations cannot always maintain the degree of ownership required for such foreign tax credit under present U.S. law.

It is recommended that section 902 be amended so that the 10-percent ownership requirement for first-tier foreign corporations should be reduced to 5 percent, and that the tax credit should be extended to cases where there is an indirect ownership of 5 percent or more in second-tier, as well as in third- and subsequent-tier foreign subsidiaries.

E. EXTENSION OF EXISTING FIVE-YEAR CARRY-OVER PERIOD FOR UNUSED FOREIGN TAX CREDITS TO TEN YEARS

Section 904 of the Internal Revenue Code now permits a two-year carry-back and five-year carry-over for unused foreign tax credits. It is recommended that this carry-over period for unused tax credits be extended to ten years. U.S. foreign investors, especially in less developed countries, can anticipate extreme fluctuations in their losses and earnings and the resulting tax base. Congress has recognized the difficulties of foreign investments in adopting the carry-back and carry-over period. An extension of this five-year carry-over period to ten years would give added stimulus to investments in less developed countries, especially by small investors with limited financial resources. A ten-year carry-over period would permit a U.S. company greater opportunity to utilize any excess foreign tax credits resulting from the adverse effect a loss attributable to the worthlessness of an investment in a foreign subsidiary may have on the limitation on the foreign tax credit in the year the investment becomes worthless.

F. LIBERALIZATION OF DEFINITION OF CREDITABLE TAXES

Section 903 of the Internal Revenue Code now permits a credit for any foreign tax paid "in lieu of a tax on income. . . ." Treasury regulations and administrative practice have so restricted this that an "in lieu tax" can only be creditable if (1) the foreign country has an income tax in force, (2) the taxpayer would be subject to such income tax absent some special provision and (3) he pays a substituted tax in lieu thereof.

It is recommended that the "in lieu" provision be broadened to give recognition to the realities resulting from the reliance of other countries on other than income taxes. Consideration should be given to permitting other foreign taxes to be creditable against the U.S. income tax, where the foreign tax is a bona fide tax.

G. WORTHLESS SECURITIES IN FOREIGN CORPORATIONS

If a foreign subsidiary becomes worthless or is destroyed through expropriation, insurrection or other disaster, section 165(g) recognizes this loss and allows a deduction, either capital or ordinary.

The section as it is now applied, however, involves only complete abandonment or destruction and does not extend to depreciation, deterioration, or other extreme changes in value short of worthlessness. The section should be revised to give some relief in cases other than complete worthlessness. (The Code presently gives recognotion to partially worthless debts.)

At the present time, a number of factors are causing concern on the part of potential investors in developing countries. It is in those countries where economic development and private enterprise are most needed. Adoption of the above revision in section 165(g) and a ten-year carry-over period for the utilization of excess foreign tax credits, so that any excess credits arising because of losses under section 165(g) due to worthlessness of investments in foreign subsidiaries, would aid in our declared government policy of encouraging investment in those countries.

H. CONCLUSION

The foregoing recommendations are intended to call attention to the fact that the United States is confronted with certain policy imperatives which need much more attention in our Revenue Code than they have received heretofore. Specifically, we stand in need of increasing the volume of income from foreign operations, the amount of exported products from our shores, and investments in less developed countries. These recommendations are designed to serve these major policy objectives of the U.S. government.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Reasonable means should be established whereby U.S. companies could repatriate funds from abroad to improve our balance of payments account without incurring tax liability.

2. As an incentive for improvement in our balance of payments, section 956 should be repealed, or at least amended so that bona fide loans to or a bona fide investment in a U.S. direct investor by its foreign affiliate would not be considered constructive dividends and subject to U.S. taxes. Arms length loans of funds between foreign affiliates should be encouraged by making clear that such transfers are not constructive dividends to the U.S. parent.

3. Some concepts similar to the Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation's special tax deduction should be applied to dividends paid by a controlled foreign corporation doing business in less developed countries.

4. To encourage the export of U.S. manufactured products, the Code should be revised so that a taxpayer would pay a lower tax on income derived from the sale of exported goods. This may be done either by the creation of an export corporation restricted solely to export business which would qualify for the lower tax and/or by extending the lower rates to the export business of domestic corporations.

5. Sections 861, 862 and 863 of the Code should be amended to make clear that allocation of expenses to foreign source income is to be made only when the expenses are incurred in the production of such income.

6. Section 902 should be amended so that the 10-percent ownership requirement in first-tier foreign corporations should be reduced to 5 percent, and the tax credit should be extended to cases where there is an indirect ownership of 5 percent or more in the second-tier as well as third-tier and subsequent-tier foreign affiliates.

7. Section 904 of the Code should be amended to permit unused excess foreign tax credits to be carried forward for a ten year period instead of only a five year period.

8. The provisions of section 903, which now permit a credit for foreign taxes paid "in lieu of a tax paid on income," should be amended so that other foreign taxes may be creditable against U.S. income taxes where they are bona fide taxes.

9. The Code should permit a deduction for partially worthless securities rather than only for those securities which are completely worthless.

Senator TALMADGE. The next witness is Mr. John J. Carroll, chairman of the National Foreign Trade Council Tax Committee, who is accompanied by Robert T. Scott, vice president of the National Foreign Trade Council, Inc.

We are pleased to welcome you, gentlemen, and look forward to hearing your testimony.

STATEMENT OF JOHN J. CARROLL, CHAIRMAN, NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE COUNCIL TAX COMMITTEE; ACCOMPANIED BY ROBERT T. SCOTT, VICE PRESIDENT, NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE COUNCIL, INC.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, my name is John Carroll and I am appearing today as chairman of the Committee on Taxation of the National Foreign Trade Council. I am also vice president of EBASCO International Corp., A. Boise Cascade Company.

I am accompanied by the vice president of the council, Mr. Robert T. Scott.

The council was organized in 1914 to promote and protect American trade and investment. The council has a nationwide membership of over 1,000 corporate members comprised of manufacturers, merchants, exporters and importers; rail, sea and air interests; bankers, insurance underwriters and others interested in the promotion and expansion of the Nation's foreign commerce.

The National Foreign Trade Council has already submitted a detailed statement to this committe expressing the views of the council on the taxation of foreign income as proposed in H.R. 13270 and the Treasury recommendations thereto.

We have also suggested certain reforms in other sections dealing with the taxation of foreign source income.

The National Foreign Trade Council is in accord with any effort made to do away with improper tax avoidance and tax evasion wherever it exists. However, the National Foreign Trade Council believes that the tax reforms relating to foreign source income embodied in H.R. 13270 should not be enacted. The case has not been made that alleged loopholes in the present foreign tax credit provisions of the code exist. Section 321, 432, 452, and 501 of H.R. 13270 and related Treasury proposals we consider to be inequitable and discriminatory and should be rejected.

These sections of H.R. 13270 attempt to indirectly limit the full effect of deductions heretofore granted by the Congress as they pertain to the foreign business operations of a U.S. national, and thus discriminate against foreign source income. All deductions allowable to U.S. nationals deriving U.S. income should also be permitted to be taken by U.S. nationals deriving income from foreign sources.

The foreign tax credit provisions should not be used to increase the cost to a business enterprise of sustaining a loss in business operations. The proposals to add additional complex sections to the foreign tax credit provisions of the code, which are already complicated enough, will only add to the growing uncertainty of the tax burden that must be undertaken by U.S. nationals willing to venture abroad.

Without going into every section of H.R. 13270 as it relates to foreign source income, I would like to refer to some particular sections. Section 431 provides for a recapture of U.S. tax where a U.S. national sustain a loss from operations in a year in which the per country limitation has been elected. The loss is to be allowed as a deduction from other taxable income in the year but the tax effect of such a deduction must be paid back in future years when operations in the same loss country become profitable. The Treasury has indicated they would like to see this extended to taxpayers sustaining an overall foreign operations' loss. This is unprecedented.

In addition, if the taxpayer is unfortunate enough to dispose of this loss operation, the deductible loss of prior years must be included in taxable income whether or not there was any reduction in U.S. tax payable in the loss year. It would appear that, if enacted, a taxpayer would have to pay a tax because he incurred a loss in his business operations.

A loss is a loss wherever it is incurred. So long as the United States continues to assert the right to tax worldwide income of its nationals, fairness dictates that such income continue to be subject to deductions wherever incurred. Denial of the tax effect of otherwise proper deductions will result in outright discrimination against U.S. nationals operating abroad as compared to those operating solely within the United States.

The restriction imposed by section 431 is inconsistent with and departs from basic U.S. principles of taxation since it could result in the taxation of foreign source income at a higher U.S. rate than that applicable to domestic income. Under the so-called recapture provisions of section 431, the prior tax loss will reduce the foreign tax credit otherwise allowable. Any such reduction in foreign tax credit, where the foreign tax rate is in excess of 50 percent of the U.S. rate, would result in the imposition of an additional U.S. tax on foreign source income. The degree of this penalty for a loss increase with the amount of the foreign tax rate, producing a further discrimination.

Thus, foreign source income would be taxed at a greater overall rate than comparable income of other taxpayers who never sustained a prior year's loss in foreign operations.

Section 431 far exceeds the basic function of section 904 of the code which is to insure that foreign source income will be taxed at no more than the higher of the U.S. or foreign tax rate.

Since section 431 applies upon the disposition of property related to the operation producing the foreign loss, this section would have the effect of permanently locking taxpayers into a foreign loss situation resulting in an uneconomical allocation of resources. This adverse treatment would not, of course, apply to the sale of a domestic business.

The Treasury proposal to apply this so-called recapture provision where there has been an overall loss while using the overall limitation should be rejected. Instead of removing the alleged double tax benefits, the Treasury proposal would provide a double tax penalty for taxpayers experiencing an overall loss while using the overall limitation: one, in the loss year foreign taxes applicable to other foreign source income which have been laid or accrued will not be creditable; and two, as operations turn profitable foreign taxes otherwise creditable will be reduced by the loss recapture provisions in violation of the traditional U.S. policy of taxing foreign source income.

Section 432, another section, provides that the foreign tax credit limitation is to be separately applied with respect to foreign mineral income arising from sources within the foreign country from which the income is derived.

This section and the Treasury's alternative thereto should not be enacted. The council would also oppose disallowance of foreign tax credits, as suggested by the Treasury merely because the foreign tax was imposed at a rate greater than the U.S. rate. If a foreign income tax has been paid, it should be creditable, within the present limitations, regardless of the foreign tax rate imposed.

Section 432 and the Treasury's alternative thereto should not be enacted. The council would also oppose disallowance of foreign tax credits, as suggested by the Treasury, merely because the foreign tax was imposed at a rate greater than the U.S. rate. If a foreign income tax has been paid, it should be creditable, within the present limitations, regardless of the foreign tax rate imposed.

Section 432 and the Treasury's alternative thereto would require that the foreign tax credit of a U.S. national deriving foreign mineral income be computed on a per country and per item basis even in cases where the overall limitation was otherwise elected. This would result in fragmenting foreign income for purposes of computing the limitation and would result in the U.S. taxing foreign source income at varying rates.

By imposing this new per item limitation, the enactment of section 432 would go a long way toward nullifying the present equitable alternative per country and overall foreign tax credit limitations in the code.

Through this indirect discrimination against a particular type of business activity section 432 would seriously depart from U.S. principles of tax neutrality. Moreover, such discrimination would create an undesirable precedent which could be used against other types of business activity in the future.

Today the mineral interests are to be curtailed. Tomorrow who can say what foreign business operation will be considered undesirable.

The Treasury proposals would further erode the principle that foreign tax credits are computed on the taxpayer's entire taxable income from either a particular country or worldwide, as long as such foreign tax is not credited against U.S. tax attributable to U.S. source income.

If present statutory deductions are the problem, in this area, they should be examined separately rather than being indirectly attacked through the foreign tax credit provisions. The fact that the foreign income tax law does not precisely mirror the Internal Revenue Code should not be significant as long as such foreign tax is an income tax, or a tax in lieu thereof.

Under a full foreign tax credit system of preventing double taxation, the fact that a U.S. national may have been faced with a tax in excess of 60 percent (or other arbitrary percentage) does not justify the denial of such excess as a foreign tax credit against the U.S. tax on foreign source income.

Such a denial is also contrary to the principle of the overall limitation, which is to permit the averaging of high and low foreign tax rates where a U.S. taxpayer has an overall business operating in many foreign countries.

Section 452* would amend section 312 of the code, to add back to "earnings and profits" of corporations the excess of accelerated depreciation over straight-line depreciation. The stated purpose of the amendment was to obviate the payment of tax-free dividends by public utility and real estate corporations from funds derived by claiming accelerated depreciation.

Section 452 as it is presently written, extends far beyond the receipt of such "tax-free" dividends from public utility and/or real estate corporations. It would have particularly harsh effects with respect to the foreign area in general and foreign tax credits in particular. It does not appear that these implications have been fully comprehended or intended by the Ways and Means Committee, at least from the House report on it.

The council recommends that section 452 of the bill should not be enacted. If enacted, its application should be limited to the distribution of "tax-free" dividends. It should not apply under any circumstances to the determination of earnings and profits for purposes of computing foreign tax credits, minimum distributions or when such determination is otherwise required under section 964 of the code.

Section 452 would arbitrarily increase the earnings of foreign subsidiaries for purposes of calculating the deemed tax credit under section 902 of the code, which would further dilute the foreign tax credits allowable against income received from such subsidiaries and, in effect, denies to these foreign operations the benefits of reduced tax cost provided by the foreign country.

Enactment of section 452 of the bill could alter the computation of the required minimum distributions under section 963 of the code. It could increase the earnings and profits of a controlled foreign corporation, and decrease the effective foreign tax rate and thus increase the required minimum distribution and would be inconsistent with the relief provisions which were deliberately put into the Revenue Act of 1962 by this committee.

The determination of allowable tax credits, the inclusion in gross income of a U.S. shareholder of earnings of a controlled foreign corporation, the allocations of distributions from controlled foreign corporations and the determination of taxable gain on the sale of stock as provided for in sections 956, 959, 960 and 1248 of the code could all be adversely affected by the enactment of section 452 of H.R. 13270.

This section should not be enacted since it represents a further attempt to diminsh foreign tax credits properly allowable against the U.S. tax or foreign source income.

Mr. Chairman, I was going to comment on section 501 which had to do with the depletion allowance but I am sure you have heard much about that already.

Section 501 which would limit percentage depletion applicable to oil and gas wells located in the United States should be rejected.

As stated, the United States asserts jurisdiction to tax the worldwide income of its nationals. Denial of a deduction attributable to foreign source taxable income is inconsistent therewith. U.S. firms producing abroad are subject to the same income tax laws as domestic producers and are entitled to the same depletion deduction allowed domestic production. This policy of tax neutrality should be continued.

Although elimination of depletion on foreign production of oil and gas might initially result in some additional residual U.S. tax, such tax would soon be "sponged up" by foreign governments increasing their tax rates. As a consequence, foreign tax payments and the foreign tax credit could be expected to increase, and no additional taxes would be paid to the United States.

The net effect would be a reduction of profits available for paying taxable dividends to U.S. stockholders in an amount equal to the additional foreign taxes collected, and eventually a reduction in U.S. tax revenue.

Mr. CARROLL. Thank you.

Senator TALMADGE. I appreciate your very fine statement, Mr. Carroll. The committee will give it due consideration when it starts to mark up the bill.

Mr. CARROLL. Thank you very much.

STATEMENT OF JOHN J. CARROLL, CHAIRMAN, TAX COMMITTEE, NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE COUNCIL, INC.

SUMMARY

The National Foreign Trade Council believes that the "tax reforms" relating to foreign source income embodied in H.R. 13270 should not be enacted into law. Alleged loopholes in the present foreign tax credit provisions do not exist. In addition, sections 431 and 432 of H.R. 13270 and related Treasury proposals are inequitable and discriminatory and should be rejected. Likewise sections 452 and 501 should be rejected for the same reasons.

The National Foreign Trade Council believes that enactment of these sections of H.R. 13270 would create undesirable precedents for the future. It has been a longstanding principle of the U.S. that its nationals are taxed on worldwide income, i.e., that all income be included and all deductions be allowed in determining the net income subject to tax. Rather than exempting foreign source income, the U.S. has provided a credit for foreign income taxes imposed on such income. This has worked in the past to prevent confiscatory double taxation and to protect the U.S. tax properly payable on U.S. source income. All deductions allowable to U.S. nationals deriving U.S. source income should also be permitted to be taken by U.S. nationals deriving income from foreign sources. The foreign tax credit provisions should not be further restricted by adding complex sections which will only add to the growing uncertainty of the tax burden that must be undertaken by our nationals willing to venture abroad.

Section 431 attempts to exact a U.S. tax payment on a loss from operations abroad. Section 431 would depart from the principles of tax neutrality and would complicate the conduct of foreign operations. This recapture provision would penalize nationals conducting operations in underdeveloped nations or risk areas where the possibility of a loss from nationalization or expropriation is greatest. A loss is a loss whether it is incurred in the United States or in a foreign country and a national taxable on worldwide income, should not be deprived of the tax effect of such an allowable deduction.

Section 432 would segregate and fragmentize income from foreign operations and apply U.S. tax on a per item basis rather than treat such income, either worldwide or from a particular country, as a unit. In addition to discriminating against one industry, the petroleum industry, enactment of section 432 could create an undesirable precedent for the taxation of other types of business income. Section 432 and the Treasury recommendations thereto complicate already complex tax laws without justification for such a departure in the taxation of foreign source income.

Section 452 should not be enacted. It could discriminate against particular industries. Among other things, enactment of section 452 could decrease foreign tax credits otherwise allowable and detract from the relief provided by this Committee in enacting the minimum distribution provisions of subpart F of the Code.

Section 501 discriminates more heavily against the foreign operations of one particular industry than it does against the domestic operations of the same industry. The Council agrees with the Treasury recommendation that section 501(a) should not eliminate percentage depletion with respect to foreign oil and gas production but does not believe that the Treasury's alternative to limit foreign tax credits allowable on a specific type of foreign business income is sound or equitable.

Section 231 should be liberalized to eliminate the $2500 limitation with respect to moving expenses incurred in connection with overseas assignments.

Section 444 should be enacted, but the favorable treatment afforded foreign deposits in U.S. banks should be made permanent and not merely extended through 1975 to avoid the continual threat of withdrawal of foreign funds from U.S. banks.

Section 902 of the Code dealing with direct foreign tax credits should be extended to apply to dividends received from any foreign corporation regardless of the number of tiers of ownership.

Section 367 of the Code relating to advance rule requirements with respect to certain transactions involving foreign corporations, should be repealed.

Statement

INTRODUCTION

The existing foreign tax credit provisions contains no loopholes and accordingly require no tax reform. Therefore, the foreign tax credit provision, which serve as one of the cornerstones of U.S. trade and investment, should not be amended as contemplated in H.R. 13270 or in the Treasury amendments thereto.

Former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Stanley S. Surrey stated in his testimony at Hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee with respect to the proposed U.S.-Brazil income tax treaty:

"American investment would not proceed at all without the foreign tax credit because then, as the Chairman pointed out, two taxes would be imposed and the overall burden of two taxes would be so great that international investment would practically cease." (Senate Ex. J., 90th Cong., 1st Sess., 19, 20.)

Thus, as is widely recognized, the foreign tax credit has, over the years since its adoption in 1918, proven workable and provided the intended relief from double taxation, despite its inherent complexities.

Further complexities have been added since 1962 to the conduct of international business by the enactment of Subpart F of the Internal Revenue Code, sections 951 through 964, and the Interest Equalization Tax, sections 4911 through 4921, and more recently with the promulgation of the regulations under section 482 of the Code and the Foreign Direct Investment Regulations by the Commerce Department in 1968. These laws and the implementing administrative rules have drastically curtailed the freedom of choice of the American investor, and created an environment in which his ability to compete with investors of other developed countries can no longer be taken for granted.

The changes in the foreign tax credit now proposed in H.R. 13270, the Tax Reform Act of 1969, as well as the related Treasury proposals, continue these shortsighted policies of adversely restricting and penalizing the conduct of international business. Contrary to the practice of other industrialized nations which overtly encourage foreign operations on the part of their nationals, the U.S., as evidenced by certain of the provisions of H.R. 13270, is continuing to hamper the conduct of international business on the part of its nationals.

While directed at the U.S. petroleum industry, the proposed changes would overturn longstanding U.S. principles of taxation, the effects of which would extend far beyond the U.S. international petroleum companies. In addition, if enacted, the proposed changes would then serve as boot strap precedent for future attempts to fragmentize and segregate foreign source income and to tax such income on a per item rather than a net income basis. Moreover, by increasing the tax cost of doing business abroad, the contemplated changes would surely have an adverse impact on our balance of payments in the private international trade and investment accounts—the one sector that has traditionally provided a balance of payments plus for the U.S.

I. U.S. PRINCIPLES OF AVOIDING INTERNATIONAL DOUBLE TAXATION AND TAXATION OF FOREIGN INCOME

Certain of the provisions of H.R. 13270 as well as the Treasury's alternatives thereto proposed by Assistant Secretary, Edwin S. Cohen, at the commencement of these Hearings along with the Council's recommendations relating thereto as well as to other recommendations with respect to the taxation of foreign income should be examined in the light of traditional principles employed by the U.S. in avoiding international double taxation and in taxing foreign income.

International double taxation

International double taxation occurs when a national of one country receives income from abroad which is subject to tax both in the country of nationality and in another country.

This problem is becoming increasingly serious, particularly for those countries, such as the United States, which traditionally have had a vital interest in world trade and investment, as foreign income tax rates range up to and beyond the U.S. rate. Assuming a 50 percent U.S. corporate income tax rate, a U.S. corporation doing business directly in another foreign country such as France, with a tax rate of 50 percent would be subject to confiscatory double taxation. Under these conditions foreign trade and investment could not long endure.

Recognizing this, the industrialized countries of the world, committed to a policy of international trade and investment, have adopted one of two methods for elimination of international double taxation.

One method, based upon the principle of territoriality, is for a country to exempt foreign source income realized by its nationals. The National Foreign Trade Council has long endorsed the exemption method and continues to believe that such method is the more desirable.

The other method is to tax the worldwide income of citizens, residents and domestic corporations but to grant a credit for the foreign income taxes paid or accrued with respect to foreign source income. Since the Revenue Act of 1918, the U.S. has traditionally attempted to eliminate international double taxation through the use of the foreign tax credit mechanism.

It should be strongly emphasized that both the exemption method and the credit method recognize and give effect to the prior claim of the country of source to tax income arising within its borders.

U.S. taxation of worldwide income

As a country of source, the U.S. asserts primary jurisdiction to tax the income of non resident aliens and foreign corporations derived from carrying on a U.S. trade or business and permits taking deductions provided for under the Code attributable thereto. As a country of nationality, the U.S. asserts jurisdiction to tax the worldwide income of its citizens and corporations. Heretofore, the U.S. had adhered to a policy of not taxing a U.S. national's income derived from overseas operations at a greater rate than that applicable to similar income from domestic operations.

Consistent with its assertion of jurisdiction to tax worldwide income of its nationals, the U.S. permits such nationals to apply all deductions otherwise allowable under the Code against such income. Thus, tax equality is preserved vis a vis those U.S. nationals choosing to do business solely in the U.S. and those doing business both at home and abroad. Both are treated alike.

U.S. elimination of double taxation

However, while asserting its jurisdiction to tax the worldwide income of its citizens and corporations, the U.S. very early in the history of its income tax law recognized the problem of international double taxation. Since the country of source has always the primary right to tax income arising therein, the U.S. under section 901 permits its citizens and corporations having fiscal responsibilities to two national jurisdictions to credit against the U.S. tax the tax paid to the other tax jurisdiction, subject to limitation as to amount under section 904. As long as the foreign tax is considered an income tax or a tax in lieu of an income tax, the U.S. has never required that the foreign taxing system be identical to the U.S. system as a condition of granting a foreign tax credit.

Section 904 of the Code provides for a limitation on the foreign tax credit which prevents any foreign tax paid to another country from being credited against the U.S. tax payable on U.S. source income.[1] The U.S. concept of eliminating international double taxation under section 904 results, in effect, in foreign source income being taxed at the greater of the U.S. or the effective foreign tax rate. Double taxation is eliminated because the U.S. taxpayer bears the burden of only one tax. The U.S. revenues are protected since the U.S. tax attributable to U.S. source income can never be reduced by any foreign taxes paid on foreign source income.

For example, where the tax rate of country X is 40 percent, a U.S. corporation whose only income is from country X will pay a foreign tax of $40 on taxable income of $100. Assuming a U.S. rate of 50 percent, double taxation is eliminated

[1] The United States permits its nationals to elect the computation of the foreign tax credit on the basis of either the per country limitation or the overall limitation. The per country limitation imposed by section 904(a)(1) restricts the amount of credit allowable against the U.S. income tax for taxes paid to any single country to the amount of tax imposed by the United States on the income derived from that individual country. Section 904(a)(2) provides an alternate overall limitation on the foreign tax credit. The overall limitation restricts the amount of credit allowable by permitting taxpayers to treat the taxes of all foreign countries collectively (rather than separately for each country) in calculating the total amount of credit allowable against the U.S. income tax on total foreign source income.

Under either system, the U.S. taxpayer must allocate a portion of U.S. expense against foreign income—further reducing allowable foreign tax credits so that the credit for foreign tax is limited to the foreign tax attributable to the net foreign source income, determined under U.S. standards.

since the U.S. corporation's $100 of income is taxed at the higher U.S. rate. The corporation credits the $40 country X tax against its U.S. tax of $50, paying $10 to the U.S. Treasury, or a total of $50 tax on taxable income of $100.

If, in the above example, the country X tax rate was 60 percent, the U.S. corporation would credit $50 of country X tax against its U.S. tax of $50 satisfying its U.S. tax liability in full. Double taxation is thus prevented; the total tax of $60 on foreign source income is imposed at the greater of the U.S. or effective foreign tax rate, or at the rate of 60 percent on taxable income of $100.

From the foregoing, it is apparent that the U.S. tax liability with respect to the foreign source income of a U.S. national doing business abroad in countries imposing tax at rates equal to or greater than the U.S. rate may be satisfied by payment of the foreign tax. This is entirely proper under the credit system of preventing international double taxation where the country of nationality asserts jurisdiction to tax worldwide income of its nationals.

Given the scope and diversity of U.S. business and the firm U.S. policy of insuring that foreign taxes not reduce U.S. tax on U.S. source income, the present U.S. concept of relieving international double taxation through the operation of an elective per country or overall limitation is economically sound and consistent with the policy of tax neutrality.

Since the expansion of international trade and investment is an important national policy, and since such policy can only be attained under adequate protection from international double taxation, any further change in the foreign tax credit system should have the effect of eliminating rather than creating international double taxation. Otherwise foreign trade and investment could not continue, unless of course the U.S. were to adopt an exemption system.

H. H.R. 13270, Sections 431, 432, and 501

1. In general

While sections 431, 432 and 501 of H.R. 13270 are apparently aimed at the extractive industry, they are of much broader impact and could present an unwise precedent for future discrimination against other industries. Enactment of such provisions would produce distorted results which are contrary to the long established policy adopted by the United States of relieving all of its citizens and corporations from the effects of international double taxation. These provisions would result in the U.S. imposing a higher rate of tax on foreign source income than on domestic source income. Moreover, these provisions, if enacted, would further add to the complexities of the U.S. taxation of foreign income.

2. Section 431. Per country limitation restrictions

Section 431 of H.R. 13270 provides for a recapture of U.S. tax where a U.S. taxpayer sustains a loss from foreign operations in a year in which he has elected the per country limitation under section 904(a)(1). For purposes of applying the foreign tax credit limitation in a subsequent year when income is realized from the country in which the loss was sustained, the taxable income from the country in which the loss was sustained (or the taxpayer's foreign source taxable income if the overall limitation is being used in the subsequent year) is to be reduced by the amount of the loss previously sustained. Thus, taxpayer would be denied up to one half of the credit for foreign taxes actually paid which would otherwise be currently allowable.

The Treasury would propose to extend the operation of section 431 of the Bill to taxpayers on the overall limitation experiencing an overall foreign loss even though in the year of loss no foreign tax credits would be allowed.

Section 431 of the bill also provides for a recapture of the so-called tax saving from a loss sustained in a foreign country where property, which is used in the trade or business from which the loss arose, is disposed of by the taxpayer prior to the time the loss has been recaptured under the rules discussed above. The amount of the loss not previously recaptured is to be included in income for the year in which the disposition of the property occurred, provided the property disposed of is a material factor in the realization of income or loss in the business in which it was used or where the property constitutes a substantial portion of the assets used or held for use in the carrying on of the business. A loss could become taxable income.

Recommendation

For the reasons set forth below, the Council recommends that section 431 not be enacted.

No double tax benefits

As set forth in House Report No. 91-413 (Pt. 1), 91st Cong., 1st Sess., 116, section 431 purports to eliminate two ostensible tax benefits which are said to arise when a taxpayer on the per country limitation experiences losses in a foreign country. The claimed double tax benefits are:

(1) such losses reduce U.S. tax on domestic income; (2) when the business operations in the loss country become profitable, a credit is allowed for foreign paid taxes to that country against what otherwise would be the U.S. tax on the income from that country. Under the U.S. system of taxation, such results can not be labeled "double tax benefits" and do not justify enactment of section 431.

Inconsistent with U.S. taxation of worldwide income.—As stated, the U.S. asserts jurisdiction to tax the worldwide income of its citizens and corporations and correspondingly permits such nationals to apply all deductions otherwise allowable under the Code against such income, recognizing that incurring such deductions is essential to the realization of such income.

If the U.S. continues to assert the right to tax worldwide income of its nationals, fairness dictates that such income continue to be subject to deductions wherever incurred. To do otherwise is not to curtail a so-called "tax benefit" but rather to adopt a "heads I win, tails you lose" philosophy of taxation, inconsistent with principles of tax neutrality heretofore adhered to by the United States.

In denying the effect of deductions attributable to foreign source income of U.S. nationals, section 431 results in outright discrimination against income earned abroad. And this will be so at a time when most other industrialized nations are taking positive steps to encourage and increase foreign trade and investment.

Inconsistent with foreign tax credit.—The rationale for the foreign tax credit as a method of preventing confiscatory double taxation is that the country of nationality, while taxing worldwide income, gives credit for foreign income taxes actually paid a foreign country on foreign source income. It is difficult to consider the granting of full foreign tax credit up to the amount of U.S. tax on foreign source income a so-called "tax benefit" which should be curtailed.

If one of the reasons for section 431 is that the foreign tax credit should not alleviate double taxation unless the foreign tax is imposed on the identical income as is taxed by the U.S., this is not sound. The foreign tax credit provisions have always recognized that foreign income tax laws cannot be expected to be exactly like the U.S. law, and that foreign income taxes will be computed under differing rate structures, and definitions of taxable income. What counts in a practical sense is the dollar amount of the tax burden in the respective countries. Income taxes paid to two countries on the same business operations constitute double taxation regardless of differences in the structure of the tax laws under which the taxes are paid.

Recognizing that foreign income tax laws do not and cannot precisely reflect the U.S. Internal Revenue Code, the rule of existing section 904 limits the foreign tax credit solely to U.S. tax on foreign source income and thereby affords full protection to the revenues. This rule remains adequate today.

The simple fact is that when foreign operations turn profitable, both a U.S. and foreign income tax will be paid on the same income—and under the foreign tax credit system of alleviating international double taxation, such foreign tax should be credited against U.S. tax, subject to the protective limitation of existing section 904. There is no justification to reduce the foreign tax credit allowable against the U.S. tax on foreign source income because a business operation in a particular country suffered a loss in a prior year. A loss should not create a further tax penalty.

Section 431 would penalize foreign income

The restriction on the per country limitation imposed by section 431 of H.R. 13270 is inconsistent with, and departs from, basic U.S. principles of taxation since it could result in the taxation of foreign source income at a higher rate than that applicable to domestic income. See Table No. 1, infra p. —. The recapture provisions would reduce the numerator, but not the denominator, of the section 904 fraction (taxable income from country where prior loss arose over entire taxable income) which is multiplied by the U.S. tax in order to determine the amount of the limitation on the foreign tax credit. The reduction is the amount of the prior year's foreign loss which was allowable under the Code. It is apparently intended that the use of the prior year's loss will reduce the foreign tax credit otherwise allowable against the U.S. tax on foreign source income of the current year.

Any such decrease in foreign tax credits, where the foreign income tax rate is in excess of 50 percent of the U.S. rate, would result in the imposition of an additional U.S. tax on foreign source income to the extent of such decrease. Thus, foreign source income subject to section 431 of the Bill would be taxed at a greater overall rate than comparable income of other taxpayers who never sustained a prior year's loss in foreign operations.

To illustrate, assume that in 1968 Corporation X, a United States corporation, generated U.S. source income of $100 and income from Country Y of $100 and suffered a start-up loss in Country Z of the same amount. Assume further that Country Y and the U.S. imposed income tax at the rate of 50 percent and Country Z at 30 percent, and that Country Z does not allow a loss carryover. Under the overall method of computing foreign tax credits, Corporation X would be considered to have no foreign source taxable income and therefore would be entitled to no foreign tax credits. The $100 of net income would, of course, still be subject to United States income tax of $50. The total tax bill under these circumstances would be 100 percent of the net income ($50 to the U.S. and $50 to Country X). It is this result that the per country limitation prevents.

Applying the per country limitation under existing law, Corporation X would be entitled to a foreign tax credit of $50 with respect to its $100 of income from Country Y. This credit for $50 of the $50 paid to Country Y offsets the U.S. tax on Country Y's income. The total tax bill under these circumstances would be 50 percent of the net income.

Assume that in the next year taxpayer realized $100 from Country Z and all other facts remain the same. Under existing law, the effective tax rate on Corporation X's income would be 50 percent. If it is further assumed that section 431 applied, the effective tax rate on Corporation X's income for such following year would be increased to 51.6 percent. If on the other hand Country Z's tax rate was 50 percent, Corporation X's effective tax rate for the year following the loss year would, under the application of section 431, be increased to 58.3 percent. Thus, section 431 severely penalizes foreign source income whenever the foreign income tax rate is in excess of 50 percent of the U.S. rate. The degree of penalty depends upon the amount of the foreign tax rate.

Section 431 far exceeds the basic function of section 904 which is to insure that foreign source income will be taxed at no more than the greater of the U.S. or effective foreign tax rate. Moreover, foreign source income will continue to be subject to the penalties of section 431 even though the operation giving rise to the loss has long since been abandoned or is unrelated to the profit operation. Thus, such losses will reduce foreign tax credits arising from unrelated profitable operations within the same country.

Underlying premise incorrect

The complexity of section 431 is illustrated by the fact that the so-called tax benefit recapture provision applies where a foreign loss was sustained in a year when the per country limitation was in effect even though the taxpayer had no income from U.S. sources against which the loss could be deducted. See Table No. 2, infra p. 5306. This is contrary to a statement made in House Report No. 91–413 (Pt. 1) 91st Cong., 1st Sess., 116.

The "recapture" provisions also apply in other situations where the foreign loss can result in no possible U.S. tax benefit. The provisions of section 431 apply where, in the typical case, the foreign country permits a loss incurred in one year to be carried over against income earned in a subsequent year. This carryover, of course, reduces both the amount of foreign tax paid in the later year to the source country as well as the U.S. foreign tax credit, thereby increasing the amount of tax actually received by the U.S. Treasury. Nonetheless, except in the rare case where the income in a country in a year subsequent to the year of loss is twice as much as the amount of the foreign loss in the earlier year, section 431 will operate to reduce foreign tax credits in subsequent years even where the effect of the foreign loss carryover provisions was to increase residual U.S. taxes. See Table No. 1, Infra p. 5305.

Recapture on disposition of property

Section 431 applies upon disposition of property which was materially related to the operation producing the foreign loss. Section 431 would appear to apply even where an unsuccessful foreign venture is abandoned without producing any income. In addition to adding further complexities to the foreign area, this provision is extremely unjust and may have the effect of permanently locking taxpayers into a loss situation, or creating income where in reality income exists, resulting in an uneconomical allocation of resources. This provision represents a significant departure from existing principles of tax neutrality, since a comparable operation in the U.S. could be sold off without tax penalty.

Treasury proposals

The Treasury proposal to apply the so-called "recapture" provision where there has been an overall loss while using the overall limitation is subject to the criticism set forth above with respect to the loss recapture on the per country limitation. Under the present overall limitation, a loss in one country offsets income from other foreign countries, thereby reducing the numerator of the section 904 fraction (taxable income from foreign sources over total taxable income) which is multiplied by the U.S. tax, so that foreign tax credits otherwise available are lost. Thus, the Treasury proposal provides a double tax penalty for taxpayers experiencing an overall loss while using the overall limitation. Firstly, foreign taxes applicable to foreign source income which have actually been paid or accrued will not be credited. This is the result under the present law. Secondly, as operations turn profitable foreign taxes otherwise creditable will be reduced by the loss recapture provisions in violation of the traditional U.S. principles inherent in the taxation of foreign source income.

Illustration showing that foreign loss produces no U.S. tax benefits

Table No. 1, set forth below, shows that there is no unwarranted benefit under present law from the deduction of foreign losses by a taxpayer using the per country limitation, and that the proposed provision for recapture of any U.S. tax saving from such deductions of foreign losses would be in fact produce international double taxation contrary to the fundamental purpose of the foreign tax credit provisions.

Table No. 1 compares the effect of a loss sustained in a new business and deducted from income of a business in the U.S., followed by income from the new business in later years, under the present law and under the proposed change, according to whether the new business is domestic or foreign and whether the foreign tax law allows or does not allow a net loss carryover. For convenience, it is assumed that both the U.S. and foreign rates are 50%.

Table No. 1 shows that the per country limitation under present law, permitting foreign losses to be in effect deducted from U.S. source income, results in an over-all tax burden of 50% of the cumulative net income over the period during which a foreign loss is sustained and offset by subsequent foreign income, whether the new business is in the U.S. or in a foreign country. When both businesses are domestic, this results from the application of the 50% U.S. rate to actual net profits. When the new business is foreign, this results under present law from a 50% U.S. tax on the net income over the period, reduced by credit for the 50% foreign tax during the same period. Under the proposed change, the over-all tax burden would be in excess of 50%, the excess being equal to the recapture of the U.S. tax benefit from the loss.

While variations in the U.S. and foreign rates would produce more complicated tables, they would still show the same violation, under the proposed change, of the principle that the net U.S. tax, under the foreign tax credit system of avoiding international double taxation, should represent no more than the excess of the U.S. rate over the foreign rate. The same effect would be shown if there were operations in other foreign countries.

Under column V, the foreign country, as is usually the case, grants a net loss carryover. The foreign tax saving resulting from the net loss carryover automatically produces a "recapture" by the U.S. of the prior U.S. tax benefit of the loss; nevertheless the proposed change in law would exact a second "recapture". When the foreign country does not grant a net loss carryover (column IV) the U.S. recapture results in U.S. tax on income which has been taxed by the foreign country where it was earned.

Table No. 2, below, graphically illustrates that the so-called tax benefit recapture operates to disallow foreign tax credits and correspondingly increases the U.S. tax on foreign operations where taxpayer never had U.S. source income which could be offset against the foreign loss. As previously stated, such disallowance results in the U.S. imposition of an additional tax on foreign source income. It is again assumed that the foreign tax rates are 50 percent. As set forth in Table No. 2, a U.S. taxpayer operating in countries A and B, and experiencing a loss in country B in 1970 will, depending on whether a foreign loss carryover is or is not allowed, be subject to a total effective tax rate of 75 percent and 68.75 percent, respectively, over the 3-year period up to and including 1972. Under existing law such taxpayer would be subject to a total effective tax rate of 50 percent regardless of whether a foreign loss carryover is allowed.

Even in cases where the foreign loss did not prevent the United States from receiving its full tax on U.S.-source income because of lower effective foreign tax rates in other countries, section 431 would operate to reduce foreign tax credits in later years. This is shown in Table No. 3 in which it is assumed that all countries have a 50% rate of tax, except that country A's rate is reduced to 20% in order to act as an incentive to attract needed foreign investment and Country B does not allow a loss carryover.

TABLE NO. 3.—EFFECT OF SECTION 431 ON LESS DEVELOPED COUNTRY TAX INCENTIVES

	Income or (loss)	U.S. tax	Foreign tax	Actual tax rate (percent)
1970—
U.S. business	$500	$250		50

Total tax paid:
United States		800
Foreign		300

Thus, the taxpayer is penalized by a reduction in the limitation on the credit for 1971 country B taxes, and $50 of the credit otherwise allowable for those taxes is disallowed by reason of the $100 loss in that country in 1970, even though the U.S. in that year received its full tax of $250 on the U.S.-source income of $500.

It is common for many of the underdeveloped countries to attempt to attract much needed foreign investment through various tax incentive programs, which have the effect of lowering the tax rate on business operations conducted in that country by foreigners. Under present law, since the U.S. does not recognize the tax sparing principle, any benefits granted by the local tax law will not be realized by the U.S. national but will be sponged up by the U.S. Treasury. Thus, under proposed section 431, thes U.S. will exact an additional tax on foreign source income (because of lost foreign tax credits otherwise allowable) even though the loss in country B did not offset U.S. tax on U.S. source income because of incentive tax reductions offered the U.S. taxpayer in his country A operations.

3. Section 432. Separate mineral income limitation

Section 432 of H.R. 13270 provides that the foreign tax credit limitation is to be separately applied with respect to foreign mineral income arising from sources within the foreign country from which the income is derived. This separate limitation is to be applied whether the taxpayer otherwise uses the per country or the overall limitation on the foreign tax credit. The separate foreign tax credit limitation is to be imposed in the following situations:

(1) where the foreign country requires the payment of a royalty or bonus with respect to the property from which the foreign mineral income is derived;

(2) where the foreign country has substantial mineral rights with respect to property from which the foreign mineral income is derived; or

(3) where the foreign country imposes an income tax on foreign mineral income at a higher effective rate than the tax imposed by the country on other types of income.

Foreign mineral income means taxable income from mines, wells, and other natural deposits within a foreign country, but only to the extent that the income is considered "taxable income from the property" for purposes of the percentage depletion provisions of the code. Dividends received by a U.S. taxpayer from a foreign corporation with respect to which a deemed-paid foreign tax credit may be claimed are to be treated as foreign mineral income to the extent the dividend is attributable to this type of income. A partner's distributive share of the partnership's foreign mineral income also is to be considered foreign mineral income in the hands of the partner for purposes of the limitation.

House Report No. 91–413 supra, indicates that the sole reason for the separate mineral income limitation on the foreign tax credit is to isolate those cases in which it is likely that the income taxes represent, at least in part, royalties because of the difficulty in distinguishing a royalty payment from a tax payment.

The Treasury has recommended that proposed section 432 in its present form should not be adopted.

The Treasury has recommended that excess foreign tax credits resulting from the allowance of percentage depletion by the U.S. should not be available against other foreign income. This recommendation of the Treasury is based on the assumption that percentage depletion will not be denied to the mineral industry operating abroad. The Treasury has also suggested that a method of handling foreign income taxes imposed at rates in excess of the U.S. rate would be to disallow foreign tax credits to the extent of any foreign income taxed at a rate in excess of 60 percent.

Recommendation

The Council concurs with the Treasury recommendation that section 432 should not be enacted. The Council does not concur in the Treasury's alternative to section 432.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth below the Council recommends that section 432 and the Treasury's alternative thereto not be enacted. The Council would also oppose disallowance of the foreign tax credit merely because the foreign tax was imposed at a rate greater than the U.S. rate.

Violates principle of tax neutrality

In the past, the Council has opposed computing the foreign tax credit separately in respect of different types of business income. For 50 years the foreign tax credit provisions have always been applied uniformly to taxpayers regardless of the type of business from which income is derived. As a matter of tax policy, it is wrong to depart from this basic principle by imposing a separate limitation on particular items of income or on particular industries. To discriminate against a particular type of business activity is to create a dangerous precedent which can be used against other types of business activity in the future.

Such tax discrimination has been rejected by Congress. The President's 1963 Tax Message recommended that the foreign tax credit be limited to prevent excess foreign tax credits arising from oil, gas and mineral operations abroad from being used to offset U.S. taxes on other forms or sources of foreign income. The Congress rejected this proposal.

The Council opposed the 1963 proposals, and continues to oppose the creation of a separate limitation on foreign mineral income.

Fragments income

The present U.S. system of avoiding international double taxation is premised upon providing a credit against U.S. tax for foreign tax applicable to the foreign source income of a U.S. national. The effect of section 904 of existing law is to insure that the U.S. national is subject to tax on all foreign source income, computed on either the per country or overall basis, at the greater of the U.S. or foreign tax rates. The U.S. heretofore has not attempted to impose tax on various items of foreign business income at varying tax rates. The requirement of section 432 of H.R. 13270, along with the proposed Treasury alternative thereto, limiting the foreign tax credit of a U.S. national deriving foreign mineral income under the prescribed circumstances to a per country and per item basis, results in fragmenting foreign income for purposes of computing the limitation on the foreign tax credit. This will further complicate the U.S. taxation of foreign income.

The principle of existing law is that all foreign source income of a taxpayer, either within a country or worldwide, is taken as a unit in assuring that the total tax burden shall not be less than the higher of the U.S. or the foreign taxes. It is wrong in principle to segregate these operations and abandon tax neutrality.

Effect on section 904 election

Section 432 of H.R. 13270 is contrary to the principle affirmed by Congress in 1960 when it enacted the overall limitation as an alternative limitation on the foreign tax credit. Section 432 would go a long way toward nullifying the present equitable alternative per country and overall foreign tax credit limitations by imposing a new per item limitation.

Rationale obscure

The Council does not understand why segregating the foreign tax and royalty payments should present difficulties of a type with which the Internal Revenue Service cannot adequately cope. The Council agrees with the statement of Assistant Secretary Cohen appearing on pages 47 and 48 of his September 11th testimony before this Committee that:

"* * * we do not feel that it is proper to characterize all foreign taxes on mineral income in excess of U.S. taxes on such income as disguised royalties."

It should be stressed that, contrary to the implication set forth in House Report No. 91–413 supra, such royalty payments are by no means minimal and/or incidental. Rather, as set forth below in Table No. 4, petroleum royalty payments are substantial in relation to the tax rate of the foreign country wherein the minerals are produced.

Increases complexity

Furthermore, the complexities of the foreign tax credit provisions would be compounded were it necessary for a company to divide its operations into separate functions and then to determine the amount of foreign income tax which might be considered paid in respect of the various functions in order to compute a separate limitation on the credit for such tax. This increasing complexity will greatly increase the problems of taxpayer compliance and government tax administration.

National policy

The separate mineral income limitation violates the long standing policy of the United States to further the economic development of less developed nations. This policy has been manifest in our foreign assistance program, as well as in the various provisions of the Internal Revenue Code which encourage investment in less developed areas. See, for example, sections 902(a)(1), 954(b), 1248(d)(3), and 4916.

Consistent with this policy, large investments by American industry have been made in less developed areas of Asia, Africa and South America. For instance, heavy direct investments in less developed countries by the natural resources industry have been a significant factor in raising the living standards of those nations where mineral wealth has been discovered. Accordingly, it would be inconsistent with such national policy to single out a particular industry for adverse tax treatment which would discourage worldwide investments which such policy is designed to promote.

Foreign competition

The separate mineral income limitation will make U.S. companies less competitive. As a result of their predominant position in worldwide business, U.S.

companies have been able to make significant contributions to the U.S. economy in general and to the U.S. balance of payments in particular. However, it must always be borne in mind that U.S. companies and citizens who venture abroad are in direct competition with large, strong, and aggressive foreign companies. Many of these foreign companies enjoy tax benefits under the laws of their countries which aid them in their foreign ventures. Moreover, some of these companies are direct agencies of foreign governments. To our knowledge, none of these foreign governments embrace, either directly or indirectly, a policy of penalizing foreign operations.

Section 904(f) no precedent

Finally, while there is a separate limitation applying to certain interest income under section 904(f), this separate limitation for interest income in the Revenue Act of 1962 was a special measure to discourage artificial and temporary shifting of short-term investments in interest-bearing securities from the United States to foreign countries principally for the purpose of utilizing excess foreign tax credit. This provision applies only to portfolio type investment interest and was expressly made inapplicable to investments directly related to an active business of the taxpayer. Investments in foreign mineral producing properties clearly are not temporary tax-avoidance arrangements but rather represent investments in an active business and in resources in which the United States has a vital national interest.

Treasury proposals

As set forth above, the foreign tax credit provisions have long recognized that foreign tax laws do not, and cannot be expected to, mirror the U.S. tax law. Nevertheless, the Treasury proposes that excess foreign tax credits which result from the allowance of percentage depletion by the United States should not be available against other foreign income. The Treasury also suggested that foreign taxes imposed at some arbitrary rate in excess of the U.S. rate might be disallowed as a credit against U.S. tax.

The Treasury proposals would dilute the effect of the foreign tax credit as a means of avoiding international double taxation. These proposals would further erode the principle that foreign tax credits are computed upon the taxpayer's entire taxable income from either a particular country or worldwide, depending upon whether the per country or overall limitation is elected, as long as such foreign tax is not credited against U.S. tax attributable to U.S. source income. The fact that the foreign income tax law does not precisely mirror the Internal Revenue Code should not be significant as long as such foreign tax is an income tax, or a tax in lieu thereof. The fact that taxpayer may have been faced with a tax in excess of 60 percent (or other arbitrary percentage) should not justify the denial of such excess as a foreign tax credit against the U.S. tax on foreign source income. Such a denial is contrary to the principle of the overall limitation, which is to permit the averaging of high and low foreign tax rates.

4. Section 501. Elimination of percentage depletion on foreign oil and gas production

Section 501 of H.R. 13270 would limit percentage depletion applicable to oil and gas wells to wells located in the U.S., its possessions, Puerto Rico, or on the outer continental shelf.

Recommendation

The Council recommends that this provision of section 501(a) not be enacted for the following reasons:

Violates tax neutrality

Section 501(a) would discriminate against foreign oil and gas production and would be contrary to the principle of tax neutrality that is the justification for United States taxing income world wide. Although a strong argument can be made for taxing only income that is earned in the United States, Congress has rejected this alternative on the theory that the income of a U.S. firm should be taxed on the same basis irrespective of where it arises. So long as that principle is followed by our country, Congress should not discriminate against income from foreign sources. Elimination of percentage depletion on foreign oil and gas production would do just that.

At present, U.S. firms producing abroad are subject to the same income tax laws as domestic producers and are entitled to the same depletion deduction allowed domestic production. This policy should be continued.

Would reduce U.S. tax revenue

Athough elimination of depletion on foreign production of oil and gas would result initially in residual U.S. tax, such increase would be a strong inducement for foreign governments to increase their effective tax rates. As a consequence, foreign tax payments and the foreign tax credit would be expected to increase, and no additional taxes would be paid to the U.S. The net effect would be a reduction of profits available for paying taxable dividends to U.S. stockholders in an amount equal to the additional foreign taxes collected, and eventually a reduction in U.S. tax revenue.

In some 24 counties the tax laws contain some type of percentage depletion deduction provisions. Most of these provisions are modeled after the U.S. law. Obviously, we could not expect those provisions to remain in force if the U.S. were to eliminate percentage depletion on foreign production. In at least one country there is provision for automatic nullification of the depletion deduction in the event a foreign producer loses its right to a depletion deduction in its home country. In any event, whether the increase in foreign taxes takes place under an automatic provision in the foreign tax law, or follows gradually by legislation, the result will be the same—any appreciable increase in revenues to the U.S. will eventually disappear and be replaced by a reduction in U.S. tax revenue as a result of the lower profits available for paying taxable dividends to U.S. stockholders.

Place U.S. companies at competitive disadvantage

United States petroleum companies compete with companies from other developed countries for the opportunity to develop and operate foreign fields. Many of these are strong and aggressive companies which are owned by their governments, or which, where privately owned, enjoy special tax considerations from their governments. The Soviet government engages directly in oil production and exports about one million barrels daily, adding to the competitive forces which U.S. companies must meet. Many of the Western European countries and Japan now provide tax incentives for national companies exploring overseas and this is now being considered by the European Common Market.

Companies from these developed countries are in direct competition with U.S. companies producing petroleum abroad. It is ironic that at the same time foreign governments are maintaining or increasing incentives for local companies to acquire foreign oil interests, the U.S. is considering action which would increase the tax burden of its companies engaged in foreign exploration and production,.

Risks greater abroad than in the United States

The search for oil and gas is as inherently uncertain abroad as in the U.S. Congress in adopting the depletion provision gave recognition to the particular risks in the oil and gas business both at home and abroad. American companies producing oil in foreign countries have added risks of losses through war, expropriation and nationalization not faced by domestic producers.

Adverse effect on balance of payments

American companies account for 56 percent of the Free World's oil produced abroad. The operations of these companies contribute substantially toward a more favorable balance of payments. The expected increase in foreign taxes as an offset against the gain in U.S. tax from elimination of foreign depletion would have an adverse effect on our balance of payments position.

Ownership of foreign crude oil reserves by Americans is important

Oil consumption in the U.S. is over a third of the Free World total, but domestic reserves are only one-tenth of the total in the Free World. American ownership of foreign oil resources is essential to assure an adequate future supply for both national security and economic strength. The absence of U.S. control of these foreign reserves will result in those who do control them turning to their own nationals rather than American companies for technical assistance, construction and operating equipment.

Foreign oil investments contribute to U.S. goals

Investments of American oil companies abroad serve to increase U.S. trade with those foreign countries and to contribute substantially toward making them less dependent on U.S. gifts and aid.

III. OTHER TAX REFORM MEASURES

1. Clarification on the U.S. income tax status of the continental shelf

In his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee, Assistant Secretary, Edwin S. Cohen, recommended that the U.S. income tax status of the continental shelf areas of the world be clarified by amending the definition of "United States" in the Code to include the continental shelf of the United States with respect to the exploration for natural resources and defining the term "foreign country" as used in the Code to include the continental shelf which pertains to the foreign country concerned. While the Council recognizes the need for clarification of the law in this area, the Council believes that the proposal set forth is consistent with the position taken by taxpayers and the Internal Revenue Service in past administration of the U.S. income tax law. The Treasury Department recommendation is also consistent with the position of the National Petroleum Council with respect to the policy which the U.S. should follow regarding the area of the continental shelf over which the United States should exercise jurisdiction.

In connection with the proposed definition of the term "foreign country" we think that it is important to define the term so that it includes any part of the Continental Shelf adjacent to a foreign country with respect to which that foreign country exercises jurisdiction to grant licenses or permits to conduct operations, whether or not the rule applied in determining the area with respect to which jurisdiction is to be exercised or the degree of jurisdiction to be exercised is the same as that applied by the United States with respect to the Continental Shelf adjacent to the United States. Unless such a definition is used, a taxpayer carrying on operations on the Continental Shelf of a foreign country which exercises jurisdiction with respect to that Continental Shelf might be subjected to international double taxation if the U.S. income tax definition of the term "foreign country" were not broad enough to include the area in which the taxpayer carried on operations.

Recommendation

Accordingly, the Council recommends that the tax status of the continental shelf be clarified along the lines of the Treasury proposal. However, the definition of the continental shelf adjacent to a foreign country should clearly include any portion thereof over which the foreign country exercises jurisdiction to grant licenses or permits to conduct operations.

2. Section 452. Earnings and profits

Section 452 of the Bill would amend section 312 of the Code, to add back to "earnings and profits" or corporations the excess of accelerated depreciation over straight-line depreciation. The stated purpose of the amendment is to obviate the payment of tax-free dividends by public utility and real estate corporations from funds derived by claiming accelerated depreciation. H. Rept. No. 91-413 (Pt. 1), 134.

Earnings and profits as defined in section 312 of the Code is relevant to other Code sections dealing with the foreign area in general and with foreign tax credits in particular. The implications of section 452 of the Bill may extend far beyond the receipt of "tax-free" dividends from regulated public utility and/or real estate corporations. It does not appear that these implications have been fully comprehended or intended by either the Ways and Means Committee or the Treasury Department.

Recommendation

Section 452 of the Bill should not be enacted. If enacted, its application should be limited to the distribution of "tax-free" dividends.

It could be provided that if a company makes a distribution which it considers is not out of earnings and profits, such company must revise its earnings and profits for a specified period of years to add back accelerated depreciation in excess of straight-line depreciation. This last suggestion might be useful in permitting the Treasury to counter abuse situations while freeing corporations not having this situation from the voluminous record keeping requirements and unintended effects which would be involved in the present proposal.

In any event, section 452 should not apply to the determination of earnings and profits for purposes of computing foreign tax credits, minimum distributions or when such determination is otherwise required under section 964 of the Code.

Code sections affected by section 452

A. Section 902

Under section 902, a domestic corporation upon receipt of a dividend from a 10 percent or more owned foreign corporation is deemed to have paid that proportion of the taxes paid or deemed to be paid by the foreign subsidiary to any foreign country or U.S. possession on or with respect to the accumulated profits out of which such dividends were paid.

Enactment of section 452 in its present form, which would add back to earnings the excess of accelerated depreciation over straight-line depreciation, would have the effect of increasing the earnings of foreign subsidiaries for purposes of calculating the deemed paid tax credit under section 902 of the Code, thereby decreasing the allowable foreign tax credit. Such procedure would be contrary to the trend of industrialized nations to permit some form of accelerated depreciation in reducing taxes otherwise payable to their Government. Increasing the earnings of foreign subsidiaries in this manner if this is intended would dilute the foreign tax credits allowable against income received from such subsidiaries and in effect denies to these foreign corporations the benefits of reduced tax cost provided by the foreign country.

B. Section 963

Enactment of section 452 of the Bill could alter the computation of the required minimum distributions under section 963 of the Code. Section 963 is a relief provision added to the Revenue Act of 1962 by this Committee which attempts to ameliorate the harsh results of the provisions of subpart F. Under section 963, if a domestic corporation elects to receive a "minimum distribution" it is not required to include in its gross income its share of subpart F income. Broadly speaking where the effective foreign tax rate is less than 90 percent of the U.S. rate, a minimum distribution, stated in terms of the foreign corporation's earnings and profits, will be required in order to avoid subpart F treatment.

Section 452 of the Bill might increase the earnings and profits of a controlled foreign corporation, and decrease the effective foreign tax rate and thus increase the required minimum distribution and could be inconsistent with the relief intended by Congress in 1962.

C. Other sections

Section 960 of the Code provides for a foreign tax credit with respect to the inclusion of subpart F income in the gross income of a shareholder in a controlled foreign corporation. Enactment of section 452 of the Bill could present problems under section 960 which are similar to those discussed above under section 902.

Section 956 of the Code provides that any increase for a taxable year in the earnings of a controlled foreign corporation invested in U.S. property must be included in the gross income of a U.S. shareholder in a controlled foreign corporation to the extent such amount would have constituted a dividend if it has been distributed. The determination of such amount could require a computation of the earnings and profits of the controlled foreign corporation and as such could be affected by the enactment of the section 452 of the Bill.

Section 959 prescribes ordering rules with respect to the allocation of distributions from controlled foreign corporations which in turn are related to earnings and profits concepts which could be affected by the enactment of section 452.

Since section 1248 provides that gain recognized upon the sale or exchange of stock in a controlled corporation shall be treated as a dividend attributable to such stock under prescribed circumstances, this section may be affected by section 452 of the Bill.

3. Liberalization of indirect credit

In view of the growing demand for local participation and the necessity to participate in consortiums through foreign subsidiaries at various levels, the Council considers that it is now the appropriate time to broaden the relief afforded by Section 902 by extending the indirect credit beyond the second tier. There should be no administrative problems in extending the benefits of Section 902 beyond the second tier since the acquisition of as little as a 5 percent direct or indirect interest must be reported to the Internal Revenue Service together with current financial information. The Internal Revenue Service must review these documents in the course of any audit of a U.S. corporation with an interest in foreign subsidiaries. In addition, the domestic corporation has the ultimate burden of substantiating any foreign tax credits cleamed.

Recommendation

The indirect credit should be extended to apply with respect to dividends received from any foreign corporation, irrespective of the number of tiers of ownership, provided the domestic parent has an overall stock ownership of 5 percent in the chain of foreign corporations through which the dividend is distributed.

4. Section 367

Section 367 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, first enacted in 1932, provides that unless the taxpayer obtains an advance ruling from the Commissioner that tax avoidance is not a principal purpose of certain types of transactions involving the organization, reorganization or liquidation of a foreign corporation, such foreign corporation will not be treated as a corporation. Where such advance clearance is not obtained, any gain, which would otherwise not be recognized under the provisions of subchapter C of the code, had domestic corporations been involved, will be recognized. It therefore becomes essential for the taxpayer to obtain an advance Section 367 clearance from the Commissioner whenever the types of transactions set forth above are contemplated. See Rev. Proc. 68-23, IRB 1968-22, 33.

Under Rev. Proc. 68-23, Section 367 is being administered in an arbitrary manner to exact costly "toll gate" charges from taxpayers as the price of obtaining the favorable ruling essential to the consummation of an otherwise bona fide business transaction. In addition, the present advance ruling procedure is fraught with costly delays for taxpayers even where the toll gate charge is to be exacted.

More importantly, transactions described in Section 367 occurring between foreign affiliates are often consummated without the knowledge of the U.S. parent so that an advance ruling is not obtained. In such cases, a tax must be paid with no recourse to judicial review, even in cases where it is obvious that tax avoidance is clearly not present and where an advance clearance would have been granted as a matter of eventual routine on the part of the Commissioner.

(1) In view of the present information reporting requirements and the array of other code sections and judicial precedent upon which the Commissioner can now reply in preventing tax avoidance, the Council recommends the repeal of Section 367.

(2) At the very least, Section 367 should be amended retroactively to all open years, to eliminate the advance ruling requirement. This would be consistent with the tax treatment now afforded the realignment of domestic corporations. Thus, the facts of any given transaction as finally developed would be determinative of the tax treatment afforded such transaction. Consistent with other areas of the tax law, this recommended change would restore to taxpayers that fundamental right of having legitimate differences as to taxpayer's motive resolved by the court rather than by the Commissioner, who by statute, now sits as appellate judge and jury in Section 367 cases.

5. Section 231. Moving expenses

Section 231 of the Bill provides for the deduction of additional categories of moving expenses subject to an overall limitation of $2500.

The Council agrees in principle with the liberalization of deductions for moving expenses. However, a dollar limitation on indirect expenses to protect against abuses will act unfairly in cases where expenses are reasonable in amount but exceed the limitation. Moreover, because of possible inflation, a reasonable dollar limit today might be completely inadequate in the future. If a dollar limitation is to be provided, it should be applied only to moves within the United States. Moving expenses in respect of overseas assignments generally involve more indirect expenses and can vary greatly as between countries. Where the move is requested by the employer and the expenses are the employer's, an attempt to tax the employee will only result in additional costs to be borne by the employer.

Recommendation

Accordingly, if a limitation will be placed on the amount of moving expense which will be allowed as a deduction, the Council recommends that such limitation shall not be below $2500 in the case of transfers within the U.S. However, such limitation should have no application in respect of moving expenses incurred in respect of overseas assignments where the amounts involved vary so greatly that it would be quite inequitable to restrict the deduction to a specified amount.

On taking an overseas assignment many people sell their U.S. home but do not purchase home in the foreign country because of exchange risks, and the like. The Council therefore recommends that the 1-year period to purchase a new home under section 1034(a) not commence to run in such case until the employee returns to, and takes up residence in, the U.S.

6. Section 444. Foreign deposits in U.S. banks

In April of this year President Nixon indicated that his Administration will review existing regulations and tax policy to assure that foreign investment in the U.S. is not discouraged. By way of specific example, the President stated that we should move now to eliminate from our laws the prospective taxation of interest on foreign held U.S. bank deposits. In this connection, President Nixon proposed the immediate repeal of the portion of section 861 of the Internal Revenue Code which would tax the interest paid to foreign depositors after December 31, 1972 in respect of U.S. bank deposits unrelated to a trade or business. It was similarly proposed to retain the present exemption of such deposits from estate tax.

Section 444 of the House Bill does not implement the President's proposals but merely defers the U.S. income and estate taxation to 1976. As recognized by the Administration and by every major commercial body which has expressed itself on these subjects since introduced through the Foreign Investors Tax Act, the provisions of present law tend to discourage the investment of funds in the United States and places a direct drain on the U.S. balance of payments.

Recommendation

The Council recommends that President Nixon's proposals be supported by the immediate and complete removal of the expiration date of the relief provisions found in present law.

NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE COUNCIL, INC.,
New York, N.Y., October 10, 1969.

Hon. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Committee on Finance,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LONG: The Council appeared before the Senate Finance Committee on October 3rd to present testimony with respect to H.R. 13270. Among other things, the Council recommended repeal of section 367.

In this connection, we enclose herewith a technical memorandum of the National Foreign Trade Council setting forth suggested statutory recommendations to the Internal Revenue Code which may be considered appropriate if section 367 is repealed.

The Council respectfully requests that this statement be made a part of the hearings on tax reform.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT T. SCOTT, Vice President.

SUPPLEMENTAL MEMORANDUM OF THE NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE COUNCIL TO ITS MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED TO THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF THE U.S. SENATE

REPEAL OF SECTION 367

Section 367 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, first enacted in 1932, provides that unless the taxpayer obtains an advance ruling from the Commissioner that tax avoidance is not a principal purpose of certain types of transactions involving the organization, reorganization or liquidation of a foreign corporation, such foreign corporation will not be treated as a corporation. Where such advance clearance is not obtained, any gain, which would otherwise not be recognized under the provisions of subchapter C of the Code, had domestic corporations been involved, will be reorganized. It therefore becomes essential for the taxpayer to obtain an advance Section 367 clearance from the Commissioner whenever the types of transactions set forth above are contemplated. See Rev. Proc. 68-23, IRB 1968-22, 33.

Under Rev. Proc. 68–23, Section 367 is being administered in an arbitrary manner to exact costly "toll gate" charges from taxpayers as the price of obtaining the favorable ruling essential to the consummation of an otherwise bona fide business transaction. In addition, the present advance ruling procedure is fraught with costly delays for taxpayers even where the toll gate charge is to be exacted.

More importantly, transactions described in Section 367 occurring between foreign affiliates are often consummated without the knowledge of the U.S. parent so that an advance ruling is not obtained. In such cases, a tax must be paid with no recourse to judicial review, even in cases where it is obvious that tax avoidance is clearly not present and where an advance clearance would have been granted as a matter of eventual routine on the part of the Commissioner.

In view of the present information reporting requirements and the array of other code sections and judicial precedent upon which the Commissioner can now rely in preventing tax avoidance, the Council recommends the repeal of Section 367 and that section 1248 be amended, as set forth below.

ACQUISITION BY U.S. PERSON OF ASSETS OF A FOREIGN SUBSIDIARY OR STOCK IN A DOMESTIC CORPORATION

The heart of the Council's proposals with respect to amending section 1248 lies in the area dealing with domesticating transfers, i.e., where the shares of a controlled foreign corporation (hereinafter referred to as a CFC) are transferred by a U.S. person without immediate recognition of gain, either in exchange for stock of a domestic corporation pursuant to the reorganization provisions, or in exchange for th eassets of a foreign subsidiary pursuant to a complete liquidation of the foreign subsidiary. Under present law, section 1248 only applies to gain from sales or exchanges of stock in a CFC which is otherwise treated as long-term capital gain. It does not apply to exchanges of CFC stock, or transactions that are treated as such, on which gain is not immediately recognized. Thus, if such stock can be exchanged tax free for either stock in a domestic corporation pursuant to a reorganization, or for the CFC's assets in a tax-free liquidation, section 1248 will not apply and ordinary income treatment of the gain could be permanently avoided. Under present conditions, such avoidance of ordinary income treatment is prevented by application of section 367.

However, the recommendations described below will insure eventual ordinary income treatment of such gain, consistent with the Revenue Act of 1962, but without the disruptive consequences of section 367, as presently applied. At the same time, the Council's recommendations will continue to permit the readjustment of corporate structures pursuant to Subchapter C as are required by business exigencies and which effect only a readjustment of continuing interest in property under modified corporate form.

Recommendations

1. Section 1248(a) should be amended to apply to section 332 to impose an immediate section 1248 tax on the gain arising from the liquidation of a foreign corporation into a domestic corporation attributable to earnings and profits accumulated after taxable years beginning December 31, 1962. However, corporations which are organized in or under the laws of a U.S. possession and which meet the requirements of section 957(c), or would have met such requirements if the Revenue Act of 1962 had been in effect, should continue to be permitted to liquidate tax free under section 332, without application of section 1248 thereto amended as suggested herein.

2. Section 1248 should be amended to cover situations where the United States shareholder of a CFC (either individual or corporate) receives stock in a domestic corporation:

   (a) solely in exchange for stock in the CFC which is tax free under section 354, pursuant to a "B" reorganization, or

   (b) in exchange for stock of the CFC which is tax free under sections 354, 355, or 361, pursuant to a "C", "D" or "F" reorganization or a section 355 distribution which is treated as an exchange to provide that the stock received in the domestic corporation will become tainted with the amount of the section 1248 liability which would have been due had the stock in the CFC been sold or exchanged in a transaction governed by section 1248(a)(1).

Such taint would survive other lifetime tax free exchanges of such tainted stock by the holder of such stock or his donees.

Explanation

Assuming the repeal of section 367 as suggested herein, section 1248 could be avoided where stock in a CFO is exchanged by a U.S. person in the situations which are the subject of recommendations 1 and 2 above since section 1248 is not applicable. See Regulation section 1. 1248–1(c). Thus, such a U.S. person can sell stock in the domestic corporation received in the tax free exchange at capital gains rates and moreover if the U.S. person is a domestic corporation it can take a dividends received deduction under section 243.

FOREIGN TO FOREIGN TRANSFERS

Where substantially all the assets of a CFC are acquired by another CFC in amalgamations described in section 332 (tax free liquidations), or section 368 (a)(1)(C) or (D) but only if section 354 applies (the acquisition of substantially all the assets of one corporation by another corporation), or (F) (reincorporation), the earnings and profits of the acquired corporation will carry over pursuant to section 381(a) and (c)(2). Similarly, in divisive reorganizations under section 368(a)(1)(D) a portion of the earnings and profits will carry over and be allocated to the separated business pursuant to Regulation section 1.312–10(a).

Regulation section 1.1248–1(a)(1) provides that upon a taxable sale or exchange of stock in a controlled foreign corporation gain shall be included as a dividend to the extent of the earnings and profits attributable to such stock:

"* * * during the period or periods such stock was held (or was considered as held by reason of the application of section 1223) by such person [disposing of such stock] while such corporation was a controlled foreign corporation."

In the foregoing asset acquisitions, the holding period of the acquiring corporation with respect to the acquired assets would be governed under section 1223(2). The earnings and profits of the acquired CFC carry over to the acquiring corporation under section 381(a) and Regulation section 1.312–10 and presumably would be considered attributable to the stock of the acquiring corporation.

Where the CFC, the assets of which have been exchanged for stock in another corporation, is immediately liquidated by the U.S. shareholder, the revenues appear to be adequately protected. One, the amendment to section 1248 set forth above will apply with respect to any domesticating transfers of the stock of the acquiring corporation. Two, if the shareholder ultimately disposes of the stock in the acquiring corporation (CFC) in a taxable transaction, section 1248 could apply. Upon liquidation, the former shareholder of the acquired corporation will have a substituted basis under section 358 and therefore a substituted holding period under section 1223(1) for the stock in the acquiring corporation. Thus, a portion of the post 1962 earnings and profits of the acquired corporation could be attributable to the stock in the acquiring corporation, if such corporation is a CFC and the stockholder owns 10 percent of such stock.

Where such CFC is not liquidated but remains in existence as a holding company, and its stock is thereafter sold, section 1248 could apply to both the earnings and profits which were carried over to the acquiring corporation pursuant to the above described asset amalgamations, as well as earnings and profits of the acquiring corporation earned subsequent to the date of acquisition. This could only occur under section 1248(c) which would attribute such earnings and profits to the stock of the holding corporation when sold or exchanged. Section 1248(c) would apply where the acquiring foreign corporation was a CFC but only if the stock interest in the acquiring corporation held by the holding company amounted to 10 percent of its outstanding voting power. Accordingly, section 1248(a)(1) could be avoided in foreign to foreign asset acquisitions where section 1248(c) did not apply, i.e., where the acquiring foreign corporation was not a CFC or where less than 10 percent of its stock is held by the holding company at the time of the sale of such company's stock.

There should be no problem where a CFC liquidates a lower tier subsidiary under section 332 since its earnings and profits carry over to the CFC. Other U.S. persons who own 20 percent or less of the lower tier subsidiary will be subject to section 1248 as it presently exists.

With respect to "B" reorganizations involving exchanges of stock in foreign corporations, both of which are CFC's, section 1248(a) amended as suggested herein will apply. If the acquiring corporation is not a CFC, section 1248 will be avoided upon the sale or exchange of such stock by the former shareholders of the acquired CFC.

Recommendations

1. Taint the stock of the acquired corporation (which remains as a holding company) whose assets were acquired by a foreign corporation in asset amalgamations described above, to insure that the section 1248 exposure of the stockholders of the acquired corporation up to the date of the exchange will be ultimately paid by them or their transferees upon a disposition of the acquired corporation's stock under section 1248(a) (amended as suggested above).
2. Taint the stock of the acquiring corporation where the acquired corporation is liquidated.
3. Where the U.S. shareholders in a CFC, including a CFC the stock of which has been tainted in recommendation 1 above, exchange substantially all of their stock for stock in another foreign corporation pursuant to a "B" reorganization, the taint provided in 2 above applies.

The taint suggested in recommendation 1 and 2 would apply regardless of whether the acquiring corporation is a CFC and/or the acquired corporation or its shareholders receive more than 10 percent of the stock in the acquiring corporation.

The taint suggested in recommendation 1, 2 and 3 above should be made broad enough to encompass preferred stock received in a recapitalization reorganization described in section 368(a)(1)(E), as well as in "C" or "D" reorganizations. This is because it would be possible in certain instances to receive preferred stock in "C", "D" or "E" reorgainzations which would not qualify as section 306 stock (because not the equivalent of the receipt of a) stock dividend within the meaning of section 306(c)(1)(B)(ii)) and would not be subject to section 1248 as presently written because, for example, the recipient no longer has 10 percent of the voting power in the CFC or where the attribution rules applicable to section 1248 do not apply.

EXPATRIATING TRANSFERS

The major concern with respect to expatriating transfers is in the section 351 area. Here present Treasury policy, as reflected in its administrative rulings, see Rev. Proc. 68-23, supra, exhibits a clear disregard of the overriding policy of subchapter C to facilitate the readjustment of continuing interests in property under modified corporate form. Such policy is neither warranted by the legislative history of section 367 nor necessary for the protection of the revenues.

At present, a tax must be paid as the price of obtaining a favorable section 367 ruling involving certain transactions where enumerated types of property are to be transferred under section 351 by a U.S. person to a foreign corporation. These arbitrary charges represent the Commissioner's unilateral judgment as to what is necessary to prevent a diversion of income from U.S. taxation. Such toll charges, imposed automatically on a transactional basis without consideration of whether a given section 351 transfer is "in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of Federal income taxes", are in open disregard of the plain wording of section 367. The Commissioner thus looks to arbitrarily defined transactions for purposes of presuming a principal purpose of tax avoidance, rather than examining the broad plan of which the transaction is but a part, as envisaged by section 367. Analysis of the legislative history accompanying section 367 leads to the conclusion that no arbirtary, automatic test was envisaged when that section was first enacted as section 112(k) of the Revenue Act of 1932.

Section 112(k) (as well as sections 901 to 904 of the Revenue Act of 1932, now sections 1491 through 1494) was primarily enacted to prevent the transfer of appreciated securities tax free to foreign corporations controlled by U.S. persons in order to avoid U.S. and foreign tax with respect to such appreciation on sale thereof. See H. Rept. No. 708, 72d Cong., 1st Sess., C.B. 1939-1 (Part 2), 471 which also indicated that the Courts probably would not hold the bold tax avoidance schemes contemplated in the report to be tax free. This prediction proved accurate, since shortly thereafter the landmark decision of Gregory V. Helvering 293 U.S. 465 (1935), was rendered along with the decision of Kaspare Cohn Co., Ltd. 35 B.T.A. 646 (1937). These cases, along with section 1491, provide ample authority for the Commissioner to attack schemes involving the use of close corporations to dispose of appreciated securities outside the U.S. by U.S. citizens in order to avoid U.S. income tax, which was one of the principal reasons for the enactment of section 367.

In addition, sections 61 and 269 are becoming increasingly important in combating tax avoidance and apply with equal force in the foreign area. Section 482, as implemented by the recently promulgated regulations thereunder, imposes detailed rules with respect to the conduct of ordinary business between related entities. Finally, the provisions of subpart F and section 1248 provide that income earned through the conduct of business abroad through foreign subsidiaries will be subject to ordinary income tax treatment in the U.S. either currently or when the investment in the foreign subsidiary is disposed of. The amendments to section 1248 suggested herein will insure this treatment.

Recognizing that the U.S. taxes income realized by a citizen or resident from all sources and cognizant of the various statutory and judicial safeguards which would insure that the U.S. obtain a fair measure of income tax generated from foreign operations, the Council has concluded that the automatic tollgate charges imposed under section 367 upon section 351 transfers by a domestic corporation to a foreign corporation are unnecessary and inconsistent with such regime of global taxation. Appendix A, attached hereto, sets forth some of existing statutory regulatory, and judicial precedent which afford adequate protection to the revenues upon expatriating section 351 transfers but which nonetheless do not operate automatically either in favor of Treasury or taxpayer.

The same considerations discussed above with respect to section 351, are equally applicable where assets in a domestic corporation are transferred to a foreign corporation pursuant to a "C", "D" or "F" reorganization.

The exchange of substantially all the stock of a domestic corporation by U.S. persons for voting stock in a foreign corporation, pursuant to a "B" reorganization, should not present substantial problems. As a general rule, the existing guidelines under section 37 assume that no tax avoidance purposes are present if shareholders in a domestic corporation do not obtain more than 50 percent of the voting power of the acquiring foreign corporation pursuant to a "B" reorganization. This assumption should remain valid. On the other hand where a U.S. shareholder gets more than 50 percent or more, the acquiring corporation will generally be a CFC. If section 1248 is amended as suggested herein the revenues will remain protected.

There is little chance under present law of the U.S. collecting a tax upon a liquidation of a domestic corporation by a foreign parent whether or not it obtains an advance section 367 ruling. The foreign parent will not be subject to U.S. tax on the income realized from the liquidation if, as is generally the case, it is not engaged in trade or business in the U.S., or if so engaged, the acquired assets (or the stock in the U.S. subsidiary) are not effectively connected therewith. Moreover, the foreign parent is not subject to U.S. withholding tax with respect to the liquidating distributions even if the income realized upon the liquidation is considered to be from U.S. sources since such income would not be fixed or determinable, annual or periodical income. Neither is the domestic corporation subject to U.S. tax upon liquidation because of section 336. See also Regulation section 1.336–1.

Appendix A. Application of Section 482 to Section 351

Present rule

The procedures for obtaining a favorable section 367 ruling from the Internal Revenue Service upon a transfer by a domestic to a foreign corporation otherwise qualifying under section 351 of the Internal Revenue Code are provided under section 3.02(1) of Revenue Procedure 68–23, I.R.B. 1968–22, 33, hereinafter referred to as the "Guidelines".

Section 3.02(1) of the Guidelines sets forth general and specific requirements for the issuance of a favorable section 367 ruling in connection with a section 351 transfer of property to a foreign corporation controlled by the transferor. In general the Guidelines contemplate that such property is to be devoted by the transferee to the active conduct of a trade or business abroad. It is further contemplated that such transferee will have need for a substantial investment in fixed assets in such business or will be engaged in the purchase and sale abroad of manufactured goods.

More specifically, section 3.02(1)(a) of the Guidelines provides that a favorable section 367 ruling will not be issued for an exchange described in section 351 of the Code where the property to be transferred to the foreign corporation is one of the following kinds of property:

(i) Inventory or property held for sale to customers or copyrights and similar property;

(ii) Accounts receivable, installment obligations, and similar property in respect of which income has been earned;

(iii) Stock or securities (except stock in a less developed country corporation transferred to a controlled less developed country corporation holding company and except for stock in a controlled foreign corporation transferred to another controlled foreign corporation incorporated in the same foreign country);

(iv) Property transferred for the principal purpose of sale or disposition by the transferee foreign corporation.

Section 3.02(1)(b) of the Guidelines provides that a favorable section 367 ruling generally will not be issued for an exchange described in section 351 where the property to be transferred to a foreign corporation is one of the following kinds of property:

(i) Property in respect of which the transferor is a lessor or licensor (except where the transferee foreign corporation is the lessee or licensee);

(ii) Property transferred for the purpose of licensing or leasing by the transferee foreign corporations;

(iii) United States patents, trade-marks and similar intangibles to be used in connection with (1) the conduct of a trade or business in the United States or (2) the manufacture in the United States or a foreign country of goods for sale or consumption in the United States;

(iv) Foreign patents, trade-marks and similar intangibles to be used in connection with the sale of goods manufactured in the United States.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, section 3.02(1)(d) of the Guidelines provides that a favorable section 367 ruling will be issued if other properties to be used in the active conduct of a trade or business of the foreign corporation are also transferred to the foreign corporation and the transferor includes in its gross income as a so-called tollgate charge, an appropriate amount to reflect realization of income or gain with respect to the transfer of properties which would not be afforded a favorable ruling.

It is evident that section 3.02(1) of the Guidelines is primarily directed at anticipatory arrangements for shifting income abroad which has been earned in whole or in part but not yet realized in a tax sense at the time of transfer.

Regulations.—The regulations under section 482 are expressly applicable to section 351 transfers. Regulation section 1.482–1(d)(5). Thus, the Commissioner may make an appropriate section 482 allocation with respect to a section 351 transfer of property of the type described in section 3.02(1) of the Guidelines where such transfer would result in the realization of income abroad which in fact had been earned in the U.S. However, under section 482, the Commissioner must establish that such allocation "is necessary in order to prevent evasion of taxes or clearly to reflect the income [of the domestic transferor corporation]."

Cases.—The case law surrounding the transfer of property pursuant to a section 351 exchange, of the type specified in section 3.02(1) of the Guidelines, affords adequate protection to the Commissioner, either directly or by way of analogy, in insuring that the income of transferor and transferee is clearly reflected. In the main, these cases permit the Commissioner to allocate income which has already been earned although unrealized at the time of the transfer in appropriate cases.

In Central Cuba Sugar Co., v. Commissioner 198 F2d 214 (2d Cir., 1952) cert. den. 344 U.S. 874 (1952), a parent transferred all of its growing crops to its subsidiary and attempted to claim the planting and growing expenses as a deduction and carry back the resulting loss. The court upheld the allocation of the deductions to the subsidiary in order to clearly reflect income. A similar result was reached in Francis L. Rooney 305 F2d 681 (9th Cir., 1962), aff'g. 189 F Supp 733 (D.C. Cal., 1961) where individual taxpayers transferred growing crops to a corporation in a section 351 type exchange and attempted to claim the expenses of growing such crops as a deduction on their individual returns.

In Standard Paving Co., v. Commissioner 190 F2d, 330 (10th Cir., 1951) a wholly owned subsidiary was liquidated tax free into its parent which received among other things long term construction contracts, the income from which was being reported on a completed contract basis. The court upheld the Commissioner's allocation to the subsidiary of that portion of the total profit received by the parent equal to the percentage of completion as of the date of liquidation. See also Jud Plumbing & Heating Co., v. Commissioner 153 F2d 681 (5th Cir. 1946).

A similar result was reached in Dillard-Waltermire, Inc., v. Campbell 255 F2d 433 (5th Cir., 1958) where a corporation engaged in drilling oil and gas wells and reporting income on the completed contract basis, sold some of such partially completed contracts to a partnership composed of its stockholders. The contracts were completed by the partnership which reported all the profit attributable thereto. The Commissioner's allocation of a portion of the profits equal to the percentage of the contract completed by the corporation was upheld.

In National Securities Corp. v. Commissioner 137 F2d 600 (3rd Cir., 1943) cert. den. 320 U.S. 794 (1943) a parent transferred high basis low value stock to its subsidiary which sold the stock and attempted to claim a loss. The Commissioner successfully allocated the deduction to the parent.

In U.S. v. Lynch, 192 F2d 718 (9th Cir., 1951) a corporation distributed a dividend in kind consisting of inventory which was subsequently sold by the corporation on behalf of its shareholders. The court upheld the Commissioner in disregarding the dividend distribution and attributing the sale to the corporation.

In the foregoing cases, the Commissioner invoked section 482 to insure that the taxpayer earning income would be taxed thereon. In addition it is possible for the Commissioner to allocate to the transferor income earned subsequent to the transfer of property where the transaction is lacking in bona fides.

In Ballentine Motor Co. 39 T.C. 348 (1962), aff'd. 321 F2d 796 (4th Cir. 1963), the businesses of profitable corporations were shifted to a related loss corporation by way of sale of inventories to the loss corporation at fair value, a transfer without consideration of the profit corporation's facilities, and a transfer of employees. The transferee corporation operated the transferred businesses long enough to absorb its operating loss and thereafter transferred such assets to another related entity. In upholding the Commissioner's allocation of income to taxpayer pursuant to section 482 and 601, the court stated:

"We therefore hold that when, as here, assets from which income is expected are transferred from one business to another business (both controlled by the same interests) and the primary object of the transfer is tax evasion by the shifting of anticipated profits, as it was here, that section 482 is not rendered inapplicable merely because the profits to be shifted have not yet been realized."

Ballentine is important in that the Commissioner allocated income earned subsequent to the transfer. Significantly however, the Commissioner would have to establish a lack of business purpose in the Ballentine situation before an allocation and a tax exacted. An automatic tollgate change such as now imposed would not suffice. See also T. Jack Foster T.C. Memo 1969-273 where a parent corporation transferred houses which it had constructed to its subsidiaries which immediately resold the properties to unrelated parties, reporting the income against their net operating losses. The Commissioner's allocation of the gain back of the parent transferor was upheld.

Summary and conclusion

Under section 482, the existing regulations and applicable case law, the Commissioner asserts authority to make appropriate allocations under section 482 with respect to transfers of property specified under section 3.02(1) of the Guidelines. However, contrary to the existing arbitrary practice under the Guidelines, taxpayer will be able to establish after the fact that the transfer does not have as its principal purpose the avoidance of Federal income tax and that income is clearly reflected.

1. Income realized on the subsequent sale by the transferee of section 1221(1) property (inventory and property held for sale to customers), section 1221(3) property (copyrights), stock or securities, may be allocated to the transferor. Ballentine Motor Co.; T. J. Foster; Central Cuba Sugar Co. v. Commissioner.

2. Income realized and attributable to transferred accounts receivable or installment obligations, or income from property in respect of which the transferor is a lessor or licensor, may be allocated to the transferor. Standard Paving Co. v. Commissioner; Jud Plumbing & Heating Co. v. Commissioner; Dillard-Waltermire, Inc. v. Campbell.

3. Income realized attributable to property transferred under circumstances which make it reasonable to believe that the property transferred will be licensed or leased by the transferee or that its sale or other disposition by the transferee is one of the principal purposes or intangibles described in sections 3.02(1)(b)(iii) and (iv), may be allocated to the transferor. U.S. v. Lynch.

NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE COUNCIL, INC.,
New York, N.Y., October 15, 1969.

Hon. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Committee on Finance,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LONG: The Council appeared before the Senate Finance Committee on October 3rd to present testimony with respect to H.R. 13270. Among other things, the Council recommended that section 452 of the Bill not be enacted.

Inasmuch as the Treasury Department's conclusion that it would be proper to apply section 452 to the foreign area was not reached until the closing days of the Hearings on Tax Reform, the Council did not have adequate time to respond thereto. Accordingly, the National Foreign Trade Council encloses herewith a technical memorandum in support of its recommendation with respect to section 452 of the Bill.

The Council respectfully requests that this statement be made a part of the Hearings on Tax Reform.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT T. SCOTT, Vice President.

ADDITIONAL COMMENTS OF THE NATIONAL FOREIGN TRADE COUNCIL WITH RESPECT TO SECTION 452 OF H.R. 13270 IN SUPPORT OF ITS MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED TO THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF THE U.S. SENATE

In its Statement presented to the Finance Committee on October 3, 1969, in connection with the Hearings on The Tax Reform Act of 1969—H.R. 13270, the Council recommended that section 452 of the Bill not be enacted. In no event should it be made applicable to the foreign area. Section 452, which would add back to earnings and profits the excess of accelerated depreciation over straight line depreciation, ostensibly is directed at problems arising from the receipt of so-called "tax-free" dividends from regulated public utilities and/or real estate corporations.

Problem

In the Technical Memorandum of Treasury Position submitted to the Committee on Finance on September 30, 1969, the Treasury Department has concluded that it would be proper to apply section 452 to the foreign area. This unsupported conclusion was not reached until the closing days of the Hearings on Tax Reform. As a result, the Council did not have adequate time to respond thereto.

Extension of section 452 as proposed by the Treasury Department, represents an over reaction to a problem that does not exist in the foreign area. A poll of a representative cross section of the Council's Tax Committee indicates that the receipt of "tax-free" dividends from foreign operations is extremely rare and should not present problems for Treasury. However, as indicated below, extension of section 452 to the foreign area would discriminate against and create complex and serious problems for those U.S. taxpayers doing business abroad through a foreign subsidiary, which in many cases is required under local law.

Accordingly, the Council reiterates its recommendation with respect to section 452 of H.R. 13270, made at the Hearings on Tax Reform.

Dilutes foreign tax credit

Application of section 452 of the Bill to the foreign area would increase the effective tax rate on foreign operations by diluting the effect of the deemed paid foreign tax credit for foreign taxes actually paid and otherwise considered creditable under section 902 of the Code.

Under section 902, a domestic corporation upon receipt of a dividend from a 10 percent or more owned foreign corporation is deemed to have paid that proportion of the taxes paid or deemed to be paid by the foreign subsidiary to any foreign country or U.S. possession on or with respect to the accumulated profits out of which such dividends were paid.

Enactment of section 452 in its present form, which would add back to earnings and profits of foreign subsidiaries the excess of accelerated depreciation over straight-line depreciation allowed under the tax laws of the foreign country, would increase the earnings of foreign subsidiaries for purposes of calculating the deemed paid tax credit under section 902 of the Code, thereby decreasing the allowable foreign tax credit. As set forth in Table No. 1, below, the enactment of section 452 will increase the effective tax rate on foreign operations, but only where such operations are carried on through a foreign subsidiary. Further, such disallowed foreign tax credits representing otherwise creditable foreign taxes actually paid, as a practical matter, will probably never subsequently be available as credits against U.S. tax.

The deemed paid foreign tax credit under section 902 of the Code is designed to afford relief from international double taxation for those U.S. corporations operating abroad through a foreign subsidiary which is similar to that obtained by U.S. corporations operating abroad directly through a branch of a U.S. corporation. In both instances, the U.S. revenues are protected since credit for foreign tax may only be taken against U.S. tax attributable to foreign source business income. Credit may not be taken against U.S. tax attributable to U.S. source business income.

The mere fact that additional tax dollars may be obtained by curtailing foreign tax credits through the operation of section 452 of the Bill, which was never designed to apply to international operations, does not seem reasonable. Rather, such result is ill conceived and should be rejected.

Would eventually reduce U.S. tax revenues

Under existing law, Treasury receives a benefit where foreign subsidiaries of U.S. corporations claim accelerated depreciation for foreign tax purposes. As a result, foreign taxes are decreased, resulting in a smaller foreign tax credit claimed, thereby increasing U.S. tax revenues on dividend distributions.

However, it should be recognized that if the U.S. were to deny the benefits of claiming accelerated depreciation granted to foreign subsidiaries, by the local foreign government, it could be expected that such government would promptly eliminate such tax benefits by changes in their tax laws and thus sponge up any tax saving which would accrue, not to the taxpayer, but to the U.S. Treasury. As a conseqeunce, foreign tax payments and the foreign tax credit could be expected to increase, and no additional taxes would be paid to the U.S. The net effect would be a reduction of profits available for paying dividends to U.S. stockholders in an amount equal to the additional foreign taxes collected, and result in a reduction in U.S. tax revenue.

Complexity

In addition to increasing the tax cost of foreign operations, section 452 would vastly increase the complexity of operating abroad through a foreign subsidiary inasmuch as all overseas depreciable assets would have to be restated to a straight line basis in computing the indirect foreign tax credit as well as for other purposes discussed below. This will raise another difficulty in explaining U.S. tax provisions to foreign personnel. Moreover, it can be expected that in those cases where a substantial minority position in a foreign subsidiary is held by foreigners, compliance with the rule of section 452 will be actively resisted.

Treaty considerations

It is doubtful that U.S. treaty partners in negotiating income tax treaties ever contemplated that the "appropriate amount" of foreign tax paid, granted as a credit against U.S. tax under the treaty, would be diluted to the extent contemplated by section 452. Therefore enactment of section 452 would violate the spirit, if not the letter of income tax treaties to which the U.S. is a party.

Illustration

The inequities and resultant distortions of the existing foreign tax credit provisions which would be created by enactment of section 452 of the Bill can be illustrated by a simple example. Table No. 1, set forth below, compares the tax effects on a U.S. corporation of carrying on the identical manufacturing operations in the U.S. and in a developed foreign country through a branch and wholly-owned foreign subsidiary under existing law and under proposed section 452. It is assumed that both the U.S. and foreign tax rates are 50 percent, that both the U.S. and the foreign country permit the use of accelerated depreciation in calculating taxable income, that the foreign subsidiary is in a capital intensive industry, and the excess of accelerated depreciation over straight line depreciation amounts to $900.

TABLE NO. 1.—COMPARISON OF EFFECT OF PRESENT LAW WITH APPLICATION OF SEC. 452 TO FOREIGN OPERATIONS

	Present U.S. law			Proposed sec. 452: Foreign subsidiary
	Direct U.S. operation	Foreign branch	Foreign subsidiary
Income	$100	$100	$100	$100
Foreign tax at 50 percent		50	50	50
Net income		50	50	50
Dividend to U.S. parent			50	50
Income		100	100	100
Adjustment for accelerated depreciation				900
Less foreign tax		50	50	50
Accumulated earnings and profits		50	50	950
U.S. taxable income (dividends grossed up)	100	100	100	52.63
U.S. tax at 50 percent	50	50	50	26.32
Credit for foreign tax [1]	0	50	[2] 50	[3] 2.63
Net U.S. tax	50	0	0	23.69
Total U.S. and foreign tax	50	50	50	73.70
Effective tax rate (percent)	50	50	50	73.7

[1] Dividend/accumulated profits times foreign tax.
[2] $50/$50×$50=$50.
[3] $50/$950×$50=$2.63.

Note: The remainder of the otherwise creditable foreign taxes actually paid, $47.37, ($50 —$2.63) as a practical matter, will not be utilized.

Discussion

Table No. 1 clearly shows that application of section 452 to the foreign area would grossly discriminate against those U.S. taxpayers doing business abroad through a foreign subsidiary rather than a branch. It is therefore difficult to appreciate how Treasury has concluded that such results are proper.

Increasing the effective tax rate on the foreign subsidiary's operations from 50 percent to 73.7 percent increases the tax cost of doing business abroad. Application of section 452 of the Bill would permit utilization as a credit against U.S. tax of only $2.63 out of the $50 of foreign taxes actually paid and otherwise considered creditable. Thus, foreign tax credits in the amount of $47.37 will, for all practical purposes, be permanently lost. These results certainly do not seem reasonable and proper. This is particularly true when there does not appear to be any abuse in the foreign area resulting from the receipt of "tax-free" dividends.

Locked in effect.—Many U.S. corporations have either choosen or were required to do business through a foreign subsidiary. Despite the adverse effects of operating under section 452 through a foreign subsidiary this section may preclude such U.S. corporations from changing their method of operation. The U.S. parent could not avoid the inequities illustrated in Table No. 1 by liquidating its wholly-owned foreign subsidiary tax-free, and thereby continuing operations in branch form. Such a tax-free liquidation would require a favorable section 367 ruling, and as a condition thereto, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue requires that accumulated earnings and profits for all taxable years be considered distributed as a dividend, thus bringing into play and magnifying the results discussed above.

If the U.S. corporation owned less than 80 percent of the foreign subsidiary, and desired to effect a taxable liquidation in order to resume operations in branch form, section 1248 of the Code would require that the gain recognized be included as a dividend to the extent of earnings accumulated after December 31, 1962. Under section 452 such earnings would be increased to include the excess of accelerated depreciation over straight line depreciation.

If, because of section 452 of the Bill, the U.S. parent decided to sell the stock in the foreign corporation, section 1248 would apply in the manner described above.

Section 963.—Section 452 of the Bill would also vitiate the relief provided by the minimum distribution provisions of section 963 of the Code. Section 963, added to the Revenue Act of 1962 by this Committee, provides that subpart F income need not be included in gross income if taxpayer elects to receive a minimum distribution, the amount of which varies inversely with the effective foreign tax rate.

In the illustration presented, the foreign subsidiary's effective foreign tax rate under existing law is 50 percent ($50/$100) requiring a zero minimum distribution. Under section 452, the effective foreign tax rate would become 5 percent ($50/$1000) requiring a minimum distribution of 90 percent of earnings and profits. However, such earnings and profits would not be the actual after tax profits of $50, but rather would represent phantom profits of $950. Apparently, a distribution of $855 would be required in order to satisfy a first tier minimum distribution if section 452 were enacted and made applicable to the foreign area.

Inclusion of the subsidiary in a chain or group election for minimum distribution purposes would produce similar results with a corresponding elimination of the relief provided by Congress from the operation of subpart F.

Senator TALMADGE. Next and I believe the last witness for today is Mr. William J. Nolan, Jr., who is chairman of the Committee on Taxation, U.S. Council of the International Chamber of Commerce, Inc.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM J. NOLAN, JR., CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON TAXATION, U.S. COUNCIL OF THE INTERNATIONAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, INC.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, my name is William J. Nolan, Jr.

Senator TALMADGE. As you know, Mr. Nolan, your statement is inserted in full in the record, and if you will summarize it, please.

Mr. NOLAN. This will be brief. I am director of taxes of American Metal Climax, Inc., and I am appearing today as chairman of the Committee on Taxation of the U.S. Council of the International Chamber of Commerce.

The U.S. council represents American business interests within the International Chamber, which in turn represents the international business community in some 75 countries.

Our committee on taxation has had the privilege of presenting its views on tax matters to the committees of Congress on many occasions, and we particularly appreciate the opportunity to appear today. Others before me have testified in detail on points made in my formal statement, and I shall not waste the committee's time by rearguing them. However, there are some general points which I should like to make briefly.

The U.S. council—and for that matter the International Chamber—have long advocated that, in order to avoid the evils of double taxation, income should be solely taxed in the jurisdiction where produced. We believe that the present system under which the United States asserts ultimate jurisdiction over income earned abroad by American companies is not the appropriate basis for taxation, even with the foreign tax credit as an effort to avoid the evils of double taxation.

The U.S. council believes the whole subject of tax policy in respect to foreign income is urgently in need of reexamination by the appropriate committees of Congress, and we are pleased to learn from

Assistant Secretaray Cohen's statement before your committee on September 4 that the Treasury is currently making an overall review of the U.S. tax policy in respect of foreign source income, and that its comprehensive proposals will be presented to Congress.

That being the case, we question the need for or desirability of making changes at this time in the specific areas encompassed by sections 431 and 432 of the tax reform bill. Specific amendments inevitably take the form of patchwork in an already heavily patched tax law, and I might say an unbelievably complicated one which would be further complicated by the House version of H.R. 13270.

The objections to section 431 of the House bill have been ably stated heretofore and we concur in those objections. Section 431 could well cause double taxation of income and thereby injure the status of American business abroad.

Section 432 is objectionable on the basic ground that it would discriminate against particular industries. Such discrimination would undoubtedly favor foreign competition over U.S. interests in the very necessary efforts being made to assure our domestic economy of an adequate supply of basic minerals.

We do not believe that equity is to be achieved by fragmentizing or compartmentalizing various types of foreign income. However, if the Committee on Finance decides to propose legislation affecting foreign source income, the U.S. Council urges for consideration legislation in the following additional areas:

One. An extension of the foreign tax credit to "third tier" foreign corporations. Presently it only goes to the first two tiers of foreign corporations.

Two. A broadened definition of what foreign taxes may be creditable where a foreign jurisdiction does not rely to the same extent as the United States on an income tax as a major source of tax revenue.

Three. Restraint by the United States in taxing foreign income where the foreign jurisdiction has authorized exemption from tax or has reduced the tax liability in order to encourage foreign investment. In other words, a recognition of "tax sparing."

Four. An adjustment in the foreign tax credit computation to prevent distortions in the case of abnormal losses.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you very much, Mr. Nolan, for your very fine statement.

Senator Williams, do you have any questions?

(No response.)

Mr. NOLAN. Thank you.

(Mr. Nolan's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM J. NOLAN, JR., CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON TAXATION, U.S. COUNCIL OF THE INTERNATIONAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

SUMMARY

1. The U.S. Council believes that there should be a full scale review of what the tax policy of the United States should be with regard to international activities of U.S. corporations. The great expansion of international investment since the end of World War II compels this review.

2. The U.S. Council believes that taxation of income should be based on the premise that the jurisdiction where the income is produced has the exclusive right of taxation.

3. Pending that reexamination of policy and in light of the Treasury's announcement that it will be making recommendations to Congress on "comprehensive proposals relating to the U.S. taxation of foreign source income," the U.S. Council urges that at this time there be deferred any legislation in the foreign tax area.

4. The proposals contained in Sections 431 and 432 of H.R. 13270 (and the Treasury recommendations for their revision) are injurious to foreign business and will hamper the development of foreign resources by U.S. nationals to the long-run detriment of the U.S. economy.

5. The U.S. Council strongly protests against the singling out of a particular industry for restrictive tax legislation with respect to its foreign income. We do not believe that if foreign income is to be taxed by the United States, it should be treated, for purposes of depletion or otherwise, differently than similar domestic income.

6. If the Committee on Finance decides to propose legislation affecting foreign source income, the U.S. Council urges for consideration legislation in the following additional areas:

(a) An extension of the deemed foreign tax credit to "third tier" foreign corporations;

(b) A broadened definition of what foreign taxes may be creditable where a foreign jurisdiction does not rely to the same extent as the United States on an income tax as the major source of tax revenue;

(c) Restraint by the United States in taxing foreign income where the foreign jurisdiction has authorized exemption from tax or reduced the tax liability in order to encourage foreign investment—in other words, a recognition of "tax sparing";

(d) An adjustment in the foreign tax credit computation to prevent distortions in the case of abnormal losses;

(e) The elimination of the advance ruling requirements under Section 367 of the Internal Revenue Code for transactions involving foreign corporations;

(f) A tolling of the one-year period under Section 1034 of the Code (relating to the deferral of the taxation of gain because of the reinvestment of proceeds from the sale of the taxpayer's principal residence) while the taxpayer is resident abroad on assignment by his employer.

STATEMENT

My name is William J. Nolan, Jr., and I am appearing today as Chairman of the Committee on Taxation of the United States Council of the International Chamber of Commerce. The U.S. Council represents American business interests within the International Chamber, which in turn represents the international business community in some 75 countries. As some of you may recall, our Committee on Taxation has had the privilege of presenting its views on tax matters to the Commitees of the Congress on many occasions.

Our Committee has had a series of meetings and has discussed at length the revision of the Internal Revenue Code proposed to be made by Sections 431 and 432 of H.R 13270. We do have some specific things to say about these proposals which I will turn to very shortly. But first I would like to say that we feel strongly that the proposed changes raise policy issues concerning what the Government's basic approach to the international activities of U.S. companies ought to be. In examining the proposals, we found ourselves continually returning to the question of whether the effect would be to carry our tax policy in a direction generally consonant with the new and rapidly growing importance of our international investment and production.

Inevitably specific proposals take the form of patchwork on an already heavily patched tax instrument. This is inevitable in the amendment process as experience with given taxes indicates the need for change, but at some point we are inhibited by a sense of diminishing returns and find ourselves faced with the impossible task of trying to create a new approach by modifying an old one.

My Committee's most significant reaction to the proposed changes, is, then, that they are modifications in a foreign tax program which itself is in serious need of reappraisal. In this connection we are most pleased that in his statement before this Committee on September 4, Assistant Secretary Cohen has indicated that an over-all review of foreign tax policy is being made by the Treasury. It goes without saying that the Council's Committee would like to make its experience and expertise available in any way that it is felt would be helpful in this constructive review.

The present system of foreign tax offset in its very nature implies the continued exercise of primary tax jurisdiction by the country where production takes place. This prior right has long been recognized in U.S. tax policy on the grounds that it is the host country that provides the infrastructural services and the political and social framework. But under the present system the ultimate and perhaps he crucially important tax jurisdiction is exercised by the parent company's country. In the typical instance this means that this latter country decides such important issues as the desirable level of total taxation. This decision clearly has a very important bearing on the competitive position of our producing activities abroad. Furthermore, the parent company's country, in exercising these important responsibilities, is motivated by considerations that almost certainly are tangential to the question of the growth and competitive strength of these activities. The present approach to the taxation of our foreign-based business treats the income very much like a windfall profit unaffected by the character of the tax, whether or not the effect of the policy is detrimental to the growth of such income. It should be noted in contrast that this last consideration—the integrity and growth of income—is the key consideration in our domestic tax philosophy.

In the pre-World War II period international production tended to be so limited that its relevance to national economic policy was small. But since the Second World War there has been an enormous growth of international production—10% a year on the average since 1950 for a five-fold increase. This is an expansion far more rapid than the 4 and 5 percent GNP rates familiar in national growth, as fast even as the so-called "miracle" growth rates reached in some years in Germany, Italy, and Japan.

In fact foreign business activity is no longer merely a peripheral activity of American business, nor one raising only incidental problems of taxation. In our close following of the trends of internationalized production at the U.S. Council we now work with a figure of estimated U.S. production abroad of $200 billion, and foreign production in this country estimated at $90 billion. Just to emphasize the order of magnitude here, we are talking about goods and services that compare with the size of the Japanese and German economies combined.

Internationalized production is clearly and by far the most important link between this country and world markets and is the principal means through which we exert an upward influence on world income. It has only started to be recognized that these producing activities are five times more important than exports as a means by which we reach foreign markets. Looking ahead a little, it is clear from the vigor of international enterprise that somewhat more than half the production of the world will be internationalized in the next 15 years or so.

Internationalized production has been brought to its present impressive importance through international investment that has taken place since the end of World War II. The United States has taken the lead in these trends, which clearly have had a transforming influence on the structure and productivity of world economic activity.

U.S. participation in international production typically involves a melding of U.S. capital and management with the management, capital, resources and labor of the foreign country, with foreign imputs ordinarily far in excess of US. ones. The result of this melding of productive contributions has been a better international allocation of resources, a dynamic growth of production worldwide, and a glimpse of the beginnings of a world economy. Fundamental tax policy questions that could be reasonably put off at earlier stages of growth must now be faced directly, because tax policy directly affects the productivity of resources.

With this in mind it is our belief, and that of the worldwide International Chamber of Commerce, that tax jurisdiction ought to be exclusively in the hands of the authorities that prevail where the production is taking place. The present system under which the U.S. asserts ultimate jurisdiction over income earned abroad by American companies is subject to at least two sweeping objections. It disregards the effect of taxation on desirable allocation of resources from a production standpoint and, beyond this, it is almost unmanageably complex.

In the long run United States tax revenues are bound to increase even though confined to income produced within its geographic jurisdiction. This is a necessary consequence of the higher production resulting from a better international allocation of resources, through which process U.S. resources are more efficiently utilized in adaptation to the broader world market. The American experience in the last decade seems to be a dramatic confirmation of the advantages in terms of production that accrue to this country as it has in fact geared its production to a worldwide basis. No one who has studied the experience of the growing number of the country's international companies would question the dramatic upward thrust that "going international" has imparted to domestic as well as overall operations. A company with coordinated producing bases distributed throughout world markets increases not only its total production but also the productivity of each of the bases. These advantages appear in the realistic form of lower costs and higher yields—one might add, higher taxable yields. International differentials in after-tax income should be accepted as being the primary guides to the flow of resources into their most productive uses in exactly the same way that after-tax differentials within the domestic jurisdiction operate.

In preparing our specific comments we have tried as far as possible to apply these international perspectives which we believe should underlie the taxation of international production now and in the future. At the same time we recognize in our review that the questions at hand would not actually arise if the United States were operating under the basic policy here recommended, namely that tax authority be exercised only with respect to income produced within the national borders of the sovereign authority. Pending this move nations imposing taxes on income earned outside their jurisdiction should seek to minimize any negative effect on the competitive strength of these producing activities abroad and in general should weigh questions of tax policy with explicit, deliberate regard for its international implications.

We question the need for, or the desirability of, making changes at this time in the specific areas encompassed by the proposals contained in Section 431 and 432 of the Tax Reform Bill when the Treasury Department has underway the development of "comprehensive proposals relating to the U.S. taxation of foreign source income" which it has announced it will present to Congress. Our Committee suggests that further patchwork in the area of the taxation of foreign income is inadvisable and may even be pointless when viewed in the light of the decisions which will flow from the Treasury's comprehensive recommendations.

However, if this Committee determines that there is need to legislate in the foreign tax area at this time, we desire to put before it our views as to the inadvisability of the adoption of the provisions presently incorporated in the House bill at Section 431 and 432 and the suggestion as to other items which should be considered for action.

Section 431—Per-country limitation

Section 431 of H.R. 13270 provides that where a taxpayer has elected the per-country limitation for foreign tax credit computations, he must carry forward losses incurred in a foreign country and use them to reduce income from that country in subsequent years before computing the limitation of the foreign tax credit to be allowed for income taxes paid to such country. The theory for this unusual proposal as expressed in the House Ways and Means Committee Report is that under present law the taxpayer receives a double tax benefit under such circumstances.

We believe that the Ways and Means Committee was mistaken in its view that a double tax benefit exists. That view must have been premised on the belief that foreign countries ordinarily do not allow loss carrybacks or carryforwards for purposes of computing income taxes. That is plainly erroneous for many countries allow losses to be offset against future income. Moreover, the taxpayer certainly receives no double tax benefit even if the foreign host country does not allow losses to be carried back or forward. He is paying full taxes and under the theory of Section 431 he would be additionally penalized—for there would be a doubling up on his aggregate tax bill.

The Treasury's proposal that the provisions of Section 431 be expanded so as to be applicable to a taxpayer on the overall limitation who has an overall foreign loss could well result in double taxation. First, taxes paid on income in Country A would not be creditable where losses in Country B offset that income. This is the case under present law. Then, under the loss reception rule of Section 431 when the operation in Country B became profitable, foreign taxes otherwise creditable will be reduced.

Section 432—Separate limitation for mineral income

Section 432 of the House bill (which the Treasury has recommended to this Committee be substantially altered) would apply a separate limitation on the foreign tax credit with respect to foreign taxes attributable to foreign mineral income. The theory underlying the limitation, as expressed in the report of the Ways and Means Committee, is to isolate cases where "income taxes represent, at least in part, royalties." The three tests are whether the foreign country:

(1) requires payment of a bonus or royalty,

(2) holds substantial mineral rights with respect to the property, or

(3) imposes any income taxes on mineral income at an effective rate higher than on other income.

We do not believe that the above three tests represent a valid basis for a conclusive statutory presumption that certain income taxes actually represent royalties. The fact that a royalty is paid to a foreign government is a strange basis for holding that income taxes paid to that government also contain a royalty element. But even assuming the validity of the tests, we question the desirability of fragmenting foreign income for the purpose of computing the foreign tax credit limitations.

We do not believe that it is proper tax policy to impose a separate limitation on certain items of income or on particular industries and thereby discriminate against a business activity.

Not only is a separate mineral income limitation discriminatory but it runs contrary to United States policy aimed at furthering the economic and social development of the less developed countries of the world. Further, such discrimination will undoubtedly favor foreign competition over United States interests in the very necessary efforts being made to assure our domestic economy of an adequate supply of basic minerals.

The Treasury has recognized before this Committee the discriminatory aspects of Section 432 of the House bill in treating mineral companies in a different fashion from all other U.S. taxpayers with foreign operations. The recommendation of the Treasury that, in lieu of the complex and unfair provisions of 432, there be substituted a provision denying the averaging of foreign tax credits where excess credits from one country arise out of the allowance for percentage depletion. While my Committee feels that the Treasury proposal is far better than the House provision, nevertheless we view that restriction as being contrary to the often proclaimed theory of tax neutrality as between United States investments and foreign investments.

The Treasury proposal would clearly discriminate against foreign mining opportunities.

That Treasury proposal is substantially similar to one presented to Congress in 1963 and rejected. The U.S. Council does not endorse the proposition that foreign source income should be penalized. For this reason, among others, my Committee opposes the provision of Section 501 of the House bill which would deny percentage depletion to income from certain foreign oil and gas wells. The U.S. Council is pleased to note that the Treasury also felt this discrimination to be unfair. Different rates for depletion on domestic income and foreign income are by nature an unfair discrimination.

For reasons fully explained earlier, the U.S. Council strongly urges that revisions in the area of taxation of foreign source income be deferred until the Treasury has presented its recommendations based upon its current full scale study. Otherwise changes made now may prove to have been unwise on an overall review of taxation and, even worse, will lead to additional complexities under an already complex system for the tax treatment of foreign source income.

Other areas involving taxation of foreign income recommended for legislation

If the Committee on Finance concludes that legislation is desirable at this time in the area of the taxation of foreign income, then the U.S. Council desires to recommend for consideration certain additional matters which we feel are deserving of prompt legislative attention and action.

Third tier foreign corporation

The U.S. Council urges that there be a broadening of the limitations of Section 902 so as to extend the foreign tax credit under certain circumstances to a third tier foreign corporation. In the last few years several bills have been introduced to accomplish this purpose. Under the present statutory provision, credit for taxes paid by a foreign corporation can only be had if (a) at least 10% of the stock of the first tier corporation is owned by the U.S. taxpayer and (b) in the case of a subsidiary of such first tier corporation, at least 50% of the stock of the subsidiary is owned by the first tier corporation.

In the past, there apparently has been some feeling on the part of Treasury that the extension to a third tier foreign corporation made the auditing problem too great. This cannot now be a valid objection. First, with the additional reporting requirements adopted over the past several years, there is ample information available to the Internal Revenue Service to check out thoroughly any claims for foreign tax credit. And second but most important, a credit is not available unless proved. If the taxpayer is not in a position to support his claim, then he has no credit!

In some foreign jurisdictions an alien may not hold more than a minority interest. Recent developments have clearly indicated a determination on the part of foreign governments that they or their nationals must own a majority stock interest in corporations engaged in business in their jurisdictions. A maintenance of the ownership formula under Section 902 at 10% by the U.S. corporation in the first tier foreign corporation but a change to a 25% interest (now 50%) by that first tier foreign corporation in the second tier foreign corporation and the extension of the benefits of a credit to dividends received from a third tier foreign corporation owned at least 25% by the second tier foregn corporation would greatly help U.S. business in organizing its affairs in foreign lands. In addition, it is our thought that such revision of the statute could lead to a broadening of foreign participation in those operations.

In addition to the above, the U.S. Council recommends a change in the statute to allow a foreign tax credit where related parties—say U.S. parent and U.S. subsidiary—own between them the requisite percentage ownership of a foreign corporation although neither one holds 10% in its own name. Obviously, the information on verification of any credit claims is just as available in this situation as it would be if either one of the U.S. corporations owned the 10% directly.

It is our belief that these changes would not cause any loss of revenue but would very dramatically ease the problems of foreign corporate organization for overseas operations of U.S. corporations.

Broaden definition of "tax" for which credit is given

Section 903 now permits a credit for any foreign tax paid "in lieu of a tax on income." Although this provision was intended to be broad in scope when included in the 1942 Revenue Act, the Treasury regulations and administrative practise have so restricted it that an "in lieu tax" can only be creditable if (a) the foreign country has an income tax in force, (b) the taxpayer would be subject to such income tax absent some special provision and (c) he pays a substituted tax "in lieu" thereof.

This type of restriction permits no credit for taxes imposed by a foreign country which has not adopted the income concept of taxation even though such taxes are at least as burdensome as would be an income tax. The failure to grant a credit in this situation certainly does not further tax neutrality as between foreign and domestic income.

The U.S. Council recommends to your Committee that some form of credit be adopted in respect to a country's principal tax even though it is not an income tax. Under our concept of taxation—such a tax would clearly be in lieu of an income tax. The Treasury Department itself in 1954 recommended a broadening of the "in lieu" provision along this line and we hope its current study will bring similar recommendations for corrective legislation.

Tax sparing

The U.S. Council urges this Committee to reexamine the concept of "tax sparing." Much has been said of the irritation of less developed countries in attempting to induce investment by some form of tax benefit only to see such benefit gobbled up by the U.S. Treasury. If the foreign land—and let us assume we are only talking about less developed countries—wants to encourage investment by forgiving taxes, then why not recognize tax sparing? The other side of the coin is that without tax sparing or some equivalent restraint in taxation of foreign income, the foreign jurisdictions are faced with pushing their tax rates up to the U.S. level. Has anything been gained by them or by the United States in that type of action? Have we helped to develop the foreign country's economy? Moreover, if the United States does not recognize the concept of tax sparing, it is then penalizing its nationals in foreign operations against those of other countries with more realistic bents. One of the evils of Section 432 of the House bill is that it further encourages foreign countries to increase their tax rates and to do away with their own tax incentives. If the United States is going to nullify through its tax system, such advantages, the foreign jurisdictions will be quick to cancel out benefits being offered for U.S. investments.

Effect of worthless securities loss upon foreign tax credit limitation

Losses from the worthlessness of foreign stocks and securities (Section 165(g), IRC) during the taxable year affect the limitation of the allowable foreign tax credit in an arbitrary and capricious way to the disadvantage of many taxpayers. It is proposed that such losses be deemed to have a U.S. source in computing the limitation on allowable foreign tax credit (Section 904, IRC).

For example, assume that the foreign source income taxable to a corporate taxpayer in a year is $1,000,000 and assume that foreign income taxes paid and "deemed paid" on this income in various foreign countries aggregate $500,000 and the taxpayer has elected the "overall" limitation. Further assume that the U.S. tax rate is 50% so that the gross U.S. tax before foreign tax credit is $500,000 against which may be credited the $500,000 foreign income taxes paid and deemed paid. No U.S. tax is therefore payable on the taxpayer's foreign source income because the income has borne foreign income taxes at an effective overall rate equal to the U.S. rate.

Now let us assume that in a particular year the assets of a wholly-owned foreign subsidiary of the U.S. corporation are destroyed in an insurrection, and the taxpayer experiences a loss from the worthlessness of the stock of this foreign subsidiary which stock has a cost or other U.S. tax basis of $1,000,000. The loss reduces the U.S. corporate taxpayer's taxable income in the amount of $1,000,000. Under the present position of the Internal Revenue Service, however, the loss is deemed to be from a foreign source and thus reduces the numerator of the fraction limiting allowable foreign tax credits. In our example, the $500,000 of foreign income taxes paid is not creditable against U.S. income taxes in the year of loss and, if the taxpayer incurs foreign taxes at rates comparable to the U.S. rate in the two years available for "excess" foreign tax credit carryback and in the five years open to carryover, the $500,000 will never be allowed as a credit against U.S. taxes. The result is that in the year of worthlessness the taxpayer's overall income from operating abroad is zero (i.e. $1,000,000 less $1,000,000 loss from the worthlessness of stock), yet the taxpayer has paid $500,000 of foreign income tax which will never be allowable as a credit against U.S. taxes.

It is submitted that the proper result would be to consider the loss on the worthlessness of the stock or securities to be from U.S. source, thereby not decreasing the numerator of the foreign tax credit limiting fraction and allowing credit for the foreign tax paid or deemed paid in our example.

A loss on worthless stock or securities in a foreign corporation may be an infrequent item, but of severe consequence. For example, if a foreign subsidiary becomes worthless because of expropriation, insurrection, natural disaster, or simply because of business failure, the loss in the year of worthlessness may be sizeable. The Internal Revenue Code recognize this loss and allows a deduction (either capital or ordinary, Section 165(g), IRC). However, this deduction can be negated, as in our example, by denying the credit for foreign taxes paid in a manner we are confident was not contemplated by the Congress. We submit that it should be the aim of Congress to encourage investments abroad through full tax recognition of loss on the failure of such an investment. (Such losses are often in the developing countries where risk of loss is the greatest and where there have been frequent indications of Congressional intent to encourage investment.)

We believe the proposed change is particularly appropriate at this time because regulations of the Office of Foreign Direct Investment may require repatriations of income carrying foreign tax credits which would be limited by such losses. These regulations narrow any opportunity of the U.S. taxpayer to minimize the loss of foreign tax credit by suspending the payment of dividends in the year of loss, and this, in turn, has the effect of increasing the severity of the loss from a U.S. tax point of view without justification. Even if the Foreign Direct Investment Regulations are ultimately suspended, it would be in the best interest of the U.S. balance of payments to adopt the proposed change in computing the foreign tax credit limitation so as not to discourage repatriation of dividends from foreign sources.

Advance section 367 rulings

My Committee urges that there be some modification in the requirement that a ruling under Section 367 of the Internal Revenue Code must be secured in advance of the transaction involving foreign corporations if the non-recognition of gain provisions of the Code are to apply to such transaction. We suggest that if the particular transaction involving foreign corporations is determined on audit to meet those non-recognition provisions, then the fact that an advance ruling had not been secured should be immaterial to the tax treatment.

The kinds of tax abuse that Section 367 was intended to counter when enacted in 1932 are no longer present. Moreover, the Internal Revenue Service has used the advance ruling requirement as a club to force its views in areas where there exists considerable doubt. The time lag now faced by taxpayers in securing a ruling would also be avoided with the elimination of the "in advance" requirement. There is also the very real problem of a U.S. taxpayer even knowing about a transaction involving a foreign corporation in advance of its consummation much less in time to attempt to see that a ruling is requested. For these reasons we recommend the elimination of the "in advance" ruling requirement of Section 367 where it can be shown that avoidance of United States income tax was not one of the principal purposes of a particular transaction involving foreign corporations.

Nonrecognition of gain on sale of residence

Under Section 1034 of the Internal Revenue Code a taxpayer who sells his principal residence at a gain will not be taxed currently on that gain of the proceeds of sale are reinvested within one year in the purchase of a new residence. My Committee would like to suggest that there be a suspension of the running of the one-year period of reinvestment in the case of any employee who has made the sale of his residence because of an assignment abroad by his employer. The suspension period would cover the period of residence abroad. To protect the revenue the sale could be treated as taxable in the year of sale with the right of the taxpayer to claim a refund if, on his return to the United States, he fulfills the requirements of Section 1034.

SUMMARY OF COMMENTS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

DEAR SIRS: (1) Section 431 should be deleted because—

(a) Elimination of flexibility now allowed a taxpayer to choose between the "per country" limitation and the "overall" limitation would result in double taxation in many instances.

(b) The workings of the Section effectively disallow losses on unsuccessful foreign operations, but tax income from profitable ones, an obvious inequity.

(2) Section 432 should be deleted because, when coupled with the disallowance of percentage depletion, the further limitation of the foreign tax credit on mineral income effectively penalizes the extractive industries.

BASIS FOR COMMENTS

(1) Section 431

This Section should be deleted.

The existence of the right to choose between the "per country" and "overall" limitation for foreign tax credit computations recognizes the myriad of international business situations which can, through inequities in the credit system and consequent double taxation, be very costly to taxpayers unless maximum flexibility is given. This flexibility should be expanded, rather than reduced, as would be the case if Section 431 is adopted.

Computations under Section 431 show that application of the provisions ultimately result in taxation of foreign source income at penalty rates as compared with domestic source income. Even more harsh is the fact that the tax effect of foreign source losses must be recouped completely where the assets of the underlying operation are sold. The effect of these provisions is to disallow losses on foreign operations entirely where they are unsuccessful and subsequently sold, but to tax the income from those operators at penalty rates if they are ultimately profitable. Provisions of this type do not belong in our taxing system.

If enacted, this Section will:

(1) Discourage investment in less developed countries,

(2) Aggravate the U.S. balance of payments positions through reduction of repatriation of overseas profits in this situation,

(3) Reduce the competitive position of U.S. business abroad.

None of these is desirable.

(2) Section 432

With respect to this Section, the proposed limitation on credits coupled with the complete disallowance of percentage depletion on foreign oil deposits creates a disadvantage for the extractive industries. To be excluded from percentage depletion is harsh enough, but that coupled with a severe limitation of the availability of the foreign tax credit will result in discriminaton against a major U.S. industry.

If there is abuse in the "royalty-tax" area where mineral deposits are owned by a foreign government, it would seem better to attack that problem directly. If there is a problem, why not provide for some method of arriving at an arm's length standard with respect to the taxes or royalty payments as has been done in other areas? Another responsibility would be to place the burden of proof on the taxpayer to show the proper relationship between royalties and taxes. To merely sweep the problem under the rug rather than attack it directly seems less than desirable.

Above all, if either Section 431 or 432 are to be adopted, they should be applied only to new acquisitions or business interests and not to existing ones where the legal and business arrangements are fully solidified and cannot be changed. Investment decisions have been made based on rules in existence at the time of those decisions. They should not be materially altered by subsequent changes in tax laws. Merely providing for a new election with respect to the foreign tax credit is not sufficient to counter the new problems created.

CONCLUSION

This statement is submitted as part of a series of letters, each dealing with a particular area of the proposed legislation. It is intended that the comments and recommendations contained herein be made part of the record of testimony relative to the legislative changes contemplated for foreign tax credit. We shall be pleased to discuss these matters further with you or the Committee, either in person or by telephone. Please call us collect at 312—346-6262 if necessary.

Very truly yours,

JOHN MENDENHALL,
Director of Taxes.

CHRYSLER CORP.

Re H.R. 13270—The Tax Reform Act of 1969.
Subject: Section 431—Foreign Tax Credit.

Hon. RUSSELL B. LONG, Chairman, Committee on Finance, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

GENTLEMEN: Chrysler Corporation ("Chrysler") welcomes the opportunity to submit a written statement presenting its views with respect to those provisions of H.R. 13270 (The Tax Reform Act of 1969) dealing with the Foreign Tax Credit (Section 431).

Section 431 of the bill, dealing with Foreign Tax Credit Reduction in Case of Foreign Losses, is inequitable and should be eliminated from the bill. This is because foreign branch profits would continue to be subject to U.S. tax, whereas losses of foreign branches would in effect be only temporarily recognized. If this proposal is to be enacted in some form, however, any tax advantage recouped by the Treasury should be reduced by any U.S. tax paid on income from such country during the three preceding taxable years (comparable to a net operating loss carryback under Section 172).

During the past several years, many taxpayers and associations have suggested (and elaborated on the justification therefor) that the "deemed paid" foreign tax credit provided under Section 902(b) of the Code be extended to dividend distributions from foreign subsidiaries below the second tier in which the U.S. parent owns directly or indirectly at least five percent of the voting stock. Chrysler urges that any tax reform bill enacted in this Congress include such a provision.

Yours very truly,

BRIAN T. O'KEEFE,
Assistant Comptroller.

BANKERS' ASSOCIATION FOR FOREIGN TRADE,
August 20 1969.

Hon. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Finance Committee, U.S. Senate,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am addressing this letter to you on behalf of the Bankers' Association for Foreign Trade. Our association, whose membership is composed of those commercial banks that are actively engaged in the international field, is recognized as the spokesman for U.S. banking on matters of foreign trade and finance. The BAFT was established in 1921 and its 133 bank members represent a broad geographical coverage of our nation.

It is our understanding that your Committee will soon hold hearings in connection with its deliberations on the Income Tax Reform Bill recently reviewed by the House Ways and Means Committee. Our Association is particularly concerned with the Foreign Investors' Tax Act of 1966 which is included in the Tax Reform Bill. Provisions of this act will, undoubtedly, be taken up for scrutiny by your committee at this tire.

With this in mind, I am enclosing a copy of our Statement of Policy which was adopted May 21, 1969 at our Annual Meeting held at Boca Raton, Florida, In particular I wish to draw your attention to that section of our statement reading:

"We commend President Nixon for his recent initiative (through the Department of the Treasury) in recommending the repeal of those provisions of the Foreign Investors Tax Act of 1966 under which interest on deposits belonging to nonresident alien individuals and foreign corporations in commercial banks in the United States will be subject to federal income tax and withholding after January 1, 1973. If not repealed, this tax will result in an outflow of deposits from the United States to the banks of many other countries whose governments will continue to exempt such interest from taxation and will have an adverse balance of payments effect.

"We urge prompt repeal of the above change scheduled to become effective in 1973 under present law.

"With equal urgency, we also recommend the repeal of certain other provisions of the Foreign Investors Tax Act of 1966, relating to estate taxes which, if not repealed, will require that all U.S. bank deposits belonging to nonresident alien decedents be included within their taxable estates, whether or not such deposits are related to the conduct of a U.S. trade or business.

"The potential increased revenues from these two tax sources are insignificant when compared with the detrimental effect on the United States balance of payments and the position of the United States as a financial center. We strongly recommend that action be taken immediately by the Officers of the Bankers' Association for Foreign Trade and the American Bankers' Association towards repeal."

The time deposits held by BAFT member banks in the name of foreign residents reach very substantial proportions. In the face of threatened imposition of income and estate taxes in the future, those interest-bearing accounts now carried by foreign depositors with domestic banking institutions, will be withdrawn and redeposited abroad with consequent unfavorable impact on this country's balance of payments. Additionally, there will be a detrimental effect on the position of this country as an international money market. We, therefore, strongly favor the rescission of those sections of the Foreign Investors' Tax Act of 1969, that would subject to income and estate tax those deposits of the type described.

As you know, the House Ways and Means Committee has published its findings concerning the Tax Reform Bill. As concerns the Foreign Investors Tax Act, the Committee recommended that the current exemptions be continued through the end of 1975. This action is helpful now, but is only a temporary solution. Therefore, we continue to urge repeal of the subject provisions and respectfully request that your Committee in the course of its deliberations keep in mind our position as well as the official recommendations of the Treasury Department and American Bankers Association which we support.

We are grateful for the opportunity to present by means of this letter the BAFT viewpoint on this matter. If, in the course of your proceedings, you would like further elaboration of our position, we would be glad to hear from you.

Very truly yours,

KENNETH P. KINNEY, President.

Enclosure.

BANKERS ASSOCIATION FOR FOREIGN TRADE

STATEMENT OF POLICY

At the Annual Meeting of members held May 21, 1969, the principles and policy recommendations set forth in the following statement prepared by the Policy Committee, were discussed and adopted by the members. Accordingly, the statement will provide guidance in the year ahead to the Directors and Officers of the Association in their efforts to further the aims of the Association and its membership.

THE U.S. D[illegible] THE WORLD MONETARY MECHANISM

During the past 1[illegible] [illegible] en at least four currency crises which could properly be characterized as "majo[illegible] e imme[illegible] promises more difficulties. The causes for the present lack of confidence in international [illegible] system are complex. This system has served the free world well since its creation at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, in 1944. But rising uncertainties, conflicting national policies, protectionism, inflation in some important countries, and possible weaknesses in the international monetary system itself, threaten disruption and call for new policies and procedures.

The Bankers' Association for Foreign Trade is concerned by the fact that the dollar, the keystone of the international monetary system, is being questioned as a monetary reserve asset. However, since cooperation among the major countries is essential to the successful solution of certain basic problems, we hope that bankers and business leaders in other nations will also undertake an active role in their respective countries to urge whatever changes are necessary for the restoration of full confidence in the monetary mechanism, a prerequisite for continued steady economic progress in the world.

We believe that world trade can continue to grow and expand only on the basis of a stable international monetary system, and in view of the vital role of the U.S. dollar as the peg to which all free world currencies are tied, our hope for such stability depends to an important extent upon the soundness of the dollar. To insure such soundness, the United States must take vigorous steps to combat inflation, to moderate excessive stimulation of the economy, and to eliminate budgetary deficits. We support the continuation of the income tax surcharge and monetary policies of the Federal Reserve System aimed at imposing a reasonable credit restraint upon the domestic economy as necessary elements of monetary, fiscal, and budgetary policies intended to insure the soundness of the dollar, and to gain control over a balance of payments deficit which has existed every year since 1950 (except for 1957 during the Suez crisis).

BEST AVAILABLE COPY

Many proposals have been advanced during the past year for dealing with the world monetary system. We recommend that further study be given to these and other proposals to determine whether they can provide realistic and workable alternatives. We strongly believe in the need for fixed and stable exchange rate parities. However, the system must have sufficient flexibility and strength to make orderly adjustments – over extended periods of time – to strains resulting from differing rates of increase in national incomes, prices, and costs, as well as from the varying impact of changing technologies.

Since it is doubtful that gold and dollars will be adequate and in sufficient amounts for world reserves in the future, we should provide for increases in the world reserve pool needed for a sustained expansion of world trade and production. We would welcome the introduction in adequate amounts of the proposed Special Drawing Rights under the International Monetary Fund for this purpose.

U.S. TRADE POLICY

During 1968, our trade surplus dropped from $4.1 billion to $835 million, the lowest level since 1959. This decline may be attributed in large measure to the upward spiral of rising wages, costs, and prices and must be met, as previously emphasized, with a rigorous attack on the fundamental problem of domestic inflation.

We must not endeavor to improve our position by short-sighted measures to curb imports, but rather by devising means to expand our exports. The Report to the President, submitted by the Special Representative for Trade Negotiations in January, 1969, entitled "Future United States Trade Policy" points toward freer trade through various measures, particularly the reduction of non-tariff barriers on a reciprocal basis. The five Task Force Reports of the National Export Expansion Council submitted to the Secretary of Commerce, recommend specific courses of action in many areas which have not yet been implemented and which would receive the support of members of the Association. Especially hopeful is the emphasis on the five-year export expansion program announced by the President, with the export goal of $50 billion to be achieved by 1973. We also commend the President for reactivating the Cabinet Committee on Export Expansion, comprised of representatives of all relevant government agencies, and for the appointment of a Special Representative for Trade Negotiations who will be directly responsible to the President on important trade matters in the year ahead. The members agree with this general approach of the Administration and are ready to assist in this important effort toward expanding world trade.

We urge that all U.S. banks engaged in international banking take an even more active part in stimulating exports from their areas, through support of their Regional Export Expansion Councils, through contacts and educational activities on the part of their business development departments, and through advertising and public relations emphasizing their desire and ability to increase exports.

VOLUNTARY FOREIGN CREDIT RESTRAINT PROGRAM AND FOREIGN DIRECT INVESTMENT CONTROLS

We believe the Voluntary Foreign Credit Restraint Program is a serious barrier to and restraint on the expansion of this nation's foreign trade, and recommend that the program be terminated as soon as possible.

We regard the changes made toward the liberalization of restrictions on foreign direct investment which were announced on April 4, 1969, as an encouraging sign that the Administration will indeed take effective steps toward full termination of the controls. We urge that this be done as quickly as possible.

FINANCING OF U.S. EXPORTS

A reversal in the serious deterioration of the foreign trade position of the United States is imperative. This will require better cooperation between government and business in many areas; export financing, export promotion, and foreign investments, to name a few.

Banks have received strong encouragement to maximize export financing as part of the government's program of export promotion. Some of the efforts undertaken by the banks were subsequently found to have been in vain; the encouragement has been vitiated by the slow development of practical government support for export financing, by the impact of tight money policies on the export sector and by the proliferation of controls and restrictions on foreign lending.

We have concluded that in order to enable our exporters to compete effectively against the foreign supplier who benefits from incentive programs now being offered by many foreign governments and in order to expand United States exports to achieve national goals, certain incentives are required, including among them special interest rates on commercial bank credits for exporters and assurances of the availability of credit for the financing of exports. It is recommended, therefore, that the Federal Reserve Board provide rediscounting facilities applicable to export credits at special rates to assist American exporters.

We urge that a government agency at the highest level be given authority and responsibility for the coordination of the policies and practices of the various government departments and agencies in the general area of foreign trade financing. We feel that such coordination would provide essential and defined channels of government policy through which more banks may develop a capability to provide support for potential as well as existing export industries.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF THE UNITED STATES

We urge the Export-Import Bank to contribute more effectively to increased commercial bank participation in export financing operations because of its positive impact on our balance of payments. We are gratified to note the fine spirit of cooperation that has existed between Export-Import Bank officials and the commercial banks in recent years. In this connection and in line with the avowed purpose of the Export-Import Bank to complement and not to supplant commercial bank financing activities, we wish particularly to urge the earliest government action with respect to improved financing of jet aircraft and other capital goods. The Private Export Financing Corporation (PEFCO) proposal, originated within the framework of the Bankers' Association for Foreign Trade and now under review by government authorities, points to a partial solution. PEFCO's lending activities will have direct participation by the commercial banking industry and institutional lenders using Export-Import Bank guarantees rather than a direct outlay of funds by the latter institution. We strongly recommend that immediate and affirmative actions be taken by the Government in approving PEFCO plan so that this corporation can be established without further delay.

We urge the more imaginative use of the $500 million Export Expansion Facility which would facilitate the penetration of the new markets and help us regain our position in the traditional ones. Liberalization of other aspects of the guaranty program must also be considered in order for U. S. exporters to be competitive.

INCOME AND ESTATE TAXATION OF FOREIGN DEPOSITS IN THE UNITED STATES

We commend President Nixon for his recent initiative (through the Department of the Treasury) in recommending the repeal of those provisions of the Foreign Investors Tax Act of 1966 under which interest on deposits belonging to nonresident alien individuals and foreign corporations in commercial banks in the United States will be subject to federal income tax and withholding after January 1, 1973. If not repealed, this tax will result in an outflow of deposits from the United States to the banks of many other countries whose governments will continue to exempt such interest from taxation and will have an adverse balance of payments effect.

We urge prompt repeal of the above change scheduled to become effective in 1973 under present law.

With equal urgency, we also recommend the repeal of certain other provisions of the Foreign Investors Tax Act of 1966, relating to estate taxes which, if not repealed, will require that all U.S. bank deposits belonging to nonresident alien decedents be included within their taxable estates, whether or not such deposits are related to the conduct of a U.S. trade or business.

The potential increased revenues from these two tax sources are insignificant when compared with the detrimental effect on the United States balance of payments and the position of the United States as a financial center. We strongly recommend that action be taken immediately by the Officers of the Bankers' Association for Foreign Trade and the American Bankers' Association towards repeal.

WORLD ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

We urge our Government to continue to lend its support in assisting the economic development of those nations which are conscientiously striving to improve the welfare of their people.

A new federal agency, The Overseas Private Investment Corporation, is being created to reorganize and administer U.S. Government incentives to invest American capital and know-how in developing countries. Its financing plans and operating criteria are still matters under discussion. We endorse in principle this effort to mobilize the use of private capital and skills in developing countries. This new agency promises to facilitate the use of government guarantees, insurance, and funds in conjunction with private enterprise in a more effective manner than heretofore.

EAST-WEST TRADE

We continue to support any action that would facilitate East-West trade within the framework of our national security and economic interest. In this connection we oppose restrictions on Export-Import Bank guarantees for export loans, providing they cover trade based on these principles.

MERLE R. CROCKARD, President
Bankers' Association for Foreign Trade

Senator TALMADGE. That completes our list of witnesses scheduled to be heard by the committee today.

The committee will now stand in recess until 9:30 Monday morning.

(Whereupon, at 3:45 p.m., the U.S. Senate Committee on Finance recessed, to reconvene at 9:30 a.m., Monday, October 6, 1969.)

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

MONDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1969

U.S. SENATE,
Committee on Finance,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to recess, at 9:30 a.m. in room 2221, New Senate Office Building, Senator Herman E. Talmadge presiding.

Present: Senators Long (chairman), Talmadge, Ribicoff, Harris, Byrd Jr. of Virginia, Williams of Delaware, Bennett, Curtis, Jordan of Idaho, Fannin, and Hansen.

Also present: Senators Bayh, Cranston, and Percy.

Senator TALMADGE. The committee will please come to order.

This morning the committee begins its final 3 days of public hearings on the Tax Reform Act of 1969. These last 3 days will be devoted to the tax treatment of private foundations.

Our first witness this morning consists of a 19-man panel, which will present the foundations' coordinated testimony. Subsequent witnesses will address themselves to the effect of the bill on educational TV, the effect on conservation, the effect on voter registration, and other problems of a more specific nature confronting various private foundations.

The first witness this morning in the foundations' coordinated testimony is Mr. Irwin Miller, chairman, Cummins Engine Co.

Senator Hartke had a statement here he wanted to make in introducing you, sir, and without objection his statement will be placed in full in the record.

(Senator Hartke's statement follows:)

Mr. Chairman, it is an unusual privilege and pleasure for me today to introduce to the Senate Finance Committee one of the truly remarkable Americans of our era, Mr. J. Irwin Miller, of Columbus, Indiana.

Industrialist, philanthropist, religious and political leader, Irwin Miller is the finest example of a real Renaissance man—Hoosier style.

As industrialist, he is president of the dynamic and progressive Cummins Engine Company, with headquarters in Columbus and plants and offices throughout the world.

As philanthropist, Irwin Miller has contributed handsomely to such institutions as Butler University, the Christian Theological Seminary, and Indiana University, and he has stimulated and presided over an extraordinary architectural flowering in his own city of Columbus.

As religious leader, he has not only long been active in the affairs of his own church but is a recent past president of the National Council of Churches.

As political leader, Mr. Miller was chairman of last year's Rockefeller for President campaign.

His voice is the voice of reason and generosity, and I urge my colleagues on the Committee to pay most careful attention to his counsels.

Mr. Chairman, I am honored to present to the Senate Finance Committee a great Hoosier, Mr. J. Irwin Miller.

33-865 O—69—pt. 6——18

Senator TALMADGE. Was Senator Bayh to be here?
Thank you, you may proceed, Mr. Miller.

FOUNDATIONS' COORDINATED TESTIMONY GROUP [1]

STATEMENT OF IRWIN MILLER, CHAIRMAN, CUMMINS ENGINE CO.

Mr. MILLER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

May I add a few words of explanation to the description of the coordinated testimony. According to the list that you have before you Father Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame and I were to discuss the role of the foundations in American life. I will speak briefly on that and Father Hesburgh will lead the panel on the effect of legislation on beneficiaries.

The original printed testimony which you received is accurate, except in respect to a few absentees. President Herman Wells of Indiana University is unable to be here.

Senator TALMADGE. Those statements will be inserted in full in the record.

Mr. MILLER. Dr. Wells is in the hospital and has sent a letter to the committee. We will distribute copies of that letter.

Senator TALMADGE. Without objection the letter will be inserted in the record of the hearings at this point.

Mr. MILLER. Thank you.

(Letter follows:)

INDIANA UNIVERSITY,
Bloomington, Ind., October 1, 1969.

HON. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, U.S. Senate Finance Committee,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LONG: I deeply regret my inability to appear before this committee. However, my physician at the Duke Medical Center in Durham, North Carolina, where I am presently a patient vetoed the suggestion of releasing me temporarily for this hearing. While respecting the veto, I wish nonetheless to take this opportunity to thank the committee again for the privilege of submitting testimony.

In my written testimony I attempted to show by many examples the vital importance of foundation support to our Indiana institutions, public and private. I had hoped to include a figure for the extent of that support in the last five years, but the time required to collect the data from each institution delayed a final summation until now. With your indulgence, I should like to append the statement that approximately 460 private foundations have given $50,454,821 in the last five years (and pledged a significant amount more) to Indiana's public and private higher educational institutions.

I have tried to make the case in my testimony that the existence of our private institutions in Indiana would be seriously jeopardized by a diminution of foundation funds and, too, that a lessening of foundation support would adversely affect public institutions which have counted on this resource for underwriting the programs, projects and staff needs that make the crucial difference between their merely carrying on customary work and being enabled to infuse it with the quality of distinction. It is through the grants which our public institutions have received from private foundations that much of their distinguished achievements have been made possible.

I wish that I had sufficient eloquence to convey to the members of this committee my belief that the encouragement of private philanthropy in all of its forms—and particularly in the form of the private foundation—is essential to the continued vitality and progress of higher education. I have long believed that our dual system, private and public, and our variety of types of institutions, with a diversity of purposes and controls, are most important guarantees of freedom and objectivity in higher education. I am just as certain as I can be that, if philanthropic support for higher education is eliminated or substantially reduced, we will soon lose this variety and with it, we will lose something very precious in our academic tradition.

Throughout the years, our private and public institutions have exercised considerable ingenuity in developing multiple sources of support. I would not wish Indiana University to receive its support wholly from the State, nor would I consider it advisable for a private institution to be dependent upon a single source of financing. The healthiest situation, it seems to me, results from a variety of funding sources and attendant controls.

Speaking for private support, without which the dual system cannot be maintained, I do not mean to imply at all that there is anything improper or undesirable in public support of higher education. I wish that there were more of it. But I think that the private sector must be protected in order to give us the kind of varied, imaginative and innovative structure which only diversity and differing points of control can ensure.

Above all else, I would plead that nothing be retained in this legislation which would discourage the creation and continuance of private foundations. The American private foundation is a remarkable invention, providing the means by which great personal fortunes can be transmuted into an instrumentality for benefitting society at large and promoting progress. Without it, the economically fortunate individual would have difficulty in giving away a portion of his wealth for such purposes. Moreover, it is vital to the health and welfare of higher education in America.

I know that the members of the committee are aware of the importance of our dual system, that they understand the significance of variety and differing kinds of control, and that they share with me a concern for freedom of enterprise in higher education as well as in other aspects of society. But I simply wish to raise my voice again, as one who has worked a long time in higher education, to emphasize the significance of these factors, to urge the committee to do all in its power to encourage philanthropy in its many forms, including through the private foundation, and thus to help our higher educational institutions better serve youth and society. In the long run this will save the taxpayer money.

If there are questions which are raised by my testimony, I shall be glad to receive them and file a written reply.

I am aware of the difficult problem faced by the committee and I realize that all of its members are committed to seeking as satisfactory a solution to this problem as possible.

Again, my thanks for the privilege of participating in this discussion.

Respectfully submitted,

HERMAN B. WELLS,
University Chancellor, Indiana University.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Ben Heineman, chairman of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Co., is unable to be here. He would have been present in September, but cannot be here today.

Mr. Elvis Stahr cannot be here. Mr. Kermit Gordon is in the hospital.

With these exceptions the list as given to you is accurate.

(The committee subsequently received the following letter from Mr. Ben Heineman:)

NORTHWEST INDUSTRIES, INC.,
400 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.,
October 2, 1969.

Hon. RUSSELL LONG,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR RUSSELL: As you are undoubtedly aware, I was scheduled to testify on September 9 before the Senate Finance Committee as part of the Foundations' coordinated testimonial group. But the rescheduling of this testimony to October 6, because of the death of your colleague and my friend, Everett Dirksen, means that I will now be unable to attend. I regret this, as I had looked forward to discussing these important issues with you and your fellow Committee members.

However, even though I will not attend the hearings personally, I should like briefly to give you my general views. I am in complete substantive agreement with the position taken by the Foundations appearing before you on October 6 that H.R. Bill 13270, as passed by the House, represents a substantial threat to a unique American institution. I am certainly aware of—and not unsympathetic to—some of the current criticism of foundations. Some have, indeed, served principally as "tax loopholes." Some have, unfortunately, acted in inappropriate ways. For these reasons, they are an entirely proper, even necessary, topic for Congressional consideration and action.

But the vast majority of foundations, and certainly the Nation's largest and best known foundations, are not mechanisms for tax avoidance but, rather, support and buttress activities and institutions all of us would regard as entirely appropriate. You are undoubtedly aware of many more of these activities than am I; but I have substantial experience with the significance of foundation involvement in at least one important area. As Chairman of the Illinois State Board of Higher Education for seven years, I saw time and time again the enormous contribution foundations made to higher education. By providing fellowships, by helping to build university endowments, by supporting faculty salaries and by underwriting new areas of study, foundations continually play a critical part in the development and improvement of education. If the activities of foundations are curtailed, then educational institutions must inevitably turn to government for support.

But I view the spirit with which discussion and legislation regarding foundations is approached as more critical than particular clauses in the Bill. There has been much criticism of the "controversial", "political" activities of foundations and substantial consideration given to means of curbing these. I would hope that these discussions take the values of diversity and experimentation into account. Foundations are most valuable in my view—not when they support an activity of acknowledged significance—but when they provide risk capital and support to new activities, new approaches and new, even unpopular, ways of doing things. These are also precisely the areas where the risks of failure are greatest. Therefore, the most valuable activities of foundations are often likely to be the most controversial.

In my judgment, the Nation needs vital sources of pluralism. I believe that the major foundations serve this need in a responsible manner. I would hope that your Committee's considerations of foundations and their activities would view them in this light also.

I enjoyed seeing you—although too briefly—the other evening and look forward to talking with you again.

With every good wish and warm personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

BEN W. HEINEMAN.

Mr. MILLER. My purpose in introducing this panel, is to discuss with you briefly and generally the role of foundations in American life, and to answer any questions that you would like to raise.

To identify myself, I am a businessman who lives in a county seat town in Southern Indiana. My interest in foundations arises out of the established American tradition that each individual citizen ought to be concerned about his country, and ought to give money in support of his concerns, and ought to give his time and his talents insofar as he is able.

In our own company we have plants around the world as I travel to visit them I have been struck with the fact that one of the truly unique characteristics of the United States is the broad concern for charitable giving which has for a very long time been actively encouraged and supported by government. I know of no other country where this is the case. As I go through the towns and cities of other countries where we have plants, the lack of concern in these communities for the welfare of their society is remarkable when compared to the United States. We have a country in which the individual citizens care about their schools, care about their hospitals, care about their municipal government. They give money and they give time and they give energy. And all this is supported and encouraged by our government. It is clearly to me one of the great virtues of the United States in today's world.

Now, this charitable giving is done primarily by the man on the street.

Over $16 million of money is given every year to charitable enterprises and research operations in this country. Of this over 80 percent is done by individuals. Foundations account for about 8 percent. Foundations are a part of this tradition, but they are one of the smallest parts of them.

We live today in the time when the private sector's contribution is being heavily emphasized. Government is trying in many ways to encourage private citizens to take a bigger share of the load, to put less of the burden on the Federal Government in Washington. It, therefore seems quite important that the government ought now to encourage and not to discourage giving or to discourage people associating themselves to give.

There are two broad ways, I think, in which the government should encourage private giving. The first clearly is to correct any abuses that exist. All of us who are here before you today support the correction of abuses. We support those provisions in this bill which prohibit self-dealing. We support those provisions in this bill which prohibit the unreasonable accumulation of income. We support those provisions which prohibit the use of a foundation simply and solely as a tax shelter. Persons who use foundations in these ways are not concerned with charitable giving. They are concerned merely with using the foundations for purposes of their own.

We also support the increasingly vigorous endorsement and administration of present laws regulating charitable giving and foundations.

We are however very seriously concerned about those additional provisions in the law, which curtail the effectiveness of foundations and which seem to give a signal to the American people that charitable giving and associating to give money is a bad thing.

The first of these is the proposed tax on foundations. In our opinion this is not really a tax on foundations, it is a tax on the recipients of foundation funds. We support a fee for the more effective regulation of foundations, and are happy to work to make this an effective one.

Our stand on the proposed tax on foundations and the fee as proposed by the Treasury witnesses will be discussed in detail by a panel which we have here for that purpose.

A second feature of this bill which we feel will limit the effectiveness of foundations in serving the public is found in those provisions which relate to program limitations and to proposed penalties. The program limitations may well tend to keep the foundations out of those areas which are most important in solving the great future problems of the society. The penalties proposed are so severe that many of the ablest Americans will simply be financially unable to accept service as trustees of a foundation.

We are opposed to those portions of this bill which define the characteristics of private foundations, feeling that many of the oldest and most respected organizations in the country which serve the national need would probably be so restricted that they could not perform their major functions.

Perhaps on a long-range basis the most serious aspects of these proposals is that they give a signal to the public that private giving is a bad or suspect thing——

The CHAIRMAN (presiding). Sir, if I might just interrupt you, would you mind explaining to me what is so good about people getting a 70-percent tax exemption. In other words, why should anyone escape a 70-percent tax while not giving anything to charity or the like? What is good about that?

Mr. MILLER. I don't believe that a person can get a tax deduction and keep the money for himself. He has to give it to the public in some legitimate and approved form.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, right now he can just give his income to his own foundation and thereby escape taxes. Isn't that about the size of it?

Mr. MILLER. I would not defend at any time the creation of a foundation merely to accumulate money, merely to retain control and not for a serious charitable purpose. None of the people here today would support that. We support the prohibitions of self-dealing, unreasonable accumulation and the intent to use foundations as tax shelters. We support these provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, fine, you support the same things I am supporting. Where a man is giving his income to his own foundation the mere fact he declares a charitable purpose and does nothing about it should not make him eligible for complete tax exemption.

Mr. MILLER. It is that last portion, and does nothing about it which I cannot support.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Well now, are you aware of the fact that this kind of thing has happened in some of these foundations?

Mr. MILLER. My judgment on that is that this is a very minor abuse. It should be corrected, but we should not tamper with the enormous services done by the vast majority of foundations. We should correct very carefully the minor abuses without stopping the genuine good done by the majority, people who are not up to anything, who are seriously trying to help the society.

I don't think that we should somehow take the risk-taking out of giving. We are in a period of enormous change. We need a great deal of experimentation and innovation, and in the giving of money there are bound to be some failures, because we are treading on new ground. We should not create too much fear and too much caution about innovative giving or we will not make the kind of contributions to our problems that we need.

In my own business, I am highly involved in technical research. If we hit 1 out of 10 we are doing well.

The foundation's success rate is far better. Their record is excellent and they should be encouraged rather than discouraged in innovation and risk-taking for the national good. Experimental giving is an area for which government, whether it is municipal, State or Federal, has a hard time finding funds. Private funds can help all aspects of the government to show the way.

I think that it is bad if the Government passes a bill which somehow has an implication that the creation of future foundations are somehow not welcome. The total assets of foundations, as I said, a little earlier, as a percent of gross national assets have been declining for 10 years. The total giving of——

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell me what is that percentage?

Mr. MILLER. All private foundations in 1968 held assets worth approximately $21 billion. These assets were about eight-tenths of 1 percent of the net equity and debt instruments of the otal U.S. economy.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the source of those figures?

Mr. MILLER. Senator, we will give you the total U.S. net debt and equity, stocks and debt instruments: $2,502 billion. Of these $21 billion are the assets of foundations or 0.84 percent.

Senator TALMADGE. Will the chairman yield at that point?

Mr. Miller, Congressman Patman says that foundations have about $50 billion, and maybe there are as many as 100,000 of them in existence. I believe you testified that assets of about $21 billion and that there are about 22,000 foundations in existence. How do we really know what the correct information is when so many of these foundations don't file any reports of any kind?

Mr. MILLER. I will have to defer to the panel that has the source material for this, and if the answers that we have here are not complete we will be glad to give you the total amount of our figures for your study on it.

(The Committee subsequently received the following additional information:)

SOURCES OF DATA, CITED IN THE FOUNDATION CENTER MEMO ENTITLED "SIZE AND GROWTH OF PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS"

1. The estimates on the total market value of all foundation assets at five year intervals from 1938 through 1968 were assembled under Foundation Center auspices. These are the sources used in developing these new estimates:

(a) Tabulations of asset values published in the Foundation Directory; editions of 1960, 1964, 1967.

(b) Preliminary estimates on balance sheets for all foundations for the years 1953 through 1968 prepared by Ralph L. Nelson at the National Bureau of Economic Research.

(c) Tabulations on the size of foundations from American Foundations and Their Fields; estimates covering the years 1930, 1931, 1934, 1937, 1940.

(d) Estimate on the size of the foundation field for the year 1944 published in American Foundations for Social Welfare.

(e) A sample of 30 major foundations which hold over 40% of the total foundation assets. The survey covered the period from 1938 to 1968 at five year intervals; it was conducted by telephone under Foundation Center auspices in September, 1969.

2. Total U.S. debt & equity is net public and private debt at end of year (bonds, notes, mortgages, etc.) plus market value of all corporate stocks. From Federal Reserve Bulletin and Economics Department at Morgan Guaranty Trust Company of New York. Partly estimated.

3. Total national wealth is the estimated aggregate value of all tangible U.S. non-military wealth including land, structures, equipment, inventories, and livestock. Partly estimated; based on Goldsmith & Kendrick data for the National balance sheet. (Goldsmith & Kendrick have produced, under private sponsorship, the most definitive estimates of the nation's wealth. Some years in the series shown were developed from extrapolation, others from interpolation.)

Mr. MILLER. I would now like to discuss income relationships.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the reason I asked you about that is I have never seen a precise figure—and we ought to get it sometime—on the net worth of all assets in the United States. I have never seen it. I know you will never get it by assessed valuation. It certainly wouldn't approximate that in my State.

Mr. MILLER. I think we excluded real estate in the figure I just gave you, this figure contains only common stocks and debt instruments because that was the figure that was obtainable.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, in my State I think the average assessment is less than 18 percent of value.

Mr. MILLER. Inclusion of real estate and properties would tend to make the percentage of foundation assets even lower.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

If you are not including real estate I suppose it would. But when you are describing foundation assets are you including the real estate that is turned over to foundations?

Mr. MILLER. You would have to do it in the case of foundations because this is reported as their assets.

The CHAIRMAN. Good.

Mr. MILLER. So this probably is an unfavorable report as far as the foundations are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Well now, what is the source from which you got that?

Mr. MILLER. There I am going to have to defer to our staff and I will get the source and provide you with that information.

The CHAIRMAN. Good.

Mr. MILLER. I have it in summary form, but I don't have the back-up material.

The CHAIRMAN. I have it in summary form, but I don't have the back-up material.

The CHAIRMAN. I think your percentage figure would be lower than that.

Mr. MILLER. I think it would.

Income is another way of measuring foundation standing. The total amount of expenditures of all foundations is two-tenths of 1 percent of the gross national product. However, more important than that small figure is the trend. For the last 10 years foundation expenditures as a percent of GNP has been declining.

In the case of the largest foundation of which I am a trustee, its size is approximately one-half the percent of the gross national product today than it was when it began operations. This percentage is declining every year. We have a summary of these figures and we would be glad to give you the source material.

The CHAIRMAN. Fine; thank you very much. We will include that in the record.

(The committee subsequently received the following additional information:)

THE FOUNDATION CENTER SIZE AND GROWTH OF PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

Questions have been raised about the size and growth rate of private philanthropic foundations in the United States. We have had a study made and here are the findings:

Foundations have never owned a significant proportion of financial instruments (stocks, bonds, mortgages, etc.) and own a smaller proportion now than ten years ago.

Foundation assets have never been a significant proportion of U.S. wealth and are now a smaller proportion than ten years ago.

Available data indicate that foundations are a very small sector of the economy and that they are growing relatively slowly. Indeed, aggregate foundation assets have grown more slowly than Gross National Product, more slowly than U.S. financial assets, and more slowly than national wealth during the past decade.

In 1968, all private foundations held assets worth approximately $21 billion. Total foundation assets were therefore only about eight-tenths of one percent of net debt instruments and corporate stocks in the U.S. economy. They were about seven-tenths of one percent of the value of all tangible U.S. wealth. Total foundation assets were less than the market value of at least two of the largest American corporations (A.T. & T., General Motors), and were less than ten percent of the aggregate assets held by domestic insurance companies.

The accompanying tables covering the period from 1938 to 1968 have been assembled at the Foundation Center. The data about all foundations are necessarily estimates. But the estimates are improvements over earlier figures because of the recent collection of more precise market values of assets for a number of major foundations for the period 1938 through 1968, and are believed reliable.

Total expenditures of all foundations now run at an annual rate of about $1.5 billion. This is considerably less than two-tenths of one percent of gross national product and is only nine percent of total charitable giving in the United States. their pets, about one quarter as much as national spending on toiletries and cosmetics, about one sixth as much as national spending on tobacco products, and about one tenth as much as national spending on alcoholic beverages.

Mr. MILLER. I have covered the general thrust of our testimony. I would like to make one personal comment in relation to the proposed tax and fee. In the present bill the tax is proposed to be 7½ percent. I think the concept of a tax is in conflict with the concept of charitable giving, and our panel will speak at length on that.

The alternate proposal for a tax at 2 percent of income to cover examining expenses. It is interesting to compare this with the charge of bank examiners for examining banks because this proposal is the same kind of a fee, namely a charge for examining thoroughly the whole activities of foundations in order to improve public accountability.

In our State (I do not have national figures) the State examination fee is 3 cents for each $1,000 of assets. A 2 percent fee on income, assuming income is 5 percent, would amount to $1 per $1,000 of assets, or 33 times as much as the bank examiners charge. So this is quite a fee.

My own feeling is that it would cover substantially more than the cost of examination.

Now, I would now like to conclude with a few general comments and then I will be glad to respond to such of your questions as I have the information to respond to.

In the first place not everybody in the United States establishes foundations. They are relatively few in numbers, and they are declining in dollars as a percentage of the national wealth.

My second point is that, contrary to general opinion, foundations are formed by rich people and poor people alike, not only by rich people.

I would like to mention my own town of Columbus, Indiana, which has a population of 25,000. I can think of four foundations in that town, two of them founded by wealthy families. There are two other foundations. One of them is the Columbus School Foundation which was founded by a group of concerned housewives and parents, who had no money to put into it, but who wanted to create an instrument to which the whole community could give, in order to provide fellowships for further education of elementary and high school teachers during summer vacations. The founders had no money to put into this foundation. They have since got the majority of their support from two or three local corporations, and they hand out the money in 15 or 20 fellowships of travel every year to high school teachers.

That foundation would probably under this bill be restricted from receiving any more money.

Another foundation in our town was called the Laws Foundation, named after a Presbyterian minister who founded it. He discovered that over the last 15 years in our town, no Negro graduate of the local high school had gone to college.

This was quite simply for lack of money. The founders didn't have any money to put into the foundation but they established it and he solicited contributions. They now have six or eight fellowships every year. In addition to soliciting funds working with Negro children at the elementary school age to motivate them to go to college.

So here are two foundations founded by people without any money at all. Because their major source of funds again is from a small number of industries, these foundations would probably not be qualified to receive money under this bill. I think there are very many cases of foundations founded this way, by persons who have a public concern but no money themselves. At first these persons usually get only one fellow or two to bankroll, but then ultimately they may obtain a broad base of public support.

A third point I would like to make about foundations is that, on the one hand, the list of their accomplishments is absolutely staggering. It is so impressive and it is the envy of every nation in the world.

The man who was going to speak with me, Dr. Herman Wells, said he recently spoke to the President of Pakistan. He said "Dr. Wells, how do I get some foundations started in Pakistan to start some of the pioneer enterprises in health, hospitals, homecare that we so desperately need. I can't get this done through government."

The list of accomplishments is impressive because of its influence on health, on education, and religion—where the government cannot enter. It is major in poverty, in art, in the development of public policy. This kind of private money is one of the things that makes this country the envy of the world.

The second thing to consider is then in the sum of the ventures, of all the foundations in the United States, the number of mistakes made are to me astonishingly few in number, and even smaller in dollars. I would have expected a substantial and continuing number of failures, just as in bank lending. If a banker makes loans and doesn't have any losses at all, he is not serving his community, because he is not taking reasonable risks.

The same is true in the foundation world. If you don't have some failures you are not really serving your society. But the number of failures to date is surprisingly small.

Finally—what is the alternative in this country if private charitable giving is restricted and if innovation is curtailed? The only alternative is for the Government to take over, and that means for each citizen to feel less responsible for what is going on in the society. I don't think this has ever been a good answer anywhere at any time. If it results in a nation of citizens who don't care then I would fear for this country. I have been in countries where the citizens don't care. Generally speaking the citizens of France and Italy and even to a certain extent the United Kingdom, have a strong feeling that they can do nothing about their problems. They take no care for the schools in their own town nor for elimination of poverty, nor for health of the oncoming generation. They think all this is somebody else's job. The contrast between those countries and the United States is very great, and it should make us tremendously proud of what we have in this country.

We have a valuable and priceless tradition. We should deal with this tradition very carefully indeed. We should correct the abuses continually and constantly. But above all, Government should remain in the posture of encouraging the individual citizen to care for his country, to give his money to it and to associate with others in order to give to it.

The Government should encourage the individual citizen to take risks, to experiment, to innovate, but above all, to accept a personal responsibility for the welfare of this country, the responsibility to do more than the law requires of him and to do it voluntarily.

Thank you very much for hearing me. I would be happy to respond to questions.

The CHAIRMAN. I just want to say one thing, Mr. Miller, and please understand I don't challenge the good work that the foundations who are worthy of the name do. I don't challenge that at all.

You have made the statement that the only alternative is for the Government to do the same thing. You are aware, are you not, that it is completely within the ability of these donors to give directly to the university or a church without ever giving it to a foundation at all?

Mr. MILLER. That is quite true.

The CHAIRMAN. So there is more than one alternative.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

But there are many answers to the business of giving. I think it is the American genius for organization that has developed in the foundation one of the good devices for charity. It is, however, not the only one. I think we need not just one answer but many foundations are one answer and a very useful one.

Senator TALMADGE. Mr. Miller, is there any good reason why foundations should exist in perpetuity?

Mr. MILLER. I think so.

Senator TALMADGE. Corporation charters expire and must be renewed, people die. Insofar as I know the only thing on earth man can create and exist in perpetuity is a foundation. What would be wrong with having some termination date for foundations?

Mr. MILLER. In my opinion, you do have an effective termination date—in this sense: Human beings don't live forever. If the same board of trustees were immortal that would not be good, but foundations' boards of trustees probably turn over every 10 to 12 years. Their emphasis, if their charters are broadly drawn, change continually. They start a new life every decade because they have a new group of people, with new opinions, new directions and new responses. When you have a situation in which the total assets of foundations are diminishing as a percent of the total assets of the country, I don't see a good reason to accelerate this trend and to drive foundations out of existence.

Senator TALMADGE. Your response brings up my next question now. I agree with the Chairman that most foundations do outstanding work, I have seen the results of it in my own State. No one argues about the merit of the contributions to higher education, hospitals, cancer research, things of that nature. But recently many foundations have gotten themselves involved in areas that are really quasi-political. Some of them are subsidizing research in school busing, birth control, and one foundation even went to the extent of subsidizing a former Senator's staff in a trip around the world. Why should the taxpayers of our country subsidize these questionable activities? What I am asking is if the Congress should draw some distinction between a true educational, scientific, charitable research effort and those that get themselves involved in quasi-political contributions——

Mr. MILLER. I would like to speak out of my own experience. Let's take some grants that my own small family foundation has made. They are in the area of influencing public policy. In the little town of Columbus, Ind., we were very far behind in building schools. About 12 to 15 years ago we made an offer to the school board. We suggested two of the most eminent architects of the country, and asked them to prepare a list of eight to 10 of the best young architects. We said to the school board, if you will pick any one of these architects to do your buildings we will pay his fee. We won't say which architect to use; nor will we determine the design. Our aim was to build school buildings that were thoughtfully designed and advanced in concept. We hoped they would last one or two generations longer and set the pace of the country. Now, that influenced the decision of a political body.

I think we will be barred from doing that under the proposed law.

We have also at the request of our mayor, contributed to a study on overall recreation planning for our community. The mayor selected the person and the organization that he wanted to do the study. He had no funds for it in his budget. So he came to us as a foundation to ask would we finance this study.

The problems of the city today are enormous, and the amount of research they need to do in order to decide which way to go, is tremendous. The results of research are very problematical, many of them are failures. As a result, when the budget comes up, research projects usually go to the bottom of the list and are not funded.

More and more mayors are coming to foundations to say "help me." I think this is a proper area for foundation response. I think that the country would be poorer without it.

Senator TALMADGE. I see no objection to the things your particular foundation has subsidized but I can see objections to foundations making gifts to public officials, for instance, Justices of the Supreme Court, and things of that nature. Where are you going to draw the line? How can you correct the abuses?

Mr. MILLER. This is a very vague area. Nobody should make a gift to any public official. But public officials are not persons of great wealth, and reasonable reimbursement of travel expenses and out-of-pocket costs in the interests of an important national or international meeting, are quite proper. This is a matter of judgment and good honesty.

Senator TALMADGE. What about voter registration drives, would you permit a foundation to do that?

Mr. MILLER. I live in a part of the country where a high percent age of the people are registered voters. As a citizen of a democracy, however, I feel that it is highly desirable that all persons who are eligible to vote be registered and encouraged to vote throughout the whole country. The higher the percent of our citizens that go to the poll, the more representative our democracy is. Voter registration should, however, be a continuous and nonpolitical activity.

Senator TALMADGE. I agree with your conclusion on that but as you know political parties vie with each other, politicians on the local level, State level and national level, vie with each other, as to the particular voters that they think are most likely to vote for them. In the final analysis a voter registration drive can be the most partisan political activity there is, depending on who selects the people that that drive is going to be motivated toward. Would you agree with that?

Mr. MILLER. I live in a very political State, and I know what you are talking about. But I don't think that the answer is to do nothing. I think the answer is to move carefully, nonpolitically, and do it all the time and not just in the spurts.

Senator TALMADGE. It seems to me that the answer might be to be a little more restrictive in what really constitutes educational, charitable, philanthropic, scientific and things of that nature, because there is no doubt in my own mind that some of our foundations have gotten far, far afield, and I think that some of the creators, if they could see what has happened to their foundations today, would turn over in their graves.

Mr. MILLER. I inherited a foundation that was created by my elders, I am sure I am not doing exactly the same things that they would have done in their time, but I tell myself that I am responding to the principles which they had in mind and then I am trying to respond in a way that is appropriate to the needs of today, needs which they couldn't have foreseen.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you, Mr. Miller. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you very much, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, sir.

We will call next on the Reverend Theodore M. Hesburgh. Senator Bayh wanted to be here to hear Mr. Miller, and he also wants to hear Father Hesburgh's testimony. Senator Bayh.

STATEMENT OF HON. BIRCH BAYH, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF INDIANA

Senator BAYH. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to share this distinguished rostrum in such distinguished company, and I certainly accede to my senior colleagues. I certainly wanted to be here to introduce both Mr. Miller and Father Hesburgh. You are aware I am conflicting duties and I had expected to be here at 10 o'clock, and I apologize to the committee as well as to the witnesses.

I would just like to say before returning to another committee that we have with us Congressman Hamilton who happens to be the Congressman from the district which Mr. Miller represents, and I am sure that he would share my assessment of the fact that there are few citizens in our State who have done more to shed light in certain areas that need this type of attention than Mr. Miller and Father Hesburgh. It is not necessary for me to add vocally to the record that they have already compiled before the committee but I did by my presence want to suggest I have talked to both of them and feel that their assessment of this whole business of dealing with the problems that certain organizational aspects of foundations present in the tax structure should not tempt us to treat other aspects of the foundations in such a way as to be punitive and I think both of these gentlemen will articulate this particular problem, as Mr. Miller has, much more precisely and with personal experience than I, but I just wanted to have this chance to join you in welcoming them and thanking them for bringing this matter to our attention because both of them have given this matter a tremendous amount of personal experience day to day attention which they have given it to themselves in a manner in which I think we can all be extremely proud.

Mr. MILLER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Let's call Father Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of the University of Notre Dame. We are very happy to have you, Father. Will you proceed, sir?

STATEMENT OF REV. THEODORE M. HESBURGH, PRESIDENT, UNIVERSITY OF NOTRE DAME

Father HESBURGH. Senator, thank you very much for the opportunities of being with you and also for your courtesy in allowing Senator Bayh, our Senator, to introduce us this morning, sir.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce the gentlemen who are with me here. First of all, I will say for myself, I am Fr. Theodore M. Hesburgh, in my 18th year as president of the University of Notre Dame. I think I am overage in grade at the moment.

The gentlemen with me on my left, your right, is Dr. John A. Cooper, president of the Association of American Medical Schools. And on my right, your left, Dr. Frank C. Ervin, Jr., chairman of the board of regents, University of Texas System, and on his right Dr. Felix C. Robb, director of the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools.

Mr. Chairman, we are here this morning not to represent any foundation or any particular interest of a foundation per se, but we are here as bystanders to this controversial issue regarding private foundations. We are not completely disinterested bystanders because collectively we represent a broad variety of institutions, institutions which over the years have derived great support from foundations.

These institutions include private colleges and universities, State and municipal universities, medical schools and in particular here, some educational institutions in the South.

We think that there are two aspects that we might focus upon this morning, one contained in the legislation, and one proposed outside of this particular House tax bill, and perhaps if we focused on these two points we might sharpen our own testimony.

I would like to summarize what we have said about these two points in our written testimony which I trust will be part of the record, and then ask each of my colleagues to supplement what I have said in summary of their remarks.

The first point that we find ourselves in rather complete disagreement with is that point in the House tax bill which would impose a 7½-percent tax on foundation investment income, and the second point which is not included in the House bill, but which has been recommended by some critics of foundations is that foundations should either terminate their existence or lose their tax exemption after a period of years. Some mentioned 25 years, some 20, 15, 10.

We believe that the first of these measures would diminish the current funds with which foundations carry out their important work, by which they support a wide range of charitable and educational institutions, and it would diminish these funds initially by about $65,000 a year—excuse me, $65 million a year—I keep forgetting I am in Washington, not Notre Dame——[Laughter.]

Father HESBURGH (continuing). And it is supposed that very shortly this amount of diminution of their funds would go to $100 million eventually.

We believe that over time this second proposal is perhaps more deleterious than the first but we think that both proposals are dangerous from our point of view because we believe that the——

The CHAIRMAN. Father Hesburgh, if I might just interrupt you there to be sure I am following you——

Father HESBURGH. Surely.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). You say one proposal would cost you $100 million a year, that is universities and colleges——

Father HESBURGH. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). Over a period of time. Which proposal is that?

Father HESBURGH. That is the 7½-percent tax on investments income of all foundations.

The second proposal we say over time might even be more difficult because the foundations we believe are one of the bulwarks of the society and facing each year the kind of changing challenge that society meets. Somewhere in the whole structure of this society we have to have the force that is flexible, open, generous and has the means of getting at these problems which very often can't be gotten at and financed in their study from any other source.

The points that I would like to make for myself are that the foundations on their simple record, and I am not talking about all foundations, here, sir, but the foundations that we know in educational institutions, that these foundations on their record have done some enormous things for the growth of the private sector of our country.

I would like to say by way of parentheses that I just returned from a trip around the world in which I visited about 25 universities and university systems in some 20 or 30 countries in the world. The one great difference I noticed in all of these countries, in all of these university systems, was that they are different from ours. Ours has traditionally since the founding of Harvard in 1636 been a dual system of education, public and private. We have learned to live with each other in great harmony and concord. But as a member of the Carnegie Commission for the future of our education I think we have identified the greatest problem facing private institutions today and that is simply a problem of survival under the financial structures that face us. We have over the years been required to do more and more in the public interest in widening educational opportunities, facing the crises in our cities and indeed in space and we believe that never before have higher educational institutions been asked to do more with less funds, and that one of the very few resources we have to help us in this endeavor are the great foundations that give much of their assets to higher education.

I would like to say in a historical context that one of the Rockefeller Foundations in the general education field in the early 20's gave large sums of money to some private institutions in this country to help them develop endowment, to make their work a little more financially viable. If you were to go over the list of those universities that in those days received this money, I believe by any man's accounts they would have to be listed today in the top 20 universities in this country.

It was a generous thing to do and it was done as only a foundation could do it and I think it has justified itself over the years.

In more recent times the Ford Foundation had a program called a special program in education in which they gave matching funds to a wide variety of private universities and colleges, in an effort to help them stimulate through matching grants other funds from private sources.

This program, and I speak from some experience because Notre Dame was part of it, by giving a relatively small amount of money but large in our eyes, like $12 million, enabled us to use this to raise from other private sources some hundred million dollars over a period of 10 years and, as a result, we were able to do in 10 years because of the stimulus and the challenge that was presented to us by this magnificent gift, what normally would have taken us 30 years. We have a great library to show for it that cost $12½ million, impossible otherwise; a great computing center, a new engineering course, a new freshman year of studies that cut freshman attrition from 30 percent down to less than 2 percent. All of these things were done innovatively, creatively, and positively because of the impetus given us by a foundation grant in a very imaginative way.

I know of no place on earth where this happens except in this country. I know of nothing closer to the mystique or the spirit of this country than the stimulation of private concern and private generosity to create great private endeavors in the field of higher education and indeed in the field of elementary and secondary education. It would seem to me, gentlemen, and Mr. Chairman, especially, that this particular mystique of our country should be encouraged in every way possible and should in no way be endangered, and I think it would greatly be endangered if out of this rather limited resource we have in the field of great private foundations they were taxed so that at a time when all of us in the private sector need more rather than less, something would be done both to discourage foundations from continuing their work in this field or to somehow limit their assets or diminish their assets.

I would like to say at the same time that all of us, the four of us here, are totally and enthusiastically in favor of the provisions in this bill to get at malpractice in the area of foundations, using foundations for private interest or using them as a tax refuge or using them for any purpose that is not consonant with the public interest or with honest administration or public accountability. We are not only in accord with these provisions but we are enthusiastic about them for this reason that we would very much dislike to see the great record of the great foundations of this country diminished by allegations of impropriety that we think are probably justified, in the case of some foundations that have used these laws to avoid taxation rather than to do good.

On the part of my colleagues, and I am going lightly over this because I think they would like to speak for themselves, we identify the great field of foundations in medical education. I know that you gentlemen know from your other experiences in Government, that there is no field of education that is more costly and more in danger today than the field of medical education. The increasing of medical technology, the provision of more doctors, more medical services, more research technicians, more nurses, more delivery of health services, this is a field which defies most university administrators by its cost and discourages them by the resources available, and for many of these programs there is no real adequate resource available except the private foundations.

One can say in all honesty that in improving and sustaining medical faculties there has been no force in this country equal to the foundations. We can say that the medical education we have today was thoroughly revolutionized following the Flexner report which was sponsored by the Carnegie Foundation. I think the Carnegie Foundation is following this tradition today by its 5-year study of the future of higher education across the board, public and private, State and local; in establishing new medical schools by the Kellegg Foundation which has inspired the founding of seven medical schools in our recent past; in helping schools with great financial difficulties, especially schools that cater to members of minority races, you can point to an instance where a school would have gone under without the enormous help from a private foundation.

In developing techniques of medical education, new curricula, new methods relating to the medical facilities for the public need and welfare of our citizens, certainly in these areas the hundreds of millions of dollars spent annually by the foundations to deliver these benefits to our country would certainly be diminished if the funds available to foundations were diminished. Parenthetically, here on the second point of focus I mentioned earlier I would like to say that health problems as well as scientific environmental problems change from decade to decade and from generation to generation, and it is for this reason that perhaps anticipating a question I would like to speak a word for the continuity of foundations, not the continuity as if their mission were always exactly what it was when they began but that they are sensitive to the challenges and to the opportunities of each new age.

There was a day when the Rockefeller Foundation spent considerable money for, to eliminate, yellow fever through its great virus program. Today there is another kind of problem facing the world, namely adequate food for all of the people of the world, and it is an amazing thing that with the expenditure of a relatively small amount of money in the past 10 years the Ford Foundation linked up with the Rockefeller Foundation to develop a new rice seed which in 1 year of its use developed a rice crop $1,200 million more in volume than the crop raised the year before with the same land, the same farmers, the same sunshine but with a seed not as well developed. It is projected with new seeds in the coming year that the crop will be $3 billion in excess of the crop of 2 years ago. And this is the kind of new challenge met today by resources available, by a current board of trustees which looks at this problem and directs the foundations attention to it. And for this reason I like to think there would be in our society this continuing force in the private sector that can face these problems quickly and with great flexibility and with great dedication to the public welfare.

In the area of medical education, since Dr. Cooper will say a few words, I will now stop. As to the foundations and the public institutions, foundations are not simply dedicated to the private sector. I think most people misunderstand the fact that great State institutions in his country, the great land-grant colleges and others, that they too have a certain lack of flexibility because of the kinds of budgets they have from the State legislatures and therefore need additional funds for innovation and for new creative activity, for the kind of research that a region needs. For example, in the Southwest the foundations have sponsored research as distinct as beef production or mineral recovery have provided funds for new kinds of innovative skills in consumer needs in the region, for programs to help linguists and to develop new language skills for people who don't speak the current language of this country or don't speak it well, to develop new kinds of communicative techniques and to develop industry in the region, and to develop agriculture. Each program could be studied in detail, and I think you will find the greatest contributions are the great breakthroughs which, subsequently caught up by the public moneys, were initiated in a kind of catalytic way by the imaginative grants of foundations to these great public institutions who simply could not initiate these kind of activities with their normal budgets.

The last point, about which Dr. Robb will speak more at length, is that there are certain areas of our country that have special needs. We feel that the South with an enormous number of children to educate and a small amount of dollars to do it with would be especially vulnerable to a public policy that would limit the flow of free foundation money to southern institutions. Dr. Robb is involved in over 9,000 such institutions, and I am sure he can give chapter and verse much better than I can to illustrate this particular point. We feel there is another point that should be made in the same area and that is with the South's growing economy it is beginning to produce indigenous wealth and this is not the time to produce any kind of legislation that would restrict the creation of new foundations that could be dedicated to the growth of this region, particularly its educational and research growth and its industrial growth as well, which follows from it, too.

In summary, gentlemen, we feel that there are many talented youngsters who should have life opened up to them for new educational opportunity, that we have the institutions to do this but we would like all kinds of things, like scholarship money, like innovation in the educative process, libraries, textbooks, museums, research facilities, and all the rest, and we believe that the foundations are one of the great hopes we all have educationally, and I must add here that we as educators stand together, public, private, North, South, East, West in our dedication to making America a better place in which to live.

We think well of the motivation of the foundations we know. I have spent a considerable number of years as a trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation, and I haven't see any endeavor in my life that has been run by more responsible men, where I have met more responsible people dedicated, with high integrity, trying to get something done for mankind. I would like to say from the vantage point we speak of as bystanders to the controversy but yet as those who benefit by the total work of foundations that we are most hopeful that you gentlemen will look with favor on the elimination of this tax which eventually would take as much as $100 million a year from these great resources dedicated now to so many good causes.

At the same time we make the correlative point that we do not believe that every foundation is a candidate for sanctity or a citizenship medal, and we believe that the cure is quite simple.

It would be quite easy to put in legislative proposals that would limit the inequities or eliminate the malpractice that takes place in relatively few foundations but we hope this might be done without injuring or limiting or in a sense discouraging the enormous great good that comes from the foundations whose record is impeccable over many decades, and we hope will be impeccable over many decades yet to come.

Could I, Mr. Chairman, please call briefly on Dr. John A. Cooper, the president of the Association of American Medical Colleges, for a word?

STATEMENT OF DR. JOHN A. D. COOPER, PRESIDENT, ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN MEDICAL COLLEGES

Dr. Cooper. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, as Father Hesburgh has said, I am the first full-time president of the Association of American Medical Colleges which has as its membership 105 medical schools of this country, their faculties and 359 of the major teaching hospitals.

The members of this association are dedicated to improving the health of people of this Nation, and they do this through their education of health professionals, through the research they do not only in biomedical sciences, but in the development of more effective, efficient ways to provide health care, to increase its quantity, its quality, and its equality.

The contributions of the foundations to these efforts have been very important in the past, and because of the limitations in support which are now facing us from Federal sources, will be even more critical now and in the future. The members of the association have expressed deep concern over the implications for the foundation programs of the legislation which this committee is now considering.

We are convinced that there is need to correct some of the abuses that Mr. Miller and Father Hesburgh talked about but we too hope in correcting these abuses that we do not limit the ability of the foundations to continue to make their very substantial contributions in the whole field of health and the provision of health care. We hope that the baby is not thrown out with the bath water.

Father Hesburgh has talked about the contributions of the foundations to research and these have been very important over the decades when there was not money available from Federal sources. They still are important in specific areas. In many cases, the support given by foundations points the way for programs which later are supported to a much greater extent by Federal funds.

I would like to discuss briefly the support of medical education, which is a very critical matter these days. The AAMC as far back as the fifties, pointed out that this country would face a severe shortage of physicians and made attempts to increase the numbers of medical students and other health professionals educated. Unfortunately, we did not have wide support for this viewpoint. In spite of this, we did move ahead, as Father Hesburgh has said, with the help of some of the foundations who recognized with us this need. They provided funds to stimulate and to help in the establishment of new medical schools by universities that did not have them at the time. They also helped significantly existing institutions substantially increase their output of physicians. Through their fellowship and other support, they have helped us to provide the faculty which is so important to maintaining the quality of American medical education and to meet the needs of the growing number of medical students.

Father Hesburgh has also pointed out that foundations have made substantial contributions to a number of medical schools that were on the brink of financial collapse. It is through this support that these schools, all private, have been able to survive. Given the situation now with regard to Federal funding, we hope that this may be a continuing and important aspect of the foundations' activities.

They have also helped to provide these matching funds for the construction of educational facilities for the medical schools, facilities badly needed to take care of the expanding responsibilities for students and also to replace facilities which are now becoming very old, antiquated, and inappropriate for educational programs which extend into the community.

As I said the support is becoming even more critical at present because the costs are rising, and we don't have adequate funds to meet them, particularly in the private schools, where we have almost reached the limit of our resources.

The medical schools are also being asked to undertake increasing responsibilities, to assume a greater role in the community, and to extend themselves outside their own walls. This is very difficult for many schools to do, largely because of the precariousness of their financial situation.

The foundation support is also increasingly important because of diminishing Federal support. We, in essence, have had no increase in dollars for research since about 1966. For many areas of medical education, there are not adequate funds from Federal sources available.

So I would like to close by saying that our medical schools are facing an extremely serious situation. Some may not be able to survive, most will be unable to meet the expectations society has of them because of the precarious state of their financial situation. We need every source of support that we can get to maintain present programs and to expand our involvement with the very pressing problems related to the delivery of health care. The foundations have been and will continue to furnish a critical part of this support. Thank you.

Father HESBURGH. Mr. Chairman, could I ask one of my associates, Mr. Frank C. Erwin, Jr., chairman of the board of regents, University of Texas system, to say something about foundations and public institutions of higher learning?

STATEMENT OF FRANK C. ERWIN, JR., CHAIRMAN, BOARD OF REGENTS, UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS SYSTEM

Mr. ERWIN. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I shall not repeat but shall merely adopt the comments Dr. Cooper and Father Hesburgh have made because they apply equally to the publicly supported colleges and universities. Here today I would like to say only a word on behalf of the public junior colleges and public senior colleges and universities, because they have a unique problem which is slightly different from those in the private sector. These public schools have the job these days of trying to take care of the rapidly increasing student enrollment, which cannot be taken care of by the private schools.

Let me give you one example which specifically applies in Texas but which also applies throughout the United States. This past month we have increased the number of students at the University of Texas at Austin by more than 3,500.

Now this is a tremendous increase, almost a 10-percent increase, in enrollment in 1 year. There are not enough buildings, there are not enough teachers, there are not enough research facilities to take care of them, and yet what do you tell parents, taxpayers, when you tell them that you can't take care of their children, that there just aren't any places for them to get a college education. We can count in the public schools in Texas this year, from the 12th to the third grade existing students, who will be in college in the next 10 years and if we apply only the percentage of college attendance of high school graduates that occurred last year, the same percentage of high school graduates who went to college last year, in 10 years we will have twice as many students in the public universities and colleges in Texas as we have today. It is a frightening and staggering statistic and when you say it so quickly it is hard to understand and appreciate the consequences of it.

It is State and local taxes that principally support those public institutions and, although these taxes are essential, it is difficult to believe that we can get adequate financial support from those sources alone to take care of the increasing student bodies.

The only other two apparent sources that we can turn to or at least the ones that we have had to turn to, are Federal support and the private foundations.

Yet at this time when we are faced with this greatly increasing student body, for reasons completely unrelated to the needs of higher education the Federal Government is withdrawing dramatically its support of higher education both in facilities construction and in the support of other activities.

And we are dismayed to see that simultaneously with this reduction in Federal support, there is a suggestion that measures be instituted which would greatly diminish the support we can receive from private foundations.

Now, as Dr. Hesburgh and Dr. Cooper have said, we do not condone in any respect any malfeasance or misuse of foundation funds for purposes other than to support truly charitable activities. But we all know from our own personal experience that the great majority of foundations, both in number and in dollars, are engaged in highly commendable work, work that is essential to higher education of we are to continue to meet our problems, and we beseach you that you do nothing in this law, and certainly that you eliminate several suggestions in the House bill, which would seriously diminish the ability of these good foundations to continue the outstanding work that they have done, because in the absence of such continued support I simply do not know how we are going to meet the responsibilities that are placed upon us. Thank you very much.

Father HESBURGH. Mr. Chairman, our final speaker is Dr. Felix C. Robb, director of the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. In a sense he speaks for more than any of the rest of us because he has 9,000 institutions from Virginia to Texas under his association.

STATEMENT OF FELIX C. ROBB, DIRECTOR, SOUTHERN ASSOCIATION OF COLLEGES & SCHOOLS

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the Senate Finance Committee, I wish to add my word of commendation to the Congress for your concern about tax reform, including any clampdown on tax dodgers and self-dealers that may exist. It is not about that, but about the tremendous and vital contribution of philanthropic foundations to southern education that I would like to speak.

I have lived my life in the South and I am now working for institutions from Texas through Virginia. I know that the South has borne a tremendous educational burden for this entire country. We are, in a sense, are the seedbed of the Nation. Shortly after the Civil War, George Peabody of Massachusetts created the first great philanthropy in America in his fund that literally created the South's free public school system. That was followed by Andrew Carnegie's gifts which created about as many public libraries as there are court houses in our Southern States. Along came the Rosenwald Foundation and helped create 5,000 schools for Negro children, followed by the Rockefeller Foundation which has done much for the advanced education of our educational leaders. This tradition of magnificent assistance to the South has been followed by such modern foundations as Ford and Denforth.

This is the tradition about which I wish to testify. It is the tradition which reputable foundation are following today.

I would like to say that our Southern colleges and universities in the private sector in many cases have their backs to the wall and this past year for the first time are running deficits. Thus, they urgently need every gift dollar as well as every other dollar they can acquire.

I would like to give two or three illustrations about how the public sector of education also benefits from these dollars.

At the University of Georgia, several years ago, the Kellogg Foundation of Battle Creek, Mich., made a multi-million dollar grant to the University of Georgia for the Continuing Education Center, and I don't know anything that has helped in generating improvement of life in the South and particularly in Georgia more than has that wonderful gift which came from outside our region.

Similarly I would like to tell you what a small gift in Louisiana is doing. Louisiana State University, like many public universities, has its own private foundation. They gave a small grant for research in the transforming of sugar cane into a protein that could be used for synthesizing food. This caused the Rockefeller Foundation to be interested and give $44,000 to help that research.

Their progress stimulated the interest of the U.S. Public Health Service to give $150,000 and now something which can benefit us and the world has been created in that State through that original initiating grant from a campus-based foundation.

I would like to tell you also about Meharry Medical College in Nashville, Tenn., an institution which has educated almost half the Negro physicians in the United States. It has literally been saved on more than one occasion by foundation dollars.

These are home of the contributions that mean a great deal to us, and so, gentlemen, I plead for a strengthening and a supporting of the foundation dollar and for the deep concern and the conscientious efforts of legitimate foundations to help the South and our southern institutions. In 22 years of dealing with foundations not once have I ever found anything but integrity and also a willingness on the part of these foundations, once they make a grant, to allow the institution to administer that grant without interference.

I think what you do will have a great precedent for our local governments and our State governments that tend to follow your lead. I wish there had been more publicity for the good works of the great foundations and the foundations of integrity than has been the case. These hearings will help greatly in that regard. Thank you.

Father HESBURGH. Mr. Chairman, all of us are deeply grateful to you and your associates for your impartiality and patience in listening to us on these points. We speak with great sincerity and great hope because we have all seen those institutions in which we have spent our lives supported, sustained, led forward and enthused and given hope by the work of great foundations, and we would hope that this might continue while full correction is applied to those foundations who are not following the laws as they should.

The CHAIRMAN. Father Hesburgh, and members of your panel, permit me to say this about this subject: I believe every member of this committee favors the kind of fine work that many foundations such as the Rockefeller Foundation are doing, and the fine contributions that have been made in research efforts at LSU and at the University of Georgia—we heartily approve of that.

But may I say that the Rockefeller Foundation itself has people on that board who have encouraged an inquiry into what some of these foundations are doing, and I am led to believe that those who are trying to find out what the other fellow is doing are shocked at some of the things they are finding out themselves just as I am somewhat shocked about some of the revelations that have occurred.

Now, when we started out looking at this matter I am one of those who rejected the idea that the Federal Government should do nothing. I believe I told Mr. Rockefeller that you are going to find enough abuses in this area that the case will be made that the Federal Government ought to do something about it, and it will help with the fine work that you are doing if we can see to it that the 20,000-odd foundations about which you know very little are doing the kind of quality work that some of the better foundations which you are associated with should be doing.

You are aware, of course, of the fact that the 100 percent unlimited charitable deduction resulted from the case of a Philadelphia nun who was giving her money, in fact, to charity. Since that time every big taxpayer in America has been trying to find some way to qualify himself as the same Philadelphia nun even though he doesn't have the same qualifications. That is corrected in this bill that we have before us, but this bill also has something that you haven't referred to and I am sure you approve of it. That makes more liberal what one can contribute as far as charity and education is concerned, so we are really trying to see what you are trying to achieve is fostered, not that it is hurt in any respect and we want to see to it that no one takes unfair advantage of something in the law that was not intended to be used that way. I am happy to see that you did agree with some of the things that are recommended in this House bill.

Father HESBURGH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Father HESBURGH. Thank you very much.

Senator WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have no questions to which I am expecting an answer now but I am wondering if you gentlemen would furnish for the record a breakdown showing for the last year the amount of your budget revenues which was derived from foundations, the amount which was derived from grants of other sources, from the Federal Government, the State government and the amount from the students.

Father HESBURGH. I am sure we can provide that, Senator, and will do so.

Senator WILLIAMS. I appreciate it.

(The committee was subsequently informed that the material was forthcoming, but had not been received at the time of printing.)

Senator TALMADGE. Mr. Chairman, I have no questions but I do want to associate myself with the remarks of the chairman and comment on Dr. Robb's remarks. He made reference to the State of Georgia, the Peabody Foundation grant of which I have personal knowledge and also the Kellogg grants which occurred during my administration as Governor of the State. The Kellogg Foundation matched State funds to build the Continuing Education Center in the University of Georgia. They also matched State funds to build the Rock Eagle Boys Camp, a 4-H club camp endeavor which we think is the finest youth camp in the world. I have no quarrel with the financing of operations of that type. It is where foundations get themselves involved in political activity that Congress needs to take some corrective action.

Senator HARRIS. I didn't get to hear all of your testimony, Father Hesburgh, but I did the others. I wonder, did your group attempt to take any position on the various aspects of this bill? I know there was general comment by you and others on some things needed to be done, the tightening of it. Did you attempt to take a position item by item in the House bill?

Father HESBURGH. No, we did not, Senator. The thing we felt would be most useful was to deal with those things with which we were personally acquainted, and being on the receiving end of foundations we felt that anything that would lower the amount of that at a time when more rather than less is needed and in the case of all of our institutions, public, private, north, south, that this would be a bad move.

Now, we also are somewhat concerned, although we didn't go into it at great length, that the very mention of taxing a foundation establishes a precedent for a State and a local tax, and in a sense it drives at the heart of something that has made this Nation great, I think, and strong in a way that no other nation has been. I mentioned before you came in, that if one goes around the world, as I do very often, and looks at educational institutions one is struck by the enormous difference of spirit in our country and theirs. Most of these educational institutions abroad, and I am thinking of the great developing areas of the world, have a terrible time getting started, because even local people with money aren't concerned, they aren't socially responsible. They don't give their resources to these local institutions whereas if you go back into the history of our country every great private institution in this country has somehow the long shadow of generous men, and it has survived because there have been very many intermingled shadows over the years, and if you do anything that discourages that or abridges it or diminishes it I think it would be a bad thing for the country generally.

I would like to see something done about the very real problem of people who abuse the tax laws regarding foundations. I think that this can be cleared up very quickly and very simply with three or four points of legislation. But this legislation should not harm foundations which are generous, which do work that can't really be done otherwise, at least historically in our country it hasn't been done except through philanthropy; these foundations should be increased, should be blessed, and somehow should be encouraged.

Senator HARRIS. That is all I have.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the panel for being here. You may not realize it but I think you are helping to save the Congress from itself. If we pass the House bill, as it relates to foundations and charitable giving, we will have changed the way of life in America. I am thoroughly convinced of that.

Mention has been made here of the good work of the Kellogg Foundation. It is true, it is one of many. The Kellogg Center at the University of Nebraska. The provisions of the House bill would have done material damage to the Kellogg Foundation, to require a change of its portfolio if it hadn't gotten a special exemption. There are hundreds of foundations, some of them smaller and less known who will likewise be dealt a severe blow, some of them will wind up by the provisions requiring them to divest if they own more than 20 percent.

If we enact that provision of the House bill, the amount of revenue that comes to the Federal Treasury is zero and that is admitted by them. I don't want to put words in your mouth, Father Hesburgh, but would it be a fair statement to say that in searching to find out what foundations are worthy and what foundations perhaps were doing some things that perhaps should be curbed that the basic test is are they doing a maximum amount of good with the assets that they have?

Father HESBURGH. I would agree with you, Senator, I would add one more thing they should be publicly accountable for these, these are the trusts.

Senator CURTIS. Very much so.

Father HESBURGH. I think if you should have a required public accountability—open accounting for everything that is done—and a requirement that a foundation spend a considerable portion of income every year. The only foundation I know very well, the Rockefeller Foundation, every year I have been on it they not only spent all its income but went into the capital by $10 or $15 million a year. The Rockefeller Foundation has given away over $1 billion in the last 50 years and have fortunately some more to give away. This kind of thing is a reflection of this country, it has grown with the country and it has been in so many areas, agriculture, medical education, health. It would be impossible to figure what this country would be like without it; I would hate to think. Of course, others have done it with greater assets; Carnegie, Sloan, and all the rest. But I would say as a simple-minded fellow in this area why not take the great foundations the way they have operated, the way they have accounted publicly, the kind of work they have done, granting they have made a mistake now and then because we all do, but take that as the norm, and establish the same kind of norm for everyone and then I think you avoid the trouble of tax-dodging, self-serving and all the rest.

Senator CURTIS. Would you agree this might be a safe procedure also that where there is an undisputed glaring abuse such as self-dealing, that we meet that and similar abuses, that by a minimal tax of maybe 1 percent these returns can be audited and then after 3 or 4 or 5 years the Congress will have knowledge upon which they can act? They will then have facts so they can say here is a practice that is in the public good or here is a practice that has led to abuses? Don't you feel that it would be well after we do our best to take care of the glaring abuses of which there is no dispute, to study the matter before we do great damage to this pluralism that we have in our culture?

Father HESBURGH. Yes, sir, I do.

And I think the great foundations have nothing to hide.

Senator CURTIS. That is right.

Father HESBURGH. Those that have something to hide are very easily taken care of.

Senator CURTIS. Don't you also agree that there are some very dedicated small foundations, small compared to the biggest ones?

Father HESBURGH. No question about it.

Senator CURTIS. Yes.

And have wonderful unselfish records and they are eager to do the maximum amount of good that they can.

Father HESBURGH. I am sure there are thousands of them.

Senator JORDAN. I have no questions.

Senator BYRD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I feel that the chairman ably and effectively put in perspective the problems facing this committee. I have been impressed with the testimony of the panel today and I want to say I am particularly pleased to welcome Father Hesburgh to this committee. I have not had the privilege of knowing him but I have admiration for his public statements one of which I put in the Congressional Record, his statement to the students of the University of Notre Dame. I want to say that if more college presidents were to show the firmness and the wisdom of the president of the University of Notre Dame, I think we and our whole country would be in much better shape than it is today. It is a little off the subject but I didn't want you to be here without telling you frankly how I feel about the way you have conducted the problems that face your university or potentially could face your university. Again, I think that the four of you have helped greatly to give this committee a keener insight into the problems which you face and which the Congress faces. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Father HESBURGH. Thank you.

Senator HANSEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would like to add my word of appreciation to this very distinguished panel. As a former member and president of a university board of trustees, I subscribe wholeheartedly to the statements you have made.

I have one question which may be parenthetical to our chief concern here this morning. I refer to the statement you made, Father Hesburgh, with relation to a grant to a small southern university whereby some new rice seed was developed down there that was very useful.

I have had the feeling that some of the larger foundations look with favor generally upon prestigious institutions and I am inclined to believe sometimes if the foundations had an opportunity to review the research program or the interest that is evidenced on university campuses throughout the country, it could very possibly be that some very important public benefits would accrue from lesser grants to smaller schools. Do you share this opinion?

Father HESBURGH. I think this; there is no question that the larger and more prestigious schools do get a little more attention because they have a great proportion of very talented people in them. But I would like to call attention to a grant that I had intended to mention, but I didn't, that was given by the Ford Foundation to every school in his country that was accredited in an effort to help them increase faculty salaries over a 10-year period or quicker because the money could be used right away. I think the net effect of that grant was a badly needed increase of 200 or 300 percent in faculty salaries because of the spurt that it gave.

In my own institution we got one of the largest, a billion and a half plus a million and a half bonus because we had shown evidence of going further, and that fund has grown through wise investment and through wise additions to some $14 million, and it just would have been non-existent without that particular grant at that particular time for this particular problem. Grants went to every school in the country and I have to say from my experience some of the smaller schools I know of got more of a boost out of the $300,000 they got than $3 million we got because their problems were much more crucial. The grants were a broad sweeping kind of thing, but they were enormously productive for the whole educational spectrum.

I think one broad thing like that, which cost the Ford Foundation several hundreds of millions of dollars puts in proportion the mistakes that are made from the foundations from time to time. We all make mistakes from time to time, I know I do.

Senator HANSEN. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you so much. May I say to members of the panel, I hope you understand our problem. We are trying to limit each Senator to about one question because we are under a deadline here to try to report this bill by October 31. Thank you very much for your statements today.

Father HESBURGH. Mr. Chairman, I have been requested to offer for the record a statement of Mr. Glickstein. He is the staff director-designate of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection.

(The statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF HOWARD A. GLICKSTEIN, STAFF DIRECTOR-DESIGNATE, U.S. COMMISSISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity to comment on the proposed restrictions on the financial support that private foundations may give to voter registration drives.

Before commenting on the provisions of H.R. 13270, I would like to note the long experience the Commission on Civil Rights has had in the area of voting. The Commission was established by Congress in 1957. Its duties as prescribed by Congress include investigating denials of the right to vote because of race, color, religion, or national origin. The Commission's first hearing, held in 1958, investigated denials of voting rights. It has conducted other hearings and issued a number of reports on voting since then. It has continued to watch voting procedures carefully since the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. In 1968 the Commission issued a comprehensive report entitled Political Participation, which dealt with participation by Negroes in political activities in the southern States. Most recently it has conducted investigations and research in preparation of testimony on the extension of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

H.R. 13270 creates a new section 4945 of the Internal Revenue Code which prohibits (by taxing at the rate of 100 percent) private foundations from financing voter registration drives unless the organization conducting the drive meets certain conditions. These condition are that the organization:

(1) is exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3);

(2) has as its principal activity a nonpartisan political activity in five or more States;

(3) expends substantially all of its income directly for the active conduct of the activities constituting the purpose or function for which it is organized and operated;

(4) is supported by other exempt organizations or by the general public as provided in paragraph (4) of section 4945(d); and

(5) does not receive contributions for voter registration drives subject to conditions that they be used only in specified States or other areas.

I consider this proposed restriction unwise and unfortunate.

While Congress has provided legislation safeguarding the right to register and vote, it has left to private organizations the affirmative task of educating and encouraging potential voters to register and exercise their franchise. This task is especially important in times of great social unrest when the racial and ethnic minorities and many young people perceive little evidence that the political process is a viable means for obtaining social reform and justice.

Restrictions on the financing by foundations by voter registration programs would add greatly to the problems encountered by concerned groups of citizens in their voter registration activities. In its investigations in the South the Commission has observed the importance of paricipation in the democratic process to the attainment by Negroes of full rights as citizens under the Constitution. Private voter registration efforts supported in part by foundations have contributed to increasing the number of Negroes registered to vote and have thus been the basis for their increased participation in political life.

According to the Report of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives the proposed section 4943 is not expected to interfere with the activities of the Voter Education Project of the South Regional Council. However, it is my expectation that it would seriously interfere with voter registration projects that have a more restricted geographic base and are not able to obtain funds from as many foundations. Thus an organization desiring to conduct a voter registration drive in a single city or State or which requires only the funds of a single foundation could not draw upon foundation support.

Registration of Negroes in the South is still disproportionately low. An end now of the effort to increase Negro voter registration would perpetuate the political inequality which still persists.

Table 1 gives the most recent voter registration statistics we have for these States.

Within the listed States there are many individual counties in which Negro registration is especially low. For example:

—In 27 of the 67 counties in Alabama, less than half the Negroes of voting age are registered. In five counties Negro registration is less than 35 percent.

—In 24 of Mississippi's 82 counties, Negro registration is less than half of those Negroes of voting age; in six counties it is less than 35 percent.

—In half of South Carolina's 46 counties Negro registration is less than half of those of voting age. It is less than 35 percent in three counties.

The failure of the Justice Department to send Federal examiners to most of the counties of especially low Negro registration under section 6 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 makes the privately sponsored voter registration drive the only effective way of increasing Negro registration in these counties.

In its report Political Participation, published in May 1968, the Commission found that the highest Negro registration was in counties where there were both Federal examiners and a voter registration campaign. Next in percent of Negroes registered were counties with Federal examiners but without a voter registration campaign. Third were counties with a voter registration campaign but without Federal examiners. Lowest registration levels were found in counties with neither Federal examiners nor voter registration campaigns.

It has been the position of the Department of Justice that local voter registration drives are the necessary and most appropriate way to increase voter registration.

In a memorandum to Attorney General Ramsey Clark dated January 12, 1967, John Doar, then Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Civil Rights Division, expressed the view that Federal examiners were not a substitute for "active local organizations" in accomplishing registration. The use of Federal examiners alone could be "counterproductive as far as bringing Negroes out of the caste system and making them viable participants in our political life." He stated that during 1967 the results of appointing examiners had been uneven, and that in some cases few Negroes had registered after an examiner was assigned to a county because there was no voter registration drive by private civil rights groups in the area. (Political Participation, page 156)

In a letter to the Commission, dated March 13, 1968, Stephen J. Pollak, Mr. Doar's successor, stated: "My experience would indicate that—at least after the first few months of experience with the Voting Rights Act—the key factor is the mounting of a drive for voter registration. The assignment of examiners may help generate enthusiasm but its major significance is as a means to assure that full opportunities are available for registration where the State fails to meet its responsibilities." (Political Participation, page 155)

In Political Participation the Commission made several recommendations for action that the Federal Government could take to encourage political participation.

Among them, the Commission recommended an affirmative program to encourage persons to register and vote and a repeal of the 1967 amendment to the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 prohibiting the use of funds for "nonpartisan voter registration activity." The affirmative program envisioned by the Commission would be a supplement to, but would not replace or make unnecessary private voter registration efforts. In view of the failure of Executive agencies to act in this area it is especially important that no new impediments be placed in the path of private voter registration activities.

One reason advanced for the value of the proposed restrictions on the financing of voter registration drives by private foundations is the belief that such drives support partisan political activity. I consider this belief unjustified. Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code already limits the involvement of tax-exempt foundations in political activities. The statute expressly prohibits participating in any political campaign on behalf of any candidate for public office. Further restriction, in my opinion, is unnecessary.

In testimony presented earlier in this Session of the Congress, the Commission strongly urged the extension of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. This action has not yet been taken by the Congress. In view of the uncertainty with respect to the extension of the Voting Rights Act, I believe it would be particularly unfortunate if legislation were enacted which could result in the total absence in the future of private voter registration activities.

The CHAIRMAN. We will next have a panel of Mr. J. George Harrar, president of the Rockefeller Foundation; Mr. Alan Pifer, president of the Carnegie Corp. of New York; and Mr. David Freeman, president of the Council on Foundations.

STATEMENT OF J. GEORGE HARRAR, PRESIDENT, THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION

Mr. HARRAR. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee. I am George Harrar, president of the Rockefeller Foundation. To my right is Mr. Alan Pifer, president of the Carnegie Corp. of New York, and to my left Mr. David Freeman, president of the Council on Foundations.

I would like to take this opportunity to submit my brief remarks. In the first instance, my own background of orientation is biology. For many years I was associated with the scientific activities of the Rockefeller Foundation; I later became vice president and in 1961 president.

During this period of time, I have had ample opportunity to examine the work of foundations such as our own and at the same time to see that of many others.

I would like to begin by saying that I think The Rockefellar Foundation, for which I speak, exemplifies the general purpose foundation devoted exclusively to the welfare of society. It is one of many, and it has over the years, I think, demonstrated the value of this almost American invention, a form of private philanthropy for the public good which has grown and become more and more sophisticated with time.

One of the reasons why foundations have had such success as they may have had is that Congress has supported the idea of private philanthropy through the provision of tax exemption over the years, with the support of the public.

I do not want to repeat what has been said before by those who have urged that the tax on foundations is simply a tax on its recipients. I think this has been said effectively by people who have made their case very well. We can only say we support this position.

I would like to explain some of the reasons why I think this is true from our own experience. In our own history, beginning over 55 years ago, we have found each year that new opportunities and new challenges and new demands presented themselves to us. We have had to evaluate and decide which of these opportunities we should attempt to assist, given our terms of reference. In so doing, past experience and demonstrable accomplishments, some of which are well-known, along with our possibilities for flexibility, stability, and continuity, have enabled us to engage in efforts for the public good for periods of time which assure progress toward established goals.

I would like to add that I think it is extremely important in our case at least that we have always had a highly professional staff. Our staff is composed of individuals who have had extended experience in a special field and are in position to interact and assess situations and problems and determine avenues of approach which they believe to be constructive and useful.

We are a self-renewing organization, as I see it. The trustees self-renew over a period of years with changes and additions. Our officers also self-renew through their own experience as they go forward in their professional careers and as they help younger people to get the same kind of background, experience and knowledge they themselves have acquired over a long period of time. So our staff is a career staff. We think of them not as being persons who come to us for a period of time, do a special task and leave. On the contrary, the vast bulk of our officers are those who are dedicated to a total professional career in private philanthropy. This to me is one form of private philanthropy, as I said, rather peculiar to America which has stood the test of time and I think has demonstrated a power to confront the many unmet human needs which we think are going to plague us in the future, against which we should all work together.

I think there has been excessive reticence by private philanthropy and private foundations—reluctance to do anything which might be called self-advertising. This reticence too often, I feel, has resulted in failure to communicate what we are trying to accomplish in a significant way to those members of the society that have an interest in knowing what we are trying to do and what our track record has been. I think we should have done a better job and the result has been, in my judgment, that a very small number of foundations have used the tax exempt privilege of private philanthropy in devious and unrealistic ways. Unhappily they have been the ones that have had the notoriety and have been the focus of much attention with the net result that in the minds of many there has arisen a tragic doubt about the public benefit derived from private philanthropy.

Our own foundation program may illustrate this point. As you know, our thrust has been upon a broad spectrum of human concern, including public health, education, food production, nutrition, and related interests. We have been deeply concerned about the spectre of hunger in many parts of the world and nutrition in those areas where this has become a vital problem to large sectors of the society. We have emphasized education in all its aspects and our whole history has been one in which training programs have been associated with each of our projects. Fellowships and scholarships have always been a principal thrust and focus in support of all that we have done since 1913, and I believe this is the only way to obtain a multiplier effect in the form of people who are dedicated and devoted and wish to contribute their skill and expertise and their knowledge for the public welfare.

I would like to point out that over the years our efforts have been sharply focussed. We have selected for ourselves limited numbers of areas of concern which we think are most basic and most important and, of course, in this self-renewal process these evolve over the years so that we are not doing today exactly what we did in 1913. However, a great deal of what we are doing today we learned during the decades of experience since 1913.

We have tried to bring our program along in such ways that as the needs of society change and as the demands placed upon us change, we respond in a constructive fashion.

To me, on the basis of my experience, one of our most significant accomplishments has been the way in which we have been able, thanks in part to the public sector, to establish informal partnership with many other sectors of our own society toward common goals. We would hope to continue to work, informally or otherwise, in intimate association with other organizations such as our own, and in many instances with Federal, State, and other entities or agencies with similar concerns, such as food production, basic research, economic development, and all the other matters which are so pertinent, so important to society today and tomorrow.

I believe that this association enriches our national scene and is extraordinarily important. I believe it has demonstrated its value, and the fact that part of it is private and part of it public or semipublic simply makes it more meaningful. Therefore, I would hope that in the future this kind of partnership counld be enhanced and encouraged. We know very well that many outstanding scientific accomplishments have been achieved by Federal agencies, such as the Department of Agriculture, NIH, and many others. We too have contributed and we wish to continue to do so, in association with others, in the belief that together the several sectors can add up to more than the sum of their parts.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would say that we very strongly fear that the results of a tax upon private philanthropy would be negative in terms of human progress and our ability to contribute to it.

We do very strongly support, however, the thought that there should be an arrangement through which foundations by paying appropriate fees could ensure that surveillance was exercised on the least conspicuous of us as well as the larger foundation. We would do everything we could to cooperate to this end and would fully support any such arrangement for this as may be decided upon by the Congress. Thank you, sir.

If there are no questions, may I turn to Mr. Alan Pifer, president of the Carnegie Corp. of New York?

STATEMENT OF ALAN PIFER, PRESIDENT, CARNEGIE CORP. OF NEW YORK

Mr. PIFER. Mr. Chairman, I subscribe very strongly to all that Dr. Harrar has just said. I would like to say I am president of one of the older and one of the larger foundations in American life. The Carnegie Corp. was established in 1911 by Andrew Carnegie before the days of the income tax and, therefore, before the days of income-tax exemption. This was true of all the philanthropies which Mr. Carnegie established and he established quite a number of them.

We have today a capital funds of approximately $340 million, and we have annual income of approximately $14 million. All of that income is devoted to charitable purposes.

The purpose of Carnegie Corp. was established by the founder, Mr. Carnegie, and that was that the funds were to be used for the advancement and diffusion of knowledge. We are, therefore, in broad terms, an educational foundation and our programs over the years have been in those fields.

In 58 years of our history, I believe I can say that this Carnegie Corp. has been operated with no other purpose than to serve the public interest. There has been no private gain or personal gain to any member of the Carnegie family, to any trustee, to any employee of the foundation or to any other individual except fair compensation for services rendered.

Our program over the years has been in fields like the establishment of libraries in which the Carnegie Corp. and Andrew Carnegie in his own lifetime pioneered. We have had an active program in that field for many years. We have supported a wide variety of colleges and universities. I had a check made recently and discovered that the Carnegie Corp. in its history has made grants in every State of the Union, all 50 States.

We have had an active program in medical education. We have been interested in adult education over the years because we considered that very important.

We have done a lot in elementary and secondary education. And in the last few years we had a particular interest in the problems of preschool education, and we have some quite interesting programs we are supporting in that field.

And finally another area which we consider highly important is the strengthening of State and local government, and we have done a great deal, we think, in that field, a great deal comparatively, certainly, because this has not generally been an area in which foundations have been very active. We have had the privilege of supporting some excellent organizations in that field, the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures, the Education Commission of the States, the National Municipal League and many others.

You will be hearing later this morning, I believe, from Senator Arrington from Illinois who will talk about some of the work of the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures.

We have developed a strong opposition to an income tax on foundations as we have considered this matter in our foundation, and the reasons are the following: First, I think one needs to consider something of the history of income tax exemption in our society. It is part of a much longer tradition that goes back to Roman times in which private, charitable organizations, have been given certain privileges by the State in exchange for the functions they performed in private charity, that is functions such as relief of the poor, taking care of widows and orphans and that sort of thing, more recently in the medical field, in welfare and a variety of other areas. They are the traditional charitable functions which have always been performed by private organizations.

It is true that over the years it has become necessary for the State to move into many of these fields, but there remains a legitimate role for private philanthropy, and there is much we can do. You heard this morning from a panel of witnesses the kind of things foundations, as one part of the charitable field, still do, and these are important things.

In 1799 an income tax was levied in Britain for the first time, and in that year, at the time that act was passed, the income of charitable organizations, was exempted from tax. That seemed a perfectly natural thing to do because of the functions these charitable organizations were performing.

So, later, in 1913 in this country, when we had our first constitutionally based income tax passed, it also seemed natural to exempt the income of all charitable organizations from tax. And over the years since then the State has never made any attempt to distinguish between various classes of charitable organizations. They have all been considered equal under the law. There has been no such thing as a qualified, or limited, income tax. It has been all or nothing. The concept of income tax exemption has been considered indivisible.

Now, if an income tax is put on foundations by this bill you are considering, even if it is a very limited tax, if it is an income tax, then the Congress will have breached a long-standing tradition and indeed a public policy in this country since 1913. We feel that that is a major decision, not just a minor decision having to do with tax reform. It is a major decision about the nature of our society, because that decision will have set a precedent which might conceivably lead to the taxation of other classes of charitable organizations by some future Congress, and would certainly give encouragement to other levels of government to levy their own income taxes not only on foundations but on other classes of charitable organizations. So we think the precedent is a bad one.

We also feel that the tax would be discriminatory because it would fall on foundations but not on other classes of tax exempt organizations, and as many witnesses have already said this morning, the tax would be illogical because the burden of it would fall on the beneficiaries of foundations.

Finally, we think that the tax would be irrelevant to curing the real abuses that there are in the foundation field. Clearly measures are required, clearly the measures you are considering having to do with self-dealing are required. Clearly there should be a greater disclosure of the operations of foundations and, if I might express a personal opinion here, I would like to repeat what I said in my testimony before the Ways and Means Committee that I think there should be obligatory publication of annual reports by all foundations; that even if it is very simply prepared material it should be available to anyone from the public who wants it, and I am disappointed in the House bill on that score.

In conclusion, just to summarize, I would like to say that we, at Carnegie Corp., feel that this tax would be harmful to the public interest. We believe furthermore that it would be unfair to many fine foundations such as our own that have operated through their history entirely in the public interest.

We also feel that if the Internal Revenue Service had done a good job of auditing tax exempt organizations over the years we probably wouldn't be sitting here today. It is certainly possible we would not be. A lot of our troubles spring from the fact that the IRS has not done a good job over the years and for this reason we have proposed, and my colleague, David Freeman, from the Council on Foundations will elaborate on this, that an annual fee be assessed on the assets of all foundations and that the proceeds of this fee be earmarked specifically for the auditing of foundation returns.

We feel out of that we would get the protection that we and foundations like ours need, and we feel this is a proper governmental function. We also feel that we have lacked that protection and we think the time has come for the government to do that for us.

Thank you very much.

Mr. HARRAR. Mr. Chairman, may I present Mr. David Freeman of the Council on Foundations?

STATEMENT OF DAVID FREEMAN, PRESIDENT, COUNCIL ON FOUNDATIONS

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to be here. I will attempt to speak very briefly on behalf of the smaller foundations, many of whom are included in our membership of some 425 across the country.

Small foundations, and the middle-sized foundations will be hit equally heavily by the 7½ percent tax on investment income.

Further than that, however, the organizations to which they traditionally give their support will feel this tax very immediately.

The small foundation typically has very small overhead. It is required under present regulations to expend substantially all of its income and, in fact, it is in every community of any size across the country one of the major sources of support for United Funds, the local welfare organizations and, of course, the educational institutions in those smaller cities.

The latest figures we have indicate 41 percent of foundation giving actually does go to education, and in response to the point that Senator Hansen raised earlier, I think it is fair to say that this is particularly true of the smaller foundations which are the ones most likely to be aware of the needs of the smaller educational institutions in their own areas. We can cite a number of examples, but I won't trouble you with those.

There is another aspect of the foundation giving which will be hit by this tax because, of course, the tax will mean that foundations have less to give away, and that is the challenge grant which has been referred to by the earlier panel. This is a technique which is not limited to the large foundations. It is used also by individual givers and by smaller foundations, and the effect of this on the recipient has been proven time after time to be that at least the amount of the grant received from the foundation is triggered from other sources, and very often it may be doubled, so that one can argue that the effect of this tax on the kind of organizations, that seek capital funds and, therefore, seek challenge grants, will be much more severe than merely the 7½ percent figure.

I should add as relates to the smaller and middle-sized foundations that this tax will inevitably be received as a punitive measure because, as Dr. Pifer has pointed out, it does not discriminate between the good guys and the bad guys. It is a flat tax on everybody's income, and I am afraid it will be a major deterrent to the growth of the private foundation. I would urge the Senate to consider seriously the advisability of encouraging rather than discouraging this growth.

As earlier witnesses have indicated, far from eroding the tax base, the growth of foundations has just barely kept pace with gross national product and with other indices of economic growth. Thus, the tax will put a further squeeze on the private sector and force charitable and educational institutions to turn increasingly to Government for support.

Now, I would like to say a word about the alternative which is suggested to cover what we all recognize as the problem which IRS has had in obtaining sufficient funds and, therefore, sufficient staff to properly investigate foundations and audit the requirements.

We recognize the need for strengthened enforcement in the field. To curb the admitted abuses, we recommend that an annual fee be assessed against foundations and charitable trusts levied as an excise based on foundation assets. The assets can be readily determined and will not provide an added problem for IRS since another provision of the bill, the provision requiring distribution, does already require the determination of assets.

We feel that the funds collected should be made available to IRS for more adequate auditing and supervisory staff in the private foundation field.

We would like to make a special point of the fact that this fee should be assessed against assets rather than income. As Dr. Pifer has pointed out, we feel it is very important that the principle of tax exemption not be breached.

Regardless of the amount that might be fixed, if the tax is a tax on income, even though it may be given another label, it will be regarded by the public, and I am afraid by other taxing authorities at the State and local level, as an income tax. In fact, it could be argued, as I believe one of the Senators pointed out at an earlier hearing, that some States would automatically tax foundations once an income tax is imposed by the Federal Government.

We would argue further that assessing the tax against assets will provide a fairer measure of determining the appropriate supervisory costs, particularly in the case of foundations which have a portfolio of relatively low-yield stock and are, therefore, not giving away quite as much as some others may be, but have real accounting problems in terms of determining how much should be given away under the distribution test.

As I have indicated, we do not believe that using the asset test would provide any additional burden on IRS, since that test must be applied in the distribution section.

Finally, we urge that the level of the tax be left to the determination of the Secretary of the Treasury. This will make clear that the funds received, whether or not specially earmarked, are intended to cover the costs of supervision of the private foundation area.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I do want to ask one question, Mr. Freeman.

On June 4th, that was 4 months ago, I asked you to provide us with information that would give us some basis upon which to see just what payments have been made to public officials. You undertook to obtain that information. But the latest I had was a letter on July 25, 1969, and as of that date there were only 216 out of 404 of these foundations had reported and of those only a handful had given any information. I would assume somebody has something shocking to report, and if he has he will be the last man reporting. When are you going to hear from the rest of these people?

Mr. FREEMAN. I have an updating for you, Mr. Chairman. I had not mailed it to you because of the pressure of other events.

I think it is fair to say that we have had a reasonably good return now. You will remember that in our discussions, when we were discussing Senator Williams' proposed amendment I indicated that, of course, this would have to be a voluntary effort on the part of our membership.

We now have returns from some 300 of the 404 members to whom we addressed the poll, and of these 295 have indicated that as a foundation they made no direct payments; five have indicated they made direct payments, and I have the specifics as to those payments available for you.

The second part of the questionnaire related to the grantees of the foundations and, as I indicated to when we first discussed this, I anticipated that there would be a longer delay in obtaining this information. In fact, we now have 219 foundations who say that, to the best of their belief, none of their grantees made such payments. Seventy-four of the foundations that answered "No" for themselves have not yet replied for their grantees. We have 7 foundations with "Yes" answers from grantees, so that of the 300-odd who have responded, we have a total of 12 "Yes" answers.

Let me indicate to the other Senators that the "Yes" answers were an indication that these particular foundations or their grantees have made payments within a specific period of time to a Government official at a given level or above of salary for a journey to a particular meeting or for an honorarium to address the meeting or in a couple of instances awards to Congressmen and Senators for outstanding service in particular areas of interest to the foundation.

I will be glad to submit this information to you, Senator. I apologize for the delay.

The CHAIRMAN. You understand, I am not suggesting there is anything wrong about these grants or awards. So far as I am concerned, I presume they are all completely justified.

Mr. FREEMAN. I think you will find the information will be helpful. It suggests to me one thing if I may take a moment on this, though it is out of order for our panel discussion, and that is that several of the "Yes" answers indicate the desirability of some flexibility in the present version of the Williams bill, if I may call it that, as it is contained in the House bill, with regard to foreign travel.

We have indications from these "Yes" answers of half a dozen senior Government officials who attended scientific conferences overseas because—with foundation support or with the support of a grantee of a foundation, because—as is spelled out in each case—they were just unable to obtain the necessary travel funds from their own departmental budgets, and I think the types of trips that were taken, and the types of meetings attended will be of real interest.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say this, unless the committee wants to do so, I do not even plan to release the information you are providing to me. But I would like to know why it takes 4 months on part A which, from my point of view, any one of these people should have been able to give you the day after it was requested.

Why does it take so long for them to get the information in part A? "Did you make a payment last year or the year before to a Government official?"

Mr. FREEMAN. Part of the answer, Mr. Chairman, is another problem with which my council has been attempting to deal with, and which I am sure many of the members of your audience today can appreciate, and that is that smaller foundations across the country are typically not very fully staffed, and when we send out a questionnaire to them, particularly if we send it out in the middle of the summer, we cannot expect very prompt attention to the answer to that questionnaire.

I would also add, as we discussed before, where part B was involved, it was obviously going to be a longer process, but I can only beg forgiveness on the argument that the foundations in the middle of the summer are hard to get to in terms of paper work.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, if I recall correctly, our understanding was that part A would be simple enough to answer that, during the period January 1, 1968 through June 4, 1969, during the last 18 months is the date we are asking it, "Did your foundation make a direct payment or directly provide services or facilities in aggregate of $25, in excess of $25, to any Member of the U.S. Congress or Federal Judiciary, any member of the executive branch, the Federal Government, whose rank was equivalent to GS-16, which is $22,800 and above, or any Member of Congress or Senators' staff receiving a Federal salary of $15,000 or above, yes or no."

It would seem to me that if those foundations, those small foundations, had such inadequate managements that they can't provide you a yes or a no answer to that question in 4 months, that there are some serious doubts whether they ought to be granted tax exempt privileges just for lack of capacity to know what they are doing with their own money.

So 104 that have not responded, it would seem to me we ought to know from the other 104 what is the answer to part A. In part B we want to know what happened indirectly, and if you made some payments, which there is some reason to think this might have been paid indirectly to some Government officials, we would like to know about that.

May I say that I can understand how some of this information could be embarrassing to someone even though there was nothing whatever wrong about the grants made. But I do think we are entitled to the information. You said we could get it, and we want it, we would like to know it.

On June 4, I said to you I would like to have that information before we acted on this big bill, and we still do not have it. This is 4 months later. When can we hear from the other 104 of your peaple?

Mr. FREEMAN. Senator, I cannot guarantee that you will hear from all the other 104 because you and I agree, this was going to be a volunteer activity. I have sent out reminders to our full membership. I will, of course, send out a further reminder. I suggest for a volunteer activity conducted chiefly during the summertime, a 75-percent return is not too bad.

But I think, the message here, really is to be sure that the members of the committee see the kind of "Yes" answers we have received because I think they are quite significant in indicating what it is that does lead foundations to make these payments to Government officials and for what purposes these funds are used. This is really the guts of the problem.

So I will again question the remaining members who have not yet replied. I will get the information to you as promptly as I can, and meanwhile I will be happy to turn this over to Mr. Vail.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

(Information received by the committee on the points raised was made a point of the official files of the committee.)

Senator WILLIAMS. In connection with the statement of the chairman, we would assume that those who have something that they are going to cover up would be the most reluctant to answer the question.

However, since this is a voluntary program, I am going to volunteer this suggestion. You tell those that do not answer we are going to proceed on the assumption they are enthusiastically in favor of the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREEMAN. Thank you, Senator Williams. I think that will have a strong effect on them.

Senator WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Now, the bill provides for an orderly liquidation of the assets, that is, foundations holdings of securities in any one company would be gradually reduced to a maximum of 20 percent. What are your views on that, Mr. Pifer.

Mr. PIFER. Did you mean that for me?

Senator WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. PIFER. This is a complex question that affects many foundations in different ways. There are many foundations that, in fact, own a good deal more stock in a corporation than 20 percent, where the income from that foundation has been used for nothing but charitable purposes. The Kellogg Foundation, I guess, would be a good example of this. I certainly feel that the primary test, as was suggested by Senator Curtis here, is how the money is, in fact, used, how the income is, in fact, used.

So I think another consideration here is that if there is going to be divestiture, the length of time, the conditions of divestiture, the percentage of stock a foundation can hold should be reconsidered. The whole idea of the timetable toward divestiture should also be reconsidered.

I think, in broad principle, if I could express a personal view—and this is simply a personal view and it is expressed within the context of the fact, as I have said, that there are many fine foundations that do at least own 20 percent of the particular stock in a company—that the active control of a business by foundation is, in principle, not a good thing.

This is because it is diversionary of the interests and energies of the foundation staff and of the foundation trustees.

Broadly, the purposes are, in the long run, different between a profit-making organization and a nonprofit organization. However, as I have said, this is a complex matter, and I would hope this is an area in which the Senate Finance Committee will study very carefully and not move precipitously to hurt any of the fine foundations which, in fact, do own a substantial proportion of the stock of a corporation, and yet are using these proceeds for wholly charitable purposes.

Senator WILLIAMS. All right.

Senator TALMADGE. Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to ask two questions. I would like to ask the first of Mr. Freeman. Mr. Freeman, you have suggested in lieu of an income tax on foundations that a fee or levy on the assets be charged.

In my judgment, that would be unconstitutional. The Congress does have the authority by constitutional amendment to levy an income tax. I think if we levied a capital tax, it would be a capital levy, I think that is probably unconstitutional.

The question that I have is this: in 1967, if the facts that I possess are accurate, 647 foundations, which included all of the major foundations, made contributions, gifts, and grants of some $754 million, but the accumulation of income in those same foundations during those same years was in excess of $2 billion. In other words, the contributions were less than half of what they received.

Don't you think we should levy an income tax on the income that they did not distribute?

Mr. FREEMAN. Senator Talmadge, let me try my hand very quickly at the first question. A paper has been prepared and submitted to Mr. Vail's staff and the others on the precise constitutional point that you raise.

It is the strong feeling of the lawyers who have studied this from the point of view of the foundations that an excise tax, or an excise more properly, would, in fact, be clearly constitutional. There is adequate documentation for this. I am not a constitutional lawyer myself, and I won't attempt to go further than to say that the point has been researched.

On the question of the accumulation, I think the difficulty with those figures which, if I recognize them, come from Congressman Patman's studies, is that they include donations to foundations and unrealized or realized capital gains.

If one takes the donations to foundations as an accretion of capital, which is the way the present regulations provide, then they do not fall within the scope of the word "accumulation" as it is used in the present statute.

In other words, if you create a foundation and give it several million dollars to get it off the ground, that is not considered an accumulation. That is an accretion of capital of the foundation, and it is the income which those millions of dollars then earn which must be paid out annually and which, under the present rules, must not be accumulated unreasonably.

So that I think the question of taxing the assets becomes one of whether this is the fairest way to assess the fundations or a service which the Government is providing and which we trust the Government will be able to provide more fully and effectively, and we would argue, for the reasons I have indicated, that the asset test seems to us to be much the fairest.

Senator TALMADGE. My own comment on it is that if I were a very rich man I would hate to see that precedent established, because if Congress can make a capital levy on foundations it could make a capital levy on citizens.

My next question is of Dr. Harrar. I am well aware of the many fine things the Rockefeller Foundation has done, some in my own state, but I have in my hand here a document and, incidentally, this does come from Congressman Patman's study. In the year 1966 the Rockefeller Foundation, according to this report, had compensation of officers of $1,400,000 plus, other wages and salaries, $1,300,000 plus; taxes, $64,000 plus; rent, $485,000 plus; miscellaneous expenses, $2,400,000 plus; total expenses, $5,763,354.

During that year you made total grants, contributions, gifts, scholarships, and so forth, of $30,586,000.

Now, a rough computation indicates that that would be about 17 percent administrative expenses. Isn't that rather high?

Mr. HARRAR. Yes, sir. If you will permit, I will not try to handle the figures because they are the responsibilities of others. But I can say that there is a substantial difference in interpretation of those figures between ourselves and the source of that report.

As I said earlier, our staff is professional. They are located in New York and in the field. We use them to work in professional association with leaders in the areas of public health, agriculture, nutrition, and so on. We consider the maintenance of this professional staff to be part of our philanthropic contribution. It is the basis of our philanthropy.

(The witness subsequently supplied additional information as follows:)

Senator Talmadge asked me to supply the Committee with an explanation of the statement made by Congressman Patman in one of his reports to his Subcommittee, that The Rockefeller Foundation had overhead costs of $5.4 million in 1966, which would have been 15.5% of the Foundation's total 1966 expenditures of $34.9 million.

The explanation is as follows: The amount spent by the Foundation in 1966 for administrative costs, as distinct from the amount spent on its charitable program, is shown in our 1966 Annual Report as $2,230,286. The $5.4 million figure that Congressman Patman used includes those administrative costs and also includes all the costs of planning and conducting—out of our New York office—the Foundation's national and international programs, including travel, program officer's salaries, and consultants' salaries. In addition, it includes a nonrecurring payment of $958,000 to transfer to an outside insurance carrier a fund for vested pension obligations which had until then been maintained as an internal reserve fund.

Our 1966 administrative costs of $2,230,286 amount to 6.4% of our 1966 expenditures, which as stated above were $34.9 million.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator CURTIS. In the interest of time, I will ask one question.

Mr. Freeman, about how many foundations have you had some contact with over the years, and of those numbers—and I do not want you to name names of the foundations—have you discovered instances where foundations have not acted in the general public interest?

Mr. FREEMAN. Senator Curtis, I have worked for three different foundations fulltime; I have been a consultant to two family foundations, and in my present position I am working with a number of foundations, certainly not all 420 members, but a wide variety of different types of foundations.

I would say that if I were to try to strike a percentage figure, certainly no more than 1 percent of the foundations that I have had any contact with, in my own judgment, have really gone outside the limits, as we understand them.

I would not want to say that every 990(a) form that I have examined has been what I would have submitted for that foundation. I think this bears on the question of audit. I think a number of foundations in preparing their 990(a)'s or having their CPAs or having their attorneys prepare them, have not understood the form fully, have not reflected adequately in the form what they are actually doing and, as a result, quite frequently I have been able to identify on their 990 (a) forms what I considered unreasonable accumulations of income which, on further exploration with them informally, have turned out to be just bad reporting on their part.

But in terms of really going off the reservation, really doing things that you and I would consider were unethical, were clearly self-dealing, I would say certainly no more than 1 percent of the foundations I have dealt with would fall within that general area.

Senator CURTIS. Thank you.

Senator JORDAN. Mr. Freeman, would you favor public disclosure of the operations of all foundations?

Mr. FREEMAN. Yes, Senator Jordan. Our Council for the first time in its existence last April took a public position. We had been a service organization. We never really tried to think through where we stood in terms of any specific issues in the foundation field.

We submitted a letter to the House Ways and Means Committee, a copy of which the Chairman of this Committee very kindly allowed to be introduced into the record during the hearings on the Williams' amendment, in which we strongly recommended full public disclosure and, if I may say so, I subscribe entirely to what Dr. Pifer has indicated.

We went further in that recommendation than the present House bill goes in that we would require that every foundation make available to the public some record of its own activities on an annual basis, whether only a mimeographed paper or listing of the grants from a 990(a) form or something, so that the general public, in trying to find out about foundations—and this is a question of all the people in foundations have fired at them all the time, "Well, if you can't help us where should we go?" The general public would be a little better informed than by having to go to the relatively few places where 990(a)'s are available, and wade through them.

We would strongly urge this. We would think it would be a very helpful thing to put people on their mettle to make a good report and do a good job.

Senator JORDAN. Now, Dr. Pifer, you suggest that, perhaps, some of the abuses and malpractices of some foundations are caused by the inadequacy of the supervision of the IRS.

Do you think the alternative proposal that you have made here to supply a fund for more staffing in the Internal Revenue Service for this particular job would take care of that difficulty?

Mr. PIFER. Yes, Senator Jordan, I think it would go a long way toward taking care of it, provided there is adequate legislation against self-dealing and, of course, requiring full disclosure.

I think if those two things were done, and then if we had adequate supervision of the returns filed by the foundations we would have gone a long, long way toward solving the problems in this field.

Of course, this means the audit must take place frequently. We cannot have an audit every five years or ten years. It seems to me that ideal might be something like an audit every 2 years, for every private foundation.

Senator JORDAN. Have any of you calculated how many staff people might be required to do this job?

Mr. PIFER. We have not calculated that figure. We have heard a figure that has, we understand, been produced in the Internal Revenue Service, that might be something $17 million, but we have thought that was really the responsibility of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and have, therefore, suggested that the Secretary of the Treasury be the one who would calculate the amount to be, of the fee to be, charged to each foundation, because only, with the help of the Commissioner, will he ultimately be in a position to know exactly how much money will be required to do the job.

Senator JORDAN. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BYRD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Pifer, you testified that the assets of the Carnegie Foundation totaled $340 million.

Mr. PIFER. That is correct, sir.

Senator BYRD. Do you happen to have the corresponding figure for ten years ago?

Mr. PIFER. I am afraid I do not have that in my head, Senator Byrd. I would be very happy to supply it for the record.

Senator BYRD. I would appreciate it if you would.

Mr. PIFER. I would be happy to.

(The Committee subsequently received the following information:)

MARKET VALUE OF CARNEGIE CORP. ASSETS

At the end of fiscal 1958, the market value of the Corporation's total assets was $253 million. At the end of fiscal 1968, the market value of total assets was $335 million, an increase of 32% in the course of the decade.

As shown on the attached sheet, in contrast with the 32% growth in Carnegie Corporation's assets, total national wealth increased about 78% in the same period, gross national product went up 94%, and total U.S. debt & equity went up approximately 111%.

Note: During most of the years from 1958 through 1968, common stocks accounted for a little over one-half of Carnegie Corporation's total investments (the percentage of investment assets in common stocks ranged from a low of 48.7% in 1960 to a high of 62.3% in 1967; the remainder consisted principally of bonds and mortgages). Counsel throughout the Corporation's history have advised that under the terms of the donor's deed of gift and the foundation's charter corpus may not be invaded. Capital gains have therefore been treated as capital and added to corpus.

CARNEGIE CORP., COMPARATIVE INCREASE IN VALUE OF ASSETS, 1958-68

[Dollar figures in millions]

	Total Carnegie assets	Percent increase	Total national wealth[1]	Percent increase	Gross national product[2]	Increase	Total U.S. net debt and equity[3]	Percent increase
1958	$253		$1,703,000		$447,300		$1,187,000
1968	335	32	3,036,000	78	865,700	94	2,502,000	111

[1] Aggregate value of all tangible U.S. nonmilitary wealth including land, structures, equipment, inventories, and livestock. Partly estimated; based on Goldsmith and Kendrick data for the national balance sheet.
[2] From Department of Commerce, Office of Business Economics.
[3] Net public and private debt at end of year (bonds, notes, mortgages, etc.) plus market value of all corporate stocks. From Federal Reserve Bulletin and economics department at Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. of New York. Partly estimated.

Senator BYRD. Mr. Harrar, would you indicate the total assets of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. HARRAR. Yes, sir. I think at the moment it is just under $800 million.

Senator BYRD. How does that figure compare with 10 years ago?

Mr. HARRAR. I just could not give you that figure. I would be glad to send it to you, but I could not give you what I would feel would be an accurate or responsible answer from my own memory.

Senator BYRD. Would you supply that for the record?

Mr. HARRAR. Yes, indeed, sir.

(The information referred to follows:)

Senator Byrd asked me to supply the Committee with the present and ten-year-ago market values of the holdings of The Rockefeller Foundation, and Senator Curtis suggested that the analysis show how much of the increase was the result of retaining income and how much the result of appreciation in value. The figures are as follows (in millions of dollars):

Market value of securities at Sept. 30, 1969	$787.8
Market value of securities at Dec. 31, 1959	584.5
Increase in market value during decade	203.3

EXPLANATION OF INCREASE IN MARKET VALUE

Appreciation in value of securities during decade	264.7
Contributions received	2.3
Deduct capital expended during decade	(63.7)
Total	203.3

During the decade the Foundation expended all its ordinary income—amounting to $274.1 million—and $63.7 million of its principal. From its inception in 1913 to the present the Foundation expended all its ordinary income—amounting to $784.7 million—as well as principal in the amount of $155.5 million.

Senator CURTIS. Would the distinguished Senator yield right there?

Senator BYRD. I would be glad to yield.

Senator CURTIS. I tihnk it would be helpful if the record shows how much of the increase, if you had an increase, is the result of retained earnings, and how much of it might be inflationary or growth.

Mr. PIFER. If I could add a word to this, Senator——.

Senator CURTIS. I did not mean to take the questioning away.

Senator BYRD. That is all right.

Mr. PIFER (continuing). In our particular case—and we are somewhat unusual here, but there are other foundations in our position—it has been the opinion of our legal counsel over the years that the Carnegie Corporation was not allowed to spend corpus; that is, to spend capital, so we have never spent capital gains, and our capital gains have been plowed into the corpus.

Now, this obviously—this bill is going to raise some difficulties for us, and it means that we are going to have to make an effort to get our charter changed. This will probably mean an act of the New York State Legislature, and if that becomes necessary, we are fully prepared to make that effort.

But I trust that in considering the figures of the growth of our corpus it will be noted that in our case our legal counsel has consistenly maintained that we were not in a position to spend capital gains.

Senator BYRD. For whatever the reason, I think it is important that the Congress be aware of the growth that has taken place in the total assets of all of the foundations of our Nation.

Now, in looking over some figures I find that 25 years ago the total assets were less than $2 billion, $1.8 billion. It was testified this morning, and the Treasury, on questioning by me, also verified that the total assets are more than $21 billion. So that in 25 years the total asests of the Nation's foundations have increased tenfold.

Now, if that continues another 25 years, that would be $200 billion, and I am just wondering whether the foundations will not become more powerful than the Federal Government.

The question I would like to direct to the two of you, and it is a friendly question [laughter], but do you feel that in the long-range interests of the Nation that there should be a terminal date put on corporations, or should there be permitted as it has been in the past, to be pertual?

Mr. PIFER. If I might take a crack at that one, Senator, I think this question of perpetuity is one that one has to consider in a broader context. There are other forms of charitable organizations, and they have their charters, and if a limit is put on the life of the foundations, as one form of charitable organization, again we have set a precedent in our society for someone to raise the question with regard to others.

Now, what about churches? Should there be a limit on the life of a church? Should there be a limit on the life of a college or a university? These are endowed institutions, like foundatons. They have boards of trustees, like foundations, and many classes of charitable organizations exist, and I think this again would be one of those very fundamental decisions which ought to be most carefully considered because of the precedent it might establish in regard to the entire charitable organization field.

Now, about the growth of foundation assets, the study which the group, the coordinated group has made and which, I hope, Mr. Chairman, we might have the privilege of entering into the record, I cannot remember whether Mr. Miller requested that, but if he did not, I would like to request it, that study shows that foundation assets, although they have been rising in relation to themselves, have been rising less rapidly than the rate of growth of the wealth of the country. In fact, we are now beginning to get a decline.

Foundations are declining relatively in relation to many other indices of the economy of the country and, therefore, we feel that anything which is done, such as limiting the life of foundations, which would tend to discourage the creation of new foundations and to discourage the whole field of philanthropy is going to cause simply a further decline in this curve.

The result of that inevitably will be that the private sector, the nongovernmental sector, will be less well-financed, and here again we come back to that very basic question about the nature of our society and the role played by nongovernmental organizations in it.

Senator BYRD. What are these figures that you are speaking of? These figures you want to submit for the record; what are the figures; what do they deal with?

Mr. PIFER. Here they are. Well, the conclusions, the principal conclusions, of this study were that foundations have never owned a significant proportion of the financial instruments, such as stocks, bonds, mortgages, et cetera.

Senator BYRD. Let me interrupt you for a minute, if you will.

I put this question to the Treasury Department, and I thought maybe you have the answer to that. The Treasury has not been able to give it to me. I asked the Treasury what were the total assets of the Nation's foundations in 1938, in 1948, in 1958, and in 1968.

Mr. PIFER. I have those figures, Senator.

Senator BYRD. I am glad you have those. You have even more power than the Federal Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIFER. Perhaps, Senator, this is a good illustration of our belief that the Federal Government has not been in the business of collecting adequate information about the entire nonprofit organization field.

The assets of foundations in 1938 were $1.4 billion; in 1948, $3.5 billion; in 1958, $12.5 billion, and in 1968 it was $21 billion.

Now, I could give corresponding figures for the total national wealth in those same years.

Senator BYRD. That is not of interest to me.

I find out now, though, that 30 years ago the total assets were $1.4 billion, 30 years ago, 1938.

Mr. PIFER. That is correct.

Senator BYRD. Is that correct?

Mr. PIFER. Yes.

Senator BYRD. And 1968 they are $21 billion; am I correct on that?

Mr. PIFER. That is correct.

Senator BYRD. Well, the only reason I raised this point is—and I want to add, and I would like to direct this question to the three of you—do you feel that in the long run there is a danger, there is a danger to our Nation, if we do not put some limit, time limit, or some other limit, on the amount of assets that private tax-exempt foundations can accumulate?

Mr. PIFER. Senator, if I might speak again, it seems to me the answer to that question must always be what proportion the foundation assets bear to the total wealth of the country.

Now, those foundation assets have never exceeded 1 percent of the total wealth of the country and, indeed, it is now falling.

It started at 0.36, and it went at the highest point, to 0.75, that is ¾th of 1 percent, and it is now down to 0.69. We estimate that it is going to keep falling.

So it seems to me it is not a question of absolute rise in foundation assets but where do they stand in the total picture. Are they an increasing portion of the wealth of the country.

Now, if they were a rapidly increasing proportion of the total wealth, then I think that would be serious cause for examination of possible corrective measures.

Seantor BYRD. You see, you do not—you do not feel that it is serious at the present time?

Mr. PIFER. I do not, because the proportion is falling.

Senator BYRD. Would you say something, Mr. Harrar?

Mr. HARRAR. I would have to support, because of the research we have done in the same field, the position taken by Mr. Pifer that this matter is more relative to the more basic figure of the economy of the Nation. Foundations are running ahead, far ahead, in numbers and, of course, numbers frighten a lot of people. The amount of national resources is increasing much faster than the assets of foundations. Instead of holding 0.68 percent of the Nation's asset's we could have foundations holding 2 percent. Then I would say it is a trend and a factor for major alarm. But it is not happening that way. I think private philanthropy has the validity which I believe it needs to keep pace with the general growth of the economy.

So far as perpetuity is concerned, sir, I have never cared for the word "perpetuity." It is a little bit like immortality, it is a little hard to come by, but I do feel, and I have said on many occasions in the past, that I think every instrument granted the privilege of tax exemption by reason of its objectives and goals has to re-earn its franchise regularly. This is not something we have forever because it was granted to us once. It is something that I think that those of us who have the responsibility, to ourselves, and to the public, must each year, each period, try to demonstrate, that the franchise is something we have earned, and continue to earn.

If not, then I think action should be taken.

Senator BYRD. Thank you, gentlemen.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HANSEN. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HARRAR. Thank you for the courtesy and privilege of being with us.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you for your presence here today.

We will next hear from a panel of witnesses on the effect of program limitations. They are Merrimon Cuninggim, president, Danforth Foundation; Homer Wadsworth, president, Kansas City Association of Trusts and Foundations, and the Honorable W. Russell Arrington, president pro tempore, Illinois State Senate, testifying for the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures.

Senator Percy, I believe, wanted to produce some constituents.

Senator PERCY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will be testifying before this committee on Wednesday morning, but I would just like to say now before introducing Senator Arrington, I think these hearings are among the most important hearings the Congress has ever held, and having seen the consequences, and having been startled by the consequences of the action of the House, I can only say "Thank God we have a bicameral system and we can stop, look and see now about the effect being done by this tax bill, and have a chance to reevaluate what we are doing to America's society."

We are really asking ourselves what kind of a nation do we want to be, and what kind of a people do we want to become.

It was de Tocqueville who discovered in 1823 that a great deal is done in voluntary associations and in the private sectors.

Senator Byrd's question that he asked: can we place a limit on the assets of our foundations, we can if we want to place a limit on how much we want to do in the private sector and, gentlemen, let us not do all this in the public sector. But it does seem to me every single one of us sitting here that I can see of my colleagues is concerned about one thing. We are concerned about how much erosion of local and State government responsibility we have had, how much erosion of the private sector at the expense of the public, and how much more we are trying to take on in the public sector, and what we are trying to do when we created a new federalism, is move back some of these programs out of Washington, back into the private sector and back to local and State governments. This is why I am very happy to have the president of our own Illinois State Senate here today, Senator Arrington.

He has not only been my own State senator, in my own district in Illinois, but he has been president pro tem of our senate. He has dealt with other members of State senates across the country in the 50 States, and various groups, including the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures.

He has from a practical standpoint dealt with the problem of how do we make our State governments responsive and responsible, and how do we take back from the Federal Government some of the problems that have always been sent down to Washington.

As a specific case, if we had not had him as the head of the senate, we would not have had a State income tax. Now, I hope this does not provoke reaction in Illinois [laughter], but I can say without any hesitation if the State of Illinois did not impose the State income tax this year we simply would have been bankrupt as a State and bankrupt in facing up to the responsibilities of the 11 million people. We would have sent more problems to Washington, not less.

We now have a tax structure, as a result of the Governor and the speaker of the house, who is now a colleague, Ralph Smith, and the president of the senate working together to face up to what we need to do as a people.

Certainly you have done more than, I know, anyone else to bring young people into the Government, to have the State government responsive to our needs.

So I am very pleased, indeed, to be able to introduce him. I believe that he will be able to make, with his colleagues on his panel, a very important contribution, and answer for us a question that plagues us: If this tax bill goes through, what would happen to the objective we have of the erosion of State and local government at the expense of the Federal Government taking over.

Mr. ARRINGTON. Thank you, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Will you now proceed as you planned, gentlemen.

STATEMENT OF MERRIMON CUNINGGIM, PRESIDENT, DANFORTH FOUNDATION

Mr. CUNINGGIM. Thank you very much.

Senator Arrington, Mr. Wadsworth, and I are to present the testimony concerning that part of the bill that imposes certain limitations on the programs of foundations.

We do not want to try your patience, sir, by needless repetition, for these matters have already been referred to briefly. We will try to keep our comments to a minimum, although we are open for any questions in this area.

There are four main points in the testimony of the three of us. We wish to point out that the bill as it now reads would prohibit "any attempt to influence legislation by a attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof." That is a quotation from the phrasing of the bill, and we believe that this prohibition will inhibit or prevent certain activities now approved which are very much in the general welfare.

We intend, secondly, to say a brief word about the partial prohibition that the bill now provides against grants to individuals.

Third, we wish to speak to the point of the definition of "expenditure responsibility" in the bill; and, finally, to point out that in our view the House committee's report indicates an intention in respect to the bill, with which we agree, and which, if followed, could repair the difficulties in the wording of the bill itself.

As for myself, I will speak briefly on the matter of grants to individuals, which is a relatively minor matter, and go on to the prohibition against any attempt to influence legislation.

My two colleagues will also speak to that point, from their different approaches.

It is always tempting in a situation like this, Mr. Chairman, to say a word about one's organization. I work for the Danforth Foundation, whose officers are in St. Louis.

We feel that we escape some of the limitations of horizon that some of our larger brethren necessarily possess by virtue of their being in the East.

We do make grants to nonprestigious institutions and, in fact, have contacts with more colleges than any other foundation in the country, and with more college people.

Our area of activity is education and urban affairs.

I want to say a word about the grants to individuals for, though this is a minor matter, it is still a matter of some concern to a number of foundations, not Danforth alone.

The CHAIRMAN. If I might just observe, I did not read that correctly. You are president of the Danforth Foundation. I have got you confused with one of those eastern foundations, and I am glad to have you correct me.

Mr. CUNINGGIM. I would like to associate myself with the Eastern Ivy as much as possible but I am the Danforth Foundation president. I am afraid that you are not the only one who made a mistake. For as far as my name I regret that my immediate ancestor did not know how to spell. [Laughter.]

The Danforth Foundation is in the business of making grants to individuals. That is to say, we have 10 or a dozen national programs of fellowship, awards, and prizes, given for various kinds of activities that we believe serve the general welfare.

We were concerned deeply when the House committee, in its May 27 announcement, indicated that its tentative decision was to prohibit all grants to individuals. The bill, as finally passed, represents a considerable improvement over the tentative decision, we believe, for as you know, the bill now allow those kinds of grants to individuals that are part of defined programs and fellowships publicly announced in which selection processes are carefully worked out and which contribute to the general public good.

We believe that this is an improvement, but there are questions still remaining here. For example, what about the status of national awards and prizes, carefully decided? They do not really fit the field of fellowships, as such.

Now, I won't take your time to go into the details of how that particular matter could, in our view, be improved, for I have tried to cover this in my written testimony, I simply want to conclude by saying that in the view of a number of foundations, not Danforth alone, that are concerned with the matter of grants to individuals, there are ways of protecting the general public against the kind of abuse that the House measure was directed at, and yet of allowing the kinds of national fellowship and award programs, that serve the general welfare.

The most important part of the testimony of all three of us, Mr. Chairman, has to do with the wording of the bill that would prohibit "any attempt to influence legislation by an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof."

This is a difficult matter to speak to for, at the very beginning I want to make quite clear, sir, that we do not believe in partisan political activity, lobbying, support of a particular candidate, or any such activities by foundations. We strongly support the effort of the House to indicate that these kinds of activities are inappropriate.

We believe, however, that the particular language used in that section is such as to call in question some part of the legitimate activities of nearly all foundations.

The wording "and attempt to affect the opinion of the general public," worries us. That is not a correct word. It does much more than worry us. In some degree it alarms us, for it would be, we believe, a challenge to the basic premise on which our foundation and other foundations operate. The premise I mean to refer to is that the work in which we are engaged possess both relevance and timeliness.

We want to make a difference in American life. We would like to feel that the programs we sponsor and the grants we make are pointed toward serious problems, not fluff, not superfluities.

We believe that it would be highly to the advantage of the general welfare if these problems were examined as carefully as could be by competent studies, by experts in the field and beyond that, if the results of those examinations were made available to and taken into account by the general public.

If, in almost any area of a foundation's activity, this process does, in fact, succeed, then sooner or later it is possible—it is more than possible, it is likely—that questions concerning that problem will come into the consideration of legislative bodies, local, State, and National.

It would be impossible, we think, to find any useful activity that would not be related to the problem of molding public opinion. Conservation of natural resources? Beautification of our highways? Air and water pollution? These seemingly innocent-sounding activities would sooner or later involve public opinion with the possibility of leading toward desirable legislation.

So we believe that in that particular wording the measure goes too far, since it would raise the question about the kind of nonpartisan activities, studies, reports, and programs which are to the public advantage.

I could list a great many individual grants, sir, that would illustrate this, not just from our foundation but others as well. Just to note a few that are related to people here this morning:

Mr. Felix Robb appeared earlier. We made a grant to the Southern Association so as to enable them to get started what they call the Education Improvement Project in many cities and rural communities across the South. This is a most ambitious program.

Other foundations have also aided it in large measure, and most of the boards of education of the States of the South are cooperating in that program.

It would be questionable whether we could now do so, in light of the fact that we hope a difference in the educatonal program in the South is going to be made by that program.

Again Mr. Pifer referred to the Educational Commission of the States. We have the honor to share with Carnegie, in support of this organization which encourages educators and legislators to pool their interests so that they can all work together on the kind of educational program they should undertake.

There are over 40 States that had to take legislative action to join that body.

The Carnegie and the Danforth Foundations joined equally in the sponsoring of that group, and by the bill's wording at the present time about influencing public opinion in legislative matters, we would not be able to do so.

Illustrations are legion. I won't take your time for more. If there is any question along that line I will be happy to try to answer it.

One further word before passing this matter to my colleagues:

The report suggests that the intention of the House committee was to prevent partisan political activity. The support of candidates, the lobbying for particular legislative measures—please let me say unequivocally that we support the intention fully to prohibit such things. We believe that the intention of the House committee report can be followed in the language of the final bill, and yet not cause the difficulties in respect to the useful programs of the foundations related to public issues and public problems that the present language would represent. Thank you very much, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Mr. CUNINGGIM. Next will be Mr. Homer Wadsworth, president of the Kansas City Association of Trusts and Foundations.

STATEMENT OF HOMER WADSWORTH, PRESIDENT, KANSAS CITY ASSOCIATION OF TRUSTS AND FOUNDATIONS

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the particular point of view from which I look at the question of program limitations and expenditure responsibility is that of relatively small foundations that operate in American communities and, therefore, look at the problems that beset us where those problems are and in association with the people who live and work there.

I have done so in Kanasas City for 20 years, and have experience in this regard in a number of other communities throughout the country.

I think the terms of this particular section will do violence to what has grown up as a natural condition of many of our communities under the impact of the kind of problems we are dealing with.

What we find in our communities is that the people of those areas, those who have money to contribute to charitable causes, and units of government, have joined hands—sometimes in desperation, to deal with the many matters that press for attention. To be able to determine at what point public discussion, investigation, nonpartisan analysis will lead to legislation is a very difficult and complicated thing, indeed.

Let me mention a few examples. The Rosenberg Foundation in San Francisco, which operates primarily in the youth field across the State is engaged in a first-class analysis of the problem of how to deal with a young person who has taken drugs in cooperation with the youth authority of that State, and the public welfare agencies, and a number of voluntary agencies.

It would be most unwise to assume that some form of legislation will not proceed from this investigation.

In the city of Chicago at the request of the circuit court and a citizens committee appointed by the court, the Chicago Community Trust is sponsoring a thoroughgoing analysis of the function of the juvenile court of Cook County. From it may be expected to come recommendations that will be reviewed both by the county but also by the State, inasmuch as the court in that community operates under the jurisdiction of the State.

In the State of Texas, the Hogg Foundation for more than 25 years has devoted most of its attention to the problem of how to deal with the medically indigent person who is emotionally ill. From its effort has arisen one of our finest State systems for the care of those who are mentally ill, a system in which the facilities of the university, public support, voluntary support, foundation support, have been largely indivisible.

In the city of Cleveland, the Cleveland Community Trust is engaged at this time, in sponsoring studies that are directed toward improving the curriculum of the police academy through which local police officers receive their basic training.

Or again in a circumstance in which Dr. Cuninggim and myself have been involved, in the State of Missouri, we are at this time financing studies that are directed toward the problem of how schools are organized and how schools are financed.

Now, I have no illusion about this effort and I am sure Dr. Cuninggim does not. Therefore, these studies will lead to proposals before the legislature of Missouri, and many of the people who take part in them will be witnesses before committees of the State senate and the State house in that State.

The watershed here would appear to be quite clearly that foundations have no business being involved in partisan matters, what the House committee report referred to as grassroots campaigning or electioneering or the support of individual candidates for office. That we can and must contribute to public discussion of essentially public questions, is, I think, mandatory.

My concern over a long period of experience with this is that very simply these provisions, if left in the bill, will numb foundation efforts and will drive foundation money away from those areas of American life which are of most concern to most people at this time.

Now, with references to expenditures responsibility, the act, as passed by the House would require that foundations be fully responsible for all funds that are made available to grantees.

Now, we are unable to determine, and we have asked many people, what "fully responsible" means. It is the current practice of all foundations to limit their grants to agencies that are adjudged by the Internal Revenue Service as qualifying under 501(c)(3) exemptions.

I do not believe that a granting agency should take over the functions of the Treasury Department, that is to say, to review the activities of tax exempt agencies or to insure that what they do is appropriate within the law.

Either the Treasury is capable of doing this or the Treasury is not, and I do not think it is possible for a foundation to maintain an army of lawyers and an army of cost accountants, to keep tract of every grant made. We ought to be able to presume that if an agency is tax exempt in the eyes of the Government it is qualified to receive a grant.

I know of no one in the field who objects to the notion that we should be reasonably diligent and proceed with care, is making grants and supervising them and that we should ask every grantee agency to submit regular reports. Frequently, and in almost all cases these reports should be accompanied by audits.

Those of us who make grants that extend beyond a single year are quite accustomed to making grants payable in the second or third or fourth year. subject to review of what happens during the course of the first year. This is standard practice.

I know of no one in the field who would object to sharing with officials of the Internal Revenue Service all of the information that we have on grantee agencies.

I do feel that the terms of expenditure responsibility as written, and especially in view of the very severe penalties that are inflicted both upon foundations and upon foundation managers will drive foundations in this area, as well, to support of little more than a mother and home.

The CHAIRMAN. What?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mother and home. I am in favor of that, certainly, but it seems to me we have a few things beyond that to trouble us, and which legitimately should be looked at, and it seems to me that there should be some clear recognition in the field of expenditure responsibility, that we should pursue reasonably diligently reporting and making that reporting available, and ourselves report to the public what we do in all respects. It protects the public interest in an important way.

Thank you very much.

Mr. CUNINGHAM. Senator Arrington.

STATEMENT OF W. RUSSELL ARRINGTON, PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE, ILLINOIS STATE SENATE

Mr. ARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in addition to my legislative responsibilities, I want you to know that I am an attorney with offices in Chicago, and I am also vice president and general counsel and secretary of the Combined Insurance Co. of America, as well as the director, a director, of Alberto Culver Co.

As my Senator mentioned to you, I am president pro tem and majority leader of the Illinois State Senate, and also a member of the executive committee of the National conference of State Legislative Leaders, of the executive committee of the National Society of State Legislators, and I was tremendously pleased and happy over the appointment by the President of me as one of the three State legislators to the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

I might say that I have the honor of serving on that Commission with three of your fine colleagues, Senators Muskie, Mundt, and Ervin.

My purpose in coming here to discuss this matter with you is to point out what I believe to be the unintended effects of the language that is employed.

I am concerned more by the language than either of these gentlemen have alluded to.

I am here, too, on behalf of the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures. I am not a member of that organization, serve in no officership, never have and never expect to. But I am concerned about the frightening results the employment of this language will have on this association.

In effect, it will cause it to be extinguished because this conference derives 87 percent of its funds from foundations.

The other 13 percent is derived from business and labor, and the character of its work is too important to have that happen without at least detailing for you gentlemen the language that does it, and the rather broad implications that the language employed has, and I am sure it is not intended.

Under H.R. 13270, the Citizens Conference would be prohibited from carrying out propaganda or otherwise attempt to influence legislation, one, through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public; two influence the outcome of any public election; and, three, influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body.

I do not join with these two gentlemen who just testified in the utter acceptance of the influencing the outcome of any public election. We, in Illinois, were very fortunate in including as a segment of a very extensive legislative implementation program, and to encourage the people of our state to authorize the calling of a constitutional convention. The same public commission which derived its funds as a tax exempt organization in urging the support of that action, in turn, took what everybody in our area thought was a very acceptable and public attitude by supporting some of the candidates just nominated last week to attend the convention.

I understand there will be a difference of belief in that, but I believe that type of action in a public election is perfectly all right. It was conducted on a nonpartisan basis, and is a desirable activity.

Then, as to influencing legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body; why, it is just unbelievable that a proposed piece of legislation would preclude that type of activity, especially of the type which is carried on by the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures.

Let me explain to you how I first came in contact with this organization, which is a relatively new organization.

Commencing in Illinois, I think we provided the leadership in elevating the image, capacity and the general ability of the Illinois State government. There was not much accumulated information as to what we could do. This organization, the Citizens Conference, had been formed the year before and had accumulated certain information and data that were informative, very helpful. It provided us immense assistance in setting the guidelines, and what ended up by the creation of a commission, which came to the 1967 session of the legislature with 87 recommendations for the improvement of legislative procedures and, unbelievably, more than 54 of them were implemented during that session, and more than 60 of them have been implemented now, and we are hopeful that by the calling of a constitutional convention in December we will be able to implement the other suggestions.

I would like to tell you about the Citizens Conference itself. I do not see how any activities they conduct, they are conducting, or propose to conduct, deserves extinction by the use of this language, nor does it reflect, I think, the intent of you gentlemen. The conference is a national nonpartisan, not-for-profit corporation. It encourages, assists and provides advisory and technical services for State citizen groups working to support and improve the effectiveness of their legislature. They conduct research or bring together comparative information about legislative improvement in the 50 States, and they conduct regional and single-State conferences which bring together State legislators with editors, publishers, broadcasting executives and civic leaders.

Their purpose is to provide a frank and candid exchange of views about legislative improvement.

I had word only this morning from Speaker Herring of the Delaware House of Representatives, who asked me to call to your attention what he considered to be the effective activity by this conference. In his own State, through arranging for a Baltimore news conference with outstanding leaders and citizens, by arranging for a legislative facilities tour on the part of the Delaware Legislature itself through six States; and through a speech made by Ed Day, former Postmaster General, who is the chairman of this conference, he says that resulted in the accomplishment of things in Delaware that could not otherwise have been done.

He points out that as a result of those activities Delaware is in the process of making available a new legislative facility. They have already got longer legislative sessions, and they are in the process of reducing legislative committees, just to cite a for-instance.

Senator WILLIAMS. I might add, since you mention our State, our legislature has been in continuous session the year 'round, and some of us were not anxious to have it extended too much. That has nothing to do with your testimony.

Mr. ARRINGTON. The Governors never liked the legislatures around. But I can tell you if the legislature wants to watch its P's and Q's and wants to have a firm hand in the operation of government, it will have to do just like you fellows do, stay in session, and I am all for it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Since all of that started, may I say I am not for it, for a good reason. If we stay here all the time—and I have been here for 21 years—after a while we are representing Washington rather than representing the States that sent us here. We would represent bureaucrats rather than carry out the intentions of our citizens. When you are back home you learn what is on the mind of the people whom you represent.

Mr. ARRINGTON. I had the good fortune last week, as a matter of fact I came from New Orleans, after having attended an annual convention of the National Society of State Legislatures, and your Ed Lebreton there, who is chairman and retiring president, it may interest you to know, that among the main things that he thinks State governments should do is to establish annual sessions and stay in session longer, and to change your constitution so as to permit the legislature in that State to do an effective job.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not quarreling about them saying in session 60 days. I am quarreling about our staying in session 12 months.

Mr. ARRINGTON. Well, you ought to hear what the people back home say about that, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. ARRINGTON. This conference, in other words, has been operating with 16 States doing the type of work that I described, and it is my belief that the language that I read absolutely prevents them from doing it.

Also because of the penalty provisions they inhibit the foundation contributions to this Commission, so it will die for lack of a facility for raising funds.

Very hurriedly, I would like to make certain suggestions intended to be helpful, and suggest five possible safeguards that you might want to consider and which, in my opinion can be well maintained and still allow for useful operations on the part of organizations such as this.

I am quite agreeable that with all the witnesses who have testified that activities have to be nonpartisan in nature, have to be national in scope, in my opinion, should not engage in support or opposition to candidates although, as I pointed out, there may be special situations where that may be entirely all right, but maybe in order to make the safeguards fully workable, you would have to limit it with respect to all types of elections, and I consider it perfectly all right, as in the case of a constitutional convention for actions to foster public sentiment; that the advocacy of legislation has to be with respect to legislation general in nature. But where they go to a State legislature and say you should have legislation to reduce the committees if they are subject to rule power or you can legislate as to the manner of sessions or the manner of operation of the legislature, I think it is a laudable thing to have citizens and associations join together in the general advance of government.

I think that is what is needed. I think that is what we have not had enough of, and that partisan election campaigns be avoided.

Here is another thing which has been alluded to here by several witnesses. I am confident that a great part of the ills that you are seeking to correct or eliminate can be handled by the disclosure techniques that you have discussed this morning.

I was stunned, it does not make much difference, but I think if you compel a disclosure and there does not seem to be any real opposition to that, that that might provide you with the greatest access to the information that you need in order to find out just what the foundations are doing.

Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, thank you very much, gentlemen.

Senator CURTIS. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask just one question about voter registration.

Rather than having foundations engage in voter registration, wouldn't it be better for the State or even the Federal Government, now that the Federal Government has gotten into the business, of just paying somebody to go down the road and register everybody who appears to be qualified? We can do that on a census basis every 10 years. Why can't we do it with voters? The big complaint about voter registration is the same thing. If someone spends money hauling voters, he hauls voters in the areas where he thinks he is going to win. He would be a fool to haul voters in areas where he thinks he is going to lose, because he will haul more votes against him than for him.

If one group or the other thinks one group that is not registered will cause the election to go for the candidate they want to be elected, would it not seem more appropriate for the Government to see to it that all qualified people are registered, and to pay the expense of doing it, either at State or Federal level?

Mr. ARRINGTON. Are you asking me?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ARRINGTON. No. I agree with the advice of the gentlemen who appeared earlier on this progam. If you disabled the foundation or the tax-empt organization from actively supporting a candidate, I mean, as long as it will be without authority or power to take positions with respect to any candidate, I do not see why the good governmental objective of getting people who are entitled to vote to get on the rolls and express their voice in the operation of their Government, I see nothing but laudable interests to be served, and I see nothing wrong with it. I see no justification for specifically disabling a foundation from engaging in voter registrations so long as it is general in character, it is nonpartisan in nature, and directed merely to getting qualified voters on the rolls.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the philosophy nowadays seems to be that everybody ought to vote. Assuming that everybody who is qualified should be registered so he can vote, why should not they be registered just the way you would take a census? Just go down the road and register everybody who appears to be qualified at all, and then proceed to use the Australian system that inasmuch as the Government has now paid the people to register in order to vote if they are qualified under the law at all, then proceed to charge them a $5 fine if they do not show up and vote on election day, so you might get your money back or at least you would have a proper indication of how the people feel on an electoral proposition.

Mr. ARRINGTON. Are you asking that as a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ARRINGTON. I do not think we are dealing with the proper alternative. I take nothing back of what I said in support of any legitimate endeavor to get the qualified voter on the rolls. Your suggestion that we have the Government do it would be quite an experience in the city of Chicago, I can tell you. We are trying to get them out of the graveyard now. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. We have made pretty good progress in taking those graveyard votes off the rolls in Louisiana.

Senator CURTIS. Before I ask my question, I might observe that if they will let us all define the words, "qualified voter", all right. My notion of qualified voters are those who vote according to my sentiments. [Laughter.]

How many colleges has Danforth Foundation helped?

Mr. CUNINGGIM. We have current intimate relations with between 800 and 1,000 colleges. We have helped that many and more, either through programs or through grants.

Senator CURTIS. What would be the range of that; what would be one of the smaller ones, and then one of the larger ones, in dollar amount?

Mr. CUNINGGIM. It would be the range in terms of institution, it would be from Nebraska Wesleyen to the University of Nebraska. [Laughter.]

It would be in dollar amount, sir——

Senator CURTIS. I do not know which end you began with. [Laughter.] I am a trustee at Nebraska Wesleyen, so I want to warn you before you testify.

My question was, these 800 colleges that you have helped, what is the range of the lesser amount in dollars and then the high, of your grants.

Mr. CUNINGGIM. The lesser amount would be a few hundred dollars to individual faculty members on campuses across the country to enable them to give larger attention to the students as individuals through a program we call the Danforth Associates, the purpose of which is to try to reduce the anonymity of college and university life.

The largest amount might be upward of a million or two in terms of some one or another institution that was sponsoring a program that we believed in and ought to support.

In respect to the particular colleges you were referring to, we made a recent grant to Nebraska Wesleyen to enable that institution to undertake an experimental program in the Nebraska State Prison so that people there who were qualified could undertake some college work.

I cheated, sir, on the matter of the colleges and universities to which the members of this committee went, for I looked it up before we came to this meeting, and so far as I am aware, the only institution with which the Danforth Foundation has not had some connection is the YMCA Law School in Nashville, Tenn., and I could wish for Mr. Gore's sake that we had had some relationship there, too. [Laughter.]

Senator CURTIS. Now, how many students has the Danforth Foundation helped, just in round numbers?

Mr. CUNINGGIM. Through fellowship programs?

Senator CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. CUNINGGIM. Through fellowship programs, we have——

Senator CURTIS. I mean, that have been channeled to the student as contrasted to the corporate entity of the college.

Mr. CUNINGGIM. Yes. It would now run something around 7,000 or 8,000 students whom we have tried to help directly with fellowships. In indirect help of various kinds, attendance at conferences or relationships with faculty on campuses, the number would be beyond my estimating.

Senator CURTIS. Well, I have remarked in these hearings a time or two, in my State of Nebraska the private colleges which happen to be all church colleges, carry 30 percent of the cost of higher education. But even our State university and our State schools depend to no small degree upon foundations and grants.

Senator HANSEN. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

Senator WILLIAMS (presiding). The meeting will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

(Whereupon, at 12:50 p.m., the committee recessed, to reconvene at 2 p.m. this same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

The CHAIRMAN. The hearing will come to order.

We will next hear from a panel of witnesses, Mr. Julius Stratton, chairman of the board of the Ford Foundation; Mr. McGeorge Bundy, president of the Ford Foundation; Mr. Whitney Young, president of the National Urban League; and Mr. Whitney North Seymour, chairman of the board of directors of the Council on Library Resources and the International Legal Center.

STATEMENT OF JULIUS STRATTON, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, THE FORD FOUNDATION

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have with me, as you indicated, Mr. Whitney Young, Mr. Whitney North Seymour; my colleague, Mr. Bundy.

My part in this coordinated testimony is to comment on two particular aspects of the bill before you. First, on the definition of "private foundations" and, second, on the proposed concept of "qualifying distributions."

Now, the issues that are related to these two subjects are more complex, more technical in some ways, than some of those we have heard this morning, and yet the implications are very serious.

In the formal statement that I have submitted to your committee earlier, I have undertaken to deal with them in detail. But now I am going to be very brief, and shall attempt only to indicate the nature of the problems and the reasons for our concern, and then I shall turn to my associates here, with your permission, for some comments of their own.

One of the most striking additions to the Internal Revenue bill, or Internal Revenue Code proposed by the new bill, is a wholly new technical definition of the term "private foundation." Unfortunately, this new definition is so broad it will, I fear, encompass a multitude of organizations whose primary function is not that of making grants—organizations which have never been thought of as private foundations in the past, and which, on the basis of their activities, should not, in our judgment, be so classified.

It is easy to quote examples. I could cite such distinguished institutions as the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, about which you will hear later, I believe; the Brookings Institution, the Council on Library Resources, the Population Council, and a variety of others.

Now, you may ask what difference does it make that, perhaps, hundreds of organizations like these might be reclassified as private foundations? Well, the consequences could be very serious indeed.

First, such organizations would be subject to the proposed tax, with a corresponding reduction in funds available for their educational and charitable activities about which we have been hearing throughout the morning.

Second, they would be subject to the stringent regulations, program limitations, and penalties of the bill about which you heard from earlier witnesses.

But the most serious consequence, I believe, would be a far greater difficulty in obtaining essential support from grant-making foundations.

Let me take just a moment to explain why. This bill, as you well know, also contains provisions requiring private foundations to make prompt distributions of income, and that is a highly desirable objective which foundations, as a whole, support fully. But there are serious limitations on the kinds of grants that would meet this payout requirement, and there are serious uncertainties as to just which organizations would be eligible to receive the so-called qualifying distributions.

For example, it appears that such respected and effective groups as the American Council of Learned Societies, the Educational Facilities Laboratories, Resources for the Future, and I could name any number of them, would fail to qualify just because they happen to depend so heavily on a few foundations. Consquently, foundations in turn would be reluctant to give them support. Of course, grants to such organizations are not prohibited—but they would not qualify or help a foundation to meet its own income distribution requirement.

I am sure you are all acquainted with the national merit scholarship program. I cite it because it offers a perfect example to illustrate how the present language of this bill might work to the serious detriment of some of our finest students.

This scholarship program was established in 1955 largely with the support of a single foundation. It was designed to identify, as you know, unusually able young people, to interest them in higher education, and to help as many as possible to attend the college or university of their choice. Under the proposed legislation, the National Merit Scholarship Organization would have been a private foundation at the time of its establishment, because the bulk of its support came from only one or two foundations.

Furthermore, it would not have been eligible to receive qualifying distributions. Now, today it does enjoy broader support, and it would qualify as a publicly supported charity. But the point is—under the proposed legislation such an organization would probably not have come into existence in the first place—and over 21,000 young men and women—from every part of the country would not have received the more than $70 million worth of scholarship aid that the program has made available over the years.

It seems to me that if productive activities of this kind are to be sustained that it is of crucial importance to write legislation that will encourage—rather than discourage—the continuing creation of organizations with new objectives, with independent boards of their own to meet new and changing situations in a dynamic society.

I might just remark in passing, to a certain degree that is the way philantrophy helps society in its quest for renewal by creating new institutions to meet new needs as they arise.

I am conscious, gentlemen, that I have been able to give you only the sketchiest outline of a complex problem and the serious difficulties that we forsee if changes are not made. In closing I should like to make three recommendations:

First, that a more precise definition of a private foundation be formulated. I have here a staff paper representing the joint effort of a group of foundations that may be helpful to you in such a formulation and, with your permission, I should like to submit it for the record.*

Second, that a simple test be established whereby foundation funds that flow promptly to legitimate charitable tax-exempt purposes would be deemed qualifying distributions. I am saying, in effect, that the idea of qualifying distributions is perfectly valid. If we can define in a simpler and more straightforward fashion what that is: that is what I recommend.

Third, it seems to me that the penalty provisions are excessively severe, out of proportion to possible offenses, and should be carefully considered. Left as they are, they will make it difficult for foundations to attract and hold the caliber of trustees and staff that are absolutely fundamental for their effective operation. Just as importantly, I fear, that these penalty provisions will dampen the willingness and the capability to try new ideas and, thereby, tip the balance against innovation and experiment, and that is what foundations are about.

What we are really talking about here goes far beyond definitions and regulations—it goes to the very heart of the kind of society we wish to have. From the time of our founding as a Nation, the American people have sustained their faith in the value of a variety of forces—public and private—at work. I cannot stress too firmly my own conviction that philanthropic foundations serve one of our most cherished traditions in providing support for public purposes. If their efforts are to be fruitful, they must enjoy the freedom to encourage thoughtful experiment and constructive innovation.

Now, in saying this I do not equate freedom with license. I acknowledge the need for guidelines and standards of action that has been recognized by, I think, all of the witnesses who have come before you today. But, as I have indicated, I am deeply troubled by the lack of clarity in some of the provisions set forth in this bill. If enacted in their present form, it will be detrimental to the public good with consequences which I suspect were neither foreseen nor intended.

The years ahead are going to test more severely than any in our history the strength of our democratic institutions. This is hardly the time to restrict the capacity of the private sector to meet greater and greater challenges.

That, very briefly, is my statement, Mr. Chairman. Now, if I may, I will turn to my associates here and, perhaps, Mr. Young would care to make some remarks.

STATEMENT OF WHITNEY YOUNG, PRESIDENT, THE NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE

Mr. Young. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I do feel very strongly about many features of this bill, and in expressing myself briefly here, I do believe I am expressing some of the anxieties and concerns of the civil rights people, human relations people, and social worker people who have the cause of social change and social reform foremost in their minds.

I am glad that I was introduced as Whitney Young. About half of the people in the building have been referring to me as Senator Brooke. [Laughter.]

Senator Bennett. That would not hurt you in this committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. Young. I just do not want to hurt him. [Laughter.]

I would not in any way try to presume to assess the intent of the authors of this bill, but there are features in here that clearly have had the direct result of making the black community particularly feel that it is a hostile bill, a bill that suddenly came into fruition with a purpose as much to intimidate as to legislate, a bill designed to discourage foundations who belatedly have found the field of social reform to be one in which they might gingerly tread, a bill to sort of caution and warn them.

I am not too sure that already some damage has not been done even by the introduction of the bill. There is some evidence that foundations will become again very cautious, very conservative, turn only toward those absolutely noncontroversial things that they feel will remove them from any threat of reprisal, of punitive action, on the part of the Federal Government.

The black community feels in many ways like a people would feel if we were playing a baseball game and we were one run behind in the ninth inning and we loaded the bases, with two outs, and suddenly the umpires got together and changed the rules in the game and decided that two outs were all that were necessary to end the inning.

For years, for years, the white community has been able to organize different ethnic groups and regional groups, vested interest groups, and they have been able to use the resources of the private sector through foundations to address themselves to their problems as they saw them, educational problems, problems of the environment—whatever the problems might have been.

It has only been in very recent years that we have managed to acquire in our black community the kind of sophistication and know-how that makes it possible for us to organize and to make our requests for resources to help ourselves and to meet our needs. And to have at this point in the game suddenly to be told that the rules are changing seem to us—again to say to black people—that "the rules are changing only when you are about to be benefited."

I am not gainsaying that this was the intent; I am talking about the effect.

At the time that the Federal Government, the administration, says that "Due to the pressures of inflation and the efforts in our international activities, we find it necessary to reduce resources for local community action programs and local organizations," and we are encouraged to turn to the private sector, primarily to foundations, we are being told that here again the rules are changing, that no foundation can give more than 25 percent to any organization, or an organization cannot have more than 25 percent support from foundations or that it must have, say, five foundations or more supporting it. Such rules would have completely eliminated most of the earlier organizations I talked about, and would today eliminate for the black community many of these organizations that are just starting.

I am particularly concerned because we have, in fact, the daily experience of going into the black community that, as you know, is impatient and angry, and justifiably so; and we have tried to suggest alternative courses of action. We have been able to convince the large majority that the thing to do is to organize and to do the necessary research to make our presentations through the normal channels for change, through the political bodies—to express the concerns about garbage collection or schools that are inadequate or street lights or recreation.

There are always those on the sideline, however, who say this is old fashioned, this is not the way to go about it, that there is no point in trying to work these things out through the normal channels.

We have just about had the people believing we could do it, and foundations were about ready to experiment and to give us some money. Our organizations in the communities are ready to make an effort, knowing full well that some would fail. And we insist that we have the right to fail as much as the right to succeed, and we are not a superior people, and it would be a reflection on white America if black America only succeeded, because certainly white Americans have sometimes failed, and I do not reflect on white Americans. But, at any rate, we are suddenly laughed at by the revolutionists.

When I first saw this legislation I had the feeling that if we had requested from Peking a kind of decision that would aid and abet the black revolutionists in our society, and to fulfill their predictions about how white America, just when we got organized, would lift from us the resources to pursue our own self-help program, I could not have gotten better features than in some of this legislation.

My first reaction almost was to suggest that certain features of this legislation be called before the Un-American Committee. I really felt that they were aiding a revolutionary effort. You and others ask the black community to be responsible, but you do not give us the resources with which we can assume responsibility.

You ask us to engage in self-help and self-discipline, but you do not give us the resources and the authority to exercise this. This is, at best, frustrating; it is at worst, deceptive, and we are dealing with a climate of young people who can no longer be deceived.

I know nothing that will undermine the attempt of those of us who try to be constructive and responsible leaders in this field than to pass many of the features of this particular legislation—about which I could be specific if you chose to ask. Nothing can undermine us more, and I say this knowing that my particular organization would be affected the least, in fact, in many ways we might be looking at it selfishly, helped the most—but this is not my purpose.

Ultimately, our problems will be resolved in the black community and not from external forces and pressures but from internal discipline and strength that can only come through having resources that today the private sector, the foundations are beginning to give.

So I do not demand of you, I appeal to you and your committee, I plead with you, that if you, too, are interested in giving support of this kind of leadership, if you are interested in making a liar out of the revolutionists, the black revolutionists, in this country, aided by young white revolutionists, then, in effect, you will quickly not only strike and greatly modify some of these features, but you will, in effect, urge these foundations whom you have before you to move, not with all deliberate speed, but forthwith, to shore up the kind of organizations that I am talking about.

Thank you very much.

Mr. STRATTON. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will call upon Mr. Seymour, former president of the American Bar Association.

STATEMENT OF WHITNEY NORTH SEYMOUR, CHAIRMAN, BOARD OF DIRECTORS, COUNCIL ON LIBRARY RESOURCES AND THE INTERNATIONAL LEGAL CENTER

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am a practicing lawyer in New York. I was president of the American Bar Association. I am here because I am chairman of two organizations, the Council on Library Resources, and the International Legal Center, which were started with generous grants from the Ford Foundation, and couldn't have been started otherwise, and have, I believe, served the public interest very well, and I think their continued independent existence is important to the public interest.

I am also on the board of several other organizations in somewhat related fields of education and research and public interest, and I will mention a couple of those.

The Council on Library Resources was established in 1956 to provide broad assistance to libraries in all kinds of problems which they were having, including the problem of moving in modern technology, and in the years since it was established it has made some 450 grants and has granted a total of about $13 million.

Many of these grants have been made to institutions, some of them public and private libraries, some of the Federal libraries. The council has given somewhat over a million dollars to the Library of Congress, and has been influential in assisting it to automate its activities.

The whole area of moving library services into an era of modern technology has been of great importance. One of the significant features of this has been that because of the importance of libraries and the interest in this subject, we have been able to recruit a very distinguished board, set forth in my full statement, of scholars and people interested in libraries, and the independent existence of that board to supervise the activities of the council, has been an important factor, I think, in its success.

We were able to draft Dr. Fred Cole from being president of Washington and Lee University, to become the president of the council, and he has put together a very able and expert staff, and that factor alone, which would be very difficult to accomplish if this whole thing had to be done within one foundation is, I think, an important aspect of the need to preserve this kind of independent action.

The International Legal Center was established in 1966 also with a Ford grant and that, too, has a very distinguished independent board of international experts in the legal field.

It is concerned primarily with helping to improve legal education and legal institutions, particularly in the newly developing countries, and to help establish an independent bench and bar, and improve the training for legislative and administrative work, and it is working around the world in some of the activities as set forth in my statement.

Again, the presence of an independent board to supervise this work, which would not be possible if the work had to be done from within one foundation, is an important factor.

Now, in addition, I am on the board of the National Legal Aid and Defender Association which has received a significant grant from Ford for improving defender services around the United States. It has put in defender projects in some places which did not have one, tuned up the projects where they did have one.

Finally, to mention here there is a relatively new organization under its present name called the Council on Legal Education for Professional Responsibility which succeeds an earlier organization called the Council on Legal Clinics, and its purpose is to expose law students in one way or another on an experimental basis to real life situations running all the way from Defenders to penal institutions, and so on, with different law schools experimenting with different projects. But it is quite clear that the use of these clinical facilities in the law schools is now receiving very wide acceptance.

Now, the reason I mention those two particularly, is that our new Chief Justice, when he spoke to the American Bar in Dallas in August, singled out these particular programs, the improvement of defender services and the improvement of legal education, as especially significant, and referred especially to the fact that it was very important that these were provided by the private sector, and that that is the kind of development in the field of the legal profession and legal research and legal education which really should be encouraged.

I think I have only to add that I believe that all of these activities are in the public interest, well within the concept of exemption which Congress originally provided. We, too, support the idea that activities which are not of that character are things that Congress should deal with, but we would hope it would not chill the activities which are really significant and which are supported on such a very significant scale by the Ford Foundation and other foundations.

Thank you.

Mr. STRATTON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

May I turn to Mr. Bundy?

STATEMENT OF McGEORGE BUNDY, PRESIDENT, THE FORD FOUNDATION

Mr. BUNDY. Mr. Chairman, I will try to be very brief. I want to say, simply, that I strongly agree with the arguments that have been presented by my colleagues on this panel and, indeed, in the discussions this morning.

Let me take one sentence or two to underline each of the points that has been made just now. When Mr. Seymour talks about the importance of an independent board of trustees in a grant-receiving organization, he gets hold of one of the fundamentals of organized philanthropy, and one of the places where I think this bill does need most careful attention because to the degree—that the bill would tighten the control by a foundation over everything its grantee did—and it does that—it flies in the face of the tradition that independent boards of trustees and independent responsibility are better executors of the grants of foundations, in a great many cases, than the foundation itself.

The same proposition in another way applies to what Mr. Young was saying. To the degree that the bill makes it difficult to make sure that you will be within the letter of a new law when you make grants to an inexperienced organization or one which may not have a long fiduciary tradition, you are again discouraging the kind of activity which so many in this country think is more and more needed for the groups which are coming into their own in a country that we hope will be one of opportunity for all.

A special case, which I believe you are familiar with, Mr. Chairman, of an important kind, and a relatively new kind, of philanthropy, where the bill is not clear as it stands, is the opportunity which has developed in our foundation and in a few others for making what we call program-related investments, which is a use of capital funds for people who are coming into the mainstream of our society, for investments you might not make as a banker or as an investment counselor just on their own terms, but which have a charitable value and a social value, which can make it, in the judgment of our board of trustees, a useful form of charitable activity.

Let me say finally, Mr. Chairman, that I do very much hope that the paper which we are submitting on the definition of PF's will be carefully studied, especially by your staffs, because there are literally dozens of organizations which, to the best of our knowledge, will find themselves private foundations unless the definitions in the House bill are amended, and which really have no idea that they are about to become under this kind of supervision and control.

Just as one supplementary note, because of the discussion this morning, of the rate of growth of foundations and of the foundation field generally. A general paper was submitted on that point this morning, but I have here, if you want it for the record, a 10-year summary of the investment portfolio of the Ford Foundation which shows that our net worth between 1959 and 1968 has, in fact, declined in absolute dollar terms from $3,100 million, to a little over $3 billion. It is now a little below that, because of what has happened in the market in the last year, and tha means, in light of the growth in our economy in the last 10 years, that the Ford Foundation, whether considered in terms of its capital assets or in terms of its grant-making capability, is one-half as large, in relation to society as a whole, as it was 10 years ago.

While you will get much argument over what the right rate of payout is for foundations in different circumstances, in our foundation the policy of the trustees has been to expend substantially beyond the annual income from realized capital each year and that, I expect, will be the continuing policy as far as I understand the trustees' purposes for the future.

H.R. 13270—Definition of Private Foundation

1. Organizations Inappropriately Defined as Private Foundations

The proposed tax reform bill (H.R. 13270) introduced a new term, "private foundation," into the Internal Revenue Code. The new definition will include hundreds of organizations which have never been thought of as private foundations and which, on the basis of their activities, should not be classified as private foundations. Yet these organizations would be subject to the stringent regulations, restrictions, and penalties of the bill. The ambiguities in certain provisions of the bill and the time required to obtain accurate factual data about a large number of organizations scattered throughout the country—many of whom are unaware of the potential impact of the bill upon them—make it difficult to identify with certainty those which would be inappropriately classified as private foundations. However, Appendix A contains some examples of national operating organizations which would apparently be so misclassified. Appendix B is a sample of local operating organizations which would also apparently be misclassified.

2. Contrasts Between Operating Organizations and Private Foundations

The operating organizations listed in the Appendices are not like private foundations in the following important ways:

They do not have substantial private endowments.—In the main, it is the private endowments of private foundations which gives them the independence which can be their great strength, but which also underlies the legitimate public concern about their activities. The operating organizations which have been listed do not have substantial endowments (in many cases they have none at all).

There is no sufficient reason to subject these recipient organizations to the same strictures as the endowed grant-making foundations from which many of them receive substantial support.

Operating organizations are directly and actively engaged in charitable, educational, scientific and religious activities.—Private foundations engage primarily in making grants to a variety of other philanthropic organizations. One of the wisest utilizations of the funds managed by them is to identify—sometimes to establish—and then to assist specialized operating organizations, with independent boards and staffs who are expert and interested in the area of that organization's philanthropic operations. Assuring prompt distributions to such organizations and thus prompt utilization of charitable funds is one of the primary purposes of the bill, but this purpose is not furthered by making the bill applicable to those organizations which are by definition actively and directly engaged in philanthropic activity.

These organizations are controlled by independent boards of trustees; they have not engaged in the fiscal abuses which the bill seeks to correct. One of the important purposes of the bill is to prevent certain fiscal abuses of private foundations. Operating organizations, without substantial private endowments and whose funds are promptly and directly employed for philanthropic operations, have not engaged in the fiscal abuses described in the Treasury Reports of 1965 and 1968. Moreover operating organizations can and should be specifically defined to include only those which, under a full examination of all the surrounding facts and circumstances in each case, are found to be independent and not controlled by private individuals or organizations.

These organizations pursue special, well-defined purposes.—Private foundations are primarily general-purpose organizations with wide-ranging interests; they seek to identify organizations with a worthy objective which, for one reason or another, need and merit special assistance. Operating organizations have more limited purposes. They generally have specific constituencies intimately and directly concerned with their activities; their performances can be measured from year to year, in relation to previously-established goals and purposes; their policies and activities are determined by expert professionals who are subject to the formal and informal direction and discipline of their respective fields. In these ways the specialized nature of their activities results in direct and indirect controls over the organizations which are not available to the same degree over private foundations.

3. ADVERSE EFFECTS OF THE BILL AND PROPOSED SOLUTION

The House Ways and Means Committee recognized the importance of these operating organizations; in its Report, the Committee stated its desire to distinguish and protect what it described as—

> "special-purpose foundations, such as learned societies, associations of libraries, and organizations which have developed an expertise in certain substantive areas and which provide for the independent granting of funds and direction of research in those specialized substantive areas. (See Other Limitations, above.)"—House Report No. 91-413 (Part 1) p. 42

The Committee introduced into H.R. 13270 the definition of an "operating foundation" (section 4942(j)(3)) intending thereby to encourage private foundations to give such organizations continued support. The definition of an operating foundation, when added to the new definition in the bill of a private foundation, is however both complex and ambiguous. Most importantly, even if the bill were modified so that all specialized operating organizations were clearly included within the definition of an operating foundation, this approach would unfortunately fall short of providing sufficient protection for such organizations. For, though they would be eligible for "qualifying distributions," they would still be unwisely defined as private foundations and therefore would still be subject to the tax, and other penalties and restrictions contained in the bill. The possibility of heavy personal liabilities would make it difficult for them to find and keep the directors and staffs they need, they would be subject to complex rules concerning their charters, their dealings with substantial contributors and public officials, and their "expenditure responsibility" for grants to other organizations. Their present freedom in obtaining funds, associating with other organizations, hiring personnel and engaging in program activities would all be sharply limited.

The more desirable and more logical course is to exclude such organizations from the new definition under the bill of private foundations. Our society needs to encourage rather than inhibit such organizations, which at national and local levels supply expert services and pursue important public objectives in their specialized areas of competence.

Attached is a proposed Amendment to H.R. 13270 which would define these organizations as "special-purpose operating organizations" and exclude them from the definition of "private foundation" under the bill.

APPENDIX A

EXAMPLES OF NATIONAL OPERATING ORGANIZATIONS WHICH WOULD PROBABLY BE PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS UNDER H.R. 13270

1. American Council of Learned Societies: Advancement of humanistic studies in all fields of learning.
2. Overseas Education Fund of the League of Women Voters: International arm of League of Women Voters Education Fund.
3. Social Science Research Council: Advancement of research in the social sciences.
4. Council on Legal Education for Professional Responsibility: To support and encourage as part of law school education clinical and internship programs in the administration of justice.
5. Council on Library Resources: Research and demonstration toward the solution of library problems.
6. Educational Facilities Laboratories: Research, experimentation and the dissemination of knowledge regarding more economical and useful physical education facilities for schools and universities.
7. Education and World Affairs: Study, analysis, and assistance in strengthening the international teaching, research and service dimensions of U.S. colleges and universities.
8. Center for Applied Linguistics: Generally concerned with linguistics and language, including for example application of the results of linguistics research to practical language problems in the areas of teaching English as a second language and the teaching of foreign languages in the United States.
9. International Legal Center: Study and development of the role of law in the development of modern nations and the shaping of the world community.
10. Resources for the Future: Scientific research and study on the use and conservation of natural resources.
11. Tamarind Lithography Workshop: Devoted to the stimulation and preservation of the art of the lithograph.
12. Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation: Increasing the supply and quality of college teachers.
13. International Theatre Institute of the United States, Inc.: World-wide communication between artists and experts in professional theatre.
14. Population Council: Research, training, technical assistance, and information programs in family planning and reproductive biology.
15. Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law: Association of organized bar, for information, study and reform activities in area of civil rights.
16. National Institute of Public Affairs: Improving the quality of public service and providing technical assistance in development of public policy.
17. Open Space Institute: Preservation of open space in urban and urbanizing areas through educational and field consulting programs.
18. Southern Regional Council: The attainment of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South through research and action.
19. Potomac Institute: Social development projects and studies.
20. Agricultural Development Council: Training and research in agricultural economics and community development in Asian countries.
21. American International Association for Economic and Social Development: Program of agricultural development in Latin America.
22. American Conservation Association: Promotion of conservation by study and action.
23. Atlantic Council of the United States: Promotion of exchange of ideas on common problems among Atlantic community.
24. Business Committee for the Arts: Stimulation of greater corporate interest in and support of the arts.
25. Center for Inter-American Relations: Education of North Americans about Latin America.

26. Associated Council of the Arts: Clearing house for scheduling of artistic events, technical assistance in fund raising and distribution and dissemination of information concerning the Arts.
27. Experiments in Art and Technology: Encouragement of the working collaboration of scientists and engineers with contemporary artists.
28. Fund for Theological Education: Encouragement of college graduates to consider careers in the ministry.
29. International Executive Service Corps: Assistance to private businesses in developing countries.
30. Interracial Council for Business Opportunity: Encouragement of business opportunities for minorities.
31. The National Academy of Education: An organization to recognize distinction in education and to sponsor research and conferences on issues in education.
32. Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center: Research and teaching programs.
33. National Committee for Children and Youth: Program to initiate national action on the implementation of recommendations from the White House Conferences on Children and Youth.
34. Youth Opportunity Foundation: For education of Mexican-Americans and research on Mexican-American problems.
35. National Trust for Historic Preservation in the United States: Consultative services to local groups and agencies and education concerning preservation of national heritage.
36. Academy of Religion and Mental Health: Study of relation between religion and mental health.
37. States Urban Action Center: Services to states seeking to solve some of the underlying problems in the nation's cities.
38. Urban Coalition: Program to foster cooperative efforts by government and the private sector in attacking critical urban problems.
39. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting: A group of citizens concerned with the quality of television and radio broadcasting.
40. American Craftsmen's Council: Promotes and heightens appreciation of fine design and the techniques for design.
41. Conservation Foundation: Gathering and dissemination of conservation information.
42. National Information Bureau: Study and reporting of financial information on non-profit organizations which solicit funds.

Note: The following organizations are now partially supported by government but they were established and supported for several years with foundation funds.

44. The National Indian Youth Council: For the first two years supported only by two foundations to do research on Indian problems and to support the training and education of Indians. Now have successfully obtained OEO and Bureau of Indian Affairs funds.
45. National Assessment of Education: Originally called the Exploratory Committee for Assessing the Progress of Education supported by two foundations for four years to develop tests to evaluate and assess American education.
46. Children's Television Workshop: Supported initially by two foundations and later by the Office of Education to design new television programs for nationwide use to teach pre-school children to count, read, and reason.
47. The Education Commission of the States: A compact between 42 states to bring governors, state legislators and educational leaders together for action projects to aid the states in education. Supported for two years by foundation funds and now supported by individual state contributions.

Note: The following organizations are momentarily "publicly supported" (they have government grants and small individual contributions) but such support is marginal so that a single foundation grant would make them a private foundation.

48. The Council for the Public Schools: A group interested in problems of education—particularly curriculum reform in grades one through twelve.
49. The American Society on International Law: One of the leading organizations in the world concerned with the problems of international law and organization; with a membership drawn from practicing lawyers, officials, diplomats, scholars, and students.
50. United Scholarship Service: Identify talented American-Indian and Mexican-American children, encourage them to finish high school and aid those children in admission to and finance of college and graduate school.
51. Council on the Southern Mountains: Programs, publications and projects to aid the people of Appalachia.

Appendix B

Examples of Local Operating Organizations Which Would Probably Be Private Foundations Under H.R. 13270

1. Kansas City Citizens Committee for Public Education: Organization and financing of public schools.
2. Kansas City Citizens Committee on Judicial Reform: Research and recommendations for judicial reform.
3. The Switchboard (in San Francisco) : An emergency telephone service for parents searching for run-away children and for children sending messages to parents.
4. West-Oakland Legal Switchboard: Organization of students at Berkeley law school, making available young volunteer lawyers for those arrested before appearing in court.
5. People Pledged for Community Progress: Women's group in Richmond, California to improve ghetto area in Richmond; establish playgrounds and recreation areas.
6. Cleveland Development Foundation: Physical development of City of Cleveland.
7. The PATH Association: Housing and neighborhood development in Cleveland.
8. The PACE Association: Improvement of public education in Cleveland.
9. Citizen's Committee for Children of New York: Devoted to child welfare.
10. Minnesota Theatre Company: Resident professional theater.
11. Washington Center for Metropolitan Studies: Urban research and training concentrating on District of Columbia metropolitan area.
12. Kansas City Association of Trusts and Foundations: The Association assists its Member Trusts and other grant-making agencies in evaluating and coordinating their support to various community activities in the Kansas City area and in suggesting project ideas for their consideration.
13. New Detroit, Inc.: Technical assistance in dealing with problems of social change in Detroit.
14. The New York College Bound Corporation: Identifies talented underachievers in high school, and encourages them to go to college and places them in colleges with scholarships.

Note: The following organizations are now partially supported by government but they were established and supported for several years with foundation funds.

43. Learning Institute of North Carolina (LINC): A non-profit organization designed to start up innovational projects and special schools in education. For several years, operated only with foundation funds.
44. Center for Urban Education: Educational research in New York City.
45. Kansas City Regional Council on Higher Education (also called "The Consortium"): Research and technical assistance for higher education. In the current year probably receives sufficient federal support to be excluded from definition, but original and basic support from private foundations.
46. Institute of Community Studies in Kansas City: Regional social and cultural research, including public administration services, economics of public welfare and health care. In the current year probably receives sufficient federal support to be excluded from definition, but original and basic support from private foundations.
47. Greater Kansas City Mental Health Foundation: Research and education concerning mental health. In the current year probably receives sufficient federal support to be excluded from definition, but original and basic support from private foundations.

Note: The following organizations are momentarily "publicly supported" (they have government grants and small individual contributions) but such support is marginal so that a single foundation grant would make them a private foundation.

48. Cincinnati Montessori Society: Family organization for experimental program in preschool education.

H.R. 13270, 91st Congress, 1st Session, Calendar No. ——

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

September —, 1969

Ordered to lie on the table and to be printed

AMENDMENT

Intended to be proposed by Mr. ———————————— to H.R. 13270, an Act to reform the income tax laws, viz:

1. On page 16, on line 21 strike out the word "and" and on line 23 strike out the period and insert:

"; and

(5) a special purpose operating organization."

2. On page 44, on line 19 strike out the word "or" and at the end of the line insert; ", or (5)."

3. On page 57, after line 2 insert the following (and redesignate subsections (d) through (k) of section 101 as subsection (e) through (l)):

(d) Definition of Special Purpose Operating Organization—Section 7701(a) (relating to definitions) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(35) Special-Purpose Operating Organization—the term "special-purpose operating organization" means an organization which is described in section 501(c)(3) and which—

(A) expends substantially all of its income or devotes substantially all of its assets directly for the active conduct of the special educational, scientific or charitable activities constituting the special purpose or function for which it is organized and operated:

(B) makes available (or permits and encourages the scholars and professional staff associated with it to make available) to the general public the results of its activities;

(C) is not controlled directly or indirectly by one or more persons who, if the organization were a private foundation, would be disqualified persons (as defined in section 4946) other than persons who, if the organization were a private foundation, would be its foundation managers (as defined in section 4946), and other than one or more organizations described in paragraph (1) or (2); and

(D) normally receives not more than one-third of its support in each taxable year from gross investment income (as defined in section 506(b)(2))."

TECHNICAL EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT

The Amendment would add to new section 509(a) of the Internal Revenue Code, at pages 15–17 of H.R. 13270, a new paragraph (5) which would exclude from the definition of "private foundation" any organization which is a "special-purpose operating organization." The term "special-purpose operating organization" would be defined in a new paragraph (35) added by the Amendment to section 7701(a) (relating to definitions). The Amendment also makes a technical change on page 44 of the bill to make clear that these organizations will be treated like other excluded organizations for purposes of the expenditure responsibility rules.

The definition of "special-purpose operating organization" would apply to section 501(c)(3) organizations which satisfy each of four tests set forth in the Amendment in subparagraphs (A) through (D).

Paragraph (A) of the new definition requires that the organization be engaged, both actively and directly, through utilization of either substantially all of its income or substantially all of its assets, in the special educational, scientific, or charitable activities which constitute the special purpose or function for which it is organized and operated. Working capital received by way of gift, contribution or as proceeds for goods or services, when expended directly for an organization's activities, would be included as assets devoted directly to the active conduct of such activities. The "special-purpose" requirement is included to assure professionalism and expertise in an organization's activities and is illustrated by learned societies, associations of libraries, and specialized public research or technical assistance organizations. This test employs a principle already used in the Code in section 170(g)(2)(B) (relating to the unlimited charitable contribution deduction) and in the Bill in new Code section 4942(j)(3) (relating to operating foundations).

Paragraph (B) adds a test that ensures that the organization and its works will be exposed to or involved with the general public to a significant extent. The test requires that the organization make available (by publication or otherwise) to the general public the results and benefits of its studies or research or other activities. Where the organization engages the services of scholars and other professionals, it would be required to encourage them also to make such work products publicly available.

Paragraph (C) is designed to ensure that the organization will be independent and not be controlled or influenced in its operations by a particular person, family, organization or group, including a private foundation which is a substantial contributor to the organization. The test is put in terms of direct or indirect control of the institution by disqualified persons other than foundation managers and other than publicly supported charities. "Control" means actual effective control and would be determined under all the facts and circumstances of each case. This test is based on one used in the Bill in new section 509(a)(3)(C) (page 16, lines 17–19 of H.R. 13270).

The test in paragraph (D) is the same as that provided in the Bill in new Section 509(a)(2)(B) and would prevent any organization with a substantial endowment from being included in the definition of a special purpose operating organization.

PROPOSED LANGUAGE FOR SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT

"The Bill defines for the first time in the Internal Revenue Code the term "private foundation." The new definition proceeds from a presumption that all organizations exempt under section 501(c)(3) (which are estimated to be numbered in the hundreds of thousands) are private foundations, and then excludes from the definition certain narrowly specified types of organizations. Your Committee believes that this definition would include many specialized operating organizations which are chiefly the receipients of private foundation support, which are not susceptible to the financial abuses of private foundations, and which should not be subject to the same assessments, regulations, restrictions and potential penalties as private foundations. The distinguishing characteristics of these specialized operating organizations are that they have developed professional expertise in the pursuit of specialized public purposes, they expend all of their income (or working capital in instances where they have no significant income) directly for the active conduct of their special exempt purposes, the results of their activities are available to the public, they are not controlled by any private individual or organization, and they do not have substantial private endowments. Learned societies, associations of libraries and public research or technical assistance organizations are examples of those intended to be excluded from the definition. The House Committee Report makes clear the Ways and Means Committee's recognition of the value of these organizations and the importance of excluding them from certain effects of the bill (House Report No. 91–413 (Part 1) pp. 26, 42). Your Committee believes that a more direct, more logical and an effective approach to this problem is not to include these organizations in the new definition of private foundations."

[2] Adjusted for the 2-for-1 split in May 1962.

The CHAIRMAN. May I just say this to the panel of witnesses: while I know the Ford Foundation, for one, has been criticized for at least one of its projects, I personally approve of a foundation looking into areas that have not been explored before, to see if something can be done about it. Risk taking and innovation are part of our heritage. If one does not try anything new, how would he know whether it is a good or bad idea. I particularly applaud the Ford Foundation for its program of related investments. It seems to me if foundations have $25 billion, they can invest some of it in something beside Government bonds, putting some of it to help people start up their own businesses, and even if it is not the best undertaking in the world as far as moneymaking ventures are concerned, somebody ought to do that to help people get started and make something out of themselves. I hope you would consider some further low-interest rate housing loans in connection with some of your activities.

But I also would like to make this point. I think the foundations that are subject to the most serious criticism are those which have done nothing, just piled the money up and done nothing at all for a worthy purpose. I am pleased to say since we got involved in this area we have at least found certain areas where something ought to be done, and I appreciate the recommendations that Mr. Bundy and certain of you connected with some of the better foundations have had to make in this area.

Perhaps by the time we are through we will have not only a better tax law and better indications of what should be done, but we will have more people doing good work in the area. I hope that will be the result of it.

Senator Bennett.

Senator BENNETT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have listened to this discussion with a great deal of interest, as I have the many private conferences I have had on the problem of foundations.

It is a serious problem. It is almost as serious as trying to find the dividing line between right and wrong generally, because each of us defines and has his own standards of ethics, conduct and value. We in the Government have to try to find general standards that can be applied across the board.

I am not sure we will be able in writing the language of this bill to make that kind of a definition which will be so elastic as to permit all the worthy enterprises to be recognized, and screen out the unworthy ones.

But certainly that is what we are going to try to do. I am sure what you have told us today will be helpful, and I am sure that these hearings and the existence of the bill, turned a spotlight on the whole problem and forced the Congress to look at things that it took for granted for a long time without concern.

I am sure nobody is going to be pleased with what we finally turn out, but I am sure that the committee is going to do the best it can.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us hope they will be pleased.

Senator Ribicoff.

Senator RIBICOFF. I think, Mr. Chairman, you have made a very pertinent point when you said that what bothers you are the foundations that do nothing. Frankly, I respect the foundations more for their failures as much as I do for their successes, because we do have many stresses in our society, and Government is timid, Government is afraid to take a chance either because the bureaucrats are afraid to take the chance or politicians do not have the courage to take a chance. But it is the foundations that do have the courage to go into new fields, whether they are in the social sciences or in the physical sciences, which is something that all of us must encourage, because you are not hedged about by restrictions. You are willing to take the changes that you may fail without having political consequences, and we should do everything to encourage the foundations that are bold instead of trying to penalize the foundations that are bold.

As far as I am personally concerned, there is much in the House bill that I think is very, very harmful for the future of our country, and in the field of where the foundations are concerned, I really think that the House bill has really stuck a blow against society advancing and trying to solve these problems instead of the other way around.

Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hansen.

Senator HANSEN. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

Senator WILLIAMS. I have no questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. STRATTON. Thank you very much. We appreciate it very much.

I might simply add that we have made mistakes. I, too, feel we would be subject to criticism if we do not make them, but we are tying to learn by the mistakes we have made, and that is the important thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Next we will hear from Dr. James Killian, Mr. Dana Creel, president, Rockefeller Brothers Fund; Dr. Jonas Salk; and Mr. John J. McCloy of Milbank, Tweed, Hadley & McCloy.

Gentlemen, I would suggest that you proceed in your own way.

STATEMENT OF DANA S. CREEL, PRESIDENT, ROCKEFELLER BROTHERS FUND

Mr. CREEL. Mr. Chairman, I am Dana Creel, president of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund. This panel is to discuss certain restrictive effects of H.R. 13270 on the development of philanthropy and the operation of foundations.

The CHAIRMAN. Might I just stop you for a moment. I am pleased to see the Senator from California at the dais with you. If he wants to introduce one of the witnesses, or if he wants to testify, that is fine.

Senator CRANSTON. I want to introduce Dr. Salk.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. CREEL. I am privileged to share this assignment with Dr. James Killian, chairman of the board of trustees of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, on my right; Dr. Jonas Salk, director of the Salk Institute for Biological Studies; and Mr. John J. McCloy, partner in the law firm of Milbank, Tweed, Hadley & McCloy, on my right.

My role is to discuss the undesirable effects of the penalties and the administrative responsibilities imposed by the House bill, and suggest possible alternatives which would seem more properly to fulfill what I believe are the Congress-stated objective in this area: that is, to provide a more rational relationship between sanctions and improper acts.

I think, in speaking for myself and for the discussion of the foundation group, there is no objection to sanctions but rather there is the desire to have them fit the situation.

I would like to put that word in now so that it does not start on a negative note.

The penalties in the bill are essentially a variety of monetary penalties applied against both foundations and foundation managers, and this means both staff and trustees.

It is not possible to summarize here, much less discuss each of the penalties. I think it is possible, however, to use a few specific examples to illustrate the shortcomings as well as the excessive nature of the proposed penalties.

For example, the foundation manager who violates the provisions of S. 4945 on expenditure responsibility or influencing legislation would be liable for a penalty equal to 50 percent of the grant, and the foundation would be liable for a penalty equal to 100 percent of the grant.

The ultimate purpose, it seems to me, of any approach to a system of sanctions should be to strengthen and promote the philanthropic endeavor in our society. This is the basis for a major objection to one whole segment of the proposed sanctions; namely, those penalties levied directly upon foundations. Penalties relating to wrongdoing should be imposed on the wrongdoer not on the foundation involved.

A monetary penalty against a foundation hurts philanthropy at large since that much less money will be available to some charitable organization.

The second major objection is that the penalty structure subjects foundation management, again both staff and trustees, to potentially very harsh liabilities.

In many cases, these liabilities would be entirely out of proportion to the transgression.

In general, the potential liability is such that the bill would greatly reduce the ability of foundations to attract the best caliber of trustees and staff.

The possiblity of a fine of $1,000 much less $5,000 would be a very serious matter, particularly as there is the possibility of more than one innocent error of judgment before there would be any identification or determination of an initial error.

The possibility of practically unlimited financial jeopardy of $25,000 to $50,000 or $100,000 or even more—because foundations deal in grants of $100,000 or even more—would be an awesome specter with which to live.

In short, the proposed monetary sanctions of the bill have an in terrorem effect and must be altered and reduced to a practical level.

I would like to propose that a substantially modified philosophy and system of sanctions be adopted, having the ultimate end of promoting and strengthening philanthropic endeavor in our society.

This proposal would recognize that while there have been some abuses in the foundation field, the vast majority of foundation managers, staff and trustees, are serious, dedicated persons, taking pride in their activities.

If the law is made clear as to what is expected, this vast majority will make a sincere effort to comply. The possible stigma of merely being adjudged in violation of any statute, quite aside from any monetary fine, would generally be a sufficient deterrent.

In the few cases where this deterrent is not effective limited monetary penalties applied by the Internal Revenue Service would be sufficient to assure compliance with the regulations.

Should there ever be a case of complete intransigence of repeated unlawful acts, the IRS always has available the possibility of revoking the foundation's tax exemption which, under the bill, would force the foundation to distribute its assets to public charity.

With the ultimate purpose of strengthening philanthropy I suggest that the system of sanctions in the bill be modified as follows:

1. Penalties should not be imposed on foundations but only on the wrongdoers.

2. Prescribed acts—or failures to act—should be defined with sufficient clarity to enable the decisionmakers to determine, without undue complexity at the time of decision, whether any act—or failure to act—constitutes a transgression.

3. A procedure should be established for providing notice of a proposed penalty by the Internal Revenue Service, with opportunity for correction within a reasonable period before application of the penalty.

4. The prescribed penalties should be flexible, reasonable in nature, with a maximum limit and appropriately related to the acts—or failures to act—which are penalized.

Generally speaking, a limit of $5,000 to $10,000 should be the maximum.

5. A reasonable statute of limitations should be made clearly applicable to the penalties.

If an approach along these general lines can be substituted in H.R. 13270, I believe that the Congress will come much closer to meeting the goal of developing sanctions that provide a more rational relationship to improper acts.

And in terms of the ability of private foundations to perform in the highest public interest, I believe such a change is crucial.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is all the same with you, we would prefer that each member of the panel make his presentation in chief and then we will ask, perhaps, one question from each Senator.

Mr. CREEL. I thank you.

Dr. Killian.

The CHAIRMAN. If I could have kept the questions down we could have heard you in the morning session.

STATEMENT OF JAMES R. KILLIAN, JR., CHAIRMAN OF THE CORPORATION OF THE MASSACHUSETTS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY

Mr. KILLIAN. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I speak to you out of my experience as an officer of a private college where foundation grants and private philanthropy are decisively important to the institution.

I might add, in a phrase of Dr. Conant, that I am a member of the Mendicant Order of College Administrators in what I say today.

Over the past 20 years my institution has received 30 percent of its private contributions from foundations, or $108 million out of $305 million.

This 35 percent has been received from 673 different foundations in the form of 2,250 different grants and, incidentally, 50 percent of this foundation income has come in the last 5 years.

These grants have been profoundly important in maintaining the quality of our education and in advancing educational opportunity for both students and faculty.

The private giving which, in my judgment, would be discouraged by this bill has provided 80 percent of all of our academic buildings, as well as 100 percent of our endowment.

In our forward planning we have relied on the continuation of grants, gifts, and bequests, in amounts greater than we have been receiving in the past few years.

I, therefore, look with dismay on any curtailment of foundation or other private support now or in the future.

Clearly at a time when we are deeply concerned everywhere in the country about the funding of all higher education, and about the financial future of our private institutions, and where we are under great mandate to achieve much needed change in these institutions, we should be looking for ways to increase and not diminish the flow of the private funds, especially since the Federal Government currently is reducing its support.

We, who are struggling day in and day out to balance budgets and to find funds for student aid, for student housing, for faculty salaries, for improved teaching, and the new programs to deal with national needs, say to you with all of the emphasis at our command that this is no time to compound the problems of our universities by making it harder for them to secure private grants and gifts.

I would add to this the enormous importance of the universities being able at the present time to develop new programs that deal with the urgent social problems of our times, programs having to do with the urban problems that we face as a Nation, problems of pollution, of environmental control, transportation and many others. These domains are very inadequately financed by the Federal Government at the present time and, as we initiate new programs we badly need private funds to get them underway.

In its present form the bill would impair the existing functioning of foundations, as has been amply, I think, presented to you today, and would discourage the formation of new foundations, and this seems to me to be dangerous and shortsighted.

The provisions of the present bill appear to be so severe that if passed in its present form it would probably constitute the death knell of the foundations as we know them. Certainly the incentive to form new foundations will be lost.

Foundations make intangible contributions to our educational system, along with their financial contributions. I readily acknowledge that foundations provide institutions such as my own not only with needed funds, but with the stimulus of criticism and of fresh catalytic ideas, thus helping to maintain quality and to achieve needed change.

They make important contributions to the quality of our society by providing multiple centers of initiative, but their ability to serve as pathfinders and to support itself firmly and by their capacity to attract into the decisionmaking and finding process a wide spectrum of able men and women.

As others have already said, I think we need to be troubled by those provisions in the bill which would discourage able men and women from accepting posts of responsibility in foundations.

Indeed, the provisions in the House bill could reduce the officers and trustees of our responsible foundations to a league of intimidated men, their initiative, imagination and boldness dampened by excessive restraints and surveillance, and by confiscatory penalties for the innocent misreading of ambiguous provisions in the bill.

Although this discussion today is directed principally to those provisions, relating to private foundations, the true effect of the bill as a whole on future philanthropy cannot be reviewed or discussed in the foundation context alone, and one needs to look at the impact of the bill on the future of all philanthropy.

Unfortunately, speaking, as I have said, as an educational institution officer, there are many other provisions in the bill which may have adverse effects on contributions to institutions of higher learning.

For example, the restrictions on the gift of appreciated property may be the more serious, to the universities, than the restrictions on foundations. Those provisions having to do with limited preference and allocation of deductions are what I am talking about.

The fact is that in my own institution again, 38 percent of all individual giving, as we have understood it, has come in the form of appreciated property, and there are many other individual gifts doubtless representing appreciated property that we do not know the back history of.

The second aspect of the bill that will be very troublesome to us has to do with the limitation on trusts, particularly charitable remainder trusts and other forms of giving that have to do with bequests.

During the last 4 years, 60 percent of all individual giving to my institution, came through testamentary trusts and bequests. These aspects of the bill that affect this kind of individual giving can be catastrophic for our educational institutions.

So, as we look at the problem of the foundations as they would be adversely affected in this bill, we in the universities plead that these other considerations be given full attention, as I am sure you are doing.

In closing, let me emphasize my position as being in no way opposed to appropriate and equitable tax revisions but as deeply concerned lest irreparable harm comes to private institutions through oversight or inadvertence.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Creel. Dr. Salk.

STATEMENT OF HON. ALAN CRANSTON, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Senator Cranston. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, of the many vital matters that are before you through this tax reform measure, I am convinced that none surpass in significance the subject matter that you are considering today,

I take great pride in presenting to you a witness who will shed light from a different vantage point on the matter before you. He will speak not as the executive of a foundation, not as a man who has devoted himself to raising funds for the work of the foundations, but as a man who, with renowned success, has done the innovative and creative and constructive work that foundations make possible.

I have talked to Dr. Jonas Salk, who is here as director of the Salk Institute for Biological Studies in California.

I have talked to Dr. Salk about the work that he undertook that led to the end of polio as a threat to children and others in our land and elsewhere.

He learned in that experience that what he accomplished could not have been done without the assistance of foundations. He learned that work could not be, could not have been, done with simply the assistance of the Government. As a matter of fact, I think he learned that Government at certain stages of that great effort was more of a handicap than a help.

The CHAIRMAN. If I might just interrupt you for a moment, I would like to make a small experiment in electronics. I wonder if you would direct your mike in the other direction, Dr. Killian. We are trying to find out why we are getting a ring in the sound system.

Please proceed, Senator Cranston.

Senator CRANSTON. Dr. Salk is now undertaking a new effort that might surpass in importance what he has already accomplished in his new endeavor at the Institute. He is seeking to find the cause and cure of cancer, and in view of his record to date, I think I have great hope that he will be successful.

He is also working to discover how to deal with multiplesclerosis, with kidney disorders, and other disorders, physical and otherwise, in our society.

Again he is undertaking work that he could not have undertaken without the assistance of foundations, and in no other way could he have done or could he now be doing what he is doing, and he will speak to you from that standpoint.

STATEMENT OF DR. JONAS SALK, DIRECTOR, THE SALK INSTITUTE FOR BIOLOGICAL STUDIES

Dr. SALK. Thank you, Senator.

Mr. Chairman, in a way I am here to present a personal testimonial of my own experiences with foundations over the last number of years, and a personal testimonial to how I regard the future.

Since I look upon myself as a public servant and I ask what will happen to the work in which I am engaged that serves the public, and I also ask what role did foundations and philanthropy play in the past.

Senator Cranston has commented on some aspects of these questions. Perhaps, it is not necessary for me to do more than to state the conclusion that past work would not have been possible, nor will what I am now engaged in be possible, were it not for the existence of the foundation system.

I might say further, that from my experience universities and institutes require for their own existence the existence of foundations and other forms of philanthropy.

I want also to say further that the grants that are made to universities for work that the Government wants to have done, through grants from the National Institutes of Health, from the National Science Foundation, and other Government agencies, require the existence of these institutions which, as I have already indicated, in turn, could not exist in the absence of philanthropy and in the absence of the foundations. And, therefore, if we, in these institutions, are to serve the country, we, in turn, can function only so long as the American form of philanthropy and the American system of foundations, as it has developed, will exist.

All seem to agree that we should encourage generosity and control greed. This, in essence, is what I heard this morning. The private sector, in which foundations are included, it should be pointed out, are really intended to serve the public sector and not, as seems to be believed by some, to serve the private or the self-serving sector.

I would conclude, from what I have heard, that the problem is not foundations, but the problem is greed and, therefore, we must not try to eliminate foundations, but rather to eliminate greed. We should try to eliminate the disease and not the patient.

The objective, it seems to me, is to stop abuse and not use, and the objective is to encourage the generous spirit and abolish the greedy spirit. The generosity which is so characteristic of this country in essence is, as has been said before, the envy of the world.

I would worry very much if we were to deprive men of the opportunity to satisfy this generous impulse.

One can think of foundations as constituting for the Nation as a whole a prudently accumulated savings account. One can also think of foundations as institutions which are in the business of helping develop foresight. If we think of the foundation system as the patient and not as the disease, and if we think of remedies, we must keep in mind the hippocratic maxim—that "do not harm, do not maim or kill the patient."

I have put it this way because it is sometimes useful to think in this kind of analogy.

As I listened to the discussions this morning and to comments upon the remedies proposed in the House bill, I recognized that a new kind of profession has developed, a new kind of service, a profession and a service in a way analogous to the medical professor or the legal profession; it is the profession of those who serve and work in foundations. I wondered, therefore, in hearing of the desire for regulation and control on the part of foundation executives that these should be, perhaps, a professional association of foundations to develop and exercise methods of control of malpractices and that membership in good standing in such associations might become a requirement for tax-exempt status in the same way that hospitals are accredited, and physicians are accredited and licensed, and as are other specialists and members of the bar.

The Flexner report on medical schools, to which reference was made earlier, which was reported around 1910, at which times there was some 800 medical schools in existence, set up standards of acceptability and soon the bad ones quickly disappeared, and the good ones persisted. There are some 80 or so now, of which we need many more. The idea of rearning the franchise that Dr. Harrar mentioned could, perhaps, be done by this kind of professional surveillance. It also occurred to me that if there were a voluntary fee, in the form of a grant made by the foundations to Government from foundation funds for auditing purposes, it seems to me that this would be in keeping with the most desirable aspects of the way in which this country tries to function—by the development of a measure of self-discipline.

I have touched upon the issue as I see it, as it would affect the work in which I have been, and am, engaged.

I have touched briefly on what could be thought of as remedies. The principle that is involved is not a trivial one and I want to emphasize it in closing. The principle in question is dualism or pluralism, as opposed to monopolism. Monopoly is equally bad, whether it be Government or private, and it is in defense of pluralism in part, that I am here.

I might say that we need a healthy foundation system if others like myself in this and later generations are to be able to serve this Nation, to use Senator Ribicoff's idea, by taking the chance that Government may be reluctant to take.

I also want to echo the comment of Dr. Killian of the desirability, in fact, the necessity, to encourage the development of new foundations as well to maintain the old. New foundations are needed to supplement the efforts of those who have already committed themselves.

I shall close at this point without touching upon some of the points that I made in the prepared statement submitted earlier. I felt that it was more meaningful to give the reactions that I had in the course of hearing the discussions this morning than to repeat what you will see in the text which I would like to include for this record.

Mr. Creel. Mr. McCloy.

STATEMENT OF JOHN J. McCLOY, ATTORNEY, NEW YORK, N.Y.

Mr. McCloy. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Senate, I was introduced as being a member of a New York law firm, but I do not think I am properly here because of that fact. I am, in a sense a rather pitiful position of a lawyer without a client. I am not representing any foundation, though my firm does do some advising of foundations, but I was for many years a member of the board of trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation, and for a number of years, a good many years, I was chairman of the board of trustees of the Ford Foundation. It is through that experience that I am here today.

I was also a member of the board of trustees of a number of other foundations, but today I have no membership in any foundation.

I have arrived at the age of presumptive incapacity where an arbitrary age limit says that you should retire. [Laughter.]

I have made a statement, as the Senators are aware, and I have tried to make an outline and summary of it for the record. I have listened to this testimony today, and I have, of course, read the bill and I think I can sum up my impressions by saying that I am quite clear that this bill is shot through with a definite animus against private foundations.

There are a number of discriminatory provisions which relate only to foundations as such, and not to other charitable foundations.

There are many discriminatory measures, and I won't run over them because I think they have been touched on largely in the testimony that was given this morning.

I have the conviction that this is the wrong approach to this problem. I feel, and my experience has made me feel, that there is a great deal in this foundation world that we do not know very much about. In the first place, the audits of the International Revenue Service have only covered a fraction of the foundations.

There is a broad field there that has not been covered or audited, and I believe that the most constructive legislation that the Congress could adopt at this time is to give the authority and the means, the facilities to the Internal Revenue Service—and I would think it would be the Internal Revenue Service rather than some other agency—by which they could really introduce a comprehensive and objective and thorough-going national audit of the foundations in this country.

I think then we will begin to know something about what we now hear by rumor. There were some figures given this morning, and with all due deference to those who gave them, I would say that I am not sure that they are right. Some people have said there are $21 billion in the foundation assets, and Mr. Patman, I think, has said, there are $50 billion. We really do not know nor do we know the extent of the accumulated income or the improperly accumulated income.

If we can get the facts and have them before us or if the Congress can have them, then it will really be in a position to appraise what good the foundations do and some of the abuses of which they may be guilty. This would tend to, improve the character of the law governing charitable foundations, as well as to take care of the delinquents.

I believe the particular provision, by which an adequate audit could be financed was dismissed this morning. I think I was one of the first who suggested that we should not have a tax but that we should have some sort of a user fee comparable to the audits that are carried on by the Federal authorities in the supervision and audit of banks.

We are all a creature of our own experience. I was a banker once, and you and I know the provisions of the regulations or the law that require the audits of the banks to be given to—or put before the directors. The directors have to read them and have to respond to them. Those audits cover the lending policies of the banks, and since that provision has been in effect, with the audits financed by the banks themselves, but since that has been in effect, at least when I was the head of a bank, I noticed that the auditor tended to improve the tone of the lending. I would think that in case of the foundation, we might have something other than just a mere revenue audit, perhaps, have the IRS empowered to comment of grants get in the shady zone that we were talking about this morning.

You know that on those bank audits there is an item called "especially mentioned loans." It is a little red flag up in the corner, and almost invariably some member of the board of directors says "Well, how about this loan and how about that loan? Why does the Government pick that one up?"

I think some such type of sanction as that might be very helpful in connection with the general audit of which we are speaking. I am very clear in my own mind that this should take on the character of the user fee rather than the character of a tax which has all sorts of connotations and implications in regard to it.

But above all, I would think that it was the duty of the Congress to eliminate from this bill the punitive and rather hostile provisions that clearly run through it. It should single out the abuses, tighten up some of the enforcement provisions—and I think that they can be tightened up—and then with the provision for such an audit as I am suggesting, we would not only know what is going on but we would know what type of regulation, what type of law should be adopted in order to see what the country really should have in the way of legislation.

I know that in the case of the banks that these audits have resulted from time to time in new laws, new regulations, which have generally tightened up the lending policies of the banks, and I believe that rather than to put to risk this flow and continuity of private foundation grants, rather than to put that to a risk what has become a real and vital factor on American philanthropy, I would think we ought to stop and take a look at this situation, get the facts, see what the abuses are, as I say, and also see what the benefits are, and on the basis of that, we will be much better equipped to deal with this problem than we are today.

This does not mean that we would postpone all action. There are some provisions in the bill that I think are very good, and I think some of the sanctions should be tightened up. But remove from this bill this philosophy, this note of animus or discriminatory practice, discriminatory provisions that, as I say, does run through the bill, and I think we would have a much more constructive approach to this subject.

This morning someone referred to deTocqueville. I have always been impressed by that young Frenchman who was over here in the 1830's. He was an extremely discerning young man. He saw the status we are now in vis-a-vis the Soviet Union in a very graphic prognostication, but he also pointed out the role that private philanthropy played in the American society, how deep it went. It is a very eloquent passage. It is not, I believe, in his book. It is in a letter that he sent to France when he was over here. But this is the concept of our society, this is the core of our society—it is also the tradition of the Congress, because the Congress approved these exemptions. The presumption is in favor of the beneficial aspects of the foundations; indeed, the Treasury is on record as saying they are convinced it is only a very small percentage of the foundations that do represent abuses.

On that basis, the presumption should be in favor of the foundations rather than against them and, as I noted, the opposite presumption runs through this bill.

Also, we have had testimony this morning of the looming deficit that is compending in this country in the effort to meet the educational needs and the social needs of the country.

We can see it coming down the road like an elephant on a towpath.

We know that we are not going to meet this gap solely by private philanthropy or solely by government action. It is going to take all the assets that we have to cope with these problems, and I believe at this stage in history to inject depressants rather than incentives to the flow of private philanthropy would be improvident and not to the best interests of the Nation.

So I won't go into the other details of my statement. As I said, I made my statement when we were prepared to testify heretofore and I do not urge you all to read it, I do not say it is the last word, but I think it was a fairly good statement. I think that the conclusions that I have arrived at as the result of a study of this problem and hearing this testimony today are that I believe that if we removed the animus and hostile spirit of the bill and really went at it, established a basis upon which we could get the facts we would do everybody, do the Nation, a great service and that, I think, is the essence of what I would care to say at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, thank you very much, gentlemen. I very much applaud the fine work that each of you has done in his own capacity, and I am sure I speak for the committee when I say that.

I fear that we will find that there are a lot of people in the foundation business, not because of benefits they hope to provide for humanity, but because they hope to avoid taxes. But, I do not believe that refers to anybody at this tale here. If others had fulfilled the purposes that are stated in their foundations organization papers, I do not believe we would be hearing you testify on this matter.

I want to thank each of you for the suggestions that have been made as to ways that we might act in the national interest with regard to foundations.

Since the subject came up, we have had a lot of very fine suggestions of things that could be done to see that foundations acted responsibly. I do not think that we have heard here today from any of those who would act in any other way than in a responsible fashion. We are particularly proud that you came here to talk to us, Dr. Salk.

We have some very fine people in my State, as you know, who are making an effort in the field of cancer, heart disease and other things, like Dr. Alton Oschner and Dr. DeBakey, and we certainly wish you all the good luck in the world in the endeavor you are making on behalf of humanity.

Senator CURTIS. I would like to thank the panel for their helpful suggestions.

Mr. McClory, I particularly applaud your idea that we should have this audit, let it run a few years, and legislate in the light rather than in the dark, and that is the essence of your message.

Mr. MCCLORY. That is the essence, yes.

Senator CURTIS. I do not know whether it has ever been called to your attention or not but there are some well-known foundations that have a splendid record. There are some small new ones that are likewise operating in the public interest.

Based on your experience as a banker and a lawyer, it is quite likely when an individual creates a foundation that he will give to the foundation that which he has, which may be stock in his own business; isn't that right?

Mr. MCCLORY. Yes, that is right.

Senator CURTIS. As the years go by just gradually they will get more diversification.

Do you believe the fact that the donor or his family have a—that their company securities are a major asset in the foundation that that per se proves any wrongdoing or lack of operation in the public interest?

Mr. McClory. No. I do not believe per se it is vicious. I believe it may be rather praiseworthy because most of those, a good many of those, small foundations, wholly controlled foundations, are not on the eastern seaboard, they are in areas where, in the hinterland of the country, there is limited giving and the needs are great.

Senator Curtis. Yes.

Mr. McCloy. And this presents a very good stimulus to giving in that area, and I feel that the point at which to strike, is at the abuse, but I do not think, as you point out, Senator, that the abuse is per se in the amount of the stock that he gives to a foundation.

Senator Curtis. Well, I used the word "small." They are small compared to some of our major ones, but they are large enough that they give away a good many millions of dollars every year.

I know one foundation that later gave 160 percent of their income. I do not know whether you are aware of it or not, but in some instances the House bill imposes the regular corporate tax on foundations.

For instance, if you have a foundation and their asset is that they are the sole owners of the business, were they a holding corporation they would get an 85-percent credit for dividends paid from the operating company. If they were in the 50-percent bracket they would have 7½-percent tax, and here a foundation that someone has turned their business over to will be faced not with a small tax but with a tax equivalent to the regular corporate tax in that particular situation.

Mr. McCloy. Well, I am aware of that provision. I think it is classed as one of those things that I call punitive provisions that I do not believe strike the right note.

Senator Curtis. Yes.

I feel that what we do here is so far-reaching that it is my sincere hope that after we take care of those few glaring abuses that a remedy can be pretty well agreed upon, then we have exhaustive audits and find out where the bad practices are and what the right solution is, and that should take a little time, 2 years, 5 years.

Mr. McCloy. And that audit will tone up the grants because—when you get—when the controlling boards of these foundations get, the audit they see that there are some questionable practices that if dealt with will tend to improve the grants. Certainly that has been the experience with the banks which, I think, is a good parallel. But I believe that the prime necessity at this point is to have a comprehensive nationwide thoroughgoing audit.

Senator Curtis. I won't take any more time. I thank you all.

Senator Ribicoff (presiding). I thank all of you gentlemen—I am sorry, Senator Hansen.

Senator Hansen. I have no questions.

Senator Ribicoff. We are very appreciative of having your counsel here.

Senator Williams and myself, I mean, if you will pardon me, Senator Curtis, we have been discussing how complex this entire measure is, and with the more witnesses we hear we realize its complexity.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Creel. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SUMMARY OF STATEMENT BY MR. IRWIN MILLER

A. The role of foundations as seen by a foundation leader

1. Foundation facts and accomplishments:
   (a) Facts:
      (1) Foundations constitute 8% of total philanthropy.
      (2) Annual foundation giving is $1.5 billion, or 7½% of the total assets of foundations.
      (3) There are 22,000 foundations, of which only a few hundred are the standard setters.
   (b) Accomplishments:
      (1) Pioneering roles, for example support by foundations for Dr. Jonas Salk and Dr. Robert Goddard.
      (2) Strengthening education and educational research.
      (3) Anticipating social and international problems.
      (4) Supporting development of writers, artists, and scholars.
      (5) Health, scientific and population research and programs.
2. Responsibility of Congress and public to examine foundations:
   (a) Foundations operate under public trust.
   (b) Foundations inevitably are found to raise questions, doubt and controversy.
   (c) Periodic examination of foundations by Congress and the public are both good and essential.
3. Proposed tax on foundations is inconsistent with purpose of tax exemption.
4. Proposed measures to curb fiscal abuses are good, and are supported by most foundations.
5. Proposed limitations on programs are unwise in that they attempt to eliminate "bad judgments" and in doing so allow for only the most bland kinds of judgments, and only the most bland kinds of activities, by foundations.
6. The tax and program limitations act as a signal to discourage private philanthropy—and thereby the whole private foundation sector of American life.
7. Foundations are in fact accountable to the public under existing conditions.
   (a) Existing law (if fully enforced).
   (b) Public disclosure and the press.
   (c) Broad-based boards of trustees.
   (d) "Market evaluation" by foundation recipients.
   (e) Congressional inquiry.
8. Each individual American citizen ought to feel and bear the responsibility to give and to act voluntarily on behalf of the continuing welfare of his country—and not only in response to the compulsion laws.

STATEMENT OF MR. IRWIN MILLER

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, in the time allotted to me this morning, I would like to sketch a background against which other witnesses will fill in specific detail. As I believe the agenda will indicate, a number of foundations and beneficiaries of foundations have coordinated their presentation so that all the major issues can be discussed and repetition avoided.

There will be six panels which in turn will cover (1) the role of foundations in American life, (2) the effect of the legislation (especially the proposed tax) on foundation beneficiaries, (3) the effect of the tax as seen by foundations, (4) the effect of the program limitation (including grants to individuals), (5) the effects of distribution requirements (including problems raised by definition of qualifying distributions, and (6) the restrictive effects on the development of philanthropy and the operation of foundations (including the effects of expenditure responsibility and heavy burdens on trustees).

Where as these presentations have been coordinated and consolidated, as was requested by the Committee in its August 12th press release, it should be noted that each witness will be testifying for himself and for the institution to which he is attached.

I speak this morning as an individual. But I am neither a disinterested nor an uninterested witness. To identify myself, I am a businessman who lives in Columbus, Indiana. Cummins Engine Company, which I serve as Chairman of the Board, created a foundation some fifteen years ago. Both directly and through the foundation, the Company normally contributes the full five per cent of its pre-tax profits. I currently serve as President of its foundation. I also serve as an officer and director of a foundation created by my family, and I am a trustee of the Ford Foundation.

In respect to my personal life, my wife and I have for some years been in the process of qualifying for the unlimited charitable deduction. Further, we have raised our five children to believe that a responsible sense of concern for the well-being of society in which they live requires that they each contribute to philanthropy the full thirty per cent of their income each year. Finally, it should be noted that I serve as a trustee of a number of institutions which are often recipients of foundation grants.

I state all this to show my bias in this matter. Having done so, I now hope you will hear my opinions. In expressing them, I must note the enormous complexity of the Foundation Sections of the Bill in my own inexpertise in legal complexities.

Let me speak first to the American tradition of private giving and the important place it holds in our national way of life.

Our country today is unique in that our government, more than any other in the world, actively encourages citizens and corporations to concern themselves with the social problems of the nation and to accept personal responsibility for constructive change. This encouragement comes in good part by way of the charitable deduction allowance, and the laws supporting the establishment and operation of foundations.

In the face of great current pessimism, I believe that America will solve its pressing problems of race, poverty, education, urban congestion, and the like. A primary reason for such belief is that there exists a broader and deeper concern about these problems among the individual men and women of this nation, old and young, than can be found in any other country today.

If, as individuals, we should shrug our shoulders, decide there is nothing we can do, that it is all someone else's fault, that "they" ought to do something about it; if we cop out as responsible individuals by blaming government for not acting, and damn government when it acts and requires more taxes to pay for the acts, then we will surely go down the drain.

On the other hand, if each one of us decides he ought to do what he can in his own situation, in his own community, and is willing to change his old attitudes, to give time and money wherever he can see it will make a small difference for the better, then we Americans will very likely provide to the world a demonstration of national achievement which will be without parallel in history.

The government by its example, now has the opportunity to encourage such an active acceptance of responsibility for the welfare of all others by each citizen.

They have made invaluable contributions to American society, and they are capable of still more. They, however, are not the pivot of American society, nor are they omnipotent or without blemish. There is a lack of adequate knowledge and understanding about their place in American society.

Let me briefly sketch the dimensions of that place. Each year, some $16 billion in private wealth is given for philanthropic purposes. The greatest philanthropist still is the man in the street, the individual givers who account for nearly 80 percent of the total (even exclusive of bequests). The private foundations provide only about 8 percent of total philanthropy. Last year foundations gave $1.5 billion, or about 7½ percent of their total assets of some $20 billion.

There are about 22,000 foundations. Most of them are little more than incorporated channels for giving by individuals and in assets and influence they account for quite a small proportion of the field; more than 12,000 foundations, for example, make grants totaling less than $10,000 a year.

The potency and signficance of private foundations resides in the few hundred with sufficient skills and resources to support efforts toward the solution of problems important to American society. They also account for most of the funds in the field. More than two-thirds of all foundation assets are held by some 200 of the general purpose foundations. By and large these are the leaders and standard setters in the field.

"Tax free" and "tax exempt" are modifiers that have so commonly come to be used in front of the term foundation that there is a tendency to overlook their essential philanthropic nature. The Treasury Department, which ought to have as keen a sense of the relation between institutions and taxation as anyone, a few years ago portrayed the role of private philanthropy and the part played by foundations in these terms:

Private philanthropy plays a special and vital role in our society. Beyond providing for areas into which government cannot or should not advance (such as religion), private philanthropic organizations can be uniquely qualified to initiate thought and action, experiment with new and untried ventures, dissent from prevailing attitudes, and act quickly and flexibly.

Private foundations have an important part of this work. Available even to those of relatively restricted means, they enable individuals or small groups to establish new charitable endeavors and to express their own bents, concerns, and experience. In doing so, they enrich the pluralism of our social order. Equally important, because their funds are frequently free of commitment to specific operating programs, they can shift the focus of their interest and their financial support from one charitable area to another. They can, hence, constitute a powerful instrument for evolution, growth, and improvement in the shape and direction of charity.

While the proposals under discussion today are addressed to private foundations, their impact would be felt throughout the entire fabric of the voluntary sector of American life.

One of the philanthropic statesmen of this century, Abraham Flexner, said the level of a given civilization can perhaps be measured "by the extent of private initiative, private responsibility, private organization in all the fields open to human culture." Certainly the accomplishments of our society cannot be measured accurately, or as positively, without taking into account those achievements reached in whole or in part through foundation support.

Robert Calkins, former President of Brookings, summarized foundation achievements as follows:

"Foundations have pioneered and assisted pioneers, scientists, scholars, and innovators; they have helped to create and strengthen colleges, universities, research laboratories, research institutions, scientific and scholarly organizations, welfare and religious institutions; they have often anticipated social and international problems and mobilized knowledge for dealing with them. In doing these things, they have freed large parts of the world from the curse of diseases, such as malaria and yellow fever; have advanced the art of medical care and the treatment of illness; have provided knowledge for the control of population and the expansion of food supplies; have aided the development of emerging nations; have encouraged educational opportunities for military groups, and the establishment of area and language studies to afford a better understanding of other cultures. They have demonstrated the value of liberal support for basic research and encouraged large public support; have contributed importantly to our growing knowledge of physical and living nature, and of social organization; have made possible the development of new scientific instruments for studying the atom, the cell, the star, and the nature of life itself; have contributed toward a better understanding of social behavior and informed social policy; have helped to clarify the goal of humanistic scholarship, aided the arts, and broadened the cultural interests and enjoyments of millions of people. They have also supported the development of thousands of scientists, scholars, creative writers, artists, and professional personnel, as well as leaders for business, government, and education. They have encouraged informed approaches to domestic problems, promoted international understanding, and assisted in the search for peace. They have contributed to the international community of scholarship and learning, and built bridges of communication and mutual respect."

But the particular issues at hand cannot be resolved by a recital of the glories of foundations. I do not favor, nor do I think the American public favors, a granting of perpetual approval to institutions simply on the basis of past laurels. No matter how unsettling it may be to men and organizations convinced that they are doing the right thing in the public interest, it is healthy that the public periodically examines its institutions to judge whether they are still serving their avowed purposes, to determine whether anything has gone sour even with our most cherished practices.

For many institutions this is such a moment. There is not only a taxpayers revolt in the air but also, I believe, fundamental skepticism about many aspects of our public and private life. Men and women are not only asking where we are going but also who is in charge. They are concerned, it seems to me, about whether all the agencies in American life that are dedicated to public purpose—governmental and non-governmental—are really working in the public interest. They are calling for some sort of accounting and insisting on greater accountability.

The proposals related to private foundations seem to me to raise fundamental questions about the role of the private sector in affairs of public concern: Is it to be diminished or encouraged? Do the American people still believe in private philanthropy still important to the attainment of our needs and desires as a people? Or have our community needs and national problems grown so in scale and complexity that private efforts are basically too puny? Would the funds devoted to them best be diverted to government use?

There are several reasons these concerns have coalesced around private foundations. The purposes and ways of foundations are only vaguely understood. Also, while foundations are the post peculiarly American manifestation of the philanthropic impulse, they do not operate as simply as traditional charity; taking the long view, and working with professional skill, they have grown more sophisticated and specialized in their approach to problems and therefore they are less easy to understand. Further, they represent relatively large concentrations of wealth, and bigness in any form stirs suspicion in the American consciousness. Foundation have also concerned themselves with some of the problems that are deeply troubling our society, and almost anything one does in these fields is apt to stir passions. Finally, certain abuses in the field have become apparent, and questions have been raised about the judgment of foundations in certain activities.

These hearings constitute an examination of the obligations of foundations under their contract with American society. Parenthetically, it should be noted that this is the first opportunity foundations have had to testify on a number of the major provisions of this Bill. At bottom, foundations operate under a public trust agreement. Through exemption statutes, American society encourages the application of private wealth to public purpose. Society must be assured both that the privilege is not abused and that the responsibility to deliver a social dividend is met.

In the matter of private foundations, the record seems abundantly clear that the responsibility has been discharged. In terms of advances in education, community life, health, and artistic and cultural resources, the foundations have returned to society many times over what society has granted in the form of exemption from taxation. There is no doubt a point of diminishing return in this sort of quid pro quo. That point would certainly be at hand, for example, if foundation assets were growing at, say, double or triple the growth of the Federal budget or the Gross National Product. In fact, although the growth in the absolute numbers of foundations has been striking, the growth in foundation assets is not exceptional as compared to other sectors. The Treasury's studies confirm this.

It is equally important that the income produced by foundation assets flow continuously to charitable, educational and scientific purposes. For the most part this is so, and passage of certain features of H.R. 13270, coupled with more systematic enforcement of existing regulations, would provide the public a guarantee of a continuing flow.

Concerning the proposed tax on foundation income, I will be quite brief, not only because succeeding witnesses will treat it in detail but also because it strikes me as the most clear-cut of the several difficult decisions before you with respect to private foundations.

I regard a tax on private foundations as patently inconsistent with the reason society sanctions foundations at all. Whatever foundations earn from their principal is—by tradition, charter, and law—intended for distribution for philanthropic purposes, for the public well-being. To reduce these publicly-dedicated funds by any percentage is to diminish the value to society by just that amount. The judgment Congress and the public must make is whether, all things considered, foundations are likely to continue making valued contributions to American life. If the answer is yes, then why reduce the contribution? If the answer is no, then more fundamental measures than a limited tax are in order. The inference I am forced to draw is that the proposal to tax foundation income is actually punishment for presumed wrong-doing by foundations—a reaction that is both unjustified and unwise.

In contrast to the proposed tax, the bill's measures to curb and prevent fiscal abuses are necessary to the public interest and vital to the preservation of private philanthropy.

The public official who abuses his position casts shame not only on himself but on all that public service stands for. Misbehavior in private organizations and institutions clothed with a public interest is quite as sordid. Society loathes the charity racket, and abuses in institutional philanthropy must also be rooted out. The Treasury has noted, "the preponderant number of private foundations perform their functions without tax abuse," but it has been clear for several years that some abuses exist, and even the few are too many. They include the use of foundations exclusively as tax shelters, the unreasonable accumulation of foundation income instead of regular distribution for philanthropic purposes, the use of foundations for self-dealing and other forms of personal or business advantage, and the concealment of foundation activities. Some of these abuses could be curbed by better enforcement of existing regulations. Others require additional legislation, and several of the proposals before you are effectively drafted to that purpose.

Speaking for myself and for the foundations with which I am associated, I say that both the new measures to curb such abuses and stricter surveillance and enforcement of existing regulations are long overdue. Many other leading foundations share this feeling, and have been on record to that effect. Better enforcement and passage of the abuse related provisions in the bill will probably have the effect of sorting out from the existing thousands of foundations those that are dedicated to philanthropic purposes and those that serve themselves rather than society. They will discourage future establishment of foundations whose donors enjoy tax advantages without a return in kind to society. At the same time, they will not hobble existing or prospective new foundations that conform to the high ideals of the philanthropic tradition.

But other parts of H.R. 13270 appear to be aimed not at fiscal abuses but at foundation activities. The nation's foundations each year make hundreds of thousands of grants. Not even the most passionate admirers of foundations suppose that some of these actions were not mistakes—for any number of reasons, ranging from the technical to the judgmental. What is remarkable to me is that so few errors occur, given the wide range of fields in which foundations are active—from the arts to community health, from manpower training to population problems. Nonetheless, neither the noble purpose nor good works of the vast majority of foundations exempt them from criticism and censure for errors when they occur. My own experience is that foundation trustees and officers are attentive to such criticism. They do not hide behind claims to virtue or infallibility.

Society deserves reasonable protection against the misfeasance of institutions it has given warrant to operate in the public interest. It is the responsibility of Congress to see to the fulfillment of that warranty. But some of the new proposals, ostensibly designed as airtight guarantees of sound judgment by foundations, are so drawn that they give no added protection over existing law, and indeed only do injury to the public interest.

One set of proposals, for example, would fence off private foundations from activity in areas of public policy. Existing regulations declare lobbying and partisan political activity out of bounds, and, while it is not always easy to draw the line between what is legitimate and what is not in these matters, there are remarkably few instances of foundations skating even close to the edge of the limits now established.

The barriers that the new proposals would erect could well impair, not improve, the judgment and effectiveness of private foundations. One on which I can speak with some intimate experience is the effect on foundation boards of trustees. The penalties proposed for violation of several of the proposed limitations—limitations that are necessarily imprecise—fall not only on a foundation as an institution but also heavily on individual foundation managers, including trustees. This could drive trustees and foundation officials into such an excess of caution that even innocent and benign activities that touch on public policy in such fields as education and conservation would be deprived of foundation support.

The proposals may stem in part from a presumed new aggressiveness of foundations to assist work in controversial fields and to venture into matters subject to pending or future legislation. Throughout most of their history, foundations have at one point or another supported work considered controversial by some segment of the population.

Foundations can inaugurate a teacher pension system, develop new curricula and teaching techniques, increase educational salaries and be applauded for all of these, but then should they support a controversial educational program such as decentralization, the reaction is likely to be, "What are they doing sticking their noses into educational policy?" The irony of this situation needs to be recognized, for if we are to legislate away all possibilities for bad or controversial judgments, at the same time we will be legislating away all but the most bland kinds of foundation effort.

If foundations were the sole source of aid to the production of information, ideas, activity and opinion on matters of public concern, there would be legitimate reason to consider an exhaustive set of rules governing such activity. But that is not the case. The work supported by foundations on public issues is just one input into a vast marketplace, along with the voices—some tax-exempt, some not—of individuals, business enterprises, unions, churches, political parties, trade associations and other organizations, to say nothing of the press. To bar foundations from supporting such work would be to limit the diversity of activity that has strengthened our society.

I do not think the government is well advised to begin making other than the broadest categorical decisions as to what is "good" and what is "bad." Experiment and trial needs to be encouraged, and one "success" most usually outweighs a dozen failures.

These issues will be discussed in detail by later witnesses. Suffice it to say now that the legislative net which has been cast out to catch those judgments alleged to be bad, controversial or imperious will drag in with it far more good than bad fish.

Apart from these and other specific consequences, some of us feel that the proposed legislation in general is, quite plainly, a signal that future foundations are not welcome. These proposals should be scrutinized, therefore, in the light of whether society would gain or lose from the establishment of new foundations, some of which might in time make extraordinary contributions to American life, just as some foundations formed in the last few decades have superbly carried forward the tradition of the pioneering foundations of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

One may even ask, do some of these proposals signal the intent of Congress to discourage private philanthropy in general, particularly in matters that are also governmental concerns? On the face of it, such a supposition sounds alarmist, but it is not far-fetched if one regards the private foundation as an outstanding example of the American genius for organization applied to the age-old philantropic impulse. Those who regard foundations as a symbol of private initiative fear that the erosion of their flexible capability might mark the first step in a trend toward general containment and withering of private initiative as a whole. And that would be an exorbitant price to pay for the abuses that have blemished the good name of the private foundation and for the offense even some of the most respected foundations may have given at one time or another.

If those parts of the foundation-related proposals are so detrimental to the benefits society would enjoy from the continuation of foundation philanthropy, then how is the public to be assured that the power that foundations represent is not one day applied to mischievous ends, to political purpose, and in general against the public interest? To repeat, past performance is reassuring, but not enough. Nor are good intentions. The public clearly demands that major institutions affecting the public well-being be accountable to society, and foundations are no exception.

But governmental regulation is not the sole path to accountability, and a thick web of governmental guidelines and restrictions can impair the very flexibility and freedom of action that enable foundations and other voluntary and private philanthropic agencies to respond to changed conditions and needs.

The basic ingredients of a balanced system of accountability, it seems to me, are already at hand. For the government's part, laws to prevent abuses are already on the books. That they have not been sufficiently enforced is a defect that some of us are proposing be remedied by a foundation registration fee earmarked for full and continuing implementation; it would also apply to the necessary new abuse-related provisions. Outside the government, channels of accountability exist, despite the myth that foundations are untouchable. Let me cite a few of the major ones:

The majority of the leading foundations that account for the preponderant resources in the field recognize large public responsibilities, and may go well beyond the legislative requirements of reporting and public disclosure of their activities.

Furthermore, they have broad-based boards of trustees—men and women of unquestioned dedication to public service and enviable records of judgment and accomplishment. The presence on the boards of foundations of such trustees constitutes a power assurance that foundations will act responsibly and will be accountable in the broadest sense to American society.

Foundations are also open to review by the press.

Their performance also undergoes continuing "market evaluation" by academic and community institutions that cooperate with them. These beneficiaries are more objective than one might assume. Since foundation funds are rarely the major support for their ongoing needs, they are colleagues of the foundations rather than patrons and wards. Their collaboration is testimony to the worth of foundation programs for, in accepting their funds, they commit to them their own reputations and some of their own resources.

Finally, Congress does have and has exercised, since 1915, the right to inquiry into activities of foundations.

Altogether, the full exercise of the governmental and marketplace channels will insure that private foundations are accountable to the public for their behavior and performance to an extent fully equal to any other part of the private sector.

Despite my preoccupation with the dangers in some of the proposals before you, I want to state my firm conviction that the scrutiny under which the Congress and the Treasury have placed foundations has been salutary.

This has been a sobering and significant chapter in the history of private foundations. It is a vivid illustration of the principle that even institutions of great value to society must constantly review their responsibilities and examine their distant borders to insure that corrosive incursions are not under way.

I close by urging that you adopt those parts of the Bill that are directed toward crippling and preventing abuses, such as self-dealing or inadequate returns to charity, which undermine the public's trust in private foundations, and that you eliminate those measures, such as the tax and the program limitations, which would vitiate the capacity of the foundations to continue their productive service to the American people. This is a plea not for private privilege or for the preservation of any single institution, but rather for the reaffirmation of the responsibility which each individual American citizen ought to feel and bear for the continuing welfare of his country, the responsibility to give and to act voluntarily, and not only in response to the compulsion of laws.

Summary of Statement by Dr. Herman B. Wells

I. THE CONTRIBUTION OF FOUNDATIONS

Foundations early and continuously helped higher education with funds for scholarships (as more students without the ability to pay aspired to advanced education), with funds for facilities and equipment (e.g., the expensive precision instruments of science), with grants for research (In this creative period, each new idea and each discovery opened possibilities to scholars who then sought sponsorship of their investigations.), and with support of a great variety of projects, designed to advance scholarship and society's interests. Often foundations came to the rescue when no other support was available, before government undertook support. In many instances (for example, scholarships), colleges and universities would have had to seek government appropriations—thus adding to the burden on the taxpayer—had not foundations supplied the support. The results of the programs, projects and research made possible by foundations have had beneficial repercussions far beyond the campus and region and will extend long past the present time.

II. DETRIMENTAL EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED TAX

Taxation of the foundations that can have no other effect than to reduce the funds available to higher education is a critical matter because each dollar—the last often more than the first—is important in launching a project, matching a grant, funding scholarships, etc. Furthermore, the size of the reduction is no measure of the potential removed by such an action. At a time of crisis in financing higher education, even the direction of such a move is disheartening. The amount that the tax would yield the Federal Government is relatively minuscule but its detrimental effect on higher education would be major. In addition, once the principle of taxing the foundations is established, there is a strong likelihood that the percentage of reduction will be increased in succeeding years.

A question arises why foundations, which already serve society, should be taxed so that government can serve society. Inevitably, the mechanics of the transfer will involve a cost which need not have been imposed between the funds and their use in the service of society.

Punishment of the abuses of a few foundations should not be visited on the many. Legislation like the Prohibition Amendment which raises a barrier against a problem instead of treating the problem merely induces new forms of abuse. From my observation it seems to me that most foundations have an excellent record and that their staffs have been conscientious in their commitment to the public interest.

The prohibition against a private foundation engaging in any activities intended to influence governmental legislation has crucial implications for higher education. Much of the scholarship undertaken in such fields as business, education and the social sciences is prompted by a desire to reduce imperfections. That is, both the fact-finding and action resulting are contemplated. Otherwise the research would be an exercise in futility. The most disturbing aspect of the prohibition is the control it threatens over the unpopular idea, the investigation of controversial issues and the concept which is ahead of the times. It is equally important to society that cancer be cured and that poverty be eliminated. However, because the first is non-controversial, they would not be treated alike as research subjects seeking funding.

Foundations are an expression of free enterprise. In their support of higher education they encourage free enterprise in ideas. They provide opportunity to the unusual man and idea. They give vital aid to the small private institution which lacks qualifications or visibility to attract government support. They have stimulated private giving to colleges and universities through such means as challenge grants. They represent an important expression of the volunteer sector. It is patent that our present store of knowledge and many of the gains which have improved our quality of life would have been unrealizable without the encouragement and support of foundations.

Institutions with which I am connected receive support from many foundations, large and small, state, regional and national. (A range of examples from different types of institutions, showing the variety of ways in which foundations have assisted higher education to perform its service to society more effectively, follows in the Statement.)

America's system of higher education is envied by many institutions abroad because of its multiple sources of support which ensure independence of thought and action and freedom from undue influence from any source. The American foundation is one of the instrumentalities by which our independence and freedom are maintained.

Statement of Dr. Herman B. Wells

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this committee. I appear here in the hope that the recounting of my experience with foundations will be useful to the members of the committee as they consider the provisions of H.R. 13270 relating to private foundations.

I speak for no one but myself. Nevertheless, I believe that my views are held generally by presidents of American colleges and universities and members of collegiate faculties.

As former President and now Chancellor of Indiana University, as a current member of the Boards of Earlham College, Howard University, and Indiana Institute of Technology, of the Malpas Scholarship Board of DePauw University and of the Board of Visitors of Tulane University, I wish to express my profound concern about the proposed tax on the investment income of foundations, because I believe that a substantial adverse impact on higher education would result from it.

As you are undoubtedly aware, in the last few decades higher education has had to respond to the need for educating as many qualified youth as possible, for sharing the talents of its academic personnel, and for facilitating investigation and experimentation. Yet, in making this response, colleges and universities have inevitably become involved in its consequences. Scholarships and fellowships, new facilities and equipment, larger academic staffs, and special provisions for research, all had to be secured. Inflation and campus growth have magnified the problem.

We educators are grateful to Congress for the role it has played in providing colleges and universities with the means to respond. But, in candor, I must attribute much of the early and continuing support to the indispensable role of the private foundations. These foundations have performed a remarkable service of aid with scholarships and fellowships, grants to scholars, implementation of innovative programs, faculty salary supplements, facility and equipment subsidies, underwriting of conferences, incentive grants for private giving, encouragement of comprehensive evaluations and investigations—the list is much too long to detail. Parenthetically, I would point out that this role has in some measure relieved taxpayers of the need to support activities that would otherwise have required tax funds to conduct.

I have included in an appendix to this statement several representative illustrations of projects with which I am especially familiar that could not have been realized without the support of private foundations. The results have had an effect far beyond the campus and the state involved and will have an influence long past the present time.

When new knowledge, improved methods and extended opportunities for our youth are at stake, there are no ascertainable limits to need. Therefore, I find the threat of a reduction by taxation of the funding available to higher education very disturbing. I would be concerned even if assured that the taxable percentage would never be increased—an unlikely contingency. For the deflection of any income, relatively small though it may be, from its anticipated use at higher education's frontiers in this time of discovery and widening possibilities would be an ill-afforded move. Moreover, the germinal small grant has time and again proved so effective that it would be misleading to suppose that a small reduction of funds is of negligible concern to educators. The approximately $65 million which would be realized by the proposed tax in the first year are not critical to the Federal government nor to foundations. They are critical to foundation recipients.

Indeed, the proposition that an organization wholly devoted to opening new paths and encouraging experimentation for the ultimate benefit of society has an obligation to support the government in its services bears a nagging resemblance to robbing Peter to pay Paul. Ironically, a portion of the funds that might have been available for grants would of necessity be swallowed up by the mechanics involved in taxation.

There is a real crisis in the financing of higher education, as you are undoubtedly aware. It will not be lessened by diminishing the ability of foundations to contribute to educational income. A tax on the foundations will inevitably have this effect and, in fact, will increase the pressure on government to provide additional financing.

The motivation for such legislation seems to be, at least in part, a desire to eliminate abuse of privileges heretofore granted foundations. If a few students cheat on examinations, you would neither expect nor desire us to levy a fine on all students. Rather than dealing with the problem, an action of this sort quite clearly punishes the innocent without providing a distinguishable deterrent for the guilty. Legislation like the Prohibition Amendment which raises a barrier against a problem instead of treating the problem merely induces new forms of abuse. From my observation it seems to me that most foundations have an excellent record and that their staffs have been conscientious in their commitment to the public interest.

An abuse that has been often mentioned is the use of foundations as shelters from taxation. It has been my experience that most rich philanthropists are very ethical in making their gifts, careful always to seek no improper tax advantage. A single dramatic example will make the point.

Indiana University has a magnificent rare book collection which serves not only the immediate University community but scholars from coast to coast and throughout the world. Its core is the personal collection of the late J. K. Lilly and its development has been supported by generous annual grants from the Lilly Endowment.

When Mr. J. K. Lilly made the original gift of his collection, he instructed the appraiser to make a very conservative valuation to avoid even a suspicion of inflated value for tax advantage. The material in Appendix A proves conclusively that the books were transferred at less than half of what they would have netted at auction. It is interesting also to note that in his collection there was a copy of the first printing of the Declaration of Independence which was given to us with a value listed at $15,000. The only copy that has come on the market since then brought $405,000.

Although some reform may in face be necessary, it can do more harm than good if it inadvertently results in deterring or hobbling the American institution of the foundations, which has contributed immeasurably to the enhancement of life in America.

There is another aspect of the proposed legislation which concerns my colleagues and me greatly. It is the absolute prohibition against a private foundation engaging in any activities intended to influence any governmental legislation. I believe it likely that the prohibition was introduced as the result of two or three projects which raised questions of improper influence and that it is aimed at preventing a repetition of such grants. But the wording has sweeping implications. Any study, any document, any project bearing upon a public issue which has a foundation subsidy could conceivably be called into question and very likely would be if its subject were controversial or its conclusions unpopular. A foundation-supported conference at Indiana University, or elsewhere, on a question of public policy could be deterred from gaining the benefits of a knowledgeable public official's views, lest his participation be interpreted as an attempt of the conference organizers to influence him in a legislative decision. The Educational Commission of the States, which receives a portion of its support from foundations and which has governors and state legislators among its membership, would surely hesitate henceforth to pursue one of its main objectives, the preparation of studies on education for use by state legislatures. The Carnegie Commission on Higher Education with its staff of experts and exceptional opportunity to assemble and report data never before available would most assuredly not be engaged in this mammoth undertaking without an intent of influencing decisions of governmental bodies.

The crux of the problem is the interpretation of "influence." As long as data made available to public officials through the activities supported by foundations are generally acceptable, no question is apt to arise. But let the facts be contraindicative of a viewpoint supported by any group or let them weigh against one side in a controversial issue, what is to prevent that group or side from invoking the provision against "influence"? It is equally important to society that cancer be cured and that poverty be eliminated. However, because the first in non-controversial and the second controversial, they would not be treated alike as research subjects seeking funding.

I sincerely believe that this prohibition will not only penalize all foundations for a very few projects to which objection has been taken but will in fact discriminate against foundation recipients, particularly in education, in their freedom to act and report on matters of public interest. Worse, it subjects them to the not insubstantial danger that a project in the course of its execution may become liable to penalty through some turn of events or opinion.

I hope that foundations will always be free to back new, non-conforming ideas, even though an idea may seem at the moment heretical. History teaches us that today's heresay may be tomorrow's truth. The earth proved to be round and the moon accessible from earth. Man-made barriers to discovery have deterred but never downed forever the progress of a well-reasoned idea. In the end, as the wise saying goes, truth will out—and we have learned little if, in this late twentieth century we still insist on depriving ourselves of the benefits which a later and more acceptant generation will reap from the ideas evolved in our time.

I have heard that there is some concern outside of the academic community with regard to the influence which foundations might have exerted on institutions. This is rather puzzling in view of the small portion of funding that they have supplied to the whole of any institutional budget. The multi-source funding of colleges and universities has, in practice, afforded them freedom of action, thought and experimentation.

It has been of vital importance to scholars to have a source of funding for pioneer ventures and for research that may be controversial. Let me cite a case or two in point that should give pause. When Dr. Robert H. Godard began his research into rocketry three decades or more ago, it was the Daniel and Florence Guggenheim Foundation which was his sole backer. We have all been made aware recently of the dramatic importance of that initial research.

The freedom which foundations have to move in advance of popular opinion, to encourage a wide range of initiative, and to respond rapidly and flexibly to ideas (or, remain "relevant," in the students' term) is precisely the virtue of private philanthropy and that freedom must be protected.

It has been no small function of foundation support to encourage the unusual man. In the humanities, a significant example is readily found in the Guggenheim grants, directed by an Indiana University graduate. Many of our leading Indiana University scholars have had an opportunity to accelerate their development as a result of Guggenheim grants. The recognition and promotion of unusual men and ideas have been one of America's greatest assets.

Although I don't agree with the late Herbert Hoover that bureaucracy is devoid of any progressive thought, I believe as he did in free enterprise in our economy, in the organizations of our society and in the commerce of our ideas. As he said, "Ours is a voluntary society. The fabric of American life is woven around our tens of thousands of voluntary associations. That is, around our churches, our professional societies, our women's organizations, our businesses, our labor and farmers' associations—and not least, our charitable institutions. That is the very nature of American life. The inspirations of progress spring from these voluntary agencies, not from bureaucracy. If these voluntary activities were to be absorbed by government bureaus, this civilization would be over. Something neither free nor noble would take its place."

American higher education—indeed, America—owes a great debt to private foundations and to the philanthropists who created them.

As an officer or trustee of educational institutions which have been the recipients of foundation aid, I cannot overemphasize the value it has been to them to receive the enabling grants, whether large enough to elevate the quality of the institutions or merely the little, extra amount that meant the difference between launching a project and abandoning it when almost in reach. Moreover, there is no question but what foundations have played a major role in stimulating private giving to colleges and universities. The challenge grant, which is a creative concept originated and used by foundations, has not only given the many institutions that have received such grants a new lease on life but has added a significant dividend in the form of instilling an understanding of higher education's needs among an appreciable portion of the private sector. In my experience, individuals and family foundations find pride and satisfaction in being identified with furthering educational and cultural progress. It is in the national interest as much as in every institution's interest that the incentives to voluntary support of higher education not be lessened, directly or indirectly. For many small, private colleges and universities, any dampening of the growth of philanthropic support would be critical. Because of their size they have difficulty in gaining the visibility or in meeting the qualifications necessary to attract government grants. The role of the private foundations in their support has therefore been especially vital, as is illustrated in the report of Earlham College, attached to this Statement as Appendix E.

In the last five years, my own institution has received annually an average in excess of $2.5 million in foundation grants. A variety of foundations, small and large—local, regional and national—and numbering nearly one hundred in any single year, have made these grants. This support has had a determining role in attracting other private donations, in accelerating the training of research scholars, in encouraging students to seek advanced training who otherwise would have been unable to, and in enabling the University to be adequately equipped to accept many Federal grants for projects furthering national interests and for training students in professional fields thought to be insufficiently manned for national requirements.

To illustrate the range, generating influence and educational significance of this funding, I shall cite a few examples from my own institution. Lilly Endowment, Inc, an Indianapolis foundation, donated $281,000 for a program to improve the teaching of American history in Indiana high schools through refresher courses for teachers. The Lilly Endowment also made a grant of $98,500 to our relatively new Program in the Study of Religion, making it possible among other things for us to appoint a scholar in the field of Old Testament and to hold a summer institute on the teaching of the Bible as literature in the public secondary schools. The same Endowment furnished $78,000 for fellowship support of persons whose interest lies in adult education in religious institutions. Further, the Lilly Endowment has provided substantial funds for the University to develop a program—and construct a building to house it—in the archaeology and anthropology of Hoosier and midwestern pre-history.

The Kress Foundation with a grant of $50,000 initially spurred the development of a graduate program in the history of art, which then attracted a $300,000 contribution from the Carnegie Foundation to provide fellowships, instructors, resource books and supplies. The Carnegie Foundation also funded in the amount of $230,000 a project for improving foreign language study in Indiana high schools. Bright junior-class students are selected to spend a summer in France or Germany, after which they become pacesetters in their language classes during their senior year. Funds are raised locally to finance students who cannot afford to pay or are furnished by such sources as the Indianapolis Foundation and the Cummins Foundation. This is a clear example of a beneficial program that would probably not have been possible without foundation aid.

A Rockefeller Foundation grant enabled us to begin our current program in genetics. This support made possible the assembling of a distinguished team o research scholars and teachers which has produced research of world-wide importance and has attracted so many students that the University has become a major center for the training of Ph. D's in the field, many of whom have won distinction and one of whom has recently won a Nobel Prize. The assembling and its initial support were fundamental in helping us to attract and utilize money from many sources, including the Atomic Energy Commission, the National Institutes of Health, and the National Science Foundation.

The Rockefeller Foundation has continued to support for many years the work of this genetics group. Dr. Hermann Muller, one of its members and a Nobel Laureate, did epoch-making investigations in a number of directions, not the least being the establishment of a finer scientific basis for our current understanding of the hazards of radio-active fallout and other forms of radioactivity. Dr. Tracy Sonneborn has opened up an entirely new field in genetics in showing the importance of the non-chromosomal material, that is, elements other than genes, in the determination of heredity. The work of the Indiana team has far-flung significance, not only for plant and animal improvement, including corn and other grains, but also for the betterment of human health.

At the other end of the spectrum, the Rockefeller Foundation has helped subsidize a strong Latin American music program in the I.U. School of Music.

The pioneering research of Dr. Leslie Freeman in the degeneration and regeneration of the central nervous system, with findings vital to the treatment of paraplegia resulting from war or other injury, received the steady support of the John A Hartford Foundation to the accumulated extent of $700,000. The Regenstrief Foundation of Indianapolis has contributed $272, 176 to research in health care.

In another area, the Kellogg Foundation has contributed $344,840 to provide for the distribution of programs from the film library at Indiana University to educational television stations.

The University programs funded by the Ford Foundation have been many and diverse. I shall cite only a few examples. Through a $742,000 grant, the School of Education developed a teacher education program combining theory, methods, simulation, practice in the use of closed circuit television and sequentially-ordered laboratory experiences with children, all culminating in a semester of paid "interteaching" and a master's degree. A project for encouragement of Non-Western studies in Indiana colleges, explained briefly in Appendix B, was instituted with the help of a $200,000 grant. The I. U. School of Business was enabled by a grant of $150,000 to assist Texas Southern University in developing the curriculum and strengthening the faculty of its School of Business to the extent that it became the first in a predominantly-Negro university to be accredited by the American Association of Collegiate Schools of Business.

Also funded by Ford, the Indiana Language Program for improving the teaching of languages in high schools (described in Appendix B) has been a remarkably successful project, justifying the $1 million in grants which have made it possible. A timely research program, designed to develop and test a practical system of low-cost tutoring as a supplement to classroom instruction, produced results through the aid of a $368,020 grant which have received immediate application in the Indianapolis school system.

The grants which have been most far-reaching in their effectiveness, increasing greatly our strength, capabilities and quality in international areas, were those made by the Ford Foundation in 1961 and 1965 in support of research in the problems of international and human resources development, and of the University's graduate programs in international business and in the following foreign areas: Russia and East Europe, Western Europe, the Far East, the Near East, Africa and Latin America (See Appendix C). Totaling in all some $5.3 million, the largest portion of these grants has been devoted to the support of doctoral candidates, whose training will inevitably benefit numbers of others. Faculty research is a second, important purpose served by the grants. Also, salaries of certain new faculty members have been paid from the grants in whole or in part for periods of one to three years. A small percentage has been spent on library acquisitions. Mainly by these means Indiana University has been enabled to capitalize on potential developed initially on its own but requiring the major impetus of private funding for its realization and resultant distinction.

I have had an opportunity to observe another beneficial and multiplier effect of foundation grants in my position as Chairman of the Indiana Advisory Commission on Academic Facilities. This Commission, as the members of Congress will know, administers and makes recommendations for the projects eligible for Federal assistance in funding under the Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963 as amended. A condition precedent to any type of Federal assistance is a current capability of the institution to defray a minimum of 25 per cent of the cost. This 25 per cent has had to be raised from a variety of sources: alumni, friends, local corporations, and foundations. The local financing of a large majority of these projects depended in part on foundation funds, and in one instance, the Fort Wayne Art Institute and School of Fine Arts, all of the matching money was received directly from a foundation grant. In the case of Anderson College, grants from private foundations totaling $1.48 million were added to a federal facilities grant of $1,076,251 and funds from other sources to provide a sorely-needed general classroom and administration building costing in excess of $3 million.

Sixteen private and five state-supported institutions in Indiana have participated in and benefited from the program. To date it has resulted in construction of 65 new or, in a few instances, rehabilitated structures worth $125 million with a Federal subsidy of a little over $40 million. It is estimated that these facilities will help to accommodate over 45,000 additional students. It is a demonstrable fact that the program would have been substantially less successful, had it not been for the assistance of foundations. I feel sure that in each of the committee members' states, the story is much like Indiana's.

I wish to emphasize that the support from private foundations to Indiana colleges and universities is pervasive and widespread. In addition to the examples I have cited, the Lilly Endowment aids fourteen Indiana private colleges with substantial annual unrestricted grants. Mr. Herman Krannert of Indianapolis and the Inland Container Corporation Foundation have given major grants for needed buildings to both private and public institutions and for vital cardiac research. In fact, the examples I could cite are legion.

I have used these illustrations from the experience of Indiana University, but other institutions with which I am familiar have similar records of aid, supplied by private foundations, which has enlarged their capabilities, enhanced their quality and elevated their horizons. At Tulane University, for instance, where I serve on the Board of Visitors, early grants from the General Education Board were basic to the development of the institutions, I have been told. In the last five years, during which I have had an opportunity to observe the benefits of contributions made by foundations to Tulane, it has received $16 million from them, including grants for medical research, faculty salaries, educational programs at both the undergraduate and graduate level, addition of faculty to the School of Medicine, support of younger faculty members, development of the natural and physical sciences, and—most importantly—as a stimulation to fund-raising which produced more than three times the amount of the challenge grant. (See Appendix D.)

Similar challenge grants from the Ford Foundation have aided four private institutions in Indiana and the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, closely associated with a fifth private institution, to raise urgently-needed funds. Earlham College received a $1.6 million grant and raised $5,500,081. (See Appendix E for a summary of foundation support to this important Indiana Quaker college.) To a grant of $2 million, Wabash College was able to add $5,037,302. The University of Notre Dame raised $24,880,573 in response to a challenge grant of $12 million. And Depauw University supporters have just completed a drive, meeting the challenge of a $2 million grant with a total of $7,124,665 raised.

In the last three years DePauw has received grants totaling $1.6 million from 28 foundations, to be used in matching a $2.396 million government facilities grant in the program to which I have already referred for the construction of a science center. Since laboratory facilities and library acquisitions are often difficult for small private universities to fund, this new center is crucial for the development of DePauw's science programs.

DePauw received foundation aid, too, in starting two now-thriving programs; a summer graduate program in American Studies for high school teachers, initially funded by the Coe Foundation, and an African Studies program, begun through a Ford Foundation grant.

The Ford Foundation also helped with the program undertaken by DePauw to improve the humanities background of its faculty members. Through the $50,000 grant from Ford the program can now be advanced to a stage at which DePauw will be better able to handle it alone.

In these diverse ways, three different types of educational institutions—a small and a large private university and a state university—have been enabled by foundation grants to improve their ability to serve scholarship and society.

All over the world, America's system of higher education is esteemed as the best ever developed in any land. Despite all of its insufficiencies, it is the envy of the world. Our system has several well-nigh unique features that have shaped its character and constributed to its world position. They are its emphasis on applied research and public service, first stimulated by the Morrill Act establishing the landgrant colleges, the dual system of public and private support and control, and the large number of institutions, making possible advanced educational opportunity for a significant portion of our American society.

Important as these are, I believe that the most important reason for this universal respect resides in what colleges and universities have been enabled to do as a result of the support of private foundations; the imaginative, creative, boundary-stretching, even revolutionary undertakings which have not only produced enormous immediate and potential benefits but have enlarged the possibilities for higher education in the future.

The face of America has been forever improved by the unique creation of philanthropic foundations that have assisted educational institutions to serve society in ways never aspired to in any other nation. Such a record deserves encouragement.

Surely a way can be found to remedy those imperfections which may have led to the proposed legislation without lessening the capability of private foundations to assist higher education in adding to that record in the future and without discouraging the patronage to be gained from the establishment of new foundations.

I earnestly hope, and urge the committee's concern, that this Bill in its final form will be free of provisions with reference to private foundations which would have a stultifying effect upon the scientific, intellectual, social and economic progress of our country.

Americans have ever been a dynamic and daring people. Dynamism has been our outstanding characteristic, the wellspring of the America we know that has been a pace-setter for the world. Foundation grants have helped keep us dynamic and moving forward. It is not pioneering, experimentation and hostility to new ideas that we have to fear but an excess of caution which could invert the face of America and ultimately relegate her to the indistinction of a static society.

APPRAISAL OF THE J. K. LILLY COLLECTION

How modest the appraisal of the J. K. Lilly collection for tax purposes was is documented by actual records of recent auction sales. Duplicates from his collection were sold by I.U. at auction at the Parke-Bernet galleries in New York City on November 8, 1962. Here is the record of five items:

	Cost	Appraisal	Selling price
No. 18 Chaucer	$17,500	$20,000	$47,500
No. 28 Copernicus	2,000	3,500	11,000
No. 34 Dalton	250	350	1,850
No. 44 Eliot Bible	4,500	7,500	10,500
No. 102 Newton	750	1,000	5,500

These items, which cost Lilly $25,000 were appraised at $32,350 and were actually sold for $76,350.

The recent Thomas Street sale of rare Americana contained fourteen items of which the Lilly collection has comparable copies. An analysis of these, comparing J. K. Lilly's costs, appraised for tax purposes, and prices the Streeter copies brought, was made by the Lilly librarian for the American Book Collector and published in its October, 1968 issue.

The fourteen items cost Lilly $24,275—the tax appraisal was $35,125. The comparable copies sold at auction in 1968 for $174,500.

The most drastic advance in prices was of the first printing of the Declaration of Independence of which only sixteen copies are recorded. Lilly's copy cost him $12,500 and was appraised for tax purposes at $15,000. A copy sold at auction in May for $404,000.

Twenty items from the Lilly collection, therefore, which cost him, during his thirty years of active collecting, $61,775, were appraised for tax purposes at $71,475 and comparable copies actually sold at public auction for $654,850.

It might further be mentioned that since its dedication in 1960 the Lilly Library has attracted as gifts, each year, material of more than double the value of the budget allocated to it from library funds. Appraisals of such material are made by competent outside appraisers and none has ever been questioned by tax authorities.

If the original gift were to be reappraised in the light of today's market, it would be worth well over $10,000,000. Additional purchases made possible by grants from the Lilly Endowment and other gifts attracted by the collection have brought the total value of the Lilly Library's present holdings to approximately $25–$30 million.

Appendix B

Statewide Impact in Indiana of Certain Foundation Assistance to Indiana University

Foundation help to institutions of higher education is crucial and unique in many ways. Our experience at Indiana University has demonstrated this in two important respects that are sometimes overlooked in assessing the value of foundation philanthropy to American education and society. For us, foundation assistance has provided, among other things, flexibility and a "multiplier effect" that are not possible with general funds from the state budget nor usually with federal grants. Indiana University has been able to develop and implement some original and exciting ideas that have influenced most of secondary and higher education throughout the state of Indiana. Two examples will illustrate this point.

First is The Non-Western Studies Project, 1959–67: As a result of the interest of several Indiana University faculty members and of the administrations and faculty of several Indiana private colleges, a program was developed to encourage more study of the non-Western world in undergraduate education throughout the state. An earlier survey had shown that the overwhelming majority of graduates of Indiana universities and colleges finished their education with no understanding of, or even acquaintance with, the history, cultures, and problems of the bulk of the world's population living in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. In view of the interconnected world of the last quarter of the twentieth century in which these young men and women would live in their careers, as citizens, as individuals, this seemed a grievous omission in their educational experience.

Over eight years, with very modest assistance from the Ford Foundation (under $200,000), the Non-Western Studies Project was able to enlist the cooperation and participation of three-fourths of Indiana's colleges and universities in order significantly to broaden both the curriculum and extra-curricular activities available to most undergraduates. Using the extensive resources of Indiana University in international studies and drawing on the enthusiasm and dedication of administrators and faculty in many colleges, the Project provided over 50 faculty fellowships for training in non-Western studies here and abroad, and for redesigning courses to include non-Western materials; it also sponsored or helped arrange over a dozen faculty and student workshops, institutes, and seminars; and it assisted institutions in acquiring library and visual materials on the non-Western world.

It is difficult, of course, to measure the full impact of such a cooperative effort, but it is clear that today many Indiana undergraduates have a wider and more internationally-oriented education, one which should prepare them better for tomorrow's world.

The second example is The Indiana Language Program, 1962–70. In the general post-Sputnik atmosphere there was national concern about American deficiencies in the study of foreign languages. Nowhere was this felt more keenly than in Indiana, where despite the University's international renown in linguistics and in language and area studies, the elementary and secondary schools of the state were providing very limited and often totally inadequate instruction in foreign languages. Determined to close this gap and in hopes of providing a model of what could be done in one state, Indiana University developed a comprehensive program to improve the teaching of foreign languages throughout the state. Drawing on the University's extensive resources in this field and on its earlier initiative in appointing a full-time School Coordinator for Foreign Languages, the Indiana Language Program, with the assistance of just over one million dollars from the Ford Foundation, has sponsored intensive institutes for teachers, the retraining of Cuban refugees as Spanish teachers, a scholarship incentive program for young people interested in careers in foreign languages (including such difficult but crucial languages as Arabic, Chinese, and Japanese), study abroad opportunities for Indiana foreign language teachers, publications useful to students and teachers, and encouragement and guidance on language programs in the schools, including those in elementary schools.

Again, it is difficult to judge the long-run impact of such a program. It has, however, drawn nation-wide attention, study, and emulation, and there is no question that this cooperative effort has radically changed the situation in the state. Whereas in 1962 there were 73 secondary schools which offered no instruction in modern foreign languages, today there are only one or two. Enrollments of secondary school students have grown between 1960 and today some seven-fold in French, nine-fold in German, four-fold in Spanish, and fifteen-fold in Russian. Students entering the University are now so well-prepared that the introductory language courses at Indiana University have had to be drastically up-graded, and hundreds of new and able teachers well-versed in the latest techniques of language instruction have been trained. Moreover, the Indiana Language Program has been able to place a number of its activities on a nearly self-supporting basis which will permit the University and cooperating schools to continue them past the expiration of the Ford grant in 1970.

In summarizing these two examples I would like to stress two points. First, the foundation assistance involved, while very small compared to the effects obtained and to the share contributed by Indiana University and the participating colleges and schools in the state, was crucial both in permitting the University to use its resources with maximum impact and in extending the benefits of these programs throughout the state of Indiana, thereby influencing the education of countless Indiana citizens, most of whom had no direct contact with the University. Second, the modest sums required, which were not available from other sources, allowed the initiation of activities which are to be carried on and developed, thus continuing the process of improving education at all levels in the state.

It is apparent, I think, that in these cases the help of the Ford Foundation, building on local concern and initiative and supplementing existing institutional resources and personnel, was not only in the interests of education in Indiana but in the national interest as well.

LATIN-AMERICAN STUDIES

The $600,00 invested over a 5-year period (1966–71) in Latin American Studies at Indiana University under the Ford Foundation International II Grant provides dramatic evidence of how foundation support can double and triple university potential in a particular area at a crucial moment of development.

The university initially provided certain basic investments. Special allocations built a major collection of books and manuscripts dealing with Latin America in the Lilly Rare Books Library. Recruitment of several promiing faculty member also sparked interest within particular departments. It was foundation funds, however, which created the catalyst to launch the program in five major areas.

(1) Nearly one-third of the Ford grant matched by extensive funds from the university and library budget went into an impressive building program in library acquisitions.

(2) Ford funds supplemented department allocations for new faculty positions and research grants. In general, Ford funds paid the first two years' salary after which the department assumed the financial commitment. The number of faculty teaching subjects related to Latin America rose from 8, representing five departments, in 1963, to 40, representing fifteen departments, by 1969.

(3) More ample fellowships made possible from Ford funds in addition to the vastly expanded academic program enabled departments to attract topflight students with Latin American interests from all over the country into M.A. and Ph. D. programs. The number of students in such graduate studies rose from 25 in 1963 to 190 in 1969. In addition, for the first time, Indiana University was able to send promising Ph. D. candidates to the field in the summer of their second year of graduate work to map out dissertation topics. This extremely successful program resulted in considerable savings in time and money when actual dissertation research began and prepared students to compete advantageously at the national level for doctoral fellowships.

(4) Public lectures, art exhibits, and music performances largely backed by Ford funds stimulated new student and community interest in Latin America. Particularly significant was the impact of Indiana University's unique Latin America Music Center, first established in 1962.

(5) Finally Ford funds enabled Indiana University to explore and open new and exciting programs for student and faculty exchanges with a variety of Latin American institutions. Among the initiatives which bore fruit were the training of economics faculty at the Andrés Bello University at Caracas, Venezuela; the student exchange programs with San Marcos and the Catholic Universities in Lima, Peru, and the National University of Rio Grande do Sul in Porto Alegre, Brazil; the exchanges with the medical faculty of Guanabara University in Rio de Janeiro; the archeological explorations established with the University of Los Andes in Colombia; the radio and television assistance program to El Salvador; and an educational assistance program in Chile.

Indiana University now produces an average of ten Ph. D's and forty M.A.'s each year with specialization in disciplines related to Latin America, in contrast with less than one-tenth that figure six years ago. The University now holds a front rank in terms of library resources and faculty specialists, in contrast to its virtually unknown position in 1962. In sum, the investment of Ford Foundation funds has resulted in launching a major international studies program, has encouraged Indiana University to make long-range commitments, and has established a new role for the University in this vital world area of study and cooperation.

Foundation Support of Tulane University

Gifts and grants from foundations have shaped the destiny of Tulane University as much as any other single influence—the specific shape of the institution in terms of individual programs embarked upon and maintained over the years, as well as the general character of the institution. Foundation involvement with Tulane dates back to pre-World War II days when the General Education Board helped support a small and struggling institution in a variety of ways.

Between 1919 and 1939, the General Education Board made available the sum of approximately $4 million as endowment, which constituted a substantial portion of the endowment of the institution at that time. The income from the investment of these funds was devoted not only to the general support of the University but also to the support of the School of Medicine.

Other foundations which have played a significant role in Tulane's development over the years include the Ford Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Commonwealth Fund, the Sloan Fund, and many smaller but extremely important foundations. For example, the Schlieder Foundation, a locally oriented foundation, has made available to the University over the past 19 years approximately $1,700,000 for medical and other research. Likewise, the Stern Family Fund has supported Tulane generously over the years.

Certain specific grants assumed transcending importance at various stages of the development of Tulane University. For example, the General Education Board made available matching grants in 1946 and in 1951, totalling nearly $3 million, on condition that the University match those sums. This stimulated early fund-raising campaigns which otherwise may not have been embarked upon. All were successful.

The Ford Foundation endowment grants to the general support of the University and to the School of Medicine in 1957, totalling $6.2 million, made as a part of a distribution to most private institutions in the nation, gave a substantial impetus to the University at that time. The income from the investment of these funds was to be used to improve faculty salaries for ten years, at the end of which time the principal was free to be used for any institutional purpose. Tulane elected to use the principal of these funds in the further development of its educational programs.

Probably the most significant grant in the history of the institution was the Ford Challenge Grant offered in 1964. By terms of the grant, the Ford Foundation agreed to contribute $6 million if the University would raise $12 million from private sources. Stimulated by this offer, the University set a total fund-raising goal of $24.4 million and actually raised nearly $28 million. It can be said truthfully that the stimulation of the $6 million offered by the Ford Foundation produced an additional $22 million for current operating purposes, for physical facilities, and for endowment. This program supported the endeavors of the institution to increase faculty salaries from approximately a "D" average in the AAUP grading scales to a "B" average, assisted in the provision of an urgently needed Library and also a Science Building, and provided other stimuli to the forward movement of the institution.

Shortly after World War II, several Carnegie Corporation grants, followed by a General Education Board grant of $1 million, enabled the institution to greatly accelerate the development of its graduate program. The production of Ph. D.'s has increased from a few in 1946 to 119 this year. This has been of inestimable significance not only to this immediate region but the whole Nation as well.

A Ford grant of $500,000 enabled the University to develop a Latin American Studies Program, which has contributed greatly to the educational advancement of our neighbors to the South.

The Commonwealth Fund has provided grants to the School of Medicine which have been of tremendous significance in the development of that institution. A grant made in the 1950's of $750,000 on a matching basis permitted the institution to add $1.5 million to its spending level, primarily for faculty and faculty salaries. In recent years two large planning grants from the same Foundation have assisted the faculty of the School of Medicine in planning goals and objectives of the School and its future development.

Also of great assistance to the School of Medicine have been two grants from the Mellon Foundation, each in the amount of $250,000, devoted to the support of salaries of younger faculty members. The Sloan Foundation has made two grants in the amount of $250,000 for the support of science at the University. This has assisted the institution in matching larger grants from the National Science Foundation and has provided an important stimulation to the development of the natural and physical sciences.

Finally, the Rockefeller Foundation has made two grants to the institution, each in the amount of $250,000, for the support of underprivileged students. These grants have assisted Tulane in making available its educational opportunities to approximately 100 students a year, who otherwise would not have been able to afford to enroll in this institution.

In the past five years, foundation sources have provided gifts and grants of approximately $16 million.

Foundation Support at Earlham College

Over the last twenty years American higher education has undergone some of the most strenuous demands in the history of the country as we have had to wrestle with large increases in enrollment, costly improvements to keep abreast of developments in the sciences, the provision of educational opportunities for the economically less advantaged segments of our society, an endless spiral of inflation, and the increasingly evident need for drastic improvement in various aspects of teaching. Earlham College, like other institutions, has had to raise large sums of money every year—beyond its normal income from student tuition and endowment return—to continue day to day operations. We have also had to raise large sums for capital development plus special program development support outside the normal operating budget. With all of these needs we have been given invaluable assistance by a number of general purpose, company-sponsored and family foundations. Let me give some specific illustrations:

1. PLANT EXPANSION

In the building of approximately eight million dollars worth of new buildings during the past twenty years Earlham College received substantial funds from Lilly Endowment of Indianapolis, the National Automatic Tool Foundation of Richmond, Indiana, the Carnation Company Foundation of Los Angeles, the Kresge Foundation of Detroit, Michigan, the Baxter Foundation of Indianapolis, and the Ford Foundation of New York.

One of the most important aspects of these foundation gifts is that they provided the "challenge" funds which enabled us to launch general fund-raising drives among our alumni and the general public. Without the stimulus of the major foundation gifts there is real doubt if we would have been able to succeed in these important expansion and campus improvement projects.

2. IMPROVEMENT OF LIBRARY COLLECTIONS AND SERVICE

As at all other institutions, Earlham must continue to work to upgrade various of its normal programs. In this connection we have had important assistance for the improvement of our library through special grants from the Given Foundation of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, W. K. Kellogg Foundation of Battle Creek, Michigan, Lilly Endowment of Indianapolis and the Ford Foundaon of New York.

A good library is a central and tremendously important resource for any educational institution. There never seems to be enough money in the general budget to take care of the ever growing needs of libraries. Foundation support has for Earlham been of great significance in the building of the excellent library service we now have.

3. SCIENCE PROGRAM MAINTENANCE AND DEVELOPMENT

Work in the natural sciences is among the most costly aspects of the various programs of any general educational institution. The Defense Department and various other government agencies pour enormous amounts of money in the support of sciences at the large universities. The smaller undergraduate institutions—which produce a disproportionately large percentage of the undergraduates who go on in advanced study to become scientists—have considerable difficulty in attracting sufficient funds to acquire the physical facilities, equipment and staff needed to maintain a high level in research and teaching in the sciences. Though Earlham is now beginning to receive significant help from the National Science Foundation, during most of the period since the end of World War II we have been in very large measure dependent upon private foundation grants for the strengthening and enlargement of our science programs.

We are now well advanced in the planning stage of a $3,600,000 addition to our science facilities for which we have received a grant of $1,206,000 in federal funds approved by the Indiana Commission on Educational Facilities.

The new building will provide laboratory space for Chemistry and Biology. In order to make the most efficient use of building funds made available to us we are doing intensive research on mechanical facility location and access, partition location and re-location, furniture design and teaching methods.

This essential research, in which science faculty members, architects and engineers are participating, is sufficiently advanced to assure us that it will produce significant construction cost savings and a high degree of building flexibility, thus providing greater insurance against obsolescence as science knowledge multiples.

This important investment in educational improvement and obsolescence insurance was financed by grants from the Esso Education Foundation of New York and the Alcoa Foundation of Pittsburgh, together with valuable technical assistance from the Educational Facilities Laboratory, a subsidiary of the Ford Foundation.

We expect the research to be of such significance that one or more of the findings will be incorporated in the construction of science laboratories for colleges and secondary schools throughout the country, a fact which may produce meaningful savings for both the public and private sectors of education.

And because the general purpose foundations particularly are attracted by projects which have a multiplier effect, we are optimistic about major foundation support for our science building program.

Specific additional assistance with financing science projects has come to Earlham from the Kettering Foundation of Dayton, Ohio, Lubrizol Foundation of Cleveland, Research Corporation (a foundation) of New York, the Shell Companies Foundation, the Smith, Kline and French Foundation of Philadelphia.

4. SPECIAL PROJECTS IN THE NATIONAL INTEREST

From time to time the federal government establishes very clear educational objectives to serve the vital interests of the country. In some cases the serving of these special national interests are assisted by federal grants and contracts. Rarely, however, is such government funding complete. Moreover, most of these tax monies will have traditionally been allocated to large universities. Most of the smaller undergraduate institutions like Earlham have to secure much of their funding for such projects from private sources. Foundations have played an essential role for Earlham in the funding of two types of programs for which the United States government has given urgent encouragement.

a. Education of the disadvantaged

In order to carry its share of the load in dealing with the education needs of lower income families Earlham has had invaluable assistance from the Rockefeller Foundation of New York and the Cummins Engine Company Foundation and the foundations associated with it of Columbus, Indiana.

b. International education, particularly dealing with so-called non-western world

Earlham has been able to develop a very extensive program of international education—including study abroad programs in a number of countries and a special program in Asian studies, including the teaching of Japanese language—through grants received from the Ford Foundation of New York, Lilly Endowment of Indianapolis, and the Watumull Foundation of Honolulu.

c. Urban and rural development programs

Assistance with special programs in the fields of sociology, political science, and economics have been given by the Schwarzhaupt Foundation and the Seasongood Good Government Foundation of Cincinnati.

5. GENERAL EDUCATIONAL IMPROVEMENT

Innovation and experimentation in education—like research and development in industry—are essential if colleges and universities are to avoid stagnation and death. Earlham College has during the last twenty years been able to strengthen its educational contribution enormously through vigorous new developments in new methods of teaching in English, chemistry, psychology, physics, biology, mathematics and several other fields. Substantial assistance, without which most of the projects could not have been attempted, has been provided to Earlham by such foundations as Carnegie Foundation of New York, the Danforth Foundation, the Esso Education Foundation, Lilly Endowment.

6. NORMAL CURRENT OPERATING EXPENSES

Without very substantial private contributions our independent colleges and universities would disappear from the American education scene, and a very much greater burden would thereby fall upon the state and federal governments to provide substitute educational services through the public institutions. Here the role of private foundations has been of enormous importance to Earlham College and continues to be year after year. Among the foundations which have been conspicuously significant for Earlham in meeting these on-going needs are such foundations as the following: Conway Scholarship Foundation, the Doan Foundation, Lilly Endowment, the Charles E. Merrill Trust, Standard Oil Company Foundation of Indiana, The McGregor Fund, and literally scores of other less well known foundations attached to a variety of business concerns and families.

During our fiscal year ending June 30, 1969, foundations provided 27.3% of our gift income applicable to the current operating budget.

In the preceding ten years foundations provided $850,000, which we utilized for budget balancing purposes, 26.2% of our unrestricted gift income for the period.

The contributions of foundations, particularly general purpose foundations, to our overall gift income, that is both designated and undesignated, add up to an even more impressive figure.

During the ten years ending June 30, 1968, Earlham received foundation grants of $3,710,667, equivalent of 31.2% of total gift income for the period.

Thus it is apparent that any measure which will inhibit the giving of foundations or will divert any significant portion of foundation income will have a direct impact on the financial health of private educational institutions.

I want to emphasize that the leadership role of foundations in providing diverse types of support for Earlham College has been absolutely indispensable in our survival and in our continued growth and improvement. Most important has been the "challenge" and catalytic effect which foundation gifts have provided in stimulating other gifts from other types of private donors. We would earnestly hope that every encouragement would be given to the expansion of the legitimate role of foundations in helping to finance American higher education.

II. EFFECT OF THE LEGISLATION (PROPOSED TAX) ON BENEFICIARIES

Summary of Statement of Father Hesburgh, Mr. Erwin, and Drs. Cooper and Robb

Representatives of a broad variety of institutions which derive support from foundations—including private colleges and universities, state and municipal universities, medical schools, and educational institutions in the South—are seriously concerned about two legislative proposals affecting private foundations. One, incorporated in the House bill, would impose a 7½ percent tax on foundation investment income. The other—not included in the House bill, but recommended by some critics of foundations—would terminate the existence or tax exemption of all foundations after a period of years.

The first of these measures would diminish the current funds with which foundations carry on their work—and with which they support the work of other charitable and educational institutions—by at least $65,000,000 a year. The second would, over time, have even more drastic effects upon foundation functions. Because the accomplishments of private foundations have been of immense value to American society and, specifically, to the institutions which receive their financial support, representatives of those institutions strongly oppose both the proposals.

Review of the accomplishments of the foundations in several areas demonstrates the undesirable consequences which the proposals would have.

FOUNDATIONS AND PRIVATE UNIVERSITIES

Through a system of matching grants, the Ford Foundation's Special Program in Education has stimulated many colleges and universities to develop resources considerably in excess of the original grants. The Rockefeller Foundation, the Sloan Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation and many others have also made major contributions to our private educational system.

Without such assistance, there is serious question whether the independent sector of our dual, private/governmental system of higher education can survive. Yet a tax on foundation income would bring a major reduction of that assistance.

Congress should, then, legislate against any specific abuses in which certain foundations have become involved—but should take care not to diminish the funds with which foundations make their vital contribution to the private educational system.

FOUNDATIONS AND MEDICAL EDUCATION

In the field of medical education, too, the resources of private foundations have been of critical importance. They provide a continuing flow of support, which, in absolute terms, contributes substantially to the training of our doctors, research technicians, nurses and other medical personnel. Even more important, foundation funds have been of vital assistance in special areas of medical education for which it has proved difficult or impossible to obtain support from other sources.

Foundation support is, for example, of particular importance—
- in sustaining and improving medical school facilities;
- in establishing new medical schools;
- in assisting schools which experience financial difficulties;
- and in developing new techniques of medical education, new curricula, and new methods of relating medical facilities to the provision of health care for our citizens.

FOUNDATIONS AND PUBLIC EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Foundations have also afforded key support to state and municipal colleges and universities. In the Southwest, for example, they have enabled such institutions—
- to experiment with problems as diverse as beef production and mineral recovery;
- to study inventive skills and consumer needs;
- to assist linguists and teachers to overcome language handicaps;
- to develop new techniques of modern communication for engineers and journalists.

THE SOUTH: FOUNDATIONS AND EDUCATION

The South, with an enormous burden of children to educate and fewer dollars to do the job than any other region, is especially vulnerable to any change in public policy that would limit the flow of private funds for education and make equalization of educational opportunity more difficult. Philanthropic foundations provide a critical margin—either for excellence or for survival—in many Southern educational institutions.

The South's growing economy is beginning to produce indigenous wealth and a new surge of local philanthropic interest in education. Taxation or undue regulation of legitimate foundations will discourage this development at a crucial time.

Educational improvement, innovation, pioneering projects, and needed research funded by national and local foundations are helping the South catch up with the rest of the nation. Important new public kindergarten programs and continuing education are two products of foundation support.

Efforts to transform talented but underprivileged youth from public liabilities to productive, educated citizens provide further dramatic evidence of the dividends accruable from strategic foundation investment in human development.

STATEMENT OF FATHER HESBURGH, MR. ERWIN AND DRS. COOPER AND ROBB

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee: I am Theodore M. Hesburgh, president, since 1952, of the University of Notre Dame. With me today I have Dr. John Cooper, who is the president of the Association of American Medical Colleges; Mr. Frank Erwin, who is Chairman of the Board of Regents of the State Universities of Texas; and Dr. Felix Robb, who is the Director of the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools.

The four of us appear before you this morning as representatives of institutions which are, in a sense, bystanders in the present controversy over legislation affecting private foundations. Although I am also a trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation, neither I nor my colleagues are appearing here to represent a "private foundation," or a group of foundations. No matter what definition you finally settle upon for that key term, all of the institutions which we represent will fall beyond it. We will, therefore, be beyond the direct effect of whatever rules you prescribe for foundations.

If we are bystanders, though, we are intensely interested ones. We are, also, a good deal more familiar with the subject of the controversy than bystanders ordinarily are. For both our interests and our knowledge, we are indebted to the very close relationship which foundations have to the programs of the institutions which we represent. Our institutions receive vital support from foundations; they work continually with foundations; and, in doing so, they have developed a broad experience with foundations' functions and characteristics. Moreover, as individuals, we have served as members or trustees of a considerable variety of private and governmental organizations—ranging from the National Science Board and the Carnegie Commission on the Future of Higher Education to Governor Rockefeller's Select Committee studying private education in the state of New York—which are active in the fields in which foundations work.

Based upon our knowledge of private foundations—and the very considerable benefits which our institutions steadily derive from them—we are seriously concerned about certain aspects of the legislation proposed for foundations.

The four of us have observed the work of foundations from rather different points of view. In discussing the consequences of the proposed foundations legislation, I will draw upon my experience with private educational institutions. Representing the Association of American Medical Colleges, Dr. Cooper will explain the role of foundations in medical education. Mr. Erwin will speak to you of the relationship of private foundations to colleges and universities which derive their principal support from states or local governments. Finally, on behalf of the Southern Association of Colleges and Schoools—an organization with 9,000 member and affiliated colleges, universities, secondary and elementary schools serving eleven Southern States from Virginia to Texas—Dr. Robb will speak to you of the place of foundations in education in the South.

From these varied points of view outside the foundation world, we would like to tell you what we know of that world; how it affects the institutions which we represent; and why we are disturbed about certain parts of the legislation proposed for foundations. As we proceed, we will document our observations with concrete examples and with general statistical data. We will not, however, enter upon an examination of the technical details or ramifications of the House bill, or other specific legislative proposals. Other witnesses are more qualified for those tasks than we are.

At the outset, we would like to make it clear that the four of us wholeheartedly support legislation aimed at the financial abuses in which a minority of private foundations are reported to have become involved. We pretend to no expertise on foundation abuses, because the foundations with which we are familiar have not engaged in them. On the other hand, we recognize that the 1965 Treasury Department Report on Private Foundations and witnesses who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee this spring have made out a strong case for legislative proscription of foundation-donor self-dealing, unwarranted accumulations of income, and certain other practices. To the extent that such practices exist, we share the concern of the Ways and Means Committee about them, and we urge you to deal decisively and effectively with them.

Beyond such steps, however, we are deeply disturbed about one aspect of the House bill and one additional proposal which, while not incorporated in the House bill, has been advocated by critics of foundations in recent years. In brief, the proposals which concern us are these:

> The House bill would impose a 7½ percent tax upon foundation investment income. The Ways and Means Committee Report estimated that this tax will produce $65,000,000 of revenue in its first year of operation. According to the House estimates, the revenue effect of the tax would rise rapidly to an annual $100,000,000. Furthermore, as the next group of witnesses will explain in greater detail, the precedent which the tax would establish for state and local governments seems likely to have an additional substantial monetary impact on foundations.
> Several critics of foundations have recommended terminating the existence or exemption of foundations after a period of years. One proposal would fix a 25-year limit on foundations' tax exemption and qualification to receive deductible charitable contributions. Another would restrict the life of each private foundation to 25 years. Others would require foundations to distribute their assets at a sufficiently high rate to end their existence within a period of 10, 15, or 20 years.

We are deeply concerned both about the proposed tax on foundation investment income and about the adoption of any mechanism whose effect would be to terminate the existence or exemption of all foundations over a period of time. Our combined experience with foundations convinces us that their work has been of immense value to the classes of institutions which we represent and to American society. We are, therefore, strongly persuaded that any measure which diminishes the current funds with which foundations carry on their work and with which they support the work of other charitable and educational institutions—by an annual $65,000.000, $100,000,000, or any like amount—will have major undesirable consequences. For the same reasons, we are convinced that an endeavor—direct or indirect—to curtail the existence or tax benefits of foundations would be thoroughly unfortunate.

To explain the grounds upon which we base these views, we should like to review briefly the work which foundations have done in the four areas with which we are familiar.

A. FOUNDATIONS AND PRIVATE UNIVERSITIES

During more than seventeen years as president of Notre Dame, I have found one of my great preoccupations to be the financing of the University's educational, research and service programs. The progress that my University has recorded during this period can be attributed in no small measure to the support of private philanthropic foundations. Indeed, one major philanthropic organization, the Ford Foundation, looms as the largest single benefactor in Notre Dame's 127-year history.

I shall not presume to speak for my fellow college and university presidents, although I can think of none whom I know personally who would favor the foundation tax which we are discussing. I would like to say a word about how one foundation, the Ford Foundation, is helping Notre Dame accomplish in ten years what normally would have required thirty years. With equal force I could document what has been accomplished on our campus with support from the Rockefeller Foundation, the Sloan Foundation, the Carnegie Corporation and others.

Specifically, I shall speak about the Ford Foundation's Special Program in Education—perhaps the most magnificent philanthropic program in the history of American higher education—in which a significant number of colleges and universities have been helped to help themselves through challenging matching grants. In the case of Notre Dame, the whole vision of what the University might be has been startlingly, almost unbelievably, altered by two $6 million matching Ford Foundation grants. With the incentive of these matching grants, between 1960 and 1966, we were able to double or triple the money normally contributed to the University. There is no question in my mind that this gigantic stride forward was made possible by the matching provision. So, aside from what the grants themselves helped underwrite--for example, the 13-story Notre Dame Memorial Library—they have helped generate many additional millions of dollars in support from alumni, from friends, from corporations and even from other foundations.

The best thing about foundation support is, of course, that it is project-oriented for the most part and encourages a university to do new things, to undertake research and launch new educational programs that would be out of the question if one had to rely on operating income or even the gift support of alumni and friends. For example, the Carnegie Corporation made a capital grant to Notre Dame which underwrote the first, national study of Catholic elementary and secondary education in the United States. Support from the Kellogg Foundation has made possible a program of continuing education that has touched the lives of tens of thousands involved in more than 300 campus conferences each year.

The aid which the major foundations have provided in the years since World War II has proved to be a life-line to the independent half of our nation's unique dual, private/governmental system of higher education. There is serious question whether the independent sector can persevere and continue to provide an educational alternative. With inflation and the spiraling cost of living threatening to impair the philanthropic support of individuals, and with corporations, generally speaking, contributing less than 1 percent of their profits to charitable organizations when they are entitled by law to contribute up to 5 percent, the proposed tax on foundations—or any general measure to end the existence or exemption of foundations—will have the plain and necessary effect of driving our independent colleges into the arms of the government at a time when many feel there is already too much government involvement on the campus. I cannot believe that this is a prospect welcomed by members of this Committee or the Congress.

To state the matter somewhat differently, a 7½ percent tax levied on the investment income of foundations would, in effect, be a tax on Stanford and Johns Hopkins, Vanderbilt and Emory, Notre Dame and Denver and, indeed, on all the colleges and universities, great and small, in every part of this land, which benefit from the regular and substantial support of these foundations. It would result in less foundation support for the nation's colleges and universities at precisely the time when they are experiencing a financial crisis and need more. The revenue generated by the tax would be of little consequence to the government, but its collection would have the direct effect of reducing the funds normally available to colleges and universities by a similar amount, and the indirect effect of a proportional reduction of the individual contributions which these funds stimulate. Furthermore, it would seem inevitable, once the precedent is set, that the tax would be increased as the states and municipalities and future administrations seek much needed revenues, thereby further reducing the funds available to colleges and universities. Again I say that I cannot believe those results to be acceptable to this Committee or the Congress.

My plea, then, is to legislate against specific abuses which may have been discovered in the administration of certain foundations—but not to diminish the funds with which foundations make their vital contribution to the private sector's educational system. This is the time for the Congress to take steps to encourage even further private philanthropy to higher education. The proposals of which I have spoken would have exactly the opposite effect.

B. FOUNDATIONS AND MEDICAL EDUCATION

In the field of medical education, too, the resources of private foundations have been of critical importance. Review of the relevant data reveals that foundations provide a continuing flow of funds which, in absolute terms, makes significant contributions to the training of our doctors, research technicians, nurses, and other medical personnel. Even more important, foundation funds have been of vital assistance in certain special areas of medical education for which it has proved difficult or impossible to secure support from other sources.

The Association of American Medical Colleges conducts an annual survey of all medical schools in the United States to determine the sources of their funds and the purposes to which the funds are applied. In addition, to assist this Committee in its current inquiry, the Association has conducted a special canvass of several of the larger medical schools to obtain more detailed information on the amounts and purposes of foundation grants in recent years.

The data stemming from these investigations demonstrate convincingly that, overall, the contribution of private foundations to medical education and medical research has been an impressive one. Foundations have repeatedly granted funds to medical schools for operating budgets and capital construction. Such grants for general purposes, however, present only a partial view of the importance of foundation support in the field of medical education. In several specific areas, foundation funds have been of special significance.

Faculty salaries

While the federal government annually appropriates large sums for medical research it has proved exceedingly difficult to obtain government support for the maintenance and upgrading of medical school faculties. Plainly, funds committed to these purposes have major bearing upon the quality of medical practice and the state of medical knowledge throughout the United States. Yet, as a dean of the Harvard Medical School noted in a recent letter to the Association of American Medical Colleges, "We are especially dependent on foundations for teaching funds since the government has neglected this area."

Specific illustrations abound. In recent years the Mellon funds have made substantial grants for faculty support and expansion at Tulane. Vanderbilt, Northwestern, Chicago, Boston University, Brown, Case Western Reserve, Columbia, Cornell, Dartmouth, Duke, Emory, George Washington, Harvard, Temple, Tufts, Washington University (St. Louis), Yale, Johns Hopkins, Jefferson Medical College, Marquette, Pennsylvania, Pittsburgh, the University of Rochester, the University of Southern California, and Stanford.

The comments of administrators at several of the recipient schools provide insight into the importance of the grants:

> "Both the basic sciences and the teaching programs have been immeasurably improved by the infusion of funds. New appointments have been made and the entire faculty stabilized." (Tulane.)
> "The grant has proved to be one of the most timely and beneficial ones we have ever been privileged to receive. It has made possible the strengthening of various departments where the need was pressing." (Vanderbilt.)
>
> "To say that Mellon funds were invaluable to Northwestern University Medical School would be an understatement. They came at a time when personnel particularly in the basic sciences was in very short supply." (Northwestern.)

"The funds have been used to stabilize the position of several very promising young scientists, attract new ones, and to start new and important areas of teaching and research at a time when federal funds have become overly restrictive." (Johns Hopkins.)

"The assistance which we have received each year from the Mellon funds has enabled us to strengthen the faculties of the three departments which do most of the teaching in the first year of medical school." (Jefferson Medical College.)

"There would be literally no other way which faculty expansion and strengthening could have been financed." (Boston.)

"These funds have made it possible to bring in people who we would have found very difficult to support in any other way." (Case Western Reserve.)

"The grant has made it possible for us to maintain academic strength in all of our basic science departments." (George Washington.)

The Mellon grants have not been the only ones supporting the improvement of medical school faculties. During the period from June of 1962 through June of 1969, the Surdna Foundation made grants of $3,300,000 to the Harvard Medical School for general faculty support. Of that total, $2,500,000 was allocated to a fund which supports fulltime faculty members in the basic medical science and clinical departments. Six hundred thousand dollars has been used to establish a new professorship in pediatrics. An additional $200,000 has been used to complete funding of a professorship of preventative medicine. The Josiah Macy, Jr., Foundation has made annually-increasing grants to Washington University (St. Louis), Columbia, and Harvard to expand training in obstetrics. It has, in addition, established a major professorship in obstetrics and gynecology.

The examples could be multiplied at considerable length. Their point, however, should be evident: institutions of medical education are heavily dependent upon private foundations for the resources which support the faculties which train the nation's doctors and medical research personnel.

Establishment of new medical schools

As has been the case with the maintenance and improvement of the faculties of existing medical schools, in recent years the federal government has provided little operating support for the establishment of new medical schools. Here again, the need has been evident, and foundations have acted to close the financial gap. Moreover, in this area particularly, their action has carried an impact extending well beyond its immediate dollar effect; for foundation grants have stimulated contributions from a broad variety of other sources—both public and private, and often many times larger than the original foundation grant. In that way, foundation commitments have frequently had a plain and pronounced multiplier effect.

The Kellogg Foundation has given $8.4 million over the past nine years to establish new medical schools at—the University of Connecticut;

Rutgers Medical School;
Brown University;
the University of Hawaii;
the University of New Mexico;
Michigan State; and the University of Nevada.

Of the grant to Connecticut, the president of the university has said: "The foundation authorized a three-year grant to the University of Connecticut in the amount of $1,037,500 'to support the establishment of a school of the basic medical sciences * * *' It is no exaggeration to say that the foundation's grant has had an exciting catalytic effect upon our progress to date. * * * This grant is a classic example of what 'venture capital' assistance from a foundation can accomplish."

The business manager of the Rutgers Medical School has commented: "Without the stimulus of the foundation, Rutgers Medical School would still probably be a dream of the future."

Assistance to medical schools in financial difficulty

The demands upon our medical schools have been particularly great in the past several years. Financial pressures have increased correspondingly. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that a number of schools—particularly in the private sector—have come very close to financial collapse. Repeatedly, foundations have made timely grants to avert such failures.

One foundation has provided almost $4,000,000 over the past five years to 10 schools which were experiencing severe fiscal difficulties. Included were such schools as Creighton University, in Omaha, Nebraska, the University of Utah, Meharry Medical College, in Nashville, Tennessee, and the University of Vermont. The dean of one of the recipient schools has said: "I should like to once again comment on the extraordinary value of the * * * award to our developing School of Medicine. The award permitted a continued growth of the school during an exceptionally critical period in which the program was expanding far more rapidly than the allocations to the School of Medicine from state appropriations. Indeed, I seriously question whether the school could have avoided a substantial collapse. * * *"

Development of new techniques

If foundation resources have afforded crucial support for medical school faculties, the establishment of new schools, and the assistance of schools in financial difficulty, they have performed services of at least equal value in a different class of endeavor. Nowhere have the innovative capacities of foundations been more evident than in the development of new systems and techniques of medical education, improved medical curricula, and new methods of relating medical facilities to the provision of health care for our citizens. Here again, reference to particular examples is useful:

The shape of modern medical education owes as much to Abraham Flexner's 1910 report on the subject as to any other single factor. Made possible by a Carnegie grant, the Flexner report advocated—and produced—fundamental revisions in a variety of facets of our system of developing and training doctors.

In the academic year 1955–1956 the Harvard Medical School utilized a $1,000,000 grant from the Commonwealth Fund to test pioneering changes in medical curriculum. Based upon the knowledge developed in these initial experiments, major changes in the school's curriculum were adopted two years later. The innovations at Harvard were the basis for far-reaching changes in curriculum at Western Reserve—changes which were supported by the Commonwealth fund, and which have had great effects on medical education across the country.

Grants to Northwestern University by the John and Mary R. Markel Foundation and the Commonwealth Fund enabled the school to evolve a program which substantially diminishes the time required for the education of doctors. Under this program, Northwestern now admits students from high schools who are able to obtain M.D. degrees in a total of six years. Grants from the Commonwealth Fund to Boston University and Johns Hopkins University permitted the initiation of similar programs at those institutions.

The Rockefeller Foundation and the Macy Foundation provided the Harvard Medical School with funds to undertake the nation's first undergraduate program designed to assist members of minority groups to enhance their qualifications for graduate study in medicine and dentistry.

The Carnegie Corporation of New York has provided three-year funding for teaching, research, and administrative programs on the economics of health care.

The Ford, Rockefeller, and Avalon Foundations have committed themselves to provide a total of $5,200,000 for the development of a unique laboratory studying human reproductive biology in conjunction with the existing Center for Population Studies at the Harvard School for Public Health. According to a recent Harvard report, "Together these two programs will represent one of the nation's primary concentrations of talent and competence."

The Commonwealth Fund and the Surdna Foundation have, together, provided funds for the creation and operation of a pilot university-sponsored community health plan. Drawing on the facilities and personnel of the university's medical school, the program will make comprehensive medical service and health care available to the residents of the surrounding community.

Conclusion

Year after year, foundation dollars afford vital support for the nation's medical schools. In a number of respects, they fulfill needs for which there are no other dollars. Further, by stimulating other support, foundation grants often generate resources which—even measured solely in monetary terms—are of far greater magnitude than the original grant. Finally, in at least one area foundation support has produced results which can only be described as unique; for without the creative impetus supplied by foundations' experimental projects, their studies of system and technique, and their programs for change, many of the advances of modern medical education simply would not have occurred.

With increasing demands being placed on the medical schools for an increased production of health manpower and greater involvement in meeting the health service needs of the country in the face of ever less adequate support from local and federal sources, foundations are a critical part of our effort to meet the expectations of society for a healthier life.

C. FOUNDATIONS AND PUBLIC EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Nobody honestly concerned with American education condones illegality or irregularity in private philanthropy. Hence every representative of public higher education endorses all legislation assuring fairness and equity among taxpayers, donors, foundations, their institutional beneficiaries, and the government.

On the other hand, it is a simple historical fact that both established state universities and developing public institutions could not fulfill their missions without foundation support. Gifts, bequests, special grants under the law have enabled such institutions to grow, to increase their effectiveness, and to serve the whole population. By such means, private philanthropy has provided a tremendous variety of activities which often cannot be supported by government appropriations.

Thus foundations have encouraged innovation and experiment.

They have initiated creative work and kept it alive.

They have made possible new departures in multi-disciplinary study and research.

They have brought public and private institutions into practical cooperation.

They have broadened and strengthened activity aimed at the common welfare.

Drawn from the Southwest alone, the following examples are typical of thousands of similar projects in the United States. Each is recent. Each has the vitality to assure later effectiveness.

Innovation and experiment

In Texas, private foundations have brought engineering and medical schools to join in studies of the individual and his environment; numerous academic departments and business organizations to experiment with problems as different as beef production and mineral recovery; inventive skills and consumer needs; biological, mathematical, and space research opening new perspective on geophysics, the world and the solar system.

Creative work

By gifts of art and libraries, by support of humanities centers and the individuals working in them, foundations have brought to life creative work, which has involved both whole communities and smaller groups concerned with painting, music, and the theater, as well as general studies.

Interdisciplinary study

Private foundation gifts and grants have helped the scientific linguist and the classroom teacher to overcome the disadvantage of students with language handicaps; the biologist and the oceanographer to establish new methods in marine medicine; the engineer and the journalist to take advantage of modern communication; the computer scientist and scholars in a dozen fields to speed the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge.

Public and private institutions

In one state alone, more than thirty joint programs between privately-endowed and tax-assisted institutions have ranged from the single classrooms to the whole region.

Common welfare

Where taxes were unavailable, private foundations have made possible the initial operation of two medical schools and continuing programs of a major teaching hospital. Without foundation grants, the Anderson Hospital and Tumor Institute, host to the next International Congress on Cancer, could not have begun its work or maintained its distinction.

Immediate benefits of such programs are manifest. Taxpayers have been saved money; they have also been given benefits which taxes could not provide. Still more important, however, is the fact that in every such phase of higher education, the university has been assisted in getting ready for the future. In that future, it is not the experience of an institution which is at stake. It is the people's interest.

By relatively small sums afforded through tax relief this future prospect can be assisted. By depriving foundations of those funds—as the proposed tax would do—that prospect would be diminished or denied. In all institutions which are "public" in the broadest and truest sense, the present system of tax relief is essential to a base of planning now more than half a century old. To shut off or cut down that relatively modest independent funding would close innumerable doors on future educational progress.

D. THE SOUTH: FOUNDATIONS AND EDUCATION

This country desperately needs a strategy for expanding legitimate philanthropy as a vital component of free enterprise—and of the private-public balance in American life—not a precedent for reducing philanthropy through taxation or excessive regulation. If it is the will of Congress to equalize educational opportunity, then Congress should encourage and facilitate the work of reputable philanthropic foundations. Such encouragement is particularly important in the South.

The South lacks resources with which to provide adequate educational opportunity for its people. The entire nation has suffered as a consequence. But the gap between the South and other regions would be much wider except for the investment by national and regional philanthropic foundations in the development of human resources.

Any reduction in foundation support would be adversely felt in the South, with its huge number of children to educate and the fewest public dollars with which to do the job. Mississippi, which in proportion to income makes a greater per capita educational effort than any other state, spent only $364 per pupil in public schools in 1967–68 compared to New York State's $1,024. If the South is ever to catch up, it needs more private philanthropy—not less.

Economic limitations have prevented most Southern educational institutions from having enough funds for operation; they have fallen far short of having enough funds for innovation, experimentation, and improvement.

All educational institutions serve best when they are strong, venturesome, and self-renewing. Consistently, ever since the Civil War, when we Southerners have had an educational problem requiring an innovative approach, we have sought and often received foundation support to test our idea, to demonstrate a new approach, or to finance needed research and programs. A substantial flow of money from large national foundations, along with our own regional philanthropies, continues to be essential to education in the South.

What would be the difference if a reduction of available foundation dollars were brought about through taxation?

(1) It would tend to discourage new philanthropy just at the time when the South's improving economy is developing indigenous private wealth that is increasingly flowing back to the public through local philanthropy.

(2) It would have serious impact upon at least two or three hundred key Southern colleges and universities—public and private—that look to foundations as their "margin for excellence," plus a number of smaller, weaker colleges facing deficits for the first time this past year. To them foundation grants are crucial.

Vanderbilt University's rise to national stature results substantially from foundation grants that stimulated local effort. Emory's great medical center could not have functioned well without Woodruff Foundation money to cover its deficits. As recently as August 22, the Kresge Foundation gave $1,500,000 to Meharry Medical College in Nashville for a badly needed library. This college—which has educated approximately half the Negro physicians in the United States—has been literally saved by foundation grants in the past decade.

Strategic grants are helping our colleges predominantly serving black students to improve their curricula, to develop their staffs, and thereby to move into the mainstream. The Carnegie Corporation of New York has underwritten one of these programs over a 5-year period and the Danforth Foundation committed $5,000,000 over seven years to sustain the Southern Fellowships Fund.

(3) Reducing foundation funds would curtail the only money we can get with long-term commitments sufficient to stay with projects and evaluate their results. For instance, over the past five years the cities of New Orleans, Atlanta, Nashville, Huntsvile, Alabama, and Durham, North Carolina have received approximately $3,000,000 each from the Ford Foundation as "seed money" for a world of educational improvements. In Nashville the first public kindergartens were started with new ways of teaching young children. In New Orleans, schools were designated to show what can be accomplished when resources and flexibility to teach individuals are combined. In Durham, research of enormous value about infant and very early child behavior and learning was conducted. In Atlanta, better ways to prepare teachers were discovered. At Huntsville, because of new programs started with foundation funds, that city's school system was recently chosen for participation in a major national educational program.

(4) The Kellogg Foundation has done much to enrich life in Georgia through the creation of a dynamic continuing education center at the University of Georgia. The value of this program is incalculable, and it would not have been initiated without foundation funds.

(5) Taxing foundation resources would reduce one of the chief means of attack on the problems of disadvantaged people in poverty-stricken rural areas. For instance, the Danforth Foundation has underwritten three pilot projects in rural counties of Florida, Georgia, and Tennessee for a 5-year interval in the amount of $1,350,000. These counties—Wheeler, Overton, and Wewahitchka—would never have seen their educational potentiality for something better without foundation funds to show how teaching and learning can be improved with very few dollars.

(6) Project Opportunity, operating in Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia, is already identifying, motivating, and propelling toward college and fulfillment of their highest potentiality 3,000 bright, academically talented high school youngsters whose record of poverty and deprivation was pressing them into unproductive lives as public liabilities. This dramatic reversal, achieved largely through a system of testing and counselling, is producing constructive citizens who will, in turn, pay taxes. Ford and Danforth Foundations have invested approximately $2,000,000 in this joint effort by eleven colleges, the College Entrance Examination Board, and the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. Dividends to the nation can be many times the money spent in the discovery and motivation of these young people. It would be a human tragedy of serious dimension to deny 7½ percent, or any, of these youngsters their chance to succeed.

(7) Regional foundations such as Z. Smith Reynolds, Mary Reynolds Babcock, Woodruff, Rich, Callaway, Stern, and the strategic Southern Education Foundation make an important difference in life in the South. They are taking a keen interest in elementary and secondary schools, and the aggregate of their support is a vital factor in the "growing edge" in Southern education. The public kindergarten movement in the South was initially fueled by foundations, as were many experiments on individualized instruction.

(8) Especially in a time of escalating costs and inadequate tax revenues at the state and local levels, it would seem unwise to reduce educational resources of the kind used for stimulus of local effort, for matching purposes (required in many federal programs), and for the kinds of innovation and long-term search for solutions to problems for which public funds are insufficient.

(9) In a dozen Southern cities, fine arts and music flourish precisely because of foundation support for our symphony orchestras, art museums, and concert halls. Without the help of national and local foundations, our cities would lose major cultural advantages.

The philanthropy of foundations operating in the South has been accomplished with competence, wisdom, and freedom to operate professionally once grants are made. Because these agencies have traditionally worked quietly, without fanfare, the American public is not fully aware of their great contribution. Thus it is necessary for those of us who live close to Southern education and who dream of its future to speak up and state how strongly we feel about our vulnerability to any change in public policy that—like the proposed tax on foundations—would limit the flow of private funds for education.

III. EFFECT OF THE TAX AS SEEN BY FOUNDATIONS

SUMMARY OF STATEMENT OF MESSRS. J. GEORGE HARRAR, ALAN PIFER, AND DAVID FREEMAN

A. INTRODUCTION

This statement represents the views of The Rockefeller Foundation and Carnegie Corporation, two of the oldest, largest and best know foundations in the country, and of the Council on Foundations, the principal membership organization in the field, representing mainly medium-sized and smaller foundations.

B. OPPOSITION ON THE TAX

We are strongly opposed to the proposed 7½ percent tax on foundation income and believe, for the reasons spelled out in the body of our testimony, that the decision Congress will make on it is a decision about the very nature of the American system.

C. THE ROLE OF INOME-TAX EXEMPTION FOR CHARITABLE PURPOSES IN AMERICAN LIFE

Income tax exemption is part of a centuries old tradition under which charitable organizations have been granted special privileges by the state because they relieve it of responsibilities it would otherwise have to meet with public funds. In the United States all 501(c)(3) charitable organizations have been exempt from income tax since such a tax was first established on a constitutional basis in 1913.

No distinction has ever been made in this provision between different kinds of 501(c)(3) charitable organizations. All have been considered equal by the federal government. Consequently, there has never been any such thing as a qualified, or partial income tax exemption in the charitable field. The concept has been considered by its nature to be indivisible.

The imposition of an income tax on foundations, however limited the rate, would destroy this principle and constitute a breaching of long-standing and well-proven national practice.

Furthermore, the tax would serve as a clear precedent for future taxation of other classes of charitable organizations, and it would encourage other levels of government to impose their own income taxes, initially on foundations but subsequently on charitable organizations generally. The tax might very possibly, therefore, lead to a substantial weakening of the private non-profit sector and further accretion of the power of government. It is pluralism that is really at stake in the decision on the tax and we believe it should be debated on these terms.

Finally, the tax poses a serious danger to the freedom of private institutions. A threat to raise the level of such a tax, once it is established, can be used as a convenient means of forcing charitable organizations to terminate activities that are arbitrarily disapproved by someone in authority. This is an extension of the authority of government that could stifle dissent, inhibit experimentation and break the spirit of voluntarism.

D. THE JUSTIFICATION FOR PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

The private foundation is a development and extension of the individual philanthropic impulse into a more effective and capable form, the advantages of which include continuity, professional staffing, and assured availability of critical masses of funds for problems upon which individual philanthropy can have little impact.

As government moves increasingly into the field of social welfare, the work of private foundations becomes more necessary rather than less. Foundations can move more rapidly and operate more flexibly than government, and foundation-sponsored demonstrations of the need for and feasibility of undertakings in the public interest are a logical precursor of the allocation of substantial government funds to such undertakings.

The historic accomplishments of private foundations are matched by the evident need in the future for precisely the kind of philanthropic activity that they can carry out more ably than any other type of institution.

E. HOW THE TAX WOULD AFFECT THE ROCKFELLER FOUNDATION

The Rockefeller Foundation has appropriated all its income and more than $230 million of its principal toward philanthropic projects many of which have been precursors of government activity in the field of social welfare. The proposed tax on investment income would cost the Foundation's beneficiaries more than $3 million per year. It would also seriously hamper the overseas programs of the Foundation—whose charter commits it to the well-being of mankind throughout the world—by making it difficult or impossible for the Foundation to satisfy foreign governments of its tax-exempt status.

F. HOW THE TAX WOULD AFFECT CARNEGIE CORPORATION

Carnegie Corporation was created by Andrew Carnegie in 1911, before the days of income tax, for the "advancement and diffusion of knowledge" among the people of the United States and of certain British colonies. In the 58 years of its history its affairs have been managed by a self-perpetuating board of able and disinterested trustees, with no other consideration than promotion of the greatest possible public benefit.

Over the years the Corporation has supported a wide range of educational activities with grants totaling $400 million. These grants have been made in every state of the Union and in one way or another have benefited every American citizen. If there had been a 7½ percent tax on the Corporation's income since it was founded, some $40 million of private support would by now have been denied to a host of worthy institutions and talented individuals. The nation at large would have been the ultimate loser.

In view of Carnegie Corporation's outstanding record of public service, the rectitude with which its affairs have been managed and the keen competition for its grants and limited size of its funds in relation to the enormous opportunities for public good, a tax on the foundation is unwarranted, unfair and entirely contrary to the best interests of the nation.

G. HOW THE TAX WOULD AFFECT SMALLER FOUNDATIONS

Foundations across the country concentrate their giving on local educational and charitable institutions. Community chests, colleges, medical schools and other local voluntary organizations will bear the burden of the tax. This result is contrary to the intent of Congress, expressed in other legislation, to encourage strong local organizations through matching grants based on a partnership between the public and private sectors.

Foundations in every state are struggling now to meet the ever-increasing needs for scholarship funds, leadership gifts for capital campaigns, and innovative grants in fields such as health services. The tax will mean that fewer of these challenges can be met, and will heighten the fear, already felt by many, that the House bill signals the beginning of the end of private philanthropy.

H. FURTHER ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE TAX

1. The burden of the tax will fall on educational, health, and welfare agencies which receive the bulk of foundation support—even though the drafters intended that these agencies should remain fully tax-exempt.
2. The tax applies to all foundations indiscriminately, and thus will be ineffective in correcting abuses.
3. While insignificant in governmental budget terms, the tax will be a serious blow to private educational and charitable institutions. Though not justified as a revenue measure, it is in no sense a user fee.
4. The tax presents an inherent inconsistency—it is an invasion of the tax-exempt status formerly accorded all charities yet the bill insists that private foundations remain in the tax-exempt category for purposes of federal control over their programs and finances.
5. The tax cannot be justified by the argument that all organizations able to pay should carry some part of the expense of government—many classes of tax-exempt agencies will retain their freedom from tax, and only private foundations, which directly serve the public interest and relieve the government of some of its burdens, are singled out. The tax is a punitive measure—not tax reform.

I. A PROPOSED ALTERNATIVE

We recommend that an annual fee be assessed on foundations in proportion to their assets. The amount of this fee should be determined each year at a level sufficient to assure adequate supervision of foundations by the Internal Revenue Service and enforcement of the laws applicable to them.

STATEMENT OF MESSRS. J. GEORGE HARRAR, ALAN PIFER, AND DAVID FREEMAN

A. INTRODUCTION

In this statement we discuss the effects of the proposed 7½ percent tax on foundation income as seen by the Rockefeller Foundation and Carnegie Corporation of New York, two of the oldest, largest and best known foundations in the nation, and by the Council on Foundations, the principal membership organization in the field, representing mainly medium-sized and smaller foundations. We believe the statement also represents the views of a number of other large foundations which are coordinating their testimony before the committee.

B. OPPOSITION TO THE TAX

We are strongly opposed to the proposed 7½ percent tax on foundation income and believe that enactment of it by the Congress would be contrary to the national interest. We find no convincing arguments in favor of such a tax and many against it. The latter we believe to be so fundamental that the decision Congress must make is not simply a matter of tax reform but a decision about the very nature of the American system.

C. THE ROLE OF INCOME TAX EXEMPTION FOR CHARITABLE PURPOSES IN AMERICAN LIFE

The history of encouragement of private charity by the state through the granting to it of special privileges goes back to Roman times and has continued unbroken since then. The basic rationale for this arrangement has also remained unchanged, namely that private charity relieves the state of responsibilities it would otherwise have to discharge, and hence should be given every incentive to flourish. This concept was first given systematic legal recognition in England in the historic Statute of Charitable Uses, of 1601, a measure designed to improve the administration of charity and encourage its development by defining a number of specific charitable purposes which would be officially recognized as such by the state.

The intent of the Statute was to place primary responsibility for the amelioration and solution of economic and social problems in private hands, and its enactment proved to be a powerful stimulus to the expansion of private charity both in Britain and in the American Colonies over the next two centuries. After that, although primary responsibility for social welfare began gradually to shift to the state, there remained—and remains to this day—a clearly recognized place for private philanthropy, as it came to be called, in both countries.

When an income tax was first levied in Britain in 1799 it seemed perfectly natural to exempt charities from it, and it seemed equally natural to do so in the United States when, following passage of the 16th Amendment, the Revenue Act of 1913 established a federal income tax on a constitutional basis. This Act exempted from income tax any "corporation organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, no part of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual." These words, repeated in subsequent laws, have in the more than half century since 1913 remained the basic charter under which a wide variety of charitable institutions have enjoyed tax exemption.

No distinction has ever been made in the basic provision for income tax exemption between different kinds of 501(c)(3) charitable organizations, whether churches, educational institutions, welfare organizations or foundations. The state has never presumed to judge whether some charitable purposes were more deserving of tax exemption than others; all have been considered equal. Consequently there has never been any such thing as a qualified, or partial, income tax exemption in the charitable field. There has been total exemption or none. The concept has been considered by its nature to be indivisible.

The imposition of an income tax on foundations—no matter how limited the rate—would destroy the principle of indivisibility and would, thereby, constitute a breaching of long-standing and well-proven national practice. It would, in effect, signify that foundations are now considered to be "less charitable" than other kinds of charitable organizations and therefore less deserving of full tax-exemption. The illogicality of such an assertion, of course, becomes obvious when one remembers that foundations are required by law to distribute their income to charity—for the very kinds of allegedly "more charitable," and hence "more deserving," purposes that would remain fully tax-exempt.

Aside, however, from the illogical and discriminatory features of such a departure from long-standing practice, its greatest harm would lie in the clear precedent it would establish for future taxation of other classes of charitable organizations—churches, colleges, voluntary hospitals, and so on. It would also inevitably encourage other levels of government to impose their own income taxes, initially perhaps only on foundations but subsequently on charitable organizations generally.

A federal income tax on foundations must therefore be recognized as a highly dangerous first step on the road toward the total disappearance from our national life of the traditional income tax exemption enjoyed by charitable organizations. Such an eventuality would of course greatly weaken the private non-profit sector and diminish the role it plays in our society in favor of further accretion of the power of government. It is in this sense that the decision Congress will make about an income tax on foundations can truthfully be said to be a decision in fact about the very nature of the American system. It is the pluralistic initiative and effort of our private institutions that is really at stake in the legislation, and we believe the issue of the tax should be debated on these terms.

In addition to the financial threat which the tax poses for the entire private, non-profit sector, it poses an equally serious threat to the freedom enjoyed by private institutions in our society. An income tax levied on charitable organizations can serve as a simple and highly effective means by which public authorities can arbitrarily punish them. All that is required to force certain organizations to terminate activities which someone in authority judges to be offensive is a threat to raise the level of their tax. This, we would submit, is a misuse of the income tax power and dangerous doctrine.

We recognize, of course, that there have been abuses by some individuals of the privilege of income tax exemption of foundations, and we favor specific measures to prevent these abuses, such as the prohibitions against self-dealing in the bill now under consideration. But we must at the same time urge every member of the Congress to consider most carefully the full implications for the nation of use of the income taxing power for punitive purposes. It constitutes an extension of the authority of government that could stifle dissent and criticism, could inhibit experimentation and could break the spirit of voluntarism in our society.

D. JUSTIFICATION FOR PRIVATE FOUNDATIONS

It has been said that the voluntary philanthropic system which has developed in the United States is the essence of free enterprise. This system appears collectively in many forms: the giving of individual time and talent to worthy causes; individual contributions of money for philanthropic, charitable, religious, and educational purposes; cooperation in common cause to create charitable community organizations; giving for charitable and philanthropic purposes by business corporations; and the creation by individuals of organized philanthropies.

Early in the history of this nation, social welfare was entirely in the hands of the private sector. Fortunately, in more recent years the government has increasingly entered the field in recognition of the growing needs and demands of a burgeoning society. There has resulted an informal partnership in which the government has become by far the major element in terms of resource investment. But the private contributor, corporate or individual, is senior in experience, demonstratedly innovative, and free to move promptly and flexibly in response to need. It is both desirable and proper for the government to take over increasing responsibility for important programs affecting all of its citizens. At the same time, the efforts of the private sector are clearly needed, and private philanthropy should be encouraged and cherished by society and its elected government.

Private philanthorpy derives from the charitable impulse of the individual, and for many years in this country the individual was the sole source of giving for the benefit of others. Benjamin Franklin established a philanthropic fund as early as 1790, but the modern organized foundation did not appear until the beginning of the twentieth century when Andrew Carnegie, John D. Rockefeller, Mrs. Russell Sage, the Guggenheims, and others converted their personal resources into organized philanthropies.

It is noteworthy that these early foundations, which are still among the largest and most influential, were formed at a time when neither individual charitable giving nor the creation of a foundation provided any tax advantage. Rich men established foundations because they believed that philanthropy, like most other human activities, could be most efficiently carried out in an organized form.

Foundations are sometimes referred to as "middlemen" by people who see no reason for what they consider the interposition of an organization between a philanthropically disposed individual and his beneficiaries. The description is inaccurate if the term middleman is taken to mean a conduit or an unnecessary party in a transaction. Foundations are more effective philanthropic instruments than individuals just because of the advantages of organization. Those advantages include continuity, certainty of the availability of funds, the possibility of professional staffing, and the bringing to bear upon selected problems of larger sums of money—and therefore a broader and stronger array of talents—than individual efforts had theretofore been able to supply.

As the foundation phenomenon developed and matured, the organizational principle was adopted for community foundations, corporate foundations, and family foundations, and for the National Science Foundation which is supported by annual grants from the federal government. The achievements to which organized private philanthropy has contributed are well documented but not so widely known as they deserve to be. They include, among many others, the establishment of free public libraries; control of yellow fever, hookworm, malaria, and other major endemic diseases; the development of modern medical education; pioneering experiments in rocketry; polio vaccine research; the solution of the genetic code that controls plant and animal heredity; research in astronomy which has yielded extraordinary advances in our knowledge of the universe; and research in agriculture and its application to the problems of hunger in many of the less-developed nations. Other achievements include the support of medical research, the improvement of education at all levels, the establishment of fellowship and scholarship programs for the intellectually gifted and for those with leadership potential, and the support of research institutions dedicated to the study and solution of contemporary human problems.

Many areas of art, culture, science, and education, and many social institutions, have benefited enormously from or have been brought into being by the initiative of private foundations. Anyone who studies the record will recognize that private philanthropy has, by reason of its achievements, embedded itself solidly in the American free enterprise system. The bulk of philanthropic giving is by individuals: personal charitable contributions totaled nearly $16 billion in 1968. The total of foundation grants was less than nine percent of that figure; but because they are organized and professionally staffed, because they are flexible and can supply continuity of effort, and because they can provide critical masses of money when problems require them, foundations are the advance scouts of philanthropy.

It is sometimes argued that although foundations have been advance scouts in the past, the increasing activity of government in the field of social welfare has rendered them superfluous. It seems clear both that that argument is false and that the situation it presupposes would be undesirable if it existed. To be sure, a degree of experimentation is acceptable in the activities of government. But government is by definition consensual, in this country at least, and that means that what government does in the field of social welfare, as in other fields, should rest upon a common, or at least a widespread, public recognition that it is needed. Government therefore tends to be constrained in supporting those forms of experimentation, or pioneering research, that must precede such a public recognition. The role in which it most plainly fulfills its obligation to the electorate is that of providing official sponsorship, and massive funds beyond the reach of the private sector, once the work of private agencies has clearly documented the existence of a need and, if possible, the viability of a solution.

Looking toward the future, it seems evident that the larger participation of government in social welfare has not diminished the number or variety of problems that most informed citizens see before the nation and the world. On the contrary, the increased rate at which we are able to answer certain kinds of questions about our lives and our universe simply increases the rate at which our answers ask new questions; and in the meantime certain types of problems—some of them indeed raising questions about the role of government—appear unusually intractable and increasingly stubborn. We are arriving at new realizations of the importance of certain problems of social organization and economics; of the effects of the numerousness of the human species both upon the sufficiency of the food supply and upon the quality of the environment; and of the risks and opportunities arising out of our increasing capacity to manipulate both the external environment and our personal environment—our physical selves.

We have not solved the problems of conflict between nations, and it appears increasingly that such conflict is a luxury the species can no longer afford. Many of our most perceptive young people are raising questions of national and individual purpose that do not seem to be satisfactorily answered by the old truths. In short, there is plenty to be done, and the need for private enterprise in the doing of it can only increase, rather than diminish, regardless of the extent to which government is able to expand its support of research and education. It must be hoped that government and private philanthropy will see themselves as essential partners in human progress, operating in harmony and mutual respect.

E. HOW THE TAX WOULD AFFECT THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION

Long before there was any public participation in the solution of many of the ills which beset mankind, private philanthropy pioneering in these areas was shedding light through research on fundamental concerns and was taking vigorous action to alleviate conditions responsible for undesirable human conditions.

The Rockefeller Foundation was formed in 1913—before the income of United States citizens and business corporations was taxed—"to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world." During the Foundation's earlier years, when government was relatively inactive in the field of social welfare, a good deal of the Foundation's effort went into projects designed to demonstrate that particular human ills were not inevitable but could be remedied by sufficient applications of energy and skill. Federal or state government often supplanted the Foundation as the primary source of funds for projects the importance and feasibility of which had been demonstrated under Foundation auspices, and the same tendency for successful projects to move from Foundation sponsorship to government sponsorship is observable today. It is probably safe to predict that a number of projects now being supported by the Foundation—for which government funding is inappropriate or unavailable—are of a kind that in the future will be felt to lie within the proper sphere of government.

The Foundation's first work was in the field of public health. Its success in the eradication of hookworm in this country and in many others overseas, and its campaigns against malaria, yellow fever and other widespread and devastating endemic diseases, are now classics in the annals of public health. Public health is now largely the province of government.

For more than a quarter of a century the Foundation has sponsored and participated in agricultural research and its application toward improving the quality and quantity of basic foods for the people of less developed countries in which food supplies have long been inadequate. The results have been spectacular: today the "miracle wheats" and "miracle rice" have achieved worldwide fame as basic to the so-called "green revolution." These long-range undertakings, carried on in association with other public and private agencies, offer for the first time the possibility that the world may in the foreseeable future meet its requirements for basic foodstuffs for all of its citizens.

From its earliest beginnings the Foundation has been committed to the philosophy of the reinforcement of educational institutions; the training of individuals with ability and leadership potential is fundamental to the success of its total program. Thus, over the years the Foundation has invested very large proportions of its income and indeed capital resources in its support of professional and general education in universities here and abroad. Simultaneously a scholarship and fellowship program has been developed which over the years has contributed to the academic, scientific and professional development of many thousands of young men and women in this country and overseas. Perhaps this development of intellectual and leadership manpower has through its multiplier effect been the Foundation's greatest contribution to economic and social progress during its more than fifty-five years of existence.

Toward the costs of its philanthropic programs, many of which have relieved government of costs it would otherwise have had to bear, The Rockefeller Foundation has appropriated all of its income and more than $230 million of its principal. At the Foundation's current rate of receiving income and realizing capital gain, the proposed 7½ percent tax would cost it more than $3,000,000 per year. Because the Foundation disburses all its income, the effect of the tax would be simply to reduce the volume of work it is able to do. The burden would fall upon the Foundation's beneficiaries.

The tax would present another problem of special importance to The Rockefeller Foundation. The Foundation's charter, as quoted previously, commits it to the well-being of mankind throughout the world. The Trustees of the Foundation have interpreted that language as a mandate to operate not only in the United States but wherever need appears, having always in mind the fact that illness, poverty, and hunger elsewhere in the world affect also the well-being of American citizens. Thus a substantial fraction of the energies of the Foundation have been expended abroad, at the invitation of foreign governments and with the cooperation of indigenous institutions of research and higher education.

In qualifying, as a private American organization, to carry on philanthropic work in a foreign country, the Foundation has always had to rely upon its status as a tax-exempt entity in the United States. Were it not tax-exempt here, it might very well not be permitted to work in a number of the countries in which it has supported conspicuously successful programs. And in other countries, where it might be permitted to work, it would probably be denied local tax exemption, which would make the importation of scientific equipment and the assignment of staff prohibitive.

For the Rockefeller Foundation, then, the most important difficulty raised by the proposed income tax may be the question whether any foundation so taxed can continue to call itself a tax-exempt institution. Even if the Congress should include in the law language expressly reaffirming the tax-exempt status of private foundations, there is no assurance that foreign governments, observing the fact of taxation and noting also that private foundations are the only group of entities in the charitable sector to be so taxed, would give credit to the declaration.

There can be no denying the fact that the proposed tax would be a breach in the long-established and often-reaffirmed principle of tax exemption for charitable, scientific, educational, and other philanthropic activities. The work of The Rockefeller Foundation and other foundations would be severely hampered by it, and those we seek to aid would be the direct losers. Moreover, the gain to the government from the imposition of the tax would be a scarcely significant addition to the federal revenues. For all the reasons stated above, The Rockefeller Foundation strongly opposes the proposed tax on investment income of private foundations.

F. HOW THE TAX WOULD AFFECT CARNEGIE CORPORATION

Carnegie Corporation of New York was established in 1911 before the days of tax-exemption. There were, therefore, no tax advantages involved for Andrew Carnegie, the founder; nor had there been any for him in the many other philanthropies which he had set up previously, such as the Carnegie Institution of Washington, the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching and the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. With the exception of a legacy for his wife and daughter, Mr. Carnegie gave away his entire fortune in his own life time.

Carnegie Corporation was the last of the great Carnegie philanthropies, the largest and the most general in its purposes. The income from its perpetual endowment fund was to be used over the succeeding years for whatever specific purposes the trustees thought best met the needs of those times, provided only that the purposes fell under the broad heading of "the advancement and diffusion of knowledge among the people of the United States." A smaller fund with similar purposes was set up under the administration of the same board of trustees for the benefit of the British colonies.

Mr. Carnegie believed that Carnegie Corporation would be best administered over the long run if he did not bind the trustees too closely by the terms of his gifts. He selected the most able men of his day to constitute the original board of trustees and placed in their hands sole power to select their successors, on the assumption that able, public-spirited men would select equally good men to succeed them. No evidence has ever been adduced to indicate that the public interest might have been better served by some other system of governance than this self-perpetuating board. The successive members of it, all of whom have served without compensation, have given their time generously and have brought to the management of the foundation a wide range of experience and talent. In the 58 years of the foundation's history there has been not a single instance of any part of its income inuring to the private benefit of any member of the Carnegie family, any trustee, any employee or any other individual except for services rendered. No consideration has ever existed in the foundation's affairs except furtherance of the greatest possible benefit to the public.

Over the years the Corporation has pursued a variety of interests. It has provided scholarships, fellowships and travel grants to deserving individuals. It has supported research in the sciences, medicine, education and the social sciences. It has fostered education in the arts. It has supported experimental new programs in elementary and secondary education and more recently at the pre-school level. It has enabled a wide range of colleges and universities, both public and private, to try out new approaches to teaching. It has organized and supported independent inquiries into important aspects of the educational system. It has contributed to the training of teachers. It has fostered the development of libraries and adult education programs. It has supported projects aimed at the strengthening of state and local government. It has attempted through the support of language and areas studies in schools and colleges to enhance the nation's capacity to discharge its international responsibilities effectively. It has supported efforts to improve the delivery of health care to the American people and efforts to ameliorate the problems of the great cities. It has worked to improve race relations.

Altogether, in these and other ways, Carnegie Corporation has since 1911 spent $400 million. In the course of this period it has made grants in every state of the Union, and it would be no exaggeration to say that in one way or another it has brought some benefit to every American citizen—rural as well as urban, Southern as well as Northern, Western as well as Eastern, of ordinary circumstances as well as privileged, old as well as young, of one race as well as another.

Had there been a 7½ percent income tax on foundations since 1913 the loss to Carnegie Corporation would in total have been $40 million. But the burden of this loss would not, of course, have fallen on the foundation but on the recipient of its grants. All of the activities listed above would in fact have had to be reduced by the amount of the tax. Similarly, if a tax is now levied, the loss to education, broadly defined, in respect to Carnegie Corporation alone will over just the next ten years be at least $12 million and probably more. There is no other way this so-called tax on the foundation can be viewed than as private support denied to worthy institutions and talented individuals. In reality it will be a tax on them, and the American people at large will be the ultimate losers.

In view of Carnegie Corporation's outstanding record of public service, in view of the rectitude with which its affairs have always been managed, in view of the keen competition for its grants and the smallness of the funds it has at its disposal each year in relation to the enormous opportunities for public good, a tax on its annual income is totally unwarranted and grossly unfair to this foundation. Far more importantly, however, such a tax is entirely contrary to the best interests of the nation, and it is on these grounds that the trustees and officers of the foundation oppose it so strongly.

G. HOW THE TAX WOULD AFFECT SMALLER FOUNDATIONS

The tax on foundation income will limit the ability of foundations across the country to support local educational, health and welfare organizations. For example, it will reduce the amounts available to local charities in Providence, R.I., through the local community fund, by at least $100,000 a year. This is estimated to be the tax which would be levied on the Rhode Island Charitable Trust—all of whose income now goes to the Community Fund. Similar reductions will occur in foundation contributions to Chests and United Funds in hundreds of communities, where small and medium-sized foundations typically concentrate their giving. Thus, at a time when United Funds are struggling desperately to keep up with the demands made, by rising costs and increased service loads, on their member agencies, the real impact of the tax will be felt by those same agencies.

Surely the Congress does not intend this result—legislation over the past several years, such as the Hill-Burton Act, the Community Mental Health Act, etc., has been based on the partnership philosophy, and has made the private philanthropic dollar, demonstrating the concern of local leadership, a prerequisite for federal contributions. Strong local organizations, with volunteer leadership, are vital to the survival of the private sector.

Another field where the impact of the tax will be particularly severe is medical education. The White House report issued this summer points out the current crisis in providing adequate health care services throughout our society, and Dr. Cooper's presentation on behalf of the American Association of Medical Colleges has highlighted the crucial role of foundation support. Three specific examples may help to underline the importance of private foundation activities in this field.

1. The Commonwealth Fund, for many years a major supporter of medical research and education, recently revised its policies to devote an even greater proportion of its income to the medical and health fields. Even so, and before the reduction in its resources which the tax will cause, it has been forced to decline proposals from major medical schools for development programs.

2. George W. Starcher, President of the University of North Dakota, one of several institutions receiving support for their medical schools from the Hill Family Foundation of St. Paul, Minnesota, writes in part:

"If we could feel that this money siphoned off through federal taxation would come back to the University through some grant from Washington, it would probably still not give us the strong support in new directions which we have received from the Hill Family Foundation. We have enjoyed great freedom and our scientists have made significant strides ahead because of the liberal conditions under which the grants have been awarded by the Foundation. Moreover, we have been helped by the continuous supervision, real interest, and concern expressed by officials of the Foundation."

3. The Dean of the College of Medical Sciences at the University of Minnesota, stressing the importance of broad foundation support during the formation of that institution's program in family practice and community health, concludes that anything done to impair the programs of the well-managed foundations will be a serious blow to medical education.

In a period when health services are becoming increasingly dependent on the tax dollar, chipping away at the remaining sources of private support for innovation and experimentation in the health field will inevitably force further dependence on the federal government.

Most foundations of modest size are active in support of higher education, through scholarships, research grants and gifts to capital needs. Programs such as those of the Markus Foundation in Cleveland, or the Sachs Foundation in Colorado Springs, provide financial support to enable disadvantaged students to attend the colleges of their choice—often by supplying the last five hundred dollars needed to complete a complicated package of loans, college aid funds and employment. The tax will mean that these foundations will be able to help fewer students—even though loan programs are seriously handicapped by rising interest rates and soaring operating costs are forcing colleges to increase their tuition fees almost annually.

Lest it be assumed that colleges are supported by only a few large foundations, it should be noted that, for example, Case Western Reserve University last year received grants totalling four and a half million dollars from more than 230 foundations, representing about 25 percent of all contributed funds. The tax will fall with equal severity on all these foundations, and others supporting their local schools and colleges in every state.

As has been pointed out earlier, the challenge or matching gift has proven to be a particularly effective device for encouraging broad support of capital campaigns conducted by educational and other private institutions. In such gifts each foundation dollar is instrumental in producing at least one additional dollar from other sources. The 7½ percent reduction in foundations' ability to make challenge grants will thus produce a double, or even larger penalty on the grant-receiving institutions.

Finally, many foundation representatives have expressed deep concern that singling out this one segment of the field for imposition of an income tax may signal the beginning of the end of private philanthropy. Whether or not this fear proves well-founded, the immediate effect of imposing the tax, taken together with the other punitive measures contained in the House bill—particularly the treatment of gifts of appreciated property to private foundations—will inevitably be a slowing down of new funds into those foundations.

Available statistics show no appreciable difference in the rate of growth of GNP and the growth of foundation assets. If foundation growth rates are seriously curtailed, the private non-profit sector will again be the loser, for only a reasonable growth rate has enabled foundation dollars to keep up with inflation and the increasing need for the help which foundations provide.

H. FURTHER ARGUMENTS AGAINST TAX

The burden of the tax will fall upon the educational, health and welfare agencies which are the major recipients of foundation support. The effect upon a number of such agencies has already been described by earlier witnesses before this Committee. In Sections E., F., and G. of our presentation we have outlined the effects of the tax upon the Carnegie and Rockefeller Foundations, and upon the programs of a number of middle-size and smaller foundations across the country.

While it was plainly the intent of the drafters of the House bill to impose the tax upon private foundations and not upon the other classes of Section 501(c)(3) organizations, the foregoing discussion makes clear that in fact it will be the operating organizations which will bear the real burden. In the most recent survey of foundation giving, educational institutions received 41 percent of the foundation dollar. (Statistics for eight selected years on foundation giving for higher education totaling over $2 billion will be found in Appendix A.) Thus the tax, though levied upon foundations, would in fact be borne by the very organizations which the bill intended to benefit through continued complete exemption. Some further reasons are:

1. The tax applied without distinction to all private foundations indiscriminately and is therefore a totally ineffective means of correcting the abuses which exist in the field. While a number of provisions of the House bill are addressed to real and specific problems, the proposed tax by its nature is irrelevant to such matters as self-dealing and income accumulation.
2. While the revenue produced by the tax will have minimal effect on governmental budgets, it will be a serious blow to the educational and charitable organizations discussed earlier in our presentation. Thus, without producing any substantial advantage for government operations or materially reducing the burden on individual taxpayers, it will have serious consequences for key areas of private philanthropy. The tax will, however, produce considerably more revenue than could conceivably be utilized by the Treasury in strengthening its audit and review forces in the foundation field, and the receipts from the tax will become part of the general revenues. It is therefore not in any true sense a user fee or a filing fee such as the alternative measure we propose in the concluding section of this presentation.
3. The singling out of private foundations for taxation on investment income embodies a basic inconsistency. Tax exemption is not to be done away with; indeed, the House bill reaffirms and insists upon the tax-exempt status of private foundations even as it taxes them, and the exemption of other types of philanthropic and non-profit organizations is maintained in fact as well as in word. What the bill does is to impose a tax upon one type of organization, hitherto tax-exempt, which for that purpose is drawn forth from the broad family of Section 501 organizations. Yet for the purpose of maintaining federal control over that type of organization the bill insists that it remain tax-exempt. This inconsistency is the inevitable consequence of attempting to raise revenue from organizations which for other purposes the federal authorities wish to consider exempt from tax.
4. Finally, the case in favor of the tax is basically unsound. While proponents attempt to justify the tax by arguing that all organizations able to do so should contribute to the support of the government, in fact the proposal makes no effort to require such support from any other class of exempt organizations. A wide variety of tax-exempt organizations, such as trade associations, business leagues, cemetery companies, etc., will retain their freedom from federal income tax. Thus the principle of tax-exemption for charity is breached with regard to private foundations, even though their record of accomplishment demonstrates that they are clearly serving the public interest more directly than most other exempt organizations and thereby relieving government of some of the financial burdens and responsibilities which it would otherwise have to meet.

The measure would, for example, require taxes to be paid from funds which would otherwise have supported cancer research; but it would require no payment at all from the very considerable financial resources of trade associations, whose sole objective is to advance the business interests of their members and which are permitted without limit to influence legislative and administrative decisions to accomplish that end. The tax would take money from the provision of scholarships for poor children; but it would take none from active and influential lobbying organizations exempt under Section 501(c)(4).

This provision of the House bill is surely not tax reform nor the plugging of a loophole. Rather, the tax is a punitive measure against an integral part of the philanthropic structure of our society—the private foundation. We submit that the foundation is a uniquely American phenomenon which does not merit this arbitrary treatment.

I. A PROPOSED ALTERNATIVE

It is our belief that the present lack of public and Congressional confidence in foundations would not exist had there been adequate supervision of tax-exempt organizations and enforcement of existing laws by the Internal Revenue Servise. Such supervision and enforcement would have prevented or reduced the bulk of the abuses now known to have occurred. It is our understanding that this inadequacy of supervision and enforcement resulted from a shortage of staffing in the Exempt Organizations Branch of I.R.S. occasioned by the fact that no substantial recovery of revenue would result from exposure of abuses in the tax-exempt organization field. We believe that to safeguard the public interest, and also to protect the reputation of the vast majority of foundations which fulfill their charitable mandate in good faith, funds for more adequate supervision in the field must be found.

It seems reasonable to us for foundations to contribute to the cost of their own supervision. We therefore propose that they be required to pay an annual fee for that purpose. We further propose that as a basis for arriving at an equitable distribution of the burden of this charge among foundations the amount payable by each foundation be proportional to its assets. The total to be collected from all foundations should be determined annually by the Secretary of the Treasury on the basis of his estimate of the cost to the Treasury of such supervision.

This proposal would provide a practical solution to the kinds of problems that have disturbed the public and the Congress. At the same time it would avoid the damaging consequences and inconsistencies we find in the proposed tax and have described in previous sections of this statement.

APPENDIX A. Amounts contributed by foundations to U.S. colleges and Universities, 8 survey years [1]

1956–57 (904 institutions)	$319,085,152
1958–59 (1,071 institutions)	88,337,037

NOTE.—The 1956–57 total includes $199,522,710 attributed to the Ford Foundation faculty salary endowment grants.

IV. EFFECT OF PROGRAM LIMITATIONS

SUMMARY OF STATEMENT OF MR. MERRIMON CUNINGGIM

My testimony is confined to the subject of program limitations. Among the unfortunate and, we believe, unintended handicaps that H.R. 13270 imposes on the work of private foundations are:

1. Restrictions on programs of fellowships and awards: The present language of the Bill, though not the intention of the House Committee, would call in question some worthwhile programs, carefully defined, publicly announced and impartially administered. Modifications in the wording of the Bill could eliminate the difficulty.

2. Implications of the prohibition on "any attempt to influence legislation * * * .": Foundations are alarmed that if the present wording of the Bill in Sec. 4945, para. (b)(1) and (c) is retained, the effect will be that grants in any area of current social importance would be off bounds, because of the likelihood that sooner or later projects supported by such grants would point toward a need for new legislation. The House Committee seems to have intended only to make sure that foundations do not engage in partisan political action. (Report, Part 1, p. 33). This laudable purpose can be achieved, and proscriptions of worthy foundation activity can be avoided, by judicious changes in the wording of the paragraphs indicated.

Statement of Mr. Merrimon Cuninggim

Introduction

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, this part of our testimony has to do with those portions of H.R. 13270 that, if finally adopted, would impose serious limitations on the programs of many foundations.

Three of us will speak to the program limitations implicit in the Bill: Mr. Russell Arrington, President Pro Tempore and Majority Leader of the Illinois State Senate, testifying on behalf of the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures, and Mr. Homer Wadsworth, President of the Kansas City Association of Trusts and Foundations, and myself, testifying concerning the effect on foundations.

My name is Merrimon Cuninggim, President of the Danforth Foundation of St. Louis.

We have four major points to make:

(1) The prohibition against "*any attempt to influence legislation * * " would inhibit or prevent presently approved activities by foundations that would adversely affect their freedom to contribute to the general welfare. This is the most serious program limitation of the Bill, and from our different perspectives all three of us will speak to this point.

(2) The partial prohibition against grants to individuals might still handicap unduly some worthy programs of fellowships and awards. I will elaborate on this position.

(3) The definition of "expenditure responsibility" is either difficult or impossible to fulfill. Mr. Wadsworth will deal with this problem.

(4) The language of the Bill on these three subjects seems occasionally to be unclear and imprecise, though we feel that the Report reflects the intention of the House Committee. As all of us will indicate, it is our belief that modifications in the language of the Bill could make its provisions consistent with the purposes of the Committee as expressed in the Report, and thereby could eliminate the dangers we see.

To the extent to which representatives of various foundations feel that H.R. 13270 imposes serious program limitations on their work, they must of necessity speak not with one unified voice but as individuals, each having his own perspective. Most foundations are local or regional in their outreach, and the implications of the Bill are necessarily limited to the geographical and topical areas they serve. Even the national, "general purpose" foundations have their distinctive program emphases, and the testimony of each would differ from that of every other. Yet common threads of concern are discernible. I can speak with assurance only for the foundation I represent, but it is my hope to be illustrative rather than simply unilateral in the treatment of the matters I want to mention.

So that you may know the particular position from which I speak, let me say a brief word about the Danforth Foundation. Our work, since the Foundation's beginning in 1927, has been largely in the field of education. In the past year and a half we have become active also in the field of urban affairs, chiefly in the St. Louis area. No such limitation applies, however, to our educational efforts: for through our grants, fellowships, workshops, conferences, and by other means we have intimate contacts of one sort or another with eight hundred to a thousand colleges and universities, hundreds of secondary schools and other educational organizations, and upwards of fifteen thousand persons in educational occupations, all across the country. In market value of portfolio we rank 10th in size among national foundations; in amount of annual expenditures—a truer measure, we think, of a foundation's activity—we are 9th. Like many another similar foundation, we believe in and practice full public disclosure of our activities. If it hadn't been for these hearings our new Annual Report might already have been off the press!

Let me direct your attention, first, to the prohibition against grants to individuals, Sec. 4945(b) (3) on p. 44 and (e) on pp. 46–47 of the Bill. This section is less restrictive than, and thus in our view a considerable improvement on, the "tentative decision" announced by the House Ways and Means Committee in its press release of May 27. The "tentative decision" prohibited all grants to individuals, whereas the Bill as it now stands would allow such grants when the conditions of sub-paragraph (e), pp. 46–47, are met.

It appears to us, however, that the language of the Bill may still be more restrictive than fulfillment of the intention of the House Committee would require. The Committee means to put an end to grants "to enable people to take vacations abroad, to have paid interludes between jobs, and to subsidize the preparation of materials furthering specific political viewpoints." (Report, part 1, p. 33) We of the Danforth Foundation, along with other foundations that sponsor carefully planned and administered programs of fellowships and awards, would heartily applaud this aim. But the language of the Bill outruns this intention and may do considerable harm to reputable programs. I shall draw my illustrations from among the ten or a dozen programs that the Danforth Foundation sponsors or supports, though I beg you to remember that these are only a few among the scores, perhaps hundreds, of such admirable programs sponsored by other foundations.

The first problem is that the language might unintentionally force the cessation of useful programs of awards and prizes, given to recognize excellence or achievement in various fields. Such awards are indeed grants to individuals, and thus would fall under the prohibition of such grants; but they would not qualify as approved exceptions to that prohibition because they are not scholarships or fellowships and do not aim "to achieve a specific objective * * *." Recipients are not applicants, expected to "produce a report" or perform some other service, but are simply honorees.

For example, our own Harbison Awards for Gifted Teaching might have to be terminated, even though in recent times both the White House and the Office of Education have expressed keen interest in the Program and a desire to emulate it. These Awards, usually ten per year, are for $10,000 each; the purpose is not merely to honor teachers of unusual competence but also, and by that means, to emphasize the importance of teaching in the academic process. It is ironic that, whereas the Bill would seem to allow this Program to continue only if it is to "achieve a specific objective * * *" the Internal Revenue Service has ruled that the Award will be tax free to the recipient (under section 74(b) of the Internal Revenue Code), only if he does not have to fulfill some requirement of the Foundation. Perhaps a clause could be added at an appropriate place in the Bill, to indicate that awards coming within section 74(b) are to be excepted from this provision.

A second problem has to do with the wording in lines 22–24 of sub-paragraph (e), p. 46. We agree fully with the Bill's intention to allow approval of those grants to individuals that are "awarded on an objective and nondiscriminatory basis pursuant to a procedure approved in advance by the Secretary or his delegate * * *." It occurs to us, however, that lest enforcement be more time-consuming and restrictive than was intended, something needs to be said as to how clearance could be secured in advance, how decisions could be reached rapidly when necessary, and what criteria should be used in making judgments. Clearance would be streamlined, to the benefit not merely of the foundations involved but also of the human needs they seek to serve, if the regulations were to spell out the kind of "procedure" that would be judged to be "objective and nondiscriminatory."

It appears to us that "objective" should mean that applicants will be judged on the basis of credentials submitted in compliance with publicly announced eligibilities and instructions; that the various steps in the selection process, also publicly announced in advance, will be such as to provide fair consideration for all applicants; and that final decisions will be in the hands of people, publicly identified, whether in or outside the foundation (and perhaps both), who are qualified by their own experience to make such judgments.

Similarly, "nondiscriminatory" should mean that no irrelevant distinctions of race, creed, color, sex or age will be imposed in the selection. The addition of "irrelevant" is important, for some worthy programs discriminate purposely in order to overcome some current imbalance. For example, our program of Graduate Fellowships for Women is directed to the lack of qualified women in college teaching; and a requirement that this particular program admit men would defeat its central aim. Taking note of this Program, the Advisory Council on Graduate Education of the U.S. Office of Education recommended this spring that the Office of Education explore the possibility of establishing a similar discriminatory program. Various programs by a number of foundations, Danforth included, on behalf of minority groups would also benefit from a clarification of "nondiscriminatory."

"Procedure" should mean that, on the one hand, "the Secretary or his delegate" will undertake to review only a defined program of grants, not the individual grants themselves; and that, on the other hand, foundations will not make episodic grants to individuals outside the framework of some defined program. As is true for all our fellowship programs, and for the host of excellent programs sponsored or supported by other foundations—Commonwealth, Guggenheim, Hazen, Markle, Woodrow Wilson, etc., etc.—the sponsoring agency would be quite prepared, and should be expected, to hold to the terms of its defined, publicly announced program and to refrain from subsidies to individuals, individually determined. Even the small foundation, making only a few grants to individuals, would not be handicapped if it were allowed to describe in advance the terms under which such grants would be made.

Lastly, "approved in advance" should mean that clearance will be expeditious and unequivocal. Long delays and peculiar requirements or conditions for approval would cut the nerve of foundations' efforts in this regard. Most helpful would be regulations stating that programs coming within the list of requirements enumerated therein need not have a separate ruling in advance. In those instances in which rulings must be sought, a time limit could be specified—say, six weeks—at the end of which, if the appropriate Government official had raised no objection, the foundation's program would be considered approved.

The final problem in respect to grants to individuals turns on the unnecessarily and, we think, unintentionally restrictive language of that part of para. (e) in lines 1–6 on p. 47. The wording provides that, to escape the prohibition, the grant must be "a scholarship or fellowship grant at an educational institution * * * or that the purpose of the grant is to achieve a specific objective, produce a report or improve or enhance a literary, artistic, musical, scientific or other similar capacity, skill, or talent." At first look the words seem to be broad enough to include any legitimate program; but on more careful examination such questions as the following arise: Must the recipient of a scholarship or fellowship be enrolled as a regular student? What about part-time? What about an auditor? What about study outside the United States? What about independent study? How specific must a "specific objective" be? Do the adjectives, "literary, artistic, musical, scientific," include any educational "capacity," the "skill" of the administrator or the "talent" of the teacher?

I do not mean to carp. Most of the fellowship programs of the Danforth Foundation as well as those of other foundations, are nicely covered by the Bill's enabling phrases as they now stand. Let me give two brief examples, however, of programs that might be adversely affected by the present language.

First is the Danforth Associate Program, an extensive effort to provide various forms of encouragement and support to faculty members on hundreds of campuses throughout the country, for the purpose of fostering what has been called "the personal dimension" in higher education. These faculty members are committed to the high aim of reversing the trend toward anonymity in campus life. The Foundation makes modest grants to them, to be used for the benefit of their students, and sponsors regional and national conferences for them for the discussion of pertinent issues. Competent outside evaluators have praised this Program for the understanding and constructive action it has quietly brought to bear on problems of student unrest in every section of the country. But those chosen to be Danforth Associates do not hold fellowships, are not expected to "achieve a specific objective," and the quality they "improve or enhance" is not so much peculiarly "literary, artistic, musical, scientific" as it is generally humane, related to their professional vocation as teachers and educators. On the basis of the Bill's present wording, what would happen to this Program is not clear.

Again our Program of Short-term Leaves for College and University Administrators would be suspect. To provide the kind of support that able, yet harried, university presidents need today, a fortification of body, mind and spirit, the Danforth Foundation insists that recipients, twenty per year, do not undertake "a specific objective" or "produce a report," or "improve or enhance" anything at all excepr their ability to cope with their immensely demanding duties. Recipients do not go on vacations, but undertake reading programs, write lectures, study the problems of other institutions, or otherwise fit themselves for the better performance of their own jobs.

Other foundations provide similar programs whose value often turns on the fact that their purposes, and their expectations of recipients, are less specific and more flexible than the language of the Bill now allows. The intent of the Bill, as we understand it, would be well served if modifications of language so as to take these considerations into account were adopted.

The second major limitation of program to which I wish to speak is the prohibition against "any attempt to influence legislation" as defined in section 4945(c), on pp. 44–45 of the Bill, and as commented on by the Report, part 1, p. 33. In my view, this is potentially the most serious issue raised for foundations by any part of the Bill. Each of my fellow witnesses will also testify on this matter.

A host of foundations are understandably and inevitably alarmed by the lan-attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof" (lines guage of the Bill as it now stands. The wording seems to suggest that "an 5–6, p. 45), on any matter that might relate to legislation, would be a taxable expenditure incurring heavy penalties. What, then is left for foundations to do? To play safe, they would feel that they must eschew working in any field of the social sciences, perhaps also the humanities, and even the natural sciences, at least in their applicability to human problems. Conservation of our national resources? Air and water pollution? Beautification of our highways? Such innocent-sounding activities would be too dangerous, for they would sooner or later touch on legislation.

Take the grants of the Danforth Foundation as a case in point. We work, by choice, in the fields of education and urban affairs, because we believe that problems in these fields are crucial for our time, and that even though our efforts are bound to be minuscule in comparison with those of government, it is important that private as well as public energies and resources be brought to bear. In our work we have in mind the molding of public opinion, local or national, not merely on behalf of the project itself that is supported by one of our grants, but also on behalf of the purposes or goals that the project seeks to serve. To support a socially purposeless project would be wasteful and thus preposterous. The pursuit of these purposes could and often does lead to a recognition that changes are needed in regional or national life, and thus eventually to new legislation. To disavow "an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public" would mean, for us, to withdraw from the fields of education and urban affairs, at the very time that private as well as public efforts in these fields are most needed.

To be explicit, let me mention a few of the recent grants of the Danforth Foundation, as representative of those of other foundations, that would be called in question by the current wording of the Bill:

> To the American Assembly, in cooperation with the American Bar Association, for a series of conferences, based on preparatory studies, of the theme, "Law and the Social Order." This program will undoubtedly result in numbers of specific recommendations by the Assembly for new, though non-partisan, legislation.
> To the American Bar Association, for support of a program of its Special Commission on Housing and Urban Development Law, to involve lawyers in solving urban problems and "to attack outmoded laws by working with federal, state and local legislatures."
>
> To the American Council on Education, in support of a National Conference on Law and Higher Education, to examine the adequacy of present understandings on the legal status of students, due process, and campus freedom and order.
> For the Cooperative School Board Project, involving four metropolitan school systems (Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles and New York), four neighboring graduate schools of education, and two other organizations to coordinate and disseminate the findings. This ambitious study of the present and desirable functioning of large city school systems will, we hope, have many repercusions, including legislative ones.

To the Education Commission of the States, a formal compact of over forty states for the purpose of bringing governors, legislators and other political leaders into closer association with educators, for the benefit of state systems of education at all levels across the country. Growing out of ideas advanced by Governor Terry Sanford, Dr. James Conant, and United States Commissioner of Education James Allen, the Danforth Foundation has shared equally with the Carnegie Corporation in furnishing the seed money for this organization, until such time as the states themselves assume its full support. The very establishment of the organization required specific legislative action in each participating state, to join and to appropriate its membership fee.

For the Governor's Conferences on Education in Missouri: We have joined with the Kansas City Association of Trusts and Foundations and other groups in supporting these state-wide, non-partisan gatherings to study and make recommendations as to desirable changes in the state's system of public education. Recent legislation on behalf of Missouri's public schools has been based directly on the work of these Conferences.

To the Missouri Bar Association, to provide for an examination of procedures in juvenile courts and, as a hoped-for result, beneficial changes in such procedures.

To the New York State Education Department: This was a many-faceted grant to enable the New York State Education Department to work cooperatively with both public and private institutions, large and small; Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, Colgate University, Cornell University, State University of New York College at Fredonia and Vassar College. The aim was to upgrade programs of teacher training and revise standards of certification for teachers, and expected results will call for changes in legislation or in decisions of governmental bodies affecting public schools.

To the St. Louis Board of Aldermen, to draw together all the leading individuals and agencies concerned with housing, both public and private, in the St. Louis area. Though the grant was made to the Aldermen, the planning committee for the two major conferences, and for the studies that went into their preparation, was composed of representatives from four universities and from other community agencies. If the recommendations of these conferences are to be accepted, changes in legislation will occur.

To the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools: For over ten years the Danforth Foundation has been working with the Southern Association on behalf of the upgrading of predominantly Negro colleges in particular and strengthening educational opportunities for minority groups in general. A particular series of grants to the Southern Association in recent years have been for the support of their Education Improvement Project, a program of many parts represented by projects in many places throughout the South, both urban and rural. Too complex to be described in a brief sentence or two, the EIP has received support from several governmental agencies, such as the Office of Economic Opportunity, as well as from many foundations; and since the boards of education of nearly every Southern state are cooperating, the result of this program will eventually be felt by legislatures and executive offices of government throughout the South.

These are only a few that might be mentioned. Illustrations could be furnished by countless foundations from many other fields of social concern and human endeavor—population, quality of environment, the arts, public broadcasting, regional planning, the administration of justice, and on and on. Rare would be the foundation, small as well as large, that could not give a multitude of examples —not the support of politically partisan efforts but of rational, impartial studies and projects. Such grants are not aimless but are directed toward making a difference. Differences are brought about in our society in many ways, to be sure, but one of the important ways which we would be loath to give up is through the changed attitudes and opinions of the public, which ought to, and do, get incorporated eventually in legislative changes, locally or nationally. It would be tragic for America if this kind of activity by foundations were to have to be discontinued.

It is my impression, however, that such an unhappey development for foundations in general was not the intent of the House Committee. In fact, in their Report, part 1, p. 33, they affirm a much more modest and realistic intention.

Referring to this provision of the Bill, they explain that it "applies specifically to expenses incurred in connection with grassroot campaigns or other attempts to urge or encourage the public to contact members of a legislative body for the purpose of proposing, supporting, or opposing legislation." In other words, the aim is to prevent foundations from engaging in partisan politics. With this aim we of the Danforth Foundation are in full accord; and we have reason to believe that the overwhelming majority of other foundations share this conviction. If the Committee's main purpose is to keep foundations from using the old substantiality test of Section 501(c) (3 in order to engage in propaganda, a purpose to which we gladly subscribe, then the dire results of the sweeping language of subparagraph (c), p. 45, can be escaped without doing violence to the laudable intention back of the language. That the Committee itself may have thought so is suggested by a further sentence from the Report, Part 1, p. 33: "This prohibition is substantially similar to the provisions of present law (Sec. 162(e)), which prohibits business deductions for grassroots lobbying activities." It is my conviction that modifications of the present provisions of sub-paragraph (c) could be made so as to enable the language to reflect more accurately the desires of the House Committee, and in the process to leave room for the legitimate functioning of foundations on behalf of the general welfare.

In closing my testimony I wish to reiterate that I do not believe the House Committee meant to impose severe program limitations on legitimate philanthropic agencies. That the Bill's wording in certain places does so is, in each case, an instance in which the language inaccurately reflects the intent. But, though the problem may be more semantics than substance, it is nonetheless serious in its implications for both foundations and their beneficiaries. I thank you gentlemen for the opportunity to present my concern to you.

Summary of Statement of Mr. Homer C. Wadsworth

I. Foundation effort marginal to government and to philanthropic giving of individuals. Therefore, foundations provide research and development assistance to agencies, public and private, seeking to advance knowledge and to cope with changing conditions.

II. Most foundations work with government agencies at all levels, and have continuous interchange with government officials—Examples.

III. Terms of H.R. 13270 section 4945(e) (1) and (2) give concern for following reasons:

A. Question of whether normal contact with government officials is prohibited.

B. Question of whether foundation officers and grantees may serve with federal advisory agencies.

C. Discrepancies, Ways and Means Committee and actual language of bill.

1. Report suggests prohibition of partisan activity; bill as written extends to grant support calculated "to affect the public opinion of the general public or any segment thereof".

2. Report states section 4945(c)(2) "does not extend to discussions of broad policy problems and issues with such members or employees". Bill reads prohibition of "* * * any attempt to influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, or with any person * * *."

D. Lack of clarity and severe penalties will drive trustees and officers to to undue caution, numbing foundation effort and driving foundation effort away from areas of main national concern.

E. Use of term "knowingly", presuming that advice of counsel will protect against penalties, too thin a reed to lean on. Problem one of fact, not law, clarity rather than ambiguity.

IV. Comment on section 4945(f)(1) and (2) and (3): Expenditure Responsibility.

A. Main concern ambiguity; what does "fully responsible" mean?

B. Foundations need appropriate reporting mechanism, but should not interfere with freedom of grantees.

STATEMENT OF MR. HOMER C. WADSWORTH

The testimony which I wish to present relates mainly to those provisions of H.R. 13270 which define the limits of foundation effort in matters touching upon public policy. I wish also to comment upon those sections which define the responsibilities that foundations assume under the terms of this statute for the expenditures made by agencies receiving grants.

I do wish to associate myself and the parties I represent with the general position taken by other spokesmen on the main features of H.R. 13270. We do not oppose provisions of the bill that outlaw self-dealing. We do not oppose requirements that would assure that private foundations spend their income for charitable purposes. We do not oppose provisions that would require full disclosure of all foundation activities.

On the other hand, we object to the proposed tax on private foundations as fundamentally punitive and totally inconsistent with the effort of our government over many years to encourage private giving and private effort to accomplish worthy public purposes. We join others in support of a fee payment to provide the Treasury with sufficient funds to maintain an adequate staff for review annually of all foundation activities to assure compliance with the law.

The proposed changes in the law governing foundations, and especially section 4945(c)(1) and (2), seem strangely out of touch with the nature of things in this period of our history. Foundations exist to serve the public interest. Their justification derives from the view that the public interest is best served if private citizens and our agencies of government work together to meet human needs and to advance human knowledge. Thus, we have public and private universities and colleges; public and private institutions to serve the sick and the disabled; public and private agencies administering welfare services; public and private organizations that sponsor a broad range of cultural activities.

These agencies are by no means separate entities that may be distinguished from one another by the way they meet their bills. The contrary is the present condition. This era is marked by the rapid growth and development of mixed enterprises, each quite as dependent on various forms of public support as well as income from gifts and endowment and the like.

A few examples come quickly to mind. There is no longer to be found in this nation a purely private university. Our most affluent universities, each guided by private citizens serving as Boards of Directors or Trustees, receive from 30 to 50 percent of their income from governmental sources. Many of our medical schools, including those which function under church-related auspices, make up more than one-half of their annual budgets from government grants and contracts. Many of our symphony orchestras and art galleries and museums receive substantial and indespensable assistance from governmental sources, either directly or indirectly.

Foundation efforts are clearly marginal to governmental programs in most fields of endeavor. They are minor activities in dollar terms, too, in relation to private giving by individuals. The total spending of all foundations in the United States is much less than the annual budget of the Office of Education—a single office among many in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. This is just as clearly seen at community levels as it is in national terms. HEW spends about 100 million dollars per year in Jackson County, Missouri (Kansas City); the total spending of our Association which is the only organized general purpose foundation group in the community is on the order of $750,000 per year.

The United Fund effort in Greater Kansas City produces $7,500,000 per year, to which must be added the considerable income of United Fund agencies from fees and memberships and the like. Therefore, foundation effort in local terms dwindles to very minor proportions—less than one percent of the spending of one Federal department among many; less than 10 percent of the amount available to United Fund agencies.

This condition in the country at large has forced many foundations, and especially those which work mainly in our communities, to regard their function as increasingly one of providing research and development assistance to programs designed to help all agencies, public and private, to better cope with constantly changing conditions. To accomplish this task we need full information about the range and quality of current effort. We need good working relations with those who carry the heavy burdens of community services, whether they be government officials or employees of private agencies. It is necessary frequently for foundation officials to join with other parties to create new institutions to meet needs that go beyond the scope of existing programs.

Many examples come to mind from our experience along these lines in Kansas City over the past twenty years. The Association took the initiative in 1951 at the request of City authorities in creating a non-profit corporation to manage and develop the public services available to indigent persons in need of pyschiatric care. This effort has produced a wide range of coordinated programs now available to qualified parties in the western third of Missouri, and operates clinical, teaching and research programs on an annual budget in excess of five million dollars per year.

The successful management of the psychiatric program led the officials of Kansas City to request in 1961 that the Association take the leadership in creating another non-profit corporation to operate the City hospital system. This was accomplished under the terms of a contract between the non-profit corporation and the City government. The City's annual payment of seven million dollars has been doubled by drawing in private support as well as Federal grants for specified purposes. New buildings are under construction, aided by private gifts as well as state appropriations and Federal grants. The University of Missouri recently announced that it would develop a new medical school for the state as an integral part of the program, and has moved its dental school to a new location within the complex.

Quite frequently foundations make grants to public agencies to accomplish useful and important purposes best achieved in this way. For example, our member trusts made a grant of $480,000 to the School District of Kansas City, Missouri in 1962 to enable the District to operate a college scholarship program for young people from families with limited means. More than 500 students entered college through this program and many have returned to teach in the Kansas City system. The format and practices of the agency created to manage this activity have now been incorporated into a major Federal program.

Our member trusts created an independent social research agency in 1950, the Institute for Community Studies. This agency receives annual grants. It also performs a wide variety of research services for many parties—agencies of government at all levels as well as private, non-profit agencies. One of its recent contracts was with the Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower and Poverty of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The foregoing indicates from our experience the basis for our concern with the changes in the tax law proposed in H.R. 13270, and especially Section 4945(c) (1) and (2). We work very cooperatively with many governmental agencies to accomplish useful ends. We find that precisely this kind of joint effort is needed to achieve the results desired. Quite clearly, many of the things we do through grant support are calculated "to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof." Once a task is completed it often becomes legislation, for, in a government by law, acts, many times, must be ratified by statute or ordinance. In addition, every appropriation is an act of legislation. We do not live in a sterile world, and we doubt that any such world exists outside of research laboratories.

We are quite aware that there exists a wide range of opinion on many current public questions, and that foundations will be criticized for grants issued that provide for experimental effort along lines that some people oppose. We respect the open market-place for ideas, ask that others do so, too, and believe that the democratic system functions best under such conditions. We have always published full reports on what we do, and have made our records available to anyone who wanted to have a look at them.

Section 4945(c)(2) would restrict severely our contact with government officials. This portion of the bill reads as follows: "(taxable expenditures includes but is not limited to) * * * any attempt to influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, or with any person who may participate in the formulation of legislation, other than through making available the results of non-partisan analysis and research." Are we to refuse to answer letters from legislators? Are we to exclude grantees from answering such letters or conversing with elected officials or "any other person who may participate in the formulation of legislation"? Are those of us who serve on Federal advisory councils—and I have served on many, and currently hold a seat on the National Advisory Health Manpower Council—to resign on the ground that our participation is in violation of this provision?

It seems to me that there are serious discrepancies between the report of the House Ways and Means Committee on this subject and the actual language of this section of H.R. 13270. The report states the following on page 33, beginning on line 10: "Your committee has determined that a tax should be imposed on expenditures by private foundations for various activities that it believes either should not be carried on by exempt organizations (such as lobbying, electioneering and 'grass roots' campaigning) or more appropriately are carried on by the other organizations."

I know of no private foundation that would take exception to this position. I know of no private foundation that would not subscribe to penalties for error in this regard. On the other hand, I see no correlation between this statement of purpose and the actual language of Section 4945(c) (1) and (2).

The same sort of discrepancy is to be noted between the Ways and Means Committee report and the Bill on the matter of communications with legislative officials and other persons. The Committee report states on page 33, beginning on line 22, that Section 4945(c)(2) "precludes direct attempts to persuade members of legislative bodies or governmental employees to take particular positions on specific legislative issues. It does not extend to discussions of broad policy problems and issues with such members or employees." (emphasis mine). The section referred to does not make explicit this point. In fact, the language simply prohibits any attempt to influence legislation and by whatever means, and extends the prohibition to "any other person" other than legislators "who may participate in the formulation of legislation." Once again, it seems to me, a limited objective is taken with an arsenal of weapons sufficient to kill off all but the most hardy of foundation officers and grantees who dare to have an opinion that might conceivably play some part in the formulation of legislation.

The provisions of this section of the Bill together with the harsh penalties provided for failure to comply with the law, can only have the effect of numbing foundation effort and driving foundation money away from the areas in our national life that currently give us most concern. Trustees are quite human in that they tend to avoid areas of controversy in the normal course of events. They serve in most instances without any compensation, and give freely of their time to consideration of the matters that come before them in the form of requests for aid. They are not likely to risk penalties, nor are they likely to permit their officers to take risks in areas where the law and the regulations are distinctly unclear. This would appear to be the general situation that we shall confront if H.R. 13270 is passed without significant amendments.

I am aware that some of the officials of the Treasury Department do not believe that the penalties set forth in the Act will be operative unless private foundation trustees or their managers "knowingly" act in support of partisan ends. It has been suggested that having available an opinion of counsel will protect any foundation board or its officers from assault at this point.

This seems to me a very uncertain reed upon which to lean. Quite obviously, an opinion from counsel on such a point is arguable from the standpoint of the facts in the case rather than the law. I doubt very much that the use of the word "knowingly" in the statute will give any aid and comfort to either Trustees or officers faced with the kinds of decisions involved. As in the earlier instance cited, the normal disposition of Trustees faced with such a dilemma is more likely than not to do nothing rather than take the necessary risks—with or without the benefit of advice of counsel.

It is of some importance, I believe, for this Committee to take into account that much of the business that comes to foundation offices these days originates in legislative action in the Congress. Hardly a day passes without a petition for aid from an agency that is in a strong position to ask a Federal grant if local sources of support for the matching requirement can be cited. This applies to local agencies of government, and even to state governments on occasion, as well as private agencies in the health, welfare and education fields. I have a dozen such requests on my hands at this moment, ranging from requests for a rehabilitation agency program to the building plans of one of the leading medical schools in the nation.

The nub of this particular matter is simply that the Government must either permit private foundations and private persons to continue to serve public purposes to the maximum extent possible or the Government must revise its matching requirements and fund more generously the costs of facilities and services very much in demand. Tax reform as it relates to foundations will come down in the final analysis to simply this.

No foundation officer or trustee is opposed to prohibitions against partisan activity by private foundations or by grantee organizations. We are well aware that the present law prohibits lobbying, electioneering, and grass-roots campaigning. We know, too, that proper enforcement of the law as it now stands would root out quickly any infractions. We are confident that full disclosure of all foundation activity is the appropriate way to achieve the purposes set forth in the House Ways and Means Report, and without endangering the crucial role that foundations must play in our national and local affairs.

What is not so evident, and is entirely missed by both the House Ways and Means Committee Report and the text of H.R. 13270, is that private foundations and other exempt organizations have less sanction in present law and regulations for presenting their views to public bodies than business organizations. Mortimer M. Caplin, former Commissioner of Internal Revenue, offers the following comment on this matter:

"Today, the policy justification of the present limitations on exempt organizations' legislative activities is questionable. Since 1962, profit-making businesses have been permitted to claim income tax deductions—as 'ordinary and necessary' business expenses—for financing legislative appearances and related activities which are closely connected with their business operations. The 1962 amendment to the Internal Revenue Code overruled the well-established case of Cammarano v. United States (358 U.S. 498), which had previously denied income tax deductions for this type of lobbying. As the Senate Finance Committee pointed out, it was felt to be desirable 'that taxpayers who have information bearing on the impact of present laws, or proposed legislation, * * * not be discouraged in making this information available to the Member of Congress or legislators at other levels of Government.'

"Congress thus recognized in 1962 that it was legitimate for business entities and the trade organizations they support to participate in lobbying for legislation of direct interest to them. Yet, if this is true for business entities, why isn't it equally valid for education and charitable organizations? This 1962 income tax relief for business suggests that Congress should reexamine the entire area of legislative activities of exempt organizations with a view to granting them a broader measure of freedom in the legislative sphere." (Foundation News: November 1968, pp. 162–163.)

It comes down to this in the most simple and direct terms. Business interests may lobby for their ends, secure tax deduction for the expenses involved, and may live comfortably with the view of the Senate Finance Committee that it is desirable that they do so. Private foundations and other exempt organizations do not have comparable privileges under present law and regulations. If H.R. 13270 is passed without amendment the rights of such exempt organizations will be further limited, perhaps to the point where they cannot make a significant contribution to the national interest.

Section 4945(f) (1) (2), and (3) set up the terms of private foundation responsibility for funds issued to non-profit agencies other than public charities. Severe penalties are provided for non-compliance for such foundations and for their managers.

The terms of this section suffer mainly from ambiguity. To continue to make grants to many of the organizations which are now our grantees, the Bill would require us to exercise "expenditure responsibility". This means that "the private foundation is fully responsible—1) to see that the grant is spent solely for the purpose for which made, 2) to obtain full and complete reports from the grantee on how the funds are spent, and to verify the accuracy of such reports, and 3) to make full and detailed reports with respect to such expenditures" to a designated government official.

Foundations request reports from agencies receiving grants, and would not hesitate to share such information with Treasury authorities. Every legitimate foundation, of course, wants to know whether its money has been spent wisely and faithfully, in line with the purposes for which the grant was given. But the amount of follow-up and inspection which the Bill requires is excessive, and perhaps even impossible to provide. How could the foundation in every instance "verify the accuracy" of the "full and complete reports from the grantee"? Moreover, the provision is unwise, for what would such supervision do to the hallowed and sound policy of non-manipulation of the grantee that every well-run foundation practices? To fulfill this requirement in full, a foundation would have to exercise a degree of continuing surveillance of a grantee's affairs that would be paternalistic and immensely expensive for any foundation and intolerable for any self-respecting grantee. It is surely a great way to enlarge foundation influence precisely at the point where foundations do not wish to exercise power.

Bearing in mind that the Federal Government and responsible foundations have a common goal—that of preventing irresponsibility—let us apply a rule of reason. Do not make up an insurer, with absolute liability for our grantee's conduct. Charge us instead with the responsibility of applying reasonable diligence to our relations with our grantees.

Summary of Statement of Hon. W. Russell Arrington

The thrust of Senator Arrington's testimony focuses on the problem of foundation supported groups that work to strengthen state government and in particular the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures. It is quite apparent that there is a national need for stronger and more effective state and local government.

The proposed section 4945 concerning influencing legislation may proscribe currently acceptable activities of the Citizens Conference. Senator Arrington stressed he was not an officer, trustee or employee of the Conference. Senator Arrington's interest is that the Conference's activities continue to be furnished to the state legislatures. Some of these activities include: 1) Provide advisory and technical services to some 16 state citizen commissions that study and recommend procedures for legislative modernization, 2) Conduct research and publish comparative information about legislative improvement, 3) Conduct media conferences to provide for an exchange between state legislators and editors, publishers, station owners and managers, and 4) Inform the public how the electorate has supported or rejected amendments concerning legislative articles of state constitutions.

H.R. 13270 will effectively prohibit these activities—even though these activities are non-partisan and do not involve elections for public office. If the "substantial activities" test is abandoned and section 4945 is substituted, the private sector may no longer be an impetus to bringing about legislative modernization.

Legislatures, by legislation, often request the Citizens Conference aid. That may be influencing legislation, even though the state asked for it. Every state legislator in the United States receives information from the Conference about the efforts to modernize. These activities may be prevented. The Conference brings the press and legislators together in the hope that they will influence one another. Undoubtedly legislation does get influenced in the process. Should this be proscribed?

Senator Arrington then goes on to make specific recommendations: 1) Distinguish between partisan and non-partisan and then go on to prohibit partisan activities and encourage non-partisan activities, 2) If legislation is procedural in the sense it affects structure of government encourage not prohibit involvement in legislative activities, 3) Use disclosure as the method of preventing abuses in the relationships between public officials and foundations, 4) Require foundations to be invited to testify or offer technical advice, and 5) Permit activities that are not engaging in support of or opposition to candidates that are general in nature rather than advocating particular legislation, and not partisan election campaigns.

Statement of Hon. W. Russell Arrington

Mr. Chairman, my name is W. Russell Arrington. For the record I am an attorney with offices in Chicago, Illinois. I am also Vice President and General Counsel of Combined Insurance Company as well as Director of Alberto Culver Company. I am President Pro Tempore and Majority Leader of the Illinois Senate, a member of the Executive Committee of the National Conference of State Legislative Leaders, the Executive Committee of the National Society of State Legislators and a member of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

My purpose in being here is to discuss the possible consequences the "Tax Reform Act of 1969" might have to the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures and to the national effort to modernize state legislatures.

Let me assure you that I am not a trustee or officer of the Citizens Conference—nor have I ever been. I am here as a concerned state legislative leader to point out to you some of the unintended consequences HR 13270, and primarily Section 4945, might have on the private sector's role in strengthening representative government at the state level.

First, let me explain my past involvement with the Citizens Conference. In 1965, the Illinois General Assembly created The Commission on the Organization of the General Assembly composed of legislators and public members. The Commission was charged with the task of examining the entire scope of legislative procedures and structure in Illinois to derive recommendations for improving the General Assembly. We were one of the first legislatures to take this step. Of the 87 recommendations this Commission felt would improve the General Assembly, 58 were adopted. The efforts of this Commission were a major input into what we consider to be one of the most effective state legislatures in the nation.

One of our problems in the beginning was the lack of a source of information about what legislatures elsewhere had found to be effective in dealing with their work. Another troublesome spot was the lack of advice as to how to proceed to maximize the effectiveness of the Commission itself. These deficiencies were soon solved by the Citizens Conference, an organization which was formed in 1965.

Other state commissions—about 16—have received major assistance from the Citizens Conference. In addition, the Conference dedicated itself to informing the public about the need for strengthening state legislatures.

Let me briefly describe the activities and character of The Citizens Conferences' program.

1. They are national, non-partisan and not-for-profit.
2. They encourage, assist, and provide advisory and technical services for state citizen groups working to support and improve the effectiveness of their legislature.
3. They conduct research and bring together comparative information about legislative improvement in the fifty states.
4. They conduct regional and single-state conferences which bring together state legislators with editors, publishers, broadcasting executives and civic leaders. The purpose is to provide a frank and candid exchange of views about legislative improvement.

The Citizens Conference does not participate in the drafting or construction of particular legislation. They do not lobby for particular legislation. Neither do they participate in campaigns for public office nor do they become involved in voter registration.

I don't feel it necessary to make a strong statement about the need for stronger and more effective state government. Many hearings conducted by this body have documented the need. The urban crises and the prospects of revenue sharing are just two major forces which require the states to participate in a joint partnership with the federal government. The thrust of my testimony concerns groups which are working to strengthen state government—organizations of which the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures is exemplar.

I have described their activities and their program. I doubt anyone here questions either the worthwhileness of their objectives or the means by which they advance them. Yet HR 13270 will proscribe most of their program. The bill, as written, will effectively prohibit the private sector from working to improve government at any level.

My testimony, then, concerns the proper relationship of 501(c)(3) organizations vis-a-vis governmental bodies—in specific, the issues which are involved in influencing legislation and elections.

HR 13270 would not allow the Citizens Conference to "carry out propaganda, or otherwise attempt to influence legislation . . . (1) through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public, (2) influence the outcome of any public election, and (3) influence legislation through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body."

This represents quite a departure from current laws and regulations which concern activities of tax-exempt groups. The current law recognizes the difficulty of forbidding completely contact with government bodies by tax-exempt groups by providing an area of discretion—the "substantial activities" test which is now applied to the issue of influencing legislation. The House Committee Report (HR 91-413 at page 32) suggests a reason for abandoning the substantial activities test for most 501(c)(3) organizations, as follows:

"Moreover, a large organization, merely because of the substantiality test, may engage without consequence in more lobbying than a small organization; a well-endowed organization may engage in lobbying and, if it loses its exempt educational or charitable status may avoid tax on its investment income by becoming exempt under another provision of the law."

Gentlemen, the dilemma facing the Citizens Conference under the provisos of HR 13270 is a very real one—it is unlikely state legislatures will be modernized unless public opinion is affected and unless legislation is enacted.

Let me give you an example. The Citizens Conference has written to each of the 7,616 state legislators telling them about the Conference's willingness to help them in improving their legislature. The Conference enclosed materials, such as The Chamber of Commerce of the United States' publication, Modernizing State Government, which explains the kinds of structural and procedural changes which could be made to improve the way in which legislatures conduct their business. Undoubtably, legislation resulted from this kind of contact. This, I suspect, may be defined as influencing legislation—an activity which is to be barred to a private foundation.

Some legislatures have passed resolutions creating advisory commissions similar to the one in Illinois which I previously described. In these resolutions, the legislatures have expressly called upon the assistance of the Citizens Conference. Such commissions rely heavily upon the materials, advice and technical assistance of the Citizens Conference. Technical assistance provided to commissions include providing consultants on internal operations of the legislative process, such as systems for preparing fiscal notes or more effective bill scheduling; consultants on commission organization, material distribution, and public relations are also provided. The Conference's staff is well versed on the methods by which commissions can be most effective. This expertise has been gained by working with many commissions and is invaluable to a commission which is just beginning. At the end of the study phase, these commissions recommend changes in the legislature of their state. When such recommendations are adopted, legislation is offtimes required. This, I suspect, may be construed to be influencing legislation.

The Conference conducts regional and single state media conferences—for civic leaders, press, radio and TV executives and legislators. The topic is legislative improvement and a forum is provided for a frank and candid exchange of views between parties sometimes viewed as natural adversaries. Editorials often result which encourage the legislature to take steps to modernize its way of working. Both the legislators and the media participants certainly would be considered to be those "who may participate in the formation of legislation." Editorials which may occur as a result of the conference may be viewed as an "attempt to affect the opinion of the general public." The net result of these conferences may be legislation which is influenced.

Let me take this opportunity to call your attention to an apparent inconsistency in the proposed law. Results of non-partisan analysis and research are allowed to "influence legislation." This same right does not apply to influencing elections. If the proposed "influencing election" section is limited to candidate elections, I see no problem. If, however, the 501(c)(3) organizations cannot make available results of non-partisan analysis or research during non-candidate elections such as constitutional amendments affecting the legislative branch, then the public is deprived of a major source of objective analyses of the issues upon which they must vote.

We must differentiate clearly and precisely between the connotations of "partisan" and "non-partisan." Although they appear to be semantical opposites they are not, nor are they operationally polar extremes. As they concern us today, they describe goals not in conflict, but goals in concert. I hope now to describe the distinction between the two as I see it relating to the influencing of legislation and/or elections.

I speak to you as a partisan. I firmly believe in partisanship in government. Partisanship is a strong factor in every decision I make on substantive issues that come before me as a member of the Illinois State Senate. But decisions regarding the fundamental structure of our basic political institutions, it seems to me, are not of the same generic family. Partisanship within the American political system does not come to bear on questions of how long the state legislature is in session, how it organizes its committee throughout a session or in the interim between sessions, the professional staff assistance provided committees and members, the size of the respective houses, the regulations describing ethical conduct, or the annual compensation a member should receive.

In a partisan sense, one cannot determine that the Wyoming legislature should meet 40 days every other year and the Massachusetts legislature sould meet in continuous session every year. When and how often a state legislature should meet must be based upon the time needed for the particular legislature to make intelligent policy decisions regarding its state's activities. Likewise, providing professional staff assistance to the legislature to insure that it can consider the most complete range of alternatives for the immediate and long-range view, does not gainsay the operation of partisanship within the legislature.

Too many of our state legislatures are so fettered by these non-partisan deficiencies in structure and procedures that their partisan decisions are reactions rather than action to meet their problems. They are impeded from innovating solutions or cures and are forced instead to apply bandaids to cancers. To correct these structural and procedural weaknesses often requires the passage of some legislation—legislation which is not substantive policy taking us a step closer to the opportunity for a good life for all a state's citizens, but legislation perhaps to remove a constitutional prohibition against annual sessions, or a limit on the amount of annual salary a legislator may be paid. We are not talking about the decision as to what to do with an egg—whether to boil it, scramble it, put it in a cake, or make a custard—but only the decisions regarding and guaranteeing that the chicken will produce the best possible of eggs.

The above distinctions lay the groundwork, I believe, for a revised bill—a bill which will allow organizations classified as private foundations to mobilize public support to study, recommend and change, if need be, governmental units. Safeguards, of course, need to be maintained. I have alluded to some— that the activity be non-partisan in nature, national in scope, that it not engage in support of or opposition to candidates, that the activity be general in nature rather than advocating particular legislation, and that partisan election campaigns be avoided.

Another safeguard which could be adopted would be disclosure of all financial transactions between a tax-exempt organization and government officials. Barring modest honoraria seems to me to be unduly restrictive. When an organization, for example, deals with legislative reform it is not unreasonable to look to legislators themselves as speakers or participants on programs.

Disclosure could also be applied to the potential problems of private communication with public officials. If there is a fear that private correspondence defeats the purposes of national taxing policies, let me suggest that I have found disclosure brings light to most relationships. As a public official I would think this is not too great a price to pay to keep open channels of communication and information with tax-exempt organizations.

Please understand that I appreciate the problems of writing a fair and equitable tax law. In Illinois we just went through that; it's not an easy task. I am asking you to recognize the nation's need to make our federal system work. This is one reason I serve on the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. The federal tax system should recognize and encourage the private sector's role in making government work at all levels. Foundations provide most of the seed money and project funds for many of the programs of this kind. Without foundation support, it is a safe bet that national organizations which provide the valuable cross-fertilization of ideas, research data and non-partisan analyses, advice and guidance about how to proceed could not sustain a program of either intensity or duration. We—all of us—benefit from these kinds of programs. Safeguards should exist to prevent possible abuses while encouraging maximum effort from the private sector.

The focus of my testimony has centered around the Citizens Conference and programs to improve our form of government. This, in large part, reflects my occupation, involvement and interests. I do not wish, however, to leave the impression that my complete concern is for just these kinds of organizations. I also want to point out other tax-exempt organizations provide a valuable service in other fields. Organizations who are concerned about the natural environment, criminal justice, regional planning, family planning, public health and housing need the same kind of consideration. We need to encourage public efforts in many fields.

Our pluralistic society needs vigorous discussion of issues. Such a process ought to be protected, even encouraged.

I trust that you, in the process of your critical evaluation, will arrive at these same conclusions. Current provisions may require some change. My concern is that the many do not suffer as a consequence of the acts of the few.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to present this testimony.

V. EFFECT OF DISTRIBUTION REQUIREMENTS (INCLUDING PROBLEMS RAISED BY DEFINITION OF QUALIFYING DISTRIBUTIONS)

SUMMARY OF STATEMENT OF DR. JULIUS A. STRATTON

This statement is addressed specifically to two aspects of H.R. 13270—the definition of a "private foundation" and the concept of qualifying contributions.

"Private foundation" is a term newly introduced to the Internal Revenue Code by the proposed legislation, lumping together for the first time as "private foundations" all 501(c)(3) organizations except certain specified categories. Because of this new definition, many important and worthwhile nonprofit institutions which are not primarily grant-making organizations, which depend heavily on foundation support, and which have never before been thought of as foundations may now be considered so and subject to the new restrictions in the bill.

There are three far-reaching consequences of such redefinition:

1. Such organizations would be subject to the proposed taxes, thereby reducing the funds available for their educational, research, and scientific activities.
2. They would be subject to the many other regulations and program limitations in the bill, limitations which earlier witnesses have discussed.
3. They would have far greater difficulty in obtaining support from philanthropic foundations.

Their difficulty in obtaining such support stems from another newly introduced term in the bill: "qualifying distributions."

Although the broad requirements of paying out current income would not cause serious problems for most foundations, difficulties arise because of the uncertainties surrounding who would be eligible to receive foundation grants and how these grants should be disbursed and managed.

Three general recommendations are made:

1. A more precise definition of "private foundations" should be formulated—a definition which would include only what have commonly and logically been regarded as philanthropic foundations.
2. A simple test should be established—based on a concept in the current Internal Revenue Code relating to operating foundations—under which grants that flow promptly to charity would be qualifying distributions.
3. The penalty provisions in the bill should be reconsidered.

Without clarifying changes of the sort suggested, the traditional role foundations have played in our national development may be seriously impaired.

STATEMENT OF DR. JULIUS A. STRATTON

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: In his opening statement Mr. J. Irwin Miller outlined very briefly the plan of our presentation relating to those sections of H.R. 13270 pertaining to private foundations. For this presentation it has been suggested that my own remarks be focused upon certain aspects of the proposed legislation—particularly the implications of the broadened definition of private foundations" and the consequences of the new concept of "qualifying distributions."

Before speaking to these specific points, however, I should like to say a more general and very personal word about foundations. I come before you with a deep concern for the future of philanthropy in our country and for the viability of many institutions whose very existence depends upon funds from private sources—institutions whose ideas and ideals are basic to our American concept of a democratic society. My own perspective of the needs and benefits of philanthropy has developed over the years that I have spent in the field of education, as a former provost and president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and as a trustee of various colleges and institutions cultivating the arts and the sciences. Then as a trustee of the Ford Foundation during the past fourteen years and as chairman of its Board since 1966, I have learned something at firsthand of the hazards and complexities as well as the satisfactions of giving. Out of this total experience I have come to the profound conviction that charitable foundations have an obligation to society that goes beyond a merely passive response to pleas for help. They have an obligation to search out new ways and means of meeting pressing needs in our society and supporting responsible institutions and organizations which have the impetence to help in resolving them. Foundations serve the highest national purpose in advancing our tradition of many roads to progress. To this end they must enjoy the freedom to encourage thoughtful experiment and to stimulate constructive innovation.

In saying all this, I do not mean to equate freedom with license. Every witness here today, I am sure, acknowledges the need for clear guidelines and standards of action. We recognize as well that these must be reviewed and revised as the concept of foundations evolves. My particular concern, however, is that some of the rules and guidelines set forth in the bill before you are difficult to interpret, with implications which I can only believe were neither foreseen nor intended, and which if enacted in their present form would have a devastating effect upon the contributions of American philanthropy to the public good.

Consider first the proposed definition of a "private foundation." This is a term newly introduced to the Internal Revenue Code by the proposed legislation. It is not found in the present Code, although tax specialists have used it, in a generic sense, to describe an organization to which contributions may be deducted only up to 20 percent of an individual's adjusted gross income (whereas contributions to certain other organizations may be deducted up to 30 percent).

Those familiar with the field of private philanthropy will recognize that a technical description of this sort is not intended to nor does it of course describe philanthropic foundations as we have come to know them over the past 50 years. Indeed it may be useful at this point to set forth briefly and in a wholly nontechnical way—what those of us who have worked in the foundation field for many years regard as the characteristics of a philanthropic foundation:

It is a nongovernmental organization

It is a nonprofit organization

It has a principal fund of its own

It is managed by an independent board of trustees

It is established essentially to make grants in support of educational, charitable, scientific, and civic organizations serving the public welfare.

In a sense, the present Code comes closer to a useful description, for under it philanthropic foundations are classified as 501 (c) (3) organizations; 501 (c) (3) of course is that section of the Code that includes organizations that are operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes and for those purposes are tax exempt. It should be noted that except for the so-called "20 percent limitation," foundations have always been considered in the same category as all other philanthropies.

In contrast, under the proposed bill—and here I do my best to summarize the pertinent provision—a private foundation is defined as any 501(c) (3) organization other than (1) the so-called 30 percent organizations described in Section 170 (b) (1) (B)—basically educational institutions, hospitals, government agencies, religious organizations, and publicly supported charities; and (2) those organizations which do not receive more than one-third of their support from their own investments and which do normally receive more than one third of their support from publicly-supported organizations or from individual contributions of less than $5,000.

It should be noted that this proposed new definition of a private foundation does not set forth the positive characteristics of a foundation; instead it lumps together for the first time as "private foundations" all 501(c) (3) organizations except certain specified categories. Moreover, the proposed legislation establishes a legal presumption that in the event of any uncertainty as to whether a 501(c) (3) organization is or is not a private foundation, it is to be considered one.

Because of the way "private foundation" is defined in the bill, many important and worthwhile organizations which are not primarily grant-making foundations—organizations which have never before been thought of as foundations—may now be considered private foundations subject to the many new restrictions in the bill.

Under the proposed definition, such distinguished institutions as The Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, the Brookings Institution, the Council on Library Resources, the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation, and the Population Council—all of which have made contributions of lasting significance to our society—might be classified as "private foundations." Why? Because they are 501(c) (3) organizations which would not meet the explicit tests set forth in the bill for exclusion from that category—tests to which I referred earlier. Yet they are, in fact, non-profit institutions of unquestioned merit which depend heavily on foundation support. The Institute for Advanced Study, for example, would become a private foundation under the bill because it does not have the specified characterists of an educational institution and it receives more than a third of its support from endowment income. As another example of the uncertainties as well as the problems created by the definition, let me quote from a letter which the Ford Foundation recently received from the American Academy of Arts and Sciences:

"We are uncertain about the effect of the bill on the American Academy. According to our performance over the past five years, we qualify as a "30%" organization on the basis of the "mechanical test" of the percentage of "public" support—which is about 40% of our income for each of the years during this period. The nature of our organization allows us also to qualify under the "facts and circumstances test" as a "30%" organization. At least our lawyers tell us that there is a high probability that we can be granted such an exemption. However, our sources of public support (most noteably, subscriptions to our journal, Daedalus) are relatively fixed or increase slowly. But we have been growing rapidly in terms of the number of projects and the percentage of our budget supported by private foundations, and consequently next year it is possible that much less than one-third of our income will come from public sources. One large grant from a major foundation could make a significant difference in our ability to pass the mechanical test. Thus, we cannot rely on exemption by the mechanito pass the mechanical test. Thus, we cannot rely on exemption by the mechanical test." (emphasis supplied)

One may ask, what difference does it make that hundreds of organizations like these might be reclassified as "private foundations"? The difference is quite tangible, with at least three far-reaching consequences. First, such organizations would be subject to the proposed taxes, thereby reducing the funds available for their educational, research, and scientific activities. Second, they would be subject to the many other regulations and program limitations in the bill, limitations which earlier witnesses have discussed. Third, they would have far greater difficulty in obtaining support from philanthropic foundations.

The difficulty they would meet in obtaining such support stems from another newly-introduced term in the bill: "qualifying distributions." Perhaps it is worth a moment to review the way in which the problem arises. H.R. 13270 contains provisions requiring regular and prompt distributions of income to charity. This objective is highly desirable, and responsible foundations support it fully. Indeed, taken as a whole, foundations last year paid out approximately 7.5 percent of their asset value.

We know of no one among responsible foundations who objects to the requirement of prompt distribution of income to charitable purposes, and there is also widespread agreement that some percentage of asset value, measured over some time-span, is a fair additional safeguard where investment income is very low in relation to capital assets. Moreover, in many cases—and the Ford Foundation is one—the proposed 5 percent rate is entirely acceptable, because the foundations concerned are already distributing, as the Ford Foundation does, at a substantially higher rate. But your Committee should be aware that there are a number of public spirited and effective foundations which would find it hard to meet a 5 percent requirement, especially when measured on a one-year basis, without a sudden change in investment policies whose long-run value for charity has been great. We do not believe that the 5 percent level has been adequately tested either by the Treasury or in the House against the real situation of such foundations, and we hope that the Committee will give careful attention to the arguments which it will receive from foundations which have a problem with the requirement as currently stated. It may well be that the main purpose of the requirement could be met more equitably by a slightly different rate, or by applying the rate to an asset value determined over a somewhat longer time-span.

In any event, it is clear that the broad requirement of paying out current income would not cause serious problems for most foundations. Rather, the problems arise because of the uncertainties surrounding who would be eligible to receive foundation grants and how these grants should be disbursed and managed. For having established the requirement that certain amounts be distributed each year, the bill then provides that only certain types of distributions will be considered to "qualify" for purposes of meeting the requirement—distributions in the main to "30 percent" organizations and to an imprecisely-defined new category called "operating foundation."

So far as we can tell from the pertinent provisions of the bill, it appears that grants to such organizations as the American Council of Learned Societies, Educational Facilities Laboratories, the International Legal Center, Resources for the Future, and the Social Science Research Council—organizations whose records of performance and accomplishment are widely known and respected—would fall outside the "qualifying distribution" category. This would have two harmful consequences:

First.—Grants to these organizations would not count in meeting the annual distribution requirements of a foundation.

Second.—Grants to such organizations would have to come out of a foundation's capital fund—the base of the income it uses for charitable purposes.

In the face of such economic constraints, foundations would clearly be reluctant to grant funds to such organizations. To be sure, such grants would not be prohibited; but they would not be qualifying distributions, and because foundations would be penalized if their qualifying distribution fell below the required level, the effect of the bill would be to discriminate against a newly created class of charities—organizations in our view illogically classified as private foundations.

Many other examples could be given. Individual foundations have developed special areas of philanthropic concern well known to all of us—like the Sloan Foundation's regular and substantial support of the Sloan-Kettering Institute of Cancer Research; the Rockefeller Foundation's assistance in the advancement of agriculture with the objective of increasing the world's food supply; the Carnegie Corporation's outstanding work in the field of education; the Guggenheim Foundation's encouragement of creative scholarship, research, and writing; the Markle Foundation's assistance in the development of medical education—and this is but to name a few. For many years, foundations have been the main support, often the sole support of productive activities of the kind I have cited.

The value in creating such philanthropic instruments for progress in human affairs is two-fold. Important work gets done through concentration on a single field, such as educational television, and secondly, the new entity provides an opportunity to develop a group of knowledgeable directors and specialists, completely independent of the donor foundation.

The "qualifying distribution" concept would also hamper philanthropic efforts to help communities, regions, and the nation as a whole meet new educational, cultural, and social needs. Experience has shown that it is often necessary to create new organizations and institutions to meet changing conditions and unforeseen challenges. On many occasions, it has been necessary for a single foundation, having embarked upon a particular course of charitable or educational development, to support a research center, an educational agency, or a specialized national agency for a number of years before it can muster wider support. This course might be substantially foreclosed under the bill, because one of the requirements in the definition of an "operating foundation" is that it must be supported by at least five philanthropies, with not more than 25 percent from a single source.

Let us look for a moment at a particular example, the National Merit Scholarships. This program, one of the most successful endeavors of its kind, was established in 1955 largely with the support of the Ford Foundation. It was designed to identify unusually able young people, to interest them in higher education, and to help as many as possible to attend the college or university of their choice. Through 1968, National Merit Scholarships valued at over $70 million have been awarded to 21,663 young men and women from every part of our country. Under the proposed legislation, the National Merit Scholarship organization would have been a "private foundation" at the time of its establishment because the bulk of its support came from one or two philanthropic foundations. Furthermore, in its early years this organization would not have qualified as an operating foundation. Today, National Merit has broader support and would qualify as a publicly-supported charity. But the point is that under the proposed legislation such an organization would probably not have come into existence in the first place. Surely this is not what the Congress intends.

Aside from their efficiency and effectiveness, new and capable institutions devoted to a well-defined purpose are also a means of assuring that control of innumerable operating organizations is not lodged in the larger foundations. That such foundations have voluntarily decentralized in this manner should be noted as evidence of their conscious and affirmative intention to avoid excessive centralization even in the absence of legislation. Permit me to dwell another moment on the question of responsibility, which seems to be a recurrent thread of concern in many provisions of the bill. I speak to the subject from a personal standpoint, having been privileged, as I noted earlier, to serve as a trustee of a major foundation. Experience has taught me that there is no better way to insure responsibility in fund management and to develop innovative approaches to complex and unsolved problems than to establish a group of capable, dedicated persons devoted to such activity. A good example is the Council on Legal Education for Professional Responsibility, an organization which has done so much to advance clinical law teaching. The Council has on its board such distinguished lawyers as Edward Levi, president of the University of Chicago, Whitney North Seymour, William T. Gossett, and Orison S. Marden. Chief Justice Warren Burger in a speech given in San Francisco several weeks ago, described the Council as—

> A concept devised by lawyers, implemented by lawyers, and financed by the private sector including lawyers and Bar Associations and great philanthropic institutions. This is the American Way of progress and it is better and more enduring than ad hoc improvements imposed by acts of Congress or mandates of courts.

In the same way, Resources for the Future, an organization supported almost entirely by the Ford Foundation, has operated under the management of a board of able men deeply interested in the problems of preserving our natural resources.

I cite these examples to stress the importance of writing legislation that will encourage—not discourage—the continued creation of new philanthropic organizations, with independent boards of their own, to meet new and changing situations in a dynamic society. One advantage of foundations is their flexibility and capacity to respond to challenges promptly and responsibly. Not in the spirit of criticism but as a result of my own participation over the years in various governmental activities, I am convinced that in many important ventures foundations are in a position to act constructively and well in advance of government. The scale of support is necessarily more limited, but the significance of foundation involvement is often substantial. And what is quite telling in this respect is that government itself at all levels—federal, state, and local—recognized and values this capability in foundations. In many instances, ideas for foundation action have in fact come from legislators and government officials, and indeed from time to time government draws on the experience and expertise that professional staff members in foundations have acquired in particular matters. These advantages could be lost if the philanthropic foundations—confronted with the problem of qualifying distributions, a problem compounded by the definition of private foundations—were to take on huge staffs of their own and attempt to operate directly over a broad spectrum of program areas.

The foregoing and the points on which other witnesses have stressed the need for clarification underscore the need for a continuing effort to match the specifics of a crucial legislative action to the underlying Congressional intent. I make this judgment in respectful understanding of the vast labor already expended by the Congress in the whole of the tax reform bill and of the enormous tasks still ahead of you. But in conseqences for society, I earnestly believe these points deserve your close attention.

I may seem to have emphasized too much the problems which relate to the large foundations, but the questions which I have raised affect even the smallest of foundations. For instance, the decision of small foundations. For instance, the decision of a small foundation to make a reatively substantial grant in support of a symphony or library in a particular community might, under the proposed language, ironically create problems for the recipient. For one thing, the beneficiary of a major grant from the single source might then be in danger of slipping into the category of a private foundation and thus be subject to the proposed tax; further the beneficiary might become ineligible for "qualifying distributions" from philanthropic foundations. I do not believe these are results the Congress intends.

As possible guidelines for your review of the several provisions in the bill to which I have referred, I would respectfully like to make three general recommendations.

First.—I believe that a more precise definition of "private foundations" should be formulated. Without presuming to suggest the specific language of such a definition, I do state my belief that far too many organizations are included in the definition as it now stands. I believe that language can be found to describe the nature and activities of such organizations as the Council on Library Resources, the Brookings Institution, and the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation—language that will clearly distinguish them from grant-making foundations. In my view many of the difficulties in the present bill could be remedied by a more precise definition of "private foundations"—a definition which would include only what have commonly and logically been regarded as philanthropic foundations.

Second.—The objective of a prompt and regular flow of funds to charity might be more readily achieved—and without unintended and harmful consequences—by establishing a simple test based on a concept in the same section of the current Internal Revenue Code from which the definition of an "operating foundation" is derived. The basic principle of that provision is that grants to an organization which then promptly applies the funds to charitable purposes are "qualifying" contributions. Under such a provision, grants for endowment—that is, capital sums which are then invested by the grantee in income-producing securities and thus not promptly expended—would not constitute qualifying distributions (except for the "30 percent" organizations and publicly-supported charities) ; on the other hand, grants for operating funds would always qualify provided they were expended in some reasonable length of time for charitable purposes. Such a relatively simple test would, it seems to me, meet the justified concern of the Congress that there be a prompt and regular flow of foundation funds to charity.

Third.—The penalties imposed on the trustees and officers of foundations in certain instances are extremely severe and seem to me to be out of proportion to the possible offenses. For example, a heavy tax is imposed on any "foundation manager" who violates the vaguely-defined prohibition against investments that "jeopardize the carrying out of any of . . . (a foundations's) exempt purposes." Harsh penalties are also imposed on "foundation managers" when foundations take actions which may subsequently be interpreted as contrary to other provisions in the bill. I am concerned that the uncertainties that hang over what might otherwise seem the most proper and legitimate actions—combined with the severity of the potential penalties—will make it difficult for foundations to find and to hold the caliber of directors and trustees so essential to their well-being and effectiveness. And, perhap as importantly, I fear that the balance will be tipped against innovation and experiment. These institutions, with men of sound judgment and practical experience managing them, should be prized for their ability and willingness—after careful study and the exercise of their best judgment—to try new ideas. It is that invaluable asset—not found widely in our society—which seems to me to be threatened. Therefore, I strongly urge this Committee to reconsider the penalty provisions in the bill.

To sum up: Without some clarifying changes of the sort suggested, Congress may seriously impair the traditional role foundations have played in our national development. The restrictions are such that this nation might be deprived of resources which have yielded effective and sound approaches to pressing problems. The question has periodically been raised, why not let these tax-exempt funds revert to the Treasury and let government carry out these vital activities? The answer is imbedded in a deep philosophical vision of the kind of society we wish to have. From the time of our founding as a nation, the American people have sustained their faith in the value of having other forces at work besides the government. Diversity and pluralism have been more than symbolic words; these concepts have always had deep meaning to us as a people. Moreover, there is little evidence that government is always ready to seize the initiative and to take substantial risks in uncharted areas not only in science and medicine, but also in the social sciences and education.

I firmly believe that the times ahead will test, more severely than any in our history, the strength of our democratic institutions. This is hardly the moment to restrict the capacity of the private sector of our society to meet greater and greater challenges.

Summary of Statement of Mr. Whitney North Seymour

Mr. Seymours statement is directed primarily toward that portion of H.R. 13270 which deals with the definition of an operating foundation.

He describes the organization and work of the Council on Library Resources, an independent, non-profit organization established in 1956 for the sole purpose of aiding in the solution of library problems. Qualifications of staff and Board are cited, to underscore the professional quality of the Councils work. He says that the Council conforms in every sense with the spirit of the proposed legislation. It engages in no self-dealing activities, all of its income is spent in furthering the purpose for which it was formed, it has no endowment, it controls no businesses, it owns no stock. He says it can best be defined in the words of the House Report accompanying H.R. 13270 to describe operating foundations: "organizations which have developed an expertise in certain substantive areas and which provide for the independent granting of funds and direction in those specialized substantive areas."

However, he fears that the language of H.R. 13270 defining operating foundations, eligible to receive qualifying distributions from other foundations, might mean that the Council might possibly be forced to terminate its greatly-needed activities. Although the Council meets unreservedly the provision that all of its income be expended directly for the active conduct of the activities for which it was organized, it cannot devote more than half of its assets to this purpose since it has no "assets" as indicated by the examples in the House Report, and its support comes entirely from one source, the Ford Foundation. Thus, although philosophically the Council is an operating foundation, it might not be considered so under the definition which seems to be established by the legislation.

Mr. Seymour expresses his concern on similar grounds in regard to the International Legal Center, and describes the Center's purpose and organization. He points out that its accomplishments would not have been possible without the initial underwriting provided by the Ford Foundation, that a non-profit service-type organization cannot become viable from inception or even launched without such financial backing. The Center, like the Council, might be placed in jeopardy by ambiguities in the provisions of the bill now before the Committee. In this connection, he asks the Committee to clarify that portion of the definition of an operating foundation which refers to assets, and to the word "directly" as applied to the use of assets.

The Congress' concern that some activities of some foundations may not have conformed with the intent of the original legislation is appreciated. Mr. Seymour expresses the belief that it cannot be the Congress' intent to disrupt the efforts in the public interest of organizations like the Council and the Center. He urges the Committee to consider carefully and rewrite the provisions he has cited in such a way as to eliminate the evils which called them into being, and at the same time clarify them so that the effectiveness of honorable and essential institutions may not be destroyed.

Statement of Mr. Whitney North Seymour

My name is Whitney North Seymour. I am a partner in the law firm of Simpson, Thacher & Bartlett, New York, a past president of the American Bar Association, and chairman of the Board of Directors of the Council on Library Resources. I also serve as chairman of the Board of the International Legal Center, an independent fund with a similar organization to that of the Council but, as is obvious, of different purpose. I am also a member of the Boards of other organizations concerned in the fields of legal education, research, and public service. We are grateful to the Committee for giving us the opportunity to present testimony directed toward that portion of H.R. 13270 which deals with the definition of an operating foundation.

The Council on Library Resources is a not-for-profit organization incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia and qualifying as a tax-exempt institution under 501(c)(3) of the 1954 Internal Revenue Code. It is an entirely independent organization—maintaining its own staff, program, and headquarters—established in 1956 for the sole purpose of aiding in the solution of library problems, particularly those of research and academic libraries. An initial Ford Foundation grant of five million dollars was succeeded late in 1960 by one of eight million dollars for an additional seven-to-ten year period, and a third grant of five million dollars has recently been made for the three-year period ending June 30, 1971. These funds have been spent on a current basis and have not been available for an endowment.

For the most part the Council has carried forward its purpose through grants to institutions, supporting innovative programs which show promise of helping to solve some of the many problems that beset libraries, in a country and at a time when demands upon them increase in almost geometric progression. We live in a world where information is an essential commodity; our libraries must be prepared to play a vital role in collecting and disseminating that information in a manner that keeps pace with the rate at which it develops.

In the years of its existence the Council has made grants of over thirteen million dollars to support approximately 450 projects. Recipients have included professional organizations and learned societies, public and special-purpose libraries, institutions of higher education, as well as a limited number of individuals with special qualifications. Agencies of the Federal Government have also been assisted by Council funds, for it is often the case that the best method for dealing with a problem area consists in helping or encouraging some Federal agency to take a needed action or to develop a needed service. Members of this important Committee understand better than most the necessary delays in the establishment of programs which are imposed by the legislative and administrative processes. We of the private sector may move more quickly, particularly in experimental or developmental activities. Thus support from the Council on Library Resources has in many instances made possible pioneering efforts in Federal libraries, efforts which have had important and far-reaching positive effects on the entire library community.

For example, the Council's assistance has been a principal factor in the automation efforts at the Library of Congress and, by extension, the libraries of this and other countries. As you gentlemen well know, the operations of all libraries are to a varying degree dependent upon those of the library of Congress. Ever since the establishment of the program to furnish catalog cards to libraries in the early part of the century, standardization of procedures and processes in libraries has depended upon its leadership. A 1961 grant to the Library for a general study of automation has been followed by others at each successive stage of development, and the Library is now engaged with Council help, in the important work of putting current and some retrospective bibliographic records into machine-readable form for the benefit and use of the entire library community. Similarly, a series of Council grants enabled the National Library of Medicine to develop MEDLARS, an outstanding example of automation applied to bibliographic and information retrieval tasks. The work of the National Archives and Records Service and of the National Bureau of Standards has also been furthered by the Council's help.

We have no wish to fill the record by describing at length the many other accomplishments achieved through Council grants. Perhaps a brief listing of some of the areas in which the Council has operated will provide an overview of its influence. Because of the Council's interest, important work has been accomplished in such fields as bibliographic apparatus and techniques, book selection and evaluation, development of permanent/durable paper, perservation and restoration of library materials, storage and retrieval of information, standardization of library techniques, interlibrary cooperation and coordination, administration and management . . . these are only a sampling. The projects have been carried out by over two hundred institutions and individuals, ranging alphabetically from the American Academy of Sciences to Yale University, and including such recipients as the American Library Association, the Southwest Missouri Library Service, the New York Public Library, the New England Board of Higher Education, the American Association of Law Libraries. Annual reports have been published for each year of the Council's existence, and we will be happy to furnish them to the Committee if it wishes.

One further point should be made here about the work of the Council, which goes well beyond the grant-making function. The counsel and advice given by the staff, in correspondence and in interviews, have been of inestimable value to library people beyond number. For much of the library community has developed the habit of turning to the Council on Library Resources for assistance in problem-solving even when no grants or projects are involved.

The staff which provides this counsel and advice is now and has always been a highly professional one, well qualified to evaluate, initiate, encourage, and monitor the innovative programs which have had such a beneficent influence. On the staff are men who have served as Deputy Librarian of Congress, Director of the National Agricultural Library, Director and Principal Librarian of the British Museum, Director of the study of the National Advisory Commission on Libraries. Dr. Fred C. Cole, who has been the Council's president since 1967 and a member of its Board of Directors since 1962, is a scholar of note and past president of Washington and Lee University. Other staff members are expected in computers, systems development, and microforms—areas of prime importance in the constant evolution of libraries.

The Board of Directors is composed of distinguished professionals: librarians, scientists, educators. They provide a resource of incalculable value. Let me list them here:

Lyman H. Butterfield, Editor-in-Chief of the Adams Papers
Verner W. Clapp, former Deputy Librarian of Congress, past president of the Council
Dr. Fred C. Cole, president
James S. Coles, President of the Research Corporation
William S. Dix, Director of the Princeton University Library, President of the American Library Association
Frederick Hard, President Emeritus of Scripps College
Caryl P. Haskins, President of the Carnegie Institution of Washington
John A. Humphry, Assistant Commissioner for Libraries, New York State
Joseph C. Morris, physicist, Vice-President Emeritus of Tulane University
Philip M. Morse, Professor of Physics, Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Whitney North Seymour, Chairman
Robert Vosper, Director of the Library, University of California at Los Angeles, and Professor of Library Science
Frederick H. Wagman, Director of the University of Michigan Library
Herman B. Wells, Chancellor of Indiana University
Louis B. Wright, Vice-Chairman, Director Emeritus of the Folger Shakespeare Library

All, by profession and philosophy, are dedicated to the purpose for which this Council was formed.

Should the Committee wish, we would be pleased to furnish statements from the world's leading librarians, educators, and information scientists testifying to the Council's dynamic role as catalyst in the essential improvement of library services during the last thirteen years.

But under H.R. 13270, now before your Committee, the Council on Library Resources might well be forced to terminate its greatly-needed activities. The Council conforms in every way with the spirit of the legislation. We engage in no self-dealing activities. All of our income is spent in furthering the purpose for which the Council was formed. We have no endowment; we control no businesses; we own no stocks. The Council can best be defined in the words used by the House Report accompanying H.R. 13270 to describe operating foundations: "organizations which have developed an expertise in certain substantive areas and which provide for the independent granting of funds and direction of research in those specialized substantive areas."

However, as the bill is now written, it is possible that the Council might not be considered an operating foundation. The legislation provides that an operating foundation, eligible to receive qualifying distributions from other private foundations, is an "organization substantially all of the income of which is expended directly for the active conduct of the activities constituting the purpose or function for which it is organized and operated." This provision the Council meets unreservedly.

But the bill then prescribes two further tests of eligibility. Such an organization must either (1) devote more than half of its "assets" directly to such activities or to functionally related activities, or both, or (2) receive substantially all of its support from five or more exempt organizations, or from the general public, and not more than 25 per cent of the support may be from any one such exempt organization. In regard to the first alternative, the Council on Library Resources has limited assets, other than intangible ones. It has its grant, which is received quarterly and expended currently, and it has the usual furnishings, equipment, books, supplies required for its daily operation. As concerns the second alternative, its support has come entirely from one source, the Ford Foundation. Thus, if the sections I have cited above were to be strictly interpreted, the Council might not be considered an operating foundation. The cost of its continued support by the Ford Foundation under these circumstances would be increased to a point where it might become infeasible.

I am also concerned on similar grounds with possible adverse effects on another organization of which I am also Chairman, the International Legal Center. The Center was established in late 1966, under a grant from the Ford Foundation, as a non-governmental, non-profit organization. Its headquarters are in New York City and its activities are worldwide.

The primary objective of the Center is to cooperate with the developing countries in their efforts to reform legal education, to improve the competence of the legal profession, and to strengthen legal institutions, within the general framework of each country's legal system and tradition as well as its contemporary needs. The Center seeks as well to increase in the United States and in other developed countries knowledge of and competence in dealing with the legal issues inherent in the process of development. In brief, the Center believes that the time has come for a vigorous and systematic re-appraisal of the role of law and lawyers in the process of development and in the building of modern nations.

For the most part the Center's staff abroad are engaged in the fields of legal education and legal research. A few examples of activities may be in order.

Chile is engaged in a nation-wide effort to make legal education, the legal profession, and the substance of the law more relevant to its development needs. The Center is collaborating in this effort with the active participation of Stanford University and other law schools in the United States. Under the program, a number of Chilean law teachers, law librarians, and deans are brought to the United States, and several American lawyers spend up to two years in Chile improving their own skills and comprehension of the problems of law and development.

In Africa, new law faculties and other institutions of legal education are now being established or strengthened with the assistance of American and European lawyers. During 1968, the Center sponsored 23 such lawyers in 11 African countries, supported in the United States and Europe a number of African law graduates who were preparing for teaching careers, provided financial assistance to make possible continent-wide African Law Reports, and sponsored a summer program offered by the African Law Center at Columbia University.

The Center has just negotiated a contract with the US/AID for the purpose of strengthening Korean legal institutions and encouraging the participation of the Korean legal profession in continuing legal education activities. We are pleased that the US/AID is turning to the Center, as the Department of State has done in the past, to carry out projects for which the Center has a special competence.

It is important to recognize that all this would not have been possible without the initial underwriting provided by the Ford Foundation. A non-profit, service-type organization cannot become viable from inception or even launched without such financial backing. During the first year of operation, the Center was almost entirely financially dependent upon the Foundation. In the second year, this dependency was reduced to 95 per cent. The projection for the current year is that a further reduction to around 80 per cent financial dependency can be anticipated. In due course it is expected that the Center will no longer require underwriting.

It should be stressed that the Center is independent in character regardless of the origins of its financial support. This is a source of its strength in working overseas in such a sensitive field as law and development. The Center is governed by a Board of Trustees which includes, in addition to myself, the following individuals:

Aron Broches, General Counsel, International Bank for Reconstruction and Development
Sir George Coldstream, formerly Permanent Secretary to the Lord Chancellor and Clerk of the Crown in Chancery
Robert K. A. Gardiner, Executive Secretary, United Nations Economic Commission for Africa
Felipe Herrera, President, Inter-American Development Bank
John B. Howard, President, International Legal Center
Joseph E. Johnson, President, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace
Milton Katz, Director, International Legal Studies, Harvard University
Edward H. Levi, President, University of Chicago
Max F. Millikan, Director, Center of International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology
Victor H. Palmieri, Lawyer and business consultant
Howard C. Petersen, Chairman of the Board, Fidelity Bank
Walter J. Schaefer, Justice, Illinois Supreme Court
Carl B. Spaeth, Chairman, Committee on International Studies, Stanford University

As in the case of the Council on Library Resources and other organizations to which reference has been made in these hearings, the future of the International Legal Center would be placed in jeopardy by a strict interpretation of the definition of an operating foundation as it appears in H.R. 13270. To qualify, the Center (and other similar organizations) must expend substantially all of its income directly for the activities constituting its exempt purposes (which it does) and either devote substantially more than one-half of its assets directly to such exempt purposes, or receive not more than 25 per cent of its support from any one organization.

At present, the Center receives more than 25 per cent from one organization. It is not likely that it could otherwise have come into existence. Therefore, to qualify as an operating foundation, it must meet the "assets test." The Center's assets consist solely of its working balances and its office equipment. If such assets can be considered as meeting the criterion that would qualify the Center and similar bodies as operating foundations, there would appear to be no difficulties except as might arise from the use of the word "directly". Such organizations should be able to carry out their exempt purposes, where that can be done best, through chosen instruments like universities. If such instruments would not be regarded as within the word "directly," some modification should be made so that such choice of instruments for carrying out exempt purposes would not prejudice the exemption. Either the proposed legislation should be clarified on these questions or there should be some statement on record providing the clarification as a matter of legislative history. At present, the ambiguity in the proposed bill is such that many worthy organizations could be put out of operation and others prevented from being started. I cannot believe that this is the intent of the drafters of this bill.

As a lawyer who has taken a particular interest in the improvement of the profession and the service it renders to the public, I cannot fail to mention here two other organizations which would find their activities in the public interest similarly jeopardized by the proposed legislation. Of one, the National Defender Project of the National Legal Aid and Defender Association, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger had this to say in a recent address:

"It has been good, very good . . . to see the American Bar Association and other legal bodies support the National Defender Program because the positive consequence is that we will ultimately have adequate public defender services provided wherever they are needed . . . One of the great things about the development of legal aid and defender programs and the post graduate seminars to train lawyers for these new tasks is that they are private and volunteer efforts of the Profession. The concept is one devised by lawyers, implemented by lawyers and financed by the private sector including lawyers and Bar Associations and great philanthropic institutions.

"This is the American Way of progress and it is better and more enduring than ad hoc improvements imposed by acts of Congress or mandates of courts."

At another point in this address, pointing up the need for further improvement in legal education, the Chief Justice emphasized that: "The recent development of law teaching through 'clinics' is one of the great new steps in legal education since Langdell's 'case method.' With Ford Foundation support, many law schools have begun to offer courses in various fields of law through the 'clinical method,' exposing students to the living problems of living clients as part of the learning process. Now Congress, in Title XI of the Higher Education Act of 1965, has authorized generous appropriations for similar programs in still other schools."

Since 1963 the Ford Foundation has made grants totalling $6.1 million to the National Legal Aid and Defender Association. In 1968 the Foundation's Trustees made an appropriation of $5.4 million over a five-year period for the establishment of the Council on Legal Education for Professional Responsibility, which is engaged in grant-making in support of clinical and internship law school programs. I have the privilege of serving on the Boards of both of these organizations.

We have not yet said, and will do so now, that we can understand the Congress' concern that some activities ofsome foundations may not have conformed with the intent of the original legislation. We heartily agree that such practices must be checked. We understand also that in drafting legislation some arbitrary standard or furmula must be established and some very fined lines drawn. However, it appears to us that if these particular guidelines are not reconsidered and broadened, a great many organizations that have made contributions of value in almost every area of concern to this Congress and to this country may be in a very difficult position indeed. For of course the organizations I have mentioned are not the only ones with special expertise which might be affected by the legislation as written.

We cannot believe that in drafting these provisions the distinguished members of the Ways and Means Committee and the House of Representatives intended to disrupt the efforts in the public interest of the Council, the Center, and other similarly situated organizations. We earnestly urge that the members of this Committee consider carefully and rewrite the provisions in such a way as to eliminate the evils which called them into being, and at the same time clarify them so that the effectiveness of honorable and essential institutions may not be destroyed.

VI. RESTRICTIVE EFFECTS ON THE DEVELOPMENT OF PHILANTHROPY AND OPERATION OF FOUNDATIONS (INCLUDING EFFECTS OF "EXPENDITURE RESPONSIBILITY" AND HEAVY PENALTY ON TRUSTEES)

SUMMARY OF STATEMENT OF MR. DANA S. CREEL

1. The proposed sanctions in H.R. 13270 are excessive and:
   (1) Include very substantial penalty taxes on foundations which would have the ultimate effect of diminishing funds available for distribution to legitimate philanthropic activities;
   (2) Subject management, both staff and trustees, to very substantial personal liabilities, which would greatly reduce the ability of foundations to attract the best caliber of trustees and staff; and
   (3) Create onerous and in some cases impossible requirements on foundation administration.
2. It is suggested that a substantially modified philosophy and system of sanctions be adopted having the ultimate end of promoting and strengthening philanthropic endeavor in our society.
3. An approach along these lines is as follows:
   (1) Penalties should be imposed on foundations but only on the wrongdoers, recognizing that a foundation is inanimate and can function only by acts of individuals.
   (2) Penalties should be flexible, reasonable in nature, with maximum limit, and appropriately related to the acts (or failures to act) which are penalized.
   (3) Proscribed acts (or failures to act) should be defined with sufficient clarity to enable the decision-makers to determine, without undue complexity and at the time of decision, whether any act (or failure to act) constitutes a transgression.
   (4) A procedure should be established providing for notice of a proposed penalty, with opportunity for correction within a reasonable period before application of the penalty.
   (5) A reasonable statute of limitations should be made clearly applicable to penalties.

If an approach along these general lines can be substituted for the system of monetary penalties contained in H.R. 13270, I believe that the Congress will have come much closer to meeting its announced goal of developing sanctions which provide "a more rational relationship to improper acts". And in terms of the ability of private foundations to perform in the highest public interest, I believe that such a change is crucial.

STATEMENT OF MR. DANA S. CREEL

My role is to introduce the subject of the effect on philanthropy of certain of the penalties and administrative responsibilities imposed on foundations by H.R. 13270.

My purpose is not to review these provisions in any detail, but rather to discuss the overall effect of the prescribed penalties for their violation.

The announced objective of the Ways and Means Committee in enacting these penalties was to "provide a more rational relationship between sanctions and improper acts . . ."[1] without necessarily resorting to the revocation of exemption, which is generally regarded as too extreme a penalty in the vast majority of situations.

I wholeheartedly subscribe to this stated objective of the Ways and Means Committee.

However, it would seem that the penalties and remedies proposed do not meet these stated objectives. They are excessive in many cases and tend to diminish the funds of foundations available for the support of legitimate philanthropy, instead of concentrating on preventing or rectifying the transgression. (See Exhibit A, attached, for summary of proposed sanctions.)

I believe that the proposed system of penalties has many shortcomings. To be specific, the sanctions:

(1) Include very substantial penalty taxes on foundations which would have the ultimate effect of diminishing funds available for distribution to legitimate philanthropic activities;

(2) Subject management, both staff and trustees, to very substantial personal liabilities, which would greatly reduce the ability of foundations to attract the best caliber of trustees and staff; and

(3) Create onerous and in some cases impossible requirements on foundation administration.

In conjunction with some of the questionable substantive provisions which others have discussed, these sanctions coupled with the lack of clarity as to what is prohibited and what is permitted will, in my judgment, drive foundations from the forefront of philanthropic endeavor, which is their logical arena, stultify management, foreshadow a diminishing role for foundations, with possible extinction an end result.

Let me illustrate by considering the effect of the proposed sanctions as they relate to the three headings I have mentioned before.

1. Substantial penalty taxes on foundations would have the ultimate effect of diminishing the funds available to legitimate philanthropic activities.—There are six types of proposed sanctions on foundations, ranging from a tax of 5 percent of the value of excess business holdings for each year held, up to an income tax on the termination of private foundation status equal to the entire net assets of the foundation. For the government to take away the assets of a foundation is not in the interest of philanthropy. It is the ultimate beneficiaries of the foundation funds that really suffer from this kind of punitive provision.

2. Subjecting foundation managers, both staff and trustees, to very substantial personal liabilities would greatly reduce the ability of foundations to attract the best caliber of staff and trustees and will inevitably render them cautious and unimaginative.—The proposed sanctions on foundations managers range from 2½ percent of the amount involved in a self-dealing transaction for each year until corrected (with a maximum of $10,000 per act) up to a tax of 200 percent or more of the amount involved if correction is not made within the 90-day notice period. Even more drastic, there is an overlap of "disqualified persons" and "foundation managers" in the penalty provisions on self-dealing which literally could be read to tax a foundation manager initially at 7½ percent and additionally at 250 percent.

An even greater personal liability is contained in the sanctions involved in connection with taxable expenditures, where the foundation manager is subject to a 50 percent penalty for each taxable expenditure. It is not unusual for a foundation to make grants of several hundred thousand dollars or more. For example, suppose that a foundation makes a grant of only $100,000 which is determined on audit to be a taxable expenditure affecting the legislative process. This would mean a tax of $50,000 on a foundation manager. This patently is an unrealistic penalty, particularly since it relates to the nebulous and uncertain definition of what is meant by "influencing legislation."

In this area, it is very easy to make a misjudgment. Consider for example, the question of what is non-partisan analysis and research. If the grantee is conducting "non-partisan analysis and research", a grant would be permissible. If not, a grant would be a prohibited taxable expenditure. The trouble is that grants are matters of judgment which can be second-guessed upon audit in the light of hindsight and subsequent developments over which the foundation manager has no control.

Another example of the unreasonableness of the proposed penalty structure relates to the making of an investment which is later determined after audit to have been made in such manner as to jeopardize the carrying out of any of the foundation's exempt purposes. It is possible in such a case for the penalties to to pyramid in the following way: The basic penalty of 100 percent of the amount of the investment is to be imposed upon the foundation and presumably at the same time a 50 percent tax would be imposed on any foundation manager who "participated" in the making of such an investment if he had knowledge that the investment jeopardized any of the foundation's exempt purposes. The foundation might also be subjected to another 100 percent tax and the manager to another 50 percent tax if the amount paid or incurred in making the investment is held to be a "taxable expenditure" on the ground that the investment did not fulfill a purpose specified in § 501(c)(3).

Moreover, if the foundation manager has previously been liable for one of these taxes, a further penalty of 100 percent might also be imposed upon him and 100 percent penalty also could be imposed on the foundation under similar circumstances. As a final cap to the pyramid, if a foundation's investments giving rise to these penalties should be deemed "willful repeated acts", regardless of the amount invested, forced termination can be imposed and the assets of the foundation can be confiscated under the guise of a tax on termination of foundation status.

While it is quite true, with respect to a foundation manager, that the bill incorporates a subjective test of knowledge—whether actual knowledge or constructive knowledge is required is not clear—as a condition precedent to liability, this condition will provide little practical protection against penalties asserted with the benefit of hindsight. The circumstances under which any foundation portfolio is managed—particularly in the light of the pressures which will result for higher yield investments caused by the required percentage distribution rules—could produce hindsight judgments that a given investment did jeopardize the foundation's exempt purposes and, indeed, that the management had knowledge of this fact. Such a possibility is perilously real for those foundations which make investments in economically blighted communities as part of a laudable program of fostering free enterprise where normal credit lines are not available. Other more conventional investments are not immune from the same destructive scrutiny. In a word, every dollar of a foundation's assets becomes a target for devasting second-guessing as to purposes. The inhibitive consequences of this provision are too clear for further comment. These obviously would be awesome obstacles to the recruitment of the highest quality staff and the service of distinguished individuals as trustees.

These liabilities apply not only to professional staff but to trustees and other persons, and it must be borne in mind that in any acts involving these penalties which also involve a breach of fiduciary responsibility, "foundation managers" would also be subject to an additional liability through surcharge under state equity jurisdiction.

3. The proposed sanctions would create onerous burdens of administration, in some cases impossible to achieve. Additional administrative work is required to comply with the requirements of full disclosure and reporting, and with this there should be no question since it is a thoroughly legitimate requirement for a tax-exempt organization.

However, there are two requirements that are unreasonably burdensome, if not actually impossible of achievement.

The first of these relates to penalty taxes on "self-dealing" between a foundation and a wide range of "disqualified persons", other than foundation managers. An initial penalty tax of 5 per cent of the amount involved in a self-dealing transaction would be imposed on any disqualified person who participated in that transaction, for each year until the transaction was corrected. An additional tax of 200 per cent of the amount involved would be imposed on such a person if correction was not made with the 90-day period after notice from the Internal Revenue Service.

Aside from a question as to the reasonableness of the penalty involved, the greatest difficulty of this provision is that the definition of a "disqualified person" is so broad that it includes persons who are so remote from the foundation that as a pracical matter, there is no way of knowing whether they are involved in a proscribed relationship. (See Exhibit B, attached, showing "disqualified persons" as defined in Section 4946.) Further, the foundation managers are not in a position to know, ask—much less demand—revelation of information from such persons which would enable the foundation's manager to obtain the necessary information to insure conformity to these provisions. For example, how could a foundation manager realistically be required to determine the total amount of stock held in all the corporations with which a foundation may do business by all "disqualified persons", including all substantial contributors, their ancestors, collaterals, lineal descendants, spouses, and corporations, partnerships or trusts, in which they may hold a 35 per cent or greater interest?

In attacking this specific penalty we are in no way sanctioning self-dealing, but rather pointing out the impracticability of complying with the provision based upon such an extensive definition of "disqualified persons".

The second requirement which places on the management of a private foundation a task which is likely to be impossible to attain involves "expenditure responsibility". This includes "full responsibility" to see that any grant (except those to a publicly-supported or other 30 percent charities) (1) "is spent solely for the purpose for which made", (2) to "obtain full and complete reports from the grantee on how the funds are spent and to verify the accuracy of such reports", and (3) to "make full and detailed reports with respect to such expenditures to the Secretary or his delegate".

Inevitably there will be cases where a grant, through no fault of the foundation, is spent in part, for purposes outside those for which the grant was made. Similarly, there may be cases where grantees, through no fault of the foundation, fail to report or where a given report is inaccurate. It is unfair to impose upon a foundation and foundation management liability in such a situation beyond due diligence. Otherwise the provision would constitute an incentive for foundations to engage in direct operations in areas where they otherwise would have funded another organization. To enlist a broader citizenship participation in the leadership and execution of a project than that which can be provided by the grantor foundation, a degree of dependence inevitably has to be placed in the grantee organization. There would be no objection to the "expenditure responsibility" provision if it were modified to require due diligence rather than absolute responsibility.

Up to this point, I have been discussing the detrimental and serious consequences for philanthropy which would arise from the sanctions contained in H.R. 13270.

As a basis for my following comments, I suggest that any system of sanctions should have the following four principal objectives:

(1) that foundation assets be properly invested to produce a reasonable income, which is in turn applied to legitimate philanthropic purposes;

(2) that foundation assets not be used to the personal advantage of those intimately related to its creation and management;

and compelled to make good any loss caused by violation of their fiduciary

(3) that those responsible for any violation of these objectives be penalized and compelled to make good any loss caused by violation of their fiduciary responsibilities; and

(4) that those responsible for any violation of proper limitations imposed by law be penalized.

The ultimate purpose it seems to me, of any approach to a system of sanctions is that it strengthen and promote philanthropic endeavor in our society. This is the basis for a major objection to one segment of the proposed sanctions, namely, those penalties imposed against the foundations.

Penalties relating to a wrongdoing should be imposed on the wrongdoer, not the foundation involved, for this only hurts philanthropy at large by withdrawing funds. I think you will agree that this is not a desirable result.

The question, and it is not an easy one, is to devise a system of penalties, restraints and corrective measures which will fit the transgressions and not, in the process, set up a rigid system which will have the undesirable derivative and in terrorem effects of those contained in H.R. 13270.

Assuming then that no sanctions should be applied against the assets of the foundations, attention should be turned exclusively to devising proper sanctions against the wrongdoer. It is here, I think, that the proposed sanctions exceed by far reasonable bounds and fail to take into account the fact that the vast majority of foundation managers, staff and trustees are conscientious and sincerely wish to abide by the law and what is expected of them as proper conduct. Just the stigma of being adjudged in violation is a very substantial deterrent and, I would venture, in more than 99 out of 100 cases would be ample reprimand.

I would suggest that a system of penalties be set up which would consist first of a notification of violation with a 90-day period for correction and that, if appropriate corrective steps are not taken within that time, then the application of the minimum tax escalating with continued failure to correct or upon any further similar violation up to a given maximum. I would suggest, in this connection, that the maximum need not be a large figure because any repeating violator would, I am sure, be removed from office by his Board. There is always, of course, the ultimate sanction of revocation of exception.

Such a system should have flexible sanctions within a maximum limit of $5,000 to $10,000. It must be recognized that the sanctions would not be a wholly adequate remedy for a violation of self-dealing, misapplication of funds or any act which would wrongfully dissipate the assets of a foundation. This would be a situation in which the additional remedy must lie, as I see it, in the courts of equity to enforce restitution for a loss to the foundation which, in these cases, would be a breach of fiduciary responsibility. Some have suggested an equity procedure in the Federal District Courts. I see a system of sanctions combining penalties supplemented by equity actions initiated by state attorneys general, prompted if needed by the Treasury.

In this connection, I note that H.R. 13270 proposes cooperation with state attorneys general and this would seem to be a very desirable development. There are those, as I am sure you are aware, who have urged more adequate state supervision, believing that ideally the flexible remedies available through equity actions would be the most effective and desirable means of regulating foundations. Sole reliance on the states, however, is not a wholly satisfactory answer at this point, because of the failure of a number of states to undertake aggressive programs of enforcement. I, for one, believe that everything possible should be done to encourage the states to fulfill their responsibilities in this respect because I believe firmly that this is not only theoretically but, practically the proper means for the most effective regulation of foundations. But until the day comes when full reliance may be placed in the various states for the exercise of this responsibility, I must reluctantly concede to the necessity of a system of Internal Revenue Service sanctions modified along the lines I have suggested, which basically are as follows:

(1) Penalties should not be imposed on foundations but only on the wrongdoers, recognizing that a foundation is inanimate and can function only by acts of individuals.

(2) Penalties should be flexible, reasonable in nature, with a maximum limit and appropriately related to the acts (or failures to act which are penalized.

(3) Proscribed acts (or failures to act) should be defined with sufficient clarity to enable the decision-makers to determine, without undue complexity and at the time of decision, whether any act (or failure to act) constitutes a transgression.

(4) A procedure should be established providing for notice of a proposed penalty, with opportunity for correction within a reasonable period before application of the penalty.

(5) A reasonable statute of limitations should be made clearly applicable to penalties.

If an approach along these general lines can be substituted for the system of monetary penalties contained in H.R. 13270, I believe that the Congress will have come much closer to meeting its announced goal of developing sanctions which provide "a more rational relationship to improper acts." And in terms of the ability of private foundations to perform in the highest public interest, I believe that such a change is crucial. Thank you.

PENALTIES IMPOSED BY PRIVATE FOUNDATION PROVISIONS OF H.R. 13270

Acts or failures penalized	Penalties imposed on private foundations (and certain trusts)	Penalties imposed on disqualified persons	Penalties imposed on foundation managers
Termination of private foundation status (sec. 507).	Lower of (1) aggregate tax benefits, resulting from tax exemption, to the foundation (income tax savings) and to all substantial contributors (income, gift, and estate tax savings), plus interest thereon, or (2) the higher of (a) the value of the net assets of the foundation on the date action to terminate its exempt status was first taken, or (b) the value of the net assets on the date such status was terminated.
	The tax may be abated if the foundation operates as a public charity for 60 months or distributes all its assets to public charities within 60 months.
Liability for ch. 42, taxes (sec. 508(e))	Forced termination and liability for tax under sec. 507, above, for willful repeated acts or failures to act or a willful and flagrant act or failure to act.
Self dealing (sec. 4941)		Initial tax of 5 percent of the amount involved for each year until corrected, imposed on disqualified persons who participated in the act of self dealing. Joint and several liability.	Initial tax (if a disqualified person is taxed) of 2½ percent of the amount involved for each year until corrected, imposed on any manager who participated in the act of self dealing knowing it to be such. Maximum of $10,000 per act. Joint and several liability.
		Additional tax of 200 percent of the amount involved if not corrected within 90 days after notice is mailed. Joint and several liability.	Addionalal tax (if a disqualified person is taxed) of 50 percent of the amount involved, impose on any manager who refused to agree to any part of the correction. Maximum of $10,000 per act. Joint and several liability.

Failure to distribute income (sec. 4942)	Initial tax of 15 percent of undistributed income for each year such income remains undistributed. Additional tax, if an initial tax is imposed, of 100 percent of undistributed income not distributed within 90 days after notice is mailed.
Excess business holdings (sec. 4943)	Initial tax of 5 percent of the value of excess business holdings for each year during which such excess is held. Additional tax of 200 percent of the value of excess business holdings not disposed of within 90 days after notice is mailed.
Investments which jeopardize charitable purposes (sec. 4944).	100 percent of the amount invested		If the foundation is taxed, 50 percent of the amount invested, imposed on any manager who participates in the making of the investment knowig that it is jeopardizing exempt purposes. Joint and several liability.
Taxable expenditures (sec. 4945)	100 percent of the amount of each taxable expenditure		50 percent of the amount of each taxable expenditure, imposed on any manager who agrees to the making of an expenditure knowing it is a taxable expenditure. Joint and several liability.
Repeated liability for ch. 42, excise taxes (sec. 6684).	100 percent of the ch. 42 tax if the foundation has, without reasonable cause, either (1) been liable for a ch. 42 tax previously, or (2) the act or failure to act giving rise to liability for the ch. 42 tax is "both willful and flagrant."	100 percent of the ch. 42 tax if the disqualified person has, without reasonable cause, either (1) been liable for a ch. 42 tax previously, or (2) the act or failure to act giving rise to liability for the ch. 42 tax is "both willful and flagrant."	100 percent of the ch. 42 tax if the manager has, without reasonable cause, either (1) been liable for a ch. 42 tax previously, or (2) the act or failure to act giving rise to liability for the ch. 42 tax is "both willful and flagrant."

EXHIBIT B

PERSONS OF ENTITIES WHO ARE "DISQUALIFIED PERSONS" AS DEFINED IN SECTION 4946

I. A private foundation will be subject to taxes under Section 4941 (self-dealing) if it engages in certain transactions with; under Section 4942 (failure to distribute income to qualifying distributees) if it distributes income to an organization controlled by; and under Section 4943 (excess business holdings) if it holds excess business interests, measured by the aggregate of its own holdings and those of the following:

SUBSTANTIAL CONTRIBUTORS, THEIR FAMILIES AND RELATED ENTITIES

1. Any person who (by himself or with his spouse) has contributed more than $5,000 to the foundation in any one calendar year, plus:

(a) The family of such person (and the family of his spouse, if the spouse has been a contributor), consisting of his (or their): Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Spouse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such persons and their families own (including stock owned by others which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c)) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such persons and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such persons and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

2. Any person who (by himself or with his spouse) bequeathed more than $5,000 to the foundation, plus:

(a) The family of such person (and the family of his spouse, if the spouse has been a contributor), consisting of his (or their): Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Spouse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such persons and their families own (including stock owned by others which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such persons and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such persons and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

3. Any person who contributed the greatest amount (regardless of the amount) to the foundation in any one calendar year, plus:

(a) The family of such person, consisting of his: Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Spouse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such persons and their families own (including stock owned by others which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such persons and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such persons and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

4. The creator of the foundation, if it is a trust, plus:

(a) The family of such creator, consisting of: Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Spouse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such person and their families own (including stock owned by oothers which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c)) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such persons and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such persons and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

FOUNDATION MANAGERS, THEIR FAMILIES AND RELATED ENTITIES:

5. Any officer, director or trustee of the foundation (including "an individual having powers or responsibilities similar to those of officers, directors, or trustees"), plus:

(a) The family of such officer, director, trustee or other individual, consisting of: Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Spouse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such individuals and their families own (including stock owned by others which is deemed constructively owned under section 267(c)) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such individuals and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such individuals and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

6. Any employee of a foundation having authority or responsibility with respect to an act or failure to act, plus:

(a) The family of such employee, consisting of: Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Spouse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such employees and their families own (including stock owned by others in which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c)) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such employees and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such employees and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

INDIVIDUALS OWNING INTERESTS IN ENTITIES WHICH ARE "SUBSTANTIAL CONTRIBUTORS", THEIR FAMILIES AND RELATED ENTITIES

7. Any individual who owns (including stock owned by others which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c)) more than 20% of the total voting power of a corporation which is a "substantial contributor" to the foundation, plus:

(a) The family of such individual, consisting of: Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their sponses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sponse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such individuals and their families own (including stock owned by others which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c)) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such individuals and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such individuals and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

8. Any individual who is a general partner in a partnership which is a "substantial contributor" to the foundation, plus:

(a) The family of such individual, consisting of: Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Spouse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such individuals and their families own (including stock owned by others which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c)) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such individuals and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such individuals and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

9. Any individual who holds more than 20% of the beneficial interest in a trust or unincorporated enterprise which is a "substantial contributor" to the foundation, plus:

(a) The family of such individual, consisting of: Brothers (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Sisters (whole or half-blood) and their spouses; Spouse; Ancestors; Lineal descendants and their spouses.

(b) A corporation in which such individuals and their families own (including stock owned by others which is deemed constructively owned under Section 267(c)) more than 35% of the total voting power.

(c) A partnership in which such individuals and their families own more than 35% of the profits interest.

(d) A trust or estate in which such individuals and their families hold more than 35% of the beneficial interest.

II. For purposes of Section 4943 (tax on excess business holdings), a private foundation's excess business holdings are measured by the total holdings of itself and all the persons and entities listed above, plus the holdings of:

10. Any private foundation which is "effectively controlled (directly or indirectly) by the same person or persons who control the private foundation in question."

11. Any private foundation "all of the contributions to which were made (directly or indirectly) by the same person or persons described in * * * [paragraphs 1 to 9 inclusive, above], or members of their families [consisting of the persons listed in subparagraph a of each of paragraphs 1 to 9 inclusive, above], who made (directly or indirectly) substantially all of the contributions to the private foundation in question."

III. For purposes of Section 4941 (tax on self-dealing), a "government official" also is included.

SUMMARY OF STATEMENT OF DR. JAMES R. KILLIAN, JR.

1. Impact of the bill on the development of philanthropy and the importance of financial support of educational institutions by private foundations and of their contributions to society.

2. Expanding costs of education and the need for more private contributions.

3. Outline of principal provisions of the bill relating to private foundations.

(a) 7½ percent investment income tax.

(b) Penalty taxes for engaging in certain transactions, failure to distribute income, excess business holdings, and improper investments and expenditures.

(c) Application of private foundation rules to non-exempt trusts.

4. Penalty provisions indiscriminately applied and so severe as to threaten existence of private foundations.

5. Inequity of retroactive application of new rules to existing trusts and foundations.

6. Other provisions of the bill which will curtail charitable contributions.

STATEMENT OF DR. JAMES R. KILLIAN, JR.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee:

My name is James R. Killian, Jr., Chairman of the Corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It is a privilege to present this statement and to have the opportunity to express my grave concern about certain provisions of bill H.R. 13270 which affect foundations and other forms of private philanthropy. In discussing the restrictions on the development of philanthropy which would be imposed by this bill in its present form, I speak chiefly out of my experience as an officer of a private college where foundation grants and private philanthropy generally are decisively important to the institution. I hasten to add that I recognize the need for tax reform and the difficulty of accomplishing it. I also recognize the need for stopping the occasional misuse of tax-exempt foundations for purposes ulterior to true philanthropy. But these objectives must be reached with precision and care in ways that will not discourage—and perhaps dry up—philanthropic giving.

Educational institutions such as the one I represent derive a substantial portion of their contributions from organizations which meet the bill's definition of "private foundations." Over the past four years, MIT has received an average of 36% of its private contributions from these foundations. These grants have been profoundly important in maintaining the quality of its education and in enhancing educational opportunity for both students and faculty. The private giving which would be discouraged by this bill has provided 80% of all of our academic buildings, as well as 100% of our endowment. In our forward planning, we have relied on the continuation of grants, gifts, and bequests in amounts greater than we have been receiving in the past few years.

I, therefore, look with dismay at any curtailment of foundation or other private support now or in the future.

Clearly at a time when we are deeply concerned everywhere in the country about the funding of all higher education and about the financial future of our private institutions, we should be looking for ways to increase and not diminish the flow of private funds to education. We who are struggling day in and day out to balance budget and to find funds for student aid, student housing, faculty salaries, improved teaching, and new programs to deal with national needs, say to you with all the eloquence at our command that this is no time to compound the problems of our universities by making it harder for them to secure private grants and gifts in the years ahead.

In its present form, the provisions of the bill that would impair the functioning of foundations or result in the confiscation of their capital or discourage the formation of new foundations seem to me to be dangerous and short-sighted. The provisions of the present bill appear to be so severe that if passed in its present form, it will probably constitute the death knell of the foundations as we know them. Certainly, the incentive to form new foundations will be lost.

In contemplating the future financing of our private institutions, I am troubled by the reduction in available funds which will result from the proposed 7½% tax on investment income, but even more troubled by the breach of the tax-exempt principle on income. Should this tax be established, it would be tempting to increase it. I would also be troubled by the precedent created by taxation of foundations as implying the possibility of taxation of our tax-exempt educational institutions.

Foundations make intangible contributions to our educational system along with their financial contributions. I readily acknowledge that foundations provide institutions such as my own not only with needed funds, but with the stimulus of criticism and of fresh and catalytic ideas, thus helping to maintain quality and achieve needed change. They make important contributions to the quality of our society by providing multiple centers of initiative, by their ability to serve as path finders and to support experiment, and by their capacity to attract into the decision-making, planning and innovative process a wide spectrum of able men and women. I am profoundly troubled by any restrictions on foundations which would inhibit the initiative or innovative spirit we see in the strong ones. I am troubled about those provisions in the bill which could discourage able men and women from accepting posts of responsibility in foundations. Indeed these provisions could reduce the officers and trustees of our responsible foundations to a legion of intimidated men, their initiative, imagination, and boldness dampened by excessive restraint and surveillance and by confiscatory penalties for the innocent misreading of ambiguous provisions in this bill. This is one of the most serious possibilities affecting the future of philanthropy that one finds in this proposed legislation.

I have addressed my remarks within the context of this hearing to those provisions of the bill which relate to foundations. It is clear, however, that one needs to look at the impact of the bill on the future of all philanthropy, and as I indicate later in this statement, the preservation of the great American tradition of benevolence, of voluntary association, of diversity of support for our charities must be looked at in the round because the spirit of generosity is a seamless web, and damage to a part damages the whole.

Let me turn now from these comments to examine briefly some of the specific provisions of the bill which lead me to the general conclusions I have set forth.

The bill proposes the following new taxes on foundations:

1. A 7½ percent tax on investment income, including capital gains. This tax is imposed whether or not all of the income of the foundation is distributed to active charities. Although the present proposed rate is 7½ percent, experience shows that once a tax exemption is breached, almost inevitably progressively higher taxes are later imposed. At the very least, this tax cannot but reduce the giving to institutions by these foundations.

2. A tax on termination of private foundation status. This tax would be equal to the lesser of the net assets of the foundation or the aggregate tax benefits that have been enjoyed by the foundation and its substantial contributors since March 1, 1913, by reason of deductions or exemptions. I particularly deplore the provision for retroactive imposition of taxes that were legally saved under laws previously in effect.

3. A basic tax of 5 percent and a penalty tax of 200 percent if not corrected, on acts of self-dealing with foundations. This tax is automatically imposed on transactions with disqualified persons irrespective of the fairness of the terms of the transaction.

4. An initial tax of 15 percent and a penalty tax of 100 percent if not corrected, on the failure of the foundation to distribute all income. For this purpose, the bill would impose an obligation to distribute a fixed percentage of the fair market value of the assets irrespective of the actual yield.

5. An initial tax of 5 percent, and a penalty tax of 200 percent if not corrected, on the value of excess business holdings. As many private foundations have been funded by holdings in closely-held corporations, this provision will force liquidation of these holdings to the detriment of the foundations and the organizations to which they contribute.

6. A tax of 100 percent on speculative investments. Such investments are ambiguously defined as investments made in such manner as may jeopardize the carrying out of the charitable purpose.

7. A tax of 100 percent on certain expenditures which are deemed to be improper. This provision would in effect require the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to regulate the activities of foundations instead of performing his proper function of administering the tax laws.

In addition to the taxes outlined above, in each case other than the investment income tax and the termination of status tax, a tax up to 50 percent may also be imposed upon the foundation manager

While approving the objectives of the bill to eliminate occasional abuses of private foundations for non-charitable purposes, I feel that these penalties are too harsh and are indiscriminately imposed against both the offenders and the innocent. Indeed the provisions of the bill are so severe that if it is passed in its present form, it may well mean the end of such foundation. Certainly, no new private foundations will be formed, despite the urgent need for additional foundation support for higher education. The only safe course for existing foundations is to refuse additional contributions, retain their present investments, and distribute more than their income until they disappear.

The penalty taxes are applied not only to new organizations created after passage of the bill, but also to existing foundations that were established in reliance on present and past laws which encouraged their formation and operation. The tendency throughout the bill to impose taxes and penalties ex post facto is, in my opinion, one of the most iniquitous features of the bill.

Of equal concern to me is the proposed application of the private foundation taxes to non-exempt trusts. The bill would impose the 7½ percent investment income tax on trusts which have only charitable beneficiaries and would impose some of the same penalty taxes proposed with respect to private foundations on trusts where only a portion of the beneficial interests are held by a charity. Like many other provisions of the bill, these rules would be applied to trusts already in existence even though they were drawn (and in many cases cannot be changed) in reliance upon laws which afforded them freedom from such taxation and penalties.

As in the case of private foundations, the only apparent relief from these penalty taxes is a provision that the Secretary "may," not "shall," abate the unpaid portion of a tax if the trust distributes all of its net assets to specified types of charities.

Although this discussion is directed principally to the bills' provisions related to private foundations, the true effect of the bill on future philanthropy cannot be viewed or discussed in that context alone. Unfortunately, there are many other provisions in the bill which may have adverse effects on contributions to institutions of higher learning. Among these provisions are:

1. The 30 percent limitation on gifts of appreciated property, whereas other contributions are limited to 50 percent of the contribution base. Moreover, the 30 percent limitation apparently applies to the full value of appreciated property, rather than only to the amount of appreciation.

2. The treatment of appreciation of donated property as a tax preference and the allocation of deductions between tax preferred and taxable income. This combination cannot help but reduce the tax benefits of charitable contributions and in addition, it makes it impossible for a prospective donor to plan his giving because he cannot determine the tax effect of contributions in advance.

3. The income tax, estate tax and gift tax treatment of charitable remainder trusts, particularly as to the application of the new rules to existing trusts, many of which cannot be changed.

In closing, let me reiterate my position as being in no way opposed to appropriate and equitable tax revisions but as deeply concerned lest irreparable harm come to private institutions through oversight or inadvertence.

SUMMARY OF STATEMENT OF DR. JONAS SALK

I. This nation's Government and its private foundations are avowedly working together toward the attainment of common public goals. Each of these channels of philanthropy is supported by the people of the United States and each has developed distinctive characteristics. The question presented by the legislation under consideration is whether this dual system should be allowed to continue.

II. Both channels of American philanthropy are subject to shortcomings. Prior to attempting any objective evaluation one must examine the abuses of private foundations and the effect of such abuses upon their stated purposes. This question of abuse must be distinguished from the more basic question of whether our dual system of philanthropic funding should be preserved. Recent history provides innumerable examples of valuable research, initiated and supported by private philanthropy, which otherwise might not have been accomplished.

III. The dualism of foundations and government parallels the dualism found in living systems generally. In each instance, the dualism represents a difference in function and purpose rather than a mere division of labor. Just as the genetic system of living organism is concerned with the future survival of the species, the private sector of philanthropy (represented by foundations) is concerned with the long-range future of mankind; similarly, the somatic system is concerned primarily with the machinery for sustaining life in the same manner that government must deal with the short-range problems of mankind. Foundation endowments provide stable reserves from which exploration and change may be effected.

IV. Regulation and control constitute important functions for every healthy living system, from cells to organisms to human society. Reasonable controls over foundations can provide positive benefits, and will not be damaging. However, unduly severe strictures will limit the usefulness of foundations. Abundant evidence has been presented regarding the positive contribution to our society made by foundations, while the existence of certain abuses has likewise been established. This Committee is charged with the responsibility of distinguishing the necessary and the useful from that which is unduly restrictive.

Like a physician, the Committee must exercise extreme caution and discretion to avoid injuring or killing the patient. Absent such care, this nation might be deprived of a vital, innovative, and independent force for growth and for constructive change.

My relationship to American foundations is somewhat different from that of the other speakers you have heard thus far. I am not an administrator of a foundation, nor a member of any foundation board, nor have I ever been. Neither do I now hold a position with fund-raising responsibility for any institution. Rather, I come before you as an individual who has been enabled—through the American system of private philanthropy—to work in certain ways, toward certain goals, which would not have been possible had this system not existed.

Therefore, I bring a somewhat different perspective to the questions the Congress now faces. From my vantage point, I would like to examine these questions, and see if it is possible to draw some conclusions.

First of all, I see both the government and the foundations as having the same avowed end: that is, they are both intended to work for the benefit of the people—especially the people of this nation, and ultimately the people of the world—if the full destiny of this country is to be realized. The people of this nation support both the government and foundations. The government of this nation encouraged the growth of foundations through legal statutes, and within this framework foundations have evolved a certain character which we will examine in a moment.

I am, of course, aware that there is concern that foundations may be abusing their privileges, and that they may be "getting out of hand." This concern extends over a broad range of points, from whether or not foundations are accumulating excess wealth in tax-free shelters, to whether or not foundations are unduly influencing legislation, to whether or not foundations are mis-using their tax-exempt status in a variety of other ways, such as operating businesses. So strong is this concern that the very existence of foundations is now being questioned.

Since foundations and the government work for a common purpose—for the benefit of man—one of the basic issues that needs to be resolved is whether two separate channels of philanthropy—one private, one public—should continue separately, or whether one should be eliminated. Thus, we must first ask ourselves, is the foundation system a disease to be stamped out, or is it a positive benefit to be encouraged?

It seems to me that before judgments can be made about the value of foundations—or, the reciprocal questions: can we afford them, or can we afford to do without them—you should have information about how much they cost and how much they give—how much wealth has accumulated in foundations compared to that accumulated by other tax-exempt organizations, and what are the relative amounts spent yearly from taxes and from philanthropic sources. You would also want to know the specifics about how often, and to what extent, foundations have abused their privileges and how often they have not. I imagine you would also want to know specifically, and not merely generally, how often, and to what degree, foundations attempt, or appear to be attempting to influence legislation, how often they have not, and how this relates to the activity of other tax-exempt organizations which have, as their openly avowed aim, the influencing of legislation.

I would remind you that regardless of advantages neither government nor foundations have been exempt from scandal in the past. No system, however well-intentioned, is perfect. And although abuse is certainly an issue, it ought not be confused with the deeper question of whether funding for philanthropic purposes, for health, for education and welfare, should continue to be conducted privately as well as publicly. Is a dichotomy between public and private funding useful?

I believe that it is not only useful but necessary and there is evidence in support of this opinion. There are innumerable examples of philanthropically initiated and supported research that would have been delayed—or would not have been accomplished at all—were it not for the American system of private philanthropy. For example, research that led to the development of polio vaccine was philanthropically funded. The government became active only when the time came to administer and control a vaccine. Studies that led to the development of vaccines for yellow fever were funded by foundations and the early work that led to the development of vaccines for influenza and measles also were foundation funded.

These are popularly comprehensible examples but an even more impressive record is in the clear fact as noted by George Beadle that "the remarkable twentieth-century flowering of experimental biology would not have been possible without the support of private foundations in key areas and at critical times." Up to 1965 no fewer than thirty Nobel laureates received Rockefeller Foundation fellowships before they won the prize.

The dualism of foundations and government has a parallel in the dualism that exists in living systems generally. For example, living organisms possess a genetic mechanism and a somatic mechanism, each separate and yet both interrelated and interdependent. This dualism is not merely a division of labor but rather a difference in function and therefore in purpose. In anthropomorphic terms there is a difference in emphasis, outlook, responsibility—a difference in attitude and even a difference in the value system applied in making judgments. By and large, the genetic system, which is concerned with heredity, is concerned with the future—with the survival of the species—with generations to come. The somatic system is concerned primarily with the machinery of life, with coping, with staying alive, with the here and now, and also with the preservation of the genetic system. This also describes the way in which foundations and government work together. Foundations can afford to be more concerned with the long range future and government, of necessity, is more concerned with the present and short range future.

As for dualism in this country, our nation was founded on diversity, and one of its great strengths lies in its tolerance of diversity. Few other countries tolerate it. Even fewer encourage it. Dualism precludes monoply and precludes dictatorship.

The foundations can, in a way, be thought of as equivalent to a savings account prudently accumulated for building the future. Foundation funds supplement tax-derived government funds which can be thought of as borrowing from the future for use in the present. Foundations can use the income from their accumulated savings to finance innovative programs continuing over a period of years; the government deals with the more urgent necessities, and with crisis not yet forestalled by planning and foresight.

The foundations are in the business of developing foresight. They support, amongst other things, colleges and universities and other institutions of advanced and future-oriented research. Foundations with their endowments provide the stable reserves from which exploration and change can be effected.

We need both the stability and the change. Legislation which aims to reduce the life-span of foundations, to limit or discourage the development of new foundations, or to hamper the foundations' ability to influence change will have a deleterious effect upon those vital functions which operate now for the benefit of the nation and the world.

At the same time that I say this, I also agree that regulation and control are important functions which every healthy living system possesses, from cells to organisms to society. Our society now demands more regulation and control from all its institutions—and this is a healthy demand. Failure of regulation and control, on the cellular level, for example, leads to cancer. Failure of regulation and control in an organ or an individual leads to many kinds of disorder and disease. Something of the same sort is true in institutions.

Just as the public is now demanding more control over its government, so I think it should demand and have more regulation over foundations. Any reasonable regulation will not be damaging. It will be invigorating. I believe most foundations will favor, and will benefit from, a form of better auditing by the IRS, financed through a fee paid by foundations themselves. I think this is necessary and advisable, and can have positive effects. On the other hand, unduly severe strictures—either financial, or in terms of foundation activity in any sphere—will limit the usefulness of the foundations.

Determining what is necessary and useful, from what is unduly severe, is the job of this Committee and of the Congress. It is not an easy job, and I do not envy you the decisions you must make. In this respect, you are the "physicians" to the country who, in a sense, must make decisions on the basis of what may be insufficient evidence. Every physician does this. No physician enjoys it. But there is a maxim from Hippocrates which is appropriate here: "Above all, do no harm."

I think you have evidence, indisputable evidence from the past, of the advantages and value of foundations. I think you have indisputable evidence that in many areas, the foundations are supporting programs—such as grants and loans to higher education—which save the government expenditures it might otherwise have to make. I think you have evidence that the foundations have reduced tax burdens that would have arisen if work they supported had not been done. You are currently faced with the equally indisputable evidence of certain abuses and I would urge you, in treating this problem, to be quite certain that you do not maim or kill the patient, and that you do not deprive this country of what has been, for the past half century, a vital, innovative, independent force for growth and for constructive change in American life, and in the world.

Summary of Statement of Mr. John J. McCloy

Bill as now drawn embodies a series of provisions discriminatingly hostile to private foundations. These provisions are not supported by any reliable record of general misbehavior on the part of foundations which would justify them. The provisions in question can only be regarded as punitive and, as such, they ignore and would put to serious and unwarranted risk the continued flow of private foundations' grants to the educational, scientific, cultural and charitable well being of our society.

All such provisions which would discourage the creation and growth of private foundations should be eliminated from the Bill. While all measures reasonably designed to correct any abuses of the tax exempt privileges of the foundations should be retained with proper enforcement measures provided.

In accordance with the American tradition of encouragement of private charities, no tax or other discriminatory provisions should be imposed on the non-profit charitable American private foundations. Provision should be made, however, for the assessment of an appropriate annual fee to be levied against all foundations based on a percentage of their assets which would serve to provide the means for a suitable Government agency (presumably the IRS) to conduct comprehensive and sustained audits of the affairs of the private foundations based upon full disclosure and reports.

No discrimination should be contained in the Bill against private charitable foundations in the treatment of gifts to them of appreciated value property. The present Bill is grossly discriminatory in this respect.

A review of the definitions as given in the Bill is required. A number of institutions not generally considered to have been private foundations are under the definitions contained in this Bill to be treated as if they were, and as such would become subject to the discriminatory provisions directed against private foundations. Even with the elimination of these discriminatory provisions, the definitions require review.

Certain of the enforcement provisions include penalties which appear quite excessive, particularly considering the ill-defined nature of some of the alleged offenses.

If the Bill is to impose new limitations on the amount of property which might be held by a private foundation coming from a single donor, an opportunity should be provided for the divestiture of any excess amount in such a manner as to avoid loss of values or the imposition of tax penalties.

Careful and sustained audits of the affairs of foundations are long overdue both from the point of view of protecting the law-abiding and dealing with delinquents. Comprehensive audits would be helpful to all concerned, and would serve as the basis for sound legislation and regulation of foundations as experience of such audits dictated.

The emergence of the Government in a large way into the welfare and educational areas of the nation does not justify limiting the flow of private philanthropy through private foundations. With the challenges the Government faces, all the help which the private foundations with their flexibility and flow of funds can give, will be needed to meet those challenges.

Statement of Mr. John J. McCloy

I have sought an opportunity to talk about this Bill which is before you primarily because it affects so profoundly institutions and activities with which I have been associated over a large part of my life. The Bill in its scope and depth seems to me to be one of the most important pieces of proposed legislation which has been in the Congress in recent years, and certainly the most important one in the tax field within that period.

I refer to the entire Bill and not only to the foundation aspects of it, though it is on these aspects that I would wish to concentrate my remarks today.

I might mention that among the institutions affected by the Bill with which I have been associated are The Rockefeller Foundation, of which I was a trustee for a number of years; The Ford Foundation, of which I was Board Chairman for a substantial period; Amherst College, of which I was also Board Chairman for a long time, and, to name one commercial institution with which I was associated, The Chase Manhattan Bank, of which I was also Board Chairman. There have been other foundations and corporations with which I have been associated, but I do not appear today on behalf of any of these institutions and I wish to express my views and thoughts on the basis of my general judgment and experience, free of any representation of a particular institution or client. For the sake of the record I perhaps should add that I am now practicing law in New York City.

There can be no question of the profound scope and impact of this Bill. I suppose the number of people and institutions which have sought to testify on the Bill, and the urgency with which they address themselves to it, is a convincing indication of the detrimental effect they believe the Bill in its present form could have on American cultural, scientific, social and educational life.

Before dealing with some of what I consider to be very serious defects in the Bill, I would like to make a few observations as to the atmosphere and timing under which the Bill was prepared because I think it explains in part the admixture of some very good and some bad features which I believe appear in it. As an outside observer, I gain the impression that the Bill was prepared under heavy pressure shortly following the election and the advent of a new administration.

The amount of work done on the Bill is most impressive, but it still gives signs of need for further thought. I have wondered whether the urgency for the extension of the surtax and its joinder with the regular tax bill may not have induced undue speed in the consideration of tax reform measures. During the consideration of the Bill, disclosures of abusive use of foundation funds appears, instances of complete or substantial Federal tax avoidance by individuals and corporations were given wide publicity and any form of tax exemption became extremely unpopular. These conditions, I am inclined to believe, account in part for the presence of a series of provisions relating particularly to foundations which run through the Bill and which seem to carry a persistently punitive note in their nature and import.

I think it is also fair to say that these factors, together with the somewhat unusual procedures adopted by those managing the House version of this Bill due to the time element, have led to an abrupt and too far-reaching reversal of a rather consistent Congressional and governmental principle or policy of encouraging the creation of charitable foundations through constructive tax incentives.

The traditional tax incentive in this country to encourage the creation of foundation and the stimulation of charitable grants has been a major influence in the striking progress of American private philanthropy. The American people carried over from their pioneer period a very strong instinct for private philanthropy. De Tocqueville writing to a friend in France in the 1830's referred to this tendency which so strongly contrasted with the habits of European society. This was long before there was an income tax, but the income tax provisions which favored the creation of charitable foundations simply continued and nurtured an already highly developed American instinct of private philanthropy.

I will not attempt to detail the benefits to American society which foundations have induced. They have been eloquently, if briefly, outlined by earlier witnesses. I believe that no comprehensive or objective study of the impact of foundation grants on our life has yet been made. I submit that those who contend that foundations have not been beneficial to this country should have the burden of proof and that no case has yet been made to justify the atmosphere of hostility to foundations which appears in the present Bill. I am aware that there is a sort of grand skepticism abroad in the land challenging our Government, our existing institutions and, indeed, many of our modes of life. But this, if we are to remain rational, does not means that we should first destroy everything we have built up and start with a clean slate. It does mean we should seek the facts of our needs, analyze them and adopt the procedures necessary to deal with them.

This Bill, as I read it, clearly embodies a condemnation of foundations. It singles them out from all other charitable organizations and imposes a tax on their investment income alone. I feel, as I gather does also Irwin Miller, that there is an inherent inconsistency in imposing a tax—any tax—on a non-profit organization such as a foundation if it serves a charitable or publicly beneficial purpose. If foundations are good, they should be stimulated—if they are evil, they should be extinguished. There is no logic in one-half or a 7½% killing of them and, quite frankly, I do not believe this administration or its predecessors have known, or now know, enough to assert with any confidence that the effect of foundations on our society has been bad or to what extent they have been partially bad or partially good. There is a very large field to explore before any such judgment can be reliably made. Some abuses have been disclosed, but the wide affirmative sweep of their benefactors have not been appraised. The foundations have certainly made significant contributions to our society and they have had the support of tax exemptions over a substantial period of our national life. Accordingly, I would start out by eliminating from the Bill this punitive or hostile philosophy which pervades the foundation provisions. I would strongly urge the Congress to impose no discriminatory tax on the income or assets of the private foundations as such at least until a solid case against them can really be made. No reliable record has been made which would justify the hostile attitude taken toward foundations which the proposed tax and a number of other provisions in the Bill embody. Singling out the private foundations from all other charities can only be read as a partial punishment for wrongdoing or suspicion of wrongdoing. The plain fact is that the administration and review of foundation affairs on the part of the Government has, until quite recently, been most inadequate and rudimentary. I imagine that this laxity has been in part based on the assumption and sincere belief on the part of Treasury officials that foundations have been generally beneficial to the country and that such abuses as have occurred in connection with their administration have been limited to a relatively few of them. Indeed, I believe representatives of the Treasury have from time to time expressed such views.

The time has come, however, if only by reason of the exposure of abuses and the general skepticism of the times to provide the means for a comprehensive, objective and sustained review of the affairs of the foundations based on regular audits by the appropriate agency of the Government. I believe it can best be done by the IRS, suitably equipped and staffed for the purpose. We should know much more than we now do about the manner in which these foundation funds are distributed and spent, about the results achieved and the effect the withdrawal or diminution of these funds from our educational, scientific and charitable beneficiaries would have before we declare, as this Bill purports to do, that the growth and creation of private foundations should be actively discouraged.

This does not mean that we should have to await an audit or survey before we take any action. There are already on the books a number of provisions against abuses or practices inconsistent with the principle of tax exemptions. These, on the basis of such knowledge as we now possess, can and should appropriately be augmented by additional provisions in the present Bill and additional measures for enforcement of the purposes for which the foundations were created and their tax exemption granted. What it does mean is that at least until such audits and reviews have been made and studied no death knell to law abiding foundations should be sounded in the shape of a tax and other discriminatory measures. Until the Congress and the people of the country can intelligently appraise the validity of private foundations and their place in our society, any such hostile forms are out of order. I have had a good bit of experience in the observance of the operations of a number of foundations, large and small. I have seen mistakes made and frustrations of objectives occur, but I am convinced foundations have played, and continue to play, a most constructive and valuable part in the texture of our society. Indeed, I would say a most important part. My view may be subject to discount because of my former association with foundations, but I firmly believe from what facts are readily observable and from the attitude the Congress has previously taken toward them that the presumptions, at least, are strongly in their favor.

The course to follow, in my judgment, is to continue with the incentive for the creation of foundations on the basis of this presumption and our experience but to provide promptly all the facilities and means necessary to conduct sustained audits and supervision of the foundations by the appropriate Government agency. This should involve an annual fee to be charged the foundations, large enough to provide adequate audits and surveys based on full disclosures. It is important that this should take the form of an auditing fee and not a tax. It should not be a tax to provide revenue.

We have something of an analogy to follow in the form of the fees charged the banks for the Federal Reserve Audit. The banks of the Federal system are charged an annual sum, depending on the size of the bank, which finances the auditing of the banks by the Federal Reserve. The system over the years has worked out very well. Moreover, these audits have resulted from time to time in the introduction of a number of statutory and administration reforms in connection with the operation of the banks. They have stimulated legislators and the banks to pass sensible laws and adopt healthy banking practices. I understand the Internal Revenue Service and the Treasury abhor the establishment of any fund which does not constitute general Government revenue, but this is a bureaucratic objection which ought not stand in the way of the adoption of a sound principle. The size of the fee can and should be tailored to fit the need.

This is my principal and strongly held recommendation for the modification of this Bill as it affects foundations. It goes to the heart of the matter, as I realize, but I am convinced it embodies the sound approach for the Government to adopt with respect to foundations. The need for such an audit and survey is great. It is needed to protect the well conducted foundation and deal with the delinquents. Even if the abuses are few and far between, such an audit represents an imperative need and it is proper that the expenses of it should be defrayed by the foundations themselves. Such an examination of foundation affairs by a Government agency (and I believe the IRS is the best agency to make it), is, I repeat, long overdue. The foundations would not be handicapped by it and the recipients of their grants would not be penalized as they would be by a tax on the foundation which if it followed the way of all taxes would be subject to increase and thus result in the diminishing of foundation benefits as they reach the beneficiaries. Indeed, I am convinced that the administration of foundations would be greatly improved by such action. It would encourage them to make their own audits and check their own procedures. Abuses could be identified and expeditiously corrected and efficiencies would be accomplished. Both the foundations and the public would know where the country stood in respect of their operations, suspicious rumors, prejudices and emotions in respect of foundations would be cleared up and the unappraised risks of impairing a significant flow of funds in American private philanthropy would be avoided.

There are many good features in the Bill such as those which provide for fuller reporting, elimination of self-dealing, undue accumulation of funds, better enforcement procedure by the Treasury, better cooperation with the State authorities to encourage the States to do their own policing, etc. These, together with the means to provide for good staffing and good auditing by the auditing Agency, could constitute this Bill the most positive and constructive piece of legislation affecting foundations that has yet appeared.

I have some further suggestions which would do little more than correct certain other features in the Bill that reflect this hostile philosophy toward foundations to which I have referred.

Prominently among such features is the provision which deliberately discriminates against private foundations in its treatment of gifts to them of property with appreciated value. I am referring to Section 170E of the Bill which would deny the donor the right of deduction for the full appreciated value of the property donated to a private foundation. His deduction under the Bill would either be limited to cost or he would have to pay a tax on the gain. If the donor gave it to any other charitable organization, not a private foundation as defined, he would be able to deduct the appreciated value. Is the Government prepared to contend on the basis of present evidence that a gift to a well run foundation is less beneficial than if it were given to a college, university, a church or any other charitable organization? This provision is clearly in the category of those designed to discourage the growth of existing foundations or the creation of new ones. Again it assumes that foundations are evil without proof. I see every reason to encourage those who have achieved wealth through their ownership of stock in growth companies to make gifts of such stock to foundations. Many prospective donors in this category are in areas of the country where foundations are rare but where the need for programs of sophisticated giving are very large. The combination of the proposed tax, the discrimination in respect to appreciated grants, the provisions regarding the qualifications for crediting grants against required distribution and the provisions demanding distribution of capital assets really all add up to a savage blow aimed unerringly at the continued vigor of American charitable foundations and these steps are proposed, I submit, without the benefit of any adequate record to support them.

In addition to the above features, there are some really draconian penalties on "foundation managers" (which would include trustees and the staffs of the foundations) for failure to observe the provisions of the Bill, some of which are not too clearly defined. I fear that in their present form these penalties can only discourage responsible participation in foundation management. In my judgment, these penalties should be reviewed and some suggestions as to their improvement have already been made. I recognize the need for improved enforcement measures in regard to foundations. Some other penalties and means of enforcement in addition to the withdrawal of the tax exemption are needed.

I have been very much interested in the attempts made by the drafters of the Bill to compel a just distribution of a foundation's assets. I observe that a distribution of 5% of the asset value of the foundation may be demanded in any one year. I can see how it would frustrate the charitable purposes of the tax exemption if all the property held by the foundation was in non-income or very low income producing property. If an arbitrary percentage or figure were chosen as the amount to be distributed in any one year, this, on the other hand, might force a slow but sure liquidation of the foundation. This would be more apt to be the case if some of the other provisions prejudicial to the growth of foundations to which I have referred were retained in the Bill.

What the foundation should distribute, and how rapidly, consistent with the purposes of the foundation, are properly matters for the trustees of the foundation to determine and I believe that trustees generally are sensitive to their responsibilities in this respect. Some may be more so in the fact of comphehensive audits.

I was for a time on The Rockefeller Foundation Board of Trustees when Mr. Rockefeller, Jr. attended the meetings. I recall that at one time on his initiative the Board gave consideration to the wisdom of a mandatory program of liquidation for the Foundation. It turned out that the initial grants to the Foundations which totaled some $500,000,000 substantially increased due to the increased value of oil stocks held by the Foundation. It was not so very long after the Foundation had been set up that it had expended 500 million dollars in grants and it still had 500 million dollars in assets left to distribute. The Board weighed the pros and cons taking intc account the needs of the times and the interests of potential donees and they arrived at the conclusion that the Foundation ought not adopt a mandatory rule for its liquidation over any period of years. As I recall it, all the trustees accepted the principle that capital could be invaded and should be in the face of any pressing need. If the demand arose, it should be met even if it exhausted most or all of the assets of the foundation in one grant.

In the Ford Foundation during the period of my Chairmanship, in most years we spent much more than our income and the Board always felt that any real need which was presented to it should be met irrespective of the invasion of capital. Indeed, we adopted a regular program for doing so. I am told that foundations in the United States as a whole paid out last year over 7% of their asset value and this, of course, without any legal requirement that they do so. I have been associated with some foundations and I know of a number of others which have liquidated all their assets. I would imagine that a substantial percentage do so each year. I am entirely convinced that The Rockefeller Foundation has justified its continued existence. It has done some very imaginative and constructive things since the question of its possible termination first came up, a number of which were probably never in the contemplation of the original donors. I certainly can identify no deleterious effects on the country flowing from the continued existence of The Rockefeller Foundation long after the death of the original donors. I would at least postpone the inclusion of any provision which would lead to an enforced liquidation of a foundation until after we saw what the audits and the practices under the new law disclosed as to the growth of foundation assets. If they got out of line with the general growth of the country and its philanthropic needs, it would be time enough to move. I see no need for a self-liquidating provision now. I cannot object to a reasonable minimum of required distributions as I do not believe it is consistent with the principle of tax exemption for charitable purposes that non-income producing property be held interminably, or, indeed, for any substantial period of time without applying it to charitable purposes. I am told and believe the arbitrary requirement of 5% is too high certainly with the existing provisions relating to nonqualifying grants. If, as is now the case, income must be distributed within a reasonable period, I would leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to determine the minimum figure to be distributed taking into account the reasonable return on capital to be expected, but without introducing any note of enforced liquidation.

I cannot see the advantage of limiting the amount of grants that any one foundation as defined under the Bill could receive from any single source. Nor can I follow the definitions which would identify worthy organizations as private foundations (which do not seem to have the normal attributes of private foundations) thus subjecting them to the severities of the provisions against private foundations (including the tax) contained in the Bill. There is something radically wrong with this part of the Bill. Mr. Stratton has treated this subject in his testimony, as have some others. If some imaginative and constructive project involving a foundation, as defined in this Bill, needs support, why preclude a private foundation from furnishing it all the support it requires? Why disqualify a grant to such an organization in determining the required distribution quotas of the granting foundation? I could name a number of highly meritorious institutions and projects which these provisions would inhibit. Mr. Stratton has only named some of them. I will not go further into this subject as it already has been dealt with by Mr. Stratton, but I do believe as the Bill now stands unwarranted and unwise prohibitions or impediments to some highly desirable foundation grants are created.

Nor do I see any particular vice in the gift by an owner of a business of stock in that business to a foundation devoted to charitable purposes even though this may constitute the sole asset of the foundation. The vice occurs in any self-dealing or manipulation which results in a frustration of the fundamental charitable purpose of such a tax exempt foundation. Some of the abuses of the charitable purpose seem to center in this type of foundation. I sense that the drafters of the Bill have felt that some restriction on the amount of equity stock held by a foundation might be a desirable way of checking these abuses. If Congress wishes now to place a limitation on the amount of equity stock to be held by a foundation in any one company, this may be a reasonable exercise of its authority but I submit it would be unfair to well intentioned donors and their potential beneficiaries to compel the divestiture of such equity stock in excess of the limitation in such a way as to cause a substantial reduction of the values involved. If, let us say, in good faith the donor in the past had made a grant of equity stock in a closely held corporation which was legal at the time to a private foundation and he now finds that the foundation must divest itself of a certain portion of the stock to comply with the new law, some equitable device or mechanism for the sale or redemption of that stock under fair conditions and without tax penalties should be provided. There would be no problem for the corporation or the donor or the foundation if the stock consisted of readily marketable securities. It may be difficult to find the right mechanism and it would seem that in some cases the only way to insure an adequate price would be by way of redemption on the part of the corporation of the stock whatever the mechanism. Yet redemption may carry with it a threat of a high dividend tax to the donor or his estate or the corporation. The principle should be recognized that neither the foundation nor its potential grantees of the foundation nor the donors' legitimate interest should be prejudiced by the forced disposal of closely held stock due to newly imposed restrictions on the amount of stock (or other property) which may be held by a foundation.

I mention this situation because I believe the practice of an owner of a closely held business which he has built up of giving it by will or otherwise to a private foundation has been a rather prevalent one throughout this country. The practice is praiseworthy and should be encouraged rather than discouraged, but it will certainly be discouraged if the owner finds that the new restrictions on the amount of the foundation's holdings would compel divestiture by the foundation in such a way as to interfere with the realization by the foundation of the fair value of the excess stock or to expose the donor, his state, or the corporation to high tax penalties.

There are a number of other provisions in the Bill capable of clarification and improvement, most of which I believe have been referred to by earlier witnesses, but I wish to stress again my main point which is that the hostile and discriminatory measures poised against private foundations in this Bill should be entirely eliminated, leaving in only those that are well designed to deal with abuses of the tax exempt discretion, and that the means of instituting comprehensive and objective audits of the affairs of private foundations, with the cost defrayed by the foundations themselves, should be promptly instituted. I believe it to be unwise and imprudent on the part of Congress to incorporate in any tax reform bill provisions which would put to risk the steady flow of bequests for educational, scientific, cultural, medical and social purposes which the assets and operations of private foundations have thus far continuously and on the whole effectively and constructively afforded this country.

I find it quite paradoxical to observe at long last the adoption in Europe of the concept of American charitable foundations at just the time that this Bill containing provisions designed deliberately to discourage the creation and growth of American private foundations, appears in the Congress of the United States. The growth of such foundations in Germany and Italy particularly has to me been a very encouraging step in their advances in the field of private philanthropy. Incidentally, I believe that cooperation between the European and American private foundations could embody some most advantageous results in social, educational and scientific areas.

If it be urged that the need for private foundations in American life has now passed because the Government itself is becoming so heavily represented in the education and welfare field, I can only answer that, in my judgment, with the challenges this country faces the Government is going to need all the supplemental private help it can get and that without the flexibility and continued vigor of American private philanthropy of which the American private foundation has been such an important and outstanding factor since the turn of the century, those challenges are not apt to be met.

Senator RIBICOFF. John Macy, please. I am sure the other members of the Committee will give me the privilege of saying how I welcome my own constituent and close friend, John Macy. I am delighted to see you here, John. You may proceed, sir.

STATEMENT OF JOHN W. MACY, JR., PRESIDENT, CORPORATION FOR PUBLIC BROADCASTING

Mr. MACY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I would like to introduce my colleagues here at the witness table.

At my far left, Mr. James Day, the President of the National Educational Television and Radio Center, known as NET, the principal production center for public broadcasting, and on my immediate left, Mr. William Harley, who is President of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, which represents the public broadcasting community, the stations and the professionals in that field.

Mr. Chairman, both Mr. Harley and I have filed previously full statements before the committee. Mr. Day had some additional points which he has included in a supplementary statement and, with your permission, I would like to request that that statement be added to the record of the committee.

Senator RIBICOFF. Without objection they will be included in the record.*

(Mr. Macy's prepared statement follows:)

STATEMENT BY JOHN W. MACY, JR., PRESIDENT, CORPORATION FOR PUBLIC BROADCASTING

SUMMARY

The public broadcasting system at both the national and local levels will be adversely affected by a tax on taxable expenditures as provided in the proposed Section 4945.

The adverse effect is believed not to be intended but will occur unless Section 4945 is clarified. A simple clarifying addition to Section 4945 is proposed to resolve this problem.

Also, as discussed by Mr. William Harley, President of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, in his statement submitted for the record, problems of interpretation are presented by the definition of private foundations in proposed Section 509, and by certain other provisions of the bill.

As Mr. Harley's statement particularly makes clear, the Federal Government over an extended period of years has acted to encourage, develop, and finance public broadcasting in the public interest. In the absence of clarification the effect of H.R. 13270 will be to weaken the system Congress has been trying to establish and strengthen.

Private foundations both large and small have been a major source of financing for national organizations and local stations making up the public broadcasting system.

Without this foundation support the Federal Government would be required to increase its appropriations if public broadcasting is to be provided as stipulated in the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967.

Public broadcasting stations operate in accordance with law and FCC regulations and are specifically prohibited from editorializing or supporting or opposing candidates for elective office. Furthermore, they are bound by the fairness and equal-time doctrines. Thus public stations are already required by the nature of their licences and existing regulations to avoid the abuses against which the tax reform bill is directed.

The following language is proposed as amendment to section 4945 to clarify the intent of the legislation:

---

*Mr. Day's prepared statement appears at p. 5536; Mr. Haley's at p. 5546.

"(g) PUBLIC BROADCASTING—

"Subsections (b)(1) and (b)(2) shall not apply to amounts paid or incurred for the production or distribution of public affairs programs which are broadcast over noncommercial educational broadcast stations as defined in Section 397 (7) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (81 Stat. 368; 47 U.S.C. 397(7).)"

STATEMENT

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, my purpose for appearing before you today—not only on behalf of the CPB but also on behalf of all segments of the noncommercial, educational broadcasting community—is to discuss the debilitating impact of certain sections of H.R. 13270 on public broadcasting.

These sections as currently written pose a serious threat to a key role of public broadcasting—that of providing genuine public service to the community through the presentation of news, public affairs and discussion programming.

The irony of the situation, Mr. Chairman, is that I am convinced the drafters of H.R. 13270 never intended to pose any threat at all to individual public broadcasting stations, to state and regional networks, to the national production agencies, and to the Corporation, which was established by Congress itself.

In short, public broadcasting finds itself in a crossfire—by accident. Happily we can be removed from that crossfire without any change in the substance of the bill passed by the House. Some clarifying language can do the job.

To be specific, my concern is caused mainly by the proposed Section 4945—Taxes on Taxable Expenditures—as it will affect financial support of public broadcasting by private foundations.

I am advised by my counsel, Stephen Ailes, Esquire, of the firm of Steptoe and Johnson, that if this section becomes law as it stands, we must expect private foundations to discontinue giving financial support to public affairs programming. A copy of Mr. Ailes' discussion of the problem is attached to my statement.

It could be argued that the language in Section 4945 is not so restrictive as to prevent a private foundation from making a grant to a production facility or a qualified noncommercial educational station even though the station decides to use the money to present a news show, a panel discussion, or other public affairs programs.

But this is not the point. The problem is that private foundations will not take the very considerable risk and expose themselves to severe penalties if they do undertake financing which could possibly be interpreted as improper undr Section 4945. Obviously, a private foundation will avoid such risks and instead extend its financial support to other types of projects.

The practical consequence inevitably will be:

Withdrawal of millions of dollars of foundation grants from the already underfinanced public broadcasting system. A large part of this support—if not all of it—would be discontinued if Section 4945 stands as written. Furthermore, since much of this support typically requires matching funds, these funds also would be lost.

If such a substantial part of total financing is withdrawn, the American public would be deprived of a large and crucial part of the still very limited service they are receiving from public radio and television stations.

In the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, Congress declared a Federal responsibility for developing and financing public television in the public interest. Any reduction in financing from private sources increases the amount of Federal financing required.

WHAT IS PUBLIC BROADCASTING?

There are today some 185 noncommercial television stations and 400 noncommercial radio stations in operation. A list of these stations is attached, and you will see these stations are dispersed in all parts of the country.

The development of public broadcasting began with the recognition that the air waves are a public resource and should be utilized at least in part in the public interest. The Federal Communications Commission has set aside frequencies to be used only by noncommercial educational radio and television broadcasters.

Adequate frequencies have been reserved to provide a full service for the public. However, actual broadcast operations utilizing these frequencies are considerably fewer in number. Limited resources have prevented the establishment of all the operations that are visualized as ultimately desirable.

Federal assistance in the establishment of noncommercial educational stations was first provided by the Educational Television Facilities Act of 1962. Under the terms of this act, Federal funds were provided under a matching formula for the purchase of broadcasting equipment and facilities. The Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 continued Federal support for facilities on a matching basis and additionally extended the Federal support to noncommercial radio stations.

As a result of the expenditure of more than $32 million of Federal facilities money, the number of public stations has been doubled since the 1962 act. It is estimated that total Federal expenditures have been accompanied by eleven times that amount in funds committed by state and local governments and private sources.

The existence of available frequencies and even the existence of physical facilities, however, does not provide the public service visualized as necessary and desirable by the Congress. The missing element is programs. Congress created the Corporation for Public Broadcasting (Title II of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967) in order to provide the means of assisting stations in the program area.

As President of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, my concern is for all aspects of public broadcasting, not only for the operation of the Corporation itself but also for the activities of organizational units that create and produce programs that may be used by the public stations as well as for the public broadcasting stations themselves.

The principal role of the Corporation, as I have indicated, is to assist stations in their efforts to provide the communities served by them with programs of diversity and excellence, by assisting them in program production, by facilitating program distribution, and by encouraging the development of national production centers.

The Corporation's initial operations have been financed by a $5 million Federal appropriation for fiscal year 1969. The Senate has acted to authorize $20 million for 1970, and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has favorably reported authorization of $20 million for 1970.

One of the aims of Congress in creating the Corporation was to provide a means of stimulating nonfederal financing for public broadcasting. The Senate report accompanying the legislation creating the Corporation recognized the need for substantial Federal financing for public broadcasting but expressed the hope that eventually the major part of the revenue would come from private sources.

We have been encouraged by the amount of private financing we have received to date. By the end of 1969, our $5 million of appropriated funds had been augmented by $2,725,970 of private financing. Our goal for 1970 is an additional $4 million of private financing.

Private foundations have been the major source of nongovermental financing for the Corporation and for other organizational units in the public broadcasting system. Now this source of private support would—at least to a large extent—be cut off as a result of the legislation before you. It is this unfortunate and, I am sure, unintended consequence that we ask you to prevent.

THE PUBLIC BROADCASTING STATION

The average public television station operates on a very small budget. (The median for operations in 1967 was $319,943.) A typical station broadcasts about ten hours a day with about five hours devoted to instructional television used in classrooms and the other five hours devoted to programs for reception in the home. The programs intended for home use fall into some general categories: programs for children, for continuing adult education, for public affairs, and for cultural affairs.

Most public broadcasting stations are operated by school systems, by city or state governments, or by universities. Thirty-eight public television stations are organized as nonprofit community stations, and these tend to be in the larger cities; for example, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, New Orleans, and Washington.

Station revenues then come from various local governmental sources in the case of most stations, and from contributions from the general public in the case of the community stations. Additionally, stations to varying extents receive support from Federal agencies, from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, and from private foundations, both the large foundations and many local or specialized foundations.

Arthur D. Little, Inc., analyzed sources of revenues for public television in the year ending June 30, 1967. Total station operating revenue was $44.8 mil- of which $26.8 million was supplied by local governments or universities for instructional programs for classroom use, and $18 million was for programs for reception in the home. Foundations provided $6.3 million of that amount for such local operations.

Foundations, particularly the Ford Foundation, through National Educational Television, have also largely supported programs made available to local stations by way of national distribution. Recently, such national programming has been generously supported by the Ford Foundation, the Carnegie Corporation, and the Sears Roebuck Foundation.

For example, a major source of such programs directed to preschool children is Children's Television Workshop. This workshop is financed in part by the Office of Education and by private foundations. "Misterogers Neighborhood", the outstanding prize-winning program for children carried by public television, has been continued as a result of a grant from the Sears Foundation.

Withdrawal of foundation support at both the station and national levels would materially affect the very nature of the public broadcasting service as we know it now and would move the industry backward instead of forward toward the fulfillment of its goal of service to the country.

MOST IMPORTANT CONCERN

A single simple solution in the form of clarification to H.R. 13270 will solve this problem.

Public broadcasting is subject to a body of law and regulation that is more stringent than the controls on commercial broadcasting stations. A public station cannot editorialize, for example; it cannot support a candidate for office nor advocate any candidate's cause. Together with commercial stations, the public station shares the responsibility for observing the fairness and equal time doctrines.

So here we would have an anomaly: a key information medium in the community, already required by the nature of its license and existing regulations to avoid the abuses the tax reform bill seeks to prevent, would be prevented from undertaking the activities for which it exists.

The proposed Section 4945 describes taxable expenditures by private foundations and imposes penalties in the form of taxes of 100 percent of any taxable expenditure on the foundation and 50 percent of the amount on the managers of the foundations who knowingly make taxable expenditures.

Subsection (b) states that "the term 'taxable expenditures' means any amount paid or incurred by a private foundation—

(1) to carry out propaganda, or otherwise attempt to influence legislation,

(2) to influence the outcome of any public election (including voter registration drives carried on by or for such foundation)."

Clearly the amount spent by private foundations to influence legislation or elections is subject to tax.

The question is whether a public broadcasting organization may be given a foundation grant without penalty to the foundation if the station then uses the grant to pay all or part of the costs of presenting news and public affairs programs.

The stations exist in part for that very purpose. Congress in the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 acted to improve and develop these very public broadcasting stations and the program centers that serve them. The stations and such program centers must operate within a set of rules that assure their activities shall be devoid of the abuses that the tax reform bill seeks to cure. The local station manager has complete authority and responsibility over what programs are actually broadcast in his community.

It would seem, therefore, that a foundation grant made in support of public broadcasting—even in the public affairs area—would not be classed as a taxable expenditure.

Regrettably, this construction of the section is not the only one. I am advised that the foundations themselves view the situation quite differently. How the foundations conduct themselves is, of course, the critical issue. If the foundations believe that the present proposed language prohibits grants for public affairs, then, obviously, no grants are going to be provided. If foundation support is withdrawn, as I am advised it will be, then the public broadcasting system and the communities served by that system will be the losers.

In order to make clear that the intent is not to prevent public broadcasting stations from presenting public affairs programs, such as news programs, documentaries, panel discussions, political debates, and interviews, with the assistance of financial support from private foundations, I propose a simple addition to the proposed Section 4945 as follows:

(g) PUBLIC BROADCASTING.—Subsections (b)(1) and (b)(2) shall not apply to amounts paid or incurred for the production or distribution of public affairs programs which are broadcast over noncommercial educational broadcast stations as defined in Section 397(7) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (81 Stat. 368; 47 U.S.C. 397(7)).

The Communications Act defines "Noncommercial educational broadcast station" as meaning those stations licensed as such by the Federal Communications Commission and which are owned and operated by a public agency or nonprofit organization or those stations which are owned and operated by municipalities and which broadcast only noncommercial programs for educational purposes. All such stations are specifically required as a condition of their license to present public affairs programs but, equally, are forbidden by Section 399 of the Communications Act from engaging in editorializing or supporting or opposing any candidate for political office. Thus, this existing law which specifically regulates noncommercal stations, together with the requirements for fairness and equal time to which all stations are subject, already fully prevents noncommercial stations from committing the abuses to which Sections 4945(b) (1) and (2) are directed.

Before I close, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a general comment about one other aspect of H.R. 13270 as it affects foundation operations.

H.R. 13270 imposes an annual 7.5% tax on the investment income of private foundations. We cannot help but believe that such a tax will result in a reduction in the amount of grants that the public broadcasting system may hope to get from private foundations—assuming we can clear the obstacles to getting grants. The amount of money available to the foundation for distribution will have to be reduced by the amount of the tax, and only the remainder will be available in the form of grants. In 1967 the total contribution by all foundations was $18 million. The proposed tax on this total would result in a shrinkage of $1.4 million. This tax, in other words, will actually be paid for by the public broadcasting recipients of grants since we expect the grants to be reduced by the amount of the tax.

Returning to my main point, in summary, I find no evidence that the Members of the Ways and Means Committee or the Members of the House of Representatives intended that noncommercial, educational broadcasting stations be deprived of private foundation support for broadcasting services so vital as coverage of public affairs.

The foundations themselves, however, cannot be expected to take the risks and expose themselves to the penalties that they feel apply according to the present language of the bill.

The additional language that I have suggested would, I feel sure, in no way change the substance of the bill but would provide the clarification necessary to enable the private foundations to give grants to public broadcasting on their own merit.

I urge Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, to provide this vital clarification.

STEPTOE & JOHNSON,
Washington, D.C., September 3, 1969.

Mr. JOHN W. MACY, Jr.,
President, Corporation for Public Broadcasting,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MACY: At your request we have examined the proposed Tax Reform Act of 1969, H.R. 13270, with regard to its impact on the financial support of noncommercial educational radio and television broadcasting. Public broadcasting in the United States receives funds from a variety of sources including the federal, state and local governments, school districts, universities, business and private citizens. In addition, a substantial source of funds in recent years has been those organizations which under the proposed new section 509 are defined as "private foundations." Our analysis reveals that the proposed legislation includes provisions which could, if enacted without clarification, seriously hamper the ability of public, noncommercial broadcasting to continue receiving financial assistance from private foundations.

TAXABLE EXPENDITURES

H.R. 13270 proposes to amend the Internal Revenue Code by the addition of a new section 4945 which would impose a 100 percent tax on "taxable expenditures" by private foundations. This section also imposes a tax upon the foundation official responsible for the expenditure, for which tax the official is personally liable. "Taxable expenditure" is defined by section 4945(b) to mean, among other things, any amount paid or incurred by a private foundation—

(1) to carry out propaganda, or otherwise attempt to influence legislation, or

(2) to influence the outcome of any public election (including voter registration drives carried on by or for such foundation).

This definition of taxable expenditure may create a problem for noncommercial educational broadcasting by limiting the ability of this media to continue to engage in news and public affairs broadcasts. The purpose of public affairs and news broadcasts is to inform or educate—hence to "influence"—the viewer. The most objective presentations of current, newsworthy subjects will in this sense, "influence" the audience. In fact, the reason for such programming would cease to exist if it failed to educate and enlighten the viewer. Thus, it is clearly possible that the language of section 4945(b)(1) and (2) could be construed to include within the ambit of taxable expenditures noncommercial television or radio broadcasts treating with legislative issues or public elections.

There is, however, no specific indication that such an interpretation was contemplated by either the House of Representatives or its Committee on Ways and Means at the time they considered and approved H.R. 13270. Further, there are substantial reasons why public affairs and news programming should not constitute taxable expenditures. Noncommercial educational broadcast stations, unlike their commercial counterparts, are already forbidden from engaging in editorializing or supporting political candidates by section 399 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, which provides:

No noncommercial educational broadcasting station may engage in editorializing or may support or oppose any candidate for political office. 47 U.S.C. § 399.

The legislative history of this provision, which was part of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, emphasizes, however, that the Congress did not intend to prevent educational broadcasters from engaging in public affairs programming. Rather, it appears that the Congress expected these stations to be the leaders in this area. For example, the report of the Senate Commerce Committee states:

Particularly in the area of public affairs your committee feels that noncommercial broadcasting is uniquely fitted to offer in-depth coverage and analysis which will lead to a better informed and enlightened public. S. REP. NO. 222, 90th Cong., 1st Sess 7 (1967).

And the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce observed:

Considerable testimony was heard that no noncommercial educational station editorializes.

Out of abundance of caution, the bill provides that "no noncommercial educational broadcasting station may engage in editorializing or may support or oppose any candidate for political office." It should be emphasized that this section is not intended to preclude balanced, fair and objective presentations of controversial issues by noncommercial stations. H.R. REP. NO. 572, 90th Cong., 1st Sess 20 (1967).

In addition to being subject to this prohibition against editorializing, noncommercial educational stations are also subject to the same Federal Communications Commission regulations, such as that imposing the doctrine of fairness (47 CFR § 73.123, see Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, United States Supreme Court, October Term 1968, Nos. 2 and 717), and the statutory requirement regarding equal time (47 U.S.C. § 315, 48 Stat. 1088, as amended), as are commercial stations. Further, under present FCC policy, any station that fails to offer news and public affairs programs is in serious danger of having its license renewal application denied. Report and Statement of Policy Re: Commission En Banc Programming Inquiry, July 29, 1960, FCC 60-970, 25 Federal Register 7291.

Noncommercial, educational broadcasters, therefore, are already under a legal obligation to present public affairs programming that is free of both editorial comment and support (or opposition) for any candidate. The inclusion of public affairs and news broadcasts by educational stations in the concept of "taxable expenditure" is neither necessary for the control of abuses nor appropriate in view of the provision of the Communications Act and the regulations of the Federal Communications Commission. However, as long as the language of 4945(b)(1) and (2) is open to the broad interpretations discussed above, and as long as the tax penalty to be imposed is so severe, it follows that no private foundation funds will be available for public affairs programs by educational broadcasters unless an unequivocal clarification is obtained.

DEFINITION OF PRIVATE FOUNDATION

There are presently approximately 164 noncommercial educational television stations and 384 radio stations in the United States. A substantial number of these stations are owned by states, school districts or universities. It is probable that virtually none of these stations would be private foundations under the definition contained in proposed section 509 because they receive almost all of their support from government sources.

There are, however, a substantial number of stations known as "community" stations which receive funds from more diverse sources. It is possible that some few of these stations may not qualify as an organization described in 170(b)(1)(B) of the Internal Revenue Code or under any of the other exemptions from the private foundation category. If clarification of 4945(b)(1) and (2) is not obtained, such a station, as a private foundation, would be prevented from engaging in any public affairs programming. As pointed out above, this would place a station in breach of its legal obligation to serve the public fully and could lead to the loss of its broadcast license.

TAX ON PRIVATE FOUNDATION INVESTMENT INCOME

H.R. 13270 includes a proposed new section 506 which would impose upon private foundations a tax equal to 7½% of its net investment income for each taxable year. This provision inevitably will result in an equivalent reduction in the amount of funds available for distribution by private foundations which quite possibly could lead to a corresponding substantial decrease in the funds received by educational broadcasting.

ALTERATIONS IN CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTION DEDUCTION

Section 201 of H.R. 13270 would amend existing Internal Revenue Code sections 170 and 1011 to eliminate certain advantages accruing to taxpayers who give or sell appreciated property to charity. Under present law a taxpayer who contributes property to charity is allowed a charitable contribution deduction for the fair market value of the property and he pays no tax on the amount of gain resulting from the appreciation. Further, if a taxpayer now sells property to a charity for less than its market value the proceeds of the sale are treated as a recovery of the cost and the seller is allowed a charitable contribution deduction for the appreciation in excess of the sale price. These provisions furnish a strong incentive for prospective donors to support charitable causes through conveyances of appreciated property. Their existence has undoubtedly been responsible for the flow to charitable organizations of a major portion of all contributions.

The new provisions would deny the donor a charitable deduction in excess of of his own cost in acquiring the property. This change would apply to all gifts of property to private foundations, all gifts of property the sale of which would have resulted in ordinary income or short-term capital gain, all gifts of tangible personal property and all gifts of future interests in property.

The television auctions conducted by many community educational stations for fund-raising purposes may prove a casualty of this change since it will substantially reduce existing incentives for making gifts of property to charity.

CONCLUSION

The taxable expenditure provisions in the proposed new section 4945(b)(1) and (2) of the Internal Revenue Code pose a serious threat to the ability of noncommercial educational broadcasting to continue to obtain substantial private funding. While there are no specific indications that the House of Representatives intended to prevent private foundations from giving funds to educational broadcast activities which engage in public affairs programs, the language of 4945(b)(1) and (2) is sufficiently broad and vague to lead to that result. Because of the substantial penalty imposed on taxable expenditures, it is likely that all doubts will be resolved against making grants to educational broadcasters who produce, distribute or carry news or public affairs programs.

It is also likely that the imposition of a 7½ percent tax on the net investment income of private foundations and the alteration of the charitable deduction provisions relating to the gift or sale of appreciated property will result in corresponding reductions of private contributions to noncommercial educational broadcasting.

Very truly yours,

STEPHEN AILES.

Mr. MACY. Mr. Chairman, we are here today, as your final witnesses after hearing from representatives of the foundations to talk about the impact of the House bill on a new industry, a new public service industry, public broadcasting.

We believe that the House bill would adversely affect the development of that industry in the public interest. We believe that the adverse effect was not intended by the House but that in the drafting of the legislation it encompassed in their language certain conditions which would injure public broadcasting.

We offer in a brief summary some proposed solutions which we believe will clarify the intent of the legislation and remove the inherent dangers that are involved in the language as it stands.

In order to do this, I plead for your indulgence for a few moments to describe what public broadcasting is. The airwaves are a public resource. Over the years the Government has acted to reserve at least a part of this resource for the public interest, to serve the needs of the American people in education and in other forms of public service.

Senator RIBICOFF. I do not want to interrupt, but as an oldtimer on the Hill you realize that bell was one bell for a vote.

Mr. MACY. I have heard that before.

Senator RIBICOFF. Yes. So we will recess until we have an opportunity to vote and then, if you will be patient, we will come back and allow you to finish.

Mr. MACY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator RIBICOFF. We will recess for 15 minutes.

(Whereupon, there was a short recess.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Macy, you were interrupted, and I would just urge you to continue your statement at the point where you were.

Mr. MACY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As a result of Government action to reserve frequencies for educational broadcasting, as a result of legislation to assist local stations in financing facility construction and installation, and then most recently in 1967, the plant to finance program production and program distribution through the creation of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, we have seen steps taken toward the beginning of a substantial public service in both television and radio.

Today there are some 185 public television stations, and 400 public radio stations in operation. These stations are all nonprofit organizations. Many of them are financed by State and local authorities, by school systems or by universities. Major television stations are nonprofit community organizations, mainly dependent upon private financing, including most importantly, foundation financing.

I emphasize that all of these stations are noncommercial, they do not sell commercial time. Therefore, they are totally dependent upon a combination of private financing and what they are able to receive from public sources.

The programs presented by the noncommercial stations tend to fall into several public service categories: Programs for children in the school and in the home, continuing education for adults, public affairs, cultural offerings in music, drama and other areas.

A substantial part of the public is now within the reach of the signals of public stations. From the information that we have before us of 58 million television set owning families, 46 million are within the public television signal areas.

Typically, a public television station will be on the air 10 hours a day during the week. Five of these hours would be used for classroom instruction, and the other 5 hours for home reception in continuing education, public and cultural affairs.

Now, turning to the House bill, there are two sections that cause principal concern for public broadcasting. The first is proposed section 509, which defines private foundations; then, too, the proposed section 4945 which establishes a tax on taxable expenditures. Basically, 4945 is our central problem, and I am really focusing my principal attention on that.

Mr. Harley, on my left, has submitted a statement in the record and in his statement gives in greater detail the technical aspects that concern us with respect to the definitions in section 509.

Mr. Day, in his statement, refers to the issues involved in the legislation which particularly relate to the National Education Television and Radio Center. He also touches on significant constitutional issues which we believe call for close consideration by the committee members and the staff.

These lurking constitutional questions call for precise definition in order to avoid later challenge.

But turning to section 4945, this, as we heard today, prevents foundations from taking action that might affect the opinion of the public or any part of the public in ways that might influence elections or influence legislation.

Public affairs programs in public broadcasting influence opinion that might affect legislation or elections. So really a public affairs discussion, if it is to be significant in terms of the public interest may, usually by indirection, influence the opinion of those who view or listen.

Given the language of 4945 as it now stands, I am informed by counsel that foundations have concluded they could not make grants to public broadcasting either to a national production center, such as NET, or individual stations if those grants, directly or indirectly, resulted in the production of public affairs programs.

Now, it is understandable that the legislation would have that kind of chilling effect in view of the penalties in the form of taxation of 100 percent of expenditures on the foundation, and 50 percent on what is described as the managers of the foundations who knowingly make taxable expenditures.

This is so severe as to provide an unwillingness or motivate an unwillingness on the part of the foundations to take the necessary risk.

I am convinced from the conversations I have had with Members of the Congress that there was not an intent that this consequence result from that legislation. Therefore, it is our view that there is need for clarification of this fact in a revision of this language.

I think it is important to recognize the vital importance of foundation support in public broadcasting operations. Foundation grants provide at both national and station level significant support. In the early days of the development of public broadcasting, the foundations had provided the difference between development and no progress at all.

Public broadcasting has been the beneficiary of grants from large national foundations and from small local specialized foundations which have assisted the stations.

In total, this foundation support is significant. It is estimated to be $17.5 million in 1967. This is 28 percent of the total financing for public television broadcasting in that year. Withdrawal of this support would have serious consequences for NET in its production of important national programing and public affairs and for local stations in serving their audiences in their broadcast areas.

We feel that the intent of H.R. 13270 is to prevent abuses, abuses in influencing public opinion, influencing the outcome of elections.

Public stations, radio and television, exist in large part for the purpose of providing news, information, interpretation, public service to the citizenry, so that the public can more completely fulfill the responsibilities of citizenship. This is a means for enhancing communication with the American people so that they are in a better position to make the choices that must be theirs in a democracy on the key issues.

Public stations are controlled now by existing laws and by the FCC regulations for the purpose of preventing the very abuses that appear to be the concern of H.R. 13270.

The statutes provide, particularly section 399 of the Communications Act of 1934, that noncommercial educational stations may not engage in editorializing or supporting or opposing any candidate for any political office. That is already on the statute books.

Stations are required, as are commercial stations, to observe the fairness and equal time doctrine. Those are safeguards against any kind of abuse.

As a condition of the license granted by the FCC stations must provide public affairs programing. This is one of the standards that is viewed in considering a license application. So the statutory obligation apparently intended by the House in the bill is inherent in the purpose of these stations themselves.

Stations, to my knowledge, have avoided and will continue to avoid the abuses in section——

The CHAIRMAN. If you will permit me to interrupt you one moment, Senator Ribicoff is going to conclude the hearings today, but I just wanted you to prepare the amendments or else prepare a memo suggesting the amendments that you think are necessary to take care of your industry. You are talking about the educational television people.

Mr. MACY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And I will join with the Senator in seeing they are considered.

Mr. MACY. Thank you very much.

Senator RIBICOFF. I would be very sympathetic if you would sit down with those amendments, work them out and present them to me, my staff, and I will be glad to introduce them.

I think you make very pertinent points here.

Mr. MACY. Thank you, Senator. We have that language and we would welcome the opportunity to collaborate with you.

Senator RIBICOFF. I will talk with you later on and make some suggestions.

Mr. MACY. Fine.

If I may, I would like to provide a supplementary comment from Mr. Day and Mr. Harley, if that is agreeable with you.

Senator RIBICOFF. Perfectly all right. You have waited so long, the least I can do is wait for you.

Mr. MACY. Well, Mr. Day was commenting a moment ago that he hopes that the conditions in the room, the absence of an audience, was not symbolic of the future of public television. I am convinced it is not.

Senator RIBICOFF. I hope so, too.

I have a question sometimes, but I feel you have got a long row to hoe. I think you are doing a good job, and I trust the listening public will get to appreciate you more and more with each passing day.

Mr. MACY. Mr. Day will be very instrumental in achieving the kind of programing that will attract those audiences, and I am sure you will be interested in hearing from him. Mr. Day.

STATEMENT OF JAMES DAY, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION & RADIO CENTER

Mr. DAY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Although I have been president of NET, National Educational Television, for only 2 months, I have served for 16 years as the president and general manager of one of the 166 public television stations in the country that are served by this national programing service. The NET service amounts to 5 hours weekly and provides many of the most important and significant programs that are broadcast on the 166 public television stations affiliated with NET.

I think it is important to point out that each of these stations is independent and may run or may not run any or all of the programs as they choose.

My concern, of course, as president of NET is with those aspects of the law that would be nothing less than the death knell to at least part of our programing. At the moment half of our total program service is concerned with national and international issues, and we would be precluded from broadcasting such programs that would influence legislation or influence elections.

This, of course, we feel would be a deprivation for the American public which has the right to know, and we feel, of course, that public television has the obligation to provide that information.

It is also important to point out that if, by putting political candidates on the air, a program influences elections, then under the terms of the House bill NET would be precluded from offering free time to political candidates.

Finally, even if it were possible to exclude NET from those prohibitions placed upon private foundations it would still place NET in the position of having each of its grants from a private foundation examined to see whether, in fact, they would be spent to influence public opinion, and the consequence of this would be more control by foundations rather than less control, and we think this would be bad.

Thank you.

Mr. MACY. Thank you, Mr. Day.

33-865 O—69—pt. 6——30

STATEMENT BY JAMES DAY, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION & RADIO CENTER

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I am James Day, President of the National Educational Television and Radio Center, known as NET. The purpose of my testimony is to discuss the problems posed for public broadcasting and for NET by the proposed Tax Reform Act of 1969 (H.R. 13270).

We are particularly concerned with the language presently contained in Sections 4945(b)(1), (b)(2) and (c)(1) of the proposed Act, which are designed to restrict the "legislation-influencing" and "election-influencing" activities of "private foundations." As I will discuss later in greater detail, it is our position that, if enacted, these provisions will seriously hamper, if not emasculate, the public affairs broadcasting activities of NET. [See Part III at page 9.] Since we believe that the Treasury proposal of September 30, 1969, does not solve the problems which we find in Section 4945,* we propose the following addition to Section 4945:

"(g) Public broadcasting.—Subsections (b)(1) and (b)(2) shall not apply to amounts paid or incurred for the production or distribution of public affairs programs which are broadcast over noncommercial educational broadcast stations as defined in Section 397(7) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (81 Stat. 368; 47 U.S.C. 397(7))."

We are also vitally concerned with the classification, under the proposed Act, of a foundation such as NET. Unless NET qualifies as a non-private foundation or as a private operating foundation as defined in Section 4942(j)(3), grants to NET will not be "qualifying distributions" under Section 4942 and, hence, foundation managers will undoubtedly discontinue all grants to NET. This will have the immediate effect of cutting off funding for the production of almost all national programs for public broatdcasting, a public service that Congress has repeatedly sought to strengthen. [See Part IV at page 30.]

We believe that it is crucial that both of these problems be solved in order to insure the continued functioning of NET, public broadcasting's major program source, and also the continued viability of the entire non-commercial educational television and radio system. The testimony of Mr. Macy, President of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, and Mr. Harley, President of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, explore the problems caused by the proposed Tax Reform Act to the other major elements in the public broadcasting system. NET endorses both of these statements.

I. OPERATIONS OF NET

NET is an Illinois non-profit corporation, incorporated in 1952, organized and operated exclusively for scientific, educational and charitable purposes. NET's primary purpose is to "promote the advancement of educational television and radio for the general welfare." In furtherance of this purpose, NET acquires and supplies programs to its 166 affiliated stations. In addition, NET provides essential advisory services for these stations which they could not otherwise individually afford. NET's sole function is to provide programs and services to its affiliated educational television stations.

Neither NET, nor its affiliated stations, may accept commercial sponsorship. NET is therefore completely dependent on such financial support as it receives from the United States Government and private foundations, the small amounts it receives from the general public and the small amounts in fees it receives from its affiliated stations. Since 1963, NET has received unrestricted annual grants of approximately $6 million from the Ford Foundation. NET also received funds from other sources. This year, for example, we received approximately $1.8 million from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. All of our funds are spent annually.

*Because the "substantial" test of existing law (Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954) is eliminated by Section 4945, it is critically important that that section be both clear and limited as to the activities which it covers. We believe that the Treasury's language is not sufficiently clear. While the Treasury states that its proposal to amend Section 4945(c) would limit it to existing law, this is not entirely clear from the proposal's language. Moreover, without the "substantial" test, even the language of existing law is not sufficiently explicit. Finally, the Treasury proposal does not amend the language of Section 4945(b)(2).

NET is a prime source of educational television programing intended for the general public. Nearly 50% of such programs are provided by NET. NET currently provides at least five weekly hours of original programing to its affiliated stations.

The programs supplied by NET constitute an important alternative to those offered by the major national commercial networks—ABC, CBS and NBC. Half of NET's schedule consists of public affairs programs such as news programs, documentaries, panel discussions, political debates, and interviews. The programs consider important current issues in foreign policy, politics, and government as well as other social and economic questions. "NET Journal," for example, is a thought-provoking weekly hour-long series that examines crucial domestic and international issues such as poverty, prejudice, problems of public and private education, the balance of world power, the Supreme Court and world hunger. NET programs deal in depth with events that commercial networks do not fully cover as well as other news items that may not otherwise be broadcast to the public. The balance of NET's schedule consists of programs of primarily cultural interest—dealing with the arts, drama, history, humanity and science—and children's programing. Some of these cultural programs may deal with public issues and in this sense are public affairs programs. Various national and international awards have been made to NET for its programs. For example, NET was awarded Emmy and Peabody Awards this year for two of its series.

Under Section 399 of the Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 399, the public noncommercial broadcasting stations affiliated with NET may not "engage in editorializing" and may not "support or oppose any candidate for political office." Further, Section 315 of the Communications Act, 47 U.S.C. § 315, and the Federal Communications Commission's fairness doctrine * require that these stations give reply time to opposing political candidates and for competing views on controversial public issues. NET insures that its programming complies with these requirements and with the recently adopted personal attack rules, requiring that individuals or groups which are personally attacked be afforded time to reply, 47 C.F.R. § 73.679. It does not offer programming that might be held to constitute political or legislative editorializing, and its programs are produced with strict adherence to objectivity and balance.

II. CURRENT TAX STATUS OF NET

At present, NET qualifies as an educational organization exempt from federal income tax under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Qualification as a Section 501(c)(3) organization has other, equally important, tax benefits to NET. Other private foundations can contribute funds to NET without fear of losing their own 501(c)(3) tax exempt status. Individuals contributing to NET can deduct the amount of such contributions up to 20 percent of adjusted gross income under Section 170 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

NET must, to retain its Section 501(c)(3) status, insure that "no substantial part" of its activities consists of "carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting to influence legislation," and it cannot, even to an insubstantial degree, "participate in, or intervene in * * * any political campaign on behalf of any candidate for public office." Despite the ambiguity of the terms "attempting to influence legislation" and "substantial" and the lack of consistency in their interpretation by the Internal Revenue Service and the courts, we are certain that NET can continue under present law to present balanced public affairs programming dealing with topics that are the subject of current or potential legislation without jeopardizing its Section 501(c)(3) status. Further, we are confident that NET will continue to present balanced coverage of candidates and election issues without being held to have "intervened" in an election on behalf of a candidate.

III. PROBLEMS POSED BY SECTION 4945

1. Effect of Proposed Sections 4945(b)(1), (b)(2) and (c)(1) on NET

a. Proposed changes from present law.—H.R. 13270 proposes to amend the Internal Revenue Code by adding a new Section 4945(a) which would impose a 100 percent tax on "taxable expenditures" by a "private foundation" and a 50 percent tax on foundation "managers"—including officers and directors—who approve such an expenditure. (In some cases a 100 percent tax would also be imposed on a foundation manager.) For reasons I will discuss later, NET would be held to constitute a "private foundation" subject to Section 4945. The consequence of this is that NET—and the foundations which support NET—are subject to the penalty tax if they make "taxable expenditures."

"Taxable expenditures" are defined by Section 4945(b) to include any amounts paid—

> "(1) to carry out propaganda, or otherwise to attempt to influence legislation, or
> "(2) to influence the outcome of any public election * * * ."

Section 4945(c) states that Section 4945(b) (1) expressly includes:

> "(1) any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof * * * ."

The proposed law does not contain the "substantial" test which presently allows a certain amount of direct or indirect lobbying on legislation to be carried on by an exempt organization without punitive consequences.

The coverage of Sections 4945(b) (1), (b) (2) and (c) (1) is very difficult to determine. Section 4945(b) (1), defining a "taxable expenditure", merely repeats the "attempt to influence legislation" language of present law (Section 501(c) (3)). As such, standing alone, it seems to cover only those "legislation-influencing" activities now covered by Section 501(c) (3). Ambiguity arises, however, because of the new language in sub-section (c) (1), which expressly includes in those activities covered by subsection (b) (1) "any attempt to influence legislation through an attempt to affect the opinion of the general public or any segment thereof * * * ." Section 4945(b) (2) also differs from present law by defining as a "taxable expenditure" any amount incurred "to influence the outcome of any public election". Both 4945(c) (1) and 4945(b) (2) seem to expand the scope of definitions in prior law of what will be considered "legislation-influencing" and "election-influencing" activities that certain 501(c) (3) organizations may not undertake in the following ways:

(i) Restrictions on "legislation-influencing" activities.—Subsection (c) (1) seems designed at least in part to clarify existing law by accepting the Treasury view that "grassroots" lobbying—urging the public to contact legislators—on particular legislation or legislative proposals is included within the present definition of "attempting to influence legislation" in Section 501(c) (3). See Treas. Reg. § 1.501(c) (3)-1(c) (3) (ii). It may also be designed to cover editoralizing (i.e., taking an organizational position) on legislation, which the Treasury also interprets as falling within this phrase in Section 501(c) (3) Ibid. The language can, however, be interpreted to cover much more, and to restrict the educational activities of organizations defined as "private foundations" even though these efforts are factual and balanced. These efforts usually are carried on for the very purpose of "affecting public opinion", if only to affect the public by making it aware of the issues.

Certainly NET's public affairs documentaries, panel discussions, interviews, and in-depth news programs have this purpose, even though they are balanced presentations, satisfying the FCC's fairness and personal attack doctrines and the statutory prohibitions against editorializing by non-commercial broadcasters. Thus under the broadest possible interpretation of this statute, if NET presented a balanced program or series of programs on a current topic such as the ABM controversy, the draft, or the Vietnam War, it could conceivably be held to be "affecting public opinion" on present or possible future legislation dealing with these issues.

(ii) Restrictions on "election-influencing" activities.—Subsection (b) (2) also seems to go beyond present law by excluding another large segment of NET's activities that might technically be held to "influence the outcome" of an election. Just as even balanced educational reporting of legislative issues will inevitably "affect" public opinion, any balanced educational broadcasts dealing with election issues should have at least some minimal influence upon the "outcome" of that election. Again the very purpose of such broadcasts, which are subject to the equal time requirements of Section 315 of the Communication Act, 47 U.S.C. § 315, is to attempt to give the public the full facts and all viewpoints so as to stimulate thought and discussion of the issues among the electorate. If these programs were not successful in helping to create informed voters, there would be no reason for their existence.

b. The proposed changes would severely curtail NET's public affairs programs.—If Section 4945 is enacted without clarifying amendments, NET would be confronted with essentially two choices: (1) it could forfeit its tax exempt status or (2) it could cease to make "taxable expenditures". If NET were to adopt the first alternative, it would have to cease business entirely since approximately 75% of its current support is from "private foundations" which could no longer make qualifying contributions to NET.

Under the second alternative NET's "managers"—including its officers and directors—faced with the spectre of heavy personal as well as institutional penalties for a mistaken interpretation of the language of the section, will be reluctant to undertake public affairs programing on issues that have any remote link with current or potential legislation. NET might also have increasing difficulty in persuading highly qualified men to serve as trustees and officers in the face of such great potential liability. Further, even if NET and its managers were willing to risk the statutory penalties, NET would be forced to adopt a programming policy foregoing public affairs broadcasts in order to continue to get financial support from other private foundations. Prudent foundation managers would not make grants to NET if there were any possibility that they might ultimately be used for public affairs programing coming within the "taxable expenditures" definition of Section 4945.

2. Reasons Why Section 4945 Should Be Redrafted To Exempt Public Broadcasting

a. None of the alleged abuses giving rise to section 4945 is in any way related to NET.—None of the Congressional concerns which led to the provisions of Section 4945 of H.R. 13270 in any way relates to the activities of NET or public broadcasting. There has been no testimony before the House committee or this committee concerning any alleged improper activities by NET or any entity engaged in the field of public broadcasting. Moreover, none of the alleged abuses which led to Section 4945 relates to the activities of NET or public broadcasting.

The impetus for the expanded definition of "legislation-influencing" activities in Section 4945(b)(1) and (c)(1) is somewhat obscure. The House Committee on Ways and Means, after extensive hearings, noted in its report transmitting H.R. 13270 that "in recent years, private foundations had been moving increasingly into political and legislative activities". H.R. Rep. No. 91–413, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., pt. 1, 32 (1969) (hereinafter referred to as "House Committee Report"). There is, however, nothing in the report that clearly indicates exactly what the committee meant by "legislative activities". It is clear that it wanted to stop foundations from direct lobbying and "grass-roots" campaigns to urge the public to contact legislators, alleged abuses considered in its hearings, but whether anything beyond this was contemplated is uncertain.

Examples of "political activities" the committee wanted to curtail under Section 4945(b)(2) were more clearly stated in the report. The committee definitely wanted to stop voter registration campaigns in limited geographical areas that were designed to favor the registration of voters who would support certain candidates. It also wanted to prevent private foundations from spending their funds to "publicize the views, personalities and activities of certain candidates" and "to subsidize preparation of materials furthering specific political viewpoints." House Committee Report, pp. 32–33. None of these activities is or has been carried on by NET or any other element of the public broadcasting system. Although both NET and other public broacasters do present balanced coverage of elections, such activity, as before, was not the concern of the House committee.

b. Restricting public broadcasting activities would be contrary to the public interest and congressional policy.—More fundamentally, we strongly believe that it would not serve the public interest to restrict programming for the public broadcasting system. Public broadcasting supplies an important alternative source of public affairs programming in the United States. At present local noncommercial stations, lacking the technical and monetary resources, are not heavily engaged in program production. Educational stations rely strongly on NET to supply the public affairs programming that they must present to satisfy the conditions of their broadcast licenses* and to serve the interest of their viewing audiences. NET programming thus contributes substantially to the strength of non-commercial television and the diversity of programming that Congress and the FCC have sought to foster.

*The Communications Act requires that all broadcasting stations, as part of their obligation to operate in the "public interest", 47 U.S.C. §§ 307(a), 309(a), "afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance". 47 U.S.C. § 315(a); see Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367, 392–95 (1969).

It is clear from past legislation that Congress desires to promote a strong and viable system of public television. The Educational Television Facilities Act of 1962, Pub L. No. 87-447, 76 Stat. 64, authorized thirty-two million dollars over a five-year period for the construction of various facilities for educational television stations. Moreover, the Public Broadcast Act of 1967 (47 U.S.C. § 390, et seq., as amended) continued this program and gave a further Congressional mandate in support of public broadcasting which, Congress contemplated, would create programs "not only . . . supplementary to, but competitive with commercial broadcasting services", and programs which will be "responsive to the interests of people" and "an expression of diversity and excellence". S. Rep. No. 222, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 6 (1967) ; 47 U.S.C. § 396(a) (4).

To this end, the Federal Communications Commission has reserved 623 station channels for educational television and, in adition, petitions may be made to the FCC for additional reservations. These stations are being licensed only to nonprofit educational organizations upon a showing that the proposed stations will be used "primarily to serve the educational needs of the community; for the advancement of educational programs; and to furnish a nonprofit and noncommercial television broadcast service". 47 C.F.R. § 73.621(a).

Not only has Congress demonstrated in the past its intent to strengthen noncommercial educational broadcasting in general, but has also indicated that it feels that the presentation of vigorous public affairs programming is one of the most important contributions that educational broadcasting can make. The legislative history of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 emphasized that Congress expected noncommercial educational stations to be leaders in this area. The report of the Senate Commerce Committee stated:

"Particularly in the area of public affairs your committee feels that noncommercial broadcasting is uniquely fitted to offer in-depth coverage and analysis which will lead to a better informed and enlightened public." S. Rep. No. 222, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (1967).

And the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce observed:

"Considerable testimony was heard that no noncomercial educational station editorializes.

"Out of abundance of caution, the bill provides that 'no noncommercial educational broadcasting station may engage in editorializing or may support or oppose any candidate for political office.' It should be emphasized that this section is not intended to preclude balanced, fair and objective presentations of controversial issues by noncommercial stations." H.R. Rep. No. 572, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 20 (1967).

Thus, ironically, if Section 4945 is enacted as presently drafted, the portion of public broadcasting that was intended to be it strongest point, will become in fact its weakest link.

3. There Are Serious Doubts That Sections 4945(b)(1), (b)(2) and (c)(1) of H.R. 13270 Are Constitutional

Not only do we believe that the adverse effect upon the public broadcast system by §§ 4945(b) (1), (b) (2) and (c) (1) is unintended and unwarranted, but it is also our view that the potential breadth of the present language of those sections raises serious constitutional issues.

a. Assuming that the section 4945 restricts balanced discussion of public issues by NET it may be unconstitutional.—Discussion and debate of public issues is at the heart of the First Amendment. The Supreme Court has noted that "speech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government". Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74-75 (1964). The primary purpose of the First Amendment is to protect our "profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open * * * ." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964). "Suppression of the right of the press to praise or criticize governmental agents and to clamor and content for or against change * * * muzzles one of the very agencies the Framers of our Constitution thoughtfully and deliberately selected to improve our society and keep it free." Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 218-19 (1966).

Discussion of public issues by broadcasters has been specifically held by the Supreme Court to enjoy the protections of the First Amendment. In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), the Court stated at 390:

"* * * the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment * * *. It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail * * *."

The Court in Red Lion warned that the right of the public to access to social and political ideas through the broadcast media "may not constitutionally be abridged * * * by Congress." 395 U.S. at 390.

Such discussion and debate of public issues can be infringed not only by direct prohibitions, but also by the taxing power. The Supreme Court has said, "[p]lainly a community may not suppress, or the state tax, the dissemination of views because they are unpopular, annoying or distasteful." Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, 116 (1943). The Court has held that a State cannot tax newspapers more heavily than other institutions, because this would reduce "the circulation of information to which the public is entitled." Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 250 (1936). The Court has also concluded that a State cannot penalize expression by denial of a tax exemption or deduction. Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958). Speiser clearly rejected the argument that "because a tax exemption is a 'privilege' or 'bounty', its denial may not infringe speech" (357 U.S. at 518) and held that the State could not deny an otherwise available property tax exemption to an individual who had refused to sign a statement on his tax return stating that he did not advocate the overthrow of the Government by force or violence. In a companion case, the Court held that an exemption could not be withheld from a church that refused to sign a similar oath, indicating that denial of a tax benefit to an organization like NET raises the same constitutional issues as denial of a deduction to an individual. First Unitarian Church of Los Angeles v. County of Los Angeles, 357 U.S. 545 (1958).

If the State had denied an exemption to the taxpayers in the Speiser and First Unitarian Church cases because they refused to sign statements agreeing not to engage in any discussion of public issues, it is difficult to believe that the results would have been different. The statute, we suggest, would have been equally unconstitutional, particularly if—as is the case here*—deductions were granted to some organizations and denied to others.

If we are correct in this conclusion, it would seem to follow that Section 4945 as presently drafted faces serious, if not unsurmountable, constitutional obstacles since it restricts organizational discussion of public issues. Unlike present law, Section 4945 cannot be justified on the ground that it is limited to the "lobbying" or "electioneering" activities. Cases like Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959), United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612 (1954) and United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947)—sustaining restrictions on such activities—do nothing to support the broader restrictions of Section 4945.

In Cammarano v. United States, supra, it was held that Congress can deny a tax deduction as an "ordinary and necessary business expense" to a business for sums expended "to promote or defeat legislation" as a legitimate means of preventing the public subsidizing of lobbying. United States v. Harriss, supra, upheld other non-tax restrictions on lobbying, such as the disclosure and reporting requirements for lobbyists in the Federal Anti-Lobbying Act, 2 U.S.C. §§ 261–70. Neither the Cammarano nor Harriss opinions, however, suggested that similar restrictions could be placed on discussion of public issues not within the categories of direct lobbying or overt appeals to the public to contact legislators. The Court in Harriss, in fact, implied that a restriction that went further than this, and attempted to cover a broader class of technically "legislation-influencing" activity, would be invalid under the First Amendment. 347 U.S. at 625–26. And the Court in Cammarano clearly indicated that its holding there was not meant to undercut its holding in Speiser that tax legislation cannot reach broadly to suppress discussion of public issues. 357 U.S. at 513.

Both Harriss and Cammarano sustained restrictions on the basis that Congress had a legitimate role in passing legislation to help maintain the integrity of the legislative process, in one case to protect it from distortions caused by tax advantages given to the lobbying activities of special interest groups, and in the other to allow Congress and the public to know exactly who is funding lobbying activities. Balanced educational presentation of public issues does not, however, undermine the integrity of the legislative process. Rather, it assists in preserving that process, by ensuring that the public is aware of legislation and the facts behind issues that may become the subject of legislation.

*Section 4945 does not apply to tax exempt organizations, like churches and colleges, that do not constitute "private foundations". Section 4945 would, through use of a support test, in effect, make, a value judgment that expression of ideas on public issues held by less than a certain number of contributors are less beneficial than those that are broadly held. Such discriminatory attempts to suppress minority viewpoints are, however, exactly what the First Amendment forbids.

In United Public Workers v. Mitchell, supra, the Court, in sustaining Hatch Act limitations on partisan participation in political campaigns by federal employees, held that Congress may place reasonable restrictions upon participation in the electoral process. But the Court specifically noted that nonpartisan expression of views on public issues was not prohibited by the Act, implying that if it were, the Act would have been held unconstitutional. 330 U.S. at 100. And in Mills v. Alabama, supra, the Supreme Court specifically held that a state could not supress the discussion of controversial issues—in that case last-minute editorials—on the ground that this was necessary to prevent the electorate from being unduly swayed in a public election.

The fact that Section 4945 covers some activities which Congress can constitutionally regulate does not, of course, save it from constitutional attack. The constitutional doctrine of the "less restrictive alternative" requires that Congress, when it legislates in the area of speech, regulate only up to the minimum extent necessary to restrict the evil it wishes to control, with the least possible diminution of protected rights. United States v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258 (1967) ; NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963).

b. Even if section 4945 is not meant to cover NET's public affairs programs, it may be void for vagueness.—Assuming that Congress cannot constitutionally tax the balanced, educational presentation of discussions on public issues, it is also constitutionally irrelevant that Congress may not have intended to penalize such presentations in its proposed enactment of Section 4945. The language of the statute is now drafted "in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application". Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926). It can be read to restrict large areas of discussion protected by the First Amendment.

Under existing case authority the vagueness and overbreadth of the statute are alone sufficient to raise serious questions as to its validity. The Supreme Court has held that strict standards of definiteness must be met by statutes having "a potentially inhibiting effect on speech". Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147, 151 (1959). See also NAACP v. Button, supra, at 432–33, 438 (1963). In the area of free speech vague statutes are unconstitutional if they seriously inhibit discussion by forcing individuals to "steer far wider of the unlawful zone" (Speiser v. Randall, supra, at 526) and restrict "their conduct to that which is unquestionably safe" (Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 372 (1964)).

The principle that laws must give clear warning is particularly relevant when the offense is to be prescribed by regulation rather than by statute (United States v. McDermott, 131 F.2d 313, 316 (7th Cir. 1942), cert. denied, 318 U.S. 765 (1943)) or when the statute is subject to administrative enforcement which can result in discrimination against minority or unpopular views (Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536, 556–58 (1965)).

We suggest that, because of its vague terms, Section 4945, as presently drafted, will unquestionably inhibit protected speech, and is therefore likely to be held unconstitutional.

One lower court has indicated that the "attempting to influence legislation" language already contained in Section 501(c) (3) might be held unconstitutionally vague if it were not limited more specifically by regulation and judicial decision to direct or "grassroots" lobbying, noting:

"In one sense, nearly every effort made by individuals or organizations in the public interest and for the betterment of government necessarily, has as an indirect result at least, some influence on legislation."

Seasongood v. Commissioner, 227 F.2d 907, 911 (6th Cir. 1955).

If the meaning of this language is still open to question, after decades of Treasury and court attempts at interpretation, the potentially even broader language of Subsections 4945(b)(1), (b)(2) and (c)(1) cannot possibly give sufficient guidance to those affected to enable them to regulate their conduct in the public affairs discussion area so as to avoid its sanctions. If this bill is enacted with its present ambiguities, foundation officers will be forced to protect themselves by restricting their educational activities. This is particularly so because extremely broad administrative discretion will necessarily have to be lodged with the Internal Revenue Service for its interpretation and enforcement, and foundation managers cannot predict how this discretion will be exercised.

Even assuming that the Treasury might at some future date issue limiting regulations or rulings that would give sufficient guidance to the interpretation of Section 4945, or that future court decisions might narrow its coverage, the delay in obtaining such standards would cause irreparable harm to educational broadcasting. NET would be forced to discontinue public affairs broadcasting in the interim, probably losing the services of many of its professionals who specialize in this area. Once private foundations, which have only limited resources, move out of the non-commercial broadcasting area and into other charitable or educational activities, it will be difficult to get them to return, even on the hopeful assumption of future regulatory or judicial clarification. Once foundations have entered other fields of philanthropy, there will be a natural tendency for them to remain there, since they have created funding expectations in those fields and will wish to follow through on initial efforts they have supported.

Thus, we believe, if Congress does not intend Subsections 4945(b)(1), (b)(2) and (c)(1) to apply to balanced presentation of public issues, it can not assume that these sections will be saved from unconstitutionality by narrowing regulations or judicial interpretations. This Committee should take positive steps to clarify the bill to insure that it does not inhibit discussions of public issues, particularly public affairs programming of the kind NET supplies to its affiliates.

In summary, in view of the unintended and substantial adverse effects that Section 4945 would have for public broadcasting and NET, the strong Congressional policy to support public broadcasting (including its public affairs programs) and the substantial doubts as to the constitutionality of the section as now written, we suggest that this committee should revise Section 4945 to exempt public broadcasting's public affairs programs, using the suggested language set forth earlier in my statement.

IV. CLASSIFICATION PROBLEMS

1. NET Should Be a Section 170(b)(1)(B) Organization

As indicated above, it is crucial that Section 4945 be amended as proposed. In addition, it is also crucial that NET be classified as a non-private foundation or a private operating foundation to avoid the ultimate demise of NET, noncommercial educational broadcasting stations' prime source of programming. (Even if NET were to qualify as a non-private foundation or an operating private foundation under proposed Section 509(a), it would still be adversely affected by the Act, insofar as private sources of funds may be eliminated unless the amendment to Section 4945 suggested above is adopted.)

Under proposed Section 509, a Section 501(c)(3) organization such as NET will be treated as a private foundation unless it comes within one of a series of specified exceptions. As currently funded NET will not come within any of the specified exemptions.

The current re-examination of the tax bill affords Congress an opportunity to help reach the goals set by Congress for public broadcasting by classifying NET as a non-private foundation.

To best carry out Congress's general intent of establishing a viable non-commercial educational broadcast system which has a broad base of public support that will complement funding from the Government, Congress may use this opportunity to give the public a tax incentive for support of this system.

By the inclusion of NET and the other elements of the country's non-commercial educational broadcast system within the 30 percent category [Section 170 (b)(1)(B) organizations] NET would have the following beneficial results.

First, by classifying NET as a Section 170(b)(1)(B) organization and thus a non-private foundation under Section 509(a)(1), it will be released from the provisions of the Act which create significant problems for the non-commercial educational broadcast system. For example, it would solve the problem of whether grants to NET will be "qualifying distributions" under Section 4942 of the Act. And it will eliminate the possibility that the working arrangements between NET and the other elements of the non-commercial educational broadcast system will fall under Section 4941—the "self-dealing" provision.

Second, by including the elements of the non-commercial broadcast system within the list of organizations described in Section 170(b)(1)(B), the system will be on an equal footing with schools and colleges, churches and other similar organizations designed to promote the general welfare. Most of the local stations already fit into this group and since all of the local stations and the other elements of the system are all working for the same end and carrying on in many instances the same functions, there is every reason to treat all of the elements of the system as qualifying for the charitable deduction prescribed in Section 170(b)(1)(B). To do this, Section 170(b)(1)(B) should be amended by adding a new subsection 170(b)(1)(B(vii) which would read:

"An organization which is a non-commercial educational broadcast station as defined in Section 397(7) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (81 Stat. 368; 47 U.S.C. 307(7)) or an organization referred to in Subsection (c)(2) which is operated exclusively for the production or distribution of programs which are broadcast over such non-commercial educational broadcast stations."

In the alternative this language could serve as a separate exception to Section 509.

2. Operating Foundation Status

Adoption of the proposed amendment to Section 4945 is crucial to NET's continued ability to produce programming for educational broadcasting. However, even with this adoption, if NET is not included within the category of Section 170(b)(1)(B) organizations, it must qualify as an operating foundation in over to survive. Under proposed Section 4942(j)(3) (A) and (B), a private foundation is not an operating foundation unless—

(1) substantially all [at least 85 percent]* of the foundation's income is expended directly for the active conduct of its tax exempt activities [the "income expenditure test"];

(2) either—

(i) substantially more than half [at least 65 percent]* of the assets of the foundation are "devoted directly" to the foundations' tax exempt activities [the "asset test"] or

(ii) substantially all [at least 85 percent]* of the foundation's "support" (other than gross investment income) "normally" comes from five or more exempt organizations or from the general public and no more than 25 percent of the foundation's support comes from any one exempt organization [the "support test"].

The crucial question is whether NET can satisfy the requirements of either of the additional tests—the assets test or the support test. The latter test—the support alternative—was described in the House Committee Report as follows:

"The * * * [support] alternative has been added because it has come to the attention of your committee that a number of charitable foundations are regularly used by many private foundations to funnel charitable contributions into certain areas. The operating foundations, in such circumstances, have developed an expertise which permits them to make effective use of the money through grant programs or otherwise." House Committee Report, p. 26.

"The support alternative is intended to focus primarily upon special-purpose foundations, such as learned societies, associations of libraries and organizations which have developed an expertise in certain substantive areas and which provide for the independent granting of funds and direction of research in those specialized substantive areas." House Committee Report, p. 42.

NET would appear to fit the Committee's picture of a special-purpose, funnel, expert foundation. It cannot, however, qualify under the support alternative since the bulk of its revenues comes in the form of grants, albeit unrestricted, from fewer than five foundations.

It may be, however, that NET satisfies the requirements of the asset alternative set forth in (B)(i) of Section 4942(j)(3) above. NET's furniture, equipment and supplies are presumably "devoted directly" to its tax exempt activities. At any given time, however, its assets in the form of cash (or short-term securities) for operating purposes are likely to be substantially greater than any physical assets. Such assets are, in one sense, as "devoted directly" to the tax exempt activities as are the typewriters and paper supplies. Such an interpretation would be consistent with the apparent purpose of the Act to impose special tax burdens on foundations which invest substantial portions of their support revenues and thus appreciably delay the charitable benefit resulting from such revenues and contributions. However, according to the House Committee Report, p. 42, the asset alternative was intended to "apply particularly" to organizations such as museums, Callaway Gardens (a horticultural and recreational area), Colonial Williamsburg and Jackson Hole, each of which has substantial fixed assets which are related directly to and physically used directly for their tax exempt purposes.

Therefore, in the absence of any change in this respect in the subsequent legislative history, it is possible that cash and short-term securities will be held not to be assets "devoted directly" to an institution's charitable purposes for purposes of Section 4942(j)(3)(B)(i) even though they are spent annually in furtherance of the organization's exempt purpose. If the asset alternative is interpreted in this manner, NET will not be treated as an operating foundation. If NET does not qualify as an operating foundation, private foundations will cease supporting NET.

Since under the Act a private non-operating foundation is subject to a tax on the failure to distribute income, such a foundation will be likely to make only "qualifying distributions" to avoid the tax imposed by Section 4942. One can assume, therefore, that the major consequence of failure to qualify as an operating foundation will be that NET will lose all of its foundation support. . . . .

We do not believe that Congress intended that the cash assets (possibly invested in short-term securities) to be expended during the year—and which are, in fact, expended during the year or succeeding year—should be deemed to be assets not "devoted directly" to charitable purposes. If read in this fashion, an anomalous situation is created thereby a grant-making foundation is entitled to make "qualifying distributions" directly for charitable purposes during the course of two years but may not utilize a specialized grant-making foundation to make a payment for the same charitable purposes within the same period of time.

Accordingly, we suggest that language be inserted in the committee report to make it clear that where contributions are made by a private foundation to a second private foundation to be expended directly for charitable purposes by the latter within the taxable year or succeeding taxable year, of the payee foundation, the expenditure by the latter will satisfy the "assets" test under Section 4942(j)(3)(B)(i).

Indeed, consistent with the long-established Congressional interest to foster and aid the development of a strong non-commercial educational broadcast system, the committee report should make it clear that NET will qualify as an "operating foundation".

Mr. Macy. Mr. Harley, would you pick up on that.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM HARLEY, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTERS

Mr. Harley. First, speaking for the educational television and radio stations of the country, I would like to associate myself with my two colleagues. We have a written statement which sets forth in some detail the adverse effect of this legislation upon educational broadcasting.

I would only emphasize one point, that without the help we have had so far from private philanthropy, most of the stations, or at least a great many, never would have come into being, and they could not continue to perform their essential public services without this help, and if we continue under this proposed legislation to perform our basic responsibilities in broadcasting discussions of public issues, the foundations under that bill might have to withdraw their support.

For us, this would simply be disastrous if we could not continue at the same time to perform our public service responsibilities and receive essential support that we need from the private sector. Because in public broadcasting the American people have on hand a device that can be put to great purpose, it seems unthinkable that at the very time that we are on the verge of bringing this into being as a really effective force in our society, that legislation might be passed that would substantially cripple its present operation and stifle its future growth.

We do not think that your committee or the Congress of the American people want that to happen.

Mr. MACY. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, our belief is that at this particular point in time to reduce the support that has come from philanthropy for this new form of public service would be to reverse a very desirable trend, a trend which is supported by the Congress and which, in the days ahead, will, hopefully, match the trend that the Congress set in motion with the Public Broadcasting Act.

Senator RIBICOFF. Thank you, gentlemen, very much.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM G. HARLEY, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTERS

I am William G. Harley, President of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters. NAEB is the professional association of institutions and individuals engaged in educational radio and television broadcasting in the United States. Its membership consists of organizations which operate 175 educational radio stations, some 180 educational television stations, and over 100 non-broadcast instructional communications systems; and some three thousand individual producers, teachers, writers, directors, students, artists, engineers and others who are involved in various phases of educational radio and television throughout every part of the country.

Educational broadcasting stations are licensed by the Federal Communications Commission only to nonprofit educational organizations upon a showing that the stations "will be used primarily to serve the educational needs of the community; for the advancement of educational programs; and to furnish a nonprofit and noncommercial television broadcast service." (FCC Rules and Regulations, section 73.621.) The stations now operating are licensed to local school boards or systems, to public and private colleges and universities, to agencies of state government, and to private non-profit corporations organized locally for the purpose of engaging in educational broadcasting. Such licensees, including such private corporations as well as such public agencies, are all exempt from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code, and contributions to them are deductible as charitable contributions under section 170 of the Code. In addition, some thirty of the states are planning or already operating statewide educational television networks, and there are cooperative regional networks in the Northeast, the South, the Midwest, the Great Plains states, the Rocky Mountain region, and the Pacific Coast. Most of the stations are affiliated with one or more of the independent program services which make available programs of national scope and interest; these national program services, like the stations, are tax-exempt organizations. By enacting the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, the Congress created a private nonprofit Corporation for Public Broadcasting to assume responsibility for the nationwide progress of all of the system, finding that "it is in the public interest to encourage the growth and development of noncommercial educational radio and television broadcasting, including the use of such media for instructional purposes." (Communications Act of 1934 as amended, section 396(a)(1).)

Our members produce and broadcast programs to serve a wide range of public needs and interests. The typical educational television station develops and broadcasts programs of formal instruction and enrichment for children in the classrooms, and for children viewing at home before or after school hours, or who have not yet reached school age. Public and parochial school systems throughout the country constitute a major segment of the educational television audience. For the adult audience, stations concentrate on informal education: vocational training and rehabilitation for the disadvantaged, and continuing education for the professions, for example. For the general public, there are programs for the development of new skills and interests, for the discussion of important local, regional or national issues, for the reflection of America's cultural heritage, and for other kinds of community service of every variety. The typical station broadcasts six to seven days a week, averaging over 56 hours of programming weekly. Slightly more than half of this is general audience or "public" television programming—public affairs programs (such as new programs, documentaries, panel discussions, political debates, and interviews), performing arts programs, children's programs, and others. The remaining time is allocated to "instructional" broadcasts during school hours. The stations themselves produce much of their instructional programming, and general audience programming of primarily local interest; but the majority of their general audience programming comes from one of the national program services, from the state or regional networks, from program exchange arrangements with their sister stations, or from other ouside sources.

During fiscal year 1967, state and local governments and state universities provided about 50% of the funds for educational television stations. Private philantrophy—foundations, businesses, trade unions, and individual viewer contributions—provided about 30%. Ten per cent came from the Federal Government, primarily in grants under the authority of the Educational Television facilities Act of 1962, and 10% came from other sources. Most of the state networks are supported entirely by funds from state government, and the regional networks are supported by the stations; the production of programs for national distribution, however, a keystone of the entire system, depends almost entirely on private philanthropy for its support. Because of their chronically limited resources, the stations alone would be nowhere near able to sustain the production of national programs of quality and excellence for their common benefit were it not for the assistance of the private foundations.

NAEB and its members are concerned about the effect which H.R. 13270 might have on their ability to continue to provide this service to the public. We are concerned that the bill could have a seriously inhibiting effect on the stations' ability to provide their present program service, and on the ability of private philanthropy to continue to support educational broadcasting activities. We do not believe that educational stations, either those operated by schools or state governments or by nonprofit corporations, have been guilty of any of the abuses which this legislation seeks to cure. Nor do we believe that any new legislation is necessary to prevent abuse by educational stations: they are already subject to an ample body of regulation under the Communications Act, as well as the Internal Revenue Code. But we fear that, because of the breadth of its language directed at real abuses, H.R. 13270 could have unforeseen and unintended consequences deleterious to the future of educational broadcasting.

We submit that such a result would constitute a sharp departure from the consistent public policy in support of the development of educational broadcasting. State and local government have traditionally been the major source of financial support for educational TV and radio stations. At the Federal level, the Federal Communications Commission has reserved 632 television channels expressly for noncommercial, educational use, and has made similar reservation of FM radio channels. The National Defense Education Act of 1958 provided funds for research into the uses of the broadcast media for educational purposes. The All-Channel Receiver Act of 1962 promoted the development of television tuners capable of receiving the ultra-high-frequency (UHF) channels on which most educational stations now broadcast. The Educational Television Facilities Act of 1962 initiated a program of Federal matching grants for improvement of the facilities of existing stations, and for construction of new stations. The Higher Education Act of 1965 provided funds for the purchase of television equipment by colleges and universities. The Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 extended the provisions of the 1962 Facilities Act, made that program applicable to radio as well as television stations, and established the Corporation for Public Broadcasting to promote the growth and development of public broadcast programming on those stations. The 1968 platforms of the two national political parties reaffirmed their support for the development of educational broadcasting. In the 91st Congress, the Senate has passed and the House of Representatives is soon to consider a bill, the Public Broadcasting Amendments of 1969, to authorize continuation of the facilities grant program, and to authorize a further Federal grant to the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Subsections (b)(1) and (b)(2) of the proposed Section 4595 of H.R. 13270 would represent a major impediment to this activity. First, a prudent station manager or program producer would avoid making expenditures for public affairs programs (such as documentaries, panel discussions, news programs, political debates, and interviews) for fear that such expenditures might constitute "taxable expenditures" under either subsection (b)(1) or (b)(2) of the prosposed Section 4945. Second, prudent foundation managers would also interpret this section as prohibiting them from making grants that might ultimately be used for such programs. We certainly do not quarrel with the position that expenditures by private exempt organizations for the purpose of influencing public opinion should be taxable expenditures. However, expenditures for public affairs programs carried over noncommercial educational broadcast stations are not, we are sure, intended to come under the language as it appears in proposed Section 4945. Nevertheless, the possible application of this section to public affairs programming, even if it is not intended to apply to such programs, would have a chilling effect on the willingness of educational broadcasters, production centers, and grant-making fundations to risk the penalties provided in Section 4945. The evils that Subsections (b)(1) and (b)(2) of Section 4945 are designed to guard against are already precluded in the case of educational broadcasting by the stringent controls imposed by Congress and enforced by the Federal Communications Commission. A qualifying amendment to the proposed Section 4945, as suggested by Mr. Macy for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, would solve this potential problem and allow educational broadcasting to carry out one of its primary duties, which is to present public affairs programs to the public.

We support, therefore, the following amendment to Section 4945:

"(g) PUBLIC BROADCASTING.—Subsections (b)(1) and (b)(2) shall not apply to amounts paid or incurred for the production or distribution of public affairs programs which are broadcast over noncommercial educational broadcast stations as defined in Section 397 (7) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (81 Stat. 368; 47 U.S.C. 397 (7))."

We are further concerned that H.R. 13270 would, in other ways, create considerable uncertainty for some of our stations. In particular, the definition of "private foundation" as stated in the proposed Section 509 gives us concern.

Most of the 185 stations on the air are financed and operated by, and are integral parts of, public instrumentalities. These stations clearly meet one or more of the tests contained in Section 509 and, therefore, are not private foundations within the meaning of H.R. 13270. There are 38 other public television stations, however, operating as nonprofit community stations. The status of these 38 stations cannot reliably be determined under the language of Section 509. The ambiguity of the various "support" tests of this section admit to several ways of determining if the station qualifies, either under Section 509(a)(1) or Section 509(a)(2). One of the key problems is whether, for purposes of both these paragraphs, revenue received by the station from services rendered to school systems is to be counted as support revenue and as contributing to the one-third of revenue from exempt sources, whether it is to be counted in neither category, or whether it is to be counted in one category but not the other. We think under Section 509(a)(1), and more particularly Section 170 (b)(1)(B)(vi), that revenues from school systems should not be excluded from the definition of "support from a governmental unit" and, hence, that stations deriving more than one-third of their support from sources should be treated as "public foundations" under these provisions. See Regulations Section 1.170-2(b)(5)(ii)(c)(1).

Furthermore, we believe it clear, in proposed Section 509(a)(2), that an exempt organization which provides services for a fee in furtherance of its exempt purpose (which is not an unrelated trade or business) to any organization described in Section 170(b)(1)(B) will be deemed not to be a private foundation if the gross receipts from such services are normally more than one third of its support. This determination is based on our belief that reciepts from such exempt organizations which are in excess of 1% of the servicing organization's support are not excluded from the numerator of this fraction. However, we think these readings of the statute are not entirely free from doubt and we would hope that your Committee Report, at least, will make it clear that, for purposes of Section 509(a)(1), revenues from school systems are not excluded from the category of "support from a governmental unit" and that, for purposes of Section 509(a)(2), receipts from any person in any taxable year that are to be excluded from the numerator of the fraction because they are more than 1% of the support of such organization for one year, do not include receipts from organizations described in Section 170(b)(1)(B).

If a public television station were found not to qualify as a public foundation under the definitions in proposed Section 509, serious problems would be presented. Particularly, if the foregoing recommended amendment to Section 4945 is not adopted, those of our stations which are treated as private foundations would, as we have indicated, be inhibited from presenting public affairs programs. In any event, those stations which must depend on the "public support" test to qualify as "public foundations" will be faced with great uncertainties from year to year and, in addition, uncertainties as to whether they constitute private "operating foundations" as distinct from private "non-operating foundations." Some of our stations are currently seeking endowment funds to be used to support their educational program. The growth of such funds may well cause these stations to be treated as "non-operating foundations." As such, they would possibly be presented with a serious impediment to carrying out their educational program, due to inability to receive private foundation grants.

These uncertainties seem unwarranted. All our stations perform identical educational functions, all are subject to the same federal controls with respect to programming and, we submit, should be treated alike for federal income tax purposes.

We suggest, therefore, that the exclusions from the definition of "private foundation" found in Section 509 contain, as an additional category, "a non-commercial educational broadcast station as defined in Section 397 (7) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (81 Stat. 368; 47 U.S.C. 397 (7))."

In the event the Congress does not rectify this problem by defining all educational broadcasting stations as "public foundations," the possible categorization of some of our stations as "private foundations" would result in certain particular problems that ought to be resolved on their own merits.

First, the proposed Section 4941 of the Bill would prohibit "self dealing" between private foundations and contributors thereto, such as private foundations making grants to our educational broadcasting stations. This prohibition is, we believe, reasonably designed to make sure that sums donated for charitable purposes are not diverted for the private interests of private parties. However, no such diversion can occur where the "self dealing" is between two organizations each of which is exempt under Section 501(c)(3).

Let me give you an example. A foundation such as National Educational Television and Radio Center (NET) renders substantial services for a small fee to our stations by producing educational programs for national distribution. In addition, NET may make grants to our stations to produce such educational programs and, indeed, it is not inconceivable that some of our institutions may make grants to NET. In such cases our respctive exempt organizations might technically be liable for the sanctions against "self dealing." Accordingly, we believe that, for purposes of the "self dealing" provisions of proposed Section 4941, the term "substantial contributor" in proposed Section 507(b)(2) should be amended to exclude an organization which is itself exempt from tax under Section 501(c)(3) of the Code, regardless of whether it is a "public" or "private" foundation.

Second, we suggest that the opportunity for an exempt organization to provide services in furtherance of its exempt purpose to other exempt organizations, without being subject to the 1% limitation, should include not only organizations described in Seciton 170(b)(1)(B) but also "operating foundations" as described in Section 4942(j)(3).

In our case, NET and other foundations provide services to our broadcasting stations. As I have noted, many of these, such as stations maintained by states, municipalities, or public school systems, are "public foundations" described in Section 170(b)(1)(B). Others, performing identical educational and community functions, are "private foundations," albeit possibly "operating foundations," if, in one year or another, as private nonprofit community organizations, they are not able to meet the "public support" tests contained in Sections 509(a)(1) or (2). It would be unfair to inhibit the capacity of an educational organization to provide educational services to operating foundations by imposing the 1% limitation on the services provided to those organizations. Therefore, we suggest that the last two lines of proposed Section 509(a)(2)(A) (lines 1 and 2 of page 16 of the Bill) might be amended to read "any organization described in Section 170(b)(1)(B) or an 'operating foundation' described in Section 4942(j)(3)."

A further ambiguity is contained in Section 4942 of the Bill, imposing a tax on failure by a private foundation to distribute income. It is found in the proposed definitions of "qualifying distributions" and "operating foundations." In substance, this section would impose a tax on certain undistributed income of private foundations as determined after the foundation has made "qualifying distributions."

"Qualifying distributions" are, of course, amounts paid out for charitable purposes during the foundation's taxable year or succeeding taxable year and include payments made to "operating foundations". The definition of an "operating foundation", as contained in proposed Section 4942(j)(3)(A) and (B)(i), includes those foundations which spend substantially all of their income and devote substantially more than half their assets directly to charitable activities. A grant making foundation is included in this definition of "operating foundation" under Section 4942(j)(3)(B)(ii), where it derives substantially all of its support from five or more unrelated exempt foundations. Such grants when received by an "operating foundation" not only constitute a "qualifying distribution" to the payor foundation but also become a part of the corpus of the recipient, without being subject to further pay out requirements.

In some instances, as the Ways and Means Committee noted in its Committee Report, a grant making foundation possesses expertise in certain areas which permits it to make the most effective use of a grant. In such a case, a foundation such as NET and similar foundations may typically receive grants for immediate expenditure within areas such as educational broadcasting from a more general grant making private foundation. However, the former specialized grant making foundation will qualify as an "operating foundation" only if, under Section 4942(j)(3)(A) and (B)(i), in addition to expending substantially all its income for charitable purposes, it is also deemed to devote "substantially more than half" of its assets directly for charitable purposes.

We do not believe that Congress intended that the cash assets (possibly invested in short term securities) to be expended during the year—and which are in fact expended during the year or succeeding year—should be deemed to be assets not "devoted directly" to charitable purposes. If read in this fashion, an anomalous situation is created whereby a grant making foundation is entitled to make "qualifying distribtuions" directly for charitable purposes during the course of two years, but may not utilize a specialized grant making foundation to make the same payment within the same period of time.

Accordingly, we suggest that language be inserted in the Committee Report to make it clear that where contributions are made by a private foundation to a second private foundation to be expended directly for charitable purposes by the latter within the taxable year, or succeeding taxable year, of the payee foundation, the expenditure by the latter will satisfy the "assets" test under section 4942(j)(3)(B)(i).

Senator RIBICOFF. The committee will stand in recess until tomorrow morning at 9:30.

(Whereupon, at 4 p.m., the committee adjourned, to reconvene at 9:30 a.m., Tuesday, October 7, 1969.)

TAX REFORM ACT OF 1969

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1969

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to recess, at 9:30 a.m., in room 2221, New Senate Office Building, Senator Russell B. Long (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Long, Talmadge, Gore, Byrd, Jr., of Virginia, Williams of Delaware, Bennett, Curtis, Miller, Jordan of Idaho, Fannin, and Hansen.

The CHAIRMAN. The hearing will come to order.

This morning we are pleased to hear a panel on the impact of foundation provisions in the House passed tax reform bill on advanced study groups.

The committee welcomes Dr. Carl Kaysen from Princeton University, Dr. Robert Hartley, vice president of the Brookings Institution, Dr. Caryl Haskins, president of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, and O. Meredith Wilson, director of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences.

Will you be seated, gentlemen.

STATEMENTS OF DR. CARL KAYSEN, DIRECTOR, INSTITUTE FOR ADVANCED STUDY, PRINCETON, N.J.; ROBERT HARTLEY, VICE PRESIDENT, BROOKINGS INSTITUTION; DR. CARYL HASKINS, PRESIDENT OF THE CARNEGIE INSTITUTION OF WASHINGTON; AND O. MEREDITH WILSON, DIRECTOR, THE CENTER FOR ADVANCED STUDY IN THE BEHAVIORIAL SCIENCES

Dr. KAYSEN. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, we are here to explain the position of centers of advanced study and research and other academic institutions not organizationally connected with universities and colleges in relation to the legislation before the committee.

I am Carl Kaysen of the Institute for Advanced Study, and I will be followed by O. Meredith Wilson of The Center for Behavioral Sciences in Palo Alto, Robert Hartley of Brookings Institution, and Caryl Haskins of the Carnegie Institution of Washington.

We are speaking not only for ourselves——

Senator TALMADGE. Doctor, will you please speak into the mike. It is difficult to hear you.

Dr. KAYSEN. Excuse me, Senator. Thank you.

We are speaking not only for ourselves but for a number of other institutions. There is attached, a listing of institutions in a situation similar to ours. There are a number of others not represented also in this position.

33-865—69—pt. 6——31

All of these institutions are an integral part of the American system of higher education. The language of the House bill before the committee would give the status of educational institutions only to those organizations meeting the criteria set forth in section 170(b)(1)(B)(ii).

These criteria appear to exclude some of the organizations represented here and leave others in serious doubt as to their status. This definition does not correspond to the facts of the system of higher education of which our institutions form a part, and we believe the definition should be changed so as to reflect these facts.

The system of higher education in the United States is marked by a high degree of pluralism and extraordinary diversity. What are usually classified as institutions of higher education are the 3,500 separately organized nonprofit degree-granting institutions which provide posthigh school education. These range in size and character from small private junior colleges to great State universities.

The system as a whole performs a number of distinct functions: Provision of general education or liberal education; preprofessional training; professional education; postgraduate training for science and scholarship; the conduct of scientific and scholarly research; and finally public service which includes the transmission of specialized knowledge to the nonacademic public and its direct application to a wide variety of public problems.

The small institutions in this diverse system typically specialize in one or another function, like the 2- and 4-year colleges which provide liberal and general education. At the other end of the scale the great universities, public and private, usually cover the whole range of activities described above.

Scientific and scholarly research and postgraduate education are intimately related. It is impossible to carry on the effective training of scientists and scholars at advanced levels except in institutions which are actively carrying on research and scholarship.

Most of the research and a high porportion of the advanced training are concentrated in a relatively small number of universities. In these institutions the distinction between research and education is very difficult to draw, and the two activities are intermingled.

Traditionally the criterion of the granting of degrees has been taken as the mark that distinguishes an educational from a purely research institution. But with the intermingling of research and higher education this distinction becomes artificial, since candidates for the doctor of philosophy degree and other higher degrees are typically engaged in research programs as part of their training.

In the last several decades more and more holders of the highest degree continue their education and training in postdoctoral programs. This practice began in mathematics and the natural sciences. It is now increasingly frequent in the social sciences and humanities, and these postdoctoral programs further reduce the distinction between research and education.

The institutions here represented perform research and higher training functions or assist in their performance in a variety of ways.

Typically each one covers only a small part of the range of scientific and scholarly activities which are to be found in universities. They are special-purpose enterprises which have grown up to meet particular needs in our diverse system.

Our educational system is in a sense like our economics system, one of private free enterprise, and there is no master plan which allocates roles and functions. At the time each of the enterprises here represented was originated the particular function which it performed was not being well performed elsewhere in the system, or it was not being performed at all, and the need was hardly recognized.

The new institution succeeded by demonstrating it could serve a new and necessary purpose. It is more an accident of terminology than an essential feature of the processes of higher education that we associate the same functions with education when they are performed within the organizational boundaries of the university, and think of them as different when they are performed by independent institutions.

A more appropriate view would see all these functions and all the institutions which perform them as parts of our system of higher education.

It might be said that the institutions of the kind we represent are so small a part of the system as to deserve no special concern. This, I think, would be inequitable, but aside from that it would fail to take account of the tremendous leverage which the higher levels of advanced training and research have on the whole system.

The training and research programs of a relatively small number of institutions, among which we here are prominent, have played a major role in the change of the quality and international standing of American science and learning in the last generation, and the equally remarkable internal change in the United States in the same period.

Before World War II we in this country were for the most part still under the intellectual dominance of the universities of Europe and Britain in major fields of science and learning. In most fields first-rate graduate training and research of international quality were to be found only in a handful of institutions, hardly a dozen.

Now the United States is a world leader in many fields of science and scholarship, and the inferior of no nation in any. The number of universities with excellent programs of graduate training and significant programs of research has grown rapidly, and such institutions are to be found in every region of the country.

In this great process of change, the contribution of every first-rate institutions has been significant. And I think no committee of the Congress needs to be instructed on the importance of research and advanced training to the Nation.

The institutions here represented all began as pioneers; embodying the vision of some man or group of men, they acquired a staff and organization suitable to their purposes, and created an intellectual tradition.

Intangible as it is, an intellectual tradition is an important part of what makes for the success of any scholarly enterprise. It cannot be easily duplicated or transferred, and the costs of destroying or damaging the enterprise which embodies it are great, even though they may not be readily visible. Excellence is vital to research and scholarship, and it still comes in small enough and few enough packages so that the country cannot afford to lose a single one.

Thank you. I will now ask Dr. Wilson to speak.

Dr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, my name is Meredith Wilson. I am director of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences. There is frequently some confusion about what the meaning of behavioral sciences might be.

I would like to refer you to page 83 in the printed document, where you will find a list of the disciplines that we generally invite to participate in the center. You will discover that they are mostly social sciences, but they do include biology, psychiatry, the biological segments of psychology, and they do include mathematics and statistics, which makes it difficult to list them only as the social sciences.

I am here, however, not only to speak about the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, but rather about what I think is an important factor in American higher education, and to deal with the four institutions and the other allied institutions which are concerned about the present tax bill.

I think it useful to say that when the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 was written, the development of postdoctoral education in the United States was not really well recognized.

It is also I think useful to comment on the fact that there has been such a remarkable increase in our dependence upon technological and scientific skill that the development of postdoctoral education to take care of the explosion of knowledge has become a fundamental factor in the maintenance of our present trend.

The advanced study institutions that are represented here today are institutions that have had a tremendous impact on this country's development already. The Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, for example, which Mr. Kaysen represents, is one with which you are familiar. It is the place where Mr. Einstein came to make his monumental contributions for science, the place where Von Neumann made the original developments in the computer which in many ways have had an effect upon all scientific work in this country. The Carnegie Institution, which Caryl Haskins will represent, gave to this country and to the world hybrid corn through its investigations into genetics of plants and the hybrid corn has been a major factor in the nutrition not only of this country but of all developing countries. It also did tremendous work on the proxmity fuse, on radar; it maintains astronomical laboratories in California. It is a constant continuing contributor to our advanced knowledge through laboratories here, in the Palo Alto area, in southern California and in New York.

The Brookings Institution is one which most of you are familiar with because it serves so well here in Washington. It is active in the area of government, foreign policy and economics, and has been one of the major contributors to the development of judgment and policy and to scientific development in fiscal matters.

These four organizations and indeed others in the country cover a wide range of advanced study and research. They are a distinct part of the system of higher education. They are a necessary complement to the colleges and the universities of the country.

In the state of the modern technological developments of this country, they and their post-doctoral contributions are absolutely essential to leadership which Mr. Kaysen called to our attention as being a position which the United States now occupies either alone or with the scientific countries of the world.

A large factor in the success and the stability of these advanced study institutions has been their independent boards of trustees, and has been the congressional recognition of the importance of eleemosynary institutions, of foundations and other granting agencies in permitting their support and their maintenance of independence.

We think that it is of great importance to the American people and to American scholarship that these boards of trustees be allowed to continue independent. We think it is tremendously important that the foundation supports, that the gifts of charitable, wise and generous people to them be encouraged, in order that they can have the independent management of scholarship which until now has characterized them and has made tremendous contribution to the country.

During the 15 years the sileo center which I represent was founded, there has been tremendous innovation in the area of post-doctoral education. There will have to be continued innovation, and that innovation will have to depend on these institutions being allowed the independence which has been part of their tradition until now.

We hope, therefore, that you as Senators will help us by not putting undue blocks in the way of the financial support which we have acquired.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I am Robert W. Hartley, vice president for administration of the Brookings Institution. I am here today substituting for Mr. Kermit Gordon, president of the institution, who had an emergency operation about a week ago. He is recovering, but is unable to appear this morning. I hope I can be as helpful to the committee as Mr. Gordon would be if he were here.

The provisions of H.R. 13270 respecting private foundations if enacted in their present form would adversely affect the advanced study and research institutions. The problem begins in section 509 of the bill which, instead of attempting to describe in a positive manner the major characteristics of the organizations to be classed as "private foundations," uses the definition-by-exclusion approach.

The four exclusions in section 509 fail clearly to exclude from the bills covered many of the advanced study and research institutions because under the technical definition in the Internal Revenue Code they are not colleges or universities, and because their sources of support are such that they do not qualify as publicly and broadly supported organizations under the mechanical tests in the bill.

Furthermore, although these institutions are in every sense actively and directly operating in educational or scientific fields many of them are not included in the bill's definition of "operating foundations," because they have large endowments, or only a few major sources of support.

In brief, the bill in its present form sweeps into the definition of "private foundation" many of America's advanced study and research institutions which have never been regarded as foundations, and to the best of our knowledge have never engaged in the abuses at which the bill is directed.

If these institutions were to be treated as private foundations and subjected to the burdens and restrictions set forth in the bill, the proposed legislaion would have serious consequences for them.

First would be the financial burden imposed by the proposed 7½ percent tax on net investment income which would aggravate an already difficult financial situation for most of these institutions.

With rising costs, they must constantly increase their financial resources merely to continue their present activities, but they must depend for their support primarily upon their existing resources, and upon the future generosity of other persons.

The proposed tax would reduce the funds available to these institutions from their existing resources and cause a corresponding reduction in their educational scientific activities. For example, if the Brookings Institution had been subject to the 7½ percent tax for its fiscal year ended June 30, 1969, its tax liability would have been approximately $200,000.

Brookings has several education and research projects with a budget of less than $50,000 per year, and if the tax had been in effect, four or more of these projects would have been discontinued or other programs would have been cut back.

In other advanced study institutions, an existing program of study for say 100 mathematicians, economists or physicists could, if the tax were in effect, accommodate only 92 or 93. Instead of the tax, therefore, we support the recommendation made yesterday, that there be a filing fee sufficient in the aggregate to finance fully the costs of an operating unit in the Internal Revenue Service which would enforce the tax laws applicable to foundations.

Under the bill, other persons, the general public and foundations would in the future be less inclined or less able to be generous in their contributions to private foundations, and thus to the advanced study and research institutions, if they were treated as private foundations.

This would result from the bill's proposed changes with respect to the tax consequences of charitable contributions of appreciated property to private nonoperating foundations. Furthermore, a separate provision of the bill would in effect compound the financial problems of the advance study institutions by prohibiting private foundations from making grants except out of corpus to these institutions, if they are defined as private nonoperating foundations.

Another serious consequence for these advanced study institutions is created by the new "expenditure responsibility" rules in the bills. If and to the extent that private foundations make grants to these institutions the expenditure responsibility rules in the bill would require the granting foundations to exercise substantial control over the recipients' use of the funds. This obviously would impair the traditional independence and academic freedom enjoyed by these institutions.

Thus, the bill if enacted would, ironically, put them in the position where they would find it both more necessary and more difficult than ever before to obtain support from the grant-making foundations, and yet if they were to succeed, they would do so at the possible cost of impairing their independence.

Other parts of the proposed legislation create major problems for the advanced study and research institution. First we are concerned by the broad and ambiguous restriction against activities that constitute an "attempt to influence legislation."

We agree that our institutions should not engage to any extent in direct lobbying or grass roots campaigns with respect to pending legislation, but the bill in its present form is very imprecise and would, we believe, be seriously inhibiting to many of our institutions.

For example, the Brookings Institution publishes scholarly analyses of public issues and public policies which seek to inform and assist the American public and the executive and legislative branches of government by clarifying the issues and by exploring policy alternatives. These studies sometimes contain recommendations of the author on matters that may sooner or later become the subject of legislation. We believe that the bill should be clarified to provide assurance that studies of this kind would clearly qualify as "nonpartisan analysis or research," even when the authors' conclusions happen to touch on matters in disagreement between the political parties.

Further the faculties and staffs of the advanced study institutions include many of America's leading scholars and experts in certain fields, and our Government is accustomed to seeking their views on pending legislation. Again it is not clear under the bill that this useful exchange would be permitted to continue, and we suggest accordingly that the language of the bill be modified.

Second, advanced study institutions by their nature have facilities such as offices, laboratories and libraries which are used by their own officers and trustees, persons who are defined in the bill as "disqualified persons." The present language of the bill may be interpreted as prohibiting these institutions from allowing such individuals to use their facilities in the future.

In other respects also the bill's prohibition against furnishing "facilities" to disqualified persons appears too broad. For example, the bill in its present form might be interpreted to preclude the Carnegie Institution of Washington from allowing top-level Government astronomers to use the Mount Wilson and Palomar observatories.

Finally, if the advanced study and research institutions were treated as private foundations, they would because of the severe penalties that might be imposed on foundation management be severely hampered in their ability to attract capable trustees and managers. This would result from the bill's broad sweeping prohibition of many activities in areas that are not clearly defined.

The result might be that these institutions in the future would be unable to attract capable trustees and managers which might lead in the long run to one of the bill's most unfortunate consequences of all.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Dr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am Caryl P. Haskins, president of the Carnegie Institution here in Washington.

If I may, I would like to lay before you a proposal which we feel might go a long way toward meeting the difficulties which you have heard this morning for organizations of our type.

Before I do that, however, if I may I should very briefly like to underline and reiterate some of the things which have been said this morning, some of the things which we believe very strongly.

Perhaps primary among these is our belief that education at the highest level, that is postgraduate education, with its accompanying research, is as vital to the future of the Nation as any other sector of the educational effort. So, independent advanced studies and the structures, the organizations particularly dedicated to forwarding them, we feel do merit the active support of government, and do merit a guarantee of the freedom of operation characteristic of that granted to schools, colleges and universities at large specializing in broader and more elementary levels of education.

And we believe that such freedom and support can be greatly inhibited if such institutions do became classified as they would in the House bill as it stands as private or private nonoperating foundations.

Let me cite, for instance, specifics from the example that I know best, the Carnegie Institution of Washington.

The institution operates like and indeed is in effect an institution for advanced education and study, in many ways, for example, like the research operating portion of the Smithsonian Institution. Its whole effort is devoted to supporting its research staff which is in effect of course its faculty, its fellows who are in effect its students, and their supporting facilities to probe the outer limits of human knowledge about the natural universe.

For example, the work in exploring the outermost reaches of space, which has already been referred to this morning, done at the Mount Wilson and Palomar observatories where the institution is in partnership with the California Institute of Technology, or again work in in human embryology an in embryology in the broader sense, conducted at our laboratory on the Johns Hopkins campus in Baltimore, often working jointly with Johns Hopkins faculty members. Or again work in photosynthesis, that means by which the green plant makes sugar—the process which lies really at the base of our human economics, so to speak, conducted in our laboratories or the campus of Stanford University and often in collaboration with their faculty, or, at a more practical level, the development this year of an earthquake detector of a degree of sensitivity which has been unknown before.

Many other organizations of similar ilk operating in various fields like those which have been represented this morning are in a similar case to ours.

The current provisions to tax such groups by 7½ percent would inevitably erode their substance, as has already been pointed out, and their programs most seriously.

In our own case, we have reckoned the cost to us would be something on the order of $400,000 to $500,000 a year, which is the cost of one of our six departments. We would probably have to abandon one of those departments.

The Carnegie Institution has been operating in this general mode since the granting of its congressional charter in 1904, and each year it has made complete reports not only of its financial situation but also of its substantive investigations.

Other organizations have been established more recently for similar purposes, and we feel strongly that not only should they be supported but that the door should be kept open for new organizations of similar sort to arise as the national need requires it, and to serve those new purposes and those new needs as they appear.

Well, I come then, Mr. Chairman, to the proposal we would like to put. We urge, specifically, the adoption of a category that would accommodate advanced study institutions outside the category of private foundations as presently defined, and we believe that the best way to do this would be to modify the category of educational organizations in section 170(b)(1)(b) of the bill, or to add a separate category.

Such a move woud place our type of organization in the category of universities to which as I have said we believe ourselves comparable in intent and function and structure. It would assure that organizations of this category would not be classified within the definition of private foundations. But it would also categorize this group as 30 percent deduction organizations a provision of course as important for many of us as it is for the universities in respect to obtaining private contributions.

As an alternative to this, a further fifth category could be added to the definition of nonprivate foundation in section 509(a) of the House bill. We believe that the exclusion could be framed to require an advanced study organization to meet several definitions of eligibility.

First, it must spend substantially all its income directly for the active conduct of scientific, scholarly or educational activities, and as you recall, such an expenditure criterion is already in other definitions of the code.

Second, it must maintain as a principal part of its operations a faculty, body of scholars or professional staff directly engaged in objective nonpartisan research or analysis, instruction or other scientific, scholarly or educational activities.

Third, it must furnish directly to the individual scholars programs of study or instruction or facilities for scientific, scholarly or educational purposes. The results of its research must be made freely available to the general public.

This requirement, of course, is very similar to that already in section 512(b)(9) of the code.

Fourth, its governing board must be independent, not controlled directly or indirectly by any one person, family, organization or closed group.

Fifth, its support from related organizations or persons and its receipts for services under contract may not exceed a specified fraction, say a quarter or a third of its total support.

Finally and summing up, it would be required to have characteristics in general like those of graduate schools of universities.

We believe, Mr. Chairman, that an appropriate definition for the proposed category would exclude effectively the nonoperating, nonexpending, narrowly supported, tightly controlled organizations at which the present legislation seems to be directed.

Mr. Chairman, we have already laid before the staff of your committee and discussed with them a possible draft of an amendment designed to effect and flesh out this definition. That is all, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, gentlemen.

Now one thing I hope you would do is to look over this bill and let us know the parts of it that you support and think are right with regard to foundations. I know that most people want to talk about what they do not like, but I think that you do agree that there are some things about this bill that are correct, do you not?

Dr. KAYSEN. Mr. Chairman, I think we can all agree, without pretending to be tax experts, that there is a problem of abuse, that we are aware that many of these calling themselves foundations have been created and used to evade the tax laws. We think that is a necessary and desirable legislative task.

We have concentrated our efforts on those parts of the bill that concern our own problems, and if I may so, sir, I repeat again we believe we can state firmly that none of our institutions, none of the familiar institutions has engaged in the kind of abuse against which the bill is legitimately directed.

The CHAIRMAN. Right. When we propose to do something in the areas where there is abuse all the good guys who have not done anything wrong come in and say, "Why do you want to do this to us?" But I think you can understand that we have a responsibility to end abuses where they occur. Unfortunately, we do not know what everybody is doing in this area—we all agree on that. And the foundations agree they will pay the expenses of providing the information.

Let us take the Brookings Institution, aren't you already providing information to people who want to know anything about your activities anyway?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is my impression. Where is it, down the street?

Mr. HARTLEY. That is correct.

Senator BENNETT. Massachusetts Avenue.

Mr. HARTLEY. It is at 1775 Massachusetts Avenue, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If you will let us know what the problems are we will see if we can do something about the areas where those problems exist.

Senator ANDERSON. Senator Talmadge?

Senator TALMADGE. Do most of of your contributions come direct or do they come from foundations?

Dr. KAYSEN. Sir, I think we should answer that individually. For the Institute for Advanced Study, most of our operating income comes from an endowment, from our own portfolio, about 75 to 80 percent. We have some small contributions. We have some Government grants and contracts.

Dr. HASKINS. Carnegie Institution is in the same situation. Almost all of the income comes from endowments, a little bit from Government grants. We do no contract work.

Mr. WILSON. The Center for Advanced Study is the youngest of these organizations. It was established 15 years ago. It was experimental, to see whether or not there was a way that scholars in the behavioral sciences—the social sciences, and some aspects of biology—could improve their understanding after they were already distinguished scholars, if they lived together and worked out their hypotheses in contrast to or in conflict with each other.

It became clear to the board of trustees of the organization 5 years ago that the center had made a major contribution and should be permanent. We now have a very modest endowment, and we are still required to raise the additional funds to survive permanently. The present provisions of the bill would have made it so difficult that we might as a matter of fact not have been able to survive if the bill were written as it now is.

Senator TALMADGE. You did not answer my question. Does most of your money come from foundations or from contributors individually?

Mr. WILSON. Almost all of our money has come from foundations. We have an alumni in the sense that colleges and universities have, so there is not that other way to get our money.

Mr. HARTLEY. Senator, to answer your question for the Brookings Institution of our total income last year for our operating expenditures last year, about 29 percent was derived from investment income, about 30 percent from grants of private foundations, about 10 percent from Government grants and contracts, about 8 percent from conference fees, 7 percent from sales of publications and other miscellaneous institutional receipts, and about 16 percent from gifts from business firms and individuals.

Senator TALMADGE. Thank you.

Senator CURTIS. I would like to ask you, Mr. Hartley, would the sale of your publications be subject to tax under the House bill as unrelated business income?

Mr. HARTLEY. No, sir; because we sell no publications except those which report the findings of our own research, and our publications operation is run at a loss, Senator. In other words, the income from the publications does not cover the production and distribution costs.

Senator CURTIS. I am not trying to suggest a tax, but I think there is a potential danger in this field because many tax-exempt organizations by the very nature of their work sell certain literature as really a part of their work and it is not unrelated, but once we enter that field, we don't know where it would lead later on.

Mr. HARTLEY. Well, sir, I think the best that we could say, and we have been very careful to follow this policy, is that we produce no publications except those that are the direct results of studies that are conducted under our auspices. We do not publish manuscripts as a commercial publisher does.

Senator CURTIS. One more thing. I would like some information. I do not want to put in the record, you can send it to my office, I would like to know the names of Government officials or employees that the Brookings Institute has hired in the last year and from what departments they come.

Mr. HARTLEY. I will be glad to supply that to your office, Senator.

Senator FANNIN. You have mentioned attempts to influence legislation. Also there have been complaints about some of the foundations indirectly promoting candidates for public office. Now what is your position on working openly with individual Members of Congress, say probable presidential candidates, promoting and publicizing their particular fields of activity or political interest? I might say there has been open support of a particular Member's position on a particular subject, and even where the Member has been working with the foundation. I would say this is true on pollution of air and water, busing of students for integration and programs of that nature. Would you like to comment?

Mr. HARTLEY. Senator, so far as I am aware, any member of our staff who supplies information to a Member of the Senate or the House of Representatives does so at the request of the Senator or the Representative. We had the unusual situation during a recent debate on a weapons system here in the Senate in which two Senators, one on one side of the question and one on the other, asked one of our staff members to supply them with information that would help their case. This particular staff member did, and we think that he helped them in a way that strengthened each of their viewpoints.

Senator FANNIN. Of course, I was not directing the question necessarily to you, but you seem to have felt that maybe the Brookings Institution has been involved in this endeavor, and I just feel that is very serious. I think complaints are to this effect: Here are organizations that are tax exempt and that they are entering into political activities.

Do you feel that any of these organizations or foundations should in any way enter into political activities?

Mr. HARTLEY. As foundations or organizations; no; sir.

Senator FANNIN. In any other way? In other words, if they are paying the salaries of people that are involved in political activities; is this equitable?

Mr. HARTLEY. Well, sir, so far as individuals are concerned, we cannot deprive an individual of his rights as a citizen, but on the other hand we do our very best to see that the individuals do not represent the institution as such in their activities.

Senator FANNIN. If an individual is employed by the Brookings Institution, for instance, and he decides that he is going to go out in this politcial arena, will you continue him on your payroll or would you continue financing his endeavors?

Mr. HARTLEY. In one case that happened during the campaign in 1968 he actually resigned from the staff.

Senator FANNIN. I cannot get into personalities. I do not know whether that was by request or whether it was of his own volition.

Mr. HARTLEY. We made it clear to him we thought it would be better if he resigned.

Senator FANNIN. I want it understood that I am not referring only to Brookings Institute. There are other foundations that are involved in political activities, and I am personally very concerned about it.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HANSEN. I have no questions.

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you very much for your presentation.

Senator BENNETT. I have one question, Mr. Chairman.

In this situation where employees of an institution such as Brookings are used or comply with requests from Members of Congress to furnish material which is used in public debate, do you think that the institution should make it perfectly clear that this information is furnished unofficially and cannot be used with the imprimatur of the institution and its prestige?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes, sir; and we always try to make this clear. If you will recall when some members of our staff are invited to appear before congressional committees, they make it clear that they are speaking in their personal capacity and not as a representative of the Brookings Institution.

Senator BENNETT. When the material they furnish is used by the politician and the institution is quoted or the prestige of the institution is claimed; do you disallow it?

Mr. HARTLEY. Well, Senator, we do our very best. Every publication that we issue states clearly that the publication itself is presented by the institution as a competent treatment of a subject worthy of public consideration. But to maintain the standards of academic freedom and scholarly work, we also state in the publication that it represents the views and the conclusions of the individual author and does not represent the views of the trustees and the officers of the institution.

Senator BENNETT. I will take you one step further. When the newspapers report that this particular point of view is supported by the Brookings Institution do you disavow it?

Mr. HARTLEY. Well, sir, we try to disavow it in the beginning when a publication is issued, but it is almost impossible to keep up with all the places where the Brookings Institution is quoted as saying such and such is true. The best we can try to do is to protect ourselves in the very beginnig, and we always try to make clear in every press release we issue announcing a publication that the material which is issued is the result of a study made by an indiivdual, and does not represent the view of the institution.

Senator BENNETT. Thank you.

Senator GORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to observe that if the Brookings Institution finds out how to overtake rumors I would like to——

Senator BENNETT. I am not talking about rumors. I am talking about specific claims of support and backing.

Senator CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, this makes it necessary for me to ask two or three more questions.

Do you not regard an institution such as yours as a public one?

Mr. HARTLEY. Public in the sense of publicly supported?

Senator CURTIS. No, that any tax-exempt institution belongs to the public, the results of their work should be made public.

Mr. HARTLEY. And that is one of the things we always try to do, Senator. Every study we undertake, if we deem it to be a competent study, is published. This is one of the problems we have in doing work under contract or grant from the Government of the United States. We always reserve the right in all of our contracts with the Government to publish the report if the Government itself does not publish it. Because of our policy there are some fields of governmental activity in which we do not accept grants or contracts. We regard our audience, Senator, as the entire American public and the members of the executive and legislative branches of the Government, so in that sense we are a public institution.

Senator CURTIS. I think so. I think when some entity earns the status of tax exempt, they earn that by performing a service for society as a whole. That is why I take issue with the idea that the proper role of an institution such as yours is to disavow what your scholars write. I think you should take responsibility for it and make it available to everybody in return for the tax-exempt privilege. Your research should be of the type and of the quality that you would not have to disavow.

I think I am a pretty avid friend of tax-exempt institutions and I am thoroughly against this 7½-percent tax as well as many other features of the House bill, and I would like to ask you this. Do you permit your scholars to prepare material for politicians, that that same material is not published under your name and made available to the general public?

Mr. HARTLEY. Well, we try to be as helpful as we can, Senator, in answering requests that may come to us, and the material which is prepared for them I assume has to be based on studies that have been previously made and published. In this respect we try to be as fair to everybody as we can and to answer every request that we can.

Senator CURTIS. Let me put it this way. Do you make public every bit of research material that you furnish to any Government official or officer?

Mr. HARTLEY. To the best of my knowledge the material that is furnished is based on what we have already published, sir.

Senator CURTIS. That hardly answers my question.

Mr. HARTLEY. I am not quite clear.

Senator CURTIS. All right, I will put it more bluntly. Did your scholars do ghost writing for members of Congress in connection with the military authorization bill which is before the Senate?

Mr. HARTLEY. To the best of my knowledge, Senator, there were two requests that came in to an individual on the staff, one from a Senator who was in favor of the bill and one from a Senator who was against the bill. The staff member who was involved supplied information to both Senators, and to the best of my knowledge helped both of them, and they felt he was helpful to them.

This is what we were trying to do.

Senator CURTIS. I still contend that the price of tax-exemption is that you are a public institution, and that whatever is published should be available to the American public, and I think that might reach the problem that may exist, I do not know, but it appears to.

Dr. KAYSEN. Mr. Chairman, could Dr. Wilson say something to this point, and then I would like to say something to this point if I may?

Senator ANDERSON. Sure. Keep it short.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, Senator Fannin began this conversation and wanted to make clear that he was not asking the question only of Brookings.

Senator FANNIN. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. I thought therefore we ought to extend this conversation from the Brookings Institution into the discussion of what all post-doctoral higher educational institutions felt were their obligations. That is the reason for my wanting to intervene.

It is our judgment that the processes of scholarship presently require continuing education beyond the Ph. D. The scholars who participate do as a matter of fact continue to be the kinds of scholars they would have been in universities. There has never been a time when a university has not some time or another been embarrassed by statements of its scholars, but this is as a matter of fact universally a problem of free inquiry.

I think that it is quite clear that none of these institutions of which we are speaking today engages in what would be clearly partisan research, and if you were talking about trying to achieve a particular political end, each of these institutions would say that is not their role, nor the appropriate objective of the scholars as they engage in research.

Senator FANNIN. I think you will agree that this has been violated though in many instances.

Mr. WILSON. I think, Senator Fannin, that there may have been violations. I am not sure of what you speak. I think I could say confidently I know of no violations that have taken place under the auspicies of the institutions that we were trying to describe to you this morning.

Senator FANNIN. Understand I agree with the statement made on page 5 about this research. Certainly it is wholly commendable. I am not making a blanket condemnation, but I am concerned over some of the abuses.

Mr. WILSON. We are, too. But we think we are best protected in our legitimate exercise if the abuses are corrected, and we think the correction can only be properly made if there is a careful focus on the failures rather than a sweeping change which would bring into question the support of what we consider to be increasingly important research institutions to continue the work beyond what had been available under structures of universities that went only to the doctor's degree.

Senator FANNIN. I certainly want to make it clear that I was not making a blanket condemnation of foundations in any respect, because I have great admiration for the work that is being done, and I agree with what is stated in the testimony in most respects, but I am vitally concerned again on the exceptions.

Dr. KAYSEN. I would just like to add to this, Mr. Chairman, if I may, that the position of our institutions in these matters is just the same as the position of the universities and colleges. The faculty of those institutions, like the faculty and staff of ours, operate under conditions of academic freedom. This means that it is very difficult for the institutions to take responsibility for what they say.

I think what we must do, what we try to do, we are not always successful, is to take responsibility for a man's professional competence and intellectual integrity when we put him on the staff or when we invite him to come as a visitor. That is the judgment we do make.

But in our society, neither in the universities and colleges nor in the advanced study institutions, do we get the right to censor a man's activities, and, if he wishes to take the extreme case that Senator Curtis posed, if he wishes to spend his evenings ghostwriting speeches for members of one or another body in the legislature, we cannot really say anything about that.

We could, I think, if it got to a certain point say, "You are not doing your academic job, you are not doing what you came here to do. You are doing something else. That is not appropriate."

Senator CURTIS. May I interrupt there?

Dr. KAYSEN. Yes, sir.

Senator CURTIS. I did not suggest censorship. I suggested that if it is a public institution, the research be made public, and I think that would dry up the abuse.

Dr. KAYSEN. We agree with that, sir, and we believe we have an obligation to make the research public. This obligation is fulfilled by the individual scholars, most of whom work and live to publish their work. That is the way they carry on their job. But I must return to the fact—I think it is a fact—that Dr. X or Professor Y will answer an inquiry, "What do you think about so and so, you are an expert on the subject, what do you think about it?"

Now, I think it would be going a little far, and I do not understand you to say, Senator Curtis, that if Dr. X is on the staff of Brookings or on the staff of one or another institution, we have an obligation to see that he publishes the answer to the question that Congressman Y or Senator S is asking him. We do have an obligation to see that the work which we are paying him to do, the time he has spent, results in some publishable work. That is the obligation we feel and I believe we fulfill, sir.

Senator ANDERSON. Thank you. I have been a Senator longer than 20 years. I think the Brookings Institution and others have done fine work. Thank you very much.

(The joint statement of the Advanced Study and Research Institutes, and individual statements of Carl Kaysen, O. Meredith Wilson, Kermit Gordon, and Caryl P. Haskins follow:)

Joint statement presented on behalf of Advanced-Study and Research Institutions, presented by Carl Kaysen, Director, The Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton, New Jersey, O. Meredith Wilson, Director, Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Inc., Stanford, California, Kermit Gordon, President, The Brookings Institution, Washington, D.C., and Caryl P. Haskins, President, Carnegie Institution of Washington.

SUMMARY

1. Advanced-study and research institutions are an integral part of America's system of higher education, and they are similar in many respects to colleges and universities. The differences, which are dictated primarily by the requirements of advanced study, do not justify any different treatment of these institutions for Federal tax purposes.

2. These institutions have never been regarded as "foundations" at all, and they have never engaged in the abuses at which the Bill is primarily directed. The Bill, however, in its broad definition of "private foundation" fails to recognize the basic differences between these institutions and other organizations covered by Code section 501(c)(3). Hence the Bill should be amended to make clear that these institutions are outside the definition of private foundation.

3. Unless the definition of private foundation is clarified, these institutions may be subject to financial burdens and operating restrictions that will severely reduce their resources and hamper their active conduct of scientific and educational activities.

4. The proposed tax should be eliminated or reduced and changed to a supervisory fee.

5. To ensure that these institutions will receive the outside support they will need to continue their activities, the Bill should be amended to make clear they are eligible to receive qualifying distributions from private foundations.

6. To ensure that these institutions, whch are "operating" in every sense of the word, will qualify as "operating foundations" under section 4942(j)(3), that term should be defined by reference to an organization's activities or use of funds rather than by reference to the composition of its assets or support.

7. The "expenditure responsibility" rules in the Bill should be relaxed to preserve these institutions' independence.

8. The Bill's rules pertaining to activities that "influence legislation" should be clarified.

9. The Bill's rules against furnishing "facilities" to foundation managers should be clarified.

STATEMENT

I. Advanced-study institutions in the American system of higher education

This statement explains the position of centers of advanced study and research, and other academic institutions not organizationally connected with universities and colleges, in relation to the legislation before the Committee. It was prepared by Mr. Kermit Gordon, President of The Brookings Institution of Washington, D.C.; Dr. Caryl P. Haskins, President of the Carnegie Institution of Washington; Dr. Carl Kaysen, Director of the Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton, New Jersey; and Dr. O. Meredith Wilson, Director of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences at Palo Alto, California; with the assistance of counsel. The document sets forth a position not only for these four institutions but for a number of others which are listed in the first appendix of this statement. In addition to these institutions on whose behalf this document is filed, there are still others with a similar range of functions which are similarly situated in respect to the legislation before the Committee. All these institutions are an integral part of the American system of higher education. The language of the House Bill before the Committee would give the status of educational institutions only to those organizations meeting the criteria set forth in Section 201(a)(1)(B)(ii). These criteria would appear to exclude some of the organizations represented and leave others in serious doubt as to their status. This definition does not correspond to the facts of the system of higher education of which our institutions form a part, and accordingly the definition should be so changed as to reflect these facts.

The document has four parts: first, an introduction on the nature of the American system of higher education, then a description of the role of advanced training and research organizations in the system, followed by an explanation of the difficulties created for such institutions by the proposed legislation, and finally, recommendations as to how the legislation could be changed so as to avoid these problems without either raising a host of new ones or altering the broader policy of the law.

The system of higher education in the United States is marked by a high degree of pluralism and extraordinary diversity. What are usually classified as institutions of higher education are the 2500 separately organized non-profit degree-granting institutions which provide post high school education other specialized vocational training. These range in size and character from small private junior colleges to great state universities. They include as well as public institutions, and among the former church-related as well as secular ones. Most of the institutions enroll a small number of students, but the 350 largest ones account for nearly two-thirds of all the enrollment. The system as a whole performs at least six distinct functions. The first group of four functions of the system comprises the provision of education and training, of several types: (a) general or liberal education; (b) preprofessional training; (c) professional educational (d) postgraduate training for science and scholarship. The fifth function includes the conduct of scientific and scholarly research; the sixth, which is sometimes described as public service as distinct from education and research, includes the transmission of specialized knowledge to the non-academic public, and its direct application to a wide variety of public problems. Frequently this process of application is organized through contract relations between agencies of government and private business firms and educational institutions or their subdivisions. Sometimes it is done as a regular activity of special divisions of educational institutions organized for that purpose. The smaller institutions in this diverse system typcally specialize in one or another function, and the most numerous smaller institutions are the two- and four-year colleges providing liberal and general education. At the other end of the scale the great universities, public and private, usually cover the whole spectrum of activities described above.

Scientific and scholarly research and postgraduate education are intimately related. It is impossible to carry on the effective training of scientists and scholars at the higher levels except in institutions which are actively carrying on research and scholarship, since an indispensable element of such training is apprenticeship in the actual tasks of research and scholarship. It is frequently, although not always, the case that those institutions which are engaged in research are also involved in the transmission of specialized knowledge to the general public, and its application to specific problems.

Most of the research and a high proportion of the advanced training is concentrated in a relatively small number of universities. Fewer than 50 account for more than two-thirds of all doctoral degrees and perhaps two to three dozen would be considered as the most important centers of both excellent training and first rate research in most fields. In these institutions the distinction between research and education is very difficult to draw, and the two activities are intermingled.

Traditionally, the criterion of the granting of degrees has been taken as the mark that distinguishes an educational from a purely research institution. Given the intermingling of research and higher educational functions, this distinction become artificial, since candidates for the Doctor of Philosophy degree and other higher degrees are typically engaged in research programs as part of their training. In the last several decades more and more holders of the highest degree continue their education and training in postdoctoral programs. This practice began in mathematics and the natural sciences; it is now increasingly frequent in the social sciences and humanities. These postdoctoral programs reduce further the meaning of the distinction between education and research.

The institutions here represented perform these research and higher training functions or assist in their performance in a variety of ways. Typically, they cover only a part of the range of scientific and scholarly activities which are also to be found in the universities. They are special purpose enterprises which have grown up to meet particular needs in this diverse system. That these institutions are organizationally separate from universities, and the specific range of functions which they perform, are both products of their own history and circumstances.

Our educational system is in a sense like our economic system, one of free enterprise, and there is no master plan which allocates roles and functions. At the time each of these enterprises originated, the particular function which it performed was not being well performed elsewhere in the system; frequently the need for it was hardly recognized, and the new institution succeeded by demonstrating that it could serve a new and necessary purpose. It is more an accident of terminology than an essential feature of the processes of higher education and research that we associate the same functions with higher education when they are performed within the organizational boundaries of a large diversified multipurpose institution such as the great university, and think of them as serving a different purpose when they are performed by independent institutions. A more appropriate view would see all these functions and all the institutions which perform them as parts of our system of higher education.

It might be said that the institutions of the kind under discussion are so small a part of the system as to warrant no special concern. Aside from the element of inequity that such a view would involve, it fails to take account of the tremendous leverage which the higher levels of advanced training and research have on the character of the system as a whole. It is the training and research programs of a relatively small number of institutions—amongst which those here represented are prominent—that have played a major part in both the change in the quality and international standing of American science and learning in the last generation, and the equally remarkable internal change in the character of American higher education in the same period. Before World War II we were for the most part still under the intellectual tutelage of the universities of Britain and continental Europe in major fields of science and learning. In most fields first-rate graduate training and research of international quality were to be found in only a handful of institutions, hardly even a dozen at most.

Now the United States is a world leader in many fields of science and scholarship, and the inferior of no nation in any. The number of universities with excellent programs of graduate training and significant programs of research has grown rapidly, and such institutions are to be found in every region of the country. In this great process of change the contribution of every first-rate institution has been significant. And no Committee of the Congress needs to be instructed today on the significance of research and advanced training to the nation.

The institutions here represented all began as pioneers embodying the vision of some man or group of men, acquired a staff and organization relevant to their purposes, and created an intellectual tradition. An intellectual tradition, intangible as it is, is an imprtant part of what makes for the success of any research or scholarly enterprise. It cannot be easily duplicated or transferred to another organization, and the cost of destroying or damaging the enterprises which embody it are great, even though they may not be readily visible. Excellence is vital to the enterprise of research and scholarship. It still comes in small and few enough packages so that the country cannot afford to lose any one.

II. Description of advanced-training and research institutions

This portion of our statement is presented by O. Meredith Wilson, the full-time Director of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Inc.

The Center is an educational institution located in Stanford, California, on land leased from Stanford University. It has now been operating for about fifteen years. It is widely recognized as a leader in the important area of post-doctoral education.

What I plan to say this morning is not, however, merely to represent the views of the Center. I feel that I am speaking generally on behalf of the American system of higher education at the advanced levels, and on behalf of the American system of scholarship, research and learning at the advanced levels. Post-doctoral education and scholarship must be encouraged, supported and improved. Our educational structure must be sound and healthy at the top—just as it must also be sound and healthy at the bottom.

The advanced-study institutions are involved in a variety of ways in scientific and scholarly research, advanced training, and the dissemination of the results of research to the academic and general public. None of them is engaged in partisan political activity. They have come into existence to meet a variety of needs which are important in the world of education and research and which are not easily met by university organizations within the traditional framework. Although these enterprises are independent, not-for-profit corporations, their activities are closely interconnected with the activities of the universities and colleges of the United States. Both sets of institutions have worked together in a way which provides an effective division of labor among them.

Your Committee, I am sure, has an understanding of the vital role the tax laws play in stimulating the successful efforts in the field of education and scholarship which are so essential to our progress and our national welfare. Fortunately for the country, we have a long tradition that our laws shall be hospitable—not hostile—to true educational institutions and institutions engaged in scholarly pursuits. It is of the utmost importance that this tradition be maintained, whatever reforms may now be desirable in particular provisions of the tax laws.

The activities of organizations such as the Center, and The Institute for Advanced Study, and The Brookings Institution, and Carnegie Institution of Washington, are illustrative of some of the finest achievements of advanced education and advanced scholarship.

The Institute for Advanced Study, for example, is probably familiar to you as Einstein's professional home in America, and as the place where Von Neumann did his great work on the electronic computer. The Carnegie Institution of Washington has produced a number of research results of great practical importance to the nation. These include the origination of hybrid corn (which has recently become so critical a factor in the lives of people in the underdeveloped nations) first developed in 1011 at Carnegie Institution's Department of Genetics; discoveries such as silicates for new forms of optic glass, refractories and high-strength cements; early work on radar and initiation of the proximity fuse; and the exciting astronomical discoveries that have come from the Mount Wilson and Palomar observatories, which are supported and managed by Carnegie Institution jointly with the California Institute of Technology.

The Brookings Institution is so well known to you who serve in Washington for its many scholarly contributions to the science of government, economics and public affairs that it is not necessary to take your limited time this morning to dwell on the details. At our Center, each year we have in attendance, on a one-year basis, a group of about fifty eminent post-doctoral scholars in the behavioral sciences who have been carefully selected and invited to come as fellows. I have set fourth some of the tangible results of our program in the separate written statement submitted to you on the Center's behalf. I refer you to that written statement rather than repeat the specifics here.

These four organizaions together—and indeed others in the country which are somewhat like them—cover a wide range in advanced education and advanced research. They operate in the natural sciences, in the social sciences, in the humanities. They are a distinct part of the system of higher education—just as much so as colleges and universities except at a somewhat higher level. They have facilities of their own. They and the scholars who attend them have numerous ties with universities and colleges and other institutions of learning and programs of research. They have professional staffs of exceptionally high caliber. They do not always have the same kind of faculty or formal curriculum which you will find at colleges and universities at lower levels, because programs for post-doctoral work and advanced training and education must be carried on in ways which meet the special needs of such a body of scholars.

It should be emphasized that the advanced study institutions have not participated in the foundation abuses at which the Tax Reform Bill is directed. So far as we are aware, no example of any such abuse has been cited in the testimony. They have not been accumulating substantial amounts of income. They have not been electioneering or lobbying. They have not been engaging in practices of self-dealing or control of businesses. And they have not developed habits of making discriminatory grants. Thus in all these respects too they deserve to be given the same tax treatment which you plan to assure for colleges and universities.

A large factor in the success and the stability of these advanced study institutions is their independent boards of trustees. In general, their trustees are public spirited citizens of prominence and achievement, who bring a variety of talents and experience to the shaping of the policies of the institutions.

Another large factor is the ability of the organizations to obtain substantial support from grant-giving foundations or from philanthropically-minded individuals interested in supporting not only tested programs but also innovative programs which appear worth while. It is essential that such sources of support should not dry up as a result of undue restrictions imposed by any new tax legislation. It is also important that such organizations not be penalized because far-sighted individuals or foundations may have furnished them sufficient support to enable them to achieve some assurance of continuity.

The advanced study institutions are an indispensable part of the American educational system. They have shown a remarkable ability to meet changing conditions and to respond to new demands in a rapidly changing world.

During the fifteen years since the Center was founded, a great deal of innovation has occurred in the thinking and the practice with respect to post-doctoral education and other advanced research and training in the United States. Innovative efforts will continue to be required in the future. It is our hope that in considering this legislation your Committee will recognize—as we do—how necessary and urgent it is that the avenues of support for these institutions and programs be kept open.

III. Problems created by the proposed legislation

This portion of our statement is presented by Kermit Gordon, President of The Brookings Institution.

The advanced-study and research institutions described above would be seriously affected if the provisions of H.R. 13270 respecting private foundations were enacted in their present form.

A. The definitions

The problem begins in section 509 with the Bill's broad-sweeping approach in defining the term "private foundation." Instead of attempting to describe, in a positive manner, the major characteristics of the organizations to be classed as "private foundations," the Bill approaches the definitional problem by indirection. It states only that certain tax-exempt organizations are not to be treated as private foundations. Consequently, unless an organization is covered by one of the four exclusions in section 509, it is automatically treated as a private foundation whether or not it has the characteristics that would be described in a positive approach to the definition.

This definition-by-exclusion approach requires, obviously, that the terms of the exclusions bear the full burden of holding the Bill's coverage within proper limits. We submit that the four exclusions in section 509 plainly fall short of carrying that burden because they fail clearly to exclude from the Bill's coverage many institutions, such as those we have described, which are completely unlike the organizations at which the Bill's controls are primarily directed.[1]

[1] Advanced-study institutions, or at least many of them, do not fit the exclusions in section 509 because they are not, technically, colleges or universities and because their sources of support are such that they do not qualify under the mechanical tests for publicly- and broadly-supported organizations.

Further, although each of these institutions is in every sense actively and directly "operating" in educational or scientific fields, many of them are not, because they have large endowments or only a few major sources of support, included in the Bill's definition of "operating foundation." [2]

In short, the Bill in its present form sweeps into the definition of "private foundation," and out of the definition of "operating foundation," many of America's advanced-study and research institutions—independent operating institutions which have never been regarded as "foundations" at all and which certainly have never engaged in the abuses at which the Bill is directed.

Because of the nature of these institutions' activities, and their need for funds to carry on these activities, the proposed legislation would have serious consequences for them if they were treated as private foundations and subjected to the burdens and restrictions set forth in the Bill.

B. The tax

The first problem, of course, would be the financial burden imposed by the proposed 7½% on net investment income. As explained above, these institutions are a part of the system of higher education. They share many of the attributes of colleges and universities; the differences—small size, flexibility or absence of a formal curriculum or degrees, and increased emphasis on independent research—are dictated primarily by the requirements of advanced study.[3] One practical respect in which these institutions are, unfortunately, similar to colleges and universities is in their pressing need, with rising costs, to increase their financial resources merely to continue their present activities. Beyond this, these institutions constantly need increased financial resources to keep pace with rising levels of education and to meet the growing need for their services.

Advanced-study institutions are not in the business of selling goods or services for profit, and of course they are not in a position to increase their resources by attracting equity investments or by borrowing. They must, instead, depend for their support primarily upon their existing resources and upon the future generosity of other persons.

It must first be noted that, under the Bill's terms, other persons—the general public and foundations—will in the future be less inclined or less able to be generous in their contributions to private foundations. This will result from the Bill's proposed changes in the tax consequences of charitable contributions of appreciated property to private non-operating foundation, and from the Bill's proposed restrictions, discussed below, on the ability of private foundations to make grants to these institutions out of income. Futhermore, the grant-making private foundations themselves will be subject to the 7½% tax on net investment income and will consequently have less money available for grants. Under these circumstances, any amount paid out in taxes, no matter how small, would be difficult or impossible for these advanced-study institutions to recoup from other sources. The tax would therefore cause a corresponding reduction in available funds, and a corresponding cutback in these institutions' educational and scientific activities.

For example, if the Brookings Institution had been subject to the 7½% tax for its fiscal year ended June 30, 1969, its tax liability would have been approximately $200,000. Brookings has several education and research projects with a budget of less than $50,000 per year. If the tax had been in effect, Brookings would have had to discontinue four or more of these programs, or to cut back on other programs. In terms of individual students, an existing program of study for, say, 100 mathematicians, economists or physicists could, if the tax were in effect, accommodate only 92 or 93. This loss in advanced-study opportunity for seven or eight individuals could be made up, partially, only if the government were to use the tax revenues, less the government's expenses, to subsidize their study.

The proposed tax on investment income, in summary, would aggravate an already difficult financial situation and would have immediate, continuing and permanent effects, both direct and indirect, on these institutions' ability to maintain their existing programs and facilities.

[2] Inexplicably, the term "operating foundation" is defined in section 4942(j)(3) by reference to the composition of an organization's assets or support rather than by reference to its activities or use of funds.

[3] For example, the very nature of advanced-study—study which extends the frontiers of knowledge—often precludes the possibility of maintaining the type of "regular curriculum" that involves instruction by others in predetermined subjects.

C. Restrictions on sources of support

The financial hardship imposed by the tax would be severely compounded by a separate provision of the Bill that would have serious financial implications for these institutions even if the tax were eliminated entirely. That is the Bill's provision that would, in effect, prohibit private foundations from making grants to private non-operating foundations except out of corpus.

In the past many advanced-study institutions have received substantial support from the heavily-endowed grant-making foundations. In the future, however, unless the proposed Bill is modified (or except to the extent that private foundations are willing to make out of corpus) these institutions, if they are viewed as private non-operating foundations, will have to look elsewhere for the support necessary to replace both the loss of contributions from private foundations and the loss of revenue resulting from the 7½% tax on net investment income. Unfortunately, in view of the Bill's proposed changes in the treatment of charitable contributions, particularly to private non-operating foundations, the replacement sources of support are almost certain to be inadequate.

D. Expenditure responsibility rules

There is another serious aspect, from the standpoint of these institutions, to the problem of receiving grants from private foundations. That is the problem created by the new "expenditure responsibility" rules in section 4945, and it arises whether or not the recipient institution is an operating foundation and whether or not the grant is made from corpus or income.

If and to the extent that private foundations make grants to these advanced-study institutions, the expenditure responsibility rules in the Bill will require the granting foundation to exercise substantial control over the recipients' use of funds. This, obviously, would impair the traditional independence and academic freedom enjoyed by advanced-study institutions (and seems, incidentally, to run counter to other provisions of the Bill, such as the operating foundation definition, which favor organizations that are relatively free of control by another party).

Institutions such as Brookings have on occasion refused grants where the grant-making foundation proposed to involve itself with the work financed with its funds. Ironically, the proposed legislation would put these advanced-study institutions in a position where they would find it both more necessary and more difficult than ever before to obtain support from grant-making foundations and yet, if they were to succeed, they would do so at the cost of impairing their independence.

E. Other major problems

Other parts of the proposed legislation create other problems of major concern to advanced-study institutions.

First, we are concerned by a broad and ambiguous restriction in section 4945(b)(1) against activities that constitute an "attempt to influence legislation." We agree that these institutions should no engage to any extent in direct lobbying or "grass roots" campaign with respect to pending legislation (other than appearances or communications respecting legislation that directly affects the institutions themselves.[4] The Bill in its present form, however, is very imprecise and will, we believe, be seriously inhibiting to many of these institutions.

For example, the Brookings Institution publishes scholarly analyses of public issues and public policies. These studies seek to inform and assist the American public and the executive and legislative branches of government by clarfying economic, governmental, and international issues and by exploring policy alternatives. These studies sometimes contain recommendations of the authors on matters that may, sooner or later, become the subject of legislation. We believe the Bill should be clarified to provide assurance that studies of this kind would clearly qualify as "non-partisan analysis and research" even where the authors' conclusions happen to touch on matters in disagreement between the political parties.

Further, these institutions' faculties and staffs include many of America's leading scholars and experts in certain fields, and our government is accustomed to seeking their views on pending legislation. Again it is unclear, under the Bill, that this useful exchange would be permitted to continue.

We suggest, accordingly, that the language of the Bill in section 4945(b)(1) and (c) be modified to make clear that the only prohibited activities are "grass roots" campaigns and direct lobbying with the Congress with respect to specific pending legislation.

Second, advanced-study institutions, by their nature, have "facilities," such as offices, laboratories and libraries, which are used by their own officers and trustees—persons who are defined in the Bill as "disqualified persons." The present language of the Bill in section 4941(d)(1) may be interpreted as prohibiting these institutions from allowing these individuals to use these facilities in the future. This obviously unintended result should be corrected. In other respects, also, the Bill's prohibition against furnishing facilities to disqualified persons appears to be too broad. For example, under the Bill in its present form the Carnegie Institution of Washington apparently could not permit a top-level government astronomer to use the Mount Wilson and Palomar observatories.

Finally, if these institutions were treated as private foundations they would, because of the severe penalties that may be imposed in foundation management, be severely hampered in their ability to attract capable trustees and managers. This will result from the Bill's broad-sweeping prohibition of many activities in areas that are not clearly defined. An example we have already mentioned is the ambiguous prohibition against activities that influence legislation. Although taxes and penalties would be imposed on a foundation manager only if he acts "knowingly," in many cases it will be impossible in advance to know whether a particular activity violates the law. There is a risk, perhaps, that knowledge of an ambiguity in the law—knowledge of the possibility of a violation—constitutes the only knowledge necessary for the imposition of a tax and penalty on foundation management.

The result of these uncertainties, in any event, may be that many persons will resign their positions, and these institutions in the future will be unable to attract capable replacements. Those trustees and managers who do continue to serve may become reluctant, because of the Bill's ambiguities, to undertake worthwhile activities. In short, these severe sanctions in the Bill, coupled with the uncertainty as to exactly which acts may result in sanctions, may lead in the long run to one of the most unfortunate consequences of all.

IV. Recommendations

This portion of our statement is presented by Caryl P. Haskins, President of the Carnegie Institution of Washington.

We believe that education and research at the highest level, extending beyond the graduate schools of American universities, are absolutely indispensable to the future progress of the Nation. Independent advanced study therefore merits not only the active support of our government but also a freedom of operation equal to that granted schools, colleges and universities. Such support and freedom will be severely hampered if advanced-study institutions are classified as private foundations or if they are further classified as non-operating foundations.

Consider, for example, the Carnegie Institution of Washington: it "operates" and is an "educational organization" in every usual sense of the words, very much like the Smithsonian Institution. All its endeavors and every spare dollar of income—and sometimes capital taken from endowment—are devoted to operating its research facilities and enabling its eminent staff members (its faculty) and its fellows (its students) to pursue research which probes and often penetrates the outermost boundaries of human knowledge. The great telescopes and program of research in astronomy in California, operated jointly with the California Institute of Technology are a representative example of its activities. These are resources and activities—physical in part but primarily human—which we believe this country cannot afford to dissipate. Taxing their income by 7½ percent would inevitably erode their substance most seriously.

The Carnegie Institution has been operating since 1902 in response to its founder's extraordinary vision of the need for an advanced research and educational organization in the 20th century. Others were later established in response to new demands and new visions. The door should be kept open for additional advanced research and study organizations.

What are our proposals?

First, we urge that Congress clarify the status of advanced-study institutions by specifically adopting a category that would accommodate them clearly outside the category of "private foundation." The best way to do this, we believe, would be by revising the category of "educational organization" in, or adding a separate category to section 170(b)(1)(B), at pages 109–112 of the Bill. This would assure that these institutions are to be excluded from the definition of private foundations. It also would make clear that we are so-called "30-percent" organizations. This would place us in the same category as universities which we regard as entirely comparable in intent and effect.

As an alternative, a fifth exclusion could be added to the defintion of "private foundation" in section 509(a), at pages 15-16 of the Bill. The new exclusion could be framed so that an advanced-study organization would have to meet several definitive tests:

First, it would have to spend substantially all of its income directly for the active conduct of scientific, scholarly, or educational activities. Such an expenditure test is already in other definitions in the Code (section 170(g)(2)) and in the Bill (section 4942(j)(3)(B), at pages 33-34.)

Second, it would be required to maintain as a principal part of its operations faculty, body of scholars or professional staff engaged directly in objective, nonpartisan research or analysis, instruction or other scientific, scholarly, or educational activities.

Third, it would have to furnish directly to individual scholars programs of study or instruction or facilities for scientific, scholarly, or educational purposes. The results of its research would have to be freely available to the general public. a requirement similar to that in section 512(b)(9) of the Code.

Fourth, its governing board would have to be independent, that is, not controlled directly or indirectly by any one person, family, organization or closed group.

Fifth, its support from related organizations or persons and its receipts for services under contract could not exceed a specified fraction—say, one-quarter or one-third—of its total support.

Finally, it would in general have to have characteristics in common with those of graduate schools of universities.

We believe that the definitional language for the suggested category could be framed so as to exclude the non-operating non-expending, narrowly-supported, tightly-controlled organizations at which the new legislation appears to be aimed.

If we cannot be placed clearly outside the definition of private foundations, we urge that the definition of "operating foundation" in section 4942(j)(3), at pages 33-34 of the Bill, be clarified so that there will be no doubt that we can qualify. In the case of the Carnegie Institution, for example, the very circumstances it has treasured and which it can primarily credit for the quality of its research and educational programs—its endowment, its independence from government support and its concentration on operations rather than fund raising, grant-seeking and grant-making—paradoxically trap it unless the definition of "operating foundation" is amended. If we are to be private foundations under the Bill, we will not, unless we are treated as "operating foundations," have the flexibility needed for our programs, and we will not attract the support from the granting foundations that we will need to offset the loss we would suffer from "private foundation" status. This is true of many, if not all, of the advanced-study organizations for which we are testifying.

Another amendment we urge, on behalf of those of our group who may not be able to qualify for "operating foundation" status, is to expand the definition "qualifying distributions" in section 4942(g)(1) at page 30. Under the definition as now written, as we understand it, an advanced research and educational organization that is treated as "non-operating" could not be supported by a non-operating grant-making foundation except by grants out of corpus. While many such foundations expend principal, it seem clear that they cannot take care of all "non-operating" beneficiaries. We recommend an amendment that would include as a "qualifying distribution" a grant or gift which the donee organization expends within a year for the exempt purpose for which it was given. The test would be modeled on the test proposed for section 170(e)(3) at page 124.

We have already mentioned the need for clarification of section 4945(b)(1) and (c) with respect to lobbying activities.

We would hope that section 4942(g)(1)(A) at page 30, lines 6-7, would be clarified so as to make clear that expenses of a foundation in the nature of administrative and ordinary and necessary business expenses will be treated as "qualifying distributions." At the same time, it should be made clear that the inclusive phrase in section 4945(b)(5) at page 44, lines 23-24, making "taxable expenditure" include an amount paid or incurred for a purpose other than a section 501(c)(3) purpose, will not be used to penalize foundations for expenditures made in good faith.

Finally, we urge, both as donors and as donees, that the "expenditure responsibility" required by section 4945(f), at page 47, to be exercised by a grantmaker over a grant recipient be rephrased so that the test can be met by "best efforts" or "reasonable diligence." As donees, we are particularly concerned that these rules might lead to impairment of our operations and loss of the operational autonomy and flexibility that advanced study requires.

There are other troublesome aspects to the Bill. We have in mind, for example, the possibility that the directors of our departments who appear to be within the term "foundation manager" might be required to give up the use of laboratory or other "facilities" that our institutions have always made available in accordance with their policy of encouraging continued research by those of their staff members who have assumed administrative responsibilities. But it is impossible to cover all of the technical problems in a limited compass, and they are less serious than those from which we have specifically requested relief.

The Tax Reform Act of 1969 (H.R. 13270)

(Memorandum by Advanced-Study Group on proposed amendment to exclude from the definition of "private foundation" an additional category called "advanced-study or research institution")

In America's system of higher education, the highest level of education is provided, to a significant extent, by a number of independent advanced-study and research institutions. Examples are The Brookings Institution, Carnegie Institution of Washington, Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, and The Institute for Advanced Study. These institutions, which have never been regarded as "foundations," are engaged directly and actively in educational and scientific activities and are similar in many respects to colleges and universities; the differences—flexibility or absence of a formal curriculum or degrees, and increased emphasis on independent research—are dictated primarily by the requirements of advanced study and do not justify any different treatment of these institutions by the Bill.

The Bill, however, in its definition of "private foundation" (at pages 15–17 of H.R. 13270) fails clearly to treat these institutions like colleges and universities and to exclude them from the coverage of the provisions applicable to private foundations.[1] Consequently, unless the definition is clarified by amendment, these institutions may be subject to financial burdens, restrictions on their sources of support, and operating restrictions that will severely reduce their resources and impair their ability to continue their educational and scientific programs. (A full description of these problems is set forth in material submitted to the Committee on Finance by the Advanced-Study Group under date of September 10, 1969.)

Attached to this memorandum is a proposed amendment that would ensure that these institutions will be excluded from the definition of private foundation and be free to continue their present operations. The amendment is narrowly drafted so as to exclude from its coverage the types of organizations at which the new legislation appears to be aimed.

A technical explanation of the amendment's provisions is also attached.

[91st Cong., 1st sess., H.R. 13270]

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. ——— to H.R. 13270, an Act to reform the income tax laws, viz:

1. On page 16, on line 21 strike out the word "and" and on line 23 strike out the period and insert: "; and

"(5) an advanced-study or research institution."

2. On page 44, on line 19 strike out the word "or" and at the end of the line insert: ", or (5)".

3. On page 57, after line 2 insert the following (and redesignate subsections (d) through (k) of section 101 as subsections (e) through (l)):

"(d) Definition of Advanced-Study or Research Institution.—Section 7701(a) (relating to definitions) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(35) Advanced-Study or Research Institution.—The term "advanced-study or research institution" means an organization, including a learned society, which is described in section 501(c)(3) and which—

"'(A) expends substantially all of its income directly for the active conduct of scientific scholarly, or educational activities;

"'(B) maintains as the major part of its operations a faculty or one or more bodies of scholars or scientists (a significant number of the members of which hold advanced degrees) engaged directly, under conditions of academic freedom, in instruction or scholarly or scientific studies or research (exclusive of instruction, studies, or research for the primary purpose of commercial or industrial application);

"'(C) makes available (or permits and encourages the scholars associated with it to make available) to the general public the results of its studies or research or furnishes directly to a significant number of individuals, selected objectively, programs of study or instruction or facilities for scientific, scholarly, or educational purposes;

"'(D) is not controlled directly or indirectly by one or more disqualified persons (as defined in section 4946) who are not foundation managers; and

"'(E) normally receives not more than one-third of its support in each taxable year from any combination of—

"'(i) gifts, grants, or contributions from one or more disqualified persons (as defined in section 4946) other than organizations described in section 170(b)(1)(B) and private foundations not described in section 4946(a)(1)(H), or

"'(ii) gross receipts (exclusive of tuition or enrollment fees) from performance of services under contract.'"

[1] The problem arises because of the Bill's definition-by-exclusion approach in defining the term "private foundation." The definition states that any organization described in section 501(c)(3) is a "private foundation" unless it is covered by one of the four exclusions in new section 509. Many advanced-study institutions may not clearly fit these exclusions because they are not, technically, colleges or universities and because their sources of support do not permit them to qualify under the mechanical tests for publicly- and broadly-supported organizations.

TECHNICAL EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT

The Amendment would add to new section 509(a) of the Internal Revenue Code, at pages 15-17 of H.R. 13270, a new paragraph (5) which would exclude from the definition of "private foundation" any organization which is an "advanced-study or research institution." The term "advanced-study or research institution" would be defined in a new paragraph (35) added by the Amendment to section 7701(a) (relating to definitions). The Amendment also makes a technical change on page 44 of the Bill to make clear that these institutions will be treated like other excluded organizations for purposes of the expenditure responsibility rules.

The definition of "advanced-study or research institution" would apply to section 501(c)(3) organizations which satisfy each of five tests set forth in the Amendment in subparagraphs (A) through (E). The five tests are designed to serve two related purposes: first, to be descriptive of the principal characteristics of these institutions; and second, to exclude from the new definition, and thereby leave subject to the Bill's provisions, organizations which are not part of the system of higher education. Excluded from the new definition, for example, would be organizations which direct their efforts to research primarily for commercial or industrial application, and organizations which do not operate under conditions of academic freedom.

Paragraph (A) of the new definition requires that the institution be engaged, both actively and directly, in educational, scholarly or scientific activities; it further requires that the organization expend substantially all of its income in conducting such activities. This test is already used in the Code in section 170(g)(2)(B) (relating to the unlimited charitable contribution deduction) and in the Bill in new Code section 4942(j)(3) (relating to operating foundations). An organization would not qualify under this test if, for example, a substantial portion of its income were expended to finance such activities carried on under the auspices of one or more other organizations.

The test in paragraph (B) reflects the major distinguishing characteristics of these institutions. The organization must operate primarily through a group of individuals (a faculty or one or more bodies of scholars or scientists) who are themselves engaged directly in instruction or scholarly or scientific studies or research. As an indication of higher-education status, a significant number of these individuals must hold advanced degrees, and their activities must meet both a procedure test and a purpose test. As to procedure, the activities must be conducted under conditions of academic freedom, which means freedom of the teacher or scholar to express the truth as he sees it without interference by any other authority or fear of loss of position. As to purpose, the activities must be pursued primarily to enhance the knowledge or capabilities of the individuals involved or of the public at large. Activities carried on for the primary purpose of commercial or industrial application are not indicative of an institution of higher education and will not qualify in meeting the test in paragraph (B).

Paragraph (C) adds a test that ensures that the organization and its works will be exposed to or involved with the general public to a significant extent. The test requires that the organization make available (by publication or otherwise) to the general public the results of its studies or research. However, since these organizations often do not themselves publish the results of their scholars' work, this test will be satisfied if the organization permits and encourages its scholars to make available the results of their work. (This test is intended to codify the current practices generally followed already by institutions of higher education such as colleges and universities; an organization would not fail to meet this test, for example, merely because its works are of direct interest only to a limited segment of the general public or because it or the scholar involved does not make available the results of efforts that are deemed unsuccessful.) Alternatively or in addition, an organization would satisfy the test in paragraph (C) if it offers programs of study or instruction or facilities directly to a significant number of individuals for scientific, scholarly or educational purposes. The meaning of "significant" will vary depending on the field of study, the nature of the program and other factors such as available financial resources. The individuals in question must, in any event, be selected on an objective basis. Examples of "facilities" within the meaning of paragraph (C) are libraries or laboratories.

Paragraphs (D) and (E) are designed to ensure that the organization will be independent and not be controlled or influenced in its operations by a particular person, family, organization or group. In paragraph (D) the test is put in terms of direct or indirect control of the institution by disqualified persons other than foundation managers. (Foundation managers are excluded from the control restrictions in paragraph (D) even if they are also substantial contributors as defined in section 4946(a)(2); this exclusion is necessary because many officers and trustees of these institutions are substantial contributors (that is, contributors of over $5,000 in any one calendar year) and is appropriate in view of the specific limitations in paragraph (E) on the amount of support that may be received from disqualified persons including foundation managers.) This test is already used in the Bill in new section 509(a)(3)(C) (page 16, lines 17-19 of H.R. 13270). The prohibited control for this purpose would include informal understandings or arrangements as well as formal voting control.

The test in paragraph (E) is designed to minimize the opportunity for control or influence stemming from financial support of the institution. Under this test, not more than one-third of an institution's support could be received from certain sources. These sources include disqualified persons who are individuals, business corporations, related foundations (as defined in section 4946(a)(1)(H) and others. For example, an institution would not qualify under this test if it normally receives as much as one-third of its support from a private foundation which received substantially all of its contributions from the same individual who made (directly or indirectly) substantially all of the contributions to the institution in question. Further, to avoid outside parties' influence over the institution's activities and any impairment of its academic freedom, the support restrictions also apply to gross receipts from the performance of services under contract. Thus, under the test in paragraph (E), at least two-thirds of an institution's support must be derived from sources such as receipts from carrying on exempt activities (such as tuition fees and sales of publications), endowment income, contributions from "30-percent" organizations including the government, contributions from the general public (in amounts such that the contributors would not be disqualified persons), and contributions from unrelated private foundations.

Statement of Kermit Gordon, President of the Brookings Institution

Summary

The provisions of H.R. 13270 would seriously affect the programs and activities of the Brookings Institution, which is not a foundation, but an independent, nonpartisan, nonprofit organization, akin to a university, engaged in advanced study and education.

To treat the Institution as a foundation under the provisions of the bill would be to place it in a category in which it does not belong. A group of institutions engaged in advanced study and research, of which Brookings is one, is submitting a suggestion for an amendment to the bill that would exclude these organizations from the provisions of the bill.

If the proposed exclusion is denied, the bill if enacted would have extremely adverse effects on the future operations of the Brookings Institution.

If Brookings had been subject in recent years to the proposed 7½ percent tax on net investment income, its annual tax liability would have averaged around $200,000, which is nearly as much as we would have had to pay were we subject to the regular corporate income tax. The tax would be doubly burdensome on Brookings; it would curtail both the available income on the Brookings endowment and the ability of the foundations to make grants to Brookings.

We are apprehensive about the effects of the provision which would penalize efforts to influence legislation, other than through making available the results of nonpartisan analysis and research. Although it would appear on the surface that Brookings is well protected by the exemption for nonpartisan analysis and research—since this phrase constitutes an accurate description of our program—there are ambiguities and uncertainties beneath the surface which would cause serious injury to staff morale and impair our sources of financial support.

Though one section of the bill is designed to minimize the degree of control which a grant-making foundation can exercise over an operating foundation, the "expenditure responsibility" requirement imposed on foundations works in the opposite direction; it virtually requires a cautious and conscientious grant-making foundation to involve itself intimately in the affairs of the operating foundation. It will be difficult to maintain the independence of the Brookings Institution if foundations are required to assume "expenditure responsibility" with respect to their grants to us.

STATEMENT

I am Kermit Gordon, President of the Brookings Institution, a nonprofit research and educational organization chartered under the laws of the District of Columbia. I appreciate the courtesy of the Committee in allowing me to present this statement concerning the problems raised by H.R. 13270 for the Brookings Institution.

Though most people in Washington, and many elsewhere in the country, are familiar in a general way with the role of Brookings, I have found that few people are familiar with the Institution's origins, broad purposes, and range of activities. Before turning to a discussion of the possible impact of the proposed legislation on Brookings, I would like to describe the Institution and its objectives.

We believe that in its conception and structure, the Brookings Institution is unique. Other organizations share some of its research interests or perform some similar educational services, but no other private institution combines its broad range of policy interests with its fundamental commitment to make social science research useful to leaders throughout our society.

The Institution is now 53 year old. Its origins date back to the first of its predecessor organizations—the Institute for Governmental Research—which was established in Washington in 1916. Its founders were a distinguished group of businessmen and educators who saw the need for an independent organization that would apply the analytic tools of scholarship to the study of public problems. Though it is commonplace today that systematic study by highly trained scholars can be valuable in the solution of public problems, the conception which led to the creation of the Institute was a pioneering notion in 1916.

In the early days of the Institute for Government Research, the work of the organization was focused on the improvement of organization and management in the federal government. The development of a budgeting system for the federal government was largely the work of the Institute. Its studies led directly to the enactment of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, which established the executive budget, created the Bureau of the Budget, and established the Office of the Comptroller General. It is widely regarded as one of the landmark events in the improvement of the organization and management of the federal government.

In addition to its pioneering work on budgeting, the Institute's studies made notable contributions to the improvement of federal personnel administration, the development of a civil service retirement system, and other advances in government administration.

Among the founders of the Institute was Robert S. Brookings, a prosperous St. Louis businessman, who retired at the age of 46 shortly before the turn of the century in order to devote his wealth and the rest of his life to public service. As a result of his experience as a trustee of the Institute, and his wartime service in 1917-18 with the War Industries Board, he became convinced of the need for basic economic data and analysis in intelligent decision-making in government. He found that other leaders in business, education and government shared his views, and he took the lead in organizing another institute, designed to do for economic policy what the Institute for Government Research was doing for government administration.

The Institute of Economics—the second antecedent organization of the Brookings Institution—was thus established on Mr. Brookings' initiative in 1922. The work of the Institute influenced the readjustment of international debt policies through its studies of reparations and war debts in the 1920's. It later conducted important research in the fields of trade barriers, agricultural policy, income distribution, social security, and other labor and welfare problems.

The third antecedent organization was the Robert Brookings Graduate School of Economics and Government, established in 1924. The School, which was founded and initially financed by Mr. Brookings, was avowedly experimental in nature, and it soon attracted wide attention for its pioneering emphasis on training for the public service. Its program focused on the opportunities afforded its students for ready access to the source materials of public policy research and personal contact and discussion with Washington officials. During its existence, the School awarded doctor of philosophy degrees to 74 persons, many of whom have since had distinguished careers in public service, research, and education.

The three antecedent organizations were merged in 1928 into the Brookings Institution. The goals of the Institution have not changed in any significant way since 1928. We remain an independent organization devoted to nonpartisan research, education, and publication in the fields of economics, government, and foreign policy. Our primary function—the analysis of public problems and public policy—is carried out through three research programs: Economic Studies, Governmental Studies, and Foreign Policy Studies. Our staff of social science analysts numbers 145, of whom 82 are members of the resident staff, and 63 are nonresident associates, most of whom are also faculty members of colleges and universities throughout the country.

Over the years we have developed a number of policies to guide our research activities. First, the studies we publish present the opinions and conclusions of the author, not of the Institution. In determining whether to publish a study, the Institution reaches a judgment as to whether it is a competent treatment of a subject worthy of public consideration, but it does not seek to influence the author's conclusions. Second, the Institution will not undertake contract research for private clients. Third, in conducting research financed by government grants or contracts, it will not accept classified projects, and it insists on the unqualified right to publish its findings.

The largest of our research programs is in the field of economic studies. Projects currently under way emphasize problems of economic growth and stability, monetary and fiscal policies, international economics, industrial organization, social economics, and labor economics. The program also includes cooperative research with major universities in public finance, econometrics, regulation of economic activity, and the role of transportation in economic development. Of particular interest to this Committee will be the program of Studies in Government Finance, which is now reaching completion after the publication of some 30 books dealing with the major issues of tax and expenditure policy. This is probably the most comprehensive effort to analyze current problems of public finance ever undertaken in the United States, and it is particularly timely in view of the current high interest in tax reform and intergovernmental fiscal relations.

The Governmental Studies Program is somewhat smaller, but growing in scope. Its current studies deal with problems of the legislative process; public policy, especially in the fields of civil rights, poverty, and urban problems; courts and the administration of justice; and political parties and public management.

The Foreign Policy Studies Program is studying U.S. foreign policy issues which changes in the international environment will bring increasingly to the fore, and whose resolution will require new perceptions and policies. The program deals with three major areas: the U.S. politico-military role, economic development and interdependence, and problems of political development. In this field of research, we are employing the study group technique—an arrangement under which the research staff meets regularly with a study group, which includes members of Congress, officials of the executive branch, and academic specialists, for discussion and debate of the analytical papers prepared by the staff.

In addition to its research activities, the Institution conducts a large and ambitious mid-career educational program. This activity—our Advanced Study Program—provides opportunities for leaders in government, business, labor, and the professions to develop a deeper understanding of government operation and public policy issues. Conferences, seminars, briefings, and reading programs are conducted to broaden the horizons of the participants and to study specific policy problems. Government officials, business executives, union leaders, scholars, journalists and other public figures participate as lecturers and discussion leaders. Since this program was launched a decade ago, more than 9,000 participants have benefited from these activities.

In the words of my predecessor, Robert D. Calkins, Brookings stands as "a plot of non-political territory where scholars, responsible officials in public life, and leaders in private life may meet for consideration of problems in the national interest." We provide these opportunities not only through our Advanced Study Program, but through a wide range of other actvities which bring persons with common interests to Brookings. Each year we award about a dozen research fellowships to advanced graduate students at universities throughout the country to help them develop the necessary skills for evaluating specific programs of the We also bring to Washington each year up to 10 young postdoctoral economists to help them develop the necessary skills for evaluating specific programs of the federal government. High level civil servants are given leave by their agencies for periods up to a year to come to Brookings to conduct depth studies of problems of importance to their agencies. We provide office facilities and other services for mature scholars from American and foreign universities who are doing research on problems that are related to the organization, operation or polices of the U.S. government. In the last year, we have welcomed to Brookings 70 people in these various categories.

In carrying out this range of activities, I believe that we have kept faith with the charter of the Institution, which states that the business and objects of the Brookings Institution are: "To promote, carry on, conduct, and foster scientific research, education, training and publication in the broad fields of economics, government administration, and the political and social sciences generally, involving the study, determination, interpretation and publication of economic, political and social facts and principles relating to questions of local, national or international significance; to promote and carry out these objects, purposes and principles without regard to and independently of the special interests of any group in the body politic either political, social or economic."

The Institution is governed by a distinguished Board of Trustees, whose present chairman is Douglass Dillon, former Secretary of the Treasury. From the very beginning, the trustees of Brookings and its antecedent organizations have been drawn from all regions of the nation and have constituted a cross-section of our national leadership. Many have been prominent leaders in business and the professions, and 19 have been presidents of colleges and universities. They have also made important contributions to the public service, either before or after serving as Brookings trustees. Two were presidents of the United States; three were Supreme Court justices; three were Secretaries of State; ten others were also Cabinet officers; and a number have been ambassadors and members of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The trustees under the by-laws have the responsibility "to elect the President, to satisfy themselves with reference to the character, intellectual competency, and scientific integrity of the staff; to approve the fields of investigation and the major specific studies to which the available funds are allocated; and to review periodically the administration and the program of the Institution."

The by-laws go on to state: "The expressed policy of the Trustees with reference to the scientific work of the Institution is as follows: It is the function of the Trustees to make possible the conduct of scientific research, and publication, under the most favorable conditions, and to safeguard the independence of the research staff in the pursuit of their studies and in the publication of the results of such studies. It is not a part of their function to determine, control, or influence the conduct of particular investigations or the conclusions reached."

After many years of effort, the Institution is now receiving enough financial support to enable it to plan its future program with some confidence. In our earlier years, there were numerous financial crises during which the very survival of the Institution was in jeopardy. Staff members who shared the faith and vision of the founders at times agreed to forego their salaries to keep the Institution alive. We owe a great deal to the sacrifices of those who went before us.

I do not mean to suggest that we no longer have budgetary concerns: in fact, we shall operate at a deficit this year if we are not able to raise additional funds in the next nine months. But we have been able steadily to expand and diversify our sources of support.

In our last fiscal year, total operating expenditures of the Institution came to $5.2 million. Of our total income, 20 percent was derived from investment income, 30 percent from grants of private foundations, 10 percent from government grants and contracts, 8 percent from conference fees, 7 percent from sales of publications and other institutional receipts, and 16 percent from gifts from business firms and individuals.

We have today a large and highly qualified staff; our finances have risen substantially; and we are able to sustain a greater diversity of activities than ever before. I believe it will not be immodest to say that the Institution today realizes its founders' dreams more fully than at any time in the half century of our existence.

Let me turn now to the problems which H.R. 13270 would raise for the Brookings Institution.

(1) It is not completely clear into which category the Brookings Institution would fall under the bill as now written. Though under the mechanical test of Section 509, Brookings would seem to approach the categories of publicly- and broadly-supported organizations which escape the restraints imposed by the bill, it would probably fail to meet these mechanical tests by a small margin. Our problem is that the "disqualified person" restriction in the formula in Section 509(a)(2) for defining broadly-supported organizations is fixed, regardless of the size of the recipient organization, by reference to any contribution over $5,000, and therefore discriminates against relatively large organizations; a $5,000 contribution is a large contribution to an organization with a $50,000 budget but it not a large contribution to an organization with a $5 million budget. We request that the Committee substitute a percentage limitation in place of his fixed dollar limitation.

If Brookings cannot qualify for exclusion from the private foundation category under the formula in Section 509(a)(2), it is not even wholly clear that Brookings would qualify as an operating foundation under the mechanical test imposed by Section 4942(j)(3). In that event, we would be a private non-operating foundation.

We have never regarded ourselves as a "private foundation", nor are we so regarded by the public. We are a research and educational organization and we conduct under our auspicies and through our staff nonpartisan research and educational activities for the benefit of the American public.

While Brookings is far from being a foundation, it is clearly a part of the system of higher education. We are much more akin to a university than to a foundation. We engage in all three of the principal functions of American universities—research, teaching, and public service. Members of our staff enjoy academic freedom. Most of our senior fellows and research associates hold the Ph. D. degree. Our staff members teach not only in our own mid-career educational programs, but also at other institutions. They teach regularly at universities in the Washington area, give lectures and seminars at universities throughout the country, and take leaves of absence from Brookings to teach at universities for a term or semester. Members of university faculties work at Brookings in large numbers—as Guest Scholars, as Economic Policy Fellows, as Research Fellows. More than 50 members of university faculties in all parts of the country are nonresident members of the Brookings staff. The studies we publish are used as textbooks at universities throughout the country.

To treat Brookings as a foundation under the provisions of this bill would, in our judgment, be inconsistent and inequitable. A group of institutions engaged in advanced study and research, of which Brookings is one, is submitting a suggestion for an amendment to the bill which would exclude these organizations from coverage. I respectfully request that the Committee give sympathetic consideration to our case.

(2) In the event that our plea for exclusion is denied, we shall probably be categorized under the terms of the bill as an "operating foundation", although this is by no means certain. But whether or not we were so categorized, we would in any case be subject to the 7½ percent tax on net investment income, as would the private foundations on which we depend for suport.

I find it very difficult to identify a valid tax policy which would support the proposed tax on net investment income. I am familiar with the argument that the services provided by the federal government benefit nonprofit organizations just as they benefit profit-making business corporations, and that the former group should be required to bear some of the cost just as taxable corporations do through the corporate income tax.

However, this argument seems to me defective in two ways. First, regardless of benefits received, business corporations pay no income tax unless they have a positive net income. (Treasury statistics show that most corporations have no taxable net income and hence pay no corporate income tax.) Grant-making foundations should not—and under the terms of H.R. 13270 they may not—earn a positive income; that is, their disbursement to qualified recipients must equal or exceed their net investment income. Hence if they are to be treated analogously to private business firms, they should in all equity be treated like corporations which earn no net income.

If the Brookings Institution had been subject to the 7½ percent tax over the last four years, its annual tax liability would have averaged about $200,000. This is nearly as much as we would have had to pay were we subject to the regular corporate income tax. Although the corporate income tax rate is of course much higher, we would then have been entitled to the 85 percent dividends received credit and the deduction of operating and administrative expenses. Far from being a "modest" or "token" tax, the 7½ percent tax on net investment income would thus impose on Brookings a burden nearly as heavy as the corporate income tax.

Second, a primary justification of the corporate income tax rests on the proposition that in the absence of such a tax, the owners of the corporation would escape taxation under the individual income tax on that portion of their equity in the earnings of the corporations which was not distributed to stockholders. But this rationale clearly has no applicability to foundations and other nonprofit organizations, for these entities have no stockholders who possess an equity interest. Moreover, the requirement that foundations distribute all of their income would in any case prevent foundations from reducing federal receipts from the individual income tax by accumulating income.

The 7½ percent tax would be doubly burdensome on nonprofit research organizations like Brookings, for it would curtail both the income on the Brookings endowment which would be available to finance our program, and the ability of the foundations to make grants to Brookings.

As an alternative to the 7½ percent tax, I hope that the Committee will give consideration to a filing fee sufficient in the aggregate to finance fully the costs of an operating unit in the Internal Revenue Service which would enforce the tax laws applicable to foundations. A fee based on this principle would seem to me wholly equitable.

(3) We have deep apprehensions about the possible effects of Section 4945(c), which in effect prohibits efforts to influence legislation through attempts to affect the opinion of the general public or through private communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, other than through making available the results of nonpartisan analysis and research. Although it would appear on the surface that Brookings is well protected by the exemption for nonpartisan analysis and research—since this phrase constitutes and accurate description of our program—there are ambiguities and uncertainties beneath the surface which could cause serious injury to the morale of our staff and could impair our sources of financial support.

The primary purpose of our studies is to clarify public problems and explore policy alternatives. These studies sometimes contain recommendations of the authors on matters that may, sooner or later, become the subject of legislation. We believe the bill should be clarified to provide assurance that studies of this kind would clearly qualify as "nonpartisan analysis and research" even where the authors' conclusions happen to touch on matters in disagreement between the political parties.

There are other ambiguities. Are we to assume that any activity by a Brookings staff member is assumed to be an act of the Brookings Institution? Is a staff member proscribed from writting a letter to the editor of a newspaper urging the passage or defeat of a particular piece of legislation? A university faculty member is of course perfectly free to do so; is such a person to understand that if he joins the Brookings staff he must surrender these rights of citizenship?

It is a common occurence for a member of Congress or a congressional staff member to write or telephone a specialist on the Brookings staff to ask for information or analysis relating to proposed legislation. Is the Brookings staff member now required to decline to answer such questions?

Remembering that grant-making foundations would, under the bill, bear "expenditure responsibility" for the use of their funds by Brookings, it is predictable that some of them at least will be frightened off by the ambiguities and uncertainties inherent in Section 4945(c). If they are to be jointly responsible for actions by the Brookings staff which may subseqently be deemed improper under these ambiguous provisions, some of them will simply avoid the risk by declining to make the grant. These consequences would seriously impair the effectiveness of Brookings; yet so far as I am aware in the years I have been associated with the Institution, no congressman or senator has ever charged Brookings with seeking improperly to influence legislation.

(4) Because we are so heavily dependent on foundations grants, we are deeply concerned by another consequence of the requirement in Section 4945(f) that the grant-making foundation exercise "expenditure responsibility" with respect to our use of the foundation's funds.

This requirement reveals a confusion and inconsistency of purpose in the proposed legislation. The terms of the definition of "operating foundation" are designed to minimize the degree of control which a grant-making foundation can exercise over an operating foundation. The expenditure resonsibility requirement operates in precisely the opposite direction; it virtually requires a cautious and conscientious grant-making foundation to involve itself intimately in the affairs of the operating foundation. We have on occasion declined to accept grants from foundations—and from the government—on terms which manifested a desire to monitor and influence our work; we have our own standards of integrity, and we think they may be breached if we allow any other organization—even the organization which is putting up the money—to enterfere in our work. Now the "expenditure responsibility" requirement will virtually force them to. It will be difficult to maintain the independence of the Brookings Institution if foundations are required to assume expenditure responsibility with respect to their grants to us.

All of these problems would be solved if the bill recognized us for what we are: an independent, nonpartisan institution, akin to a university, engaged in advanced study and education. I hope that the Committee will accept this view, and amend the bill as we have requested.

STATEMENT OF CARYL P. HASKINS, PRESIDENT, CARNEGIE INSTITUTION OF WASHINGTON

This statement, presented on behalf of Carnegie Institution of Washington, is filed as a supplement to testimony on behalf of the group of advanced study and research organizations of which the Institution is a member.

Carnegie Institution of Washington was founded by Andrew Carnegie in 1902 and incorporated by Act of Congress approved April 28, 1904 (Public Law 260, 58th Congress). Under the Act, a copy of which is attached, its purposes are to "encourage, in the broadest and most liberal manner, investigation, research, and discovery, and the application of knowledge to the improvement of mankind; and in particular . . . to conduct, endow, and assist investigation . . . and to cooperate with governments, universities, colleges, [and] technical schools. . . ." Throughout its life, the Institution has performed educational functions along with fundamental research in accordance with Mr. Carnegie's original Deed of Trust which provided that the Institution should "afford instruction of an advanced character to students properly qualified to profit thereby." The Institution has always been governed by a Board of Trustees independent of its founder. They have always been drawn from the most distinguished Americans of their time. Past Trustees have included Alexander Agassiz, General Omar N. Bradley, Robert Woods Bliss, Frederic A. Delano, Simon Flexner, James Forrestal, Herbert Hoover, Ernest O Lawrence, Charles A .Lindbergh, Henry Cabot Lodge, General John J. Pershing, Elihu Root, William Howard Taft, and others.

The current Board includes: Eric Ashby, Amory H. Bradford, Vannevar Bush, Michael Ference, Jr., Carl J. Gilbert, William T. Golden, Crawford H. Greenewalt, Caryl P. Haskins, Alfred L. Loomis, Robert A. Lovett, William McC. Martin, Jr., Keith S. McHugh, Henry S. Morgan, William I. Myers, Garrison Norton, Robert M. Pennoyer, Richard S. Perkins, William M. Roth, William W. Rubey, Frank Stanton, Charles P. Taft, Charles H. Townes, Juan T. Trippe, and James N. White.

In pursuit of its program, the Institution operates six facilities: a photosynthesis and experimental ecology laboratory on the campus of Stanford University in California; an embryology laboratory on the campus of Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore; two laboratories in Washington, D.C. specializing in geophysics, biophysics, and astrophysics; a genetics laboratory in Cold Spring Harbor, New York; and (jointly with California Institute of Technology) the world-famous Mount Wilson and Palomar astronomical observatories in California. The work and functions of the Institution parallel in many respects the work and functions of the Smithsonian Institution.

All of our departments cöoperate in the programs of a university or universities. One of the best known associations is that with the California Institute of Technology. The Institution and the Institute jointly manage the Mount Wilson and Palomar Observatories, which offer the leading astronomical observing facilities in the world and for many years have been the world center for advanced training of astronomers. The Institution also has a photosynthesis and plant ecology laboratory on the campus of Stanford University, and an internationally leading laboratory of embryology on the campus of Johns Hopkins University, both important centers of graduate and postdoctoral training.

In order to devote its full energies to its research and educational activities, the Institution has never solicited support from the general public. It relies primarily on the income of its endowment most of which derives from gifts made by Mr. Carnegie in 1902 and 1910, before income tax laws came into effect. It accepts a limited number of grants from government agencies, principally from the National Science Foundation and NASA.

The professional staff at the six departments is composed of about 70 senior scientists, who conduct research of the most advanced kind. Although each department is of relatively small size, all enjoy worldwide recognition and esteem. Many of our scientists serve on university faculties, and the facilities are generally available to university faculty members. More than 100 visiting scientists, American and foreign, shared our laboratories and observatories last year.

Candidates for the Doctor of Philosophy degree at universities carry on their research in our laboratories under the supervision of Staff Members of the Institution, and the laboratories are accredited for this purpose. Sixty students worked at the Institution during 1968–1969. Even more important, about 55 younger scientists who have received their degrees work each year on postgraduate research as the colleagues of older and more experienced investigators in its laboratories and observatories. A striking illustration of the close relations between Fellows and Staff Members occurs at the Institution's Mount Wilson Observatory where approximately half of the observing nights on the telescopes are allocated to students and Fellows.

In some fields, as in embryology and astronomy, the Institution has provided a major world source of advanced investigators who go on to teaching or research posts from these fellowships. About 440 men and women have held fellowships at the Institution since 1952. Of these more than half now have professorships or other academic positions, and are considered leaders in their profession. Eighty have gone on to responsible positions in fundamental research, and 28 to industrial and other applied research.

During the fiscal years 1967–68 and 1968–69, about $4.8 million per year was spent for operations, 88 percent from endowment fund sources, for support of the staff, Fellows and students. We have reported publicly on our work in a report distributed throughout the world every year since 1902.

The Institution, I am proud to say, operates with a high degree of economy. Government salaries have long been our standard, and we never have exceeded them. Our ratio of technical assistants to Ph. D.'s in our laboratories is 1 to 1.9 and the ratio of all supporting staff, including even buildings and grounds, to Ph. D.'s is only 1.2 to 1. These ratios again are low. At the same time we make decisions on important new initiatives quickly—usually within a day or two.

For 67 years the Institution has contributed actively to the intellectual life of the country, particularly in the natural sciences. Many of the exciting astronomical discoveries that have totally changed man's concepts of the universe have come from Mount Wilson and Palomar, supported and managed by the Institution and the California Institute of Technology.

The Institution's program has always been devoted primarily to scientific fundamental research and highly specialized scientific instruction, but a number of its research results have been of great practical importance to the nation. Methods of hybridizing corn, which have meant billions of dollars to American farmers and industry, were first developed in our Department of Genetics in 1911. Other such discoveries include silicates for optical glass, refractories and high strength cements; and research on the ionosphere that led to long distance radio transmission. Our scientists have made valued contributions to the national defense, in their early work on radar, in the invention of the proximity fuse, in devices for night detection of aircraft, and in design of the atomic submarine. Its research has assisted medicine, as in improved methods of penicillin production, and in embryological investigations.

During the Second World War the Institution also was the source of many of the ablest scientists in the Office of Scientific Research and Development (OSRD), of which the Director was Dr. Vannevar Bush, President of the Institution.

These contributions are continuing. Our Department of Terrestrial Magnetism has just reported the invention of an extraordinarily sensitive new instrument for measuring strain within the earth. It is so sensitive that it measures displacements one-thousandth the distance within an atom. We believe that we may have in this instrument a means of developing predictions of major earthquakes.

The Institution's research has always been self-generated. It has never accepted and does not now accept sponsored research, whether from a government agency or from a private corporation. However, the Institution has always been quick to expend its funds to meet national needs. For example, early pathfinding research on the proximity fuse and on the atomic bomb were initiated by its personnel and supported by it.

In sum, the Carnegie Institution is an operating organization engaged in fundamental research that also makes important contributions to advanced education and scientific training. Some of its operations are integrated with university facilities. Many of its staff serve on university faculties, and its facilities are generally available to university faculty members. A number of graduate students do their theses in its laboratories under supervision of its staff; and a substantial number of young scientists with advanced degrees are each year resident in the laboratories and receive the most advanced training available in their fields. There is little difference between the operations of the Institution and those of the research institutes or graduate departments of many universities.

Unfortunately, however, the proposals in H.R. 13270, as we read them, may be construed to place the Institution in a category different from that of the universities and thus have a crippling effect upon its operations.

The tax proposals which would severely and adversely affect the operation of the Institution's research facilities and educational program are the provisions that would (1) reduce by 7½ per cent the investment income on which the Institution depends; (2) disqualify it as a recipient of support from grant-making foundations; (3) exclude it from the category of 30 per cent organizations for purposes of charitable contribution deductions by individuals; and (4) make it virtually ineligible as a donee of appreciated securities.

These provisions would apply to the Institution because, under the proposed definitions, it may not fall, as it should, in the category of "educational organization" except from the category of "private foundation" and would probably be treated under the proposed law (notwithstanding the fact that it is in every sense an operating research and educational institution) as a "non-operating private foundation." This is true for the following reasons: (1) The value of the Institution's endowment, the income from which is essential to its operations and is wholly expended therefor, is considerably more than the value of its laboratory buildings, equipment, and other physical assets. (2) The Institution does not receive a substantial part of support either from the government or the general public.

The most serious damage to the Institution's program caused by the proposed legislation would be (1) reduction of its total program caused by payment of federal taxes coupled with (2) doubt as to its eligibility to receive fully deductible contributions from individuals or grants from other foundations. These provisions would force curtailment or even abandonment of parts of a program that has prepared many national leaders of research and teaching, past and present, in astronomy, embryology, plant biology, geophysics, and genetics. They could very well force abandonment of a major new astronomical observatory, of the Palomar class, which we have just begun in South America.

We respectfully urge that provision be made so that the Carnegie Institution and similar organizations will be specifically retained in the exempt category of "public" and "operating" institution. This result can best be accomplished by defining an "educational organization" exempt from classification as a private foundation to include not only schools, colleges, and universities, but also an "organization primarily engaged in fundamental research (or an organization of the kind described in Section 512(b)(9)) that operates laboratories and other facilities for such research, and provides related instruction to individuals who are candidates for degrees at colleges or universities and postdoctoral training to individuals who are not candidates for degrees."

If such provision is made, as I most earnestly hope it will be, the Institution will be enabled to continue its 67-year old program; to make important basic research contributions, to prepare university teachers, and to give foreign scientists as opportunity to understand us by working with us.

Articles of Incorporation

[Public No. 260. An Act to incorporate the Carnegie Institution of Washington]

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the persons following, being persons who are now trustees of the Carnegie Institution, namely, Alexander Agassiz, John S. Billings, John L. Cadwalader, Cleveland H. Dodge, William N. Frew, Lyman J. Gage, Daniel C. Gilman, John Hay, Henry L. Higginson, William Wirt Howe, Charles L. Hutchinson, Samuel P. Langley, William Lindsay, Seth Low, Wayne MacVeagh, Darius O. Mills, S. Weir Mitchell, William W. Morrow, Ethan A. Hitchcock, Elihu Root, John C. Spooner, Andrew D. White, Charles D. Walcott, Carroll D. Wright, their associates and successors, duly chosen, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporated by the name of the Carnegie Institution of Washington and by that name shall be known and have perpetual succession, with the powers, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

Sec. 2. That the objects of the corporation shall be to encourage, in the broadest and most liberal manner, investigation, research, and discovery, and the application of knowledge to the improvement of mankind; and in particular—

(a) To conduct, endow, and assist investigation in any department of science, literature, or art, and to this end to cooperate with governments, universities, colleges, technical schools, learned societies, and individuals.

(b) To appoint committees of experts to direct special lines of research.

(c) To publish and distribute documents.

(d) To conduct lectures, hold meetings, and acquire and maintain a library.

(e) To purchase such property, real or personal, and construct such building or buildings as may be necessary to carry on the work of the corporation.

(f) In general, to do and perform all things necessary to promote the objects of the institution, with full power, however, to the trustees hereinafter appointed and their successors from time to time to modify the conditions and regulations under which the work shall be carried on, so as to secure the application of the funds in the manner best adapted to the conditions of the time, provided that the objects of the corporation shall be all times be among the foregoing or kindred thereto.

Sec. 3. That the direction and management of the affairs of the corporation and the control and disposal of its property and funds shall be vested in a board of trustees, twenty-two in number, to be composed of the following individuals: Alexander Agassiz, John S. Billings, John L. Cadwalader, Cleveland H. Dodge, William N. Frew, Lyman J. Gage, Daniel C. Gilman, John Hay, Henry L. Higginson, William Wirt Howe, Charles L. Hutchinson, Samuel P. Langley, William Lindsay, Seth Low, Wayne MacVeagh, Darius O. Mills, S. Weir Mitchell, William W. Morrow, Ethan A. Hitchcock, Elihu Root, John C. Spooner, Andrew D. White, Charles D. Walcott, Carroll D. Wright, who shall constitute the first board of trustees. The board of trustees shall have power from time to time to increase its membership to not more than twenty-seven members. Vacancies occasioned by death, resignation, or otherwise shall be filled by the remaining trustees in such manner as the by-laws shall prescribe; and the persons so elected shall thereupon become trustees and also members of the said corporation. The principal place of business of the said corporation shall be the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Sec. 4. That such board of trustees shall be entitled to take, hold, and administer the securities, funds, and property so transferred by said Andrew Carnegie to the trustees of the Carnegie Institution and such other funds or property as may at any time be given, devised, or bequeathed to them, or to such corporation, for the purposes of the trust; and with full power from time to time to adopt a common seal, to appoint such officers, members of the board of trustees or otherwise, and such employees as may be deemed necessary in carrying on the business of the corporation, at such salaries or with such remuneration as they may deem proper; and with full power to adopt by-laws from time to time and such rules or regulations as may be necessary to secure the safe and convenient transaction of the business of the corporation; and with full power and discretion to deal with and expend the income of the corporation in such manner as in their judgment will best promote the objects herein set forth and in general to have and use all powers and authority necessary to promote such objects and carry out the purposes of the donor. The said trustees shall have further power from time to time to hold as investments the securities hereinabove referred to so transferred by Andrew Carnegie, and any property which has been or may be transferred to them or such corporation by Andrew Carnegie or by any other person, persons, or corporation, and to invest any sums or amounts from time to time in such securities and such form and manner as are permitted to trustees or to charitable or literary corporations for investment, according to the laws of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, or Massachusetts, or in such securities as are authorized for investment by the said deed of trust so executed by Andrew Carnegie, or by any deed of gift or last will and testament to be hereafter made or executed.

Sec. 5. That the said corportion may take and hold any additional donations, grants, devises, or bequests which may be made in further support of the purposes of the said corporation, and may include in the expenses thereof the personal expenses which the trustees may incur in attending meetings or otherwise in carrying out the business of the trust, but the services of the trustees as such shall be gratuitous.

Sec. 6. That as soon as may be possible after the passage of this Act a meeting of the trustees hereinbefore named shall be called by Daniel C. Gilman, John S. Billings, Charles D. Walcott, S. Weir Mitchell, John Hay, Elihu Root, and Carroll D. Wright, or any four of them, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, by notice served in person or by mail addressed to each trustee at his place of residence; and the said trustees, or a majority thereof, being assembled, shall organize and proceed to adopt by-laws, to elect officers and appoint committees, and generally to organize the said corporation; and said trustees herein named, on behalf of the corporation hereby incorporated, shall thereupon receive, take over, and enter into possession, custody, and management of all property, real or personal, of the corporation heretofore known as the Carnegie Institution, incorporated, as hereinbefore set forth under "An Act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia, January fourth, nineteen hundred and two," and to all its rights, contracts, claims and property of any kind or nature; and the several officers of such corporation, or any other person having charge of any of the securities, funds, real or personal, books, or property thereof, shall, on demand, deliver the same to the said trustees appointed by this Act or to the persons appointed by them to receive the same; and the trustees of the existing corporation and the trustees herein named shall and may take such other steps as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

Sec. 7. That the rights of the creditors of the said existing corporation known as the Carnegie Institution shall not in any manner be impaired by the passage of this Act, or the transfer of the property hereinbefore mentioned, nor shall any liability or obligation for the payment of any sums due or to become due, or any claim or demand, in any manner or for any cause existing against the said existing corporation, be released or impaired; but such corporation hereby incorporated is declared to succeed to the obligations and liabilities and to be held liable to pay and discharge all of the debts, liabilities, and contracts of the said corporation so existing to the same effect as if such new corporation had itself incurred the obligation or lability to pay such debt or damages, and no such action or proceeding before any court or tribunal shall be deemed to have abated or been discontinued be reason of the passage of this Act.

Sec. 8. That Congress may from time to time alter, repeal, or modify this Act of incorporation, but no contract or individual right made or acquired shall thereby be divested or impaired.

Sec. 9. That this Act shall take effect immediately.

Approved, April 28, 1904.

CENTER FOR ADVANCED STUDY IN THE BEHAVIORAL SCIENCES,
Stanford, Calif., September 5, 1969.

HON. RUSSELL B. LONG,
Chairman, Finance Committee,
The Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LONG: I am writing in my capacity as Director of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, a postdoctoral educational institution providing for the further development and advancement of scholars who have completed their formal university training and who have distinguished themselves by their work in the field of behavioral sciences. I write because of our concern about certain potentially adverse effects which H.R. 13270, the tax reform bill which your Committee is now reviewing, might have upon an organization such as ours.

Some of the points in this letter will be touched upon in the testimony which I and representatives of certain other organizations expect to present before your Committee on Wednesday, September 10, 1969. I think it may be helpful to your Committee also to have this fuller statement of the Center's views.

Our concern lies not in certain restrictions which the bill seeks to impose on "private foundations," such as restrictions on self-dealing, excessive business holdings, and investments which jeopardize the organization's purposes. Instead. I am concerned about provisions in the bill which might be interpreted so as to jeopardize the support for, and hence the ability of, the Center to carry out its mission, a mission which I believe is clearly in the best interest of scholarship and education in this country.

From a review of the bill passed by the House of Representatives and the report of the House Ways and Means Committee, I believe that the Center, as a postdoctoral educational organization, should not be classified under Section 509 as a "private foundation." Moreover, even if the Center were so classified, it is the kind of an institution which, according to the House Committee report (p. 41), should be eligible, as an "operating foundation," to receive qualifying distributions from other foundations.

I am troubled, however, by some of the rigid standards and inflexible criteria in the bill which might permit, contrary to what I believe to be the Congressional intent, a different classification, thereby damaging the ability of the Center to raise the support it vitally needs if it is to carry out its purposes.

More specifically, my concern is that if the House bill were enacted in substantially its present form, it might be possible for enforcing authorities to conclude that the Center is not an educational organization exempted from the "private foundation" category by Section 509(a)(1) and further that the Center, because its sources and levels of support vary from year to year, has not met the rigid fiscal criteria needed to qualify as an "operating foundation." The end result of such classifications would be that other foundations could not make "qualifying distributions" to the Center, which count toward satisfaction of the foundation's obligation to distribute income. Accordingly, the foundations probably would be reluctant to make grants to organizations like ours. For an educational institution like the Center, which from its inception has been dependent on support from private foundations (and recently on government grants and fellowships as well), such a result could endanger not only our future growth, but also our very existence.

Such an impediment to obtaining further support would be particularly damaging to relatively young, innovating organizations like the Center. The Center has been, in the 15 years of its existence, a leader in the field of postdoctoral education. It began with an idea for an experiment in higher education—now an established aspect of higher education. As is often the case, such experiments initially depend on foundation support—and that has certainly been the history of the Center. Now that its concept has been proven, the Trustees of the Center have decided that it would be in the best long-term interests of education in this country to seek to endow the life of the Center, rather than to rely on tentative annual funding. This effort to achieve stability and permanence could be thwarted, unjustifiably in my view, by the impediments which the House bill might place on potential sources of support.

With your indulgence, I would like to review the activities of the Center in hopes that the substantive purposes and operating procedures of organizations like ours, rather than the rigid standards and inflexible criteria found in H.R. 13270, would be utilized more fully to determine the impact of any tax reform legislation which may be enacted. I would also urge that the Committee review, in light of the description which follows, the scope to be given the term "educational organizations" (in Section 170(b)(1)(B)(ii)), which are excluded from the category of "private foundations" by Section 509(a)(1). I urge this review primarily because there have been substantial advances in educational theory and practice since that definition was first adopted in 1954, particularly at the postdoctoral level of education which was in its infancy at that time.

The Board of Trustees of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences holds in its trust and is responsible for the operation of an educational institution which was established to provide for the further development and maturity of distinguished scholars who had already completed all the formal work provided by our universities and who, by their additions to knowledge, were regarded as among the best students of the Behavioral Science world. The Center, one of the few institutions in this country offering formal in-residence postdoctoral education, combines for scholars in the social sciences, psychology, philosophy, the humanities and biology, opportunities to increase their competency, broaden their perspectives, and to expand man's knowledge of human behavior.

Some of the special characteristics of the Center as a postdoctoral educational institution are:

The gathering in one place of leading scholars in varying disciplines fundamental to behavioral sciences.

The opportunity for interdisciplinary exchange and study in seminars, working groups and joint explorations, with each scholar drawing new knowledge and understanding from other disciplines.

The freedom for scholars alone or with others to explore a given field or subject in depth.

The chance for a scholar to engage in research, writing or self-examination, to reassess his goals and priorities, to test his hypotheses, to engage in original scholarship with new insights provided by scholars in other disciplines.

The opportunity to receive formal instruction in highly specialized areas.

Like other educational institutions with very high standards, the Center exercises extreme care in the selection of the Fellows who comprise its student body. The process involves two basic stages: determination of a candidate's eligibility, and selection of each year's roster of Fellows.

Eligibility: Judgments concerning all candidates nominated for Fellowships are based upon information provided by the candidate's references, confidential panels of leading scholars in the candidate's field and, at times, interviews with some of the Center's Trustees. Because of the importance attached to this process, selections, which are made solely by the Trustees after long periods of review, are based upon the following criteria: (1) interest in developing more adequate knowledge of human behavior, (2) intellectual competence, (3) knowledge of significant work in his discipline, and (4) promise as a productive scholar.

Selection of each year's roster: The determination of each year's roster is normally completed 1 year in advance, based upon the candidate's preferences and upon other criteria designed to insure an appropriate distribution among disciplines, institutions, nationalities and age levels. Since each scholar is an essential part of the environment for the others, great care is exercised in the selection process to insure the creation of an exciting and stimulating intellectual environment.

I am attaching a table showing the distribution of Fellowships by field of study, and by country or state of origin. The evaluation of the period of study at the Center by the Fellows themselves is very high. In the interest of brevity, I have not included a list of the Fellows or their reports on their year at the Center, but they are available should you or your staff desire to review them.

The products of the Center, also characteristic of leading educational institutions, include: the enhanced quality and competence of the scholars; new or more sharply defined goals and perspectives; impressive additions to the literature and to man's knowledge in the behavior sciences.

Much of the value of the Center is to be found in the changed perspective and the increased vitality of the scholars themselves, but it may help to appreciate the value of the Center if your Committee were to have available some concrete evidence of the product of the research which takes place here at the Center. I am, therefore, attaching a list of books which have been attributed by their authors to the influence of the Center and to the period of time which they spent here as Fellows. These 18 pages of bibliography do not include any of the articles, published in professional journals here and abroad, which would number in the thousands.*

While there may have been little understanding of the concept of postdoctoral education and the Center 15 years ago, the concept is clearly established today and the status of the Center as a postdoctoral educational institution is well recognized. It is regarded as such by most colleges and universities and has been referred to as such by Presidential Committees and Federal agencies. The

*The list referred to was made a part of the official files of the committee.

Center is, in fact, supported as an organization providing opportunities for postdoctoral education and research, both directly and indirectly, by the Office of Education, the National Science Foundation and the National Institutes of Mental Health. This support includes both grants made directly to the Center and scholarships provided to the Fellows.

As early as 1960, the President's Science Advisory Committee referred to postdoctoral education as a "new and growing form of higher education." The following quotation from Dr. Ernest R. Hilgard, Chairman of the Behavioral and Social Science Survey Committee, which was created in 1968 to advise the National Research Council and the Social Science Research Council on the support needed for the behavioral sciences, may help to appraise postdoctoral education generally, as well as the stature of the Center.

Postdoctoral training is coming to be expected in the physical and biological sciences as a matter of course, and only more slowly so in psychology and the social sciences. In some parts of Europe and Asia there is a special kind of degree or diploma issued on the basis of advanced scholarship, after formal graduate-school training is completed. We may be coming to that in this country. The many "specialty-boards" in medicine are being duplicated now in psychology; this is a straw in the wind. Apart from formalities, there is no doubt that the Center is a postdoctoral educational institution, contributing to the understanding of advanced scholars, and through them modifying the course of training in our universities.

As might be expected, however, postdoctoral education for distinguished scholars differs significantly in form and content from formal education at lower levels of attainment. It is here that the scope to be given the term "educational organization" contained in H.R. 13270 may come into question. For example, that definition (Section 170(b)(1)(B)(ii)) calls for a "regular faculty and curriculum."

The Center has a regular faculty but one whose characteristics differ substantially from an undergraduate faculty. The Center has a few paid staff members providing formal instruction in specialized areas (mathematics, computer science, languages), but the bulk of the faculty is, in keeping with advanced concepts of postdoctoral education, drawn from the ranks of the noted scholars in residence at the Center. In seminars, working groups and joint explorations, one scholar—by definition a teacher as well—will teach his colleagues. At other times, he will be a student of his colleagues. Thus, the very nature of postdoctoral education requires a departure from the particular concept of a regular faculty employed at lower educational levels.

Similarly, in keeping with modern concepts of advanced education, the Center's curriculum differs in character from that found at the undergraduate level. While the Center offers formal instruction in certain specialized areas and draws on the curriculum of leading colleges and universities located nearby, a major part of the Center's educational program does not involve a curriculum similar to that found at lower levels. Instead, the scholars themselves—interacting, studying in seminars, working groups, joint explorations, or alone—chart in substantial part, the course of their educational enrichment and exploration. This widely accepted concept of a regular curriculum in postdoctoral education might be though by some to be inconsistent with the meaning of the phrase "regular curriculum" as it was adopted in 1954 with reference to education at lower levels of attainment.

We believe that the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences is in fact, an educational institution. We believe that the provisions of H.R. 13270 might work a hardship on our program and might make it impossible for us to continue. We believe that the loss of the Center for Advanced Study as a resource for postdoctoral work in the behavioral sciences would be a serious loss to scholarship in the United States and to the understanding of human behavior among the scholars of the world at large.

We would hope that in light of the significance of this matter to the future course of education, it could receive the consideration of your Committee. We would recommend that the Committee consider, should it decide to report favorably on legislation similar to H.R. 13270, either confirming in the Committee's report that organizations like the Center fall within the scope of the term "educational organizations" in Section 170(b)(1)(B)(ii) or amending that definition of an "educational organization" so as to make it expressly clear that it includes organizations such as ours which normally maintain a regular program for the postdoctoral education of scholars.

We would be pleased, of course, to assist the Committee or its staff should any further information or materials be needed.

Very truly yours,

O. MEREDITH WILSON,
Director.
